PRIVILEGE

MR. DUMONT—RESIGNATION AND FAREWELL

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I should like to inform the House that, as of this day, I shall no longer represent the constituency of Frontenac. I am resigning with the satisfaction of having discharged my responsibilities. Other duties will enable me to return to Ottawa in order to negotiate the rights of Quebec, after April 29.

I urge the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to take the advice of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and get married so as to be able to grasp the human problems facing all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, to you and to all my colleagues I say that the experience gained in this House is highly valuable. I thank you all for your understanding, but we will surely meet again.

Som hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member should perhaps indicate to the Chair whether his resignation comes into force immediately or whether he intends to tell us when he will leave the House?

Mr. Dumont: It will take effect this very day, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Frontenac having notified us of his intention to resign his seat, it is my duty to inform the House that when the Clerk has entered such notice on the journals of the House, in accordance with the provisions of section 6, chapter 143 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, namely under the House of Commons Act, I shall forthwith address my warrant to the Chief Electoral Officer, for the issue of a writ for the election of a new member for the said federal constituency.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I thought it might be of some assistance to the House if I indicated the plan for House business for this week commencing April 6.

As hon. members know, the first item for today will be government order No. 5, the report stage of Bill C-3, the hate literature bill, to be followed by third reading in due course. The second item is government order No. 15, the bill with regard to the International Development Research Centre; we would expect that would be called tomorrow. The remaining two days of the budget debate, that is, the fifth and sixth appointed days, would be called for Wednesday and Thursday of this week. Friday will be the remaining allotted day from the last period which, pursuant to the order made by the House, will be allotted to the New Democratic Party.

I hope to have a meeting with the House Leaders later today or tomorrow to discuss the general allocation of business for this part of the session.

CRIMINAL CODE

BREATHALYZER PROVISIONS—REFERENCE OF VALIDITY OF PROCLAMATION TO SUPREME COURT

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the government has decided today to refer the important question of whether the breathalyzer provisions of the Criminal Code were validly proclaimed on December 1 last to the Supreme Court of Canada for hearing and consideration pursuant to section 55 of the Supreme Court Act. This step is being taken because of the recent judgment of the Supreme Court of British Columbia in the case of Regina v. Story which held that these provisions had not been properly proclaimed.

The breathalyzer provisions contained in recent Criminal Code amendments were designed to attack the ever-growing problem of death and injury on the highways resulting from persons driving motor vehicles after having consumed excessive amounts of alcohol. While the legislation included provisions dealing with approved containers that might be used as a check on police equipment and analysis, it was made clear by the government when the legislation was before the House of Commons that approved containers had not yet been perfected and that they were not yet available for use. It was also made clear that the breathalyzer provisions would be brought into force notwithstanding the unavailability of approved containers. Indeed, the provision of the law dealing with approved containers was included as part of the legislation for the sole purpose of avoiding the delay that would result if additional legislation were required to make approved containers, once perfected, available to the public as an additional possible defence.

Because of the importance of the new breathalyzer laws to all Canadians and the desirability of eliminating confusion in the public mind that will result if these laws are not enforced with reasonable uniformity throughout the country, and because of the conflict of judicial opinion that has recently developed as to whether they are now properly in force, I consider it desirable to have this issue determined definitively as quickly as possible.

By proceeding by way of a direct reference to the Supreme Court of Canada rather than by the ordinary appeal route, I feel that a good deal of time will be saved in clarifying the legal status of the breathalyzer provisions as proclaimed last December. In addition, a substantial amount of court time throughout the country will not have to be taken up with needless argument and this in turn should result in a significant saving of expense to persons charged under the breathalyzer provisions of the Code. The required Order in Council under section 55 of the Supreme Court Act will be filed with the Supreme Court of Canada within the next few days.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I do not like to start off in a critical fashion just after the Easter recess but I am afraid I must. At five minutes before two o'clock today we received a document called a press release. On a matter as serious as this I should have thought the Minister of Justice would hand to the official opposition a copy of the statement he should have made on motions before issuing a press release, and flowing from that statement there could well have been a press report.

[Mr. Turner.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, it is high time that Parliament was taken into the confidence of this government, whose arrogance is beyond understanding.

I should like to refer to an interesting point brought to my attention by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants who first brought this whole matter to the attention of Parliament. He pointed out that this proclamation was wrong and, as the minister knows, he is one of the leading members of the House on the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. I should like to quote from page 476 of Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence No. 11 of that committee to show that the minister was well aware of the law or appeared to be well aware of it, unless he received some bad advice along the way. The relevant date is Tuesday, March 18, 1969. As I say, at page 476 of that report the minister is reported as having said:

> The Attorney General of Canada will have to approve some container as suitable. We do not have a suitable container yet developed. What happened of course was that testimony was given to this committee last year or the year before that there was a suitable container which has turned out to be inaccurate evidence. That is the problem that Mr. Hogarth was talking about and that is why we have to delay the proclamation.

In other words, when the minister was before the committee he knew that he would have to make the proclamation with respect to the law on the breathalyzer test. He also knew that he had to specify in that proclamation the kind of container and the kind of scientific equipment that was necessary. During the Easter holidays, following the decision of Judge Craig Munroe, the minister said, "We are going to appeal." I hope, now that he has had a change of heart and is going to refer the matter to the Supreme Court of Canada, that he will remember that we are dealing here with something involving the rights of citizens.

Parliament passes the laws, though it is true they flow from the government. But I submit that even the present executive, including the Minister of Justice and the present Prime Minister, must obey Parliament and cannot by proclamation go beyond the powers this institution has given it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: The press release from the office of the Minister of Justice reads in part as follows:

> Mr. Turner pointed out that the breathalyzer provisions contained in recent Criminal Code amendments were designed to attack the ever-growing problem of death and injury on the highways resulting from persons driving motor vehicles after having consumed excessive amounts of alcohol.

That may be true. Parliament passed the act but the executive went far beyond it. This action is a typical example of rule by cabinet and not by Parliament. It is a typical example of the bind the government will get itself into in future if it continues to follow this course. The people of Canada still trust Parliament, even if the government does not.

[Editor's Note: At this point a voice from the gallery shouted, "I don't."]

Mr. Woolliams: Why don't you resign your seat? You are drawing good pay.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: That was from the gallery.

Mr. Woolliams: He is getting good pay, too.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: I hope the Minister of Justice will take into consideration the cost to the citizen of this appeal. I like the procedure being followed in this instance but I submit that my criticism has been well-founded.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, there is one aspect of the minister's statement that I would commend, and only one. If the deed must be done, it is well that it be done quickly. If this matter is to go to the courts then I submit it is proper that it should go to the Supreme Court of Canada as quickly as possible in order to avoid confusion in the courts and to avoid confusing the people of Canada on this important subject.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is a far more serious aspect of this matter than the mere legal aspect. I am not, of course, going to discuss the legal aspects since the matter is before the courts, but I want to refer to the question of the rights of Parliament. I suggest that whatever the law is and whatever the Supreme Court of Canada may say, it is a most outrageous and dangerous precedent that says that the criminal law of this country should not be made here, in Parliament, by the peoples' elected representatives but by the cabinet of the day. This is a very dangerous precedent and one that should be avoided.

What is the situation? Parliament designed this legislation. I will not comment on it. I think it was excellent in purpose and as far as I am concerned I approved of it. But a safeguard for the subject was tied right into the legislation. What happened? This part of it, taken right out of context, is not proclaimed. This is a form of selective delegation which warps the meaning and intent of Parliament. This is not a minor matter. It is not taking one section, putting it into effect today and taking another section and putting it into effect tomorrow. That might be perfectly all right. This is removing the integral part of the section, a safeguard given to the subject in a matter of penal law, and saying, we, the cabinet, are going to pass this law in a different form from that approved by Parliament.

The intentions may have been excellent. Perhaps the containers are not yet available or something of the sort. If that is so, the government should have either proclaimed the whole thing or come back to Parliament and said that they could not do this and wanted to change the law. Perhaps they could have been able to do that.

I say that the greatest safeguard that exists to the liberty of the subject is that the criminal and penal laws of this country in serious matters of this sort which affect the liberty of the subject should be made by Parliament and not by the cabinet of the day. For this reason, whatever the legal consequences, I repeat that it is a dangerous and outrageous precedent that we have before us today.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister's statement could start an important debate among lawyers. I am not a lawyer but I feel that the question is urgent and important since a decision of the Supreme Court of British Columbia has made it possible to question the validity of the act providing for the use of the breathalizer. In my opinion, the minister was absolutely justified in making a statement today and to act as swiftly as possible, so that we know exactly what the situation is regarding this important matter.

I agree entirely with the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) who says that an amendment to the Criminal Code must first of all be introduced in the House of Commons.

However, the procedure, if followed, would take four, five or even six months before the law is passed. However, under present circumstances, I believe it is urgent that this question be decided upon as soon as possible and that the government take its responsibilities in this field.

It is absolutely inconceivable and unacceptable that the use of the breathalyzer be legal in one province and illegal in another. It is important to standardize the law throughout Canada and it is for that reason that we approve the announcement made in the House today by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner).

AGRICULTURE

DAIRY POLICY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion the necessity and the urgency of which are explained by what follows.

On March 23 last, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) announced his dairy policy. As he was not in the House on March 24 and 25, it was impossible for us to obtain any further details about some very important points of this policy.

The new estimates run to $115 million compared to $125 million last year. Furthermore, the government has announced a fine of $1.25 per cwt. for all milk produced in excess of the allotted quotas, thus creating a drastic situation for milk producers in general and those from Quebec in particular.

Actually, Quebec produces 75 per cent of Canada's "above quota" milk. The government's policy is therefore ruthlessly aimed at producers in Quebec, primarily a dairy province.

What does the government intend to offer to the dairy producers? Retraining courses or subsidies for pilot projects on different branches of Quebec's agricultural industry? Thousands of producers are now threatened and may end up dependent on the government since the present subsidies are needed even by the most efficient producers.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McKinley) that an emergency debate take place on the government's dairy policy which is now affecting thousands of dairy producers and places them in danger of bankruptcy.

[Mr. Caouette.]

Mr. Speaker: I could not see in the remarks of the hon. member a motion which might be put before the House. However I do not wish to make difficulties. In my opinion it is simpler to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to hold a debate as proposed by the member for Joliette.

[English]

Is there unanimous consent under the terms of Standing Order 43?

Some hon. Members: No.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: As there is no unanimous consent, the hon. member's motion cannot be put at this time.

HOUSING

CONTINUING DECLINE IN STARTS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I rise to seek leave to make a motion with the unanimous consent of the House under the provisions of Standing Order 43. My reasons for doing so will be apparent from a study of the most recent release of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation on the housing situation throughout Canada in the month of February.

This release shows that the grave and growing housing crisis is getting worse and that it is not being dealt with. It reveals that during February housing starts for all Canada were at the rate of 158,000 a year. The Economic Council of Canada has made it clear that if the need is to be met there must be at least 215,000 starts. In urban centres whose population exceeds 10,000, starts for February were down 46 per cent compared with the number a year ago. On the other hand, the rate of interest charged by the corporation has risen from 10.1 per cent to 10.25 per cent.

Shelter and housing are absolutely essential, Mr. Speaker, but the need is not being met. I therefore move, seconded by my hon. friend from Broadview:

That the matter of the urgent housing crisis revealed by the recently released report of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the continuing decline in housing starts amounting, in centres of 10,000 and more, to a drop in February of 46 per cent below the rate in the previous year, be referred to the committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

In my view this is a matter of such urgency that I confidently ask the unanimous support of the House to have it sent to the committee.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the terms of the motion suggested by the hon. member for Greenwood. The motion cannot be put unless there is unanimous consent. The Chair has to inquire whether there is such consent.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: In the absence of unanimous consent the hon. member's motion cannot be put at this time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—INCREASE IN RENTS PAID BY SERVICEMEN IN DND ACCOMMODATION

Question No. 1,092—Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West):

1. Has the Department of National Defence recently ordered an increase in rents to be paid by servicemen and families in DND accommodation and, if so, what is the nature of the increases and what is the effective date thereof?

2. What has motivated such an increase, and if in the case of an increase in grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes, have such increases matched increases of taxes with respect to each base concerned or has a uniform increase in rents been demanded of the affected servicemen?

3. (a) What is the anticipated yield of the additional rent demand (b) what increase in payments in lieu of taxes are expected in the fiscal year 1970-71?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of National Defence and the Department of Finance as follows: 1. Yes, effective 1 April, 1970. The amount will vary depending on type of accommodation but in no instance will the increase exceed $15 per month.

2. Rent for Canadian Forces' married quarters was revised effective 1 April, 1968, at the direction of Treasury Board. All charges are based on the weighted national average of market rental values as appraised by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. A transitional period was established during which the rates in effect on 31 March, 1968, would be increased by $15 per month per year on 1 April. Two such increases have been imposed. Provision was also made for subsequent review and adjustment of charges if warranted on 1 April, 1970, and at intervals of two years thereafter.

The grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes have no bearing on the system of charges for married quarters.

3. (a) As there are some 26,077 married quarters controlled by DND under the rental system, and administered by over 100 base commanders across Canada, records at Canadian Forces Headquarters are not maintained in a manner which would readily provide this information. However, it is estimated that approximately $4.5 million additional rent will accrue during 1970-71.

3. (b) Government records are not kept in such a way as to indicate the amount of grants on individual properties and the necessary information is not readily available. On a percentage basis, the year to year growth rate of grants in lieu of taxes has recently averaged about 8 per cent. However, this includes growth as a result of the construction or acquisition of new federal property. In the case of service accommodation, where new construction is relatively limited, the annual growth rate would be somewhat lower, perhaps about 6 or 7 per cent, depending very largely upon changes in municipal tax rates. In the absence of specific information about changes in municipal tax rates and levels of assessment in 1970-71, the percentage range of 6 to 7 is the best measure of the government's expectations for growth of grants in lieu of taxes on service accommodation.

ASSISTANCE TO CONSTRUCTION OF OLD PEOPLE'S HOMES

Question No. 1,167—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. By percentage, what is the federal government's contribution to the construction and outfitting of old people's homes?

2. During the years 1965, 1966, 1967, 1968 and 1969 in the constituency of Richmond, how many old people's homes received federal government assistance in the construction and outfitting, where are they located and what amount was invested by the federal government?

3. What was the provincial contribution to each of the above-mentioned homes?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): 1. The financing of senior citizens' housing under Section 16 of the National Housing Act, to June, 1969, provided for loans of 90 per cent of the cost or value of the project. Under the provision to the National Housing Act of June, 1969, in which Section 16A was combined with Section 16, such loans may be 95 per cent of the cost or value of the project. Where such a loan is secured by a mortgage, the cost or value may include furnishings and equipment which become part of the real or immoveable property; where such a loan is secured by a debenture, the value or cost may also include moveable items of bedroom, lounge and cafeteria equipment, and specialized equipment such as hospital type beds and whirlpool baths in special type projects.

2. See Table 1 attached.

3. Information on the provincial contributions to such projects is not available.

Section 20 provides that the Bank shall act as fiscal agent of the Government of Canada without charge. The Bank manages the Exchange Fund Account.

Section 21 gives the Bank the sole right to issue notes intended for circulation in Canada and provides that the form and material of the notes shall be approved by the Minister.

2. By the Bank of Canada Act, Parliament vested the management of the internal administration of the Bank in its Board of Directors. Relevant portions of the Act are:

Section 5(1) provides that the management of the Bank shall be under its Board of Directors and stipulates that the Board shall be composed of the Governor, Deputy Governor and 12 Directors.

Section 13 provides for an Executive Committee and its composition, empowered to deal with any matter within the competence of the Board.

Section 15 empowers the Executive Committee to engage such staff as it deems necessary and the Board to establish by by-law a Pension Fund for employees.

Section 33 establishes the authority of the Board, with the approval of the Governor in Council, to make by-laws not repugnant to the provisions of the Act.

Other than the Reports and Returns specified in Sections 26 and 27 as mentioned in the answer to part 1, decisions as to information to be given concerning the activities of the Bank are made by the Board of Directors.

Formulation research is in progress on dietetic fruits, and it is anticipated that satisfactory products which do not contain cyclamates will also be available by the deadline of September 1, 1970.

3. Has the whole or any part of this proposed budget been approved by the federal government and, if so, what are the details of the projects approved?

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): 1. No, but a proposed budget has been submitted for the approval of the government of Canada and the province of Prince Edward Island by the joint federal-provincial advisory board for the Prince Edward Island plan.

2. and 3. Until such approval has been obtained, no detailed disclosures can be made.

*EXCLUSION OF PRINCE ALBERT AND ADJOINING AREAS FROM INCENTIVE PROGRAM

Question No. 1,589—Mr. Diefenbaker:

What are the reasons for the exclusions of the City of Prince Albert and adjoining areas from the Incentive Program, while including other areas in the province where unemployment and growth is greater?

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The Prince Albert area is not the part of Saskatchewan where growth has been most slow. The areas designated are those where industrial incentives can be expected to be most effective in improving employment for the benefit of people in slow growth regions.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, I should like to make an inquiry about question No. 827 which was placed on the Order Paper on January 12 and concerns the Canada Grains Council. I would ask whether inquiries could be made about this question.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will inquire in that regard. With regard to the earlier submission, may I point out that over 75 per cent of the questions asked this session have already been answered, including 57 today.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, with regard to what the House Leader has just said, I should like to point out that questions 162 to 172 standing in my name have been on the Order Paper since the beginning of the session on October 23. This is almost a period of six months. The questions pertain to a very important matter, namely, the degree of involvement of foreign firms in business activities in this country. At various times in the past month I have been promised that the answers would be forthcoming, and I should like the House Leader to give me some assurance as to when the answers can be expected.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, considering the imprecision in the way that the questions have been drawn obtaining replies has taken a great deal of time. It is difficult to inquire into the control of over 800 firms in Canada. However, I will get the replies as quickly as I can.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

AUDITOR GENERAL

STATEMENTS BY GOVERNMENT MEMBERS CONCERNING ACTIVITIES

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, pursuant to Standing Order 26, to move the adjournment of the House to discuss a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the unprecedented challenge to the Auditor General, a servant of this House and Parliament, involved in the question asked by the hon. member for Sarnia of the President of the Privy Council as recorded in Hansard on March 25, and the subsequent statement made outside the House by the President of the Privy Council, which are critical of the Auditor General in the performance of his duty and which followed almost immediately on the tabling in this House by the Minister of Finance of the Auditor General's report for 1968-69, volume I. In particular, a statement by the President of the Privy Council suggests that he and certain of his colleagues have tried, condemned and found guilty the Auditor General by star chamber tactics that are repugnant to Canadians.

[Mr. Burton.]

The urgency of the situation and of debate lies in the fact that this challenge to the office of the Auditor General must impair his usefulness and encourage government officials to disregard his views, and this House provides the only forum to discuss the question.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Peace River has proposed the adjournment of the House to discuss what the hon. member describes as "the unprecedented challenge to the Auditor General" by the government.

The Chair agrees with the hon. member that the relations between the Auditor General and the government and Parliament constitute a very serious and important matter indeed. The question is not whether this situation should be debated by hon. members in due course, but whether this House should be adjourned for the purpose of considering the matter later today.

As the hon. member well knows, in making its decision the Chair is required by the Standing Orders to take into account the possibility that the matter may be discussed in the House by other means at an early date. There are long-standing precedents to indicate that an immediately pending or continuing budget debate is deemed to provide the type of opportunity envisioned by the Standing Order. The current budget debate has not yet been completed and there are still at the disposal of hon. members two of the six days provided by the rules. I understood the President of the Privy Council to indicate earlier this afternoon that these days would be called on Wednesday and Thursday of this week, at which time the situation alluded to by the hon. member for Peace River might well be considered by the House.

In the circumstances, I must conclude that the hon. member's proposed motion cannot be put to the House at this time under the terms of Standing Order 26.

POST OFFICE

ALLEGED GOVERNMENT MISHANDLING OF MONTREAL POSTAL DISPUTE

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the government's mishandling of the Montreal postal situation and the need for Parliament to consider alternative courses of action.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands has given notice pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 26 of his intention to request leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing the Montreal postal situation. I am sure the hon. member and all hon. members would agree that the comments I have just made in relation to the motion proposed by the hon. member for Peace River might, to some extent at least, be applicable to the situation raised by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. However, there are additional considerations which should be referred to at this time.

In deciding whether or not leave should be granted, the Chair must take into consideration also the limitations placed on that procedure by the terms of Standing Order 26. Hon. members may recall that as long ago as February 18 last the hon. member for Peace River requested and was granted leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing the crippled mail service in Montreal. It seems to me the proposal now being submitted by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands is in essence the same continuing question. In this regard subsection (d) of section 16 of Standing Order 26 reads as follows:

the motion must not revive discussion on a matter which has been discussed in the same session pursuant to the provisions of this Standing Order;

In other words, it has long been established that there can be only one emergency debate during the course of a session on one subject. I realize full well that because there has been debate on a general subject it is difficult to determine whether or not there are different aspects of the question which might not militate in favour of having a second debate which would not be precisely on the same terms as the one previously. But I would think the circumstances would be very rare in which the Chair should place itself and the House in the position of having a second emergency debate and a second discussion of a situation which essentially has been considered by the House under the terms of Standing Order 26.

The decision has caused me some difficulty and some anguish, but in view of the rather specific provisions of subsection (d) of section 16 of Standing Order 26 I think the motion cannot and should not be put at this time.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

POST OFFICE

MONTREAL POSTAL DISPUTE—POSITION OF FORMER LAPALME EMPLOYEES

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Labour, who I believe is in cool waters, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister regarding the Montreal postal troubles. Can the Prime Minister advise if the government has made any further changes of policy so as to do more toward protecting the employment rights of the G. H. Lapalme workers who formerly carried the mail?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the position of the government remains the same. The Goldenberg report is accepted and is being and will be implemented by the government. There are of course, matters which have been discussed between the leaders of the CNTU and the President of the Treasury Board regarding the ways in which it should be implemented, but the fundamental position of the government remains the same.

Mr. Macquarrie: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it the view of the Prime Minister and the government that these steps meet what Commissioner Goldenberg called the government's moral obligation to seek to protect the employment of these men?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker. As has been made known to the public, the position of the government is that in so far as a number of men would be required to continue the service of delivery of mail by truck these men would be given preference in respect of being hired by the public service for the pursuance of this service. We are concerned with making sure that the men who have worked in these positions in the past would be given the choice of continuing to work in these positions in the future, with all the added security and other advantages which accrue from working in the public service.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in taking the decision to have the trucking of postal material in Montreal carried out by the government, may I ask the Prime Minister whether the government gave the employees any assurance, first of all, of job security and of retaining the same rates of pay and retaining their security rights? Were these assurances given to the employees, or does the government intend to give such assurances to the employees?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the government has given many assurances to the representatives of the employees. These will be made public in due course, but as is proper in the field of labour negotiations the dealings have been between the President of the Treasury Board and the duly chosen representatives of this particular union. We are still hopeful that the men will get the total message the government wants to convey to them, but we are still determined to communicate through the official representatives of the union. For that reason I do not think it is useful at this point to go into the details of the offer made by the President of the Treasury Board.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the public has a right to know why the employees to date have been refusing to accept the government's offer, may I ask the Prime Minister if the government is offering these workers considerably lower rates of pay than they have been enjoying up until now?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member that the public has a right to know, but I am sure that if the government had taken the position of not dealing with the representatives of the union and had talked directly over their heads to the men and the public he would be the first to condemn us.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether the government intends to continue with its policy of having the trucking done by the government itself or does it intend to revert, as has been reported, to making contracts with various firms and including some stipulation in those contracts in respect of wage security and seniority?

Mr. Trudeau: In answer to the first question, Mr. Speaker, I indicated it was the intention of the government to implement the terms of the Goldenberg report. This means inviting the former employees of Lapalme to enter the civil service and work as civil servants in the jobs they previously occupied.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister.

In view of the confusion now prevailing with respect to the post office, would the Prime Minister look into the opportunity or the possibility of granting the mail delivery contract for Montreal to Mr. Michel Chartrand, for instance, just to see if he could do better than everybody in dealing with the employees?

[Later:]

[English]

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In view of what the Prime Minister just said about going over the heads of the official negotiators of the union and the inappropriateness of such action, would he consider reprimanding the Postmaster General for doing precisely this in the current negotiations with the postal workers?

MONTREAL POSTAL DISPUTE—PAYMENT OF COMPENSATION FOR CANCELLED CONTRACTS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, is it the intention of the government to fully compensate the contractors, whose contracts were summarily cancelled on April 1, for the purchase of trucks and other necessary expenses incurred by them in order to carry out these contracts?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As was recommended by Dr. Goldenberg, this matter has been referred to the Department of Justice and we intend as a government to discharge any obligation we may have in this regard.

BROADCASTING

CANCELLATION OF LICENCE OF CKPM BY CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION COMMISSION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. Although it is difficult to know under which department some of these organizations actually come. I am speaking of the Canadian Radio-Television Commission. I think it comes under the hon. gentleman when he is here. Today I would ask him whether it is acceptable to the government that Pierre Juneau as chairman of that commission, without a hearing and in almost a star chamber fashion, to use the words of the President of the Privy Council, should have cancelled the licence of CKPM? What is the attitude of the minister in this regard? Will he secure an explanation from Mr. Pierre Juneau in respect of his statement that he could not conceive of Mr. Stewart having the right to apply for a licence again? Surely the minister can speak out and assure us that Canadians shall not have their rights determined by any government board without a hearing.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am wondering if the right hon. member for Prince Albert has addressed a question to me. In the allegations he has just made, and I do not even admit half of them, I have not found the elements of a question. If he cares to put a question to me, I shall try to answer it.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I can understand the minister having difficulty understanding the House of Commons after holidaying for weeks—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the right hon. gentleman might ask his question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, Mr. Speaker. My reference arose out of the challenge expressed by the minister, and I am sure he wants information. I ask him this: is it considered proper that a Canadian should have his rights determined by Pierre Juneau regardless of the fact that no opportunity has been given for a hearing and regardless of whether or not the minister approves of the statements made by this commissioner that he is going to act as he will, with no regard for Canadian feeling?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, I said I do not admit the allegations made by the right hon. member for Prince Albert. They are inadmissible because they do not represent the truth, the reality or the facts. Therefore, I cannot agree with the conclusions that the hon. member draws himself from false assertions.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Evasion like that may be all right in newspaper offices but this is Parliament. I ask the minister: will he get in touch with this dictator, Juneau, and find out the facts?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, first I think that the CRTC is not Mr. Pierre Juneau. It is the whole Canadian Radio-Television Commission and if the right hon. member for Prince Albert has doubts on this matter, I should advise him to read the Broadcasting Act. If my memory serves me right, he was not in this House when the legislation was passed.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Of course I will recognize the right hon. gentleman on a question of privilege but I trust we will be given an opportunity to go on to the next subject at an early date.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My question of privilege is this: who is this minister who dares to treat Parliament so insolently? Questions are asked but he laughs at Parliament, and that is what he has done all along.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Has the hon. member for Annapolis Valley a supplementary question?

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): I welcome back the Secretary of State from his external affairs tour. My supplementary question is: would he check with the chairman of the CRTC and make a statement to the House, hopefully tomorrow or whenever he is going to be in the House next, to amplify the reasons given by the CRTC in its press statement of March 25 saying that the ownership and control of the licensee company has not been clarified to the satisfaction of the commission, and would he point out in particular in what way these points have not been clarified by the licensee company?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, I should be very happy to contact the Canadian Radio-Television Commission in order to ask whether additional explanations may be supplied to the hon. member who has just asked a question.

As regards the question put by the right hon. member for Prince Albert, that is to say who I am, I refer him to the Parliamentary Guide where he will find useful information about me.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister will hear about this. He is the most arrogant and insolent minister in Parliament. He is never here at all, he is always somewhere else.

FISHERIES

WEST COAST COMMERCIAL SALMON FISHING LICENCES—POSITION OF INDIANS

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might be permitted to change the subject and address a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. The question concerns the salmon licencing arrangements, with particular reference to the Indian people in British Columbia. Arising out of the answer given to me by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development on March 25, may I ask whether the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has met with him since March 25, and have the two ministers reached a solution in regard to ensuring that the Indian people of British Columbia are not squeezed out of the salmon fishery?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure that the first part of the question is in order. The minister might like to reply to the last part.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I have been in close consultation with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development for some time regarding the problem faced by Indian fishermen in British Columbia being able to raise the amount of money necessary to pay their fees in the commercial salmon fishery in 1970.

Mr. Barnett: Can the minister tell me whether all Indian fishermen have been able to raise the fees and to qualify for permanent licencing in the salmon fishing industry in British Columbia under the agreement reached with the other minister?

Mr. Davis: All of the applications received so far from the native people on the west coast—and at this date they approximate half of the total—have included the full payment of the fee. We do not really see any problem. If, however, there is a problem we will meet it through the Indian fishermen's assistance program on the west coast.

GRAIN

WHEAT—ACREAGE REDUCTION PROGRAM—APPLICATION OF QUOTAS

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture, but in his absence perhaps I may be permitted to direct it to the Prime Minister. First of all, I should like to point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that I have the roster before me and according to it the Minister of Agriculture is supposed to be on duty on Mondays, Tuesdays and Thursdays. In light of the concern in western Canada arising out of the wheat acreage program it is regrettable that the minister is not in the House today to answer the questions that western Canadian farmers are asking concerning this program. I will direct my question to the Prime Minister in the hope that he may be able to answer it. Arising out of the wheat acreage reduction program and the allocation of quotas based on summerfallow in the coming crop year, there is a guarantee of eight bushels per summerfallow acre of wheat allowable for delivery. Is this guarantee of eight bushels under wheat transferable to any other crop? I ask that question in all seriousness because very shortly western farmers will begin to plant their spring crops and will want to know whether or not the eight bushels are guaranteed for any crop other than wheat.

[Translation]

Mr. Florian Côté (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, allow me to answer this question on behalf of the Minister of Agriculture who is now in the western provinces precisely to try and settle the problems that my hon. friend finds alarming. When he is in the House, he is blamed for not solving problems.

I will bring this question to the minister's attention, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Horner: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In light of the fact that according to the roster the Minister of Agriculture is to be present in the House tomorrow, perhaps his Parliamentary Secretary could bring these questions to the minister's attention so that he can answer them tomorrow. The supplementary question is if in fact the eight bushel quota guarantee is not transferable, assuming that the surplus wheat is in the hands of a third of the farmers, then is the government in fact not guaranteeing to two-thirds of the farmers who have not a surplus of wheat that if they plant wheat this spring they will be given an eight bushel quota, and will this in fact not encourage them to plant wheat this spring?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. My understanding is that the hon. member has invited the Parliamentary Secretary to take note of the supplementary question and bring it to the attention of the minister.

Mr. Horner: I have one more supplementary question which I think I should put at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest that perhaps it should be as brief as possible because the first two questions were rather lengthy.

Mr. Horner: I am sure that if Your Honour checks back over the record you will find that I have been very brief in the question period in particular.

In light of the fact that the Minister of Agriculture, according to the roster system, is supposed to be in the House tomorrow, perhaps his Parliamentary Secretary might take this question also as notice.

Further, in light of the fact that the Minister of Agriculture knows the eastern irrigation district very well because he used to represent it, I would like to ask him this question and through you, Mr. Speaker, or his Parliamentary Assistant perhaps reach him: are he and his department considering additional moneys for summerfallow in the irrigation area because of the tremendous cost involved in summerfallowing land, particularly in the eastern irrigation district, and will additional consideration be given to this under the wheat acreage reduction program—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Horner: —because I might add—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has had the floor for a considerable time. Now he is asking supplementaries. Perhaps he will take it for granted that the minister will answer.

Mr. Horner: I only hope he is here tomorrow.

FINANCE

QUEBEC—REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING REFUND OF $200 MILLION

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

In view of the disagreement between the Quebec government and the central government in connection with the $200 million deemed to have been collected in the province of Quebec under the social development tax, is the Quebec government making representations to or having talks with the federal authorities about the refund of those 200 millions?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that there is at the present time any exchange of views between the two levels of government. Some time ago, the premier of Quebec, or the provincial Minister of Finance, wrote to the federal Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) in that respect. I perused the answer prepared by the federal Minister of Finance, and that letter must have already been received by the Quebec minister. As for us, the matter has been settled for a long time and I think that the citizens of the province of Quebec will be pleased when, as soon as possible, the provincial government implements the medicare system.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

In connection with this quibbling, as it could be called, has the Prime Minister or the government been advised by Mr. Mario Beaulieu that the province will separate from Canada in 1974, if Ottawa does not accede to the claims of Quebec?

Inquiries of the Ministry

POLLUTION

MERCURY CONTAMINATION OF FISH IN LAKES ERIE AND ST. CLAIR—COMPENSATION FOR FISHERMEN

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. Following discussion and negotiation with the government of the province of Ontario I am wondering if his department will undertake to compensate those who will not qualify for unemployment insurance but will suffer a loss of income because of fish being poisoned by mercury? Will the department supplement their incomes to the level they would have earned except for the government's ban?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, a program of that kind is under consideration. I might mention that I am meeting tomorrow with the Minister of Lands and Forests and the Minister of Energy and Resources Management of Ontario about this particular problem.

Mr. Cullen: Would the minister consider making a statement on motions so that the fishermen in this particular area, and I am thinking also of the fishermen in the Lake Huron area, will know exactly where they stand and whether or not they should fish this year?

Mr. Davis: I hope we can make a statement soon, Mr. Speaker. I expect that the fishermen in that area would get the same treatment, or treatment equivalent to that received by fishermen in Newfoundland last year when they were faced with a similar situation.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Would the minister make a brief statement in reply to my question now, or on motions tomorrow, and clarify the situation as to whether these fish in Lake St. Clair and Lake Erie are poisonous or not? There are conflicting reports, Mr. Speaker, and no one wants to buy the fish. One day they are declared to be poisoned, and the next day they are declared not to be poisoned. Could the minister clarify the situation?

Mr. Davis: Perhaps I could say quite simply that the pickerel in Lake St. Clair do present a problem. Those from the extreme western end of Lake Erie are close to the very safe international standard of .5 parts per million. Those in the rest of Lake Erie, and that is the great bulk of the Lake Erie perch fishery, are comparatively low in mercury, but we want to be sure, as a result of a long series of tests, that all our fish are safe from the consumers point of view.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry on this subject. Could he tell us now, or in the statement on motions which was suggested, whether any steps are under way to ensure that the people responsible for creating the mercury pollution in these lakes will be paying some of the compensation required by the fishermen because of the loss of their fish catch?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, this is one of the topics for discussion with the Ontario ministers tomorrow.

[Later:]

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister confirming that no fish with any dangerous level of mercury in them have been found in Lake Huron?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, we have no definite indication of a problem in Lake Huron. Tests, however, are being carried out in respect of all fish in the Great Lakes area.

SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—MERCURY CONTAMINATION OF FISH—PRECAUTIONS TO SAFEGUARD PUBLIC

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a supplementary question with regard to mercury pollution in the Saskatchewan River caused by the co-op plant in Saskatoon. Are adequate precautions being taken to safeguard the public? I do not necessarily mean the commercial fishermen but others who may be involved in sports fishing, and Indians who may rely on fishing for their livelihood?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, the situation on the Saskatchewan River is that the pollution from the plant was stopped within 48 hours of the determination of the source of the pollution, namely, the co-op plant downstream from Saskatoon. The situation is different on the prairies in that our Crown-owned Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation has been buying all the commercial catch from the Saskatchewan River system.

Mr. Korchinski: Just for clarification, Mr. Speaker, may I say I understand the situation with respect to the commercial fishermen, but what I am concerned about at this time is that the public be adequately warned of the danger of eating these fish. I refer in particular to Indians and to sports fishermen who may be using the fish from these contaminated waters?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation in saying that we have been working with the Indian Affairs Department and with the provincial departments concerned with this matter for a period now of five or six months, and I am sure that anyone who is engaged in that fishery, knows of the dangers involved.

UPGRADING OF RESEARCH AND CONTROL PROCEDURES

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the fact that the type of pollution encountered in western Canada, central Canada and eastern Canada seems to be a recurring problem, is the minister giving any consideration to upgrading the research and control procedures within the department in order to short-circuit much of the contamination and pollution and thus eliminate much of the cost involved?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, this is not a recurring problem. We have identified the 12 possible sources of mercury pollution in Canada. We think we have now found the principal ones, and all of the companies concerned are taking remedial action. This will eliminate the sources of mercury, and natural flushing out of the river systems will eliminate the problem within the next year or two.

PENITENTIARIES

INVESTIGATION OF SUICIDES—CORRECTIVE ACTION

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Solicitor General whether an investigative study was carried out into suicides in federal prisons, as alleged by Dr. Bruno Cormier of McGill University, and whether corrective steps will be carried out as a result of this study?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated on the last day that the House sat before the Easter recess, we are very much concerned about this problem. We are now conducting an investigative study within the department with a view to determining what kind of further investigation should be carried out to get to the root of the problem. As I indicated in my answer on that occasion, we are very much concerned about the matter and are determined to get to the root of the problem.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

NORTHERN QUEBEC—TRANSFER OF JURISDICTION OVER ESKIMOS—REQUEST FOR TRANSCRIPT OF PROCEEDINGS AT MEETING

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Resources or his Parliamentary Secretary. Would the minister undertake to obtain and table in the House a transcript of the proceedings at the public meeting held in northern Quebec between representatives of the government of Canada and of the government of Quebec and the native people, when the native people indicated they were unhappy about the proposals made to them and that they in turn may make a claim to the lands in that part of the country which have never been the subject of any treaty?

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I understand there were a series of meetings. If my hon. friend is referring—

Mr. Baldwin: The one on February 19.

Mr. Honey: In any event, Mr. Speaker, I will relay his request to the minister who will advise him.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. André Ouellet (Papineau): Mr. Speaker, millions of hockey fans throughout Canada, more particularly the supporters of the Montreal Canadiens, have apparently been cheated yesterday afternoon during a game between the Detroit Red Wings and the New York Rangers.

I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether he could urge the president of the National Hockey League to investigate the circumstances surrounding yesterday's defeat of the Detroit team in New York?

UNIFORM ENFORCEMENT OF BREATHALIZER PROVISIONS

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. In view of the minister's intended reference to the Supreme Court of Canada of the breathalyzer provisions concerning impaired driving, is it his intention to contact the Attorneys General of the different provinces across Canada to obtain uniformity of practice with regard to impending charges and charges where convictions have been registered and the driving licences of the people concerned have been suspended?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, of course the decision as to how the breathalyzer provisions will continue to be enforced across Canada is one for the several provincial Attorneys General, but I shall take into consideration the proposition made by the hon. member.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the President of the Privy Council. In view of the problems created by this excessive use of executive power, would the minister arrange to bring forward for discussion and decision at an early date the recommendations of the committee on statutory instruments which contain precautions against the kind of impropriety we have recently seen?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me the hon. member may misunderstand the situation. This situation has been very adequately protected by the courts.

FISHERIES

APPOINTMENT OF PRESIDENT AND CHAIRMAN OF CANADIAN SALTFISH CORPORATION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the fact that the legislation setting up the Canadian Saltfish Corporation received royal assent on March 25, and particularly in view of a telegram sent by the minister to the exporters asking them to desist from further exporting activities, is the minister now in a position to state when the president and chairman of the Canadian Saltfish Development Corporation will be appointed? The delay is hurting our marketing activities for the current season.

[Mr. Ouellet.]

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can assure the hon. member that work is proceeding and there are no delays. The appointments will be made, in the case of the chairman hopefully by this weekend, and in the case of the president by mid-month.

CRIMINAL CODE

SUGGESTED PROCLAMATION OF ALL BREATHALYZER PROVISIONS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have a question for the Minister of Justice, Mr. Speaker. In order to avoid further delay or confusion with regard to the breathalyzer law, is the government considering proclaiming all the breathalyzer provisions so that they may be in effect from now on, whatever the past situation may have been?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think the matter is properly before the courts and I should let it run its course before deciding what future course to recommend to the government. I intend to await the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada.

BREATHALYZER PROVISIONS—SUPPLYING OF NECESSARY SCIENTIFIC EQUIPMENT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Minister of Justice could tell us at this stage whether there have been any negotiations or arrangements made with any organization or corporation in this country for supplying the necessary scientific equipment as set out in the bill passed by Parliament?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Yes, Mr. Speaker. As I stated on an earlier occasion, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have been analysing all the applications for approval of sample breathalyzer equipment and are still doing so. To date they have not found themselves able to certify any particular make of equipment.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, that practically answers the question I had in mind except to ask if the minister can state whether any container has been developed that will assure the protection and preservation of the rights of the accused as contemplated under the act?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, a lot of containers have been manufactured but as yet none has received the approval of the authorities in Canada. That is to say, so far no container is sufficiently foolproof to justify its use under the criminal statute.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The bill was brought in before it should have been.

PUBLIC WORKS

DELAY OF QUEBEC PROJECTS IN LIGHT OF POLITICAL SITUATION

Mr. Robert Borrie (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is related to an answer given previously by the right hon. Prime Minister. Will the Ste. Scholastique airport and a number of other federal projects scheduled for Quebec be delayed while assessment is made of the apparent statements in favour of separatism by two political parties seeking election in that province?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, federal policies are designed for the advantage of all citizens of Canada. If we were to suspend their completion every time some petty provincial politician from any province threatened separatism we would get nowhere.

INFORMATION CANADA

CONSULTATION BY MINISTER WITH DIRECTOR PRIOR TO ALLEGED CHANGING OF NEWS STORY

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister without Portfolio who speaks for Information Canada in the House. I should like to ask if the minister, who was not in the House for a few days before we recessed for Easter, consulted with the director of Information Canada before intervening personally to change the Canadian Press story reporting partisan influences in Information Canada?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member does not do justice to the Canadian Press. I have no means of changing any story of theirs. When questioned I simply gave my side of the story and they were kind enough to include that which had not been included before. The director had not yet been appointed at that time.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, the minister came to my question in the last part of his answer. My question was, did he consult before he amplified his position to the Canadian Press. I should like to know if it was before or after.

Mr. Stanbury: I have just said, Mr. Speaker, that I did not consult. There was no director at the time and I have not consulted with him since about my statement.

Mr. Nowlan: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. This is a rather important matter which has not come before Parliament in the proper way. In view of the serious threat to accurate reporting posed by the appearance of partisanship in Information Canada, will the minister use his good offices with the chairman of the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts to have the director of Information Canada, Mr. Gagnon, appear before that committee to define his terms of reference and to explain some of his past partisan political activities?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: Good question.

Mr. Nowlan: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take the time of the House today but the minister was not in the House for several days before we rose, even though he was on the roster. Certain things happened in regard to Information Canada which caused a great deal of gloom and left a cloud over it. I thought the minister was about to rise to answer this question because the whole matter has not come before Parliament. It has been slipped in as an estimate of $7 million at a time when this government is chopping expenditures, everywhere.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is addressed to the Minister without Portfolio responsible for Information Canada. Would the minister instruct the director of Information Canada, as one of his first duties, to use his influence to have the minister answer the questions on the Order Paper?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. Would the minister demand from the president of the CBC an explanation for the terrible mistake in programming which occurred last night when The Forsyte Saga, a good program, was actually scheduled in prime viewing time?

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

TERMINATION OF COMMISSION'S WORK—FINAL REPORT

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the right hon. Prime Minister. Has the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism ceased functioning, and when does the Prime Minister expect to receive any final reports, including one dealing with the role of cultural or ethnic groups other than English and French, in accordance with the terms of reference?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can only answer in general terms. Some months ago I did meet the co-chairmen of the Royal Commission who told me that they could finish their work by March 31 but that there may be some problems of printing or editing thereafter. I believe their main task on the substance of the report was finished by March 31 and that the subject referred to by the hon. member has been dealt with. At what precise moment it will be printed I cannot say, but it will obviously be very soon.

POLICY FOLLOWING THIRD REPORT OF COMMISSION

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Prime Minister can tell the House and the country if the government has made up its mind yet on the third report of the B and B Commission?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nowlan: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When can the House and the country expect a policy statement on that portion of the B and B work?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, there is a lot of implementation to be proceeded with on the other portions of the B and B report and we still need some time ahead of us before implementing every part of the reports.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the fact a Spence Bay Eskimo has been charged with bear hunting on the ice off the Northwest Territories, will the minister say if he thinks Jimmy Tootalik will come out of his trial with a "bare" skin?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

FISHERIES

BOUNTY FUND—DISTRIBUTION TO PROVINCES

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. Has the minister received resolutions from the legislative assemblies of the Maritimes asking that the fund designated or known as the fishermen's bounty be distributed to the provinces? Also, has he plans to accede to this request?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen any such representation. If it has, in fact, been made I will consider it, even though it be ill advised.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

SIGNING OF AGREEMENTS WITH NEW BRUNSWICK AND NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. When does he expect to sign the agreements with the provinces of New Brunswick and Newfoundland in connection with the special areas program he announced on March 15? In anticipation of the minister's answer, will he define "soon" for us?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): For all practical purposes, Mr. Speaker, the negotiations with New Brunswick are complete. Only formalities have to be approved. As to Newfoundland, the matter should be settled soon.

SEALS—PICTURES ON CBC TELEVISION—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. Will the minister make a statement to the House at the earliest opportunity on the question of seal hunting? Pictures recently shown on television indicated that the law was being broken. Could the minister and his officials find out whether the pictures shown by the CBC were accurate representations, or fraudulent as has been suggested?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly give consideration to that submission. I may also mention that our mail in respect of seals is down substantially this year.

Mr. Hees: That is not because people are not writing.

ACTION ON SIXTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE, MAY 9, 1969

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice. Has the minister's department taken action on the sixth report of the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry of May 9 last? If not, when may we expect some action on the report?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the last time I replied to that question I said to the hon. member in the House that one of the witnesses was in Australia. We are having some trouble finding him.

Mr. McGrath: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister consider sending the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate to Australia? He might have some luck in finding him.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is a good idea.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

AMENDMENT RESPECTING HATE PROPAGANDA

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-3, to amend the Criminal Code, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Douglas A. Hogarth (New Westminster) moved:

That Bill C-3, an Act to amend the Criminal Code, be amended by inserting the word "publicly" after the words "Everyone who" in line 6 on page 1.

Mr. Speaker: It is my understanding from the advice I have received that the words referred to are on line 7 of the bill as reprinted, as opposed to being on line 6 of the original bill. I assume that hon. members would want the proposed amendment to be moved in those terms. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Woolliams: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker; since I want to move several amendments to the bill it will be necessary to change the wording of my proposed amendments in the way Your Honour suggested just now with respect to the amendment of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hogarth). We did not receive copies of the new bill in our offices until this morning; I am talking of the amended bill which has been before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. As a result, we have had to rely on the old bill in drafting our amendments. I would ask that there be added to my proposed amendment the words "lines 1 to 9, on page 5 thereof". Otherwise, the amendment would read improperly.

While I am on my feet may I draw something to Your Honour's attention? Since these matters are now considered by a standing committee of the House of Commons instead of by a committee of the whole House, we are experiencing some problems in placing our amendments on the Order Paper in good time. I say that because amendments placed on the Order Paper have to be drafted before the reprinted bill is printed, and I ask for some direction from the Chair in this regard. It was impossible to draft proper amendments which are to be presented in this important debate touching on the freedom of speech.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, may I speak to the point of order? It is my understanding of the circumstances here that there was no obligation to submit a bill as reprinted. It was really for the convenience of the House that the reprinted version was circulated. On this basis, I do not think any hon. member should be prejudiced by reason of the revised version. The reprinted version was circulated out of our motivation to be helpful. Since that is why the reprinted version was circulated, there is no reason for not modifying the amendments.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, with the greatest respect, I trust the government house leader can see the problem.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I can, indeed.

Mr. Woolliams: If many amendments have been suggested in the standing committee where the bill has been considered, then surely, if these amendments are to be logically and intelligently considered, copies of the bill should come before the House in good time.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, speaking to the same point of order, may I say that I have not yet received the helpfully amended bill. I wonder where it is.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. My understanding is that it should be in the hon. member's file. An additional copy will be sent to the hon. member immediately. I suggest the point raised by the hon. member is well taken. It complicates the work of hon. members when a bill which has been substantially amended is not distributed until the time when the bill is to be debated. I am advised that this bill was actually reprinted some days ago and it is difficult for the Chair to understand why it was not distributed earlier. My suggestion would be that perhaps the general policy should be established that any bill which is amended at the committee stage should be automatically reprinted so that it will be much easier for hon. members to consider the amendments when the bill comes before the House at the report stage and so that they know to which amendments reference is being made. If this procedure were adopted as a matter of policy by our committees, then there would not be the difficulty with which we are confronted today.

The point made by hon. members is worth considering and I will consult with the committee branch, with the clerk and the table officers, to see whether we can prevent a recurrence of this difficulty.

Mr. Hogarth: Mr. Speaker, just so that there is no misunderstanding with respect to what has been agreed, and certainly I agree with the sentiments expressed by my hon. friend, the relevant wording in the first paragraph as amended would read, "Everyone who publicly advocates or promotes genocide is guilty of an indictable offence...".

This bill has been before Parliament and the Senate on a good number of occasions, so to speak. It has been debated in the Senate and in the House and has received a very thorough going over before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. I think all of us are gravely concerned about the bill because it deals with one of the very fundamental things with which we in a democratic society are concerned, the right of our freedom of expression. It is regrettable, in a sense, that such legislation is even necessary in Canada today.

As the bill stands, it creates three substantive offences. The first of those is the one I have just mentioned and is contained in paragraph 267A. That provides that anyone who advocates genocide is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for five years. The second offence deals with a breach of the peace resulting from someone inciting hatred against a minority group in a public place, and the third offence is the one which deals with wilfully promoting hatred in other than private conversations.

The penalties with respect to the three offences should be very carefully considered. First, the penalty dealing with the advocacy or promotion of genocide is up to five years imprisonment. It is to be specifically noted that this offence is solely an indictable one. The second offence, making statements with respect to hatred toward minority groups, is indictable and punishable by only two years imprisonment, or if the Crown so chooses, it can proceed by summary conviction in which case the penalty is much less. The maximum in that case is six months or a $500 fine. The third offence created in this bill is one of willfully promoting hatred. Similarly, the Crown can proceed by indictment or summary conviction. The maximum penalty when proceeding by indictment is two years. Should the Crown prefer to proceed by way of summary conviction, the same provisions apply as to the second offence.

There is a distinct difference between the first, second and third offences. Where statements are related to the second and third offences, private conversations are excluded. There can be no prosecution for the second and third offences unless the advocacy of hatred takes place in a public place or other than in a private conversation. My concern is that in the first instance, where a person advocates genocide, which I agree is a terribly reprehensible thing to do, that person can be guilty of the offence no matter when, where or under what circumstances it took place, even in the privacy of his own home in the presence of two people. If he advocates or promotes genocide, he will be guilty of an offence and liable to imprisonment of up to five years. There is no option of the summary conviction proceedings which appear with respect to the other two offences.

As far as I am concerned, people who make statements in public that incite hatred against ethnic groups which bring about breaches of the peace, or people who wilfully promote hatred in public or advocate genocide in public, should definitely be held accountable in the criminal courts. I agree that these should be offences, but I cannot see why the genocide provisions should be singled out as being so much more reprehensible than the other two offences.

It could be said that the concept of genocide carries with it a greater degree of culpability because it relates to the destruction of the whole ethnic group or puts that group into a situation where its physical destruction is inevitable. In contrast with that, who in Canada today is going to take the advocacy of such a proposition seriously? In addition, it is extremely unlikely that a person who makes statements of this nature, even in the privacy of his own home or in the privacy of another person's home, is going to be taken seriously and is going to do the public any serious harm.

I suggest there is no real need for the criminal law to so restrict our freedom of speech that it will be an offence punishable by five years' imprisonment when somebody in the heat of an argument, possibly after a few drinks and perhaps a little obsessed, makes such a reprehensible a statement as the advocacy of genocide. Nobody is going to take such a statement seriously. As far as I can see, such instances would occur so rarely that they would hardly be worthy of any consideration from the point of view of the criminal law.

I admit such contentions, if they are put forward publicly, should be offences. I say that because the essence of the criminal law is to prevent harm and maintain social order. If statements of this nature are made in public, it is obvious the person intends that the public react to them and that he intends to promote what he has said. I cannot see how it can be so terribly reprehensible if such statements are made in a heated debate during a private conversation.

Certain members of the committee criticized the suggestions I am putting forward. It was said in committee that the concept of genocide is so reprehensible in any context whatever that it has absolutely no redeeming social value and it should not be permitted to be advocated by anyone under any circumstances. I agree with the point of view that it has absolutely no redeeming social value. There is no one in this chamber who would disagree with that point of view, but is that the criterion by which we are to establish criminal law? Is it because it has no redeeming social value that we should make it an offence? The only time it should be made an offence is when there is a clear and present danger to an ethnic group or any one or more members of the public.

I do not agree with the contention that the criminal law should be used to educate the public. The criminal law should be used to protect the public from harm where there is a clear and present danger that such harm exists or might come about. The basis of this bill is the report of the Special Committee on Hate Propaganda in Canada. Certain eminent members of this House were members of that committee. I do not think that they ever intended that the advocacy of genocide should be made an offence when it occurs in a private conversation. It is stated at page 62 of the report that:

> It would be an emphatic public declaration of our total commitment to the elimination of this most inhuman manifestation of prejudice and a reassurance to any minority groups in our midst that—

These are the important words:

> —promoting such a concept in public discussion is beyond the pale. At the same time it would be one more potent instrument in the education of the people of Canada as to the awful consequences of racism and prejudice.

At page 63 the report reads:

> There is, therefore, no ambiguity and no begging of the question in the stand we take namely, that any form of advocacy or promotion of genocide is outside the bounds of legitimate public discussion.

Even though in the final recommendations of the committee they do not distinguish between private and public conversations, it is my contention that the committee was clearly concerned with the advocacy of genocide in public, and the prevention of the harm that could possibly accrue if such a course were followed among the people of our community.

There is a suggestion that we are bound to our international commitments resulting from the declarations which were made in the United Nations. However, it seems to me that we never went so far in those commitments that we would prohibit a private comment made by an individual who might choose to advocate genocide for some ridiculous purpose which he had in mind. In those commitments and in others found in appendix V of the report, we undertook that we would pass laws against genocide; conspiracy to commit genocide; direct and public incitement to commit genocide; attempt to commit genocide and complicity in genocide. At no point in our international commitments did we undertake to make private conversations of this nature a criminal offence. My question is, how far do we have to go to protect the public? It must be admitted that in this particular situation we are treading upon the dangerous ground of restricting freedom of expression.

I submit there is no need to go as far as this to protect ethnic groups from the type of literature, the type of communication, which is deemed to be offensive under the legislation before us. If there were forces at work in Canada today which advocated, as part of a political philosophy, the death or destruction of any particular minority, my view would be different. But I do not believe anyone can point to the existence of a political movement in Canada today which seeks the destruction of any of our ethnic minorities.

It is true the clause with which we are dealing contains a provision to the effect that no prosecution can be undertaken without the consent of the attorney general of one or other of the provinces. This does not mean, however, that a person making a statement of the kind described is not committing a crime. A statement, though made in private, might constitute a crime; the provision to which I refer merely means that it is open to the attorney general to decide whether or not to prosecute. In constituting a crime which can be committed by persons who might be taking part in a private conversation, we are opening the door to those who might bring accusations that such offences took place; we are opening the door to extortion.

I cannot believe there is a single ethnic group in this country today, as defined in the legislation before us, which feels we ought to go as far as this for its protection. No one can deny that on occasion it is necessary for the criminal law to trespass on our individual right of freedom of speech and communication. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) has made this clear. Few people realize the extent to which our freedom of speech is limited at the present time by the laws of defamatory libel and slander. I suggest that in this clause on genocide we have gone too far. We are not moving to protect the Canadian people. What we are doing here is passing criminal legislation which is politically motivated to get political support from ethnic groups.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hogarth: I do not believe this principle is a sound basis upon which the criminal law should be established. The criminal law should be established to protect the public, not to satisfy demands from any particular group within the public.

In seeking support for my amendment, I think it is only fair to advise hon. members that it was defeated in committee. Nevertheless, I seek their support because I think we have gone too far. There are real fears on the part of the Canadian public that we have gone too far in establishing this overall concept. If we were to make it clear that these provisions will not apply to things done privately, I believe the bill would prove far more palatable to the many critics who have written to us about it.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I ask the hon. member why he has not followed the example of the committee by suggesting an amendment which would exclude statements made in private conversations and in private homes, instead of opening the field so widely by using the word "public"? It is difficult to define what is meant by "public". I take it that a thousand people, for instance, might organize a gathering to which the public in general would not be allowed access, and that this would constitute a private meeting. I ask the hon. member why he has not followed up his plea by proposing an amendment dealing specifically with private conversations in private homes.

Mr. Hogarth: The words "other than in private conversations" were inserted, I think, by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) in an amendment; there was a great deal of difficulty in committee in determining what would constitute a private conversation. No doubt there would be equal difficulty in determining what would constitute the public advocacy of genocide. The hon. member for Sault Sainte Marie (Mr. Murphy) tried very ably to define it more accurately. As far as I am concerned, the words "other than in private conversation" have the same effect as the amendment put forward, though I do not particularly like the words "other than in private conversation". I would prefer a judge to have to determine whether a man was seriously advocating genocide or whether he was simply making a private comment.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I realize, Mr. Speaker, that we are dealing with a specific amendment, but perhaps I might be permitted to make a general comment which applies to a number of amendments as well as to the present one.

I believe that taking into account the amendments made in the committee and, perhaps, some changes which could still be made in this House, we have eliminated any ground for fear that this bill is an unreasonable or improper invasion of freedom of speech. If hon. members will permit me to be a little autobiographical, I would say that concern for freedom of speech was part of my career before I came to this House. Both as an advocate at the bar and as a promoter of organizations concerned with civil liberties, I have always considered it one of my prime duties to seek to defend the right of individuals to freedom of speech. I believe this freedom to be vital to our whole parliamentary system and to our whole democratic structure. It is against this background that I am able to give the House the assurance, as far as I can, that there is nothing in this bill which involves an undue invasion of freedom of speech or a curtailment of the fundamental rights of Canadian citizens.

There has, it is true, been some opposition to this bill but most of it, in my opinion, is based on misunderstanding. There are various sorts of amendments which might be made to the bill. Some might constitute improvements; others could be considered as wrecking amendments. Although the particular amendment before us is not intended to be a wrecking amendment, I nevertheless find it unacceptable and I intend to oppose it, not because I doubt the good faith or the good sense of the hon. member who introduced it, but because I disagree as to its necessity and efficacy.

First, the hon. member seeks to introduce into the genocide clause the concept that an offence, to be actionable, must be committed in public. What is genocide? Genocide is the murder or destruction of a race, and I say its advocacy should be prohibited whether or not it is done by subtle circulation in private circumstances or whether it is done in public. We are speaking here about the advocacy of the murder of people on the basis of their racial extraction. It is no light matter. We are obliged by international treaty to deal with it. What does "publicly" mean? A public place is one to which the public is invited, or to which it has access. If this amendment were carried, one could call people to attend private meetings in private houses, and organize a campaign of genocide there.

I entirely approve of the amendment made by the committee to the subsequent clauses that deal with the propagation of oral statements and excludes private conversation. I think it is entirely proper that we should make it clear that the part of the bill that deals with the dissemination of hatred should not apply merely to casual conversation. But I say, to use a colloquialism, that it is a horse of an entirely different colour to talk about genocide, which is the purposeful destruction of a race.

I would point out to the hon. member that the definition of genocide clearly implies a positive intent; it does not apply to matters merely of a casual nature. I know from having had to consider the question of genocide in a different context that it is probably one of the most difficult things in the world to prove. It implies within its own definition a very clear and definite intent to destroy a race. I suggest it would not apply to any casual conversation or occurrence that took place between individuals. This is not the way one plans the destruction of a race. But it might very well be planned by means of a clandestine conspiracy that would not be public, and therefore would not be covered by the legislation. It is necessary that there be a wilful offence.

My hon. friend suggested that there was some difficulty in this connection in that there was the possibility of frivolous prosecutions being laid. I would remind him that protection against that is afforded, even in respect to the crime of genocide: the approval of the attorney general of the province concerned must be sought. I cannot conceive of a responsible official like an attorney general consenting to lay a frivolous prosecution in connection with a charge of genocide. Surely, such a grave offence would require pretty grave consideration by the attorney general before he authorized prosecution.

May I conclude by once more making a general comment? I think that the fears to which the hon. member referred and which have been aroused among some sections of the public with regard to this bill are totally without foundation. A narrow definition is incorporated in this particular clause, and I suggest that ample defences have been erected. We are dealing with a clear and present danger, one that was found to exist by the commission that studied this matter. We are carrying out our international obligations by dealing with this question. As I have already said, while I do not feel as strongly about this amendment as I do about some others that will be coming before the House, I do suggest that the bill would be a better one without the inclusion of this particular amendment.

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, I have heard a good deal about the dangers or supposed dangers to freedom of speech presented by the clause that provides that everyone who advocates or promotes genocide is guilty of an offence. I have also heard that this provision was instigated by the authorities because of a desire to protect ethnic groups of one sort or another. I do not believe that is true. I believe that the origin of this amendment goes back 25, 30 or 40 years. I think the recent tragic experience in world history has indicated to us that freedom of speech has to be circumscribed now to some extent.

Freedom of speech in this world—not necessarily in this country but in the world—cannot include freedom to promote or to advocate genocide. The world today has been called a global village, and one can well imagine that if freedom included, as it did over 2,000 years ago, the freedom to say that a certain race must be completely eliminated, then the problems of Canadians in Canada and the rest of the world would become insurmountable.

I do not believe the legislation is designed to protect an ethnic minority, or indeed any number of minorities, though mind you, Mr. Speaker, this is more important possibly in Canada than elsewhere in the world. But I do believe that freedom itself has to be redefined. There has been a constant hue and cry that freedom of speech is being lost. The news media would be the first to say that freedom of speech must be protected, certainly as far as they are concerned. We are proposing a bill to grant pardons to people who have criminal records but have served their time and have become good citizens. Yet the news media are going to make their records available in perpetuity, and thus completely undo what we have done.

There has been a constant cry that freedom of speech must be maintained. The fourth estate today is much more powerful than it was. Its members now comment on the news instead of merely reporting it. Freedom of speech, freedom to hold private conservations, is no longer the sacred thing that it was at one time.

In this regard I would even disagree with the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), who said that if the bill provided that private conversations did not contitute a criminal offence the legislation would be suitable. It would not. After all, from where does hatred stem? Does it arise on any occasion when a person, known or unknown, hires a hall or an hour on television or radio and starts to promote genocide? I suggest that the evils we have experienced over the past 30 years have found root in private conversation, in private letters, in private messages, which have developed a consensus that the thing to do was to promote hatred.

Let no one belittle or minimize the importance of protecting private conversation—yes, in a family and, as the hon. member said, in cases where a person might be slightly drunk. Let no one minimize the danger of this kind of conversation, of this kind of promotion of genocide. On such occasions as this the children hear, as do others who are influenced by the conversation, and as a result they begin to mimic and to copy.

I do not think for a moment that we are going to see any number of prosecutions. The chances are that the words "advocates or promotes" will be considered as one. The chances are that the courts will for a long time say that "advocacy" and "promotion" must be combined, and that mere conversation will not give rise to prosecution. There is the further protection that the attorney general must consent to a prosecution.

Nevertheless, if we in this House stamp with the authenticity of a national law the proposition that to advocate or promote genocide, even in private conversation, is evil, and may also subject a person to criminal prosecution, certainly the listener would be protected because he too has some rights. A person reading certain correspondence has the right not to have it sent to his house or to be told that the promotion of genocide is a course that he should adopt. We cannot minimize the importance of telling our children and younger people that we consider genocide the greatest of evils at the present time, not only in Canada but in the world.

I have one reservation I should like to point out to the minister. The minister knows I have always very much suspected and resented the judicial power that may be given to police officers, because the minister must agree there will be many complaints, as the hon. gentleman said, that genocide has been advocated and promoted. It is also quite reasonable to presume that for the next few years the police will not be too anxious, except when they think it is important, to prosecute. This clause gives new trouble because we are now leaving it up to the police officers to decide which information to present and upon which information to prosecute. The greater the power given to police officers the greater the danger becomes to the average citizen. However, I cannot recommend any amendment that would solve this difficulty.

I would hope that the prosecuting attorneys and also the judges will lay down a precedent in the very near future so that the question we have is given greater identification. Although I fully agree with the hon. gentleman who moved the amendment, nevertheless I repeat that there will be problems at the present time and in the present circumstances in Canada. We cannot go far enough to indicate to all Canadians that the promotion and advocacy of genocide is evil and criminal.

Mr. Hogarth: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Otto: Yes.

Mr. Hogarth: I should like to ask why the hon. member would permit the most vicious advocacy of hatred in a home and yet would commend a provision which would make one comment concerning genocide punishable by five years' imprisonment. It is true this is an extreme situation, but a man could poison the mind of his child in the home and spend endless hours telling him about the ethnic groups he does not like. The hon. member supports this and yet would let one remark in respect of genocide bring about imprisonment for a five-year period.

Mr. Otto: We have not yet come to that clause which I intend to oppose as well. I said I do not agree that the advocacy of genocide is more evil than the advocacy of hatred. I think one stems from the other. Yet when we come to that clause I shall be glad to discuss it.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I wish to state the proposition as briefly as I can. First of all, the government accepts the bill as it has been amended by the committee. The amendments made by the committee are those indicated by special markings in the reprint of the bill that has been circulated today.

I think this particular amendment is narrowly drawn on the issue of genocide, so I shall confine myself to discussing this. However, when the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) opens up on his amendment in wide terms I think I should like to say something about the implementation of it. I should like to say that the committee did reject the amendment now presented to the House by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hogarth) and the government supports the position the committee took. Therefore, I would urge the House to reject the hon. member's amendment.

In meeting the hon. member's argument, I think members of the House should refresh their minds on what we are talking about when we are talking about or advocating genocide. The term "genocide" is now limited to two specific acts. That was clarified by the substitution of the word "means" for the word "includes" by the standing committee. Genocide means either of the following two acts, committed with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, any identifiable group; first, killing members of the group and, second, deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction. What we are talking about here is the advocacy or promotion of the killing of members of an identifiable group, a group which may be distinguished by colour, race, religion or ethnic origin, or the promotion or advocacy of deliberately inflicting on that identifiable group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction.

We are not talking simply about the advocacy of homicide but the advocacy of group homicide. We are talking about the deliberate extinction of a group of people which can be identified by their colour or their race or their religion or their ethnic origin. The government accepts the position taken by the special committee commissioned by the former Minister of Justice, the late Guy Favreau. This committee was under the chairmanship of Dean Maxwell Cohen, then dean of law at McGill University. We believe we are talking about so heinous a crime that its advocacy or promotion should not be condoned either in public or private. I agree with the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) that it is very difficult, in the terms in which the hon. member has drawn his amendment, to define just where he would draw the line.

Let me read from page 62 of the report of the special committee presented under the chairmanship of Dean Cohen. He is talking about advocating genocide. This is under Section 267A. The special committee reports as follows:

> But because existing Canadian law already forbids most substantive aspects of genocide in that it prohibits homicide or murder vis-à-vis individuals, and because it may be undesirable to have the same acts forbidden under two different legal categories, we deem it advisable that the Canadian legislation which we urge as a symbol of our country's dedication to the rights set out in the Convention—

That has reference to the United Nations.

> —should be confined to "advocating and promoting" genocide, acts which clearly are not forbidden at present by the Criminal Code.
> Canadian law generally has not gone to the length of prohibiting mere intellectual advocacy of a forbidden act, but has contented itself with proscribing conduct which incites to illegal action in a present, immediate way. However, we are convinced that, in the one case of the urging of physical violence against identifiable groups, to the point of genocide, there is no social interest whatever in allowing advocacy or promotion of violence even at the highest level of abstract discussion. It is odious and unacceptable at any level.

The hon. member argues that without the adoption of the word "public" some private casual conversations might be brought within the web of this legislation in this particular clause. I wish to argue against that as well. Here we are talking about the words "advocates" or "promotes". As the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) said to the House a few minutes ago those words do not apply to accidental, haphazard, occasional unthought, nondeliberate statements. The words "advocates" or "promotes" will be given by a court and jury their ordinary connotation. The shorter Oxford English dictionary, the 1967 edition, defines "advocate" as "to argue in favour of; to recommend publicly", and "promote" as "further the growth, development, progress or establishment of; to further, advance, encourage; to support actively the passing of (a law or measure)". These words imply a course of conduct and they imply some deliberate intent.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

Whether that advocacy or promotion is done within the confines of a home or whether it is done in public, it is quite clear by the use of those words that we are talking about the deliberate advocacy or promotion of a type of conduct within the meaning of genocide that is surely abhorrent to the world. Moreover, the hon. member for Greenwood has already mentioned, and indeed the hon. member for New Westminster was fair enough in his own presentation to suggest, that there was and there is an additional defence or precaution in this section militating against a frivolous proceeding undertaken on behalf of one private citizen against another, or a vexatious or mischievous proceeding, because it is clear, and the words of the section bear it out, that under this section no proceeding for an offence shall be instituted without the consent of the attorney general. Within the meaning of the Criminal Code, this is the attorney general of a province.

In summary, we believe that the type of conduct contemplated here against which a criminal sanction is to be imposed is so heinous and so abhorrent to civilized men and women in Canada that the sanction ought to apply no matter where the crime is advocated or promoted; secondly, the terms "advocate" and "promote" are such that they would cover only deliberate, preconceived conduct toward the elimination of a race or of a people of certain colour religion or ethnic origin. Finally, the risk of mischievous, vexatious or frivolous proceeding has been sidestepped hopefully by the requirement of a fiat of an attorney general. For these reasons, I urge the House at this report stage to confirm the committee's decision to reject this amendment.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I would like to deal briefly with the amendment proposed by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hogarth). I want to say, first of all, that I consider this amendment to be a most admirable one to present. I do not think there are any members in this House who would disagree with the general provisions and objectives of such an important bill, but I think it very important when we draft a bill of this kind that we be specially careful not to restrict the freedom of all individuals. In looking at the provisions of this bill I think that they come very close to thought control because we are saying to a man that in the privacy of his own home he cannot advocate a reprehensible thought to other members of his family. We may think that these thoughts are reprehensible, as indeed we do in this particular instance, but I question whether Parliament has the right to say to a man that in the privacy of his home he cannot have an evil thought or communicate it to the members of his family.

I think that this bill goes to dangerous lengths when it attempts to regulate in such a minute way what a man may say to members of his own family, and that is what this bill does. The minister suggested the phrase "may argue in favour of" as a dictionary definition. In other words, a man would be guilty if he "argued in favour of". To argue in favour of a reprehensible act is a pretty minor offence for which to be called upon to answer in the courts. I believe that the hon. member for New Westminster proposed a valuable amendment. I think we would be doing a disservice to the people of Canada if we legislate in such a minute way that we negate the sense of freedom which this Parliament seeks to protect.

I do want to say, therefore, that I support the amendment of the hon. member for New Westminster and I will vote for it, even though I am strongly in favour of the general provisions of the bill.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): I think that the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hogarth) has pointed out the horns of a dilemma upon which we find ourselves in dealing with the genocide section of this measure. It is one thing to reach into a person's home life and to say that that person should be punished for teaching his own children that identifiable groups should be the subject of genocide. That may seem as abhorrent as the thought that there would be people who would nurture such thoughts among their young in their own homes. But it is another thing, and this is the other side of the dilemma, that only the small part of the iceberg shows when genocide is actually carried out.

I suggest that if one reflected upon the state of affairs in the 1930s in Nazi Germany and if one wished to punish the perpetrators of those crimes against mankind under Bill C-3, one would find it difficult going because one would find that there were those who publicly stoked the gas ovens but there were also numbers of people hidden behind the grey walls of bureaucracy. These people never made a public statement that certain people should be sent to the gas ovens, and yet their actions were fatal to the people concerned. Those who carried out the acts were simply the executioners. That is why I say we are faced with a dilemma here. For example, if genocide should ever be carried out against a group in Canada—if somebody were to fall on an identifiable group of people before police action could intervene—I suggest you would find that the executioners who carried this out would clearly fall within the provisions of Bill C-3. However, I suggest also you would find that the boys in the backroom were the ideological spear carriers but not the actual carriers of spears. I suggest that these people would be equally guilty, perhaps even more guilty than those who actually carried out the crime itself.

As I said, I think we are on the horns of a dilemma and the hon. member who presented the amendment has usefully pointed this out to us. I would answer him by saying that his amendment, which adds the word "publicly" does not, however, say "advocacy by public action", and to me that is a very important distinction. I cannot get myself off the horns of the dilemma by accepting his amendment, and therefore I have to follow the reasoned argument of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner)—and I think it is a reasoned one in this case—that the safeguard offered by the attorney general of a province at least is some kind of safeguard. Therefore, in conscience, I am compelled to vote against the amendment proferred.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take issue with the amendment proposed by my colleague from New Westminster. I would like to say at the outset that I think his statement that this legislation is before the House as the result of the political pressure of a particular group in our society does less than justice to the many members of this House who have presented bills on this subject, to the government which has put forward this bill, and to the members of the justice committee who have supported it.

I believe that this bill is before the House of Commons because of social need. Unfortunately, even in our country, we have a certain amount of hate literature in its most virulent form. It is also before this House because in the 20th century there has been a sad history of mass murder, to which I hardly need call the attention of this House.

I believe that my colleague from New Westminster is wrong in his philosophy, in his analysis of the report of the Cohen Committee, and also in his projection of the application of this law. First as to his philosophy, the hon. member believes that in all cases we should apply the clear and present danger test which was developed in the United States by the great judge, Mr. Justice Holmes. That test, Mr. Speaker, is intended to apply to situations in which there is redeeming social value in the conduct which is in question.

I would submit to members of this House, and in particular to my colleague from New Westminster, that there are certain things which are not within the pale of argument one way or the other. At one end of the spectrum we have the internal freedom of conscience which everyone has. This surely is not subject to any kind of government direction. At the other end we have the belief in, the advocacy, and the promotion of mass murder. That is something at the other extreme in which there is no social value. It is not something about which we can say, "Yes, if we do not have discussion on this, all kinds of undesirable social consequences will follow."

The Cohen Committee agreed, and rightly so, that there is a social interest in allowing discussion of revolution, discussion of overthrowing the government, discussion of all kinds of political questions. But when it comes to a question of solving the political problems of this day by the use of mass murder, by eliminating your opponents, this is surely something in which there is no true interest on the part of society; and if there is no interest on the part of society, then there is no reason that it should be tolerated in a free society.

My colleague from Okanagan Boundary has said that the circumstances in which a person might be convicted could be mild. He used the word mild several times. I suggest he could take that view only if he were concentrating on the words of the formula, and not on the terrible examples of mass murder committed in this century and which could be promoted and advocated here in this country.

Now, with respect to the analysis of the Cohen Report presented by my colleague from New Westminster I can say, I believe without breaking the confidences of the committee, that I wrote the words which were subsequently adopted by the committee and which he has quoted to the House. I would suggest to him that, as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) has pointed out, he ought to go farther.

After the quotations from the report which we have had presented by the hon. member, these sentences occur in the report:

> In our opinion there is no need for any exempting clause in the application of legislation against advocacy of genocide, because there is no social interest in protecting any variety of such advocacy. The prohibition should be absolute because the act is wrong absolutely, i.e., in all circumstances, degrees, times, and ways.

This is the last statement which the committee makes on this subject in its analysis of the situation and its proposals for new legislation. It is true that earlier the word 'public' was used as a part of the rhetoric of the report, because that, of course, is obviously where the most serious danger lies, but the fact is the committee concluded by arguing for the prohibition of the advocacy of genocide "in all circumstances, degrees, times, and ways."

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I believe that my colleague is wrong in his suggestion as to the possible application which this section might have. He has what I might call the "passing moment" conception of the application of this section. He says that a man may be sitting in his living room with his children gathered around him. He may be in his cups and toss off some of these phrases. I say that this is not the kind of situation in which a conviction could occur.

The Minister of Justice has already pointed out that the words here are "advocate or promote." There is no possibility of a man being convicted, be he in his cups or out of his cups, unless he expresses these views in such a way, and believes in them in such a way, that he could be said to be advocating or promoting this most horrible deed. And if he is doing this why should he be exempted? Why should there be any exemption? There is no social interest in it.

What is the interest which the hon. member has suggested? The interest in protection from extortion. This, I believe, is the sole danger which can lie in such legislation, and this is a general problem with the criminal law. I am sure my colleague would argue that it is more dangerous in a situation such as this, but I would suggest to him that this is surely the kind of case in which not only would a prosecutor and a court be careful, but it is also one of the few cases in the law where prosecution is subject to the express approval of the Attorney General.

Obviously, there are safeguards in this legislation. We have, of course, the normal safeguards we generally trust in our society, that we will not have people who are pressured into certain actions in our society as a result of the fear that they will be pilloried before public opinion. If they have really done these things, there is no reason that they should be protected. If they have not, there is no possibility that they will be subjected to public contumely.

In conclusion, I would say that if we adopt the amendment which is proposed by my colleague from New Westminster, which I believe one of the hon. members opposite has shown is not even as well worded as the amendment which was adopted to a later section, "other than in a private conversation," —that amendment which the committee found it possible to support—we would destroy in very large part the moral effect of this legislation.

Criminal law does deal with morals. It deals with morals when they are public morals, not private morals. And things which occur in private are not always private. They are not private if they involve the advocacy of killing people, and I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that there is nothing on which the people of Canada wish this Parliament to express itself more clearly than their abhorrence of any suggestion that social problems should be resolved by resort to mass murder.

Mr. Hogarth: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. MacGuigan: Certainly.

Mr. Hogarth: If the clear and present danger is not the basis on which criminal law should be formulated, why is it we have not got a law that prohibits the advocacy or promotion of the mass death of mentally retarded since that policy has absolutely no social redeeming feature?

Mr. MacGuigan: I am not sure if I understand my hon. friend's question. I presume this legislation and other legislation of this kind would prohibit murder, would prohibit the annihilation of those people who are mentally retarded, or any others. Perhaps my hon. friend could explain more fully what he has in mind.

Mr. Hogarth: I point out that here we have made it an offence to advocate or promote genocide, and the genocide is directed to an identifiable group which has to be a section of the public distinguished by colour, race, religion or ethnic origin. But we have no laws against advocating or promoting the mass murder of people who might be mentally retarded, and my point is that if the clear and present danger is not the criteria, if it is the lack of social value that forms the basis of our laws, why have we not moved in these many other fields in which the concept has no social value?

• (4:30 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacGuigan: My friend is focussing, I believe, Mr. Speaker, on the definition of "identifiable group". Not all forms of mass murder are prohibited by this legislation but only forms which deal with fundamental groups, groups which I might refer to as natural groups. This is where the great problem has been found to lie in the twentieth century. We have not found any serious social problem in most of our countries with people advocating the annihilation of the mentally retarded or mentally insane. If we do, we may require legislation to deal specifically with those instances. We have had a great deal of history in the twentieth century illustrating attempts to annihilate groups which are of the kind here defined.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I was was rather pleased to find the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) admitting in his answer that the clear and present danger was in fact the motivation for something like this, and a proper criteria. I think it is natural that anybody who belongs to the Liberal party will have a great deal of difficulty with legislation like this. No single item I can conceive of could present as compelling an end to justify the means as a move to reduce even the thought that genocide might be an acceptable sort of subject for conversation. It is as abhorrent as any single item that one could put one's mind to. Yet what is the means proposed to control this situation?

It seems to me that conversation in the living room or kitchen is more an extension of the thought processes than an extension of public debate.

Mr. Baldwin: What about the bedrooms?

Mr. Mahoney: That is a cute phrase and I was coming to it. It seems to me when the law moves into the kitchens and sitting rooms of the nation and it is made an offense to advocate or promote within the family group a thing that is repulsive and abhorrent, you are getting to a point where you have to ask if we are attempting to control the thought processes. Is the advocacy of the subject matter of this private conversation something that we, as a society, should make an offence. As Liberals, we are concerned with the extension of liberty and I find great trouble with this. I wish I did not. I find more trouble now that the member for York East (Mr. Otto) has spoken. There are people who seriously believe that this is a proper thing to do, to move into the sitting rooms and kitchens of the nation. This is a rather peculiar move for a government which has taken the state out of the bedrooms, that it would now put the state into the den and family room.

I must say that I am going to support this motion. I did not, until I listened very carefully to this debate, have quite as much trouble with this particular section of the bill as I had with the next one but having listened to the debate I am persuaded to support the amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hear some nays and some yeas. All those in favour please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my view the nays have it. I declare the motion negatived.

Motion (Mr. Hogarth) negatived.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North) moved:

That Bill C-3, an act to amend the Criminal Code be amended by striking out

lines 26-28, both inclusive, page 1 thereof
lines 1-46, both inclusive, page 2 thereof
lines 1-46, both inclusive, page 4 thereof

(5) Where a person is convicted of an offence under this section, anything by means of or in relation to which the offence was committed, upon such conviction, may, in addition to any other punishment imposed, be ordered by the presiding magistrate or judge to be forfeited to Her Majesty in right of the province in which that person is convicted, for disposal as the Attorney General may direct.

He said: Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to thank you with regard to the slight changes in the page numbers to conform to the amended bill. As I said earlier on a point of order, we did not have the new bill before us. This amendment is fairly extensive and deals with that part of the bill concerning advocacy, so I hope I might be allowed to take a little extra time on it. In that case, I would not take any time on third reading because my argument would only be repetitious. I might as well present it now because it is this part of the bill which I wish to attack.

The motion I am presenting to the House today proposes to amend by striking out all the clauses in Bill C-3, but the sections dealing with genocide. I want to pause there for a few moments. I did not speak on that matter when the amendment was moved by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hogarth) because on the second reading of this bill our party took the position that we were in agreement with the principle of the Bill in this regard. Our position was well set out at that time by the hon. member for Halifax East Hants (Mr. McCleave). No other member of our party spoke to the amendment just recently presented by the hon. member for New Westminster. In our amendment today we are asking that everything be struck out except those sections dealing with genocide.

First of all, I must say that I have contempt for the vile propaganda which this bill is attempting to suppress. In brief, there is no one in this House of Commons, whatever their position, when the final vote is called, who cannot but feel within their heart a complete sympathy for the bill as far as the principle is concerned. But sometimes one has to go beyond the heart and take a look at these matters from a logical and legal point of view. This is what I hope to do today in setting out my argument on my amendment.

A bill such as is proposed is not a wise or effective way of dealing with the evil involved. The supporters of this bill justified the limitation on freedom of speech and privacy by stating that on balance of public convenience and inconvenience it is warranted to prevent the defamation of groups. I will say something in a few moments about those clauses which deal with statements being made against any identifiable group which may lead to a breach of the peace. I submit that most of these matters have been well protected under the traditions of our system of democracy and have been included in the Criminal Code of Canada since its inception. The laws are not written for selected individuals. The laws are proper because they apply to all individuals in Canada without regard to colour, race, religion or ethnic origin.

But the present bill, which is defended as providing for groups protection hitherto granted to individuals, introduces new standards. This bill proposes to apply to all groups equally. In fact, it would not apply to most groups within the community. It would not for example, and this is what I think the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hogarth) was dealing with when he talked about identifiable groups or classes, apply to groups within which hatred and contempt are most acutely felt, where individuals are most systematically maligned, threatened and slandered. This bill would provide no protection for the victims of hatred and contempt if they belonged to the wrong groups.

The hon. member for New Westminster, in dealing with a group or class, dealt with the unfortunate situation of those who are categorized as retarded children. An identifiable group is defined in the bill. It deals with the group and not with any one class. The law does not threaten two years in jail for those whose "communicated statements" incite hatred or contempt of our police officers, military leaders, separatists or political opponents, civil servants or Members of Parliament. I shall go into detail about this in a few moments. A Canadian would still be able to make a profession of inciting hatred and contempt against any group he dislikes, except identifiable groups, and therein lies one of the weaknesses of the bill.

If the bill is to be proper at all then "identifiable" is the wrong word to use. Every group is identifiable. It might be a group of farmers who march to the legislature in Edmonton with their chickens and let them loose, and so on. But they are not an identifiable group under the bill. However, they are a class of people or a group of some kind. Obviously, the word meant is, "designated". Certain groups will be designated and these groups will be protected from hatred and contempt. If this bill passes it will be possible to incite hatred against groups A, B and C but henceforth illegal to incite hatred against groups D, E and F. This is indeed a new principle in criminal law, a principle quite different from that of providing protection for individuals.

Clearly, the bill is not concerned with hate and contempt as evils in themselves, as bills are concerned with assault or theft as evils in themselves. If hatred and contempt were the evils to be prevented, why make it illegal to promote hatred of race but not illegal to promote hatred of class? Why is hatred of an ethnic group illegal but not of a national or social or cultural or labour or linguistic group? The defence that this bill would extend to groups the same protection hitherto given to individuals will not withstand examination. Protection is given to individuals equally, but protection is proposed to groups selectively. The law should be the same for every citizen from coast to coast in Canada.

Without drawing any dogmatic line, it would seem to me that whatever protection an individual citizen needs that can be given in law he should have by right as an individual equally with other individuals. Anyone looking at the Criminal Code as it is now worded will see that it provides for freedom of speech, freedom of thought, freedom of assembly and, above all, for freedom of the press and freedom of the medias of communication. That will be the strong point I shall stress in a few moments when I argue about our right to speak here and our right to have our speeches reported in the press, through the radio or television, or through any other media that may arise in the future. It seems to me that this bill works on the principle on which we used to bar Indians from beer parlours. We said they were especially vulnerable and needed special protection.

May I refer to the Bill of Rights and what the Supreme Court of Canada said about it. Clearly, the Bill of Rights in itself gives us all the protection we need. I think we all agree, including the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner), that the words used by that great Canadian, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), in this House on July 1, 1960, were great words. I was in the House, as were several other senior hon. members and heard him say these words, found on page 5649 of Hansard for that date. He said:

> I am a Canadian, a free Canadian, free to speak without fear, free to worship God in my own way, free to stand for what I think right, free to oppose what I believe wrong, free to choose those who shall govern my country. This heritage of freedom I pledge to uphold for myself and all mankind.

Those are great words spoken by a great prime minister and a great Canadian, and the Supreme Court of Canada has upheld the Bill of Rights which touches on the inalienable civil rights of individuals. What are some of those rights? One is the right of an individual to life. Does that not deal with genocide? Others are the right to liberty, security of person, the enjoyment of property, the right not to be deprived thereof except by due process of law, the right of an individual to equality before the law and to the protection of the law; the right to freedom of religion, and so on. Those rights were enumerated in that great speech made on July 1, 1960. The right hon. member for Prince Albert said that Canada was the first Commonwealth country to grant freedom of worship in law.

We have not experienced the troubles they have experienced in Britain and other places in the Commonwealth. We were the first to legislate freedom of religion. We have also freedom of assembly and association, and freedom of the press, which can be interpreted to mean freedom of communication of all kinds, be it through radio, television or any means that may arise in future. So, before saying what the Supreme Court of Canada said, I just wish to show hon. members that the Criminal Code and the Bill of Rights today protect Canadians against any difficulties which might arise as described in this piece of window dressing.

The hon. member for New Westminster and his father are both great lawyers of tremendously high calibre. Both have served as Crown prosecutors in our country and served our nation well in this regard. This afternoon the hon. member touched the pulse of this debate when he said that this measure is a political move. The bill is introduced to win votes. The Bill of Rights and the Criminal Code protect us adequately. May I deal with this at some length, Mr. Speaker, as this will save my having to speak on third reading.

The Criminal Code and the Bill of Rights, as interpreted by our courts, give us all the protection we need. Do you think for one moment that if this bill were not introduced, if this piece of window dressing were not brought in, any Canadian tonight would be in fear of genocide? I shall deal with the question of ridicule in a few moments. If we were not permitted some ridicule and were not permitted to create some disturbances, this would be a sorry country indeed. Democracy would be pretty dead. Little reflection is needed to understand how widely varied may be the kinds of communicated statements which do in fact incite hatred or contempt.

We have only to look at the famous Russell case and the book which the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) wrote about her father, Mr. Woodsworth. Every Member of Parliament and every Canadian should read that book. When the soldiers returned from the war to end all wars, World War I, unemployment was rampant in this country. There were poverty, ghettos and unemployment, maybe even worse than we have today. Men like Mr. Woodsworth and other great labour leaders brought men together. What happened to them? They were charged under the Criminal Code. If we compare the Code of those days with the Code of today, we see that they could not have been convicted since they wanted to ridicule and treat with contempt the society in which they were living because they could not get jobs and dared to unite in unions. Whether we agree with the philosophy of Mr. Woodsworth or not, he was a great Canadian who should be remembered.

The daughter of Mr. Woodsworth has written a book on the great drama of the life of her father. This book shows there is a time when we must incite and when there must be protests beyond the stagnation of the legislature and even Parliament. Possibly the fellow who heckled me this afternoon was right. I must apologize. I thought it came from the rump of the chamber. When I said there was nothing wrong with Parliament, he had a right to say what he did. He may have been ridiculing the institution, but when this or any other parliamentary institution does not function and serve society, one of two things will happen. Either we slide into a dictatorship or else the protests take place outside the chamber.

Thank God there have been men who have incited, showed contempt and ridiculed. Whether it is through a union or otherwise, the average Canadian can negotiate proper hours and wages and in this way we got the children out of the mines and factories. That is why I oppose certain sections of the bill, and moved my amendment. I do not want to put a lid on free speech.

I am going to refer to what Professor Mewett and Professor Scott had to say. I do not know what Professor Mewett's politics are, but I have a pretty good idea of Professor Scott's.

An hon. Member: He is intelligent.

Mr. Woolliams: I agree that he is highly intelligent. Little reflection is needed to understand how widely varied may be the kinds of communicated statements which do in fact incite hatred or contempt. The paradox is that not only is it bad speeches, speeches intentionally so designed to incite hatred or contempt. The most necessary word that has to be said in society at the most critical time may incite the most fanatical hatred. The speeches of John F. Kennedy and Robert F. Kennedy incited hatred. And these men were both shot. The speeches of Martin Luther King indisputably incited hatred and contempt of himself and others, among those who feared, in their own contemptible phrases which I do not want to repeat.

The late President of the United States, John F. Kennedy and the late Attorney General of the United States, Robert Kennedy, made certain statements. A few moments before he was assassinated Robert Kennedy said in a speech that if he were the President of the United States, help would go to Israel. That incited contempt and ridicule in an Arab who had some problems, a hang-up as the young people say, from the environment from which he came. Because of that, Robert Kennedy lost his life.

I want to emphasize that great leaders of the world who brought about reforms and progress had to incite somebody. They had to knock over the establishment. I will come to what Professor Mewett had to say. In my opinion, this bill will not help minorities. If implemented and ever used, which I question, it would work against minorities, not for them.

Section 267B adds the qualification "where such incitement is likely to lead to a breach of the peace". Consider what this might mean in practice. If someone is advancing an unpopular cause, which some other person thinks will expose him to hatred or contempt, then if the over-agitated person gathers together a gang of his buddies and threatens to beat the speaker to a pulp, the law will move in to arrest, not the mob which is threatening the peace, but the prospective victim.

This tactic, cleverly exploited, could obliquely recruit the courts of the land as reserve allies of a fanatical group. Freedom of speech is, of course, not without limit. But it is meaningless if it is freedom for unpopular or even contemptible opinion. To admit that certain groups in society are "bad guys" and that they may therefore be silenced by assault or by threat, is to open the way for other groups to nominate other "bad guys" who may be silenced by assault or by threats, which as I said in committee, is exactly what the Nazis did.

Thirty years ago in Quebec, a certain premier passed the notorious padlock law. In Quebec at the time no questioner could get any rational consideration of the true nature of the bill for fear of seeming to be soft on communism. The sections of this bill on hate propaganda, though not a padlock law, seems to me to be dangerously vague and susceptible to abuse. We are not faced with a clear and present danger that warrants such sections on hatred and contempt.

I say we are protected under the Code and by the Bill of Rights. What crisis exists in Canada today that makes it necessary to control freedom of speech within the limits of reasonable men? Reasonable men are tempered by the society and the culture of Canada. I trust Canadians; they are reasonable.

SUGGESTION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should give consideration to the advisability of ensuring by law a guaranteed annual income as a means of ensuring that all Canadians will have an income sufficient to provide for a life of dignity.

He said: Mr. Speaker, since the election of 1968, in my judgment there have been only two meaningful and desirable pieces of legislation which we have passed. These are the languages bill on the one hand and the omnibus bill, offering a series of good, constructive amendments to the Criminal Code, on the other. Both these measures were inherited from the last Parliament; they were not generated by the present government, nor by members who presently sit in opposition. My conclusion is that nothing of significance has been done except for the passing of these bills which came from a previous government. Recently we saw the government increase the pensions to which Members of Parliament are entitled. We have watched the government trying to deal with inflation by putting thousands of Canadians out of jobs as a deliberate instrument of economic policy. Continuing consideration has been given to a white paper on taxation which has been masquerading as a document of significant reform, although it contains within it a proposal to continue taxing the poor in Canada. All this suggests to me something which must be regarded as the prevailing characteristic of the Trudeau government, namely, a small "c" conservatism which has done nothing to improve the social, economic, and, by extension, the spiritual well being of Canadians. This hour affords an opportunity for ordinary Members of Parliament in all parties to show that they are concerned about the well being of their fellow countrymen. They have an opportunity to vote for this resolution; they need not talk it out. I hope they will act upon it.

First, I should like to say something about the need for some form of guaranteed annual income or, as I call it, a guaranteed minimal annual income. To my mind, this represents the single most effective and efficient means of attacking, simultaneously, both material and spiritual poverty in this country. Of course, it is by no means the only action which could be taken to achieve progress in this direction, but by one stroke of legislation we could make an important advance. The object of this proposal is not simply to alleviate poverty in our land, but to eradicate it.

According to the Economic Council of Canada, the Canadian Welfare Council and other similar bodies in this country, there are between four and five million people living in a state of poverty in this rich country of ours. How does the Economic Council define poverty? It proposes that a family be regarded as poor if it spends 70 per cent or more of its income on food, clothing and shelter. I believe most hon. members will agree that this is a reasonable definition; any family which has to devote 70 per cent or more of its income to the provision of food, clothing and shelter has little left with which to do, or acquire, those other things which hon. members of this House, for example, would regard as being the normal expectation of people living a civilized existence. Virtually no money is left for recreation in any of its forms. There is no separation, as many like to suggest, between material conditions and spiritual life. There is an inextricable connection between the two. They are bound together. In seeking to overcome material poverty we will be laying the foundation for a fuller spiritual life.

Who are the poor? They include the 50,000 or more who receive old age assistance benefits. They include more than 700,000 elderly persons who receive a guaranteed income supplement. They include the young men and women who have recently left school and who cannot find jobs—incidentally, these represent the fastest growing section of the unemployed. You will find the poor among our Indian, Eskimo and Metis population whose life expectancy is just over half what it is for the rest of us in Canada—surely, a national disgrace. You will find them among the women receiving mothers' allowances—over 165,000 of them—and you will find them among that grotesquely overlooked groups of people, the blind and the disabled who receive special allowances. Thousands fall into this category. Most of these people receive welfare assistance in some form, inadequate though it may be. To some degree, therefore, they are present in the consciousness of Canadians throughout the country.

However, in addition to helping people such as these, a guaranteed minimum income would benefit the group of people who are consistently overlooked not only by those responsible for legislative programs but also by the average citizen. I refer to the working men and women of all ages who are unable to earn sufficient in their jobs to escape from a state of poverty. Most of them are non-unionized workers. Let us not forget that less than a majority of the working people of Canada belong to unions, the worst record of any industrialized country in the world. The group I have in mind consists, too, of workers, whether unionized or not, who live in the economically poor areas of Canada. A guaranteed income program would do something effective to improve conditions affecting this important category of Canadians. It is important to note that in 76 per cent of the poor families at least one member of the family is working. In other words, 76 per cent of all those families officially designated as living in poverty include one or more members who go out to work. These are the working poor.

I wish to deal briefly, now, with two myths. The first one, I call the abusive myth. This is a view held by many people in this country, unfortunately, and it goes as follows: That people on welfare really tend to abuse the system; that they live high on the hog; that they use their welfare payment for a downpayment on a new car. All kinds of bizarre and, in my judgment, cruel stories go around to this effect.

What is the evidence? The evidence, recently confirmed in an article published in "Canadian Welfare" by Professor Stephen Peitchinis of the University of Calgary, is that 95 per cent of the people on welfare who were studied were found to be legitimate welfare cases. They were people who were living in an unfortunate state and had no meaningful alternative. Less than 5 per cent could be seen to be in any way cheating or abusing the system. This recent study merely confirms the whole history of studies done in this country and elsewhere and which reached the same conclusion. In short, the vast majority of people on welfare in our country, as well as elsewhere, have no alternative and would damn well like to be working.

The second myth is that somehow we need to keep people at a relatively low level of income in order to get them to do any work at all. This I call the incentive myth. It is said that unless you really do have a number of people suffering a little—not to a substantial degree, but suffering a little—these people will sit back and do nothing. Once again the evidence is completely to the contrary. I would refer to anybody who wants to rely on evidence as opposed to irrational prejudice a current study that is now being done specifically on the question of a guaranteed annual income in the state of New Jersey. The evidence provided so far—though the study is by no means complete—conclusively suggests that people do not require financial incentive to work. It confirms that there is something in human beings that the so-called romantics have referred to as integrity, as the desire to make one's fair contribution to the productive labour of mankind.

I will leave these myths at this point. I have mentioned them because I suspect that they may be brought up in this debate or elsewhere in the country. I leave them, I hope, with the clear suggestion, one based on evidence, that they are myths and should not be taken seriously.

I should now like to get into the specific form of guaranteed minimum income that I have in mind. There have, of course, been many proposals, a wide variety, coming from all sides of the political spectrum. My own preference is for a 100 per cent federal program which would be related to the level of taxable income and the annual estimate of poverty level incomes that is made by the Economic Council of Canada. The explicit objective of the guaranteed minimum income program would be to ensure that no family or independent single person in this country has an income which is at or below the poverty level.

The program would be implemented in the following manner. First, any man or woman could apply for the guaranteed minimum income at the beginning of each year. This would be done simply by filling in a form giving an estimate of the individual's or family's income for the coming year. Second, if the estimated income of the person or family falls below the current estimate made by the Economic Council of Canada of the existing poverty levels, then the applicant would be eligible for a monthly federal government payment which would enable the person or family to escape from the poverty level income category. Third, if during the course of the year the income position of the person or family improved, they would be expected to inform the government so that the rate of payment could either be altered or abolished completely. Fourth, at the end of each year when the recipient fills in an income tax form, which would be obligatory for all recipients, if he had received payments in excess of the requirements he would be obliged to repay to the federal government the excess amount in monthly instalments. Fifth, abuses of the guaranteed minimum income program would be checked in precisely the same way as are income tax evasions at present.

With regard to cost, our research people have estimated that, assuming the abolition of family allowances and the Canada Assistance Plan, the cost would be somewhere in the neighbourhood of $1 billion, a sum which I suggest is the minimum amount our society can provide at this time for this worthy cause.

What, then, are the merits of the plan, apart from the social and economic ones of a general nature to which I have just alluded? First, a guaranteed minimum income would be established in Canada as a right of citizenship. There would be no suggestion at all of public charity. Millions of Canadians would be able, with the program in effect, to live a life that is not associated with the spiritual impoverishment which, as I said earlier, arises from material deprivation, especially in our kind of competitive economy. Millions, for the first time, would be free of the concerns which come with poverty.

Second, there would be no likelihood, or very little, of people deliberately choosing not to work. The level of payments and man's normal desire—something I stress—to share in the social commitments of society would mean that virtually all of our people would continue to do their share of productive labour, provided that sources of labour were available. I will return to this point in a minute.

Third, there would be little paper work involved in this plan. Almost all the work would consist of simply filling in a single form which would be processed in Ottawa by relatively few civil servants aided by computers. The plan's effect on bureaucracy, in short, would be almost nil.

In conclusion, I should like to stress that the guaranteed minimum income is not in any way a panacea for the ills of our society. It should be seen as but one instrument needed to overcome poverty, as one important ingredient of any advanced, civilized, industrial nation. What we also require in this country are the following. First, a related set of social and educational programs, the aim of which is to develop the co-operative and creative potential that lies within man. Second, other public goods and services which would continue to be provided for all our citizens out of the general tax revenue. I am thinking here of schools, medical and dental services, and recreational facilities. Third, and perhaps most important, what is required is that governments in this country become committed as they have never been committed in the past to an economic policy, the aim of which is to generate full employment—not stable prices—so that very few people in this country in the long run would need to rely in any sense on a guaranteed minimum income.

Our objective as a nation should be to introduce this plan now and then work, with all the energy and intelligence at our disposal, toward the creation of the kind of Canada in which no one in the years ahead would be required to rely upon this form of income plan. We should begin now!

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. Murray McBride (Lanark and Renfrew): Mr. Speaker, motion No. 14 standing in the name of the hon. member who has just spoken raises a very broad and important matter for consideration this afternoon. As all members of the House are aware, there has been considerable discussion in recent years in all corners of our country about income maintenance schemes which in some way would guarantee a minimum income to all Canadians. This, of course, would be a major attack on poverty in our country. These proposals are given different labels such as negative income tax, guaranteed annual income, family security plans and so on. While they have certain essential similarities, often the plans differ as to specific features and approach. Difficulty in understanding arises when the same scheme is referred to by several different names, and when expressions like "negative income tax" are used to describe all the different methods proposed.

Guaranteed income describes all types of income maintenance measures which guarantee a continuing flow of income to all persons in a specific population group, or to all persons in a given category, or to the population at large. "Guaranteed income" is therefore a most comprehensive concept and is any scheme which guarantees an annual amount of income, while "Guaranteed minimum income" is a scheme which brings all persons up to a specified minimum level of income. Negative income tax is one approach which can be used to provide a guaranteed income.

I should like, first of all, to make a few comments about negative income tax. It seems to me this is a system which would propose to use income tax as a means for closing part of the poverty income gap. The poverty-income gap is the difference between the actual income of a poor person or poor family and the income they would need in order not to be poor.

This involves using the income tax system in reverse. Under a negative income tax scheme a prescribed income level would be established at which no taxes and no benefits are received. Persons with incomes in excess of this level would pay income taxes on the excess income, while persons whose incomes fall short of this level would receive a benefit equal to a percentage of the difference between his actual income and the prescribed income level. This income gap is considered to be "negative income" and the percentage of this "negative income" given as a benefit is considered to be a tax, hence the expression "negative income tax". The level of income prescribed for a negative income tax scheme can be either the personal income tax paying level, or an officially determined poverty line or any other income standard.

There are two main methods for determining income deficiency under negative income taxation. One of these, as suggested by Friedman and Lampman, is to determine a person's income gap; that is, the amount by which total income tax exemption and deductions exceed actual income, and then fix a benefit at some percentage of this income gap. Friedman and Lampman suggested a benefit equal to 50 per cent of the income-gap, while other suggestions have been made, namely by Lampman and Schwartz, to pay 100 per cent of the income gap which would bring all persons up to the prescribed minimum income level. Another method is to assign to each unit a fixed allowance which could be varied by family size and family composition to reduce the initial value of this allowance by some percentage applied to other income received and to pay out the net value of the allowance, if any, as a benefit. This is the method which is used with the Guaranteed Income Supplement program and in the New Jersey experiment which was alluded to by the member who spoke before me.

With the first method, it is possible to provide income to fill all or part of the income gap, while with the second method it would be possible, depending on the rate of the fixed allowance and the recovery tax applied to other income, to guarantee incomes to levels exceeding those which are generally regarded as poverty levels.

Negative income taxation then is one technique which can be used to guarantee an annual income. The use of guaranteed annual income, the term used in motion No. 14 which is before us today, as a new income maintenance technique has been advocated by many people from all walks of life representing both the right and left of social thought. Some of these people are actually opposed to social welfare, but they see the guaranteed annual income as a better alternative to the present mixture of social security programs which will provide what they consider to be a more realistic system at less cost. The scheme has also been advocated by many others who regard the present social security as inadequate and who wish to have income support considerably expanded and extended.

While the concept of the guaranteed annual income has come into a great deal of prominence lately, it is not a new idea. In fact a program based on the principle of the guaranteed annual income was used in England from 1795 to 1834, but was abandoned because the use of such a scheme was believed to have a depressing effect on wages and on the mobility of labour. The concept lay dormant until World War II, when its use on a universal basis was strongly advocated in England by Lady Rhys-Williams. A similar approach was suggested in Canada in 1965 by a Canadian industrialist, D. B. Smith, and in 1966 by the Senate committee on aging, for persons over 65. These representations did not give rise to the use of the concept on a wide scale but its use on a more limited basis has been put in practice in England and in Canada.

In this respect the Canadian Guaranteed Income Supplement program, which provides an income-tested supplementary benefit to old age security pensioners who qualify, is based on the principle of the guaranteed annual income but is applied only to aged persons receiving the old age security pension. In the United Kingdom a universally applied social assistance program called the Supplementary Benefits Scheme virtually provides a guaranteed annual income to all persons in need.

It is obvious I think to anyone who considers the motion before us today, or the issues that are before us in a broader sweep, that there are some definite advantages to the guaranteed annual income scheme. Many of the features of the guaranteed annual income approach are excellent and have advantages over some of the income support measures now used. For example, the system enables larger benefits to be directed to families and individuals having low incomes at a lower cost than under certain of the social security programs now in force.

Payments can be made on the basis of a simple income test which does away with the social stigma normally associated with the receipt of public assistance and does not require potential beneficiaries to undergo the degradation of having their incomes and assets, as well as their way of life scrutinized to determine eligibility, as is required by the provincial social assistance programs partially supported under the Canada Assistance Plan. While these advantages are important, the approach also has a number of disadvantages and limitations which cannot be overlooked. It may be helpful to discuss several of the problems associated with the use of the guaranteed annual income as an income maintenance measure.

One important question is whether the guaranteed annual income would replace in whole or in part or supplement the present social security system. The existing social security system has evolved slowly over time in response to emerging social and economic needs and indeed the emerging social conscience on the part of society generally.

Programs have been designated and indeed designed to provide solutions to underlying social and economic problems, but the design has often been limited by the availability of financial resources and more urgent and important priorities for other areas of government spending. The present system is indeed not perfect. I do not think anyone would suggest that our social system of welfare legislation is perfect in Canada, but it is continually being improved as social and economic conditions change with time.

It seems to me that it will be necessary to adapt any new method of providing income support to Canada's existing social security system. It was done, as we all know, in the case of the guaranteed income supplement for old age pensioners. At the same time, some of the existing programs will no doubt be modified, and others may be abandoned in the future. With respect to the possible replacement of existing income maintenance programs, it is important to keep in mind the objectives of existing programs.

A program such as unemployment insurance is designated and designed to provide income for the short-term unemployment of all covered members of the labour force regardless of annual income. It replaces temporary wage loss due to unemployment without requiring recipients to have less than some subsistence level of income in order to qualify. On the other hand, the Canada Pension Plan and the old age security pension program have as one of their objectives the provision of income support to aged, disabled and widowed beneficiaries regardless of their other income.

Workmen's compensation is designed to provide for income support and health services arising from work-connected accidents or industrial disease. The maximum levels of support are more generous than those that would apply under a guaranteed minimum income concept.

Consequently, the effect of introducing a guaranteed annual inome program on existing programs needs to be examined closely in relation to the social and economic objectives being served by many of the existing social security programs. The existing system provides health and welfare services as well as income support, and it is well to keep in mind that a guaranteed annual income is not an answer to social needs where social services over and above maintenance payments are required. The guaranteed annual income can only relate to cash benefit payments.

Another question is that of financial cost. There is not only the question of the ability of the nation to finance such a scheme, but the problem of the effects of total cost on the adequacy of benefits. If a guaranteed annual income program is to provide some minimum level of adequacy, a necessary first step is to establish minimum living standards which would vary as to family size and composition, geographic location and rural or urban residence, and to translate these living standards into terms of income so that they can be used as standards for payment as well as standards for eligibility. The determination of minimum living standards is not an easy task but it is absolutely necessary if equity is to be maintained among the many different family units which might receive a guaranteed annual income.

A further problem is the relationship of the benefit payment to those income levels corresponding to the minimum living standards. The benefit could be equal to the gap between a person's actual income and his appropriate minimum standard of income, or it could be some percentage of this gap or it could overlap the standard to extend income support beyond the minimum standards in order to prevent inequities arising as between families at the margin.

I think you can see that the choice of the standards and the choice of the benefit level in relation to these standards have important effects on the cost of the scheme. The higher the standards, the greater will be the cost; and the greater the benefit in relation to those standards, the greater the cost also. If the benefit equals the income gap, it may be adequate but at the same time discourage some people from working, therefore making the scheme more costly in economic terms. If the benefit is less than the income gap, it will be less costly than the approach just mentioned but may not be adequate. If the benefit levels extend beyond the minimum income standards, the levels of support will be adequate, work efforts will be encouraged because a person will always be better off by working, but the scheme may be far too expensive in terms of the nation's ability to finance it at present and in the immediate future.

Finally, a problem which is very often discussed with respect to a guaranteed annual income approach is the effect of such a program on the incentive to work of beneficiaries or potential beneficiaries. Two possible considerations with respect to work incentives are, first, whether the guaranteeing of a minimum income and the taxing away of income when it was at high rates would reduce the work effort of people affected and, second, if the level of the guaranteed income is high enough, whether some families and individuals would be so satisfied with the amounts transferred to them that they would partially, substantially or completely reduce their work effort.

Some studies have been done in the United States and in England on the effect of high marginal tax rates on the incentive to work. These have mainly been concerned with the effect on persons in the upper income brackets. While the results of these studies showed no noticeable effect on the work effort among those with high incomes, these conclusions may not be valid among persons with low incomes. An interim report on an important experiment and study in the United States which has just been received is very reassuring with regard to low income groups.

In Canada there are a number of factors operating to encourage work effort. We live in a work-oriented society where a person is expected to work and his social status is judged on employment status and the nature of his employment. The question of the effect of income transfers on the work effort of low income members of the population is one that needs to be examined further both theoretically and practically.

One project aimed at a thorough examination of the effects of a guaranteed income on incentives to work is the New Jersey experiment which I mentioned earlier. That is a three-year experimental study involving the use of the negative income tax technique of income maintenance on a limited group of families in New Jersey. It is financed by the Office of Economic Opportunity through the Institute for Research on Poverty at the University of Wisconsin and is being conducted by Mathematica Incorporated, a firm in Princeton, New Jersey.

The sample being used is 1,200 low income households with working-age heads selected at random from among three metropolitan areas in New Jersey. The selection of the household heads was made in such a way as to provide a homogeneous group to reduce design and analysis problems and to eliminate certain types of family heads whose economic and social circumstances are such as to basically distort the study.

Four hundred of these households are the control group which do not receive income guarantee payments but are paid a small fee for taking part in interviews every three months. The other 800 are enrolled in one or other of the various negative income tax plans and receive money by cheque every two weeks. They are interviewed four times a year for the full three years and prepare every four weeks a short tax return reporting on their income and family size. The amount of money paid every two weeks is determined on the basis of the interviews and reports and an audit run by the program itself.

The composition of the eligible family unit and the concept of income used were two basic problems underlying the experiment. The research design provided that the definition should closely correspond to the definition of "family" and "income" used for census purposes. The eligible unit includes husband and wife and any child or other person, related or not, who lives with and derives more than half his support from the family head.

This definition falls somewhere between the census concepts of "economic family" and "census family." During the course of the experiment no entries are permitted into the family unit, except by birth or in the case of a minor child after an initial waiting period of six months. Rules have also been set down indicating what persons are considered to have left the family unit.

The concept of income is a broadened measure of income because it is more comprehensive than that used under the U.S. income tax system and is also a family measure because it includes income of all family members. The definition of income used in the income tax system has been broadened to include such things as pensions, gifts, gross rented value of owner-occupied housing occupied rent free, social security payments, capital gains and losses, but it excludes public assistance payments and permits certain other deductions. The period over which income is calculated—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Does the House give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McBride: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The period over which income is calculated for determining the benefit is an important feature of the scheme. The prime consideration in a guaranteed income maintenance scheme is to match current benefits to current income in the benefit year so that benefits are neither too high nor too low for current needs. Under the positive income tax system the problem is handled by using an annual accounting period with pay-as-you-go taxes or a scheme for withholding tax payments so that taxpayers are kept "current" and are not faced with unduly heavy tax payments when the income tax returns are filed. There are certain other important features which have to do with this experiment, Mr. Speaker, but I wish to share with the House only some of the conclusions which are to be drawn from it.

Preliminary results of the survey have just been released by the Office of Economic Opportunity. Again, Mr. Speaker, they were referred to by the hon. member previously. These results are based upon an analysis of the data gathered in the period August, 1968, to October, 1969, from 509 families in Trenton, Paterson and Passaic, New Jersey. The data suggest, and I think this is the most important thing of all, that there is no evidence that work effort declined among those receiving income support payments. On the contrary, there is an indication that the work effort of participants receiving payments increased relative to the work effort of those not receiving payments. Low income families receiving supplementary benefits tend to reduce borrowing, buy fewer items on credit, and purchase more consumer goods such as furniture and appliances.

A number of in-depth interviews of participants in the project were conducted in order to determine the attitudes of low income individuals toward work. These interviews clearly indicated that low income people are strongly motivated toward work. The majority of those interviewed indicated that they aspire for a better job and are willing to move to another city or take training even if it means a pay cut in order to get that better job. The majority also indicated that they are willing to work in two jobs to support their families. Of all the factors influencing work choice, job security was ranked twice as high by participants as any other job factor, including wages, working conditions or job interest. These people wanted to work. Here again, this study destroys the widely-held myth that the poor are lazy and that they are only poor because they are lazy. These responses from the participants indicate that supplementary income assistance will not reduce their work effort.

We have a number of other experiences within Canada, but in case other hon. members wish to participate in this debate I will now relinquish the floor.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? I rather enjoyed his interesting remarks for 25 minutes, but I could not reach any conclusion as to whether he agreed with a guaranteed annual income. Would he tell us?

Mr. McBride: Mr. Speaker, if the House agrees I will be happy to finish my speech.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just answer yes or no.

Mr. McBride: Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I had carried out too much research and had too much material before me, but I think it is very clear that I am much enthused about the Calgary experiment and I think there is important knowledge to be gained from it upon which legislation could be based. I am equally enthused about the New Jersey experiment. I am sure that much of the study now being undertaken on old age security annual supplements will also be of benefit in bringing about useful, positive legislation in Canada.

Mr. David Weatherhead (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my hon. friend, the member for Oshawa-Whitby

(Mr. Broadbent), for giving the House the opportunity of discussing this very important subject this afternoon. On October 28 last I made a speech during the debate on the Speech from the Throne in which I spent considerable time commenting on various guaranteed annual income schemes, and I welcome the opportunity of further discussing them this afternoon.

Last November my third report to my riding, mailed to all my constituents, included a questionnaire which contained the question: "Do you believe that a guaranteed income plan should become the basis of a revised welfare program?" Interestingly enough, after the questionnaires were returned I discovered that the opinions of my constituents were split exactly 50-50 on this subject. Many who returned the questionnaires wrote additional comments on them or included letters with them, and many of the letters showed a quite deep suspicion of a guaranteed income plan. Such comments as, "Numerous people prefer no more, and live on welfare because easier" and, "I don't believe in giving freeloaders an easy ride" were used by some of my constituents.

The principle of a guaranteed income plan is a very difficult one for many people because of the high cost of our many social welfare schemes and the high taxes everyone has to pay to support them. It is an especially difficult concept for those who work hard to earn perhaps $1,000 to $4,000 more than the amount that would be subsidized under a guaranteed income plan. These people in, say, the $5,000 to $8,000 a year income level—and they are very numerous in my riding—realize that they would receive no direct benefit under such a scheme, and many of them—and also many in higher income brackets—believe that the people who live in public housing and/or receive municipal welfare or assistance under mothers' allowances and similar plans are taking advantage of them, the hard-working taxpayers.

Over the years federal Liberal governments have initiated all our main social security legislation and I am proud of their record in that regard. Some $6 billion are spent annually by the federal government on social security and social development programs, including $1,760 million for old age security and guaranteed income supplements for our senior citizens, $906,000,000 for hospital insurance, $889,000,000 in equalization payments to less developed provinces, $618,000,000 to post-secondary education, $616,000,000 for family and youth allowances, $472,000,000 for the Canada Assistance Plan which pays for one-half the cost of the provincial social security schemes, $214,000,000 for manpower retraining, $181,000,000 for medicare, as well as unemployment insurance benefits which are largely financed by direct contributions from employers and employees.

However, Mr. Speaker, despite the value of all these programs they have not directly met the needs of the 25 per cent of our people who are living below the poverty level as defined by the Economic Council of Canada. To me, therefore, a guaranteed income plan which would have to include excellent incentives to work for additional income is needed as quickly as possible in Canada before we can hope to win our war against poverty.

It has become a cliché to state that we are a rapidly changing society, but it is a very true and major characteristic of our changing society that we are in the midst of a social and cultural revolution. If we ignore this mood in the development of our social policies and programs, we do so at our own peril. In the midst of this social and cultural change, some of the basic principles which have for centuries governed the manner in which we have dealt with the more vulnerable members of our society should be questioned and challenged. In brief, the concept of aiding the poor through charitable handouts or public assistance relief measures may well be outmoded.

The technological revolution has been a major factor in producing almost a quarter-century of solid economic growth for Canada. For 19 years we have enjoyed economic expansion at a healthy 5.1 per cent annual rate, and for 18 years wages and salaries have gone up at the annual rate of 8.7 per cent. The Economic Council suggests it is realistic to hope for a further 35 per cent increase in our standard of living by 1975. In the midst of this economic growth we are increasingly puzzled as to why some 25 per cent of our population seem unable to participate in this new wealth, and why the gap between the "haves" and "have nots" is growing.

Although a moralistic approach to poverty dies hard, the concept that poverty is in most cases a consequence beyond the individual's control is now being more widely accepted in Canada. We will likely continue to be a work-orientated, indeed a work-addicted society. While fewer workers may be required, because of technological advancement, to produce the necessary goods and services, our rising aspirations and increased standard of living will demand even more goods and especially services, thereby keeping demand for labour high.

The most desirable way for a man to acquire sufficient income is through gainful employment. Therefore, the primary aim of our social policies should be to guarantee the individual the freedom and the opportunity to carry responsibility so far as he is able for meeting his own needs and aspirations. However, when he fails for whatever reason to provide for his own needs, including an adequate income, we are confronted inevitably and invariably with the core question: Does a man have a right to an adequate income?

An adequate income is by no means the only criterion in avoiding poverty, nor will a plan of guaranteed income by itself eradicate poverty. Without an income sufficient to purchase the essentials of modern living, a family is likely to remain poor. Hence, the provision of an adequate income should be basic to a war on poverty and it should also be central to our social security system. We have tried for too many decades to sidestep this fundamental truth. For too long our social workers, economists, businessmen and politicians have clung tenaciously to the view that the poor could be cajoled, coaxed, counselled and case-worked either into a state of independence or into acceptance of their unhappy lot. Only during the past few years have we begun to realize more clearly that this system does not work and is not cheap, but on a cost-benefit ratio it is very expensive.

I am not advocating doing away with all case-work. We will need to continue to work with the poor in all age groups on an individual basis; we will have to help them in developing plans for adequate education, training, adult retraining, resettlement to job opportunities and all the rest. We will also have to provide public housing for some, and we will have to expand our day care services. The Toronto Star on March 20, 1970, focused on the desperate need for day care facilities in metropolitan Toronto where 135,000 children need day care, 45,000 of them being under six years old; yet in all metropolitan Toronto there are only 83 day nurseries with places for 3,710 pre-school children. An adequate income is no substitute for these services, but most of these programs will be expensive and an exercise in futility unless we also provide poor families with an income adequate to purchase the necessities of our modern life.

Our tax reform proposals which increase the single exemption from $1,000 to $1,400 and the married exemption from $2,000 to $2,800 will certainly be of some help to people who fall below the poverty line. The proposal allowing an exemption of up to $500 per child for day care expense for up to four children will also help working mothers, but these proposals do not go very far in themselves toward providing our poor people with an adequate income.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Reuben Baetz, the executive director of the Canadian Welfare Council, in a paper he wrote for our Harrison conference last fall stated that there are five principles which must be applied rigorously to any system designed to provide a guaranteed income, and I agree with him on them. They are: 1. Will it provide most help to those who need it most? 2. Is it equitable; is it fair to all concerned? 3. Does it enhance rather than destroy human dignity? 4. Is it efficient to administer? 5. Is it economically feasible?

It would seem that the present social assistance programs fail in varying degrees in every test, and that the negative income tax approach of guaranteed income comes through with a much higher score. Regarding No. 1—will it provide help to those who need it most?—this is the question raised by a tax-weary public. In light of the $6.5 billion spent annually by our three levels of government on direct social security programs, a perplexed public asks: Why do we continue to have the poor with us? The answer is, of course, that most of our costly programs were never designed to help most of those who needed it most. The over $600 million tax free family allowance program is a classic example, and the more than $1 billion in old age security benefits is another. A negative income tax system with its guaranteed floor and steady scales of allowances based on an income test will provide, without equivocation, most help to those in greatest financial need.

Secondly, is it equitable; is it fair to all concerned? In a number of ways our present public assistance programs violate the rules of fair play and equity. In many regions of the country a fully-employed man receives no help at all, even though the family income is below any standard of adequacy. This principle of "all or nothing at all" is also applied to families who are on public welfare but who have some earnings. They generally have one dollar deducted from welfare for every extra dollar that they earn.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. The hour allotted for private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING HATE PROPAGANDA

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-3, to amend the Criminal Code, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, prior to private members' hour I was dealing particularly with those clauses of the amendment that relate to advocacy. I said that it is tragically true that in Canada tiny groups of perverted individuals circulate literature that is filthy, malicious and scurrilous; but ideas, good or bad, are seldom buried in jail. As I have pointed out, there is plenty of protection against this sort of thing in the Criminal Code and the Bill of Rights. What we might be doing here is creating the possibility for people to become martyrs. Ideas, as I said before, are seldom buried in jail. As Professor Harry Arthurs, Dean of Osgood Hall, has said, to pass this bill could mean that in the name of democracy we sacrificed democracy. The police crackdown or the jail sentence is a singularly ineffective way of diminishing hatred and contempt.

The most effective strategy to counter either the pathological fanaticism that distributes smear sheets or the more sophisticated expressions of those prejudices and hostilities that still survive among groups in our society is not the incarceration of a few annoying individuals. I cannot admit that we are approaching bankruptcy in terms of our moral and educational resources to deal with the problem of hate and contempt.

With the Canadian Bill of Rights of 1960 we have a new development in the law. The Bill has been interpreted in the Drybones case and now the courts take cognizance of the Bill of Rights which protects us. We have moved into a new concept of how to protect human rights and particularly how to eliminate racial discrimination.

I refer to the human rights commissions that are now being established by various provinces, of which the best example is the Ontario Human Rights Commission. Here we have a new method of approaching this problem. In my opinion we do not need more criminal law. Why involve the police, and why have trials. Matters such as hate and love are in a realm of human behaviour where law is a very awkward and clumsy form of control. You do not release the hatred by more prohibitions, but by fair human rights legislation.

Our anti-discrimination laws are greatly advanced and are developing all the time. To my mind this new kind of approach is almost like a social worker's approach. By a proper and well-balanced system of education you reach the minds of people and raise the dignity of the individual. Individuals are raised to such an extent and their expressions become such that they lack the capacity for this kind of hate literature which is published, as I said before, by small groups.

The second point is that the clauses of the bill dealing with hate literature are not necessary. This is crisis legislation, and there is no crisis in Canada. The bill undoubtedly constitutes an increase in the prohibitions of the Criminal Code and therefore a decrease in the freedom of the individual. I see no pressing evil at this moment, and I do not think anybody can produce evidence of any, in Canada that warrants its necessity.

As for the argument of fulfilling any obligations we may have internationally, there are two international conventions that might seem to give us obligations. There is the Genocide Convention and the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination. There is good authority to say that our present law is adequate to fulfil our obligations under these conventions, international agreements or arrangements.

The third argument is that this bill is dangerous. It is bad education for the public. It teaches that the way you stop hate is by having the police lay charges and putting a man in prison. That is not the way to make people behave better. I do not think anybody who saw what took place in the neighbouring country to the south, at the Democratic Party Convention in Chicago, will ever forget what happened. There we saw police power at its worst.

When you put power over the area we are discussing in the hands of the police, what happens? What happens when you put a man in prison for three months and he comes out again? Has that man changed his mind? Some good men here argued previously that capital punishment is not a deterrent to murder. How can they say, then, tonight that by threatening to put a man in jail because he may publish something will, according to the provisions of this bill, deter him from publishing that paper? That argument is utter nonsense. As I say, what happens when you put people in prison? You do not change their minds. We are getting away today from the whole concept of this old style criminal prosecution as a method of handling difficult human relations.

Why is this question raised in connection with criminal law? No international convention says that you must make laws in this matter or that they must be criminal laws. I submit the government has not the right to leap into amending the Criminal Code when there are to be explored two areas of alternative procedure such as I alluded to before. I would remind you again, Mr. Speaker, that this bill will bring a reduction in the amount of freedom of speech and freedom of the press that we have had in Canada up to this moment.

I will mention only the section granting the Attorney General discretion as to whether charges will be laid under the sections dealing with promoting or inciting hatred that may lead to a breach of the peace. The Attorneys General of the provinces are members of political parties. Our Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) is a member of the Liberal Party. He is a political animal, as is any other Member of Parliament. This power may be used by an unscrupulous Attorney General of a province, or the Attorney General of Canada, even against members of this institution and the public at large.

The Minister of Justice said that there will be no rule of law under this bill. There will be law by political fiat, and politicians have been known to bend with the wind. This means it is possible there will be one law for the French and one for the English, one for the Jews and one for the Arabs, one for the Catholics and one for the Protestants. This provision renders unacceptable all sections of the bill save those covering genocide.

I now wish to deal with some of the things that have happened recently. What did the Czechoslovakians say when the U.S.S.R. overran their country recently? One student put it in its proper perspective. The professors, the intellects and administrators remained aloof from the campus and university conflict and played safe. One student said he felt ashamed of himself "because we move and breathe, and say a few complacent words with tongues that are afraid to say our thoughts. We think we are alive. But we are dead". The only way to conquer hate is to change the heart of man, and the heart is controlled by the mind.

We ought to educate more than our Canadian students. We must educate our masters, the legislators and the citizens who in the end make educational institutions possible. We need to convince them of what they have forgotten—the importance of intellectual freedom if we are to have the kind of country most Canadians desire. We need to make our fellow citizens realize that freedom is not safety, but opportunity.

I referred in my opening remarks to a most powerful speech which was made in this chamber when our country was about to join the rest of the Commonwealth in the war against the Nazis. One member who spoke in this House opposed all other members. Thank God he had the right to do that! No doubt at that time he was subjected to ridicule and contempt. I am referring to Mr. Woodsworth. His daughter, in her book, quotes him as saying:

> I do not care whether you think me an impossible idealist or a dangerous crank. I am going to take my place beside the children and these young people, because it is only as we adopt new policies that this world will be at all a livable place for our children who follow us. We laud the courage of those who go to the front; yes, I have boys of my own, and I hope they are not cowards, but if any one of those boys, not from cowardice but really through belief, is willing to take his stand on this matter and, if necessary, to face a concentration camp or a firing-squad, I shall be more proud of that boy than if he enlisted for the war.

Naturally people did not agree with him at that time, the point I want to make is that there was freedom of thought and freedom of speech. There were those who believed that the war was an imperialistic war, even when the truth was out that men, women and children were confined to concentration camps and ended up in gas chambers. There were those who still maintained it was an imperialistic war. Do they have the right to have those thoughts and speak out? Yes!

When our words may jeopardize the state, such as in time of war, there should be some control over the manner of speech, but thank God under normal conditions we have the right to express ourselves as we see fit.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: This afternoon I referred to the Bill of Rights. I shall not repeat what I said. I point out to the House that these things can be checked. When dealing with this bill, they must be put on the record. Section 60 of the Criminal Code deals with sedition. One hon. member said he had a lot of experience. I ask him to look up section 66 dealing with the punishment of a rioter. I also refer to section 67, the punishment of a member of an unlawful assembly; section 68, the reading the Riot Act; section 30, preventing a breach of peace; section 120, public mischief; section 150, offences tending to corrupt morals; section 160, the causing of disturbances; section 246, blasphemous libel; and section 166, spreading false news. In those sections of the Criminal Code we have all the protection we need. We can still maintain freedom of thought, freedom of speech, freedom of the press and freedom of communication.

I wish to remind the House of the statement of Mr. Justice Rand in Boucher v. The King, 1951 Supreme Court Reports at page 284. It is interesting to note what Professor Scott said at that time. He said at the Legal and Constitutional Committee of the Senate, on April 29:

> I will never forget, Mr. Chairman, how delighted I and all my friends were at the Supreme Court coming out with what we thought was a great clarification in the law, an increase in freedom of speech, yet still providing us in Canada with an adequate protection against real danger.

This was in relation to hate and malicious propaganda. His words can be found at page 202 of the report. At page 287 of the Supreme Court Report a description of the Boucher case is given. A religious sect published an article. Certainly it was mischievous and malicious. It created contempt, ridicule and broke the peace. The document was headed, "Quebec's burning hate for God and Christ: Freedom is the shame of Canada". The author was charged under the Padlock Law and put in jail. This is what Justice Rand said in dealing with sections of the Code:

> The definition of seditious intention as formulated by Stephen, summarized, is, (1) to bring into hatred or contempt, or to excite disaffection against, the King or the government and constitution of the United Kingdom, or either House of Parliament,—

I am not going to quote all that he said, but I want to make the point that the definition the learned Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada set out in 1951 in the Boucher case is basically identical to the protection this bill is supposed to afford. The law is there. As the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hogarth) said, this is a vote-getting job and it threatens freedom of speech, freedom of thought and freedom of the press in this country. In other words, so far as law goes, freedom of the press is only the right to be let alone. The law itself does nothing affirmative; it leaves the whole task of promoting truth in the hands of authors, editors, reporters, publishers, broadcasters, motion picture producers and the rest of the communications people.

What will happen to books in the library which fall within the provisions of this bill? What will happen to a member who reads those books? Will he be charged under those sections and be liable to two years imprisonment? Is some Attorney General going to say to the member, "Because you read the book of Woodsworth or the book Out of the Night"—one of the most terrifying books I have ever read—"you will be charged"? What will happen to these books? I would like somebody to answer that question.

Unless they do something worth while, not a mite of truth has been attained or communicated. All that has happened is that a bunch of outsiders with official titles and police badges have been reduced to inaction. The law is kept away, but is truth any further ahead? Freedom of speech, and therefore freedom of the press—freedom from what? That is a good question but a much bigger question is, freedom for what?

I would like to ask some questions at this stage when dealing with this bill, which can become a very emotional and inflammatory issue: Is the government implementing this law with an eye on the next election? Has the government party an axe to grind? Are its decisions moved by emotion rather than intellect? I leave those questions with the House.

I now wish to turn to another question which puzzles me. What will happen in connection with parliamentary immunity? We are fully protected against all kinds of civil actions for slander when we are speaking here. But are we protected against a criminal charge? If, in desperation, an hon. member were to assassinate somebody or commit assault resulting in bodily injury, actions covered by the criminal law, would he enjoy parliamentary immunity? I am sure he would not; this House would quickly move a resolution and the parliamentarian concerned would be tried in the courts of justice like any other citizen.

But what would happen to parliamentary immunity under this bill if any hon. member dared raise his voice in the House and express himself in a way which brought him within the formula laid down here? Could not a resolution be passed by supporters of a majority government which is awfully hungry for power and which has shown itself prepared to override parliament at every turn? These are the dangers of the bill before us. I ask what would happen to parliamentary immunity if it became law. The Attorney General has power to say whether an offence, if one has been committed, shall be subject to prosecution or not. Well, the Attorney General is a member of a political party; he is as much a political animal, as anyone else here. What might happen?

When the legislators stagnate, I am glad we have dissenters. But consider the actions of those who take a stand on the Viet Nam situation; those, for example, who defend the position of the United States. Do their words not lead to hatred? Do they not cause, on occasions, a breach of the peace? It is the process of dissent which gives rise to freedom. Just because there is a man like Beatty in Toronto, and a few other crackpots like him, is no reason for using a packet of dynamite when a few drops of mosquito oil would do.

One hon. member mentioned the CBC. What about the plays I see continually on the television screen? My children would never have known anything about Nazi Germany but for them. Every night there is one of these programs. Now there is one about Yugoslavia. They have got out one about fighting guerrillas. Are these programs hate literature? Are they directed against identifiable groups of people? What will happen to TV and radio? I must congratulate the national newspapers; they have been writing responsible editorials drawing attention to precisely the points I am raising now. I hope the press gallery of this institution will measure up to its responsibility and make it known that the power to write, the power to find out the truth and the power to protest is vital to democracy even though its effect may not be appreciated for some time.

We have a right to be silent, too. That is a form of free speech. Take the example of an obscure Englishman named Francis Jenkes, in the time of Charles II. He had been brought before the court for daring to criticize the court itself—at least it was an identifiable group, made up of judges and bishops. When asked the question, "Who advised you in this matter?" he replied:

> To name any particular person (if there were such) would be a mean and unworthy thing, therefore I desire to be excused all further answer to such questions.

What did the lords and bishops do? They threw him into a dungeon. But as a result, freedom was born. He stayed in prison all summer, but his stubbornness helped bring into being the great Habeas Corpus Act of 1679. What about the right of the press to remain silent as to their sources of information? What about the right of a Member of Parliament to remain silent as to his sources of information? Does free speech produce truth? The great writers and speakers mislead us a little because their inspiring words lead us to expect too much from discussion too soon. In great debates it is possibly true to say that no parliamentarian convinces more than a few. But we tend to ignore thousands of listeners and readers many of whom reshape their half-formed views because of what is said in the course of free speech, in the thrust of parliamentary debate or, indeed, in debate on the hustings.

To put it in another way, we know the tide is either coming in or going out, but we do not possess a tide-table. Very few people can accurately measure public opinion. Every now and then, of course, we encounter the speaker or the writer who is really an objectionable fellow. There is the position of the extremist. He may frighten a multitude of cautious and sensitive men who do not dare imperil their wives and children: it upsets their tranquility, which is essential to productive writing. We cannot know what is lost through the effect of repression of them, because it is not prosecuted but simply left unsaid. The agitator's contest is waged on behalf of these thoughtful men as well as for his own sake, and if he wins, the gain to truth will usually come more from their writing than from his. As Spinoza said, paring down the state until it is too small to harbour men of talent and integrity is not the answer.

I have already discussed the position of books and magazines. I could quote from the book "Out of the Night". If this is not hate literature, there never was any hate literature published. It should be read by every Canadian. It is in the library. Suppose somebody wants to read it to a group of people and it happens to fit into the terms of the bill before us: is this any reason for putting people in jail and limiting freedom of speech?

Prior to the Rebellion Losses Bill of 1837, those Canadian revolutionaries of Upper and Lower Canada won over the establishment by resolution, and they were no cowards. They did not fear political change. They did not exalt order at the cost of liberty. I should like to read what Professor Mewett said in reply to certain questions which I addressed to him in committee. I put this question to him: Suppose the chief of an Indian band calls attention to conditions on reserves in Alberta, attributes those conditions to the actions of the white man, and disturbs the peace by inciting protest. He is arrested because the Attorney General says he is causing his party and the government embarrassment, and he is charged under the terms of the "hate bill". My point is, Professor Mewett said this could happen. Later I asked him what could happen if the press—for example, the Calgary Herald or the Albertan—were to print what the chief had said. Professor Mewett told me that they, too, could be found guilty under the act.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired. Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Woolliams: I will try not to be too long, Mr. Speaker. Somebody said I have just started. Well, this is an important subject, one to which everyone should direct his attention, particularly as far as this institution is concerned. I happen to have a strong distaste for certain things, including communism. I want to express that distaste in my own manner and my own oratory. But I would also defend as vigorously, and with all the ability at my command, the right of communistic groups not only to defend their philosophy but to propound it. How could an advocate take any other position?

• (8:30 p.m.)

Let me ask this question of record: Were the concentration camps in Siberia any different from those that were created by the Nazis, as far as human destruction of the soul and body and the breach of all our understanding of civil liberties are concerned? What brought these camps about? Under a dictatorship, free thought, free speech and free communication among the masses were denied to the people. And the people did not even believe that this was going on in their midst!

What are we going to do with the fuss that this bill will cause before it is implemented? The few charges which may arise, and investigations which may take place could, and will, stop freedom of speech. We might even convict a few conscientious men. Does the government want to create martyrs?

In 1589, when Udall was charged before the then known Privy Council, made up again of lords and bishops—the establishment—for inciting ridicule and contempt and creating hatred against the corrupt court that caused men to revolt, the bishop of the day, much like in "Anne of a Thousand Days", said to Udall that if he would not answer he must go to prison. He said: "It will go hard with you, for you must remain there until you admit it". Hon. members should read some of the famous cases and read books like "Blessings of Liberty" by Chafee which bring this question up to date. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, what Udall replied? His remarks are the very foundation of our freedom. He said: "I would rather go to prison with a good conscience than be at liberty with an ill one". The truth will out with freedom of speech. In a free country we punish men for the crimes they commit, but never for the opinions they have and rarely for the opinions they express.

Supporters of the bill will refer, as I have said, to crackpots like Beatty in Toronto who incite prejudice against immigrants and others. His failure to win any support shows that the confidence that is put in the voters of Canada is justified. It is justified when you have informed people in a democracy. As I have said, why waste dynamite when you can use insect powder?

I want to refer to two matters before I sit down, to bolster my argument. I want everybody who talks about voting with a free conscience, about not being bound by party discipline, to think about this. Let them read in Western Weekly Reports, 1920, the case of

Rex v. Russell. I also mentioned in passing Woodsworth and referred to the time when unions in Winnipeg were being organized in order to try to get for the average working man the right to arbitrate and make deals in regard to wages, time and working conditions. In those days the courts were way behind the times. The law had not been changed in Canada and brought up to date as it had in England. This is what the court said in Russell's case:

What took place before the strike shows that the accused and his associate "Reds" aimed at something much more drastic.

I am not quoting a newspaper; this is the statement of a judge of the Manitoba Court of Appeal. He went on:

Their ultimate purpose, as declared in their public speeches, was revolution, the overthrow of the existing form of government in Canada—

Pausing there, why should they not overthrow the government? These men had gone overseas for four years during the first war. They had suffered in the trenches, had to contend with lice and all sorts of unpleasant things. They saw their friends killed and wounded. They came back to find no jobs and a society that would not look at them. As a result, they dared to incite, to cause ridicule, and perhaps create a little hate—because they must have had a little hate.

These men were tried before the courts and thrown into jail. They included Woodsworth and Russell, men who helped lay the cornerstones of the labour movement today and the labour legislation that I hear so much about from my friends to my left. I think they will go along with me, because one or two of them were in the committee with me on the bill. I do not know how they can justify the cause of the labour movement if they give their support to certain clauses of this bill.

Let me return to the Russell case and read what was said:

This was to be accomplished by general strikes, force and terror and, if necessary, by bloodshed. The Bolshevists in Russia were greeted and approved.

That is what the judge said. He was shocked. He went on:

A vast quantity of propaganda in the shape of pamphlets, booklets, printed papers, etc. was distributed by the conspirators—

Mr. Woodsworth had an unusual library, one that was filled with material which gave him a deep and dedicated sense of feeling for humanity, a sense of feeling for men who had served in the war and for the workingman. But the authorities said this was awful. They said this man had this literature which he read to the crowd, thus inciting the crowd to break the peace. As a result they were put in jail. This is not a story taken from a newspaper or a magazine hastily written. This is not a speech made by a crackpot; it was written by one of the judges of the land at that time. The judge continued:

All of this contained matter intended to excite discontent and stir up class hatred—

Perhaps these men were glad that something was stirred up, because they were tired of going home hungry. They were tired of being sworn at and being fired. They were tired of working for 20 cents an hour. He continued:

The agitation prior to and during the strike showed no desire on the part of the leaders to bring about by constitutional means an improvement in the position of the wage-earner or by securing for him of a greater share in the fruits of his labour. Writing to brother socialists prior to the strike the accused contemptuously refers to the rank and file of the working men as the "plugs."

This engendered hatred and he was thrown in jail. What did Parliament do? They accepted the judgment which was confirmed in the court of appeal. I will not read any more of this case; it is there for all to read. It follows the same kind of line. The judgment was put in the wastepaper basket because the legislators took their responsibilities and passed the sort of laws that this House and this Parliament would today pass with ease.

Let me refer to a great Liberal who met with an accident which caused his death, Blair Fraser. He talked in the same vein as I. He said he would go along with the first clauses dealing with genocide, but then he said:

The Cohen committee suggested making it an offence, punishable by up to two years in jail, to "incite hatred or contempt against any identifiable group, where such incitement is likely to lead to a breach of the peace." The inciter would thus be the guilty party, even if the breach of the peace were committed by the group he was slandering, as has happened at neo-Nazi rallies in Toronto.

This sort of thing is a lot trickier. It recalls the famous case of Boucher vs. The King in 1950 and 1951—

That is the case to which I have referred.

—when after two separate hearings the Supreme Court of Canada quashed the conviction of a Quebec Witness of Jehovah who had been convicted in his own province of "seditious Libel" for distributing the Witnesses' tract—

That is the magazine I have described. In directing the acquittal of Boucher, Mr. Justice Rand in his judgment said:

"Freedom in thought and speech and disagreement in ideas and beliefs, on every conceivable subject, are of the essence of our life. The clash of critical discussion on political, social and religious subjects has become too deeply the stuff of daily experience to suggest that mere ill-will, as a product of controversy, can strike down the latter with illegality."

How the cabinet—

He is referring to a group of members on the other side of the House.

—is going to get around this difficulty we shall not know until the legislation is introduced.

And the cabinet has not got around it. Then he went on to say that many private bills against hate literature had been introduced in the House. I end with these words. Today I was shocked. Here we are debating something which, as far as I am concerned, is established fact—freedom of speech and expression not only in the House of Commons but throughout the nation; the right of freedom of the press and freedom of radio and television. We are engaging in this kind of debate, nevertheless. I asked for two assistants to interpret the law as I see it, before I moved my motion in the committee, and I was refused.

I spent the whole Easter holiday briefing myself, because I do not have behind me a staff like some of the ministers. As I see the law, the individuals of this country are fully protected. We are faced with many problems such as housing and the problem of no trade in respect of wheat and petroleum. There is a large gap in foreign policy between the United States and Canada which can wreck the whole economy. There is rising unemployment and there is inflation. If this government would turn its mind to the just society, clean up the ghettoes and do something for the average man, there would not be the hatred there is in the hearts of men, or the desire to incite, because they would be getting on with their jobs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Never in history since Confederation have we had such a government. All governments use a little window-dressing, like the bride to look beautiful for public opinion. Never, however, has there been a government which has used such window-dressing as has been used in respect of hate literature or amendments to the Criminal Code. This government should get on with the economic problems of this nation. Never in my life have I seen so much unrest in this nation. There are separatists in the west and there are separatists in Quebec. There is trouble in the Maritimes and everywhere else. This government was elected on the question of unity. It must get on the move. It has a majority and we cannot drive it from office by a vote, but there are a few Liberal backbenchers whom we must admire. We heard one this afternoon. Let me say to the government that dissension in its own ranks will grow until the government is driven from office.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, this is a bill which divides people who have worked together for many years, people who have worked in the field of civil liberties and in the field of the right of the freest expression of opinion. I respect the position of people such as Professor Frank Scott of McGill University, who has been in the forefront of every fight against any attempt to restrict the right of any person to express his views, whether those views deal with religion or, in the case of Professor Scott, with politics when he dealt with the Padlock Law or in the field of books when he dealt with the case of "Lady Chartterley's Lover." I respect the views expressed before the committee by Professor Arthur of Osgoode Hall. I respect these gentleman and give them a great deal of consideration. I am sorry I cannot agree with them. I am sorry I take issue with them, because I think this bill is necessary.

I was surprised and delighted to hear the speech of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). I found his speech interesting when he quoted so approvingly from the speeches made in difficult times by people like my old teacher from Winnipeg, the former member for Winnipeg North Centre and founder of the CCF, Mr. J. S. Woodsworth. I found it interesting to hear him mention the cases which arose out of the 1919 strike. I grew up in Winnipeg and I know what effect this strike had on Winnipeg and western Canada for so many years.

In the years to come I will be interested to see whether the hon. member for Calgary North will be as quick and as vocal in defending the rights of those who may strike in the 1970s or those who may express views which do not find favour with the majority of the people in the 1970s. I do not want to be too critical of the hon. member for Calgary North, but I heard him speak on the side of what may be called the establishment, and knowing the views he seemed to be espousing tonight I find it difficult to understand his position.

I can understand those who are concerned about this bill and feel it may infringe upon the rights of people to express their views. People such as Professor Arthur and Professor Scott have a deep commitment to civil liberties: they have worked to defend the right of all those who want to express themselves, not just those who want to say things with which most of the people of Canada agree. I have respect for Professor Scott and the kind of things he has done over the years. I think that people who express views with which most of us do not agree have a right to their opinions.

I think those who have been labelled hippies have a right to their opinions and their way of life. In my own and in other cities I have found the police have taken the position that these people are not very welcome and are not very useful. They have adopted methods with which I do not agree. I do not agree with the methods used by all those who are critical of the involvement of the United States in the war in Viet Nam, but I join with those who insist that those people have a right to express their view here in Canada. If I lived in the United States I would say they have a right to express their point of view there.

I disagree with many of those who are associated with what is commonly called the New Left, the Maoists, the Trotskyists, and so on. All my life I have opposed that point of view. But I defend their right to say what they think and put forward their point of view even though others may strongly disagree with them. So I understand the position of most of the people who are opposed to this bill, because I am a civil libertarian. I think I have demonstrated both in the House and outside my concern about what I consider to be these zealous activities on the part of the police, the Crown prosecutors or indeed the courts. I shall continue to do so, and I want others to have the right to continue to do these things even if the majority of the people do not agree with them.

I do not believe, however, that freedom of speech means licence. I do not believe this bill will prevent the expression of controversial or what some people, and even I, might consider to be offensive modes of speaking or writing. We already have slander and libel laws under which a person who is falsely accused, defamed or injured, either in speech or in writing, can go to the courts and can claim damages and ask for an injunction prohibiting the type of malicious, false accusation which has been made against him.

Although I do not place myself in the same position as many hon. members who are trained in the legal profession, I do understand that this bill proposes to do for groups what has already been done and what has worked so well over many years for individuals. It proposes, as I understand it, to protect groups from the type of dishonest, malicious and harmful criticism which is now prohibited by law against an individual. I think that is not only fair but is necessary.

Of course, we are proposing a limitation on complete freedom of expression. But can we really argue that there ought not to be any limitations, in light of the history of the past half-century? We are not living in the golden age of liberalism when in some countries like Great Britain people could say almost anything they wanted without hurting anybody.

After all, need I remind members of this House of Commons what has happened in the world? Need I remind Members of Parliament that in the United States of America there are people who so hate and despise American citizens whose colour is not white that they write and speak about Negroes, Puerto Ricans and Mexican Americans in the kind of language which has led to murder, to rape, to lynchings and to burning of whole communities?

This is a fact of history which I think most Canadians know. Need I remind Members of Parliament of what happened in Europe during World War II when Hitler decided that certain people who were not members of the master race should be, and they were, exterminated? At that time millions of people, Jews, Poles, Ukrainians, were murdered in gas ovens, were shot and were burnt simply because of their racial origin. These are facts of life. That hatred lingers on.

Who would have believed that in a communist country—I have spoken about my dislike of and opposition to communism many times both inside and outside this chamber—racism would exist? Not many of us, as anti-communist as we were, really believed that the communists with all their faults could be guilty of racism; yet the 2,000 Jews who went back to Poland after World War II are now leaving. They are being forced out for one simple reason—because they are Jews. Racism exists in communist Poland as it existed before and during World War II in fascist Poland.

Are we so free of racism in Canada? Who is there in this chamber, particularly those who come from western Canada, who has not heard or read expressions about Canadian Indians or Canadian Métis which would put to shame some of the worst material published in the United States about black Americans? These are facts with which we have to live, and because of this we support the principle of the bill.

I said earlier that some civil libertarians oppose this bill. While I disagree with them, I respect them. There are many civil libertarians, people who have put many years into defending the right of the unpopular, who are supporting this bill. I have had many differences of opinion with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and I will have many in the future, but the Prime Minister played a very honourable role in the province of Quebec at a time when it was not very popular to oppose the former Premier, Mr. Duplessis. The Prime Minister was on a committee which studied this question, the report of which led to the presentation of this bill. The hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) was an active member of the Civil Liberties Association in Ontario before he came to this House. He was on that committee.

My colleague, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) has a long record, which I need not go into tonight, of defending people who are unpopular, who are being persecuted and prosecuted by the establishment. He is defending this bill. I say they have done so because the evidence is that the kind of thing about which this bill talks, hate propaganda against people simply because of their race, colour or religion, is being disseminated in this country. It is being disseminated in large quantities in virtually every province. Because this is so, and because it creates division and hatred for Canadian citizens, I believe this bill is necessary.

In passing this bill we will be joining a host of other countries which have been faced with the same problem and have attempted to deal with it in part at least by the enactment of legislation. Great Britain, a country to which we always refer when we discuss parliamentary democracy, freedom and human rights, has, after centuries of assuming that legislation is not necessary, now passed legislation. Sweden and other countries too numerous to mention have also passed legislation.

They have done it because they looked at the record, they looked at the history of the last 50 years and realized how deep is this hatred, how pathological, how destructive is this kind of feeling and how necessary is this legislation. When we pass this bill I say "when" because I am confident that we will—we will actually be putting into effect the United Nations Declaration on the Elimination of all Forms of Racial Discrimination which was passed unanimously by the UN General Assembly on November 23, 1963.

I do not expect that the passage of this bill will mean the end of all hate propaganda. I know that we will be putting a difficult task in the laps of the police, the Crown prosecutors and the judges. I know there will be divisions. I am certain that some judges will not go as far as I think they should, and I am also certain that some judges will go further than I think they should in interpreting this bill and in dealing with examples of what will be called hate literature. That is part of society, that is part of a democratic way of life.

I want to be honest. I am not certain that the provisions of this bill will be very effective, but even knowing that this may be so I support it because it seems to me that in passing the bill we, the Parliament of Canada speaking for the people of Canada, will be making a declaration and will be saying to the people of Canada: We believe that it is not only wrong, not only immoral but illegal for any person in Canada to attack, to vilify and to incite hatred and violence against any other Canadian because of his race, colour or religion. Because I believe that that kind of declaration will be useful and will in itself be an educating force which can be held up as an example to all the people of Canada, I intend to vote for this bill as it is at the present time.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we are speaking now to an amendment proposed by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) who enjoys the confidence of his party, the official opposition, as their official spokesman in matters relating to the administration of justice and the review of the attorney generalship in the Department of Justice. I think we ought to analyse, before probing the substance of his amendment, just what it would do. It purports, on the face of it, to eliminate a few lines of the bill. But what it does is truncate and absolutely vitiate the bill, and if adopted by the House would kill the bill. I do not think we can prevaricate about that; that is exactly what it will do.

There are three offences contemplated in Bill C-3. The first is found under new section 267A, which embraces the offence of advocating or promoting genocide. The second is found in new section 267B(1), which is the proposed offence of public incitement of hatred where such incitement is likely to lead to a breach of the peace. The third offence is found in new section 267B(2) providing for the wilful promotion of hatred or contempt.

The amendment proposed by the hon. member for Calgary North, presumably on behalf of the party for which he is the official spokesman, would eliminate two of these three offences.

Mr. Woolliams: Right.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): It would leave in the bill only the proposed offence of advocating or promoting genocide. It would completely strike from the bill the proposed offence of public incitement of hatred, and the proposed offence of the wilful promotion of hatred.

That being said, Mr. Speaker, let me now say that we are at the report stage of the bill in the House of Commons, debating the report of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. I said previously, when speaking to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hogarth), the government accepts the amendments proposed in committee. Some of those amendments were proposed by members of parties that I do not represent. Some of those amendments were carried with the support of members with whom I am associated.

None the less, I believe very firmly in the committee system, allowing Members of Parliament to exercise their individual judgment, and I believe very firmly that in this particular instance the bill, without being sacrificed in substance, has been distinctly improved in detail, particularly in so far as there has been provision for new defences, a new balance protecting the right of free speech. I wish to outline briefly for the House what those amendments in committee were which we accept. The amendments appear clearly on the copies of the bill reprinted as amended and reported by the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

The first amendment is found, of course, in the genocide section where the word "means" was substituted for the word "includes", in order to restrict the definition of genocide to the two particular acts that are set forth in the bill, namely, killing members of an identifiable group and "deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction." I think that restriction, that precision adds clarity to the bill and in so adding precision protects the position of a potential accused.

The next amendment relates to section 267B where the words "or contempt" found in the combination of words "hatred or contempt" were dropped from the formulation of the proposed new offence of publicly inciting hatred, and they were also dropped from the formulation of the proposed new offence of the wilful promotion of hatred in section 267B(2). The omission of the reference to contempt focuses the real emphasis of the bill on the dissemination of hatred, and the members of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs were unanimously in favour of the removal of the reference to contempt.

I think those hon. members who have had training in the law are aware that the common law definition of libel has always been that type of statement which would tend to bring another person into hatred, ridicule or contempt. I know that the special committee under the chairmanship of Dean Cohen, when it presented its recommendations to the then Minister of Justice, the late Hon. Guy Favreau, recommended that the wilful promotion of hatred or contempt ought to constitute the offence, but the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs has now eliminated the words "or contempt" to make it quite clear that we are dealing with hate propaganda and hate literature, just as the Cohen committee recommended the elimination of the word "ridicule" with respect to the offence of the promotion of hatred.

The third amendment is found in new section 267B(2) dealing with the communication of statements "other than in private conversation." Those words are underlined in the copies of the bill now in the hands of hon. members. The communication of statements in private conversation has been excluded from the ambit of this particular offence. This amendment was moved by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis). I think that no civilized person would condone the wilful promotion of hatred against an identifiable group, no matter what form that promotion takes, but there is something to be said for leaving the condemnation of such conduct in private conversation to the ordinary social sanctions of the community rather than to the sanctions of the criminal law, and I am confident that the determination of what constitutes a private conversation can well be left to the sound sense of a judge and, in proceedings by indictment, a jury.

In section 267B hon. members will notice a new subsection 3. The defences provided under the original subsection 3 have been revised and an additional defence has been provided by paragraph (d). This entire subsection was proposed by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Murphy) and accepted, I believe, virtually unanimously by the committee.

There are two other substantial amendments. There is an addition of a new subsection, 267B(5), added to make it clear that the forfeiture provision in subsection 4 of this section does not apply to communication facilities. You can seize the telephone for the purposes of evidence, but you cannot seize the telephone merely because it has been used to communicate a statement. Finally, there was a technical change made in the in rem proceedings, as they are known, dealing with the seizure of property under section 267C(8) (c).

I think the House should review at this stage the defences that were added by the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, and that were rendered more precise, because in analysing this bill those who oppose it have failed to illustrate and emphasize to the House the defences that are available to an individual citizen and his free exercise of speech. These defences are set out in section 267B(3), with regard to the offence of the wilful promotion of hatred. First, no person shall be convicted "if he establishes that the statements communicated were true." Further, no person shall be convicted "if, in good faith, he expressed or attempted to establish by argument an opinion upon a religious subject." Therefore, any bona fide, far-ranging expression of opinion on any religious subject is sufficient to take that statement outside the purview of this bill.

Mr. Woolliams: How would you establish the truth of a religious statement?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Thirdly, no person shall be convicted "if the statements were relevant to any subject of public interest, the discussion of which was for the public benefit, and if on reasonable grounds he believed them to be true." If the statement were made in the course of debate or in the course of discussion the basis of which was for the public benefit because it involved discussion of public affairs, if it was a subject of public interest, if the statement were made in the reasonable belief that it was true even if it were not true, that amendment provides, as in an ordinary libel action, a complete defence to any prosecution under the offence of wilful promotion of hatred.

Finally, there was a new defence added at the instance of the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie. If in good faith a person intended to point out, for the purpose of removal, matters producing or tending to produce feelings of hatred toward an identifiable group in Canada, if the purpose of the statement or communication was to attempt to persuade his fellow citizens to remove the cause of that hatred or dissension, he has a defence. The situation the hon. member for Calgary North was talking about in his speech this evening in defence of his own amendment is now eliminated, that argument having been made by members of the committee and now rendered needless by the addition of the fourth defence in paragraph (d). If the Indian population in Alberta, to which he referred, feels it has a grievance against the white man in Alberta or in Canada, if it states this grievance for the purpose of removing the reason for the grievance there is, I would submit, a defence under this subsection.

Then there is the added protection in those two offences relating to genocide in section 267A, and the wilful promotion of hatred in 267B(2), there is the precaution of requiring that no proceeding can be taken under either of those offences without the consent of the provincial Attorney General. That restriction is not placed upon the second offence of public incitement of hatred and contempt likely to lead to a breach of the peace. Where a breach of the peace is involved obviously you have a potential unlawful assembly or a potential riot, and you have no time to try to get the consent of the Attorney General of the province before making an arrest.

In the offence of advocating or promoting genocide, in the offence of the wilful promotion of hatred by any statement other than private conversation, before prosecution can issue the consent of the Attorney General of the province is necessary. This means all vexation proceedings, mischievous proceedings, frivolous proceedings would not be available to a private citizen who wanted to undertake prosecution.

I know the hon. member for Calgary North has a certain suspicion of Attorneys General. He called them political animals, and it is true that in our country they tend to be members of a cabinet, as I am currently a member of the government of Canada and the Attorney General of Alberta is a member of the cabinet of Alberta. But I think the hon. member knows as well as I do that the tradition under the British parliamentary system is strong and firm on this particular point, that where an Attorney General is dealing with the administration of justice and criminal law he has to exercise his judgment on whether to initiate a prosecution or withdraw it on the basis of his own estimation and evaluation of the public interest. He cannot be bound by a decision of his cabinet, of the government to which he belongs. In fact, he should not be so bound, and if he is he can be subject to the condemnation of the House of Commons or the provincial legislature. It has happened. In the first Labour government in Great Britain the then Attorney General was suspected of having withdrawn a prosecution for political reasons. It provoked a crisis in the House of Commons at Westminster and the first Labour government fell. I believe that was in 1926.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Yes.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I did not want to interrupt the minister so I let him finish. Maybe it was an unfortunate word to use, but he said that I was "suspicious" of Attorneys General and Ministers of Justice. I am not suspicious of them as a class or group; I only say that they are human beings. That is what I said. I know that the member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney) is always talking from his seat and not from his mouth, but the fact is that I am saying that as long as you have such men, whether he be Attorney General or in any other executive position he is subject to human behaviour. I know the Minister of Justice would want to be fair and say that there is no suggestion that I am suspicious or I am using any terms of his bill in reference to the position he holds.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I am sorry, but the hon. member's remarks were totally incomprehensible to me and I could not have interrupted him if I had wanted to.

Mr. Woolliams: That is understandable.

Mr. Mahoney: I did not do it. It was another member on this side who seemed to understand what he was saying.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I shall make no comment on the fratricide between the two members for Calgary. I may say, however, that I am glad the hon. member for Calgary North is not imputing that any Attorney General of this country, federal or provincial, would in any way use his office in the administration of justice for political motivation. That cannot be done; it would subject him to the censure of the House or the legislature. The principle was clearly set out in the House of Commons at Westminster by the then Attorney General, Sir Hartley Shawcross. This principle is still binding on the Attorney General at Westminster and I would consider myself so bound. The hon. member suggested we are human. If he can indicate to me any way of running a free society other than by human beings, I wish he would suggest it.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I again rise on a point of privilege. We are governed by the rule of law and not by the rule of subject. The Minister of Justice, as a Rhodes scholar and legal man, ought to know that.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I am not going to be misled by that sophistry and I am sure the House is not going to be misled by it. The rule of law has to be interpreted by human beings, and that is the only way it is going to be done.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): And applied by them.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): And applied by them, as the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) has reminded me. The hon. member for Calgary North suggested in his speech that the present criminal law was adequate to cover the purposes of this bill. He cannot have it two ways: he cannot suggest the bill is unnecessary and yet pernicious. If it is unnecessary, the criminal law that currently applies must to his mind be pernicious. If the law is presently inadequate, then his argument in these terms might have some value. I am suggesting to him that the terms of the present criminal law, as it has been interpreted to me by the advisers upon whom I rely, are inadequate to cover the purposes of this bill. I think I am supported in that by the conclusions drawn in by special committee under the chairmanship of Dean Cohen, which made those points.

I should like to refer the House briefly to the three offences. The first offence is that of advocating or promoting genocide. Existing criminal law in the Code prohibits homicide of an individual person. Whereas I suppose it is conceivable that one could have homicide of a group of people within the existing terms of the law, the bill deems it necessary to create a new offence of advocating or promoting genocide, because there is now no offence in the Code of advocating or promoting the homicide of a group of people. These are acts which are clearly not forbidden at present in the Criminal Code of Canada.

When one turns to the second offence of public incitement of hatred and contempt likely to lead to a breach of the peace, I am advised there is a gap in the law today which derives from the fact that it does not penalize the initiating party who incites to hatred and contempt with a likelihood of violence, whether or not intended and whether or not violence takes place.

An hon. member referred to the case of Boucher v. the King, (1950) 1st DLR at page 267. The burden of that case was that the protection of groups under the provisions of the criminal law extends only to certain situations where a prosecution can prove violence was intended, whether or not the violence was a likely result of the action. The law is based on intention not on a likelihood of result following cause, effect following cause. It is the intention which is considered to be the necessary element under the present law as interpreted by the Boucher case. This would be, to our mind, unduly restrictive as applied to public incitement of hatred.

I know of no case, Mr. Speaker, in which a court has convicted a person who used insulting language that resulted in a disturbance where there was no intention on the part of the speaker to provoke a breach of the peace. This is probably a good instance where, the policy of the bill having been decided on, it is much better and fairer for the legislators to say expressly what the offence is, rather than to debate the possibility that the conduct may already, and perhaps inadvertently, be proscribed.

The third offence, the wilful promotion of hatred, is, again, on the advice I have received, not covered within the present provisions of the Criminal Code. If you turn to those sections of the Code dealing with defamatory libel, commencing with section 248, you will see that there is no specific protection extended to groups. The committee had this to say on the subject:

> —the defining words in section 248 preclude any protection for groups—

The reason is, of course, that the defamatory libel must be against the person and not against a group of persons. It is the word "person" that is used in present section 248 of the Code. Of course, the members of a group are still protected as individuals against a libel in collective form, but to establish the publisher's liability it would be necessary for the prosecution to show that the libel exposed every member of the group individually to hatred, contempt or ridicule.

The committee also considered section 166 dealing with the publication of false statements likely to cause injury or mischief to a public interest, and section 315(1) penalizing the sending of false information with intent to injure or alarm. Both these sections, in the opinion of the committee, have only very limited application to hate propaganda, for two reasons: first, both require the Crown to prove that the libeller knows that the matter is false. Not only is this a heavy burden for the Crown to meet, but it is undoubtedly true that many purveyors of group libel are sick or misguided men who thoroughly believe in the truth of their statements. Second, both apparently apply only to straight matters of fact and would have no application to any matters of opinion. The committee concluded with these words:

> In sum then, it is evident that the Criminal Code, even on the widest interpretation, does little or nothing to protect groups from the evils of hate propaganda.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that there have been philosophic objections to this bill. I want to deal with them as my final point. The philosophic objection to this bill has predicated itself on a certain set of assumptions about the right of free speech in a democratic society. Accordingly, as the argument goes and as the bill's detractors say, the bill infringes on free speech and arrests the freedom of expression so necessary to a democratic polity.

This kind of verbal gamesmanship is misleading and is based on three hidden but false assumptions. First, it suggests that the arguments in respect of the bill must resolve themselves in terms of whether one is for or against free speech—categorically for or categorically against free speech. Second, it suggests that the right of free speech is an absolute and unfettered right; and third, it questions the validity of the criminal sanction as an educative process. Let me deal with each of these assumptions which form the basis of the philosophic opposition to the bill.

First, I believe one's attitude toward this bill cannot, or should not depend on whether one is for or against free speech. I, of course, believe every hon. member of the House is in favour of free speech, freedom of expression and freedom of assembly. One's position respecting the bill cannot be construed as an automatic label of one's civil libertarian position. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) has spoken of civil libertarians who are against the bill, but he also spoke with equal authority and experience of civil libertarians who are in favour of the bill. There are respected libertarians who have argued on both sides of this particular piece of legislation. The question is not whether one is for or against free speech but, rather, what are the permissible limits on free speech; what are the permissible contours of freedom of speech and expression?

To put the question another way, to put it in absolute terms and say that if one is for the bill one is against freedom of speech, and if one is against the bill one is for freedom of speech, is to display a type of verbal sleight of hand, a type of verbal gamesmanship. It is what Professor Harold Lasswell of Yale law school has called "the cloud of normative ambiguity", because it derives the normative value by declaring that support of this legislation is tantamount to infringing on freedom of expression and is therefore anti-civil libertarian and even anti-democratic, rather than appreciating the morality of the behaviour being proscribed and the normative value of the principle being affirmed. The principle being affirmed is that no democratic process should oblige any of its members to subject themselves to verbal maiming or lethal language which cannot possibly have any intrinsic redeeming value or advantage, either in terms of freedom of speech or the democratic process.

There is a second false assumption on the part of those opposing this bill. I am not saying that the opposition to this bill is not sincere or is not well-founded. I am not being categorical and saying that the bill is a good or bad bill, because when we talk about the subtle balance between freedom of expression on the one hand and the abuse of that freedom by the dissemination of hatred on the other, no one can be absolutely sure or absolutely categorical that he is right. It is a question of value judgment; it is a question of feeling. I submit to Your Honour that the members of the government and the members of the committee who studied this bill tried to achieve a reasonable balance, a reasonable reconciliation, so that the conflicting legitimate interests of freedom of expression on the one hand and the protection of reputation and group identity on the other are balanced. This is a very difficult thing to achieve and we have tried to do our best.

We must realize that nowhere in our constitution and legal practice, and nowhere in our constitutional tradition is there any sanction of the concept of absolute liberty. There is no such thing as an absolute freedom of speech; there is no such thing as an absolute right of assembly. We are dealing with a right which we are trying to enhance without infringing on the rights and privileges of other people. If the hon. member for Calgary North says that the Bill of Rights is impliedly against this piece of legislation, I say that that argument is a bit of sophistry. True, the Bill of Rights talks in terms of freedom of expression, but there is nothing in the Bill of Rights that says there is an absolute freedom of expression.

There is nothing in the constitution of the United States to say that there is an absolute freedom of expression or freedom of assembly. Indeed, no democratic process, Mr. Speaker, could categorically licence any absolute rights—and the hon. member for Winnipeg North pointed out clearly the difference between a right and the abuse of that right by licence—without endangering the viability of the democratic process itself. The history of democratic society is the history of the balancing of legitimate interests and legitimate rights as between various members and classes of that society and between members of that society and the government by which they are governed.

The concept of absolute freedom is a perversion of the rule of law. It is the replacement of the rule of law by the rule of absolutism. The tradition of the enhancement and the enlargement of the right of freedom of expression—the hon. member for Calgary North cited some of the landmarks that have enhanced and enlarged the right of freedom of speech—is part of a parallel process whereby there have been placed at the same time necessary limitations and restrictions on the legitimacy of freedom of speech.

The criminal law of Canada, modelled upon the criminal law of England, authorizes freedom of speech but not in absolute terms. It does so within permissible contours, within permissible parameters. One need only refer to the present rules regarding defamation, blasphemy, sedition, libel or scurrilous material to appreciate the attempt, made throughout the history of Canada and under the rules of the common law, to draw boundaries between what is permissible and what is not permissible speech rather than to speak in terms of freedom of speech in absolute terms. From time immemorial there have been limitations on the freedom of speech and our laws of libel and slander are examples of this.

We are merely broadening, in the main purview of this bill, the law of libel and slander to include group libel and group slander. I have no right to defame my neighbour's reputation. There must be no right to promote the hatred of people on the basis of race or religion, the hatred of people who are distinguishable by colour or by their ethnic origin, let alone advocate their total annihilation or advocate genocide. No democratic process worthy of its name can licence the advocacy of genocide in the name of the democratic process itself. No claim to freedom of speech can legitimate the incitement of racial hatred and condone the breakdown of social order in the name of free speech.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, one must reject the charge that this legislation involves an invalid use of the criminal sanction. Such an objection not only fails, in my submission, to appreciate the intrinsic value of this legislation in respect of outlawing hate propaganda itself, but ignores the educational value of the legal process in general and the criminal sanction in particular. The measure of our laws, it has been said, is the measure of our civilization. If we are to have justice in society, then we must begin with just laws. Nowhere is this more important than in the realm of criminal law. It is here that the most fundamental values of life, liberty and dignity are to be protected and sanctioned, and it is here that the measure of our commitment to these values will be tested.

I do not consider the criminal law to be just an agency of social control. I do not consider it to be merely what Herbert Packer called the controlled use of power in society. I consider it to be a set of articulated values by which civilized men tend to regulate their lives and measure their society. That being so, this law will represent part of those articulated values by which we tend to regulate our conduct as free citizens in Canada.

This law is not just a technical body of rules. It tends within the conduct that is prescribed to articulate the values by which we Canadians seek to live. The criminal law is not merely a sanction or control process. It is reflective and declaratory of the moral sense of a community and the total integrity of a community. It seeks not merely to proscribe, but to educate. It seeks to set forth a threshold of tolerance and standards of minimum order and decency.

I echo what many members have said in committee and in this House. One cannot legislate a community to love or even eradicate by legislation the promotion of feelings of hatred. But one can control certain kinds of public hate dissemination and hate activity. One can put this country on record as declaring that the conscience of the Canadian community will not tolerate that kind of activity. One can put the Canadian community on record as subscribing to the international conventions, which other hon. members have referred to, under the auspices of the United Nations.

What this bill hopes and seeks to articulate is that we condemn the social evil of the deliberate, wilful dissemination of racial hatred in this country and elsewhere. We consider it to be a poison in a civilized society. We consider it to be contrary to the collective moral sense and total integrity of the Canadian community. We consider in the global village in which we are living, which is almost claustrophobic, that the exploitation of hostility in man and the skilful promotion of hatred must be combatted. As such, in its ultimate sense the criminal law sanction, and in this context the bill outlawing the dissemination of hate—and I make no prediction as to how successful this legislation is going to be; I would be a fool to try to do it and so would any other member—is a conscientious attempt on the part of the government, and I hope of Parliament itself, to outlaw as an articulation of the total integrity of the Canadian community the dissemination of hate in this country and throughout the world, proclaiming our commitment to humanity, humanism and to the rule of law.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, one would think from the eloquent words of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) that feuding, fighting, fussing and inciting to hatred, ridicule, contempt and the like were rampant in the streets of the global village. This measure has been before the other place for two sessions and before us for this session. I have yet to hear any discussions regarding any instances where the thoughts embodies in the bill have any particular application to this country. I am serious: I have yet to hear where it has any application to this country.

I know we receive in our mailboxes publications from the two opposing sides dealing with events that are taking place 5,000 miles to the east. I suppose those reports that we receive are the communication of statements which are supposed to incite our hatred of an identifiable group which is likely to lead to a breach of the peace, yet I have not heard of these groups seriously coming to blows with each other. I have not heard that these publications, which might be deemed to wilfully promote hatred, have led to any serious disturbance in Canada. They probably led to a discussion or some process of thoughts in our own minds as to whether we should take one side or the other or, sensibly as Canadians, we should try to find a mutual way to resolve a dispute in some other part of the world that, if not resolved, could lead us into disaster. In short, propound with regard to Bill C-3 what I call the Hatfield and McCoy theory, that we have not seen that feud transferred to Canada. If we are not using atomic weapons, we are using a great deal of parliamentary puff to try to dispel things that largely do not exist. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I am very sceptical. It remains to be proven to me during this debate that the exercise we are going through is meaningful.

I can agree with the first part of the formula in Bill C-3 without any difficulty. I think it should probably be passed in about five minutes without anybody giving too much attention to it. I do not think anyone in Canada would advocate or promote genocide. However, if a person, short of the lunatic stage, is inclined to promote genocide in Canada, we must deal with him or her promptly. I have my doubts about the purpose of Bill C-3. I know it is the pet child of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). The foundling has found its way into the lap of the Minister of Justice. The hon. gentleman is doing the best he can with it. He very properly raised it for a parliamentary blessing, but still I have my doubts.

This seems to be a bill dealing with thought. It is really an attempt to exercise control over the process of thought, imposing criminal sanctions against thought rather than against action. Most of our Criminal Code deals with actions by one person against another. But look at what is contained here in section 267B: the key words are "communicating statements which incite hatred against any identifiable group where such incitement is likely to lead to a breach of the peace." First, one has to assess what is meant by the communication of a statement and then somebody has to decide whether the mere fact of such a communication is an incitement to violent action. Finally, one has to determine whether it is likely to lead to a breach of the peace.

Outside this chamber we have all been subjected in the last year to an unusual number of jokes dealing with Newfoundlanders. To most of us who do not have the benefit of coming from that island they may seem very funny. Even if we are close to it, they may seem funny. Though I have never seen a Newfoundlander take exception to these jokes, they may seem less amusing to those directly concerned.

At one time the vogue was for Polish stories. Then it was Italian stories, or Indian stories, or black stories, or something. Is this sort of thing a communication of hatred, or ridicule, or contempt? Is it something designed to bring about a donnybrook? Is it something designed to bring about a belly-laugh? I suppose it would depend upon the circumstances—whether one told the story in a pub in St. John's at midnight or whether one told it somewhere in Alberta. Do we, by telling these stories, communicate hatred, ridicule or contempt? What happens when people tell these strories against themselves? I suggest a jury could look at such statements and reach entirely different conclusions in different parts of Canada.

Perhaps I have belaboured this point more than it should be belaboured. The point I am trying to make is that a thought expressed in one part of Canada might be taken to mean something entirely different in another part of Canada. This is why it is dangerous to attempt to deal, as I think this bill does, with what would essentially be thought-crimes. A person expressing a certain opinion may well do so for reasons which have nothing to do with inciting a breach of the peace. He may have said those things with his tongue in his cheek. Yet the result could still be a donnybrook, it could be a belly-laugh, or it could merely lead to people saying, "Go away. Don't disturb us with that kind of nonsense. We know you are full of hot air." This is what any of these so-called crimes could, in effect, amount to, depending on the circumstances of utterance. For example, what is said over television today or on the radio today produces an effect far different from that which have been produced by the same statements a hundred years ago. This is why we must proceed very carefully when we deal with the sort of crimes we are trying to establish under 267B. I realize the Attorney General will have to give consent before a prosecution is allowed, but an Attorney General in one part of Canada may have a conception of what constitutes social rectitude entirely different from that held by his counterpart in another province.

Reduced to its essentials, the bill is really dealing not with defamation, libel or slander as between individuals, but with defamation, libel or slander as between classes. It affords an opportunity for one minority group to say that another minority group is out to get it, or it provides an opportunity for a majority group to complain about a minority group, or for a minority group to complain about majority groups.

Perhaps I am especially sensitive to this issue because recently in Halifax we were visted by an encounter team, experts from outside in sociology, psychology, racial relationships and the like, who turned our community inside out, if I may use that phrase. They examined everything. They lifted the lids from our ids. They wanted to see what made the Halifax area tick—how the black people got along with the white people, and vice versa. They criticized all our methods of government and, in short, they examined everything that could be put out publicly on the line. In addition, there was the question of the appointment of a city manager.

The gentleman who was chosen by the Halifax city council came from Oklahoma City. At one time he was engaged in labour relations with a certain union. All did not go well, I gather, in his dealings with that union, so people who resented the loss of a victory, in other words, the defeat of the labour union, were quick to telephone Halifax and suggest that the man chosen by the city council to be the city manager was a racist. I think this is germane to the bill, because what happened next was that certain people drew ranks together, just as any rallying crowd would do. There was a tremendous fuss at city hall and the man withdrew his candidacy for city manager of the city that I, along with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), represent in Parliament.

Mind you, Mr. Speaker, this happened without the man's true nature being known to the people of Halifax, without there being one word in the charge being made against him of racism, or implied racism—a pretty serious charge if proven. He might have his remedy in the courts, I do not know; but he will have his remedy in public opinion when at some time or other people have the chance to dig out the facts and find out what it was all about. As for the job itself, his salary would have been an increase over what he received in Oklahoma City, and this he will not have thanks to a few who were able to raise the cry of hatred against him. Knowing this man's circumstances and his plight, I sympathize with him. I think he was kicked like a dog and never had his day in regard to public opinion as a result of the vapid thinking of a racist, rallying group, a small minority that nevertheless had its way in my own city.

Despite this, I do not think I could espouse the principle that is contained in a bill such as this. I do not think you can settle a miserable battle in this way, where one man's thoughts or one group's thoughts communicate statements that incite hatred or wilfully promote hatred against another person or another identifiable group. I do not think this situation can be solved by criminal action. You cannot solve this kind of miserable battle in court; it cannot be done in that way.

The only way you can solve battles like this, I think, is to dredge the slugs, the people who espouse hatred or contempt of others, out from under the rocks and hold them up high where the public can look at them and ask questions. I think essentially they are suffering from sick or misguided minds; perhaps they have infantile minds and are not able to see the whole world as it exists but rather see only their own small part of it.

Every member of the House has received letters in his mailbox, as I have in mine, from someone who dislikes French Canada, from others who dislike English Canada, letters complaining that the Indians are not getting a good break, that the blacks are being hounded, that the WASPs are an ugly bunch, and so on and so forth. We all receive letters like this. If they are all put together, what they add up to is that just about everybody in Canada is a person who should be hated, who should be the object of ridicule and contempt.

This is the way life is. I do not see how we solve these things by having a few brisk court cases—miserable battles, as I called them earlier. I think we are better off having the full spotlight focused upon these situations in a democratic country. These things should be explored in the newspapers, on television and radio. Let us talk about them in Parliament, though perhaps the most distasteful debates that take place in this House are those that deal with human rights. It is always difficult in a political forum to deal with such issues. For example, a few years ago I do not think I made any great contribution to the debate on the Bill of Rights. I went back to it, and this is one of the items I wish I had not talked about, because I think I had some political motivation in getting after certain of my friends who now sit to my left.

Be that as it may, I think it is public discussion and public spotlighting that provides a better answer. The light of truth can be made to shine. People who have to lurk in small corners with their own small prejudices, their own small hates and their own small contempts can be made to live harmlessly from the rest of us. So, Mr. Speaker, unless I am persuaded very much otherwise during the debate tomorrow, I am afraid I cannot accept the principles contained within section 267B (1) and 267B (2), and will support the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams).

Mr. Colin D. Gibson (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, in the course of his speech the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) inferred that Bill C-3 is designed for election purposes. I believe he has missed the point. The bill before the House is designed to protect minorities, not majorities. Surely this is not a narrow, electioneering purpose. The hon. member has, of course, had little opportunity in recent years to acquire an accurate understanding of majority opinion. He and his party are obviously out of touch with majority opinion in Canada. We are dealing with the dignity of man, and we intend to protect the victims of slanderous prejudice in modern Canadian society. If we pass wise and just laws, we are far more likely to be re-elected than if we retreat and shrink from laws which dignify man in Canadian society.

In speaking against the amendment, I believe that should the amendment pass we would eliminate the direct causes of genocide by criminal restraint. I believe that the House has the courage and the strength actively to prevent abusive, prejudicial expressions of hatred against identifiable minority groups. We agreed through action at the United Nations to take steps to eliminate racial prejudice. This we said and this we shall do. This is why we are here today. We are in the act of doing what is required to equalize the rights of those minority groups, thus giving them the protection they deserve. The high standard set by Canadian justice will be reached by goals such as those contained within the bill. Prejudice will be thwarted by law and by education.

May I call it ten o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

POST OFFICE—MONTREAL POSTAL DISPUTE

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, on March 6, not knowing at the time that I was so prophetic in the import of my question, I asked the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans), as reported at page 4469 of Hansard:

> —what other minister or ministers will now be assigned the duty of bringing about a solution to the prolonged postal dispute in Montreal?

Alas, sir, that prolonged dispute is still facing the country, and the acerbity of the problem has not diminished. Although I asked the question on March 6, the problem began much earlier, on February 3. To say that the Postmaster General is disaster prone is to use an euphemism. There has been more trouble, more divisiveness and more unrest than in any equal period of any of his predecessors since the great Sir John A. Macdonald occupied the post for one day over 100 years ago.

One of the kindest things one could say is that the hon. gentleman is a trouble-prone Postmaster General. In this, the most brittle and most bitter of disputes, the government has moved to bail him out and share with him the responsibility for the brittleness, ineptitude, harshness of attitude and lack of perception of the problems. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) today is, unique among the cabinet ministers, away in the cool waters of the Azores. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) is not with us. What he thinks I am not able to divine, but I have my suspicions.

So after many, many weeks of faltering, inadequate or non-service we have an eleventh hour effort to bail out the government and an urgent last minute summons to a man heretofore with an unblemished record, Mr. Goldenberg. Yet this man's report is anything but a paean of praise for the Postmaster General. Indeed, it looks like a carefully documented denunciation and denigration of that hon. gentleman whose activities as Postmaster General some of us have questioned rather stringently and severely in these past many months. Almost, sir, it is as harsh as the denunciation of Mr. Martin of the Public Service Commission some months ago. Significant among the comments of Mr. Goldenberg is that in respect of the moral responsibility of the government in its role as employer. I submit in all the tangled web of uncertainty and misunderstanding that the role of the government as an employer is the very, very significant question we as legislators must face.

Surely the government should be pre-eminent in the realm of labour-management relations and should as an employer be above reproach. But it would be a reckless man who would suggest that in this tangled web of uncertainty, of deception and of regrettable faltering the government has been above reproach. I will pass by quickly Commissioner Goldenberg's comment upon the substitution of the six-day week for the five-day week, a matter upon which many of us have commented, lo these many months, to no avail. But after months of inefficiency, ineptitude and internecine conflict the Post Office has reached a state of paralysis or worse in the most important receiving and distributing centre in our whole nation, namely, the city of Montreal. The failure to give good service to the Canadian people is appalling; but it is something to which the Canadian people should have grown accustomed. But the fact that bad service is tolerable cannot pardon the government for providing no service.

If I had time in these seven minutes I would quote from the illustrious paper, the Ottawa Citizen, the lead editorial which is capitalized "A Catalogue of Blunders." In considering everything, I ask how many more privations the Canadian public must endure in this unseemly conflict between an arrogant Postmaster General and a legitimate union. I am not going to talk about the reported turbulence in the cabinet which it would seem is even more disturbing than the turbulence in some areas of the postal service. It is not my purpose to seek to pry into the workings of the Privy Council to ask who is on slippery slopes or in cold water, but I ask: Are we to punish hundreds of decent, honourable workers who have served the mail service well, in order to follow a certain formula acceptable to a minister or to this government which is not acceptable to the union or to a majority of the cabinet?

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, in answering the question of the hon. member may I say that it is indeed a privilege for me to say what I think should be said, and I intend to make my remarks in less than the two minutes allowed me. First of all I should like to correct some insinuations which the member made. If the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) is in the Azores, his wonderful record of accomplishments entitles him to this trip which is well earned. Regarding the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene), let me say that he is not in the Azores because I had supper with him tonight in the parliamentary restaurant.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Did he deserve that?

Mr. Whelan: If the rest of the comments made by the hon. member are as inaccurate as those I mentioned, I do not know what I can say to help him. The minister has inherited a department that has been long neglected by other governments. The government of which the hon. gentleman was a member did not do anything to try to improve postal services or the long-forgotten department.

Mr. McCleave: We did deliver the mail, though.

Mr. Whelan: Anyone who accepts a challenge to improve a department which has been neglected for so long is bound to run into conflict. If he is determined to make it work, reaction of every kind will certainly rear its head, and anyone who has studied the history of the Post Office Department, as I am sure the hon. member has, will realize that this is true. This department has long been due for an overhaul. When one checks the record of the minister and his background, one certainly notes his ability. I am sure that all members of the House recognize the minister's ability to work and to solve the tremendous problems faced by the Post Office Department. He has the necessary experience and knowledge, and he needs the backing of every member of this Parliament to ensure that the problems with which the Post Office Department is confronted are solved in a satisfactory manner.

I understand that today a new offer has been made to the postal workers in the Montreal area who are involved in the strife that is now going on there. The offer has been announced in a press release, but no details were given. We all have to wait until tomorrow to find what they are, and let us hope that by tomorrow the difficulty will be settled in an amicable fashion for the benefit of all those concerned with the postal services in Canada.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS—ACTION RESPECTING NON-RETURNABLE BOTTLES

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, on March 12 I asked the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) what plans he had to protect the consumer from a growing pollution menace, that of non-returnable bottles. This is a completely unnecessary evil thrust upon the long suffering consumer by the glass industry. Always on the lookout for expanding markets, they have seized upon the one-trip bottle as the glass industry's bonanza, regardless of the added cost to the consumer, regardless of the danger of broken glass on playgrounds, streets and highways, regardless of the unsightly litter of disgarded bottles everywhere and the difficulties and expense to municipalities of cleaning up the mess.

Such callous disregard for consumer interests has begun to stir community groups into action. Organizations such as the Consumer Association of Canada, the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities, the Home and School Association, known in some parts of Canada as the Parent-Teacher Federation, and other large organizations have protested vigorously at their national conventions and have demanded action—so far in vain.

More recently the minister of highways of the province of Alberta declared that unless the federal Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs places a ban on non-returnable bottles, the highways ministers of all ten provinces will discuss ways and means of dealing with this problem. Still more recently the province of British Columbia passed Bill No. 33, the litter Act, section 3 of which reads:

> No person shall sell or offer for sale beer, ale, carbonated beverages or drinks in a glass, plastic, or metal container for consumption or use off the premises of which they are sold or offered for sale unless the person undertakes to refund to the purchaser on delivery up of the container the sum of not less than two cents for each container.

This is the sort of legislation we need federally. At the beginning of the tourist season we scarcely need to be reminded of the vast quantities of soft drinks and their containers that will be bought this summer. Will this mean pleasure all around, or will it mean momentary pleasure for the individual and long drawn-out, pain-in-the-neck pollution for the community? Surely we have had enough of pollution without letting this kind of pollution proliferate in the way it is doing. It is up to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs; let him ban the one-trip bottle now; let him find ways and means of doing it.

In the days gone by the minister might have been tempted to shelve such action by saying it was strictly provincial in scope. But after the answer he gave through his parliamentary secretary to my colleague, the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman), on October 3, 1968, no such escape is possible. On that occasion his parliamentary secretary said—I am glad the parliamentary secretary is in the chamber tonight—as follows:

> However, Mr. Speaker, in line with the minister's duty to promote and encourage the institution of practices tending to improve protection of the Canadian consumer and to co-operate with provincial governments or their agencies, or with private groups, the minister will be having further talks with his officials and will consider the question of non-returnable bottles, with a view to formulating some type of regulation.
> After these departmental talks, it is intended to invite representatives of the manufacturers, the user and the retail distributors of these bottles to

Ottawa to discuss the problems and all proposals, as well as ascertain from these people what they intend to do relative to the problem mentioned by the hon. member.

I repeat that that was on October 3, 1968. After 18 months, Mr. Speaker, we are still waiting to hear the result of these talks, formulations, invitations, discussions, ascertainments, intentions—I take all that language from the reply—and what-nots, and that last expression is my own, on non-returnable bottles, which is the problem we are talking about.

Non-returnable bottles are to be found everywhere. The retailer does not care what happens after the sale is made. The empties will be found in householder garbage cans, in parks, rivers and lakes, on lawns, streets, in roadside ditches and even in grain fields. Some of us remember the Russian wheat deal and how the Russians could not handle the grain because of the broken-bottle litter in it. How about watching out for our export trade, because it is important. Non-returnable bottles can be a great factor in making more accidents possible, and damage and injuries greater. Death can be accelerated by contact with broken glass carelessly thrown in a ditch after a minor car accident.

After all these prolonged negotiations we are waiting to hear what the minister has come up with, after he has invited the provinces, the glass people, the consumers and the retailers and everybody else to Ottawa to do all this discussing. Surely after 18 months he is beginning to come up with something to protect the consumer. Pollution is a thorny problem with many ugly angles. Few are uglier or more unsightly than the broken glass which wastes our resources, endangers our children and infests our landscape. Again I ask the minister, what plans has he to deal with this pollution menace?

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) I would first like to assure all hon. members of the House that the department is not only concerned about the problem of non-returnable bottles but also is giving this problem very urgent consideration. In particular, the department is now looking into standards for containers. In general, I should like to say that we are very much aware of at least two major problems presented by non-returnable bottles, the problem of litter and the problem of safety.

It has been suggested frequently that the federal government ban the sale of beverages in non-returnable bottles. I should like to emphasize that the federal Parliament has jurisdiction only over that part of trade and commerce which is interprovincial or international. Since soft drinks and beer enter interprovincial trade rarely, if at all, any action by the federal Parliament would be ineffective in dealing with the problem. Any legislation to ban the sale of beverages in disposable bottles would have to be passed by the provincial legislatures.

Non-returnable bottles are only one cause of the litter created by containers. Legislation to prevent the use of non-returnable bottles would be only a partial remedy. The hon. member has already mentioned the Litter Act which was introduced into the legislature of British Columbia and which will be under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Recreation and Conservation. I should like to commend the government of British Columbia for introducing such a bill, one which defines litter by including rubbish, garbage, waste material, containers, packages, bottles, cans or parts thereof. The hon. member has already mentioned section 3, about the refund that should be made to the purchaser, and other sections of this act. It is one which I believe should be commended to all provinces of Canada, Mr. Speaker. This bill will require that all containers for beverages be returnable and will prohibit the littering of waters and lands, the spoiling and fouling of waters and adjacent land.

Mr. Speaker, this is all I can say at the present time, but I have made note of the representations made by the hon. member and I should like to assure her that I will bring this matter to the attention of the minister.

CRIMINAL CODE—PROCLAMATION OF REMAINDER OF AMENDMENTS RESPECTING BREATHALYZER

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, the decision of Mr. Justice Craig Munroe with regard to the rather unique method by which the government proclaimed the breathalyzer provision of the amendments to the Criminal Code was not the first time this matter had been raised publicly. On January 15, in this House of Commons, at page 2464 of Hansard, at just about this time of day I said:

I note that it has been accepted over the years that certain sections of acts can be proclaimed, and indeed have been proclaimed, without the whole body of the act being proclaimed at one time. But I have never heard of a package within an act being proclaimed and little snippets and pieces of that package being cut out and held up until a future proclamation.

My understanding that this was a very unusual course was reinforced when I spoke to two members of the class of 1940 in the House, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). In their vast parliamentary experience—and nobody is their equal in that regard—they could not recall such a course being adopted.

I made that statement then, nobody has challenged me since, and I stand by it. I think on behalf of Parliament a big vote of thanks is due Mr. Justice Craig Munroe for doing what we should be able to do but find ourselves powerless to do once the government acts in such an unusual fashion.

When the matter of the approved container for the breathalyzer section of the Code was dealt with—and this is what we are dealing with here, the removal from proclamation of three parts of the amendments to the Criminal Code which deal with this very essential right of an accused—a question was asked by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) on March 18, 1969, with respect to the proclamation. This is when the matter was before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. The following exchange is reported at page 476 of Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence No. 11 of that committee:

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): ...We do not have a suitable container yet developed....That is the problem Mr. Hogarth was talking about and that is why we have to delay the proclamation.

Mr. Peters: Well, Mr. Chairman, how can you approve it when you have not decided on one.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is right. Until we find one we will not proclaim it.

Most or all the members of the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee took that exchange to mean that the minister would not proclaim the entire .08 package of the law until the approved container was found. I have been reinforced in that view by talking to hon. members, who have given me this opinion privately. Perhaps I should quote one hon. member who has given his opinion publicly. I wish to quote from an article in today's Montreal Gazette, by Gordon Pape. At page 7 of the newspaper the hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Chappell), a government supporter, is written about in these terms:

[Mr. McCleave.]

Mr. Chappell charged that the law as proclaimed "completely defeats the spirit of the act." He said it had never been Parliament's intention "that the penalties would pass into law but not the safeguards."

I return to the essential point. When the Standing Committee of the House on Justice and Legal Affairs gave its approval to the bill to amend the Criminal Code—and the bill was a general package which included various provisions—it was our feeling that the whole of this particular amendment to the Criminal Code, the whole provision dealing with the .08 per cent blood alcohol level and the breathalyzer, would come into force and effect at one time. We were surprised when the minister and the government adopted the course taken. We are pleased that the court has seen fit to chide them for their action. I wish to quote one more passage from today's Ottawa Journal. The editorial page reads in part:

The government was three times warned in Parliament about this discrepancy by Conservative Robert McCleave but Justice Minister Turner assured the Commons the accused's human rights were already protected. And so they may be.

But it is clear that neither the judge nor Canadian public opinion is against the breath test. The judge suggests only that the governement did not take pains to see that its laws are not only sensible but framed and processed within the law.

I think these things are better on record, Mr. Speaker, because I have seen the Minister of Justice, who seems to be a white haired boy among certain elements of the so-called national press, quoted without anybody ever trying to look back at the committee report to see what really was done or intended then. It is time, for example, that Mr. Burns of the Toronto Globe and Mail at least got the facts in order.

Mr. Jean Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to avail myself of this opportunity to correct some assertions made today by some opposition members concerning the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner).

All those who know about his fairness, his broadness of mind and his sense of justice will recognize that the Minister of Justice had warned the House that this section would not be passed until the equipment for making the test and communicating its results to the accused was available.

Besides, the hon. member should have mentioned the statement made by the Minister of Justice before the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. As reported at page 459 of the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the committee, the minister stated, and I quote:

> You and I have talked privately about this. At the moment there is no fool proof sample procedure available. I will give an undertaking to the Committee that we will not proclaim this section until we have one available, but we think we ought to have it. We ought to have the section ready if we can get a proper sample procedure approved.

I feel that quotation is quite clear. It covers the whole section and the cabinet intends to act accordingly.

In addition, I wonder if this is really the time to discuss that matter, since the Minister of Justice has just said that the whole matter will be deferred to the highest court of justice in Canada. I feel that we should wait for the decision of that court.

TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE WITH HUMBLE OIL COMPANY CONCERNING SECOND VOYAGE OF "MANHATTAN"

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

POLLUTION

ESTABLISHMENT OF STANDARDS FOR AUTOMOBILES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport concerning the manufacture and importation of automobiles and the matter of pollution about which there is great concern because of health and other reasons. Is it the intention of the government to establish standards governing pollutants emanating from automobiles and, if so, will this be done at an early date?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the highway safety bill which was given royal assent on the last day before adjournment gives us the authority to set standards for automobile exhaust systems. These standards are now being drawn up and it is our hope that the necessary hearings will have been held in time for the systems to be installed on automobiles for the current year, that is, the 1971 models.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will these regulations be substantially the same as those that are evidently being promulgated or prepared in the United States?

Mr. Jamieson: I am afraid I am not in a position to answer that technical question specifically, Mr. Speaker. We will draw up the best standards, taking into account all studies that have been undertaken both in the United States and Canada, and I shall be glad to make the facts known as soon as the standards have been drawn.

Mr. Stanfield: A further supplementary question. Is it intended to impose these standards upon all imported automobiles as well as those manufactured within the terms of the automobile agreement?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The highway safety bill provides that the same standards will apply not only to automobiles manufactured in Canada but to those imported from anywhere in the world.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. Is any research being done in Canada into the concept of removing the lead component from gasoline and substituting a gasoline derived from grain, which would greatly reduce pollution? This is being seriously studied in the United States. Is Canada doing any research in this connection inasmuch as, if successful, it would greatly reduce the pollution from automobiles?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, that type of research is going on and we have a full exchange of information with the counterpart agency in the United States.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

ESTABLISHMENT OF STANDARDS FOR AUTOMOBILES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether research is being conducted into the question of what additional safety measures ought to be imposed with regard to automobiles operating under our climatic conditions? Is the minister simply following the research and the standards being established in the United States or is serious research being done in order to relate our standards to our conditions, particularly with regard to winter driving?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there is research with regard to winter driving and an effort is under way now to determine if it is feasible for us to introduce special safety standards having to do with such things as rear window defrosting.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the statement made yesterday in Montreal by Mr. Ralph Nader, the highly respected American critic of auto safety, that American cars stand up better in accident testing than Canadian-made automobiles, will the minister look into that in order to see to it that Canadian cars are built with all the safety factors they should have?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am at a loss to understand the question since many of the so-called United States-made automobiles driven in the United States which appear to be safer are actually made in Canada.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And they are a lot cheaper there than they are here.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TRANSFER OF NERVE GAS FROM OKINAWA TO UNITED STATES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs may I direct my question either to the Prime Minister or to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. Word has just come over the radio that the United States government has authorized the transportation of large quantities of nerve gas from Okinawa to Oregon via the Strait of Juan de Fuca and Bangor, Washington. I have raised this matter several times in the House with the Secretary of State for External Affairs and asked him to look into it and urge the United States government to detoxicize this material before it is transported. Can he give us any information, first of all, whether the shipments are actually to take place and whether any steps are being taken to safeguard Canadian waters in the event of a mishap during this transportation process?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member might consider asking his question tomorrow when the Secretary of State for External Affairs will be answering questions.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

An hon. Member: When will someone answer on behalf of the Department of Agriculture?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I did not know that we now have selective answering. This is a matter of deep concern. Is the Prime Minister aware whether the Canadian government made representations to the United States government with reference to this 8,000 or 10,000 tons of lethal gas? Did the Canadian government consent to the shipment of this gas which is greatly feared by the people of British Columbia adjacent to the strait? Did the Canadian government consent to this movement, because some months ago it was said that before shipments were made Canada would have to consent?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the right hon. gentleman's question deals with the same subject as the previous question; therefore my answer remains the same.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the Prime Minister not know what is going on internationally? The answer is no.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, this question goes beyond the scope of the Department of External Affairs. This is a matter which could possibly involve the safety and welfare of people on the Pacific coast. I was not directing my question solely to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I ask the Prime Minister if he, as the head of the government of this country, has any information regarding this matter. Have any representations been made or are any going to be made by the government of Canada to make sure that Canadian safety will be kept in mind during the period of transportation?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am trying to convey to the opposition that this is not a one-man government and that there are other ministers in it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Why does the Prime Minister not practise what he preaches.

Mr. Baldwin: It is no government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: It is a one-man government.

An hon. Member: You mean, it is a one-man opposition.

Mr. Speaker: May we have order, please.

NATIONAL SECURITY

SHERBROOKE—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO ALLEGED SUBVERSIVE PUBLICATION

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

This afternoon I received from a citizen of Sherbrooke a copy of a small magazine L'Estrien Rouge which is supposed to be the organ of the Sherbrooke student movement. This newspaper which is obviously communist calls traitors the members for Papineau and Sherbrooke (Messrs. Ouellet and Gervais) and I quote the following excerpt:

> The attitude of the traitors Ouellet and Gervais, representatives of colonialists, shows that only the power of the people could drive them out of Quebec.

Consequently, I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he is aware of the existence of that magazine. In addition, is the RCMP investigating its distribution in Sherbrooke and elsewhere, because it is a clear case of subversion, and is the Prime Minister able to indicate whether measures are taken to ban the distribution of the magazine in the province of Quebec?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, to the first part of the question, I must answer that since, unfortunately, I do not have the time to read the excellent magazines that are published in the country, I cannot pay any attention to such cheap literature.

I cannot answer the second part of the question. I shall get in touch with the Solicitor General and if an investigation on that kind of publication is really necessary, I am sure he will be glad to report to the member.

POST OFFICE

MONTREAL POSTAL DISPUTE—POSITION OF FORMER LAPALME EMPLOYEES

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board. I am surprised he did not make a statement on motions today about the Montreal postal issue. I understand he did issue a press release. Can the minister advise if he has now found a solution to the long-standing Montreal postal dispute and, if so, what is it?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, a very generous offer was made by the government to the representatives of the employees of G. Lapalme—

Mr. Stanfield: What offer is that?

Mr. Drury: —last night. It was to be communicated to them this morning and I understand was so communicated. The representatives of the men said that they would provide me with an official reply to this offer. I do not expect to receive this until a meeting later this afternoon.

INDUSTRY

TEXTILES—ANNOUNCEMENT OF NEW GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the difficulties and uncertainties which exist in the Canadian textile industry, can the minister inform the House when he will make his promised policy statement with regard to that industry?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): As soon as I can, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Harkness: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister be a bit more specific in view of the great anxiety which exists among the people in this industry?

Mr. Pepin: I wish I could, Mr. Speaker, but I cannot. In the meantime I have been meeting with all the interested parties. I hope the solution I will recommend will meet with the co-operation and approval of everyone concerned.

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister personally, not members of his department, meeting with the ministers of the provinces and when does he expect these discussions will be terminated?

Mr. Pepin: I have met with some but not with all because I could not. If necessary, I will meet the others in the near future.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP OF CANADIAN CORPORATIONS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. On several occasions before the Easter adjournment the Prime Minister informed the House that either immediately before the adjournment or immediately after resumption of sittings of the House he would make a general statement with regard to the government's policy on foreign ownership. When may we expect that statement?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): With all respect to the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, I am quite certain I made no such assertion. I did say that the matter was under consideration by cabinet and that it might be some time before we could make such a statement.

Mr. Lewis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Aside from our difference as to what the Prime Minister said—we both have to look up the record—I ask the Prime Minister whether the minister responsible for studying the matter and presenting recommendations to the cabinet has done so? I am not asking what the recommendations are. Is the cabinet now studying these recommendations and when may the House expect a statement of the government's policy on the issue?

Mr. Trudeau: I believe that at no time did I indicate what minister was making this study, Mr. Speaker, but I can answer the hon. member for his information that the matter has come before cabinet and has been studied. A considerable degree of further study will be needed before a statement can be made.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Prime Minister if he is aware of a report that a Canadian funeral complex has taken over half a dozen—an American funeral complex has taken over—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: That's the Canadian government.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Maybe I had better start over again and get it right. In view of the report that an American funeral complex—

An hon. Member: It won't be long, Stan!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I see the President of the Privy Council is giving an answer to the Prime Minister before I have even asked the question. In view of the report that an American funeral complex has taken over half a dozen Canadian funeral homes, will the government look into this matter and make sure that two years from now there will still be a Canadian funeral home when the time comes to bury this government?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a supplementary question to the Prime Minister who has just announced that the cabinet is at the present time considering the matter of Canadian ownership of Canada's development.

Will the cabinet examine at the same time the reason for a $50 million loan secured in the United States by the NDP government of Manitoba for the development of the Manitoba Hydro Electric Commission?

TRANSPORT

MARITIME PROVINCES—FREIGHT RATE INCREASES—REQUEST FOR REPORT BY FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I would direct my question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that freight rates in Atlantic Canada have been increased by as much as 28 per cent in the last six months, would the minister ask the CNR to roll back that part of the increase which went into effect yesterday?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I have answered a similar question on a number of occasions. As far as freight rate increases are concerned, this is a matter which is being studied by the Prices and Incomes Commission. It is in relation to their guidelines that it is being done.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): I have asked the minister several times in the House about the deliberations of the federal-provincial committee which was to have produced recommendations for a comprehensive policy. I know the committee has made some recommendations, and I would ask the minister whether he would press the chairman of the committee to make a report on what has been done so far, so that we might be in a position to forestall further increases.

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, I shall be glad to do what I can in that direction and I hope the hon. member, to the extent he has influence in New Brunswick, will press the provincial members of the committee to get on with it, too.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): With reference to the telegram sent by the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission on March 26 protesting these increases, and to the minister's undertaking to use his influence in an effort to secure an early report from the federal-provincial committee, may I ask the hon. gentleman whether he will apply similar pressure to the chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications with a view to the federal-provincial committee being called before the transport committee so that its members can find out just what is causing the hold-up in enunciating the policy for Atlantic transportation which the minister promised almost a year ago?

Mr. Jamieson: The committee is, of course, in charge of its own deliberations, but I would be more than pleased if such a course were followed. I would have no objection to their doing so.

INVESTIGATION OF CNR OPERATIONS IN EASTERN CANADA

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Can the minister tell us when the department is likely to be in a position to reach a decision on the request for an investigation into the operations of the Canadian National in Eastern Canada, a request which was made three months ago and repeated in the House on three subsequent occasions?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): As far as a general line of inquiry is concerned, I am assuming that the transport committee will be hearing the officials of the Canadian National within a little while. I recall replying previously to the effect that an appropriate time would perhaps be whenever the vice-president for the Atlantic region was appearing before the committee. If that does not appeal to the committee I could arrange for another kind of meeting whenever they wished.

Mr. Lundrigan: In view of the evidence which has been presented to the minister in connection with negligence surrounding the particular operation referred to, would the hon. gentleman be prepared to make a statement on motions in the House, bearing in mind that the committee has encountered considerable difficulty in getting at the root of the problem when hearing from CNR officials?

Mr. Jamieson: I would be glad to consider that. I come back to the point I made earlier: I believe the committee would have a good opportunity when the CNR officials are in attendance. If the hon. member wishes specific officials to appear, I would be glad to try to get the CNR to agree to it.

PROPOSED U.S. NUCLEAR TESTS

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but in his absence, and in view of the considerable concern felt in British Columbia over the matter, perhaps somebody across the way could take it as notice. Having in mind the fact that the United States government has now definitely scheduled the date of its major underground nuclear test in the north Pacific, when can we expect a statement by the government in relation to the representations that it is making to Washington on this important matter?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): I will take this question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

SUBMISSION BY NATIONAL FARMERS UNION RESPECTING ALLEGED PAYMENT COMMITMENT

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of a letter submitted to him about a month ago by the National Farmers Union, in which they made an accounting of the amount of money that they allege is owing to farmers to fulfil a commitment given in writing by a former Minister of Agriculture, a commitment amounting to some $385 million, may I ask the Prime Minister whether or not he has replied to this submission and, if so, what the reply consisted of?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will have to check. I do recall a letter and it seemed a very fanciful bit of accounting to me.

Mr. Benjamin: A supplementary question. In view of the fact that the submission quotes commitments given by a former Minister of Agriculture, may I ask the Prime Minister whether it is the intention of the government to give sympathetic consideration to honouring those commitments?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO WORLD FOOD PROGRAM

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of Agriculture is away, I shall direct my question to his Parliamentary Secretary.

In a release issued by the federal Department of Agriculture, it is stated that the board of directors of the World Food Programme will be holding study sessions in New York this week. Now, since Canada is a member of that board, could the Parliamentary Secretary tell the House whether the Canadian contribution to this organization will consist mainly of food and whether the minister will recommend that Canadian dairy products account for a large percentage of the contribution?

Mr. Florian Côté (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Last fall, Mr. Speaker, during a trip to Rome, I had the opportunity of attending a meeting which was a sort of preliminary to the one now taking place in New York. I can say that Canada is the second country to provide major assistance to underdeveloped countries. Canada has offered all kinds of foodstuffs.

However, the choice of foodstuffs is made by a special committee comprising representatives of all member countries. Canada will not itself determine its contribution. The delegates of all countries that are members of the organization will decide which countries will contribute and also what foodstuffs will be offered to underdeveloped countries.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

As Canada is represented within this committee, would it not be better, even if the decision is not that of Canada alone, for us to decide what we would prefer to offer to underdeveloped countries?

Mr. Côté (Richelieu): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—GRANTS TO ESTABLISH TOBACCO FARMS VIS-À-VIS ANTI-SMOKING CAMPAIGN

Mr. H. E. Stafford (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare but in his absence I will direct it to his Parliamentary Secretary. How does the minister reconcile the recently announced government grants to help establish tobacco farms on Prince Edward Island with his strong anti-smoking campaign?

[Mr. Benjamin.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Stafford: Ten o'clock.

TRADE

EFFECT OF WHITE PAPER DEPLETION ALLOWANCE PROPOSAL ON IRON ORE AND OTHER EXPORTS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Since two very large and important long-term contracts to supply iron ore to Japan will be made uncompetitive if the government's white paper proposal to do away with depletion allowances is carried forward—and these contracts are in jeopardy at the present time—is the minister aware of any other suppliers of Canadian materials who are in a similar position?

Some hon. Members: Answer!

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I asked the minister whether he is aware. He must be aware of something. I know it is not much, but is he or is he not aware?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: Get on your feet and speak like a man.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair has recognized the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

NORTHERN QUEBEC—TRANSFER OF JURISDICTION OVER ESKIMOS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development whether he will tell the House what the present position is in view of the collaborations that have been going on between representatives of this government and of the government of Quebec concerning Eskimo rights in northern Quebec?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, as I have said several times in the House, an official of my department and an official of the provincial government have visited every Eskimo community in New Quebec. They are back and now in the process of translating the minutes of the proceedings of those meetings. The government's position has not changed: we are endeavoring to find all the co-operation possible so as to give Quebec Eskimos the services most likely to protect their interests.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have a supplementary question. As a result of the discussions that have taken place and the notes that have been taken of those discussions, has the minister now ascertained that there is almost universal opposition by the Eskimos to being pushed around and placed under the custody of the Quebec government rather than remaining under the control of the federal parliament?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the Eskimos are satisfied that we are ensuring that their basic rights with regard to their language and their religion will be protected in all parts of Canada, including Quebec, and I think that the right hon. member should support my campaign to have the basic rights of a minority in Quebec recognized.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Apparently that answer demands the support of the sycophants of the government. I ask the minister this question. Will he table the arrangements made in respect of language and religion which he says the government of Canada supports? Will he table those and will he also table, so we can understand whether or not the Eskimos are as dissatisfied as they claim to be, a copy of the discussions that have taken place and which were taken down by a reporter?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, if we sign an agreement with the government of the province of Quebec, I shall be pleased to so inform the House and to table the document here.

As for the minutes of the meeting, they are now being drafted and will later be translated into English and French. They will then be checked by translators, in this case a Protestant minister and a Catholic priest who speak the Eskimo language. The reports, when submitted to us, will serve as a basis for whatever new policy is adopted, which will be communicated to the House.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Treatment of Eskimos.

SECOND VOYAGE OF "MANHATTAN"—BARRING OF CANADIAN NEWSMEN FROM SHIP

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the minister's announced close and friendly relations with the owners of the Humble Oil Company, can he say why Canadian news media correspondents are not being allowed aboard the Manhattan during her voyage through the Canadian Arctic?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the question should properly be directed, I suppose, to the Humble Oil Company with which I do not have any particular affinity, let me assure the House. I do understand, however, that the reason is that the Humble Oil Company declined to allow any United States correspondents to go on this particular voyage of the Manhattan. Therefore they felt it might apear to be a form of discrimination if in fact they allowed Canadian newsmen. Arrangements have been made now, I understand, for Mr. Haas, who is the project officer on the Manhattan, to give periodic briefings on board the St. Laurent for the newsmen who are making the trip, and perhaps at some point in the future they may be able to get on the Manhattan.

Mr. Nesbitt: Is the gentleman—I did not quite get his name, Your Honour—to whom there was reference and who is going to give these briefings, a representative of Information Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, again—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Baldwin: I have a supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the Minister of Transport, and it is a very simple question. In the event of any dispute arising between the command of the Manhattan and the command of the Canadian icebreaker in the case of any emergency, which command will have priority?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is hypothetical.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

POLICY RESPECTING CAUGHNAWAGA RESERVE

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

He set out earlier the government policy respecting Eskimos. I would like to know if the same policy applies to the Indians. I am thinking, for instance, about the Indian reserve of Caughnawaga. Are there any problems between Quebec and Ottawa concerning the treatment to be given to Indians who live on reserves?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the same basic policy applies to Indian and to Eskimos. We want the Indians and the Eskimos living in the province of Quebec to enjoy their full rights as Quebecers and as Canadians.

Mr. Caouette: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to bring to the attention of hon. members that we will be running out of time in a few minutes. I would like to receive the co-operation of hon. members in connection with supplementary questions. We should limit them, if hon. members will agree to this, to the next ten minutes or so.

TAXATION

WHITE PAPER ON REFORM—REPRESENTATIONS BY IRON ORE COMPANY OF CANADA

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance who is not in the House today. I hope he is not taking time out from his parliamentary duties to discuss the white paper throughout the country or anything like that.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Perhaps I might get the information—

An hon. Member: What were you doing?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Perhaps I might get the information, Mr. Speaker, from the Minister without Portfolio who assists the Minister of Finance. I should like to ask now whether the Minister of Finance has conducted any inquiries to see whether there is anything to the claim put forward by the Iron Ore Company of Canada that the tax changes proposed in the white paper would make it impossible for them to proceed with this contract? Has the Department of Finance conducted any such inquiries and has the department established any mechanism or machinery to look into cases of this sort to determine the effect of these proposals upon developments which are now said to be put in doubt by these proposals?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance is representing Canada at an international meeting.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Is he telling them about the white paper?

Mr. Gray: With respect to the question of the Leader of the Opposition, I can tell him that the Iron Ore Company did come to the department with some rough figures about their own estimates of the effect of the white paper on the sale to Japan in question. The government asked for more substantial information, some six weeks ago, and it has not yet been provided by the company. The government is, of course, quite willing to receive and study any further information on this matter that the company wishes to provide.

ENERGY

REQUEST FOR DELAY IN GRANTING NATURAL GAS EXPORT PERMITS PENDING FORMULATION OF GENERAL POLICY

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources a question regarding the five applications that are now before the National Energy Board involving the export to the United States of some nine trillion cubic feet of natural gas valued at some $3 billion spread over the next 20 to 25 years. In view of the fact that this matter must come to cabinet for approval, I want to ask the minister whether the government can give the House the assurance that no such export permits will be granted until the entire energy policy has been fully dealt with and completely formulated?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, when the National Energy Board has a hearing such as this very important hearing in respect of applications for permits for the export of gas, it sits in its quasi-judicial capacity and, of course, there is no interference by myself or by the government in its deliberations. When its decision is made it will be referred to cabinet and will be considered at that time. I do not think I can add anything useful by anticipating any cabinet decision in that regard.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I have a supplementary question. In view of the fact that at the hearing before the board there were differences of opinion as to the surplus gas which is available in Canada, would the minister at least undertake, before any final decision is made, to make a statement on motions giving the House the information as to what the actual finding of the National Energy Board is in respect of the amount of surplus gas in Canada?

Mr. Greene: Well, Mr. Speaker, the evidence before the board is, of course, a matter of public record. The National Energy Board under the present law of Canada is the custodian of the public resources of Canada in respect of gas, and I feel very certain that the board has exercised that responsibility in the best interests of Canada in years past and I am sure will continue to do so. With regard to my hon. friend's suggestion as to presenting to the House the report of the National Energy Board as presented to cabinet, I will be very glad to consider that when the time comes.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister would advise the House if they are using the need for natural gas in the United States as a bargaining tool to increase the export of crude petroleum?

Mr. Greene: No, Mr. Speaker; the law is very clear in this regard. The only exports that are permissible in respect of natural gas are those that are clearly surplus to the Canadian need in the foreseeable future. The National Energy Board is the custodian of the public domain in that regard and protects the public rights of future Canadians. I do not think it would be possible for the government of Canada to use the future rights of Canadians in this regard as a counter for oil at the bargaining table today.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PUBLIC HOUSING GUIDELINES

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to direct to the minister in charge of housing. When can we expect the long-awaited statement on the guidelines for public housing?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I am rather hopeful I will be able to make a statement within the next ten days.

TRANSPORT

COASTAL TOWBOATS—AVAILABILITY OF STUDY ON SAFETY AND MANNING

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, this question is directed to the Minister of Transport. I should like to ask him when the labour-transport study on safety and manning provisions on coastal towboats, which was chaired by Mr. Elsestrom, will be made available to Members of Parliament and the public?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will have to take that question as notice.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TURKEY—ASSISTANCE TO EARTHQUAKE VICTIMS

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. What steps is the government taking to assist earthquake victims in Turkey? I ask this question as one of the members who over Easter saw earthquake devastation in another country.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will take the question as notice.

Inquiries of the Ministry

GRAIN

WHEAT—DELIVERIES UNDER DEFERRED QUOTA SYSTEM—FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO FARMERS

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister without Portfolio responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. In light of the stringent cash shortage in the western grain economy is the minister giving serious consideration to making up the cash deficiency to those farmers who were forced to take a lower initial payment per bushel for grain delivered under the deferred quota system in the last crop year?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, this question has been asked and answered many times before in this House.

WHEAT—ACREAGE REDUCTION PROGRAM—APPLICATION OF QUOTAS

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. Under the wheat acreage reduction program we are guaranteeing the farmer an eight-bushel quota on his summerfallow. The eight-bushel quota is for wheat. Is it permissible to allocate the quota to barley or some other crop? In other words, is it permissible to transfer it?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the initial assertion by the hon. member is not correct. The summerfallow acreage, including the portion of credit for a previous year's summerfallow acreage, is available to the farmer for allocation to wheat or to one of the other grains as he may choose. The eight-bushel quota is only applicable to wheat.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact that the eight-bushel guarantee is only in respect of wheat, will this not in fact encourage wheat production by farmers who do not now have surplus wheat?

Mr. Lang: No, Mr. Speaker. The quota for other grains will be on a seeded acreage base, with acres seeded to those grains available for quota along with any acres which may be allocated to them from the summerfallow eligibility base. The quotas for these other grains will be called forward on their own in such a way that the producers of those grains will share the total market for those grains in direct proportion to their acreage or allocation for those grains.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the fact that the farmers of North Dakota have indicated they will be raising their spring wheat acreage by 10 per cent because of Canada's wheat reduction, is the minister now prepared to amend the new quota regulations in order to make them more equitable for those farmers who have already reduced their wheat acreage in western Canada?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, of course the overall indications are that United States wheat acreage is in a downward direction. The original proposal and the proposal for wheat acreage reduction as it stands does recognize the reduction in wheat acreage last year by the allowance of a 25 per cent credit toward quota based on any summerfallow from last year.

PRINCIPLE OF ORDERLY MARKETING—APPLICATION TO FEED GRAINS

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatchewan. In view of reports that two Canadian Wheat Board commissioners were considering resigning their posts, has the minister assured the board that the government is fully committed to the principle of orderly marketing and in particular that it will resist proposals to allow open marketing of feed grains?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I have made it perfectly clear to the Wheat Board that they have my confidence and that the principle of Wheat Board marketing and orderly marketing is fully supported by this government. I must say I could only label as pure speculation the report to which the hon. member refers.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CAMBODIA—CLOSING OF CANADIAN MISSION

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the request by the new Cambodian government that the International Control Commission reassume its duties and also having regard to the appeal made by the government of India which serves with Canada on the ICC, could the Prime Minister inform the House whether there has been a decision regarding the delaying of the closing of our mission in Cambodia and whether or not the policy of the government has been communicated to the Geneva powers?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker; there has been no decision to delay the closing of the mission.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day. I regret that a few members rose a number of times and did not have an opportunity to ask their questions I have tried to make a mental note of their efforts and will endeavour to give them preference tomorrow. This includes the hon. member for Mackenzie.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING HATE PROPAGANDA

The House resumed from Monday, April 6 consideration of Bill C-3, to amend the Criminal Code as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, and Motion No. 2 (Mr. Woolliams).

Mr. Colin D. Gibson (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, the United Nations declaration on the elimination of all forms of racial discrimination which was adopted by the United Nations General Assembly on November 21, 1963, was supported by Canada. It provides as follows:

> The necessity of speedily eliminating racial discrimination throughout the world, in all its forms and manifestations, and of securing understanding of and respect for the dignity of the human person.

I submit that is an important part of Canadian foreign policy. Surely, the provisions before the House in Bill C-3 are consistent with that policy and inconsistent with any other conclusion than that we are genuinely acting against unjust discrimination.

An editorial in the Toronto Globe and Mail this morning, Mr. Speaker, expressed the view that Bill C-3 is a clear attempt to legislate morality and that its main section would make it a crime to communicate statements that promote hatred. The editorial goes on to ask why. Then, it continues:

> Not because anything follows from that, not because public order is disturbed, not because windows are broken or a mob becomes unruly, not because anyone is endangered or because there is a breach of the peace or even the likelihood of a breach of the peace, it simply says it is wrong to promote hate, period.

I respectfully disagree with the tone of the editorial. It completely overlooks the evil effects on the lives and social attitudes of classes singled out for hatred, which in some cases leaves scars and wounds on their minds and personalities, but also overlooks the tendency to single out groups for social discrimination of a deplorable nature. Also, Mr. Speaker, this same editorial overlooks the fact that the bill is not designed to prevent hatred, period. But rather the bill is designed to prohibit hatred directed against any identifiable group which is specifically defined in proposed new section 267A(4) as, "any section of the public distinguished by colour, race, religion, or ethnic origin." Thus, here we have a classic example of a nationally read newspaper giving a wrong impression of the provisions of a proposed criminal statutory amendment.

The subject matter of Bill C-3 has been considered by a royal commission. The bill has been thoroughly discussed in committee, and now is the time to support it in this House. It represents a major landmark in the extension of the laws of libel and slander to cover vulnerable groups in our society and to protect those identifiable groups from the vile abuse of verbal pollution expressed in the form of hatred.

Why? Because minorities need protection, and the Canadian standard of fair play for all demands it. That is why, Mr. Speaker. We can all recall the events which occurred prior to and during the Second World War when, by use of expressions of hatred, hatred led to genocide, and millions of innocent people of the Jewish faith were slaughtered in Europe.

I suggest that hatred breeds contempt, and that the result in society is a form of social class distinction which is abhorrent to all Canadians. The scars created by expressions of hatred based on discrimination against colour, race or creed, in many cases last forever. The soul and the spirit of Canadians require a standard of conduct which will eliminate the stigma of second class citizenship.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, the bill has profound educational value as a measure to enhance the strength and spirit of true Canadian respect for the dignity of man. To me, we are strengthening the bonds of citizenship in Canadian society by demonstrating the intention and determination of the Canadian people to prevent social class distinction, and to place those in identifiable groups on exactly the same level of respect and regard as all other Canadians. This bill will be a victory for the dignity of the rights of Canadians. As a lawyer, I see this bill as a specific example of the rule of law whereby "all are equal in the eyes of the law", and perhaps this bill expresses the view that all are socially equal and not despised or discriminated against by reason of race, religion, colour or ethnic origin in the eyes of the law as well as in the soul of man.

In these days of television, radio and fast communication it is sound legislative planning to provide such humane criminal legislation. Thus, we in this place will in some measure remove the psychological pain and the unfortunate doubts and uncertainties which in some cases pervade the minds of individuals in minority groups, to their lasting misery and resentment. We shall prohibit hatred in the forms expressed in the bill by criminal laws of restraint, and thus remove from identifiable groups the stigma left by the expression of that hatred.

We in Parliament do not seek to pry into the minds of men, but we do intend to prohibit acts of discrimination against identifiable groups. Mr. Speaker, when I think of all those Canadians who sacrificed their lives in war, in the war against tyranny and racial discrimination, I do believe that in a very real and lasting sense we here today are supporting the cause for which they valiantly fought and died.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, let me first pay tribute to those who have already discussed this matter in the House. I think this is one of the occasions when hon. members rise to great heights in their attention, discussion, and contributions to the subject matter which is before this House for its decision. I say this advisedly because unfortunately we have heard a few really snide comments upon the nature and the quality of the discussions in this House. That may be all very well for those few people who think this is a place which should be an abattoir, swimming in blood at all times, rather than a place providing grave and solemn opportunity for the discussion of serious issues. This has been one of those occasions, and I pay tribute to hon. members who have made their speeches along those lines, although I may not and probably will not agree with everything that has been said.

Now, Mr. Speaker, because this sort of debate touches the consciences, the feelings, the emotions, and the background—possibly to some extent there is an hereditary aspect to it—people will take different positions. We saw evidence of this yesterday with some members on the government side. I mention in particular the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hogarth), who proposed a motion with which I was in sympathy. If he had been able to persuade five of his colleagues to stand and the matter had been put to a vote I would have voted for it. But he was not supported by a large number of his colleagues and so the matter did not come to a vote. However, I pause to say it is quite obvious that a great many members opposite must now be discussing in their seats what took place yesterday.

I have no doubt that as time passes, and as this debate progresses, there will be members on this side of the House who may differ from the things I have to say, who may differ from the majority of the people in their party, and that may be this party or it may be the New Democratic Party. I would think it passing strange, Mr. Speaker, and I say this through you to hon. members of this House, if there were not to some extent some parting of the ways in the approaches which many hon. members take to this particular measure because of the issues which are involved.

I agree with what the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) said yesterday when he pointed out that no particular, sudden emergency has arisen which calls into being the need for this legislation. No particular public situation has come about. There is no clear and present danger. As a matter of fact, there has been a presistent, stubborn and very well organized campaign to bring these new laws into effect, and it will ultimately succeed.

I do not fault the people who have pursued this campaign. It is their democratic right. It is proper for them to do so. I do not fault them for that, and I do not say the government should not have introduced the bill because of that. I simply pause to say that in 1964 there was a private members' public bill introduced by I think it was at that time the hon. member for Cartier. I spoke on that. The bill was not quite the same, but it dealt primarily with the issues which are before the House today. I opposed part of it then, as I oppose part of it today. Some of the things I said then I am going to repeat today and I am fortified in this because after six years of consideration, contemplation and discussion of this issue, I hold the same views even more strongly than I did then.

As has been indicated, Mr. Speaker, there are three aspects of this bill and then there are some consequential matters which follow. I have no difficulty in accepting the proposals contained in section 267A dealing with genocide and I doubt very much if there will ever be any prosecutions launched in this country. However, the passage of this particular section constitutes an adherance to an international obligation which this country accepted some time ago. I have no hesitation in saying that if this section stood by itself I would have no problems at all.

I differ to some extent from my colleague the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) in that I would not be too afraid of accepting the first part of section 267B, the proposed new section of the Criminal Code, which provides:

I am reinforced in my view that this would not be too difficult a proposition to accept because it does contain a safeguard. Hon. members who have practised law, and all hon. members who have had occasion to deal with the Criminal Code, will realize that there is in fact this safeguard, that in order for there to be a conviction it must be established that the incitement is likely to lead to a breach of the peace.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I abhor violence—we all abhor violence. We have seen too much of it. I am afraid that in too many deliberative assemblies in the world today there is not that opportunity to reflect the views, the thinking, wishes and desires of the people. We have too much domination by an executive and not enough opportunity by the elected branch to pursue their task for the people. One of the reasons we have this violence, and why it will continue, has been the failure of the deliberative bodies to exercise the right which they must exercise to give the views, thoughts, wishes and aspirations of the people full consideration.

Because of that, Mr. Speaker, when I see this particular subsection which says that where there is likely to be a breach of the peace an offence would be brought about, I am prepared to accept it. To that extent, I am prepared to confirm what I said earlier, that there are differences, there are distinctions between the thinking and the views of hon. members of this House and even between hon. members of the same party. To that extent, I would part company from my distinguished colleague, the learned and hon. member for Calgary North.

I would point out, however, that I am not as much concerned about it as I otherwise would be, Mr. Speaker. To substantiate that point, I refer to the speech I made on July 10, 1964 when, in dealing with this very same issue I said, as recorded on page 5359 of Hansard:

> The hon. member quite properly pointed his finger at the word "person"—

We were dealing with the question of defamatory libel then.

> —and said that the word "person" having been used in the Criminal Code, this automatically excludes actions which are directed against a class.

This was to distinguish whether or not an action would lie under the Criminal Code for inciting hatred of a class of people as distinguished from an individual.

> At first blush I think that is a very sound argument, but I would refer the hon. member, who is from the province of Quebec, to a Quebec case. I do not have the case itself here, but it is referred to in The Canadian Abridgement, volume 13, and in column 436 I read these words:
> ...a charge of publishing a defamatory libel against the Roman Catholic clergy of a particular diocese does not disclose an offence. Section 317... specifically refers to a "person" and the definition of "person" in section 2(13) is not sufficiently wide to include an unincorporated group—

The citation then goes on:

> An indictment will lie at the common law, and the common law is in effect in this country to the extent to which it has not been——taken away.

> —the indictment in such case must allege (and the crown must prove) that the tendency of the libel was to excite hatred against all members of the class and to provoke a breach of the peace.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, by the common law which still exists in this country, it would be possible to lay a charge under almost the same facts and circumstances as set out in the first part of this proposed new section 267B (1).

For that reason, I am not too concerned with the argument of the hon. member for Calgary North, and I disagree on this aspect of his amendment. In the very rare and almost unprecedented circumstances which could bring about the laying of a charge under this subsection if passed, as it will be passed no doubt, it would be the same as an information laid under common law so we are not losing anything and we get this protection. Hon. members must think about this.

In order for a conviction to be brought about, at some time or other a judge or a jury, and ultimately a court of appeal, will have to say that the statements made in this public place were of such a nature that they were liable to lead to violence, to a breach of the peace. Abhoring as I do the thought that violence could become a way of life, I would go along with the section because it has that protection. Thus I do not need to move, as I otherwise might have moved, an amendment to the motion we are now considering because we have the protection of the existing common law which covers this particular area.

Any reservations which I had about 267B (1), Mr. Speaker, have grown to such substantial doubts with regard to 267B (2), that I could not accept it under any circumstances. I agree with much of what was said yesterday about the inherent difficult and dangerous circumstances which would be brought about if 267B (2) were passed. It would lead the law enforcement agencies and the courts of this land into a very serious situation. It is bad law; it is bad philosophy and the facts are bad. It is not the kind of law which a country such as Canada should have. Much as I appreciate the views of other people, and much as I accept the views of many of my friends, I could not under any condition support a bill which contains a clause of this kind.

Life and society ought to consist of a continuous process of the circulation of creeds and philosophies, each in turn being conceived in the conflict of ideas and often born to the accompaniment of passion and anger. Each rises, blooms, and then fades, but contributes much to the values and the philosophies which succeed. On this account alone, we have a grave responsibility not to diminish the opportunity, not only to permit but to strongly encourage the clash between people and ideas. When we stop doing this, sir, I say to you, and through you to my colleagues, that the motor which powers society will run out of fuel and our civilization will be on its way to perishing.

We wonder at times what will be the interpretation of some of the clauses of this bill. What will be the problems to which these clauses will give rise. What is to be the interpretation of hatred? It is all very well for my friends to say, "Look at the dictionary", but the dictionary is not good enough; it gives no answer on an issue like this. What I may consider to be hatred may be something quite different in the mind of the person to whom I am addressing my remarks. How is there to be an opportunity for the conflict of ideas and the clash of opinions if we are to be inhibited in the fullest expression of our views? Hatred to me, my friends, my family and the people I associate with may mean one thing; it may mean something entirely different to other people. What will it mean to a judge? In the final analysis, in any jurisprudence on this issue, the court will probably say that it is what reasonable people conceive, under certain reasonable conditions, to constitute hatred. That will mean that hatred will be what the majority of the people of the country consider hatred to be. The majority will be imposing their interpretation of hatred on the minority. I do not accept that for a minute, especially since this may mean that matters arising out of the communication of ideas which are not likely to lead to violence will be the basis of convictions. I cannot accept that in any circumstances.

I raise another thought. How are we to consider existing material? What about existing books? What about films and what about scripts? There are books published 100 years ago which, in my opinion, contain phrases, sentences and whole paragraphs that under this law, if passed, would constitute breaches of the criminal law. If I were to give to my hon. and distinguished friend, the leader of my party, (Mr. Stanfield) a book which contained this material I could be convicted of "communicating" within the meaning of this particular clause.

Mr. Greene: It is a change when the Tories communicate.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, more questions are raised than answered by this legislation. I know the government has established a certain number of defences but these defences in turn will create more bad jurisprudence. times we wonder at the government's reasons When governments are compelled to dredge up a number of defences such as are involved here, that is a clear indication that the legislation is not, and never will be, good. At for introducing this particular part of the legislation. It is true—we all admit it and we all worry about it—that many horrible things have been and indeed are being perpetrated, partly or to a large extent because hatred has been aroused. There are those who believe or who feel—because this is a matter of emotion rather than of reason—that the civilized portion of the world should make a declaration either by legislation or otherwise, collectively admit its faults, cry mea culpa, and make atonement.

Even if we admit that society and humanity are imperfect, that does not mean and certainly should not mean that we should be compelled to pass unsound legislation now which could easily create far more problems in the future. A careful reading of the committee proceedings suggests that a goodly number of its members probably felt very uncomfortable about this particular clause. They made a number of attempts to amend it. The hon. member for New Westminster made attempts to amend it, as did other hon. members. They were not successful; all the same, the government permitted certain varied limited amendments to be made. I suggest that any objective reading of the transcript of those committee proceedings indicates that a great many members of the committee were not happy about this particular clause. It was included for very unsound reasons, as set out by my hon. friend for Calgary North. It was included for political purposes or largely for political purposes. So I ask, why tack on to the valid part of the bill those parts which are unsound and will cause a great many problems in this country.

We must bear in mind that the government has reduced the Cohen Committee proposals very substantially. Having read the evidence and listened to the minister, I am convinced that the minister and his advisers were determined that this bill was to pass with the very minimum of alteration. The minister had his mind set on it and all this nonsense about referring it to the committee for change was just that, nonsense. The minister's advisers and the cabinet had made up their minds as to what it was they wanted, and this is what has been introduced, bad as it is. For those reasons, I feel I cannot support the bill on third reading. Of course, for the reasons I have given I will support this amendment, although I have reservations about the one clause to which I referred.

I want to say finally that the 100 per cent proponents of all parts of this bill will say that we must forbid bad men from perverting society by the propagation of opinions which are regarded as vicious and violent. As against this, I suggest, there must be complete liberty to contradict and disprove opinions so long as there is no apparent and immediate likelihood of violence. It is indeed strange that men should admit the validity of the arguments for free discussion but object to their being pushed to the extreme.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my remarks on Bill C-3 will be brief, but I feel duty bound to participate in the debate.

The purpose of the bill is to curb hate propaganda of all kinds in this country. This very important bill can produce good results as well as bad ones. Should a totalitarian government ever take power in Canada and decide that whatever does not stem from the government is hate propaganda and whoever thinks otherwise than the government is an agent of hate propaganda, then I believe the freedom of individuals and of society would clearly be in jeopardy.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, we of the Créditiste party maintain that the individual is the most important element in any organized society, that he has rights, and duties also, that he must be respected and show respect for others.

The present bill certainly has a very definite purpose since it provides, and I quote:

> 267 A. (2) In this section "genocide" includes any of the following acts committed with intent to destroy in whole or in part any identifiable group, namely:
> (a) killing members of the group, or
> (b) deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction.

Such genocides have taken place in certain parts of the world where everything was done to exterminate or wipe out some human groups by systematic murder.

For instance, the Germans were accused, during and after the war, of having tried to exterminate the whole Jewish people. In Africa, Nigerians were heard to say that all Biafrans should disappear. Now, thinking along these lines is prevalent in Guatemala, as it was in Cuba, before the advent of Castro, when all reactionaries were to be suppressed, etc.

Mr. Speaker, the adoption of such legislation will endanger the freedom of individuals who should have the right to their opinions.

Mr. Speaker, for many years now, we have been hearing about freedom of the press, freedom of speech, freedom of the individual, political freedom, freedom of religion, of language.

We cherish these freedoms like the apple of our eye. We want to feel free.

Hate Propaganda

On the other hand, hate literature incites people to revolt and we could quote cases. In 1962, the Liberals accused me of being a Hitler, a Mussolini. Newspapers in general, especially the English ones, gave it to me hard. If legislation such as the one now under study had been in force then, maybe we could have complained and said: This is a case of hate propaganda since it affects the freedom of the individual.

But as we have been elected democratically we did not have recourse to violence or try to suppress the die-hard Liberals. We simply endeavoured to defeat them through a democratic election. We succeeded to a certain extent and the same thing applies to the Progressive Conservatives whom we drove out of Quebec practically without harming anybody.

As for the liberty of the press, I think that everybody recognizes its existence even though, at times, it is rather annoying to do so, because we know that the press is not always honest, that sometimes it imagines certain things. I do not speak only of the big thick La Presse of Montreal but of newspapers in general in which attacks have been launched against the Créditistes, as it was done in the newspaper Le Devoir.

We must recognize that newspapers are free to write even lies against us as long as it is not libellous, and we can always take legal action and oblige these people to retract, if we deem necessary to do so.

Obviously, however, there is a difference between freedom of the press, written or spoken, and freedom which tolerates subversion.

Earlier, I asked a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) about a small paper published by certain University of Sherbrooke students, L'Estrien Rouge, which features the picture and the declarations of Mao Tse-tung. On the front page, there is an article titled "Good News: TWO FEDERAL M.P.'s HECKLED AT U. OF S."

The article is not very long, but it shows clearly that we have here in Canada, in the province of Quebec and more particularly in the City of Sherbrooke, young students, probably very few, who spread hate propaganda, make subversive statements and want to destroy what others have built. We must remember that the University of Sherbrooke, the University of Montreal, the University of Ottawa and Laval University in Quebec City have been built with the taxes of the Canadian people in general and particularly of the people of Quebec, to allow foreign professors to come and teach our youth the road to subversion.

Mr. Speaker, this is an unthinkable situation! We cannot accept it but we must believe it because it is real. What do those young people write anonymously? The article reads as follows and I quote:

At the noon debate of March 16, in Antre II of the University of Sherbrooke, two lackeys—

They try to be polite.

—of English-Canadian colonialism, Ouellet and Gervais, Liberal members of Parliament, came to praise federalism. After jeers from progressive students, there was a discussion between the students and the two lackeys.

At a certain moment, a progressive student—

Instead of calling him a Communist, he is said to be progressive. It is more fashionable and the people will take it more easily. He is perhaps a poor student, but he is progressive when it comes to disrupting the order which must exist in Canada and in a province like ours.

I will now continue to quote:

—a progressive student asked Ouellet—

Not Mr. Ouellet, Mr. Speaker, but only Ouellet.

—why he did not ask Mackasey to give guns to the employees of G. Lapalme to protect themselves from Kierans, the puppet, and the SS of Montreal? Ouellet answered that this was not the solution and that some committees had been set up to study their case. The student replied that the workers were disgusted by solutions such as those at the George T. Davie and that they believe that the matter could be settled with guns; they would shoot such traitors as himself.

That is the member for Papineau. I proceed.

During the noon debate the student crowd was also heard to shout: "Murray Hill, out of Quebec". Some showed their discontent by throwing eggs—

—throwing eggs is quite useful for informing the people——and other objects at the two official compredores, others did not miss the opportunity to jostle Ouellet when he came out of Antre II.

• (3:30 p.m.)

When the meeting was over, the student leaders of the Parti Québécois, who during the debate had turned the students' nationalism against the bourgeois federalists, blamed the progressive students for their improper behaviour towards the representatives of colonialism.

The attitude of the traitors, Ouellet and Gervais, representatives of the colonialists, serves as evidence that only the strength of the people—

—not the vote—

—the strength of the people will be able to throw them out of Quebec.

May Quebec people wage a good fight!

Mr. Speaker, that was written by young people, aged 18 and 19, who attend the University of Sherbrooke, perhaps half a dozen students out of 8,000, 10,000 or 15,000 students. And it is hot-heads like them who spur hatred, trouble, contempt for law and order.

Apparently those people have had not enough examples to be able to forecast what might happen here in our province. Let us have a look at what happened barely a year ago in Czechoslovakia when the Czechoslovak students were literally crushed after they decided to recover their freedom. But these students of today are the sons of the Czechoslovak students who 25 years ago advocated exactly what some hot-heads are advocating now at the University of Sherbrooke.

The Czechs wanted their liberation, but once they were liberated they fell into the hands of the Communists. Then they again lost their freedom and as they wanted to recover it 25 years later they were literally crushed.

Shall we follow that example?

That is why Bill C-3 can, to a certain extent, be justified. It can help to protect people not against elements that can oppose our views, but against those who would, if ever they took power, deny all freedom to those they now want to replace. In the name of the freedom they now want for themselves, they will deny that same freedom to citizens once they are in power.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot afford to dream in colour, we must look at the facts as they are. And we will hear these people say: "Hurrah for the liberation of the Quebec people!"

Let us consider what happened in Russia. The Ukraine, for instance, was once a free country, but, today, it is not anymore. And the same thing is happening in all Communist countries of Europe.

And there are in Quebec and the rest of Canada people who cannot foresee the consequences of what they are doing today.

It is all very well, Mr. Speaker, to rouse people and to say: Take up guns. But is any thought given to the consequences? Last night René Lévesque said on television that if he did not win the Quebec elections on April 29 there might be violence. He stated: Vote for me or else bombs will explode.

Is that true democracy or a smart attitude? On the contrary it is mere blackmailing. I am convinced that most Quebec citizens, as those in the rest of Canada, want order and justice in our country and not the disorder and anarchy that is advocated in certain parts of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, we live undoubtedly in one of the most beautiful countries in the world. That there are things to be improved in this country, we admit it. I believe the hon. members of other political parties recognize that something should be changed in order to promote trust between individuals on a larger scale. Once that goal was reached, Bill C-3 would be absolutely useless. Lack of trust, jealousy and envy have laid hold upon the conscience of individuals to such an extent that human beings persist in devouring each other instead of uniting in order to build something.

The poor are against the rich and the workers against the employers. There you have subversion! Some union leaders, instead of acting as moderators between employers and workers have become distributors of boxing gloves so that employers may stand against workers. Instead of thinking soundly, they just sound off.

The workers are fed up with such leaders. They want to be treated like human beings and not as numbers or as people cynically exploited by sinister exploiters, which is what some Canadian labour leaders are at the present time.

There are many examples of that situation. But the cause of all this is hate propaganda. Some Canadians have said that they had no money because the Jewish people were hoarding. Maybe we should advise those who are not Jewish to do the same.

While going through the Montreal phone directory yesterday or the day before yesterday, I came across the name of The Hebrew Free Loan Organization. This is a body that has the legal competence to grant interest-free loans to Jewish people, in order to promote mutual help. Should a Jew wish to go into business, those people will lend him money without interest. Instead of criticizing them, why don't we do the same?

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) is letting me know he can guess what I am driving at.

If the Canadian government said: Let us use the Bank of Canada to grant loans without interest to the provinces, municipalities or school boards, there would be less hate propaganda. There would be co-operation. We would no longer hear of conflicts between Quebec and Ottawa, or Quebec and the nine other provinces. We often hear in Quebec that the province is not treated as well as the other provinces. And we have a proof of this if we go by what the government says, that is that there are only three wealthy provinces in Canada: Ontario, and the two Social Credit western provinces, British Columbia and Alberta. The seven other provinces are poor. And amongst those poor provinces, some are even poorer than Quebec: New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Manitoba, and Saskatchewan. It is not a matter of one province against nine, but rather of seven provinces against three!

If there were more Social Credit provinces in Canada, I am convinced there would be more prosperity. Ten provinces could prosper, because the problem remains the same. It is often said that man does not live by bread and butter alone. Indeed, he must also feed his intelligence.

Mr. Speaker, has my time expired or were you going to call me to order?

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: No, I would never call the hon. member to order, but I must however remind him that, pursuant to the Standing Orders, his time has expired. He cannot continue his remarks without the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the Chair and my colleagues.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): This is an excellent election speech.

Mr. Caouette: My dear colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) acknowledges that I am a good speaker, that I inform him, that I give him the means to suggest to the government a way to deal efficiently with hate propaganda. Moreover, such is the object of the bill.

Mr. Speaker, as I was saying earlier, man does not feed only on bread and butter. His mind must also be fed. However, there is another saying that it's no use preaching to a hungry man. When somebody is hungry, it is useless to try to force moral principles on him, for as long as he is hungry, his ears and his mind will not be able to understand anything. That is the point that the Ralliement Créditiste has stressed for a long time. We have been laughed at, but nevertheless no solution has been found to the problems facing the country.

Bills are introduced against hate propaganda, which can very well exist in many fields, but that hate has a root somewhere. People have a grudge against the rich. Why? Because they are not as well-off.

When I hear the socialists say to the workers that they are poor because the employer's profits are too high, I have to laugh. Few people can make out a $1 million cheque in Canada today. Millionaires do not pile up their millions in their bedrooms for the sake of hoarding money: They put them to good use. When they expand their plants or build houses or castles, they provide work for the people. In fact, when buying construction materials, they do society a service.

According to the socialists, the rich has to be destroyed because, allegedly, they get richer all the time. If all the poor people united to destroy the estates of the rich, they would then realize that they still have to live in the same shack. Nothing would be changed. Therefore, some basic thing has to be changed to prevent the hatred, misunderstanding and disunity that exist today. In his connection the Ralliement Créditiste suggests a monetary reform that sets the individual free and allows him to be his true self in a Canada that he himself has built for himself, his family and his children.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege.

The hon. member for Témiscamingue having alluded to events in which I was involved in Sherbrooke not long ago, I would like briefly to make one point clear. I spoke before a group of about 400 people and hardly twenty students behaved rudely and caused disorder. They bore the sign of the Parti Québécois.

However, I should say that most of the students attending this demonstration understood the advantages of federalism and of Quebec being part of Canada.

[English]

Mr. John Roberts (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose this legislation and to support the amendment. Before I do so I should like to compliment the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner), particularly since I propose to attack him in a few moments. I think that he has been the minister most concerned to involve backbenchers and the committees effectively in the legislative process. I compliment him for that and am grateful to him. He has made a more determined effort, I think, than any other minister to make our new committee system work.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Roberts: But in spite of all his praiseworthy and admirable qualities, he has come up this time with legislation which is ill-conceived and ill-constructed. I agree with those members who have already spoken and suggested there is no real need for this legislation, and that what needs to be done is already covered by laws of libel and laws concerning public order.

I do not particularly wish to repeat their arguments, but I do wish to note the rather bizarre argument that the Minister of Justice presented last night to the effect that this new legislation cannot be both unnecessary and pernicious at the same time. It is exactly because it is an unnecessary restriction of freedom of speech that it is pernicious. Those measures which we now have dealing with libel and with public order are necessary because they deal with actions, with things which may lead directly to action, or because they deal with specific and identifiable, individual interests.

It is exactly because this legislation goes further and deals in a rather vague way with expressions of opinion in general areas that it is pernicious. I think it is not only pernicious; it is ineffective—ineffective in dealing with what its objective purports to be. One of the problems with this legislation is that if it were effective it would drive underground or drive into hidden areas those expressions and feelings which—if we are to combat them—because they are held in the minds of men, can only be combatted through discussion, argument and controversy.

There are, of course, defences in the legislation—rather bizarre ones. The first thing one should note about them is that they shift the onus of responsibility away from the Crown to the person who is accused. They place the onus of proving his good faith upon him, instead of placing the onus upon those who are attacking or condemning him. The very phrases which are used are so vague and general. The defences talk of "good faith". They talk about what is "relevant," about what is "reasonable." They talk about what a man "believes to be true." Again, they talk of "good faith." These phrases are phrases that apply to states of mind. They go to what a man thought or what he believed to be true. But, "there is no art to find the mind's construction in the face." It is very difficult to go into a person's mind to find what he truly believed, what he truly held, in good faith. How is the judge to interpret these rather vague defences which are presented within this legislation?

This legislation transfers to the courts in an indistinct and general way a whole area of limitation of speech which I contend it should be for politicians to define, and as precisely as possible, rather than for courts freely to interpret. These defences are so wide that you could drive a herd of drunken elephants through them. I have no doubt that even Adolf Hitler believed in good faith that the measures he proposed were ultimately for the general good. I suppose that almost all bigots, all those who have been imbued with racial hatred, had good faith in their opinions and believed them to be true. Under these defences, if taken literally, such people would escape prosecution.

If it were only a question of practicability, if it were only a question of whether the law would work, whether it could be applied effectively, then I would bow to those of greater knowledge and experience and, it may very well be, wisdom. But it appears to me that this legislation as proposed should be disposed of not only on practical grounds but on grounds of principle. I contend that it is ill-conceived; that it strikes at the very roots of the Liberal philosophy. It traduces the Liberal tradition.

Last night, when dealing with the philosophical aspects, the Minister of Justice said that the opponents of this legislation had been dealing in verbal gamesmanship. I am not exactly sure what verbal gamesmanship is, but I do recognize verbal straw men when I see them. The minister said there were three basic assumptions which were hidden and false. One was that opponents of this legislation believed that there were absolute rights. Another was that one had to be either a civil libertarian or not; one had to be either for or against. Those are the Minister's straw men.

These are not really the objections that the opponents of the legislation are putting forward. They agree, as he mentioned, that the question is not whether one is for or against free speech, but rather, what are the permissible limits of free speech. What are the permissible contours of freedom of speech and discussion? That is the question. What principles does one use to establish this delimitation? On what basis does one make that delimitation?

Hate Propaganda

I have looked through the minister's remarks, during the course of which he stated several alternative bases for the limitation that he has proposed. He talked about "outraged feelings of the community". He talked about the "total integrity" and "moral sense of the community"; about "standards of decency"; the "conscience of the community" and "articulated values". He talked about what is "offensive" what is "heinous" and what is "abhorrent". They are the bases for the limitations that he would like to impose. Finally, he said that the limitations should be what the government believes to be reasonable.

Members of the government and members of the committee, he said, who had studied this bill had tried to achieve a reasonable balance, a reasonable reconciliation, so that the conflicting legitimate interests of freedom of expression, on the one hand, and the protection of reputation and group identity, on the other, are balanced. "Feelings of the community", "abhorrence"; "what is believed to be reasonable by the government"—that is exactly the kind of rationale and justification for the limitation of free speech which liberals have fought for centuries. It is extraordinary what societies will consider at any time to be abhorrent. It was because the Athenians thought the views of Socrates were abhorrent that he was put to death. It was because the Romans felt the views of Christ were abhorrent that he was crucified. It is because Protestants have felt the views of Catholics to be abhorrent that they have tried to exerminate them—and Catholics the views of Protestants. Moslems have believed the views of Christians to be so abhorrent that they would prevent them from being disseminated. The church believed the views of Galileo to be abhorrent and tried to extirpate them from the books by command.

In this century, the people of Tennessee have thought that views on evolution were so abhorrent that they should not be allowed to be propagated. Within the last 15 years people in the United States have believed that views of Communism were so un-American and so abhorrent that they should not be allowed to be advocated.

Liberals have fought for centuries, as I have said, to develop bases for the defence of free speech on a basis other than the generalized conscience and moral feeling of the community. They go back to Pericles, 25 centuries ago, who said that in Athens we allow all men to come, and all men to speak and say what they will, and let all men judge because we have confidence in the discrimination and judgment of the people in our society.

This is the kind of view which John Stuart Mill expressed in the last century when he suggested we must allow ideas which are abhorrent and wicked to us to be presented and discussed because only in free discussion will one find the truth; only in the clash of ideas will one be able to determine what the truth is. By saying to a man that you will not allow him to present his views because they are so wicked or abhorrent, you are denying the possibilities of persuading him through argument. You are also denying yourself the chance of re-affirming and strengthening the views that you have by presenting them in contested arguments.

Liberals have drawn a distinction between actions and thoughts. They have said actions should be limited when they harm the interests of the community. They have said that thought should only be limited—this is indeed the whole theme and spirit that infuses John Stuart Mill's essays, "On Liberty"—when it transgresses specific and identifiable individual interests.

That is the principle which liberals have followed through the ages; the principle not that an expression was abhorrent, not that it was offensive, not that it was in bad taste, not that it went against standards of decency, but that it transgressed specific, identifiable, concrete, individual interests, not a vague, outlawing expression of opinion in one category, but a transgression of specific individual interests. Even in those circumstances, as Mill suggested, liberals have held that the advantage to society of having free expression of views greatly outweighs the rather minimal interference with an individual's interest which could occur with the expression of free thought.

The whole liberal belief has been that the wellspring of social progress lies in allowing people to express all their views, bizarre, wicked and pernicious though they may be, because they have believed that "truth is not put to flight in a free encounter," and that it is on this truth that social progress is dependent. Once we start to say that we can outlaw one set of ideas and prevent their expression because we consider them to be so abhorrent to us, or a sizable group in our community, it is very easy to go on and to find other views which are also abhorrent and to consider that these, too, shall be ruled out of discussion and out of free expression. Indeed, that has happened, as I have just said, many, many times throughout history.

The liberal principle has been that you do not create sacred cows beyond the realm of discussion and contestation, and that when you create sacred cows you are weakening the foundations of liberal democratic society. Liberals have believed our society is strong enough, calm enough and tolerant enough that dark thoughts should be brought out and dealt with in the light of day through debate and discussion. A democracy which has lost faith in the judgment of its citizens has lost faith in itself. That is essentially what this legislation says to us. It says we do not have sufficient confidence in the judgment of our citizens that they will look upon these pernicious ideas for what they are and assess them correctly. We have so little faith in their judgment that we will prevent these pernicious ideas from being expressed at all.

I have not lost faith in the judgment of our citizens. I do not find in this proposed legislation a practical approach to dealing with what prejudices there are in our society. Moreover, it confounds and attacks a basic principle of what I believe liberal society should be. I cannot as a liberal, in conscience, support this legislation and shall, therefore, vote against it.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, the speeches we have heard in this House on this bill make it clear that this is a matter upon which men of good will and good sense can very well differ. I want to rise and oppose the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) as a wrecking amendment and I think it was no doubt intended as such. It emasculates the bill, make no mistake about it. It is impossible to be for the amendment and for the bill. One cannot enjoy that intellectual luxury.

True, the amendment will leave the genocide provisions in the bill in effect, but the major provisions of the bill are to be struck out if the amendment succeeds. These major provisions, may I remind the House, seek to put under the ban of criminal law the deliberate propagation of racial hatred. We have heard many praise liberalism and freedom of speech, and I concur with everything that has been said in that regard. I say there must be some reasonable limit and the limit is exceeded when people deliberately use propaganda for racial hatred.

The amendment was commended by the hon. member for Calgary North, in his usual forceful eloquence, in the name of freedom of speech, freedom of assembly and freedom of the press. It is my view that if any legitimate concept of freedom of speech, assembly and the press was affected by this legislation I would be the first to reject it and vote with him for the amendment. I do not believe this to be the case.

As the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) said so well yesterday, freedom of speech has always been subject to limitation. Indeed, I venture to assert that it is the right as well as the duty of Parliament to limit freedom of speech where to permit it would permit a clear and present danger of social evil. I agree with all those who say we must be vigilant to see that the words used in legislation of this sort are not so vague or so ambiguous as to prevent not only the evil aimed at but also to prevent legitimate expression of opinion, distasteful and critical as it may be.

I ask what does this bill do and I see very little in common between it and some of the remarks we have heard in the House on the bill. I am not referring to the genocide provisions. Proposed Section 267B(1), as has been pointed out, deals only with statements in a public place likely to lead to a breach of the peace. Who shall say that it is not the duty of any rational Parliament to restrain that type of conduct? It has been restrained from time immemorial and it should be restrained by law again.

What does proposed Section 267B(2) do? It deals with statements calculated to promote hatred, not in private conversation, but calculated with deliberate intent to promote hatred. If there is any fear amongst people that perhaps these expressions could be used more broadly, proposed Section 267(B) provides for defences. It provides a defence for truth; it provides a defence for religious argument; it provides a defence for fair comment on matters of public interest.

My submission is that the committee succeeded in putting this in clear, narrow, specific and strict language to deal with a clear and calculable evil, the promotion of racial hatred, which is not within the ambit of free speech in a civilized society. Surely, we are not to be deaf to the tragic lesson of history which is that evil men can and do exploit latent hostility or even ignorant hostility for their own purposes.

Hate Propaganda

I wondered when I listened to some of the speeches in this House in support of this bill whether the people had read the Cohen commission report. There were full and ample illustrations and examples of material which could only be explained as the deliberate propagation of racial hatred, palpably unfit to be disseminated in a democratic society, which could not by any stretch of the imagination fall within the ambit of free speech as understood under our traditions. Much has been said and much no doubt will be said—and it is suitable that it should be—against pollution of our air and water. There is such a thing as polluting and poisoning the minds of men. This is a tragic reality. It is an historic fact that we in this generation have been able to see for ourselves.

It has been said that you cannot legislate to make men good and that you cannot strike down attitudes of mind. I suggest that is not entirely a sound statement. Legislation is clearly an educative factor. In this very field of racial discrimination, provincial legislation representing the conscience of the community has expanded human rights in respect of discrimination in real estate deals, in providing accommodation, in employment and in other fields. This has had an educative effect upon our people. Legislation will not make us perfect, but it can help to mould public morality.

I wonder if those who are fearful of this bill have considered that equivalent legislation is being passed in all the advanced democratic nations of the world. Great Britain, the so-called mother country which has a great reputation in this field, has, perhaps reluctantly, passed legislation similar to this. The Scandinavian countries are at a similar stage and countries with a long and honourable tradition of freedom are almost unanimously ready to pass legislation of this sort. Should we discard the wisdom of these people and say we alone need nothing of this sort? It is said, and rightly so, that the law is one thing and morality another. No doubt there is a great gulf between the realm of public law and private morality. But to assert that law is not an important embodiment of public morality is simply without foundation. Criminal law does and should express a consensus of public morality.

This legislation is very important. It does not deal with non-existent fears but a very real and tragic evil that the history of this age has shown to exist, even at this very moment, when such hatred and racial discrimination are obsolete, odious and disastrous. Mr. Speaker, I urge the rejection of this amendment because I believe we would be doing a disservice to a sound concept of what is involved in freedom of speech if we turned down this legislation. The amendment is commended in the name of freedom of speech, freedom of assembly and freedom of the press. I believe we would be doing a disservice to a sound concept of what is involved in freedom of speech if we turn down, by a false cry of freedom of speech, a reasonable limitation upon that freedom of speech imposed in the public interest by this bill.

Mr. J. E. Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, about six years ago I had the privilege of standing in this House and supporting a colleague who is no longer here, Mr. Milton Klein, the then member for Cartier. I supported and seconded his motion in respect of a private member's bill dealing with the type of situation which is now covered by a government bill. I felt it would be important to remember what my colleague, Mr. Klein, did during the private members' hour in the form of a private member's bill to bring what I call a great social problem to the attention of Parliament and this country.

I do not suppose there is any piece of legislation on any issue that has received greater thought over a longer period of time. As has been stated in this debate, the principle involved in the original private member's bill received consideration at various stages. It was discussed in committee. It was before the Senate twice and was before the former committee on external affairs. My friend, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), played a very active part in the proceedings before that committee. I am sure he will remind me if I am not correct when I say that I believe there were very lengthy hearings at which briefs pro and con were received from many people, and at which time people who did not have closed minds appeared as witnesses. These witnesses were people who understood the great social implication of what we were endeavouring to do. The government of the day decided that this question was important enough for the government itself to accept the responsibility of placing this legislation before us.

I wish to congratulate this government, and particularly the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner), for taking the responsibility of bringing this matter before us for our consideration. I do not think I have listened to any debate in which there has been less acrimony and less personal vindictiveness, such as we sometimes see in this House. I have been very pleased with the debate. I certainly accept the sincerity of all the opinions expressed. However, as a Liberal—and I address this particular statement to my friend across the way in the same party who feels he cannot support the bill—I fully support this bill. I have been fighting for such a measure for the past six years, as have a number of other people. Up until now many of the contributions have been made by members of this House who, by profession, practice law. I have had the feeling we are getting bogged down in the legal technicalities of the bill. Once this legislation is passed, if the House sees fit to pass it, the matter of the legal application of it may end up in the courts, where I suggest the points of law should be argued rather than in the House of Commons.

Along this same line, may I say that the other day I read some comments by the economist Galbraith about the way to battle inflation. He suggested one of the difficulties in respect of what we are doing now is that the experts, the professors and economists, are the only people who are having their say. So, today I stand here not as a professional person but possibly as a representative of the man on the street. I believe it might be helpful to hear from the man on the street in respect of this legislation.

In 1966, the Toronto Daily Star sent out reporters on the street to interview ordinary Canadian citizens about this matter. I would like to place the result of this interview on the record. No matter what type of a law we pass in the House of Commons, or what type of law is recommended by the law officers, I have a feeling a law is good only if it is accepted by the public. There are many laws on the books these days that are observed in the breach much more than by compliance. It makes a ridiculous situation when we have laws that are not observed, possibly because public opinion and the ordinary good, common horse sense of the man in the street have not been taken into account when the laws have been drafted.

• (4:10 p.m.)

In this particular interview, the question was asked:

Should free speech be allowed in public parks—?

I want to put these answers on the record because there are a lot of hon. members who have made contributions who have been wondering about the cut-off point at which free speech is no longer free speech because the purpose of it is to destroy the freedom of other people. Here is a lady, Mrs. Sadie Denley, a housewife, who says:

I believe in freedom of speech—as one's right under democracy. But the line has to be drawn somewhere when inflammatory speeches tend to incite the crowd to riot and violence, resulting in harm to someone. It is only sensible to exercise some restraint over speeches.

Here is Harry Jackson, a salesman, who says:

One's first reaction to any kind of censorship, particularly in speech, is to think of a police state. One should be free to voice opinions in what one believes. But to carry this to the point of accusing a certain person or race, colour and creed, or condemning them, goes beyond freedom of speech. This is downright unacceptable to any intelligent person.

Here is Norman Thornley, a salesman, who says:

When a speech tends to insult one's religion, race or colour, whether of an individual or collectively, in a public park or anywhere, then it constitutes slander. Preventing this kind of speech isn't censorship. It's just a sensible, legal restraint.

Here is Bill Graham, a sales representative, who says:

As with any privilege, it can be abused.

He is speaking of freedom of speech.

No one has a right to a freedom that would permit excessiveness that results in violence, destruction and harm. This constitutes an attack on society. And preventing this extreme does not constitute censorship.

Here is Harold Nissenthall, a company employee, who says:

Every individual should be allowed to voice his feelings and opinions. But singling out some individual or group, and hurling abuse and insults at them, can never be regarded as coming within the legal claim of freedom of speech.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker and colleagues, that the opinion of the ordinary man in the street, the man who does not perhaps understand the technicalities of law but does understand some of the social problems and social evils we have in our society, is equally valid and may be more important than some of the technical legal arguments that we have heard in this House of Commons today.

Not because it was a particularly good speech but because it went to the centre of my thinking, away back in 1964 as a matter of fact, I would like to quote from a speech which I made in the House of Commons at that time. I would like to say that, in my judgment, these people who are able to spread hatred because of the present lack in the law have in their hands a time bomb, a poison vial, that can really be more destructive of our society and our human relations than possibly a military bomb.

On that occasion I said:

These enemies of society, these wreckers and destroyers of other people's lives—

Because that is what they are.

—use freedom of speech to destroy other freedoms equally important—

Perhaps freedom from fear should be considered to be a right of Canadians equal to freedom of speech, and also freedom from persecution. Hate propaganda racists are people who are so bitter in their hatred that they blame other people for their frustrations, and the next step most of them take is to use democracy to destroy democracy. They use freedom of speech for themselves to destroy the freedom from fear of other people.

The racists always use these methods. Surely the persecuted, the good citizens—

I am taking this out of the context of talking only about one group, a minority of people in this country. Canada, Mr. Speaker, is a country of minorities.

Surely the persecuted, the good citizens, deserve the same sympathy and consideration and freedom which apparently exists under the present laws for the rotten racists and their followers.

Surely, the good people have a right to the protection of some law that the absence of law now gives to the racists.

These...unbalanced bitter people are using our laws to make fools of us all.

We are in a new era in a troubled time, Mr. Speaker. We are in an era of great disturbance in societies all over the world, and I believe we have to achieve a new dimension in human relations if society is going to hold together. I cannot think of any country better equipped than Canada, that has so few of the problems bothering other societies in the world, to encourage the establishment of good human personal relations as an example to the rest of the world of what a liberal, open society should be doing.

Violence and the threat of violence endanger our society. They endanger the peace. We must counteract within the framework of the law the racists who are here. They are in our midst. They are here to disturb us. As I say, we must counteract within the framework of the law these racists, otherwise violence as a principle has won out over law as a guiding principle upon which a civilized society should be based. If we have no laws now to protect the basic right of people to live undisturbed, unthreatened lives, then surely we must make those laws. As individuals we cannot take the law into our own hands, although I can imagine and I know of instances in this country and in other societies where people driven to frustration because they do not have the protection of the rest of society, reach the point where they say, "Nobody will protect us. There is no law to protect us; therefore we must take the law into our own hands." One does not have to look very far from the borders of our own country to see where this sort of thing is taking place. I would think that a very small step at this time, by way of a very mild law, may preclude the necessity in the future of something that would be abhorrent to us all. I refer to the passage of some law that would have authoritarian strength in it of a kind that we would not want.

We cannot take the law into our own hands or we would destroy the very thing we are trying to produce, a country and a world of peace and order, in which we may all live lives of creativeness and purpose without the fear of having our freedoms destroyed. And, Mr. Speaker, all I ask is the same protection, the very same protection for the good people in this country, for the non-racists in this country, for the decent majority of citizens in this country, as presently exists for the racists who are apparently determined to destroy our Canadian society. I will certainly be supporting this bill.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendment that is before the House. I do so for a number of reasons, some of them already aptly expressed by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Roberts). In passing, I must say it was interesting to note the differences in opinion between the hon. member for York-Simcoe and the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Walker).

It is all well and good to go out and interview people on the street about a proposed piece of legislation designed to limit the freedom of speech, and ask them whether they like it and whether at any time freedom of speech should be limited, but we cannot place much reliance on the opinions that are gathered that way when the persons interviewed have not had the intent of the bill explained to them. It really lends very little weight to the argument used by the member for York Centre (Mr. Walker).

I have nothing against the provisions in the bill which outlaw genocide, and I suppose nobody will find fault with that aspect of it, but the rest of the bill gives me a great deal of concern. We can talk about guarding freedom of speech, but we must of course accept the responsibility that goes along with all our freedom. If in this piece of legislation we must place some limits on the freedom of speech, are we not really just getting out of accepting responsibility for doing so? I think we are. We are shelving our responsibility by saying that the society in which we live will no longer accept responsibility for its acts and, therefore, we have to legislate control. Surely, in this country we have not gone that far, though some people may believe that society is slipping. This piece of legislation might be justifiable in some of the underdeveloped countries where there is a tendency to create hatred, riot and violence and so on, but as one of the better educated countries of the world surely we have not slipped that far. Surely, with our level of education, we are above that.

The bill attempts to define hate literature in this way:

> "hate propaganda" means any writing, sign or visible representation that advocates or promotes genocide or the communication of which by any person would constitute an offence under section 267B;

Now, section 267B is the one that worries me, Mr. Speaker. It reads:

> Every one who, by communicating statements in any public place, incites hatred against any identifiable group—

I ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) or any other member of this House, through you, Mr. Speaker, what would have happened if a bill like this had been in the hands of some of the governors in the southern United States who were faced with people trying to bring about better conditions? Would these people not have been accused of inciting riots, inciting acts of violence and hatred? Would the governors not have used legislation like this to confine and regulate the minority? I do not want to name any of these governors but we have seen them on television and have had them here in our country. We have seen their attitude to some of the justifiable uprisings that have taken place, and here I am going back to the beginning of the recent upheavals in the United States six or seven years ago. What would a bill like this have done, and how would it have been used?

Many members have said that this bill will never be used. If the person who may use it is fair and broadminded, then no harm will come from it. In trying to protect minorities, we may well be harming or limiting the expression of thought of those minorities. I cannot emphasize this point too much. When we think of the uprising in the country to the south of us, and I am thinking of some of the southern states where there has been an uprising of an identifiable group for a justifiable purpose, a bill like this could have been used to control the measures taken to bring about social change and better conditions.

One of the good things that may come out of this bill, Mr. Speaker, is that it may limit the CBC, something which nobody has been able to do. Nobody has been able to limit what we see on our television screens. Some years ago the leader of the Nazi movement in the United States, as I think it was called, a Mr. Rockwell, was brought to Canada. Had this bill been passed then, I suppose he could have been accused of promoting hatred in a public place. I am sure the television screen could be defined as such. One could say the same of Stokely Carmichael and some of the other agitators on the North American continent who are brought to this country from time to time by the CBC. So perhaps, Mr. Speaker, one good thing that will come out of this bill is that somebody somewhere will place some control on the CBC. That is a very negligible amount of good to come out of a piece of legislation which could otherwise be so very harmful, which could disrupt and divide a relatively united country. People who have worked side by side and fought for social change are divided on this legislation. Some say it is not necessary and some say it will never be used. Why bring it in if it is so poor?

What are the benefits of this legislation and how is the application of it going to affect the man on the street? Well, he is going to be limited. The committee changes subsection 2 of section 267B and added "other than in private conversation". I suppose this means that one has to be talking to more than one person, but it still does not mean that one can say what one wants to two or three people in one's own home. The effect, therefore, is limiting to that extent and changes the whole principle of our legal system. This afternoon Your Honour suggested that it creates equality in the eyes of the law; I think Your Honour saw a lot more in the bill than I do. I think it changes the whole concept of our law that a man is innocent until proven guilty. If a man is accused under this law he is automatically guilty and then has to use the defences provided in the measure to justify his statements or publications. If in using these defences he can prove that the statements were absolutely true, he is not guilty but it is up to him to prove it.

Section 267B (3) reads:

(b) if, in good faith, he expressed or attempted to establish by argument an opinion upon a religious subject;

This means he could use the defence that he was only expressing the idea to promote discussion and argument, that he did not believe what he said. I suppose he could get around the charge that way. I believe that defence would make it very difficult to convict anybody who had good legal advice.

Section 267B (3) (c) reads:

(c) if the statements were relevant to any subject of public interest, the discussion of which was for the public benefit, and if on reasonable grounds he believed them to be true;

• (4:30 p.m.)

I suppose one could incite a riot if one thought it was for the public good. I watched television once and saw a member of the Ontario Legislature, Stephen Lewis, interviewed. He as much as said, "Riots are all right; a little violence does not hurt. Sometimes it brings about change, and that is good for the country." He more or less said that on television. Clearly, he was indicating that violence was in the public interest; that it was good for the public. This is a matter that is dealt with in subparagraph (c). I ask, were the people who attempted to burn the Murray Hill garage acting in the public interest? True, they were not an identifiable group, but violence and hatred were certainly displayed in their actions. One man was killed.

To me, this is poor legislation. What is the aim of the Minister of Justice? In which direction is he leading Canadian law and our legal system? I am no lawyer, but having looked at the defences set out in the bill I can safely say that it is a good thing the Minister of Justice is not in practice and attempting to defend someone who has contravened the provisions of this bill. I do not think a practising lawyer would have introduced a bill like this with so many weaknesses and loopholes.

Subparagraph (c) reads in part:

—and if on reasonable grounds he believed them to be true;—

If charged, I suppose I would have to convince the judge and jury that I really believed my utterances were true. I would then say, "I am sorry Your Honour; I thought my utterances were true, but I now realize they were not true. Please do not convict me." I suppose a lenient judge might say, "I believe you had reasonable grounds for believing your utterances to be true and, as a result of your defence, the court cannot convict you." I should get off scot-free. Will this bill not benefit the so-called martyr, the real kook who advocates violence and who puts out hate literature that is directed against an identifiable group? Will passage of this bill not mean that the would-be martyr will gain a platform for the dissemination of his ideas? There will be court cases which will be reported by newspapers, and the would-be martyr's utterances and hatreds will be fully reported. That is the type of person this bill will benefit, the person who wishes to become a martyr, who wishes to be tried in order to secure that publicity which will further his views in our society.

An hon. Member: An example being the Chicago Seven.

Mr. Horner: Yes, the Chicago Seven. Subparagraph (d) reads in part:

—if, in good faith, he intended to point out, for the purpose of removal, matters producing or tending to produce feelings of hatred towards an identifiable group in Canada.

What that means it is hard to say. The bill is weak because the defences enumerated would allow almost anybody to escape the punishment he may or may not deserve. As I say, passage of this bill will mean that would-be martyrs will be assured of newspaper coverage of their trials. They hope thus to publish their views. Really, no man will be convicted under this bill unless he, himself, wishes to be convicted. To my mind, the bill will limit the workings of the CBC, benefit the would-be martyr and do little else for the good of our society. Surely, we could better spend our time in this House promoting better education and better understanding instead of promoting existing divisions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Horner: Because that is what the bill does; it promotes existing divisions. It says there is no cure for them and therefore we will penalize anyone who tries to create divisions. That is a very negative way of thinking, and a surprising way of thinking for the Minister of Justice who I thought at one time was rather forward thinking.

Mr. Baldwin: He is contaminated by his colleagues.

Mr. Horner: I urge the Minister of Justice to withdraw the bill. It ought to be withdrawn; and the reprinted version should include the clause respecting genocide, but nothing else.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Syndeys): I see the government has at least one supporter.

Mr. MacGuigan: I should like to think that there are some supporters of this bill on the opposition side as well. With respect to the sum total of the arguments which have been made for the amendment and against the bill, I must say that, while some of the arguments have been cogent, many, I fear, have been specious. As the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) said last night, they are sophistical arguments.

A few minutes ago the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) raised the question whether certain kinds of riots would be exempt from the provisions of the bill. The defences he referred to are not defences to offences under the public order section; they are defences to offences dealing with the distribution of hate propaganda, and there is no such question which really arises as a result of this particular bill.

I trust the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) will not object if I single out his address for particular attention. I believe it is fair to say he was the official spokesman for the opposition on this subject. In his speech yesterday he referred many times to the words "ridicule and contempt". Of course, the traditional common law phrase with respect to criminal defamation was the phrase "hatred, ridicule and contempt". I am sure all hon. members know that the word "ridicule" was dropped by the Cohen Committee in its wording respecting the new offence of group defamation. The word "contempt" was eliminated by the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs during its deliberations. The only word that remains of this original common law triad is the word "hatred". Therefore, the references the hon. member for Calgary North made in his rhetoric to ridicule and contempt are, I submit, beside the point.

He also referred to the speeches of Kennedy and King. I am not sure which Kennedy he meant. In any case, I would suggest that he would be hard put to find statements by those men which are incitements to hatred. Men like Kennedy and King do not need to resort to hatred, do not need to resort to attacks on another person who is a member of the natural groups protected under this bill, in order to make their points adequately. Nor need anyone resort to such attacks in order to carry on the kind of dialogue which is necessary in a democratic society.

Mr. Woolliams: Will the hon. member permit a question? I did not say these men were either professing or promoting hatred. But would he not agree that it was because of hate—it may have been paranoic hate—that Robert Kennedy was assassinated?

Mr. MacGuigan: I agree, and that is the very type of hate this bill is attempting to curb.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacGuigan: A substantive argument, although I am not sure that it is more substantial, is that with regard to selective protection for groups. Selective protection is not unknown in the law, Mr. Speaker. The Canadian Bill of Rights, which was originally sponsored by hon. members who now sit in opposition and which was heartily endorsed by hon. members on this side of the House, selects, among the rights it will protect, the freedom of speech, freedom of assembly and so on. It does not put on the same level the equality of the sexes, the right to privacy and the liberty of employment.

The question is not whether there is selective protection, but what is the basis of the selection. We should know that the protection is not, despite some of the comments which have been made, proposed to be given to groups. The protection is to be given to individuals in their capacity as members of a group; it is to be given to individuals who may be attacked because they are members of a group. The whole thrust of this legislation seeks to protect individuals in a way they were not protected at common law and in a way they were not protected by statute previously.

After all, Mr. Speaker, in earlier centuries we did not have the same consciousness of groups that we now have. We did not realize that what might be said about a man, his group capacity and his membership in one of these basic groups, could hurt him just as much as a comment that was made about him directly as an individual with reference to his own individualizing characteristics.

The selectivity of protection of this bill is its very strength. The basis of this selectivity is to protect a man in his membership in those groups which are most natural and most basic to him, the groups to which he belongs almost by reason of his very being. As the history of mankind shows, group membership has produced the greatest degree of hatred throughout human history. This is the basis of the protection and the selectivity of the protection which this legislation attempts to give. This selectivity is its strength.

Another argument made by the hon. member for Calgary North deals with the adequacy of the present Criminal Code. The hon. member referred to section 60 and the sections immediately following which deal with seditious libel. I submit that this argument and his reference to the Boucher case reveal a misunderstanding of the focus of this legislation with which we are now dealing in comparison to the traditional sanction against sedition.

Sedition is a concept which has to do with the relationship of the individual and the state directly. It classifies as undesirable conduct certain kinds of agitation by individuals which is directed against the government and attempts to overthrow the government or, in earlier days, the person of the monarch. This is not the purpose of this legislation. This legislation is not directed to protecting the government, but to protecting other people in society. It is directed to protecting some of the weaker and more vulnerable people against those who may attack them. It is not an attempt by the government to protect itself. The focus of this legislation is not the same as legislation dealing with sedition. The comments made respecting the Boucher case, I submit, are not applicable to the present legislation.

Another example of the supposed adequacy of the Criminal Code is section 64 and the sections immediately following, culminating with the proscription of unlawful assembly in section 67 where it requires for proof of an unlawful assembly, an assembly of three or more persons with an intent to carry out a common purpose. In order to establish guilt under this section, it is necessary to prove that at least three people came to a meeting with a common purpose. That is not always possible to prove.

A third argument was made. This argument, I believe, raised very basic problems about the bill and whether or not, as the hon. member for Calgary North argued, it is crisis legislation. I submit it is not crisis legislation. It is problem legislation. It is not crisis legislation because it is not extreme. The hon. member for Crowfoot attempted to demonstrate how weak the bill is because of the breadth of the defences. Without agreeing with his interpretation of the bill, I say if this bill errs, it errs on the side of favouring free speech.

It is not crisis legislation in the sense that it is not stringent legislation. It is far less stringent than the Race Relations Act in Great Britain which allows no exculpation of the conduct which is condemned. It also is not crisis legislation because no one who is supporting the bill is talking about a crisis in this country. We do not have a crisis. Like most other countries in the world, we have a problem and, like most other countries in the world, we need legislation equal to that problem.

Mr. Woolliams: What's the problem?

Mr. MacGuigan: The hon. member asks, "What's the problem?" I will review some of the facts set out in the committee report. The current hate campaign which that report refers to began in early 1963 and continued on to about 1966 or 1967, when it lay quiescent for a short time before it again sprang up. This campaign was carried on in eight provinces of Canada. It was perhaps carried on in the other two provinces as well but we do not have the same type of public evidence with respect to them.

I will not deal with all of the instances. They cover about four or five pages in the report of the committee. I wish first to draw to the attention of the House the situation which existed in the province of Ontario. The first distribution of hate materials began in April, 1963 in the city of Toronto. There was hate distribution in July and September. In October, there were four instances; in November five instances, and six instances in December. This was in the year 1963, before the campaign gathered momentum.

As examples of some instances of distribution of hate literature, I wish to quote examples from 1964. The report reads at page 20:

> On January 15, five hundred leaflets entitled "Special Bulletin" were picked up by an apartment administrator from tenants mailboxes in apartment houses along Don Mills Road, Victoria Park Avenue and Eglinton Avenue East in Toronto. The leaflets all had special "hate" messages typed on the reverse side.

At page 21 it reads:

On September 7 and 8, the dates of the Jewish New Year, one of the most solemn of Jewish religious holidays, a green card was received in the mail by many members of the Jewish Community in Hamilton and Toronto. The card, mailed from Toronto, depicted a Jew fleeing a large swastika, and contained the words "Thith ith the end".

On February 19, 1965, it was reported that hundreds of anti-semitic leaflets were found strewn in cars parked on the main streets and in parking lots in North Bay, Ontario. Others were reported found in the doorways of retail shops.

Some of this circulation was through the mails. Other distribution was by placing them on the streets, in shops and by hand in apartment buildings.

In Quebec there were instances of distribution in 1964 and 1965. There were instances of distribution in 1964 and 1965 in British Columbia. In Alberta, a certain amount of hate literature distribution occurred in December of 1964, in Calgary. In Saskatchewan, in April of 1965, a number of pamphlets were mailed from the Vancouver branch of Natural Order to residents of Saskatoon. In Manitoba in September of 1964, several pamphlets, including one entitled "Communism is Jewish" were mailed to the principal of a high school and others in Winnipeg.

There was distribution in New Brunswick in 1965. Pamphlets were mailed from Frederiction, New Brunswick, to people in Moncton and Saint John. In 1964 in Nova Scotia a number of pamphlets were mailed to people in Dartmouth. This is a brief summary of the distribution of hate material contained in the report of the Special Committee on Hate Propaganda. This recital ends with the completion of the committee's work in the fall of 1965. I have not had an opportunity to complete a similar survey of all the instances of hate literature which have been distributed since that time.

I wish to refer members of the House to several other kinds of events which occurred in Toronto. After the founding of the Canadian Nazi party on April 20, 1965, these incidents occurred by way of reaction to attempts to distribute messages of hate. I will illustrate that, in matters of this kind, the reaction is something which the law has to take cognizance of as well as the actual commission of the offences under the present criminal law.

After the founding of the Nazi party in Toronto in 1965 and the setting up of a headquarters, a Nazi rally was called at Allan Gardens on Sunday, May 30. A crowd began to gather about noon, although the meeting was not called until two o'clock. By that time there were about 5,000 people in the park. When John Beattie entered the park he was immediately spotted by members of N3 Fighters Against Racial Hatred and was tackled, kicked and beaten before police could rescue him. A mob of about 500, many carrying sticks and clubs and shouting "kill, kill, kill", also chased and attacked a number of youths believed, in most cases wrongly, to be nazis. Fifty policemen eventually restored order and arrested nine men, including Beattie. Because of a lack of time, I will not go into all the difficulties which the Toronto City Council had in grappling with the problem as to whether to grant permits for meetings in the park.

On July 25, after he had been twice denied a permit to speak in the park, Beattie and seven other nazis attempted a silent protest march through Allan Gardens carrying a swastika banner and two green maple leaf flags. As the nazi group marched into the park, two mounted policemen rode on either side. Suddenly, a small group of about 20 men jumped up from park benches, rushed the Nazis and beat them with fists and with their own flagpoles. A further incident occurred in 1966 when, as a result of a change in the park rules, Beattie was able to obtain a one-hour speaking permit for Sunday, June 5. He arrived at about 2.10 p.m. and walked through the park surrounded by police. As he began to speak, the crowd, estimated at 4,000, closed in on him, but mounted policemen pushed the spectators back and ringed Beattie for the rest of his speech. A similar meeting on Sunday, June 19, led to a near riot. Although the crowd, numbering about 1,200, was smaller than on June 5, its mood was uglier despite the presence of some 200 policemen. Beattie's half-hour speech dealt almost exclusively with Jews.

There is one further incident of this kind to which I should like to draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, before coming to a conclusion. On the night of July 6, more than 1,000 angry anti-Nazi demonstrators jammed Nathan Phillips Square in front of City Hall to denounce the city's free speech policy. Marchers included many victims of nazi persecution in Europe. The conclusion I should like to suggest after this recital is that when there is a manifest lack of provision in the law, a manifest injustice with which the law is unable to cope, people are tempted to take the law into their own hands. Indeed, in some of the cases I have cited the temptation was too strong for them to resist; an enormous problem was raised for those responsible for law enforcement in Toronto as crowds of between 4,000 and 5,000 took part in near-riots, creating scenes almost beyond the control of the police in attendance.

This summary of events in Toronto illustrates the effect which a persistent hate group can have on the public life of a large metropolitan area and, what is perhaps even more important, the depths of passion and the extent of opposition which can be aroused by way of reaction, especially in a community some of whose members have had first-hand experience of nazi tyranny and inhumanity. It also brings to light the difficulty of handling such a situation through legal means, especially at the municipal level. The Toronto City Council, in the absence of a law adequate to control the activities of the nazi speakers, tried to handle the situation by preventing speakers from using the parks, in other words, by preventing people from speaking before they had been given a chance to air their views. It is one thing for a law to impose liability on people after they have spoken, but prior restraints are anathema in a democratic society. Yet even knowing this, and probably agreeing with my view, the city council acted as it did because it felt it had no choice in its attempt to deal with the crisis situation which arose at that time.

I should like to say a word, now, about the anti-Jewish messages which were available over the telephone in Toronto last year. I do not present this as being an extreme kind of threat because, obviously, a person had to call a particular number before he could get the message. Nevertheless, the fact that people can indulge in this kind of attempt to hurt other members of their community proves that the spirit of hatred is still abroad in some of our cities.

Since the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. Muir) is present in the chamber I will also refer to the hate material to which he drew the attention of the House earlier in the year. It is clear that hate material has not vanished from this country, and that its distribution continues.

The situation does not constitute a crisis, though there have deen crisis situations in Toronto. What we are facing is a serious problem, one which we should not attempt to measure only in terms of its quantitative influence. This is primarily a qualitative problem. The real threat arises because material of this kind can, because of its cleverness, its subtlety, affect the thinking of people, leading them to accept views to the detriment of their neighbours which they would not otherwise hold.

Such literature corrupts the majority, but more important still is the danger in which minorities are placed. Social psychology has shown us clearly that the effect on minority groups of constant subjection to hatred and prejudice is etxremely destructive. We are seeing the effects in the United States today in the growth of movements such as the Black Panthers. These are movements toward self-assertion. In other areas, the result is a feeling of unworthiness and withdrawal. Not many studies of this kind of thing have been made in Canada, though a number have been completed in the United States. However, I noted recently a report of a study conducted on an Indian reserve in western Ontario which supports the conclusion that Canadian Indians have a negative self-image. This thesis was based on a study conducted among small children, in which the children showed a preference for dolls of a colour other than their own.

Hate propaganda, like prejudice of all kinds, is destructive. It is destructive of the majority because it corrupts the majority, and it is destructive of minorities because it can place minorities in a position where they are made to feel unworthy.

[English]

Mr. Forest: There have been discussions between various hon. members, Mr. Speaker, and I believe there would be general agreement to our proceeding to item No. 4., Bill C-37, in the name of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is it so agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

MEASURE TO PREVENT PUBLICATION

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale) moved that Bill C-37, respecting disclosure of names of drug addicts, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

• (5:00 p.m.)

He said: Mr. Speaker, in introducing the second reading of Bill C-37, I should like to preface my short remarks by saying that no current social illness is more threatening today in our country than that of drug abuse. The abuse of drugs and its consequences can be disastrous to the mental, physical, social, moral and economic health of individuals. The drug abuse problem affects not only individual drug users but also their families, friends, employers and their country. The great challenge that the drug abuse problem poses today is one which we legislators must face and to which we must also strive to find solutions.

I welcome this opportunity to bring to the attention of all hon. members Bill C-37, the purpose of which is to prohibit the publication of the name of the person so charged without special leave of the court, so that, among other things, a distinction can be made between the addict and the drug pusher.

The concept underlying this bill maintains that publishing in the newspapers the name of a person charged with possession of narcotics, including the non-narcotic drug marijuana, tends to destroy the character of the accused, who is often a teenager. It tends to destroy the careers of students and other persons, adversely affects their families, and makes rehabilitation more difficult.

The federal government is now endeavouring to learn more about the drug abuse problem in our country by the establishment of a federal inquiry into the non-medical use of drugs. This will enable the government to learn more about the drug abuse problem so that adequate and sound legislation may be enacted as soon as possible.

In perusing literature on the drug abuse problem, statements and recommendations made by experts in this field urge lighter penalties, especially for offences relating to marijuana which should not be classified as a narcotic. Spokesmen for the Ontario Alcoholism and Drug Addiction Research Foundation have stated that, generally speaking, the creation of opportunities for lesser penalties for illegal possession as opposed to trafficking of various drug substances is a move in the right direction. It is believed by these experts that in the long run we legislators should seek to transfer drug abuse problems from the realm of criminal offences to the realm of treatable health conditions.

The traditional response whereby legal control mechanisms alone are seen as the only way to solve these problems is inadequate. I should like to quote, to prove this point, a few paragraphs contained in the brief of the Canadian Medical Association entitled "Non-Medical Use of Drugs with Particular Reference to Youth", made public in November 1969:

> One area of increasing agreement has emerged: the continued disdain of marijuana users for punitive legislation has forced us to re-examine the justification for and consequences of laws which treat the misuser of any drug as a criminal. Growing numbers of prominent individuals, committees and organizations are now demanding a more realistic approach, through restructuring of the drug laws, more accent on education, intensification of research, and provision of diagnostic and treatment facilities. It has become obvious that existing laws have had little influence on the spread of marijuana use and that to impose a criminal record on a young person for simple possession is self-defeating and often destructive. In Canada, within the past 12 months, many concerned groups have passed on resolutions to the federal government recommending that simple possession of marijuana be no longer treated as a criminal offence punishable by imprisonment.
> The Drug Habituation Committee of the British Columbia Medical Association concluded that "the harshness of the law outweighed the probable danger of marijuana itself and that the rigid application of the law would likely give rise to social ills exceeding those inherent in the uncontrolled use of the drug itself."

The brief goes on to mention other statements by experts in the British medical journal The Lancet, in the article written by Dr. Yolles, director of the United States National Institute of Mental Health, and others. All of them point to the fact that the present criminal law is too harsh on people who are charged with possession of certain narcotic drugs, including marijuana.

This is why I have introduced Bill C-37 in this House. It will give all hon. members an opportunity to express their views on the two clauses in the bill, which propose to prohibit the publication of the name of the person so charged without special leave of the court so that, among other things, a distinction can be made between the addict and the drug pusher.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us is a good, neat bill. It makes one point and makes it rather well. I think it is an exciting and interesting bill, one that I intend to support. I know a great number of my colleagues are of the same opinion, and since there are probably a number of members who would like to take part in this debate I shall try to keep my remarks as brief as possible.

In the justice and legal affairs committee recently, the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police advised us of the statistics relating to convictions for various offences connected with the non-medical use of drugs in Canada. Within the last year or two the rate has gone up 85 per cent over what was the average for the previous few years. So, I suggest it is pretty obvious that we are dealing with a rather substantial problem when we consider the number of cases involving drugs that come to court.

I think the sponsor of the bill made a very valid point, one that I think cannot be emphasized too much. He said that what happens to a person convicted of drug offences does seem, in today's circumstances, to be quite out of proportion. Careers can be ruined for the smoking of one marijuana cigarette. A career in the professions, for example, can be lost upon conviction of this sort of thing. Therefore, it is time that we looked at all the penalties that fasten on to the non-medical use of drugs and substances like marijuana.

The bill could, of course, have been wider in scope in this sense, but I would not want in any way to oppose it since it does deal with one particular point. This point is a good place to start. This afternoon I hope that the House will give second reading to the bill, if only for the purpose of getting it to the committee where this problem could be examined. Perhaps the sponsor would not feel particularly aggrieved if the bill did not come back or if the examination there were somewhat extended. However, somewhere along the line we do have to get our teeth into legislation dealing with the penalties which are imposed for narcotic and non-medical use of drug offences.

The hon. member is to be complimented for suggesting a very practical measure, indeed. In the next year, of course, Parliament will be faced with the problem on a wider scale when the LeDain report is before us, and when the government has had a chance to suggest the measures it intends to initiate. But certainly the discussion in Canada which is going on now is a pretty important discussion, that is whether the narcotics problem is a criminal law problem or a medical problem. It has always struck me as absurd that any night in Canada hundreds or thousands of men are hauled in to local hoosegows and then the next morning brought into court for being drunk in a public place. To me alcoholism is part of the problem with which the hon. member is concerned in presenting in this measure. It seems to me more of a medical problem than one to be treated by putting people into dungeons or gaols, even the best of those. These are issues which will stir all Canadians. I was pleased to note that one province at least is not treating the alcoholic as a quasi-criminal, and I hope other provinces will follow that step.

I am glad that the hon. member, while he is not really taking a direct whack at the question of a criminal record for those who are caught for the non-medical use of narcotics, is at least seeing to it that they are spared public notoriety. I have some question as to the part of his formula which would allow, by special leave of the court, the names to be made public in the news media. I think that probably should be amended in some way because it should not be left too much to the discretion of judges who may have great sympathy for this problem or may have none whatsoever. That is only a very small, niggling issue in my mind.

By and large, I can support the measure with a full heart. I hope this afternoon it will be sent to the committee where we can start getting our teeth into this very large and worrisome problem in Canada.

Mr. Douglas A. Hogarth (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I find it very difficult to consider the bill of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz), since it is so deeply related to the problems of narcotic addiction, marijuana, amphetamines, speed or what have you. I find little rationale in confining the measure to the non-publication of the names of the accused in cases dealing with narcotics.

To my mind, the principle that should be established in this bill, and I think it would be something worthy of consideration by this Parliament, is that the name of any person charged with any criminal offence should not be published until such time as that person has been convicted. If we are going to give credence to the doctrine of reasonable doubt, which applies equally to cases under the Narcotic Control Act as to the Criminal Code or any other criminal statute, that is that no one is deemed to be guilty until they have been proven so beyond a reasonable doubt, then it seems to me that no person's name should be published until after his conviction.

I think the hon. member for Parkdale is quite correct, that the mere laying of a criminal charge does a great deal to destroy the reputation and character of a person in the community. Very often the news item that the person has been charged appears, but sometimes no mention is made of the fact the person was acquitted at some subsequent date. This is particularly true when the case gets into the court of appeal after the original conviction. A bill of this nature might go a long way, if it were extended to cover all criminal offences, towards taking the sting out of charges against people when those charges are subsequently dismissed.

On many occasions it is not only the accused who suffers so far as defamation of his character is concerned. All of us who have practised in the criminal courts have seen situations where witnesses were subjected to far greater abuse than the accused himself. This can often be so in the very degrading sexual cases which we have been so unfortunate to have occur in our communities from time to time. There is nothing more difficult for a woman, the complainant in a rape case, than to be subjected to a strong and far-reaching cross-examination on the most intimate matters and the most distasteful subjects of evidence that can come before our criminal courts.

It might well be, as I suggest, that this bill would form good legislation. I am somewhat surprised that the hon. member for Parkdale confined his remarks to young people, because the bill does in substance apply to any person, as it should. I know the hon. member has in mind the provisions of the Juvenile Delinquents Act which prohibit the publication of the names of young offenders who are processed in the juvenile courts. The report on juvenile delinquency that was prepared some years ago by the Department of Justice dealt with this particular subject and expressed the thought that this practice should not only be clarified, because it is not too clear in the present act, but that it should be extended. The report reads at page 140:

> Under the Act the ban on identification of the child is addressed to "newspapers and other publications". Doubt has been expressed as to whether this prohibition extends to radio and television. These doubts should be removed and the legislation should indicate clearly that identification of the child through any media whatsoever is prohibited without special leave of the court.

The hon. member for Parkdale knows that the report of the Justice Committee on Juvenile Delinquency supports the principle of his bill. What he is doing is extending it to adults. I think that is a very good thing. From time to time in our criminal courts the press have been asked by the presiding judge not to print the name of a particular witness or a particular person, and the good press of Canada have certainly obliged the judge by refraining from so doing.

I am a little concerned with the provision in the bill relating to getting special leave of the court. I cannot conceive of any situation where an accused person should have his name published if he does not wish to have it published. There are situations where it might well be that an accused person could find witnesses in his favour if his name were published. I think the bill would be better framed if it applied only to cases where the accused gave special permission.

In closing, I hope the hon. member for Parkdale will have the time to consider the bill I have pending, Bill C-154, which would also prohibit the fingerprinting of accused persons, before their conviction, under the operation of the Identification of Criminals Act. I think both in respect of my hon. friend's bill and the Identification of Criminals Act, this Parliament might well look very seriously into the way the law can, on occasions, abuse innocent persons. I look forward some time to debating more extensively those problems in respect of narcotics, but I do not believe that subject is really germane to this bill today. I would not want any of my remarks to be construed that I did not think the bill was important and something which should be given consideration in the very near future by this Parliament.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) is to be commended for bringing forth Bill C-37. The purpose of this bill, as stated, is to prohibit the publication of the names of the persons so charged without special leave of the court; that is, charged with possession of narcotics including marijuana. The sponsor of the bill, by profession, is a doctor. I am sure he has had wide experience in respect of the non-medical use of drugs by persons and also wide experience in respect of alcoholism. I note from clause 1 of the bill that the reference is to any person who is charged with possession. Possession certainly is the most common charge with regard to drugs. There is also, however, the charge of selling and trafficking. Experience has shown that many people charged with selling drugs or trafficking in drugs are drug addicts. Therefore, possibly this legislation does not go far enough since it does not include people who have been charged with selling drugs and trafficking in drugs. As the hon. member has stated the publication of the name can cause a great injustice in respect of the person charged and possibly, as the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hogarth) said, the witnesses who are attendant at the trial.

During the last session similar legislation was brought forward by a former member from Montreal, Mr. Klein. His bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. At that time, some experts in this field gave evidence. Their evidence was excellent. I thought that possibly the government would act upon some of the recommendations made in the report of the committee in respect of that bill. Unfortunately, however, this government does not appear to want to act too quickly. We now have a situation in which many young people charged with possession of marijuana and other drugs are suffering the result of convictions when they seek employment, bonding or wish to travel. Back in the year 1966, it was said in the district of Columbia circuit court of appeals that alcoholism should be treated and not punished. That principle has been applied in some of the states of the United States. In Europe, a more enlightened view is taken in respect of the problem of alcoholism because it is said this is really the third largest public health problem that prevails in countries today.

In Europe, and in parts of the United States, intoxication centres have been established where a person who is intoxicated is taken either by the police or by a friend. He is sobered up there and then when he has sobered up he is permitted to go home. If he should be an alcoholic he may need further treatment, and if so would be referred to another centre where he would obtain proper treatment. In other words, he is not looked upon as a criminal but as a person with an illness which should be treated. If we were to use that analogy of alcoholism in respect of the drug problem, surely we should be setting up drug centres across Canada so that a person who is in the throes of illness as a result of taking a drug could be treated before any charge is laid. As I recall the legislation proposed by Mr. Klein, it was indicated that when a person is charged with possession of a drug he should be brought before the magistrate. The magistrate should then suspend the hearing and either persuade the accused to take treatment voluntarily or involuntarily if necessary.

There are different types of treatment for the drug problem. Indications are that many of these have been highly successful. Once a person has been treated, then he could be returned to the court in which he had been charged. If a person were charged with possession of marijuana and it were the first offence resulting in no ill effects, surely an enlightened Crown counsel would then ask the magistrate, based on the report he received from the drug centre or hospital at which the person had been treated, to drop the charge. This would be an enlightened approach. If the report from the drug centre indicated that the person needed further treatment, and that there had been prior convictions in his case, then the charge rather than being dropped could be delayed to be brought forward at a later date, say six months, a year or even 18 months later. In other words, the case could be adjourned sine die so that the person could be further treated and tested. This is what I would like to see done, because then we would be treating the drug addict in an enlightened way. We would be treating an illness rather than punishing a person for possession of drugs.

I think all of us have known persons charged with possession of a drug who have been convicted of the offence. The problem in respect of the RCMP and other police forces with regard to a conviction is rather difficult because possession is not the easiest thing to prove. The RCMP have been quite assiduous in pursuing the problem. The drug addict is at times most ingenious in disposing of the drug. This has put the RCMP on the alert in respect of obtaining the evidence concerning the drug charge. The result has been a growing bad relationship between the drug user and the RCMP. One would hope the relationship between the police and the person who has committed the offence would be a proper relationship. Unfortunately, as a result of this particular offence and the difficulty of obtaining the evidence necessary for a conviction, there has been a bad relationship between the police and the offender. I might say that the treatment of many young people who have been charged today with possession of marijuana has left a great deal to be desired. The result is that their attitude toward the police and law enforcement officers generally has not been a healthy one. In fact, their abuse of the police at times has been unwarranted but nevertheless they justify it because of the attitude of the law officers.

We have before us legislation concerning the obtaining of a pardon in respect of a criminal conviction. Many hon. members of the House, particularly those who sit on the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee, have been disappointed with the government's bill concerning pardons for people convicted of a criminal offence. Many hon. members feel that bill should go the full way. Many are afraid of the word expungement and would prefer use of the word annulment. Be that as it may, I do not think we have gone far enough with regard to erasing the convictions of certain criminal offenders.

The Ouimet Commission recommended that any person charged with a summary offence should have the conviction erased after a period of two years, and that any person charged with an indictable offence should have the opportunity to apply for an annulment after a period of five years on proof of good behaviour and rehabilitation. The bill presented by the Solicitor General (Mr. McIlraith) does not go far enough.

Many high school and university students have been convicted of possession of drugs. What they did was dare to take a chance with regard to drugs, the same way as many of us in our young days dared to take a chance with regard to alcohol. Our problem was alcohol, not drugs. Convictions against these young persons weigh heavily upon them and their prospects for future employment, bonding and travel. It is not my intention to dwell on this subject, however, Mr. Speaker.

The hon. member for New Westminster raised a question concerning the necessity of publishing the name of any person charged with a criminal offence, and suggested widening the proposed legislation to prohibit publication of offenders' names until such time as their offences had been completely dealt with by the courts and judgment passed. I hope this bill will pass. I hope hon. members on the government side will not adopt their usual method of talking it out. I think it should be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs where we can go into it more deeply, where we can call expert witnesses to give evidence so that we may develop new legislation not only based on this bill but on the report of the LeDain Commission on Drugs, and thus be foremost in legislation dealing with this grave social problem.

[Translation]

Mr. Georges-C. Lachance (Lafontaine): Mr. Speaker, it is well known that ever since my election to the House, I have always taken a special interest in the problem of the rehabilitation of prisoners and all those people who have had a run in with the law, have been found guilty, are serving time or have been released, or who have found it difficult to readjust socially and take their normal place in this world.

The principle of the bill proposed by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) is highly commendable, and we should congratulate the hon. member for bringing home to us this extremely serious problem of divulging the names of drug addicts.

Following in the footsteps of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert), I must say that I would like to see the scope of this bill greatly widened. A few years ago, I had the opportunity of introducing a bill whose objectives were much more far-reaching. Among other things, I had proposed that not only the names of the accused but those of the witnesses not be published in a criminal case, because I feel that this does not give anything, does not facilitate rehabilitation and enables certain media to publish exciting articles. Besides, the family of the accused suffers needlessly. And when those people have paid their debt to society, they find it that much more difficult to return to the outside world and contribute to the country's economy.

Now, I will speak of those who are condemned and of those who are acquitted. We know that they are branded forever, whether we want it or not. I just happened to read today in a magazine an article which said of someone that he or she had been indicted but later acquitted.

I will not disclose any name. Indeed, a great number of people are prosecuted, even if we are told that they are acquitted, something always remains. If the names of the accused and witnesses are not disclosed by the news media, those who are acquitted will not suffer as much. Evidently, it is easier afterwards to rehabilitate those who have been found guilty.

The bill now under consideration mainly deals with the problems of drug addicts. If the government would decide to take a first step in that field, conditions would improve. Indeed we are increasingly hearing about the problem of drugs, whether they are hallucinogens, marijuana or something else.

We deplore the fact that teenagers, once condemned, get a criminal record. I do not intend to deal with criminal records because I believe we will soon have an opportunity to do so when the bill which is now before the committee is reported to the House.

A few years ago, I introduced a bill to eliminate criminal records but I will surely have an opportunity to talk about it. Besides, the government will bring forward a bill to this end and there will even be a possibility of legalizing the sale of some drugs.

Actually, the names of those who are arrested or convicted of using or possessing drugs are made public by the various media. I think the government should immediately take steps so that at least the accused are spared the publication of their names.

According to the bill, the court would have the power to decide whether the names should be published. With all due respect for the opinion of my colleague from Parkdale, I feel the court should not have this right. I can see no reason for publishing the name of a defendant or a witness.

Anyone may be called upon to appear in a case. If someone has witnessed a murder, his name is published in a newspaper and broadcast by radio or television. Even for the innocent witness to a murder, something will always remain on record. The same rule should be applied not only for preliminary hearings, but also in the case of Royal Commission inquiries which may lead to criminal proceedings being brought. In such a case, the names of witnesses and of defendants should not be revealed.

Those, in short, are the remarks I wanted to make. I am in favour of the bill. It is only a first step but I hope that if it goes to the committee for study amendments for the purpose of not leaving to the court's discretion the special right of deciding whether the defendant's name will be published will be brought forward.

[English]

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-37 is touching on a very important question, the use of drugs, presumably by young people. The policeman is the young person's best friend, whether or not he is accepted as such, but he has a very unenviable task; he tries to protect young persons not only from themselves and their immaturity but from the worst type of criminal, the drug pusher.

Although I have the greatest sympathy for young people who fall into the drug habit, I do not know how they are to be protected unless we are pretty tough on the people making fortunes of the filthiest kind by pushing drugs to young people. I am in sympathy with the spirit of this bill which is trying to protect our young people from gaining a bad reputation and help them on the road back.

When a young person is out on a prank and is found in possession of one marijuana cigarette at a dance or some such place, perhaps the law is a little overeager in wanting a conviction at the present time. This is just the smallest link in the chain of conspiracy of the unhealthy and very serious drug racket. We have to be careful about who we are trying to protect, and the bill must be specific in this respect. When the bill says "any person", surely it does not mean a man already convicted of several offences of pushing drugs. Surely it does not mean a young person who has been given a suspended sentence, allowed to return to his normal routine and later found to be passing drugs in large quantities. Are we to believe that we are trying to protect such people? Perhaps I am being technical, but I think the bill should specify exactly who we are trying to protect and under what circumstances.

The person caught smoking his first marijuana cigarette should certainly be protected with regard to publication of his name. I doubt whether any magistrate, if it was within his power, would do anything except put a boy like that on suspended sentence or remand him in the custody of his parents with the understanding that if no more drugs were found nothing more would be heard of the matter. I hope that in cases like these the press will use discretion and keep the name of the boy out of print. Certainly, if the long arm of the law catches the pusher or the person helping him, I would not expect the press to extend the same discretion.

The bill does not mention age. I suggest there should be a great difference in the way boys of 16 and under are treated and the way boys between 16 and 18 are treated. Any person older than 19 years—after all, we say these days that boys of 18 ought to assume their civic responsibilities—should experience the full rigour of the law. The law should deal very severely with persons of 18 or 19 years of age who ought to know that pushing drugs on young people in this country and elsewhere is a very serious offence indeed.

I do not think we need look abroad and see what is happening in other countries, although it is interesting to note that in several countries the offence of drug pushing carries the death penalty. In those countries the sale and use of drugs has dropped off dramatically. This includes drugs such as marijuana. Whether marijuana is a dangerous drug, I do not know, although I notice the bill lumps all drugs together. I am thinking mainly of marijuana in my presentation. The evidence about this drug is conflicting. I am not at all sure, Mr. Speaker, the possession of more serious, hard narcotics is a matter that should be treated lightly. I think the bill should spell out whether possessors of marijuana should be treated differently from possessors of hard drugs.

The person possessing a drug may be the only link in a long chain leading back to the drug trafficker who is really dangerous to our society. I would go along with any method of protecting the reputation of young people who for the first time have innocently come into contact with drugs. Even if charged, their names and addresses ought to be withheld, at least until the time of the trial. I do not think such young people ought to have their names smeared unnecessarily. If a person is convicted, that is different. Boys falling within the age limits I referred to ought to be protected, even if they are convicted. On the other hand, when the pusher of drugs is apprehended, the more publicity given to his being engaged in this most notorious of trades, the better. On this point I cannot go along with the spirit of the bill.

I agree with the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) who suggests the bill is very important and ought to be referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs. Expert witnesses could be called. I should like to see witnesses from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police drug squad called. They are responsible for protecting our young people and could give guidance as to how we might protect them from using drugs on the campuses, on the beaches and elsewhere. If there were liaison between our young people and the RCMP and our young people realized that the RCMP wish to protect them, we might be more successful in tracking down drug traffickers who are the real criminal element in our society and who must be apprehended as soon as possible.

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Colin D. Gibson (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) for presenting this thought-provoking bill which has brought on such an interesting debate today. It is fair to say that the issues involved in the bill involve rights related to the freedom to publish news. This bill seeks to protect the reputation of individual citizens. It refers to persons charged with possession of narcotics, which includes marijuana.

I think there is a fundamental difference between narcotics such as morphine and heroin, which are terribly damaging and very harmful socially, and marijuana, the possession of which is against the law but which is not in the same category as the harder drugs. I think a line ought to be drawn between misdemeanours and what might be termed less serious offences, and more serious offences and that the names of persons charged with less serious offences ought not to be published in newspapers or mentioned on radio and television. On the other hand, the press and other news media should enjoy their full freedom to report cases involving hard narcotics. That is why I say there is a great deal of merit in giving this matter more study and consideration.

Mr. Ricard: Question.

Mr. Gibson: Those of us who are lawyers have often found ourselves on the horns of a dilemma. Sometimes a man comes to us who has been charged with impaired driving.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hour set aside for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING HATE PROPAGANDA

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-3, to amend the Criminal Code as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, and motion No. 2 (Mr. Woolliams).

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, I have almost finished my remarks. I fear I have also just about completed the time allotted to me. I wonder if I might ask the indulgence of the House to continue for a very short time.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacGuigan: In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words with respect of arguments adduced by my colleague, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Roberts), with respect to the amendment and to the bill. My colleague said that the thrust of liberalism over the centuries has been toward liberty. I agree of course that the thrust of liberalism has been toward liberty. But liberalism is not a one-sided philosophy; it is for equality and security as well as liberty. Indeed, it might be argued that the very purpose of liberty is to enable the achievement of equality and security in our society.

My colleague quoted the great liberal philosopher John Stuart Mill to the effect that legislation should be enacted only when there is a situation that transgresses specific and identifiable rights. I submit that is precisely the situation before us. We have specific and identifiable human rights which are being transgressed. These rights have not been previously recognized by law. That is the purpose of this change which is being made in the law. The offence of group defamation is one which has not been recognized by law until now. This is a new law which will recognize this human right. It is not a sacred cow, as my colleague suggested; it is a sacred right of the people of this country.

My colleague also suggested that the effect of this bill would be to drive hatred and hatemongers underground. If that were the case, I submit the purpose of this bill would be fully achieved. This bill is not aimed at thought; it is aimed at speech and conduct, especially speech which goes toward unlawful conduct. If we could succeed in driving hate and hatemongers underground, we would succeed in ridding the democratic dialogue of our country of this cancer.

This bill is aimed at establishing minimal standards for public debate. I stress the word "minimal". It is not a bill specifically aimed at protecting either the minority or majority group in our society. In practice it will undoubtedly normally protect the minority because the minority, as the weaker members of our society, comprises usually the groups which are attacked. Occasionally it may succeed in protecting the majority. This does not disturb me. If members of the minority behave in such a fashion that they depart from the minimum standards of debate which we believe are necessary in this country in order to protect the interest of groups—not the interest of the government but the interests of citizens in our society who can be attacked by reason of their group membership—or if members of either minority or majority fall afoul of this new legislation, so be it. The purpose of the legislation will be achieved if we achieve minimal standards of public debate which eliminate the dregs of discussion, discussion which would spew forth hatred at groups.

In my opinion this bill represents a great step forward in the law. It represents a new sophistication which deals with an old problem which we have newly realized, one of great social dimensions. I support the bill. I cannot support the amendment.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to say a few words on Bill C-3. We have before us in this House a bill which is still more tangible evidence of the direction in which we are being led by the present orientated government. We have still more evidence that any legislation presented by this government must steer across the board and encompass, not only the actions of all citizens but thoughts and statements that are a substance of a free society.

I cannot accept the view put forward by the government that Bill C-3 is a necessary piece of legislation. Like any other reasonable, compassionate individual, and as a representative of the people in our Parliament, I put myself on record as being in favour of any effort by any individual or group that would promote good will. I would heartily support any effort to remove from our society the causes of hatred and distrust. Mr. Speaker, I would even go so far as to endorse the spirit of this bill in so far as it makes it a crime to advocate the extinction of any group or segment of our society because of race, colour or for any reason. I do not believe that any group in this country is in danger of extinction by genocide, but I would be willing to erect any reasonable safeguards that would ensure that this could never happen here.

It is a paradox, Mr. Speaker, that the only real requirement for legislation such as Bill C-3 would be to protect the people and the very Parliament in which we sit against encroachments by the government that proposed Bill C-3. Our society is made up of individuals first of all. Any measures designed to protect groups within a society must take into account that the individual is paramount. Our fundamental and basic concern for the individual did not come about by chance or accident. It was bought at great price and sacrifice by all the generations that came before us. It was bought with the efforts and the pains and the ministrations of our founding families. It was bought with the blood of our patriots. And it has been tempered with the wisdom of past generations of great Canadian parliamentarians. In short, Mr. Speaker, the preservation of the sovereignty of the individual might be called our principal reason for being.

I would be the first to agree that society, any society, must have form and body and substance. I would be the first to agree that it would be impossible for any society to survive in an acceptable form if it did not recognize the requirement for order and for protection of the rights of citizens from conspirators and demagogues. However, Mr. Speaker, within the framework of an orderly and lawful society we must also have the greatest possible guarantees, within reasonable bounds, that the rights of the individual will remain the paramount consideration of government. I would add here that the principal task of the opposition in this Parliament is to guard against incursions on individual rights by our present government.

Bill C-3 in its present form is far too restrictive and its wording is open to too many interpretations. This makes the intent of the bill too restrictive and far too punitive. I want to come back to that point later, the part of the bill that lends itself to such a loose interpretation of peace officers and jurists.

I mentioned that the intent of this bill is too restrictive; there are insidious overtones in it which should not be taken lightly. When laws are too restrictive, when laws are too oppressive, it becomes impossible for the individual to fit comfortably into his environment. The best way to encourage contempt for the law is to make laws which show contempt for the individual. In such situations the laws are often disregarded and in time patterns of contempt for the law will develop. When laws are too rigidly imposed and too rigidly enforced, the individual will strive to break out of his oppressive environment and revolutions are born.

I would like to return to what I called the intent of this bill, or at least the intent which is implied in the government's wording of it. The intent of the wording would appear to be a desire on the part of the government to venture into the realm of moral legislation or, more explicitly, of legislating morality. This is a strange turnabout when one recalls the insistence of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) just a year ago that the government was not interested in or concerned with the morals of the individual Canadian. I should like to quote from an editorial which appeared in today's Globe and Mail, as follows:

"The problem of trying to render synonymous law and morality is that we then come down to the question: Whose morality? Whose standards of behaviour? Whose sense of morality? Who is to determine the standard? Who is to attribute blame? Who is to say what is moral and immoral? Who is to decide when moral responsibility exists in terms of freedom of will, and when it has to be diluted in human terms because of environmental or physical causes?... In a pluralistic society there may be different standards, differing attitudes, and the law cannot reflect them all. Public order, in this situation of a pluralistic society, cannot substitute for private conduct. We believe that morality is a matter for private conscience. Criminal law should reflect the public order only."

Hate Propaganda

The speaker? Justice Minister John Turner. The time: a year ago almost to the day. The occasion: the debate on the government's amendments to the Criminal Code liberalizing the law relating to homosexuality and abortion.

I return for a moment to one of the potentially dangerous, if not the most dangerous, aspects of this bill. I am thinking of the aspect of interpretation. The interpretive scope of this bill is almost as broad and sweeping as this government's thirst for power, and when any law is so open to interpretation, when any law is so prone to tax the wisdom of lawyers and jurists alike, it follows that it must be a bad law. Again, Mr. Speaker, I say it is a strange paradox that a government which makes so much of its efforts to reform the laws of this country should take such pains to attempt to pass yet another bad law.

I am not a lawyer. Indeed, the vast majority of Canadians are not lawyers. But we must all deal with this law if it is passed, and it would be helpful, I might even say vital, to the interests of us all if the average Canadian could make some sense out of the wording of the bill as it now reads. Take the word "advocate" which is the very essence of the bill. The dictionary gives a very simple definition of "advocate" in the verb form. I quote from Webster's Collegiate Dictionary: "Advocate—to plead in favour of." The word "support" is added as the synonym. There may also be a legal definition which is the same for all lawyers and jurists; I do not know. But I do know that the word "advocate" is the very root of free expression as we enjoy it today and as we will enjoy it for some time to come if we can only restrain the impulses of the present government.

Advocacy is at the very root of the widespread dissent we tolerate so freely among the young people in our society. Could it be, Mr. Speaker, that the real intent of the bill is hidden behind the government's fears that some group or segment of our civilization needs protection from imminent genocide? Is some group in our society so in danger of being rendered extinct that we must now, today, bring in legislation which will endanger the very fabric of that society, the right to engage in free expression?

Again, I must say I am in favour of any measures which are necessary to protect any group in this country from unfair and unwarranted attacks from demagogues, either from within the country or from without. I am in favour of any measures which may be deemed necessary to curb the distribution and dissemination of hate literature, or to curb public outrage against ethnic groups. But, this bill goes far beyond anything required at the present time to augment the provisions already contained in the Criminal Code to enable our police and courts to deal with such matters.

I should like to quote again, for the record, from this excellent and searching editorial in the Globe and Mail of today. It goes on to say:

Hatred can't be banned absolutely. At least the bill recognizes that. There are so many willing, even eager, to be roused to hatred over innocuous statements that an absolute ban would be terribly unjust. But in trying to define what is socially useful hatred the government has entered a catacomb of confusion. It ignores that social attitudes cannot be ruled by law and that the strength of a democracy rests on the sanity and reasonableness of all informed public.

As a spokesman for the Canadian Civil Liberties Association said when the bill was before the committee: "Many useful utterances in a democratic society incite what could be described, at the very least, as bitter feelings." It is the citizens, not the law, who must cope with these feelings. If they fail, then our society fails. And only the law will be left standing righteous and indignant and alone.

The Minister of Justice defended some of the provisions which are to be found in the bill before us. He said, for instance, that no one could be convicted if he could prove that the statements he made were true. I suggest this would be an extremely difficult thing to do. Then again, it would be very hard for anyone to decide whether an individual was expressing hatred or merely distaste.

The minister told us that those who expressed opinions as part of their religious beliefs are to be protected. But what is a bona fide religion? Does religion include organized religions such as the United Church and the Catholic Church as we understand them, or does it mean religion in the broad sense? Would religion encompass atheism, agnosticism, sorcerism? Or going into the philosophies, does it mean pure communism, pure socialism or pure capitalism? Does it mean anarchism? I suggest that religion is difficult to define.

Who is going to decide what is the public benefit? Again the minister suggests that this would be grounds for a defence. But what is in the public benefit for one person may be entirely different from what is in the public benefit for another. I suggest that these so-called built-in safeguards will not have real effect because they are too vague, too open to misinterpretation and there will be such wide interpretation of them by all who are affected. Therefore, I support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) that this portion of the bill be deleted.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to support the amendment before the House if only because it emasculates the bill, which I think is the only way to treat the bill. Unlike some members who have spoken against the bill and see it as a dangerous, bad bill, I do not feel that strongly about the dangers that are inherent in it. I do not see the bill having any serious effect in regard to limiting freedom of speech in our society. My own feeling is that the courts will lean over backwards to make sure that justice is done and that the benefit of the doubt is given to those people who appear before them. Having said that, a person is not in a position to know how a judge will react or how the courts generally over the years will change.

From experience in society I would not think that freedom of speech would be seriously limited by the bill. My reasons for so saying are different from those of others who have spoken. My reasons are that the bill is really an impossible bill, that it is a foolish bill. It is all too easy to dismiss the problem of hatred by passing legislation. It is all too easy to pretend that we can cope with this serious situation in society simply by passing a piece of legislation after which everybody goes home and feels great, that they have done something about hatred, that they have struck a blow against hatred. This is an illusion, and one nobody should be under.

As a layman looking at the law, I see three general categories. One is the kind of law that everybody agrees must be passed because it is required for the safety of society. We must have laws to deal with murder, to regulate traffic, and so on, because society just cannot exist without them. Such laws meet with almost universal acceptance. This is really their strength; everybody in society agrees that these laws are necessary, and people give up part of their freedom in return for greater freedom as a result of the protection accorded them under these laws.

The second category of laws governs such things as fair employment and discrimination as it concerns housing. These laws are not 100 per cent effective and are frequently evaded. But they do serve a purpose. People in society state how they feel about these things, and to a large extent these laws are enforced, though not completely, because they are definite and specific and apply to particular situations.

We then come to the third kind of laws, laws that try to legislate morality. Experience in society shows that you cannot legislate morality. I see no evidence that we have ever been able to legislate morality. I suggest the law we are discussing here is this kind of law: it attempts to provide that people shall like each other, that people shall not say unkind or hateful things about other people.

Morality is a very difficult subject to deal with. First of all, morality changes from one time to another time. What is considered immoral at one stage may not be considered immoral later. There is also the question of definition. How do you define pornography—though I know we have attempted to? How would you define hatred, when you really get down to it?

My views are very subjective and I must admit are much influenced by my personal experience. My personal experience tells me a number of things. I am not unfamiliar with prejudice. I am not unfamiliar with how shattering hatred in society can be. During the war I had a chance to see the ultimate, fearful results of hatred. I was in Belsen very soon after the camp was taken by the allies, and the visible evidence was there to see. I wonder whether a hate literature bill would have prevented that sort of thing. I do not believe it would. I do not think that any hate literature legislation could have prevented the sort of thing that happened at that time.

On the other hand, I am also very fortunate, in observing how society has developed in my own time, to see how much progress we in Canada have made on the question of tolerance of one group by another. We live in a much changed society today. Our society is much different from the one I knew as a boy. Why is this so? After all, there were no hate literature bills during the last 20 or 30 years, yet these changes have taken place. They have taken place because of the lot of the people; their situation has improved tremendously. The causes of hatred have declined. The sort of things hatred feeds on have started to disappear; and this is really where hatred must be tackled. As a socialist, I feel that this is the only way we can abolish hatred. There cannot be freedom or security for any minority group unless there is freedom and security for everybody in society. But this cannot be rushed or hurried, and it seems to me that passing this sort of legislation is a grave error.

As I said earlier, I do not think this legislation is dangerous, but I do fear complacency. With this legislation on the books, people in society will pretend to themselves that they have done something about the problem when in fact this is not the case; they have simply diverted their eyes from the problem. That is the greatest danger posed by this kind of legislation: it will prevent our coming to grips with the real causes of hatred and dissatisfaction in our society, and this is the real issue.

I know that we live in a very squeamish kind of society. We do not like to see ugliness around us. We apply a cosmetic to ugliness and pretend that it is not there. We try to push it out of the way, and this approach is very dangerous. It is better to see the ugliness fully exposed, where we can deal with it, than shove it off in some corner or paint it over with make-up, powder or rouge so that it looks prettier than it really is.

We do a disservice to our society if we pretend that hatred and discrimination do not exist. My plea is for realism and for acknowledgement that these difficulties are still with us and have to be dealt with. I do not want to see anything done that will obscure the real diseases of our society. I am not interested in making people feeling more confortable. I want them to feel uncomfortable; I want them to be confronted by and to see this ugliness, rather than have it hidden. I am very worried that we will not get rid of hate literature simply by passing this legislation. What we will do is make it more subtle and perhaps more pallatable. Maybe we will stop it here and there and people will not be so terribly offended. But nothing really will be solved by doing this.

I think there is an increasing danger that the indefinable thing that we may call tradition or good will, which does not depend on the law but is part of our society—sympathy, if you will—will be lost to those suffering from hatred and will tend to support those disseminating hatred under the false notion that they are defending freedom of speech and the right of even the most vile minorities to be heard. There is this danger.

I want to speak from personal experience. I have been through numerous political campaigns. I do not think I have ever been in a political campaign where hate literature in one form or another was not used against me. Always my party worker would come to me with a piece of literature or a story that was being spread around and say, "We have to bash this on the head and wade right into it. We have to stop it." I have always said, "No, because you cannot stop it." They have asked, "What is going to happen?" and I have always replied, "If people want to believe this sort of nonsense, this kind of junk, this scurrilous stuff being spread around, nothing you or I can do will make any difference. We have only one hope, that the people will see it for what it is. If they do not see it for what it is, we are lost anyway and what do you accomplish?" Either there is an element of decency, fair-mindedness and intelligence in society, or the ball game is lost anyway. You have to count on that. This approach has always worked and the element of decency and intelligence has been there.

In the last campaign, in 1968, all of us were aware of the kind of hate literature that was being circulated against the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). It was dreadful stuff. On the whole I think it helped to get him elected. I know that during the course of the campaign my party workers came to me with this literature and asked whether I was going to let these things be said, even though they were being said about an opponent. They would ask if I was going to take advantage of the situation. I repeatedly, during my campaign, had to divert from my own rather urgent need to consolidate my position and take a stand against hate literature because it offended the decency and intelligence of my people. We wanted to beat the opponent, but we did not want to beat him that way. The Prime Minister probably gained a measure of sympathy that he would not have gained had this literature not been spread around.

What do we gain by banning the worst forms of ugliness contained in such literature? We feel a little more comfortable—but is it worth it? Isn't it better to have it where you can see it and deal with it, where you can appeal to the intelligence of people? You can ask whether they are going to listen to this kind of stuff. You can ask whether it is not offensive to them. I would rather do it that way, and I think in the long run that is the way to do it.

I appreciate the feelings of people who have been discriminated against, particularly those who were subjected to the extreme form of discrimination found in concentration camps. You cannot expect them to be politically objective, perhaps the way I am trying to be at this moment, about hate literature. When they see something like this they are reminded that it is not just an occurrence during an election campaign; it is an indication that their lives may be in danger. It is understandable that they would press the government and society to afford them some protection which would relieve them of the haunting fear of this recurring menace.

The question that must be asked is. Do we have to succumb to that plea, as legitimate as their fears may be? In some ways those who are looking for protection from hate literature may find that their insecurity is heightened as a result of the passage of this bill. Every nut, every crackpot and every lunatic will now have the opportunity of testing this legislation in court. They will seek prosecution so they can have their day in court. The type of person who is disposed of by the newspapers and the other news media have been discounted for what they are. They will now have the sympathy of the editorial pages. I would add that the editorial pages are unwisely and unnecessarily sympathetic, but that is the way of editorial pages. Every one of these people will now be able to be part of a cause célèbre. If a court should sentence them to jail, they will come out martyrs. This will give them a status they do not deserve. It will give them a position to which they are not entitled. There is some danger in this approach and we have to be very concerned about it.

I made these brief remarks because I felt someone like myself should make them. I conclude by saying that in the final analysis the safety of minorities depends upon the good sense and the security of our whole society. You cannot protect minorities unless you change society and protect all of society.

Mr. H. E. Stafford (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I shall speak but briefly on Bill C-3, if only to put on record that basically I consider it an unnecessary piece of legislation. I know of no minority group that is prejudiced by our social system as it exists today. I know of no threat to any minority group in our nation. If such existed I could readily understand the need for the passage of such legislation.

In a free society such as ours we can do anything that the law does not make illegal. Even the minister has not demonstrated the need for such legislation. He did say that the legislation would show the world our good intentions. I find it very unusual that we have to amend the Criminal Code to show the world that we have such intentions. It is idle to suggest that this legislation will prevent the commission of such crimes in the future. The existence of the legislation may do more harm than good in drawing attention to the possible existence of such crimes in our free society.

The great test of this legislation will come, say, in ten years from now. If one looks back over such a period and finds no convictions, so much the better. But it will more than anything else show the lack of need of such legislation at this time. It is also difficult to understand the Attorney General being appointed the watchdog of this legislation any more than in respect of the other sections of the Criminal Code. Even though I see no need for such legislation at this time, the principle behind it is to be commended. I trust the need to use it never arises. At this time when more important problems face the country I would think that the last two days could have been better spent.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to become involved in what I believe to be a very significant piece of legislation. In the first instance I wish to say I reject the amendment put forward by my own colleague. In keeping with my conscience, it would nullify the principle of the bill. The bill strikes at that which is of extreme importance, that is, the incitement or promotion of hatred. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I accept the bill in its entirety. I do not find it offensive, untimely or particularly dangerous.

I am not here to become involved in the niceties of the legal matters in respect of this bill, because I believe sincerely that all legislation no matter whether it stems from this House or from any other place is subject to comment regarding its workability. For some time I was a member of the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. The members of the committee were sincerely concerned with the bill in the first place, as I was and still am, and attempted to make to that bill the amendments they believed were necessary in order to make it workable.

If this bill should pass, of course it will be for the courts to give their judicial interpretation of a matter to which we have given deep and sensible deliberation. I am very concerned about the bill, but at the same time I appreciate the varied views of my colleagues. It seems to me there has been one theme running through the entire debate. Everyone seems to be for the principle of the bill—but! This "but" which continually came before me really had me concerned, because I cannot see how one can be so emphatic about being for the principle of the bill and then say "but".

I do not know whether the bill is perfect. Perhaps it is not perfect. Maybe it is contrary to the thinking of some of us. It may, on the other hand, be shocking. We as Canadians and parliamentarians must discuss this type of legislation. Perhaps this legislation would not have been necessary had we followed, as I indicated in my maiden speech, the advice of one Adele Florence Corey. I should like to quote from Hansard of September 20, 1968—but remember that when I first spoke in this House I was more nervous than I am now. As recorded at page 291 of Hansard for September 20, 1968, I mentioned what this woman had said a long time ago. I said:

> She said that men should be judged not by the colour of their skin nor by the way they fight, love or sin, nor by the gods they serve or vintage they drink, but by the quality of the thoughts they think.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: If mankind were prepared to accept that very simple principle, we would not have my friend stating earlier that in his wisdom he thinks we are wasting time because we would not have to be discussing this bill. But, Mr. Speaker, some people will not accept the principle I have just enunciated. It is not within their thinking. It is not within their moral fibre to accept that principle. I do not know whether there are many faults in this bill, but with all its alleged faults and with all the shortcomings that were expressed this evening and yesterday I sincerely state that it is a step in the right direction. It offers hope to the many people who have long suffered, the many people who have long been humiliated, and the many people who have long been ignored.

This bill offers hope in that it is an indication that someone is aware of the problem that actually exists, that someone is aware that inciting hatred toward identifiable groups is unacceptable. I ask this simple question: Is it good just to have this type of reasoning? We are concerned about a particular condition and we say it is unacceptable. Is this in keeping with our democratic principles? I suggest that what we are now doing, and have been doing for the past two days is good and is in keeping with the principles of democracy. Hate as expressed by some Canadians in our midst concerns me, and it concerned the Cohen committee. I should like to read from pages 25 and 24 of the report of the special committee:

> In the committee's view the "hate" situation in Canada, although not alarming, clearly is serious enough to require action. It is far better for Canadians to come to grips with this problem now, before it attains unmanageable proportions, rather than deal with it at some future date in an atmosphere of urgency, of fear and perhaps even of crisis. The Canadian community has a duty, not merely the right, to protect itself from the corrosive effects of propaganda that tends to undermine the confidence that various groups in a multicultural society must have in each other. The committee therefore concludes that action by government is necessary—

Let me revert to page 24:

> The number of organizations involved and the numbers of persons hurt is no test of the issue: the arithmetic of a free society will not be satisfied with oversimplified statistics demonstrating that few are casting stones and not many are receiving hurts. What matters is that incipient malevolence and violence, all of which are inherent in "hate" activity, deserves national attention.

Not local, but national attention.

> However small the actors may be in number, the individuals and groups promoting hate in Canada constitute "a clear and present danger" to the functioning of a democratic society. For in times of social stress such "hate" could mushroom into a real and monstrous threat to our way of life.

Therefore, the committee was concerned—a committee set up by Parliament. Hence this bill. Our fathers and our grandfathers, responsible as they were in their day, were also irresponsible. They were irresponsible for projecting and being preoccupied with notions of their fellowman, all based on myths—the Jew, the black man, people of colour and those whose names ended in "i" or "o". That was their way of life, Mr. Speaker. That was how things were done then. But it is changed now. Those types of attitudes are no longer acceptable. I believe that the thinking Canadian has been awakened by the truths slashing away at the myths, truths about hate, and he has gathered this information from the media in all forms. Because, Mr. Speaker, it is my considered opinion that hate disrupts our social, economic and political orders and structures and, most important, it can be extremely expensive. That, I know, has been brought home to us on many occasions in the past few years.

I believe the vast majority of Canadians will accept the principle of this bill, as many members here do, except when they say "but". The Canadian people will accept the principle of this bill notwithstanding the editorials and the lobbies. There is in Canada now a concerned generation that is aware of attitudes that can lead to no good as far as the ultimate destiny of Canada is concerned.

Let me refer again to the Cohen committee report, page 67:

> The history of law and opinion as concurrent developments is replete with instances, as A. V. Dicey long ago indicated, not only where law reflected the state of opinion but where a fluid opinion was itself crystallized by law. This generation of Canadians is more sensitive to the dangers of prejudice and vicious utterances than ever before. Such public opinion, therefore, should now be prepared to crystallize these sensitivities, fears and doubts into positive statements of self-protecting policy—namely statements of law.

Statements of law, Mr. Speaker! This bill is not the first of its type. In Ontario we have the Ontario Human Rights Code, a codification of all acts on discrimination dating back to 1944, passed in code form in 1962 and administered by the Ontario Human Rights Commission. Let me read the preamble of the Ontario Human Rights Code, which I think all Canadians are interested in and in which they should be interested:

> Whereas recognition of the inherent dignity and the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world and is in accord with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights as proclaimed by the United Nations;
> And whereas it is public policy in Ontario that every person is free and equal in dignity and rights without regard to race, creed, colour, nationality, ancestry or place of origin—

Such a preamble is equally applicable to the nation, Mr. Speaker. We have other such acts in our great land. This is not the first time an act has come before parliamentarians that had to do with conduct and attitudes. We have federal legislation such as the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act. Listen to a list of the provinces that are involved with all sorts and types of human rights legislation: Alberta, British Columbia, Manitoba, Nova Scotia, Ontario, Prince Edward Island and Saskatchewan.

In the past two days we have been discussing guidelines for human behaviour as it affects man. This bill points out that which is unacceptable to the Canadian way of life. It is not a code for love. That is the red herring that is always thrown into this type of argument, that you cannot legislate love. No one wants anyone else to love them when it comes to this type of legislation. It is a code directed towards conduct, towards overt action. I respectfully state that the greatest force that should exist today is man's relentless pursuit of the attainment of better human relations between all peoples.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: But how do you do it, Mr. Speaker? It has been said that you start in the home. Well, how long have we heard this? Mom is supposed to teach junior to respect his fellow friend. Then when you cannot get it through the home, they tell you to go to the church. I do not want to get into the area of the church, but they say, "Go to church. The church will help you." When that fails they say we are supposed to have group discussions. When that fails then they say, "Leave it to education." I have heard all these things running through the debate all afternoon. Then, Mr. Speaker, last but not least we come to legislation. When all else fails with the good intentions of mankind and with the background man professes to have in Christian love and brotherly love, and that cannot arrive at the necessary solutions, I respectfully state it is my public duty as a parliamentarian to start thinking about legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: That is why, Mr. Speaker, I do not know who is for this bill on the outside, but I am not particularly worried. I am not thinking of it as a politician, as a Progressive Conservative, or as a Liberal in the way that we have heard some hon. members talk. I am thinking about this problem as a man whose conscience is being affected, as a man who has some awareness of what it means to be a member of a minority group.

You cannot legislate love, nor can you legislate against prejudice. But, Mr. Speaker, surely you can legislate against the overt act of discrimination. I do not know whether this bill will work, but I hope it will. It can work in this area, in that it is a form of education. But it is a form of education the hard way. We could not get it the easy way, so we had to do it the hard way.

In the committee I listened to a discussion on the possibility of this bill backfiring on those it is attempting to protect. I got into the debate, into the questioning on that matter, because if this was a fact I did not want any part of the bill. I know the interaction, that is becoming more and more a part of our way of life, by those who are attempting to show society the wrongs that they have been affected by over the years. But I was advised, Mr. Speaker, that the minority striving for recognition, proclaiming their desire to become a real force in the mainstream of Canadian life rather than accepting misery in their insignificant tributaries, would be protected by the defences that were eventually written into the bill. But I believe, too, that the defences are also open to those who proclaim that freedom of speech is being affected. Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that I believe—this is just my considered opinion—the defences therein equally can protect freedom of speech. All I know is that when you start talking about freedom of speech and freedom of the press, sooner or later the dignity of man, the value of man, transcends freedom of speech and these matters must be protected by society.

I do not know what the experience of my colleagues who speak about Bill C-3 has been, but I reflect on the name-calling, the frustrations, the rejections, the spite and the hate that have occurred in my life. I have been fortunate, but let me tell you that there are a lot of people not so fortunate. I do not want to point to any particular province but it does not take much imagination to think of the east. I know a little about the black man's position because I am black and proud of it. He has been abused; he has been confused.

Mr. Speaker, what does a mother say to her child who comes running home crying because his skin is black, or cries when he goes to bed at night because he is a member of a minority group? Does she tell him that freedom of speech is paramount? What does a father say to his family when, as a result of hatred and contempt, he cannot bring home bread in order to sustain life? I could go on and on, Mr. Speaker, with illustrations that would frighten a lot of people in terms of what hatred can mean, and how frustration can lead the people affected by it to believe that they are inferior and have no rights within society because those who are bigoted use hate propaganda to the extent that a man becomes possessed and believes it to be true.

What we are doing here is creating an atmosphere not out of crisis but out of a new awareness of what hatred could do to Canada. I should like to read from the Ontario Human Rights Code something which illustrates what I mean by creating an atmosphere. This was printed in 1967, and God knows it is applicable in 1970! On the back of the book is this statement:

> The aim of Ontario's Human Rights Code is to create at the community level a climate of understanding and mutual respect, in which all our people of whatever racial, religious or cultural background—new Canadian no less than native born—will be made to feel that all are equal in dignity and rights, that each is a part of the whole Canadian community, and that each has a rich contribution to make to the development and well being of our province and nation. Few will disagree that this is a prerequisite for the building of a truly healthy Canadianism.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I say that in my humble opinion Bill C-3 is a prerequisite of this mood, leading to a truly healthy Canadianism.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, in view of the speeches made today I think it a great pity that the rather disturbed young man who was in the gallery yesterday did not have the opportunity of hearing them. There have been many fine speeches on both sides of the House which have completely crossed party lines. Had he heard them, he might have had a different view of the purpose of this institution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nesbitt: I might add that I hope the press gives the same prominence to some of the speeches made today as it did to the unfortunate and ill-informed remarks of that young man yesterday.

I think it is quite clear that there is not any member of this House in any party who does not agree with the principles and objectives of this bill. The only disagreement is on the means of attaining these ends. The objections seem to lie largely in one of the many sections of the bill, namely section 267A subsections 1, 2 and 3.

In this respect I think the bill is badly drafted because it not only attains the objectives that we all have in mind, but a few that were not intended, as has been ably pointed out by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) and other members on both sides of the House. This is what really concerns the members and it is the reason for the debate continuing as long as it has. Some of us are very much afraid that not only will the commendable and excellent objectives pointed out by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) be attained, but others less desirable will also be attained. We are always accused of wasting the time of the House by repeating arguments. I do not want to be guilty of that, although I feel that section 267A may create situations never contemplated when the bill was drafted.

I have another reason for wanting to speak on this bill. Other members have not hesitated to blow their own horns in this debate, so I should not hesitate to say that several years ago I was one of the first members to bring this matter before the House of Commons in a private bill. Other members, some of whom are still here, also brought it before the House. Apparently the government of the day did take some notice of members with private bills, the Cohen commission was established and today we have this bill before us.

I should like to deal in some detail with the bill which I introduced at that time. It might be helpful if the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) would take some notice of it. He never seems to take much notice of suggestions, but perhaps he would this time. The second time I put my private bill on the Order Paper it was Bill C-164 of the first session of the twenty seventh Parliament and appeared on April 4, 1966. I had consulted the legal adviser of this House, a gentleman with wide legal knowledge, Dr. Ollivier. I had suggested putting in a bill all by itself, but he advised me to present it as an amendment to the Criminal Code. The bill that I presented at that time had two clauses. They are very brief and I should like to put them on the record because I think they may be very helpful in this debate. The first clause reads as follows:

• (9:10 p.m.)

Subsection (1) of section 248 of the Criminal Code is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

'248.(1) A defamatory libel is matter published, without lawful justification or excuse, that is likely to injure the reputation of any person by exposing him to hatred, contempt or ridicule, or that is designed to insult the person of or concerning whom it is published or that is likely to injure the reputation of any group of persons by exposing them as a group to hatred, contempt or ridicule by reason of their racial or national origin, colour, or religion, or that is designed to insult any group of persons by reason of their racial or national origin, colour, or religion.'

The explanatory note to the bill at that time was as follows:

This bill proposes to enlarge the Criminal Code definition of a defamatory libel, to include 'hate literature'. Because such literature is, in many cases, the expression of a sick mind, the bill further proposes that any person charged or convicted of publishing such a libel shall be placed under mental observation to determine whether he is mentally ill.

Before I read the second clause of the bill I should like particularly to note the remarks made this evening by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) who, along with other hon. members, took very much the same view I have taken, that those who promote hate literature and defamatory group libel are sick people and ought properly to be treated as such. At the time I introduced the bill originally, a series of rather indecorous events had taken place in the city of Toronto. A young man—I will not dignify his name by repeating it in this House—was creating racial disturbances. His attacks were aimed against the Hebrew people particularly in the city of Toronto. Because the authorities were using various methods in an attempt to prevent this, the lad became something of a martyr with some of the low-minded, the sick-minded and the ignorant. He became the object of praise and a leader, just as was Adolph Hitler at one time in Nazi Germany, as some can well remember. I think the hon. member for Waterloo put it very well: we do not want to make martyrs of these kinds of people.

Some years ago I had the opportunity, as had the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hogarth), of being a Crown attorney. I well remember an incorrigible young man who kept appearing in the police court in my area. He was a repeater, and was charged with every kind of petty, and sometimes more serious offence. No one knew how to deal with him. He was sent to reformatory and came back a hero. His time inside his friends thought of as you think of chevrons on a sleeve. Every time he went to prison he attained a sort of good conduct stripe as far as his buddies were concerned.

After a little thought it was decided he would not be such a popular hero if he were treated as if he were ill and sent to the Ontario Hospital for observation. The strange thing is this: it seems that when people come out of that institution, to which they are sent when their behaviour is such that they may be retained as a guest for some time, they come out not as heroes but as objects of ridicule. That is exactly what happened in this case. My experience in this matter rather prompted the drafting of the second clause in the bill I presented at that time. It reads as follows:

The said act is amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 251 thereof, the following:

'251A. Where a defendant is alleged to have published a libel defamatory of a group of persons within the meaning of subsection (1) of section 248, the court, judge, justice or magistrate may at any stage of the proceedings remand the defendant, by order in writing, to such custody as the court, judge, justice or magistrate directs for observation for a period not exceeding thirty days to determine whether the defendant is mentally ill; and where the defendant is not so remanded and is found guilty, the court, judge, justice or magistrate shall so remand the defendant before sentence.

I think that if a provision such as this had been included in the present hate literature bill there would be no danger of making heroes out of hate peddlers. There would be no danger of giving these people a lot of publicity if they were sent for a mental examination, which is what they ought to have. They would not come out of hospital and be heroes for the drug store-corner gang any longer; they would be objects of ridicule and contempt. To make the punishment fit the crime, I can think of nothing better for them. Believe me, Mr. Speaker, in my rather brief experience I have found this sort of thing works.

I know other hon. members wish to speak, and I do not wish to take up more time than is necessary. I think new section 267A, subsections 1, 2 and 3, may very well defeat the purpose of the bill. I think those subsections will accomplish a number of purposes we have in mind but, as I have already said, they may accomplish other much less desirable purposes.

This debate has crossed party lines. It is not becoming a party issue in this House. The cabinet may not think so, but the backbenchers on all sides of the House do. I think the Minister of Justice and his advisers might very well withdraw the bill temporarily, look at its drafting, pay attention to some of the suggestions which have been made in this House, and perhaps consider redrafting this clause so as to accomplish the purposes of the bill without leaving the loopholes which have been pointed out, which might endanger free speech and all the other things we have heard about. I hope the government does this.

One cannot impute motives to the bill, and very properly so, because no one really knows what is going on inside somebody else's brain. If the government refuses to pay attention to the suggestions made here, one can only assume that the reason for introducing the bill is that suggested by one hon. member, that it is presented largely for political purposes. It was given a great deal of window-dressing, trumpeting and fanfare, but it is clear that the same objectives could have been achieved by a simple amendment to the Criminal Code. The Minister of Justice is always telling us he wants to make further amendments to that document. If he had done just that in a simple way, without all these trappings, I think everyone would have appreciated it very much more and the amendment could have accomplished these ends.

I have found one thing a little unconvincing in the remarks of the Minister of Justice and one or two other hon. members of the House. When the Criminal Code amendments were before the House and we were considering controversial matters such as abortion, homosexuality and other things, there were many high-flown speeches saying that you cannot legislate morals and that morality does not come under the criminal law. That was how some talked out of one side of their mouths at that time.

Yesterday and today we heard similar arguments about the purposes of this legislation, but exactly the reverse arguments were used, namely, that morality does come under the criminal law, that this bill may point the way to how people should behave, that it may give guidelines to human conduct and all the rest of it. I find this peculiar double-standard of reasoning very hard to take. I am one member of this House who does not think morality can be legislated. I have never thought so from the first day I entered law school and had the benefit of the opinions of some eminent people in that regard, including the former Chief Justice who has just retired.

I find it difficult to understand why people with considerable experience in the legal profession argue that morality can be legislated on one occasion and not on another. It is for this reason I find some of the arguments put forward in favour of the bill a little difficult to comprehend.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say I am in favour of the principle of the bill. I think every hon. member in this House is in favour of it. However, I think the two sections to which I have referred should be redrafted. While I agree they may well accomplish the purposes of this bill, I fear they may also accomplish other objectionable purposes and open the door to those with evil intent who would twist the law for their own evil purposes, as we have often seen done in this country and in many other places. As I have said, I hope the Minister of Justice will pay attention to the many fine arguments put forward from both sides of the House.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, hate propaganda is an extremely important subject. I am one who believes that you cannot fight hatred with hatred. That may sound strange coming from a man who spent most of life enforcing laws, some of them fierce but most of them humane. Although I am not particularly proud of a part of my life, I would do it again. I refer to the seven years I spent fighting the nazi regime in Germany. If we are to believe all that we hear, the nazi regime in Germany committed one of the most savage acts of race annihilation in modern times. I suppose if by legislation we were able to prevent that type of thing, we would be unanimous in supporting such legislation.

I do not think that any legislation can put down hatred—on the contrary. I do not think harsh laws reduce hatred. It is strange that in this Parliament when we are liberalizing the law pretty well across the board, we are rushing into a permissive society. In some circles it is no longer thought evil to peddle drugs to our young people. It is certainly not considered evil to partake of them. It is strange that we should suddenly find it necessary to put something into the Criminal Code which has been tolerated for a thousand years. In fact, it has been more than tolerated: it was fought for with all the vigour which it was possible to produce by the fearless island people and their descendants, particularly with respect to our law and parliamentary institution.

I think it is very dangerous to restrict freedom of speech, no matter how violent speech is, because there is a tremendous difference between violence spoken and violence acted. Sometimes I think violence spoken is a safety valve. Until recently in England freedom reached unprecedented heights at Hyde Park. I have stood in Hyde Park on a Sunday afternoon and listened to the speakers. Perhaps they were disturbed, perhaps not. Some very notable people spoke in Hyde Park, including Bernard Shaw. I heard someone say that the Queen should be eliminated from British politics. It was strange to hear this 25 years ago in Hyde Park. The English bobby walked up and down with his club. Although the fellow who was speaking was heckled, he was quite free to speak his mind. After a while he folded up the little stool on which he was standing, put it in his Cadillac or Rolls Royce and drove off.

Is there any place in the world where freedom is practised more than it is in Canada? I think not. One of the reasons is that we have an inherent desire for freedom and fair play. Whether we admit it or not, it is largely inherited and taught to us by those same island people, some of whom were my ancestors. My mother was born in Indian territory. She had only Indian children to play with. My grandparents and parents, aunts and uncles learned to know these first citizens of Canada well. They learned to love them and they passed that love on to me. In my family circle race tolerance is not discussed, it is practised. As far as I know, I am welcome in every Indian home in Canada and every Indian and Eskimo in Canada is welcome in my home. This is the only basis for a greater understanding of these people and their understanding of us.

My former leader, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) did not try in the Bill of Rights to codify in detail the rights of people to speak. He took it for granted that we have the right to speak. I agree. Those who speak with prejudice and hatred in their hearts are more to be pitied than a homosexual, because a homosexual does not have any control. Ignorance can be controlled. We can learn to know the people who live in our country. If we learn to know them, we will learn to love them. No statute, no matter how fierce or wise, can substitute for human understanding and human love.

I mentioned that I was a soldier. I know that in my human frailty I can be whipped up into a frenzy of patriotism, and I suppose I would fight again in defence of my home and my country. But I realize that most war is absolutely futile because it is based on hatred. As Nurse Cavell said when she was being led away to be shot for helping to free Canadian soldiers and send them back to the rich life here, "Patriotism is not enough". It was not until I reached the wrong side of 50 that I fully realized what she meant. Indeed, patriotism is not enough.

Being a soldier under arms is not enough. Being an officer of the law is not enough, whether you pound a beat or whether you sit on the Supreme Court of Canada, unless you carry into your private life, into your politics and into your relationships from Halifax to Vancouver a real sense of brotherhood based on love and understanding which can only come from meeting with people, working with them, serving with them and trying to know them better.

Sometimes the greatest heroes are not those who walk into machine-gun fire. Equal courage is shown by people of ethnic origin, many of whom I have had the pleasure of living with in Canada, who have endured insults from early childhood to manhood, enduring it in their home lives as well as in their public lives but showing by their tolerance that they are a good deal bigger than those who throw ignorant epithets at them. Many of these people—some of them have sat in this House—feel there is no need to codify something which warms their hearts every time they look at a flagpole and see our flag, whether it is the new one or the one they first learned to love and trust, the one that flew over our ports and over the ships which brought them here.

If I thought for one moment that passing a statute would reduce hatred in the slightest degree, I would vote for it. If I thought that any amendment to this proposed statute would reduce ill feeling among Canadians, I would vote for it. This is a question which crosses party lines: it does in my case. I am under no pressure whatever from my party to do anything but vote according to my conscience, as I intend to do, and I hope this is the feeling throughout the House. I just cannot give my support to what is second best—to trying to accomplish by laws, whether fierce or innocuous, when the alternative is to lead in a positive way along the path to friendship and better understanding.

As is often the case, we do not have a clearcut decision to make. We are sometimes offered a package deal and we are told it is not political sense to vote one way or another. I do not believe most members are attacking this problem in that manner. I do not believe this statute would ever be invoked by a government or by the law enforcement officers if they put their priorities into proper perspective. If there are people walking about who feel genocide is acceptable in the slightest degree, I claim they are sick; they need attention. This may not mean locking them up in institutions or putting the tag of mental instability upon them. It is a tag of ignorance. They, perhaps more than the victims of their evil propaganda, require our sympathy.

As far as I can see, nothing is to be gained by turning from hatred on the one side or spending time and trouble in arming ourselves to fight with imprisonment, fines and more hatred the very thing we should be attempting to attack with a great more understanding and wisdom than perhaps we now possess. So often it appears easier for us to grasp a weapon, whether it is the reeking tube or the iron shard, to settle our differences than to try once more by friendship and understanding to get through to the people we despise the most.

I find it hard not to hate people who preach race hatred, but as soon as I fall into that trap I am in a bottomless bog with them, and when one fights them on that ground there is no way of doing it except by getting down in the bog and wallowing there. Throughout recorded history men have resorted to violence. And how far have they got? With all our modern technologies, with all our provision for free education, with all our permissiveness to young people, allowing them to expand their personalities and to alleviate their pain with various drugs, with all our concern for family planning and better nutrition, with all the wonderful advances we have made in transportation, how much closer are we to the brotherhood of man?

These are matters we should think about. Instead of new or antiquated laws to bolster up what is perhaps an out-of-date Criminal Code, one we seem to think is inadequate in most of its aspects, we attempt in this session of Parliament—one that is becoming very liberal in many ways—by imposing penalties on people who are ignorant, undeveloped, who do not appear to have the ability to grow up mentally, politically, and certainly spiritually, to find the answer to this age old problem of brotherhood. I do not think this approach will work. I think I have the right to speak because I am nearing the age of 60, and if I have learned anything in my 60 years it is that violence begets violence, that hatred begets hatred, that misunderstanding begets misunderstanding.

In all the years I tried to enforce the Criminal Code of Canada and to make the world free for democracy, I saw more good accomplished by a few kind acts, by putting out the hand of friendship, by using a little human understanding, than all that the brass buttons, red coats and the arsenals of democracy in the western world could produce by force or law.

Although I do not think our present approach will work, I think the other approach will. In this regard I appeal to the press. This is one area in which the press can well take a hand and help us. If a man is so bigoted as to advocate racial discrimination, superiority of colour and skill, superiority of ethnic origin, he should be ridiculed. There is nothing particularly cruel about that sort of ridicule.

I feel sorry for such a person if he is mentally undeveloped. I feel sorry for him if he has come from a home where there was no love. I feel sorry for him if his free education in a modern school has left him high and dry so that he is an unfeeling wretch. This person enters a free society—as free as we can make it—where there is opportunity for people of all ethnic origins, certainly as far as I know. I beg the media to ridicule such a person, and if he is mentally sick I hope we can send him to the appropriate doctor.

It would be wasting the time of the courts to bring persons of mature years before the bench in order to tell them their basic responsibilities as Canadian citizens; to tell them they do not appreciate what freedom really is, that they do not understand what it is to be able to travel in a country such as ours where people do not have to lock their doors at night. This is a country where, by and large, both the person and his property are sacred.

I appeal to the press, to the television medium and writers of plays and singers of songs to ridicule these people. Seven years of fighting them with guns has not seemed to do much good. I do not think the violence we have seen during the last 50 years has moved us one inch closer to the brotherhood of man. But men like Martin Luther King have done so. If we needed any further proof that the black man is our equal or our superior, where is there a man today who can replace Martin Luther King?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I am afraid his time has expired unless he has unanimous consent to continue.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could not have ended on a better note.

Mr. D. Gordon Blair (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my reason for participating in this debate is that four or five years ago I was concerned in proceedings conducted under the Post Office Act leading to the issuance of a prohibitory order against the circulation in this country of what was called scurrilous literature. These proceedings are referred to in the report of the Special Committee on Hate Propaganda, and more particularly at pages 47 to 50.

When I first approached this subject I was like many of the writers of editorials in our newspapers who have been giving us advice in the past few days. I thought that any effort by the state or by the criminal process to control what might be considered to be the expression of political opinion was likely to be harmful to us all. But as a result of my involvement in these proceedings I was for a considerable period of time exposed to the hideous subculture of hate—hate as expressed in the outpourings of the authors of the publications that we had to consider and which were made public by an organization called the National States Rights Party. I was also exposed to the full force and vigour of the hideous hatred of the representatives of this party in Canada.

The result of this experience was to convince me that people who offered documents of this kind and who spoke opinions of this kind were not entitled to the protection of the ordinary democratic rules and principles; that these people, at least in my opinion, were enemies of a free society and that it was in the public interest that something should be done to control what they were trying to say or trying to publish.

We are now faced with this new and important proposal, and no one can say that it has not been well considered. It has been considered by an important committee which held public hearings, which published a report that has been before the public for three or four years. As we all know, a bill in a form somewhat similar to the one presented to us now was considered for two or three years by Their Honours in the other place. This bill—I speak now as a member of the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee—received very careful consideration in committee and, I would make so bold as to say, has been improved as a result of the discussion held and suggestions made there.

We are faced with a proposal in an amendment moved by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) which would have the effect of deleting from this bill its two most important provisions, those which prohibit public incitement of hatred and permit the authorities to impound, seize and otherwise prevent the circulation of written material expressing hatred. I find it very difficult to believe that people who have read this bill carefully could think it could be directed at the innocent and the honest expression of free political opinion. The opening words of proposed Section 267B are as follows:

> Every one who, by communicating statements in any public place, incites hatred against any identifiable group, where such incitement is likely to lead to a breach of the peace, is guilty of—

It goes on to say that certain defences are provided, such as the defence of truth, the defence of expressing arguments which are in the public interest, and the defence of expressing arguments which are made in good faith. I have risen to speak in this debate simply because, as I said earlier, I have had first-hand exposure to written hatred, to personal hatred and to the application of the judicial or semi-judicial process to it.

I am not troubled at all by the wording of this bill. I do not have the same difficulty that has been expressed by other members about the various defences because, for what my experience is worth, the wording is not very difficult and it certainly would not be very difficult for the judiciary of this country to deal effectively with people charged under these provisions and to consider such defences as truth, good faith and the expression of argument made in the public interest. These are things experienced judges can easily ascertain, assess and apply in the circumstances presented to them. In the proceedings with which I was connected all these defences were raised, yet it was not difficult for the expert tribunal which considered the matter to put them in proper perspective and find that they did not apply.

I therefore welcome the opportunity to support the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) and others who have said that this kind of legislation can be enacted in good heart by this House. It is important for Parliament to set a standard, and the prohibition of hatred expressed in an odious and terrible way is as important to this Parliament as our Criminal Code provisions against blasphemy, criminal libel and seditious utterances. For these reasons I urge the House to reject the amendment of the hon. member for Calgary North and to support the bill.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, because it is almost ten o'clock and any remarks I make at this time will barely introduce my speech, I suggest we call it ten o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Blair.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, speaking on behalf of the Government House Leader, we intend—despite a previous announcement, and having talked to other House leaders—to continue tomorrow with the debate at the report stage of Bill C-3, dealing with hate literature. If tomorrow the report stage is concluded, the House may want to consider waiving the rules and proceeding with third reading of the bill.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

SOCIAL SECURITY—INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF WHITE PAPER

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, one of the highlights in the Speech from the Throne at the opening of this session—and it will be found at page 2 of Hansard for Thursday, October 23, 1969—was the declaration that a white paper on social security would be presented to Parliament during the course of this session.

I may remind the House that in the previous session there had come to our knowledge the fact that a document known as the Willard report was being prepared. I expressed the hope that that report might be tabled during that session of Parliament, and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) held out the hope that that might be done. However, it now appears that the government has no intention of making public the Willard report. Rather, the government has fallen back to its promise to make public its own white paper on social security which presumably will be based on its study of the Willard report.

As I have already said, the commitment to table the white paper in the course of this session was one of the promises in the Speech from the Throne, and hon. members will not be surprised if I say I have been asking for it just about every month since this session began. The first occasion was on Monday, October 27, 1969, as recorded at page 95 of Hansard when I asked again about the Willard report only to be told that we could not count on seeing it, but I was reminded that there would be a white paper on social security and I quote these words from the Minister of National Health and Welfare:

—which will be brought before Parliament in the course of the next few months.

As I say, that was on October 27, 1969. I will not take the time of the House or take my own time to read all the questions I have asked during the last several months about this, but if I did they would tell the story of a receding hope. A long time ago we were to get the Willard report; then it was changed to the white paper; we were going to get a white paper soon; we were going to get it during the course of the session; we were going to get it within a few months, for after all it was a highlight of the Throne Speech. As the months have gone on, the hope that we would see that white paper in time for anything to be done on the basis of it during the course of this session seems to be disappearing.

The last occasion I questioned about this was on Wednesday, March 25, 1970, as recorded in Hansard at page 5466. On that day I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare if we could look forward to the tabling of the white paper on social security when we came back after the Easter recess. The minister's answer was in these words:

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the white paper will be ready by the time the hon. member indicated.

My colleague the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) came in with a supplementary question, asking on what date we would get the white paper. The minister's reply to her was as follows:

The only assurance I can give, Mr. Speaker, is that it will be ready before the end of this session.

Then I put this supplementary question:

Will it be in time for any action to be taken on it during this session?

To that the minister replied:

I do not believe so, Mr. Speaker.

Sir, I contend that is a very sad reflection of the government's position with regard to the old age pensioners and other people in this country who look for progress in the field of social security. This document, the white paper, was held out to us in the Speech from the Throne last October as one of the highlights in this session. We have asked for it repeatedly and now are told we will not get it in time for anything to be done in respect of it during the course of this session. I suppose it probably will be tabled during the last week of the session so that then it will receive newspaper coverage and all that kind of thing, in the hope that the people of Canada will think something may be done about it at the next session.

In view of the length of time it takes to get a white paper, I expect we will go through another session trying to get the government to bring in its legislation. This is really reprehensible, particularly in view of a certain piece of legislation that was put through Parliament just before Easter having to do with our own pensions. We did not have to wait for a white paper on social security, but the old age pensioners are being told they must wait for that document.

This applies not only to them but also to the veterans receiving war veterans allowance. They are being told that their case cannot be considered in conjunction with the study of the Woods report or the white paper on veterans legislation. They must wait until we have the white paper on social security. In other words, there are many hundreds of thousands of people involved, when we consider those on the old age pension. Remember that three-quarters of a million of them are in such straitened circumstances that they are able to qualify for the guaranteed income supplement. When we add to that number those on the war veterans allowance and the many others who are on the borderline in need of increases in their pensions, it is a conservative estimate that at least one million people in Canada are having to wait for the tabling of the white paper for an improvement in their economic position.

Yet the government cannot bring down the white paper. I am being charitable when I say the government cannot bring it down. I contend that the government refuses to bring it down. I believe the government has made a deliberate decision, that if it is to do anything at all in this field, it will stall until as close as possible to the next election. We have had far too much of this over the course of the years. It is all right to talk about having to fight inflation and having to enlist the old age pensioners and the war veterans in the battle against inflation, but we did not join it ourselves by what we did just before Easter. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I say this is a policy the government should not pursue, the policy of delaying the tabling of the white paper.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

I know that the white paper when it comes down will not by itself do anything. I know that after that there has to be legislation. I am not one who expects to be greatly delighted by the white paper, for I believe it will probably say some things that are grossly inadequate. But if the government has decided that the tabling of its white paper is the next step before there can be legislation in this field, then for heaven's sake bring it down so that we can get on with pension legislation and do something positive to meet the needs of more than one million people who are waiting desperately for action in this field.

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the preparation of any thorough review of social security involves a great deal of research, comparison and evaluation of existing programs in Canada and elsewhere, and an investigation of its relations to other areas, like the economy as a whole and regional disparity. At the same time, we know the urgency of the problem, the inefficiency of many existing programs and the amount of personal distress suffered by many in need. However, compassion and sympathy will not solve the difficulties unless supported by a good and workable program. When social legislation is enacted, it must be the best that we can possibly devise.

I can only assure the hon. member that the question is receiving the greatest attention and the highest priority in our department, and that the white paper will be tabled with all the speed compatible with a good, useful and workable program. Again I would like to draw the attention of all hon. members to the assurance that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) gave in this House on March 25, that the white paper on social security will be ready before the end of this session.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But not in time for action.

AGRICULTURE—PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—GRANTS TO ESTABLISH TOBACCO FARMS VIS-À-VIS ANTI-SMOKING CAMPAIGN

Mr. H. E. Stafford (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I directed a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro), namely, how does the minister reconcile the recently announced government grants to help establish tobacco farms on Prince Edward Island with his anti-smoking campaign? A few days ago an irate tobacco farmer in Elgin county wrote me, enclosing an article from the Delhi News Record which included a picture and a red headline stating that three young Delhi men "start flue farm on P.E.I." The article described the proposed operation regarding the farm, greenhouse and kilns and said in part:

> Financing for these expenditures will be aided by a grant from the federal government.

Unless the minister is able to prove that the soil of Prince Edward Island is such that it will grow tobacco which is totally immune from all the harmful compounds which the minister claims is found in tobacco smoke, I can only conclude that one branch of the government is promoting the growing of tobacco while another is carrying on an anti-smoking campaign to discourage the use of tobacco. All this gives strength to the old adage that the left hand does not know what the right hand is doing. It is confusing, to say the least.

Under either the Area or Regional Development Incentives Act the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is making grants for the establishment of tobacco-curing facilities on farms in Prince Edward Island. Under this arrangement many thousands of dollars have been approved and paid to farmers as an incentive for flue-curing tobacco facilities in that province. The Department of Agriculture finances the Delhi Research Station at Delhi, Ontario, in an attempt to improve the yield and quality of the tobacco farmer's crop. Similar experimental work is being carried on by the department at the Harrow Experimental Farm.

The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce works incessantly to promote the export of tobacco. In the past few months the department sponsored a trade mission whereby representatives of the department and of the Ontario Flue-Cured Tobacco Growers Marketing Board went to Britain, Western Europe, Japan and Australia in an attempt to increase tobacco exports. In April, 1969, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) went to Tokyo on a Canadian trade promotion and made a forceful case for tobacco. The Japanese market is very important to future exports of Canadian tobacco, and the minister tried to persuade the Japanese government to liberalize its imports of tobacco. The minister even smoked a Canadian cigar in front of one of the Canadian booths to show the Japanese how good they are.

Three departments are doing their best to encourage more people in economically depressed areas to get into the production of tobacco, improve the quality of tobacco and increase our export sales. All this while the Department of National Health and Welfare is doing its best to eliminate cigarette smoking. What kind of policy is it that encourages people to develop tobacco farms with one hand and then threatens to cut them off at the knees with the other?

Perhaps we should look at our basic policy, if we have one. A policy so diverse and leading in opposite directions cannot all be right. Our trade missions are moving around the world helping Canadian farmers sell their tobacco. Can we possibly live with our conscience when one department tries to discourage Canadians from smoking while another goes out of its way to encourage the nationals of other countries to use our tobacco products? Of all times in our economic posture when we are doing everything to cut back government expenditures, we must make certain that such expenditures are made under a prime policy.

The right of people to smoke is established. It is a matter of free choice. I would be the first to assert that the public should be made aware of the risks involved. It distresses me that the minister bases his case against tobacco on evidence much of which is dubious to say the least. In contrast, we appear to be spending money directly toward a policy which if implemented might be disastrous, namely, the legalization of the use of marijuana. Yet in contrast to the use of tobacco we have available compelling evidence of the dangers of marijuana.

In a public statement made in western Canada shortly before the appointment of the LeDain commission, the Minister of National Health and Welfare implied that the government might consider legalizing marijuana if a minority of Canadians use it. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) has suggested that he knows no particular harm in the use of marijuana. These statements are made in the face of research authorities in Canada, the United States and Britain that marijuana is proving to be both a personally and socially harmful drug. It leads an impressive percentage of users to hard and dangerous drugs, according to many experts such as Dr. Donald B. Lauria, the chairman of the Department of Public Health and Preventative Medicine at New Jersey College of Medicine, and Dr. F. W. Lundell, associate professor of psychology at McGill University. It causes hallucinations which can have serious consequences, of which no more telling example may prove to be the tragic leap to death from the Peace Tower of a young man whose 17-year old companion was found in possession of hashish. The preliminary research of Dr. Lundell indicates the probability of permanent brain damage from the use of marijuana.

All this leads us to question the consistency of policies in the Department of National Health and Welfare itself. The minister chose, on very preliminary research on cyclamates where cancer was produced in a mouse which received large doses of cyclamates, to stop the use of cyclamates in food products, where on the other hand he talks of legalizing marijuana on which there is considerable research evidence on the dangers of its use. I call on the Minister of National Health and Welfare to clarify these matters in his department, and for the government to issue a clearcut statement on them.

I know hundreds of tobacco farmers who are deeply concerned over the inconsistencies of government policy relating to tobacco. They have every reason to be alarmed. In fact, the council of Delhi and the county council of Norfolk are on record with resolutions urging the government to exercise real caution in its approach to this situation on which the lives of thousands of people depend.

Hon. members should know that tobacco growing in recent years has been the most stable of our agricultural products. It is, next to wheat, our largest agricultural export commodity and this year will generate more than $60 million in export sales. It is also the bedrock of the Canadian tobacco manufacturing industry, supplying virtually 100 per cent of the requirements of an industry which this year will be the largest single source of revenue of the Canadian government, contributing about $600 million to the federal treasury. It is the government's responsibility to provide clearcut policies.

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to say that I regret the minister was unable to be here this evening to answer the hon. member. The information that we have obtained from departmental officials is that there is no federal grant program available to help establish tobacco farms in Prince Edward Island or elsewhere in Canada. Such grants may have been made by the provincial government but this, of course, would be outside the jurisdiction of the federal government.

I should like to draw the hon. member's attention to the report of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs which studied tobacco and cigarette smoking. As far as assistance to tobacco growers and workers in the tobacco industry is concerned, the recommendation was as follows:

> Your committee recommends that the Departments of Regional Economic Expansion, Agriculture, Manpower and Immigration, Industry, Trade and Commerce, and National Health and Welfare co-ordinate their efforts to assist the tobacco growers and workers in the tobacco industry to adjust to the major changes which will eventually develop.

I expect there will be a great deal of development in this field because the minister is now preparing draft legislation based on some of the recommendations of the committee. I am sure that if the hon. member listens to the explanation to this bill which will be given, I hope by the minister himself, a lot of the smoke and doubt that is beclouding many minds with regard to this matter will be dissipated.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. TURNER (OTTAWA-CARLETON)—MISQUOTATION OF EVIDENCE BEFORE STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege. I rise to express a grievance about a serious misquotation on the part of the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) in the House on the evening of April 6. His quotation of my evidence before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs was torn from its context and if read in its context carries a meaning that is quite the reverse of the meaning he saw fit to attribute to it.

The effect of what he said was that I led the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to believe that none of the breathalyzer provisions in the omnibus criminal law amendment bill would be brought into force unless all were brought into force simultaneously. I did no such thing, Mr. Speaker. In fact, what actually transpired is quite to the contrary, and I propose to deal with this matter in detail before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs at the first convenient opportunity.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. McCleave: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will be given that opportunity in a moment. I doubt whether it would be in order to debate the minister's question of privilege. It may be that the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants has his own question of privilege. We will come to that in a moment. So far as the minister's point is concerned, it seems to me what we have before us is a disagreement between two hon. members as to what was said or what was not said when evidence was heard before a standing committee of the House of Commons. That, in my estimation at least, does not meet the requirements of a question of privilege. The Minister started his remarks by saying he had a grievance. I suggest that the Minister of Justice put himself out of court at that moment and there is not a prima facie question of privilege.

Mr. Baldwin: Perhaps he should refer this matter to the Supreme Court of Canada, too.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the discussion might be pursued in other circumstances, but I would not think that the point ought to be discussed further by way of a question of privilege. Having said that, it may be that the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants has his own question of privilege. I will hear him on that.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I shall be there on Tuesday. The record will be fully quoted at that time and will substantiate what I have said in the House.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE

TABLING OF LETTER TO UN SECRETARY-GENERAL SUBMITTING RESERVATION TO ACCEPTANCE OF COMPULSORY JURISDICTION

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, hon. members are aware that the government has given notice of its intention to introduce today two bills dealing with protection of Canada's marine environment and the living resources of the sea. I wish now to table a copy of a letter which Canada's Ambassador to the United Nations has delivered to the Secretary General submitting a new reservation to Canada's acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice. This reservation is intended to guard against any possible litigation of certain features of these two bills.

Canada strongly supports the rule of law in international affairs. Canada has made known to other states that it is prepared to participate actively in multilateral efforts to develop agreed rules on the protection of the environment and the conservation of the living resources of the sea.

International Court of Justice

• (2:10 p.m.)

[Translation]

Canada is not prepared however to engage in litigation with other states concerning vital issues where the law is either inadequate or non-existent and thus does not provide a firm basis for judicial decision. We have therefore submitted this new reservation to Canada's acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court relating to those areas of the law of the sea which are undeveloped or inadequate.

[English]

It is well known that there is little or no environmental law on the international plane and that the law now in existence favours the interests of the shipping states and the shipping owners engaged in the large scale carriage of oil and other potential pollutants. There is an urgent need for the development of international law establishing that coastal states are entitled, on the basis of fundamental principle of self-defence, to protect their marine environment and the living resources of the sea adjacent to their coasts.

In spite of this new reservation, Canada's acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction of the court remains much broader than that of most other members of the United Nations, and it is the hope of the government that it will prove possible to reach agreement with other states on the vital need to develop the law to protect the marine environment and its living resources so as to make it possible for Canada again to broaden its acceptance of the court's jurisdiction.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, one would need to see the bills to which the Prime Minister referred and would also require very full information before making any kind of definitive comment upon the statement of the Prime Minister. We must recognize that it constitutes a serious step, a step hardly in the right direction, for Canada to reduce the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice. I am not passing judgment at the moment on whether or not this is the correct decision in the circumstances. I do say that the government has made this decision without any consultation with Parliament and without any discussion in Parliament.

It seems to me that the position the Prime Minister has announced today is diametrically opposite to the position he took in the House about a year ago when he indicated he was going to try to resolve all these problems through the United Nations and through consultation with the Secretary General. My point is that we seem to have here a complete reversal of position, without any real discussion in Parliament, on a matter that we all regard as very serious. The Prime Minister's statement does not seem to settle in any way the question of sovereignty. Presumably we are talking about control of the environment.

I want to know, Mr. Speaker, why the leader of the government has felt it necessary to take this position with regard to the United Nations and reduce the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice before the bills have been introduced and discussed. Why has he felt it necessary to take this action in an arbitrary manner without, if the government is going to proceed with the proposed legislation, giving an opportunity to the members of this House, the representatives of the people, to express their views on this matter before the adoption by Canada of a position with regard to the jurisdiction of the court?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: If there is any reason why this arbitrary action has been taken by the Prime Minister and the government before the matter has been discussed by Parliament, then certainly the Prime Minister has not given it to us. I say this is another indication of the secretive manner in which this government behaves; it is another indication of the contempt with which the government treats this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, at a time in human history when every nation and all peoples in the world are seeking to establish an international rule of law, it is obviously extremely regrettable that the government of this country, a country which has a position of some importance in the international family, should find it necessary to reduce the extent to which Canada is ready to submit itself to the rule of international law.

I say to the Prime Minister that this matter should at least have been discussed at some length by the appropriate committee of Parliament. The reasons in favour of the need for such a reservation should have been given to us in full, with the officials of the government explaining in much greater detail than the statement now before us does the present legal situation, the present composition of the International Court of Justice, the fears which the government has, and the validity of those fears. If every country in the world, every member of the United Nations, were to reduce the sphere in which it would be internationally bound every time it was faced by a matter of national interest, pretty soon the whole concept of the International Court and, indeed, of the United Nations itself, would be dead and buried. This is the issue which concerns us so very deeply.

I am not persuaded from the information contained in the Prime Minister's statement that the reservation is necessary. Possibly his advisers and he have studied the situation and reached a conclusion which may be valid. But I also say that as members of this Parliament I and all others who sit in this chamber have the right to possess as much information about this matter as the Prime Minister himself possesses in order that we may intelligently understand and evaluate the action taken by the government.

At least the Prime Minister should have had the humility not to do any double-talking in this statement. What nonsense it is to say, "Canada strongly supports the rule of law in international affairs", when in the next breath he says he does not intend to be bound by it. We should stop this hypocrisy in international affairs. There has been enough of it in the United Nations and elsewhere. I do not think we serve the cause of peace and international law and order by indulging in this kind of double-talking hypocrisy, and I resent it.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that we did not receive the French text of the statement just made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

Still, I believe that the government is well advised in being concerned about such an important question as zoning and fishing rights. In my opinion, it is imperative that our government take time to discuss the matter very seriously with bordering countries so that it becomes clear what position Canada is to adopt in future concerning our vested interests in our territorial waters.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN SPEAKER'S GALLERY OF PRESIDENT OF BRITISH BOARD OF TRADE

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, may I have your indulgence to call to the attention of hon. members the presence in the gallery of a most distinguished member of the British cabinet, the Right Honourable Roy Mason, M.P., President of the British Board of Trade.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO HAVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I seek unanimous consent—hopefully, the consent of the President of the Privy Council—to move a reference under Standing Order 43. My reasons are very simple and dramatically alarming. They concern the almost unprecedented unemployment situation in Canada. I am referring to the 6.5 per cent unemployment rate in Canada generally, the 9 per cent rate in Quebec, the 13 per cent rate in the Atlantic provinces, and the reported 22 per cent in Canada's newest province. This is definitely an unprecedented rate of unemployment.

My reason for seeking unanimous consent to move this motion is simply that the government's fiscal and monetary policies are continuing to have a tremendously detrimental effect on the Canadian economy. The programs of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion are not having any effect because they are not getting off the ground and offsetting the impact made by unemployment.

Since this problem is one that affects all Canadians, either because they are unemployed or because they face the danger of becoming unemployed, I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski), the following motion:

That the chronic unemployment situation in Canada, which is especially serious in the disadvantaged areas of Canada, be referred to the Standing Committee on Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate under the terms of Standing Order 43. This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House to be proceeded with. Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not, so the motion cannot be put at this time.

Mr. Bell: They are waiting till its gets to 20 per cent.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, is there any practice under our parliamentary rules whereby the names of those who oppose such a motion are actually recorded in Hansard?

Mr. Baldwin: That would make Hansard hate literature.

TESTING OF TELEVISION SETS FOR RADIATION

Question No. 1,370—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

1. In each year 1965 to 1969, what number of television sets were tested for harmful radiation?

2. Which were the sets that had acceptable radiation levels from all sides of the television set at a distance of one foot?

3. (a) What is considered an acceptable level of radiation (b) how is it determined (c) what sets in 1966, 1967, 1968 and 1969 continued to emit harmful radiation?

4. What steps are being taken by the government to prohibit the production of television sets which emit harmful radiation levels?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. During the last three years the Radiation Protection Division of the Department of National Health and Welfare has tested new colour television sets as well as sets in private homes. The number of sets tested by year of make are as follows: 1965, 33; 1966, 89; 1967, 12; 1968, 160; and 1969, 144.

2. The tests were designed to measure radiation dose ratios close to all surfaces of the sets, and no systematic measurements were made at a distance of one foot.

3. (a) Recommendations by the International Commission on Radiological Protection required that the dose rate near the surface (5 cm. of any set not be greater than 0.5 mR/hr. under normal operating conditions. (b) The radiation dose rates were determined both by electronic equipment and by a photographic method standardized by the Radiation Protection Division. For the majority of the tests the latter method was used. (c) In a survey of domestic television sets carried out last year it was found that about 20% of sets purchased in 1966 or earlier emitted radiation which, in some degree, exceeded the Standard of 0.5 milliroentgen/hour recommended by the International Commission on Radiological Protection. The proportion fell to 14 per cent in 1967, 8 per cent in 1968 and 4 per cent in 1969. Examples of such sets were found among all popular makes.

4. The Division has a continuing program of checking new models as they are produced. The Department is drafting detailed technical safety specifications and will shortly introduce them in the form of regulations which will govern the manufacture, sale and import of all television sets in Canada.

ANCIENNE-LORETTE AIRPORT—AIRCRAFT OVERSHOOTING LANDING STRIP

Question No. 1,438—Mr. Godin:

Since 1965, have any aircraft overshot the landing strip at Ancienne-Lorette airport and, if so (a) what is the runway number (b) what type of aircraft were involved and (c) in each case, what was the distance covered beyond the runway?

CURBING AIRCRAFT NOISE AND SONIC BOOMS

Question No. 1,442—Mr. Mather:

Is consideration being given to curbing aircraft noise and sonic boom over populated areas?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Transport and the National Research Council of Canada as follows: Yes. At a recent meeting of the International Civil Aviation Organization, of which Canada is a member, agreement was reached on a noise certification plan which will ensure that all new turbojet aircraft undergoing initial airworthiness certification after January 1, 1969 do not exceed predetermined levels of noise when taking-off or landing at an airport. It is expected that the first new types of aircraft subject to the noise certification plan should be in service by 1974. In the interim every effort is made to control the noise of aircraft in the vicinity of airports through the implementation of noise abatement procedures and curfews where required.

With regard to the operation of supersonic civil aircraft over Canada: these aircraft will not be allowed to fly at supersonic speeds until it has been established that this will not be detrimental to the people of Canada.

Improved designs for stator blades in turbomachinery are being tested by the National Research Council of Canada.

Question No. 1,509—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys):

1. Has the Minister of Labour received a letter from Mr. Daniel Bonnar, 100 Fraser Avenue, Sydney Mines, Nova Scotia, dated February 7, 1970, protesting in general the pre-retirement program of the Cape Breton Development Corporation and also the fact that men who were willing to continue work were forced to go on a pre-retirement allowance at sixty years of age?

2. What was the nature of the reply that was provided Mr. Bonnar?

Mr. Jim McNulty (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): 1. Yes.

2. The Minister of Labour replied on February 13, 1970 and explained the nature of the plan which is similar to some 170 individual plans which have been approved by the Unemployment Insurance Commission. The Minister has also explained the functioning of the plan as such.

BUSINESS AND PROFESSIONAL TAX DEDUCTIONS

Question No. 1,576—Mr. Mather:

In 1968 and 1969, what was the approximate total of business and professional tax deductions relative to deducting cost of doing work from income?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister of National Revenue): Available figures indicate only the total expenses deducted from gross business and professional income in determining net income from these sources for tax purposes. This figure for 1968 taxation year was $12,385 million. Not available for 1969.

METHOD OF DECREASING JET PLANE NOISE

What efforts are being made by the National Research Council to develop an efficient method of decreasing jet plane noise?

Is consideration being given to increasing the federal funds available for funeral costs to war veterans and their next-of-kin dependants?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Effective April 1, 1970, the amount payable by the Department and the Canadian Pension Commission under the Veterans Burial Regulations for or towards the funeral expenses of a deceased entitled veteran was increased by 30 per cent from $277 to $360. The amount payable to a funeral director under the Last Post Fund Regulations was also increased by 30 per cent from $240 to $315 effective the same date. The Department has no authority for payment of the funeral expenses of a deceased dependant or next-of-kin of a veteran.

Mr. Speaker: Notices of motions for the production of papers.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, you turned the other way and perhaps you did not see me.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is right on both counts.

Mr. Rose: I should like to ask when the government plans to answer my question No. 81 which has been on the Order Paper since October 23.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I will make inquiries, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I should like to make the same inquiry in respect of questions Nos. 162 to 172 inclusive which have been on the Order Paper for almost six months.

Mr. Forest: Mr. Speaker, even though the tracing of the ultimate ownership of about 800 companies has been a time-consuming task, I am informed that the answer should be forthcoming in about a week.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, my question No. 770 has been on the Order Paper almost four months. There are not 800 Crown corporations or agencies and it seems to me that it should not be that difficult to provide an answer. I hope it will not be much longer before it is supplied.

Mr. Forest: Mr. Speaker, I will inquire of the appropriate department.

REPORT ON PROPERTY APPRAISALS, RIDING MOUNTAIN PARK

Motion No. 389—Mr. Stewart (Marquette):

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the appraisers' complete report by the firm Rohne-Trumpour Realties Service Limited who were selected by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to do the commercial appraisals of property in Riding Mountain National Park.

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the appraisal report is considered a privileged document, as it contains information on the yearly land rental to be paid by the leaseholders in Riding Mountain National Park. The land rental figures form part of the lease agreement which constitutes a confidential landlord-tenant relationship. The government does not table such documents, which would represent a breach of this confidence, without the express written consent of the lessee. Under the circumstances I would therefore ask that the hon. member withdraw his motion.

Mr. Stewart (Marquette): Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is transferred for debate.

TRANSPORT

SECOND VOYAGE OF "MANHATTAN"—EXTENT OF AUTHORITY OF CAPTAIN OF ICEBREAKER "ST. LAURENT"—CONTINGENCY PLANS IN EVENT OF OIL SPILL

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport who was here a moment ago.

Mr. Bell: He is behind the curtain smoking with the Minister of Health.

An hon. Member: Tally-ho!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, my question relates to the voyage of the Manhattan. Can the minister tell the House what instructions have been given to Captain Fournier of the icebreaker St. Laurent authorizing the captain of the icebreaker to take command of the expedition when in his opinion there is risk of an accident?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the details were included in the letters I tabled yesterday between the Department of Transport and the Humble Oil Company. I am speaking from memory now because I do not have the letters in front of me. They are to the effect that the captain of the icebreaker, Captain Fournier, would have the authority—I am trying to recall the precise words—to terminate or advise the captain of the Manhattan that he should not proceed farther should he feel that the circumstances are too precarious to warrant any further penetration of the ice. But I would refer the Leader of the Opposition to the letter because it might answer the question more specifically.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, do these instructions give the captain of the icebreaker the authority to terminate the whole expedition, with compliance by the Manhattan, or do they simply give authority to the captain of the St. Laurent to decide when he should take the icebreaker out of the situation?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, again I refer to the letter which indicates the conditions we laid down. The letter from the Humble Oil Company indicates their willingness to abide by these conditions. If both are read together I think they would indicate that the captain of the Manhattan, if so advised by the captain of the Canadian icebreaker, would be required to change direction in line with the recommendations of the captain of the Canadian vessel.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Transport. What contingency plans have been made to deal with pollution should the Manhattan be crushed in the ice, control not having been taken over by the St. Laurent?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to provide the hon. member and the House with a copy of some of the details of the contingency plan. Briefly, I believe there are three or four frogmen on board the Canadian vessel who have all the necessary apparatus. There are booms on board for the containment of any oil spilled and various absorbent substances which in Chedabucto Bay have proven to be the most effective in terms of sopping up the oil—I suppose "sopping" is the proper term. There are other details and I will make them available to the hon. member.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that this voyage is now taking place at a time when this legislation is being brought forward, accompanied by the Prime Minister's interesting statement, will the Prime Minister discuss with the President of the Privy Council the prospects of bringing forward immediately in the House a debate and discussion on second reading of these bills so that consideration may take place at the appropriate time?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will gladly discuss that with the House Leader. I hope members of the opposition will not judge that the Manhattan has been in contempt of Parliament.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TRANSFER OF NERVE GAS FROM OKINAWA TO UNITED STATES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Prime Minister is in a position today to give us some information regarding the decision of the government of the United States to transfer large quantities of lethal gas from Okinawa to Bangor, Washington, via the Strait of Juan de Fuca. Can the Prime Minister tell the House whether or not the Canadian government was notified of this action and whether or not it was assured of any precautionary measures being taken? Can the Prime Minister also tell us the approximate date when this transfer will take place?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Since the question was raised I have inquired of External Affairs. Although I would prefer that the minister, when he returns from Europe, give a more detailed answer, I can assure the hon. member and the House that there have been discussions between officials between the two governments on the nature and kind of preventive measures which have been taken by the United States. They appear to be extremely elaborate.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he is prepared to tell the House what these precautionary measures are? Some United States scientists have indicated it is possible to detoxicize the nerve gas. Is this being done, or are the precautionary measures merely careful handling of the product?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I believe some of these measures are of a confidential nature. At any rate, at this stage I am not prepared to enter into the details.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether representations were made to the United States government by the government of Canada in respect of this matter, when they were made, what was the nature of the representations and what was the nature of the reply?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I cannot answer in detail. Obviously there have been some exchanges since there has been an exchange of information between the two governments. We have asked what precautions are being taken. We have been told what those precautions are and we have been engaged in an assessment of their sufficiency.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the Prime Minister not give more details than he has already supplied? Will he state whether or not consent was given by the Canadian government to the shipment of 8,000 to 10,000 tons of this dangerous material? If so, on what basis was the consent given?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I know of no basis on which Canadian consent is required by the United States for them to operate in their own waters.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that answer of course is as facetious as usual. The effect that would be felt by the people of British Columbia in the event anything should happen is too dangerous to be played with by such words on the part of the Prime Minister.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

FINANCE

LOANS BY FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS FOR PURCHASE OF RUSSIAN FARM MACHINERY

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, my question was for the Minister of Finance, but as he is absent I will put it to the Prime Minister.

Can he tell the House whether Canadian farmers will be eligible for loans from our financial institutions for the purchase of Russian farm machinery which is being sold at prices 35 or 40 per cent lower than those of Canadian farm implements, and whether the Canadian farmers will be informed of this possibility?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I take this most interesting question as notice on behalf of my colleague.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PROGRAMS FOR RIVERS AIR BASE

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. The minister is on the roster today but as he is not here I shall direct the question to his Parliamentary Secretary. In view of the fact that No. 4 flying training program, the last training operation at Rivers air base, is being transferred to Portage as of July 1, what new programs will be announced for Rivers air base?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me this is a question which normally should be answered by way of a general statement. If the hon. member considers there is urgency about the matter, it might very well be considered at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, the people of western Manitoba think it is very urgent.

Mr. Speaker: Then if it is urgent I would co-operate with the hon. member to make sure it is given priority for debate at the time of adjournment.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

RIGHT OF ACCUSED TO WITHHOLD EVIDENCE —STATEMENT BY MR. JUSTICE HAINES— POSITION OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. In view of the very unfortunate remarks made by Mr. Justice Haines before the Medical Association which indicated that in the mind of the learned judge there should be no right on the part of an accused to withhold evidence at a criminal trial, would the minister seize the first available opportunity to indicate that this is not the view of the government and that the government's position is that the rights of an accused person will be maintained?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Justice Haines was not speaking from the bench but was making a speech on a private occasion. I have already made a comment to the effect that these certainly are not the views of the Attorney General of Canada.

Mr. Baldwin: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister indicate to the judge that these views are probably contrary to those of the Prime Minister who does not feel that members of the opposition should be heard?

Mr. McIlraith: They are not the present Prime Minister's views but those of a former Prime Minister.

POST OFFICE

MONTREAL POSTAL DISPUTE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON OFFERS AND DEMANDS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I should like to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board. Would he be prepared to undertake to make a statement to the House on motions tomorrow outlining the various offers made by the government to the truck drivers involved in the postal dispute in Montreal and outlining also the additional requests or demands which they have made of him at the various meetings they have held with him?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): I would think that the hon. gentleman, who has had considerable experience in labour negotiations, would appreciate that until such time as these have been concluded it would not be helpful to try to debate in the House the merits of the course being followed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: What is all that clatter over there all about?

Mr. Lewis: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the great experience of the President of the Treasury Board in the mismanagement of labour relations in this country—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might ask the question.

Mr. Lewis: That was a necessary preface, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McIlraith: Quite improper.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the minister whether in his view it is more important for him to issue press releases giving the details of these matters than to make a statement to this House?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will recognize, I am sure, that the question in those terms is not acceptable.

Mr. Lewis: May I reword it, Mr. Speaker, and ask the President of the Treasury Board whether he did issue a press release outlining the offers made by the Treasury Board in the negotiations with the men and their union and, if so, whether he would be prepared to elaborate on the points in that press release for the further information of members of this House?

Mr. Drury: It is correct that a press release was issued in agreement with the union. The time of issue was agreed upon with them. As I mentioned earlier, in light of my considerable administrative malpractice the hon. member would not regard as very helpful a further elaboration of what is going on.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: I agree with the minister and so do the truck drivers in Montreal. May I ask him, however, a further supplementary question. In view of the importance of some of the negotiations and the inquiry before Mr. Goldenberg, would the minister undertake to table in the House all the documents which were presented to Mr. Goldenberg during the course of his inquiry, including the contracts which have now been cancelled and memoranda presented to the commissioner regarding the situation in Montreal?

Mr. Drury: I would be glad to consult Mr. Goldenberg regarding the tabling of all the documents that he has received. I suspect, without knowing this, that some of them may be of a confidential nature, but I will be glad to inquire.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, which I wish to direct to the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the frequent emphasis the Prime Minister places on the long periods of planning that the government puts behind all the moves it makes, I should like to ask the President of the Treasury Board whether everything is going according to plan in connection with this matter?

Mr. Baldwin: The word is "plot".

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): I have a supplementary question for the President of the Treasury Board. Are discussions still going on with the union representatives of the employees in Montreal or has the government now made its final offer?

Mr. Drury: As I mentioned a moment ago, I do not think the details of the negotiations could usefully be discussed here, but let me say that the door is still open for further conversations.

An hon. Member: Further conversations?

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I have a further supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister giving any consideration to requesting that the Minister of Labour return as soon as possible from his vacation to deal with this very serious labour problem?

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

DELAY IN PROCESSING APPLICATION FOR LETTERS PATENT BY JOHN BULLOCK AND OTHERS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, because of the fact that it has been impossible to secure information from the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in connection with an application made by John Bullock who has recently been trying to save Canadians from some of the shortcomings of the white paper on tax reform—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Be serious.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Apparently he has been even more successful than I thought he was, judging from the groans I hear. As I am informed that he and his associates applied for letters patent on January 19, almost three months ago, and the matter is still under consideration, will the minister say whether the unnecessary and unexplainable delay is due to the fact that Mr. Bullock is connected with the application?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): As minister I only concern myself with important things, and I am not aware of this application to begin with.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Better ask the Minister of Finance whether he knows about it.

NATIONAL SECURITY

METHOD OF SCREENING APPOINTEES TO HIGH POSITIONS—DIRECTOR OF INFORMATION CANADA

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. Will he make a statement to the House as soon as possible on the method of security screening of political appointees to high federal government positions, and particularly with respect to the recent appointment of Mr. Jean-Louis Gagnon?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Rise to your feet, leader.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the Prime Minister advise the House whether the government has decided what portions of the report of the Royal Commission on Security are to be implemented?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I made a very lengthy statement in the House on those portions of the royal commission report which were being implemented; at that time I said that some aspects of it were still under consideration, and they still are.

Mr. Nowlan: I have a supplementary question for the Minister Without Portfolio responsible for Information Canada. In view of the appointment of the director of Information for the Minister without Portfolio before this appointment was made any security clearance was done, on the basis of the commission report, by one of the three following agencies, namely, the security panel, the Privy Council office, or the director of security and intelligence of the RCMP?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): I think the hon. member knows that appointments of deputy ministers are the prerogative of the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You don't like him either, eh? That explains it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The one-man government.

Mr. Stanbury: I only hope, Mr. Speaker, that questions of this kind do not sink this country into a new McCarthy era.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: I can understand why the minister has no portfolio in view of that type of remark. In view of the answer given by the Minister without Portfolio ,my question is now directed to the Prime Minister. Before the appointment of the director of Information Canada was there any type of clearance by any of the three agencies mentioned in the commission report, namely, the security panel, the Privy Council office, or the director of security and intelligence of the RCMP?

Mr. Trudeau: In answer to this question and with reference to the reaction which was created by the statement of the Minister without Portfolio, I would like to remind the House that the practice of giving the responsibility for the appointment of deputy ministers or people at that level to the Prime Minister was begun by Sir John A. Macdonald and is recorded as such in a minute of the council many, many years ago. To answer the second part of the question, it is, of course, my responsibility to ensure, when anyone at this level is being appointed by me, that the proper security assurances have been given.

Mr. Nowlan: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Were such assurances given?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have a point of order too—I have the floor. The hon. member seeks the floor on a point of order.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the Prime Minister's answer. This is a serious matter and no one is suggesting otherwise, but because it is a serious matter members of the opposition or members of the government are entitled to ask questions on such important matters, especially when they have not come before Parliament by any vehicle whatsoever. It is because of the latter part of the Prime Minister's answer stating what the policy has been that I asked the supplementary to my supplementary: were such assurances given and accepted by the Prime Minister?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the House that I have such assurances. Of course if members of the opposition have any vital or secret information on this subject—from other sources than Ron Gostick—or others—I would suggest it is their duty to convey such information to the Solicitor General.

Mr. Nowlan: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker, and it is only because of the importance of the matter. In view of the insinuation of the Prime Minister, would he exercise the influence and power of his office to have this whole agency, Information Canada, with the director of Information Canada, referred to the appropriate committee of the House and because there is no committee—

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Un-American activities.

Mr. Nowlan: —on supply and services at the moment, would the Prime Minister—if the President of the Privy Council wants to get up out of his seat and speak in the House I would be glad to hear him—would the Prime Minister use his good offices, because we should clarify this matter now rather than have it amplified—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question period is only 40 minutes and we have to give an opportunity to all hon. members. Perhaps the hon. member might ask the question so that we can get on.

Mr. Nowlan: I appreciate your stricture, Mr. Speaker. Did the President of the Privy Council suggest this was an old McCarthy ploy?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I said you sound like Joe McCarthy's boy.

Mr. Ricard: You sound like an empty barrel.

Mr. Speaker: We will go on to another question. The hon. member has asked a number of supplementary questions. Perhaps we might go on to another question.

Mr. Nowlan: I appreciate we must get on with the business of the House but this is part of the business of the House, Mr. Speaker. In view of the addendum of the President of the Privy Council I would much rather not accept the insinuation, but in view of some of the questions raised on this side of the House I would hope that the Prime Minister would use the power and persuasion of his office to have this whole matter of the director referred to the appropriate standing committee of the House.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley.

Mr. Nowlan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister got up on his feet to answer the question.

An hon. Member: He needs protection.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley.

PENITENTIARIES

INVESTIGATION OF SUICIDES

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. In view of another suicide in one of Canada's penitentiaries, making a total of seven so far this year, what does the Solicitor General plan to do about this very awkward social problem?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in the House on two occasions within the last few days, we are taking a very serious view of this matter. I am having an investigation made in the Montreal area on the number of recent suicides there by a committee composed of three staff members of the government correctional agencies, a psychologist, a classification officer and a classification director with, as a consultant Professor Frechette, a psychologist and professor of criminology. This Committee is investigating the regrettable suicides in the Montreal area.

Within the department I am also having research done on all suicides since 1959 and at the conclusion of this will take whatever steps are necessary to get to the root of this situation. In addition we are examining matters—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Simcoe North.

Mr. Baldwin: A supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether we might not move on to another subject. I feel a bit guilty that a number of members have been awaiting an opportunity since yesterday to ask questions. The hon. member for Simcoe North.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

HEALTH AND WELFARE

RELEASE OF PREVENTIVE MEASLES VACCINE

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): My question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare, Mr. Speaker. In view of the interesting dilemma surrounding the astronauts due to contact with German measles and the great increase in this disease, with its attendant morbidity and mortality, in certain states of the United States in many people not vaccinated, even though a preventive vaccine has been in use for the last year, when can we expect release of this preventive vaccine in Canada?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I will be pleased to check into the matter and let the hon. member know, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bigg: On a question of urgent privilege, Mr. Speaker, don't anybody panic but a fire bomb has been dropped outside Room 235. I was wondering what explanation there might be for this rather serious breach of security.

An hon. Member: We didn't do it; we are all here.

Another hon. Member: Another government backbencher revolting.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if we might have the proper party look into this matter.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the matter is being looked into if the situation is as suggested by the hon. member.

PROGRAMS TO ALLEVIATE UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, it never fails; I get to my feet and the members of the press gallery leave. I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question. In view of his impending absence from the House in a few weeks and in view of the serious unemployment situation across Canada, would the Prime Minister enlighten the House before his departure on any impending programs that might alleviate the situation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my impending departure will take place in a month's time so I think the question may be premature.

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): A supplementary question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. In view of Canada's growing commercial and economic ties with Japan, will the Prime Minister consider making his forthcoming Osaka trip an all-party affair to show united Canadian support for Expo 70?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will give it consideration but I must advise the hon. member that there is a limit to the weight that can be carried on the aircraft.

An hon. Member: You can go by reindeer.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I can understand the Prime Minister's irritation after viewing last night's Academy Awards. A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I do not wish to go on the trip, but would the Prime Minister consider at least inviting the leaders of the other parties?

TRANSPORT

APPLICATION BY U.S. RAILWAY TO CARRY COAL FROM FERNIE, B.C. TO ROBERTS BANK

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is it the intention of the government to clearly instruct the Canadian Transport Commission to reject the request of Kaiser Steel to deliver coal from Fernie, B.C. to Roberts Bank by an American railway?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be in any way appropriate for the government to issue instructions with regard to a hearing now under way before the commission. If and when the commission reaches its decision it will then, of course, be subject to appeal and will be dealt with in the appropriate manner at that time.

SYDNEY, N.S.—INVESTIGATION OF HUSTLER CORPORATION

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. On March 25 the Parliamentary Secretary to the minister took notice of a question by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby asking if his department was conducting an investigation into the affairs of Hustler Corporation in Sydney to determine if there was a misuse of public funds. Could the minister report on this matter and indicate to the House what action is being taken by his department or by Devco to deal with this situation where I understand there has been a shutdown of operations?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, my department is not doing anything but Devco is inquiring into the matter. I have had no report up to now. I understand that in the meantime the management has been changed.

Mr. Burton: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is Devco giving any consideration to making arrangements to take over the operations of Hustler Corporation so that employment may be continued at this plant?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I can inquire into this and make a report later.

HISTORIC SITES

PRESERVATION OF HOME OF HUGH JOHN MACDONALD

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for historic sites. Has the hon. gentleman received a report from the National Historic Sites and Monuments Board with respect to the historical significance of the former home of Hugh John Macdonald in Winnipeg?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Dinsdale: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the imminence of the demolition of this building, which I believe is to start on April 15, can the minister give an assurance that this matter is under active consideration and that there will be a report before that date?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I understand the board is looking into it right now. I will inquire and report to the hon. member.

BROADCASTING

APPLICATIONS TO TAKE OVER CKPM FREQUENCY

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Secretary of State? In view of the fact that the Canadian Radio-Television Commission has announced that the broadcasting licence of radio station CKPM is only being renewed for the balance of this year, will the minister look into the matter and determine how many applications have been received for this new assignment? Also, is it a fact that some of these applications were received before the announcement was made?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I could inquire and give the hon. member the information he is requesting.

[English]

NATIONAL PARKS

BONNE BAY, NFLD.—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT REGARDING ESTABLISHMENT

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Would the minister indicate his department's position with regard to the establishment of a national park at Bonne Bay, Newfoundland, in view of the white paper announced by the premier of that province which categorically rejects the government's plan for the park?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I did receive the report yesterday and I am studying it at present. I will be pleased to give the hon. member my views on this matter as soon as I have completed my study of the report.

[English]

POST OFFICE

CARRYING OF MAIL BY OTHER AIRLINES IN ADDITION TO AIR CANADA

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of a statement made by the minister a few days ago, as reported in a press dispatch by Victor Mackie, may I ask the minister if the government is giving consideration to any means whereby the carrying of mail on our cross country air routes might be given to lines other than Air Canada?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think this question should more properly be directed to the Minister of Communications. All I know is what I have read in the papers.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Inasmuch as the press report says that the statement was made by the Minister of Transport, is he not in a position to comment on it?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, what I said, I believe, was that I understood that negotiations or talks were going on, but I am not in possession of information respecting the specifics of those talks.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TRIP TO EXPO 70 BY PRIME MINISTER—COMPOSITION OF PARTY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question about his impending trip. I assure him I am not seeking accommodation myself. I wish to know whether in his party on the trip there is to be an expert on grain selling, so that the good will created by the Prime Minister in the course of this trip can be turned to immediate advantage in perhaps opening up supplementary markets for our wheat in the countries the Prime Minister will be visiting?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Of course, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Bravo!

Mr. Trudeau: Thank you.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Come on. Don't be like that. Stand up! Stand up!

Mr. Trudeau: I don't understand.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): We realize that you do not understand. The Prime Minister does not understand a lot, especially with regard to unemployment in the country.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): That does not bother the Prime Minister; unemployment does not bother him. He does not worry.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: All right, now—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: If this is a joke it is a joke, but I am asking the Prime Minister a serious question and I should like a serious answer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Come on, Oscar.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Give your leader a chance.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

TURKEY—ASSISTANCE TO EARTHQUAKE VICTIMS

Mr. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to reply to a question that was taken as notice yesterday and that came from the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell) in connection with the earthquake in Turkey.

The Canadian International Development Agency has given the International Red Cross an amount of $15,000, through the Canadian Red Cross, following the earthquake in Turkey. As a matter of fact, the Canadian Red Cross has likewise granted an additional $15,000 to the International Red Cross.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Red Deer.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which affects all members of the House and particularly your office. We have just seen a demonstration of control in the House of Commons. The Prime Minister of this country has deliberately usurped your office and authority in this House by his attitude, his petulant attitude.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: Hon. members can laugh, but this is still a democracy and I am raising a question of privilege which affects this House and every member of it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: The Prime Minister, by his very attitude, reflected on your authority to keep order in the House of Commons and he would not reply to a serious question put to him by the Leader of the Opposition. He would not reply to him because of a few cat-calls.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: We have all been subjected to them. I do not get very many but I do not complain about the few I do get.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: I try to continue talking. I respect your authority and your command of the House. The Prime Minister reflected on your duties and your position in the House, and that should not go unnoticed because it affects the privileges of every person here. When the Leader of the Opposition asked a serious question he got no reply because the Prime Minister felt he could not stand the cat-calls. If you can't stand the heat, get out of the kitchen!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I think this might be a very good moment to call orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING HATE PROPAGANDA

The House resumed from Tuesday, April 7, consideration of Bill C-3, to amend the Criminal Code as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, and Motion No. 2 (Mr. Woolliams).

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, may I direct the attention of the House to the legislation before us, Bill C-3.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. May I call the attention of hon. members to the fact that the conversations going on make it very difficult for the Chair to hear the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I wish first of all to say, through you, to the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), our distinguished colleague in the House, that I am most grateful for the remarks he made, as are hon. members on all sides of the House. No one can doubt the sincerity of those remarks and no one can but respect the articulate manner in which they were expressed. If I thought Bill C-3 would bring about that state of affairs in our nation with respect to our people which the hon. member expects or hopes it will bring about, I should be completely in support of this bill. I can but agree with the basic objectives and motivation behind those remarks. I say that with the utmost sincerity. However, Mr. Speaker, it is my opinion that this bill will not accomplish what those who support it hope it will accomplish. I believe that the contrary will prove to be the case. I wish to elaborate briefly on why I believe this.

The matter of genocide and hate literature referred to in Bill C-3 is of very deep concern to every conscientious Canadian. I speak with much feeling on this subject of personal freedom, individual and civil rights. As the result of my own convictions in this regard I spent 15 years, the best years of my life, dedicated to the premise that those less fortunate than myself were entitled to the same assurance of freedom and liberty that I have enjoyed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Thompson: One of the highlights of this experience was my opportunity to travel with a shipload of refugees from Nazi oppression in Europe who were picked up in Lisbon and Cadiz in January, 1944. These refugees were the first to reach the shores of their promised land, by the Mediterranean route, during the midst of war. I was part of that historic voyage.

At this time when the talk of civil rights and race riots in our neighbouring nation, the United States, is part of our daily headlines and the cry of discrimination is heard even in Canada, I think all decent Canadians deplore the dissemination of hatred. However, I am not sure that this situation can ever be better controlled by the implementation of this law. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner), and I direct these remarks to the hon. minister at this time, have made it very clear in previous legislation which we have dealt with in this Parliament that the state has no business in the bedrooms of the nation. In other words, what they have tried to convey has been the fact that you cannot legislate morality; that you cannot, through the passage of laws, improve the nature of men or control their personal habits. In introducing this bill, they are inconsistent with that premise. If the state has no business in the bedrooms of the nation, it has no business in the living rooms of the nation or in the hearts of individuals. It seems to me there is a good deal of inconsistency as far as the government is concerned in pressing this legislation as they are doing. The roots of race prejudice go so deep that they are not likely to be affected by the laws that this Parliament can pass. I am convinced that only when people replace hatred and prejudice with love and tolerance will we ever eradicate prejudice, genocide and hate literature.

It is essential, and this is part of my own personal conviction, that human beings, divinely created with spiritual needs and potentialities, have inalienable rights which must be respected and preserved. I am sure we all agree on this. The question that looms before us is, how can this be assured? I feel sure that this was uppermost in the thoughts and minds of those who sponsored Bill C-3. I believe that those who have been involved in the long drawn-out deliberations over the past five or six years have been motivated by good intentions. However, good intentions alone are not an adequate safeguard.

The real difficulty with Bill C-3 is that it attempts to qualify freedom of speech. Freedom cannot be cut into pieces, discarding, according to someone's opinion, certain aspects and then retaining others. I was particularly impressed by some comments made by the eminent British historian Sir Arthur Bryant. In an article which appeared in the Illustrated London News, in 1964 he made the following statement:

> But to render such incitement—

This means incitement such as Bill C-3 is attempting to eliminate.

> —a criminal offence would be, so far as I can see, a denial of the very principle out of which the English belief and practice of toleration has grown. For the essence of that principle is that men should be free to speak and write what is in their minds without the interference or interdict of those in authority, and once that principle is denied, in the name of whatever virtue, freedom of speech and thought must very quickly cease to exist.
> However deplorable such ill-education and prejudice, and however important it is to remove them by education and the active promotion of reason and humanity, to prohibit the public discussion of controversial topics because of their effect on vulgar minds can only lead to the establishment of the very despotism we deplore. The reason why the advocates of religious and racial persecution have failed in the past to win support for their vile creeds here, as they so tragically have succeeded in doing in other lands, is because we have allowed freedom of discussion instead of suppressing it.

"Good beats bad where the fight is only free," we used to sing at my old school and it is true.

The true believer in toleration is the man who defends from persecution and victimization the very opponent whose opinions he most strenuously opposes. That is what in this country we mean by respect for freedom, and it will be an ill day for us if we ever lose it.

For every disseminator of hate literature and hatred in this country there are 999, perhaps even 99,999, who are opposed to and abhor such hatred. It is these people, so vastly in the majority, who will control the few who, because of the sickness of their own minds or hearts, are willing to allow themselves to become the disseminators of hatred and prejudice. I suggest to the House that the words of William Ewart Gladstone are very applicable today. He said:

It is liberty—that fits men for liberty—liberty, that is, for every man to express his opinions freely, however unpopular, foolish or wrong-headed they may be. Everyone wants liberty to express his own opinions; the test of a love of freedom is a man's willingness to allow the same liberty to others to express opinions that he detests and despises.

It is impossible to have freedom of speech without having those who will use it for silly, irrelevant and evil causes. This may be a high price to pay, but it is the only true way to preserve the rights of individuals. No matter to what extent a man is wrong, he has the right to express himself. Any attempt to curtail the rights of a communist, Nazi or religious bigot is to also ultimately menace the rights of the sanest and fairest of persons. To attack the rights of one man, is to attack the rights of everyone.

Herein lies the chief evil of Bill C-3. There are others. In 267A(4) an "identifiable group" is defined as "any section of the public distinguished by colour, race, religion or ethnic origin." What is the definition of religion? Who is to define it? I might choose to define the communist ideology as a religion and then I might choose to condemn it as hateful and contemptible. The implications are ridiculous. How can this bill ever become a positive part of our statutes?

The British common law derives its strength from the fact that it is an unwritten code. It is one of the great heritages we have in this country and God forbid we should adopt a substitute. I know that among supporters of the government there are many who agree with what I am saying. A few have had the courage to speak out and express their convictions. I wish they would all do so.

It was Lincoln who said that to sin by silence is to make cowards of men. In speaking to this bill, some of the government's supporters have referred indirectly to an editorial which appeared in the Globe and Mail of Tuesday, April 7. They criticized certain parts of it but they never really told us what the editorial had said. Mr. Speaker, I am so convinced about the merit of this editorial that I intend to read it into the record in its entirety in order that hon. members may know the true gist of what the writer was seeking to convey.

"The problem of trying to render synonymous law and morality is that we then come down to the question: Whose morality? Whose standards of behaviour? Whose sense of morality? Who is to determine the standard? Who is to attribute blame? Who is to say what is moral and immoral? Who is to decide when moral responsibility exists in terms of freedom of will, and when it has to be diluted in human terms because of environmental or physical causes?—In a pluralistic society there may be different standards, differing attitudes and the law cannot reflect them all. Public order, in this situation of a pluralistic society, cannot substitute for private conduct. We believe that morality is a matter for private conscience. Criminal law should reflect the public order only."

This was the very argument used by the Minister of Justice when the amendments to the Criminal Code legalizing homesexuality and amending the laws on abortion and divorce were put through this House.

Mr. Jerome: Did you support it?

Mr. Thompson: I am thinking about hon. members on the other side who then supported that premise and who now seem to be repudiating it by their arguments.

Mr. Jerome: Did you support it then?

Mr. Thompson: No. I stated very clearly my reasons for my not supporting it. Go back to the record in Hansard. There were other reasons involved. The editorial from which I have been reading continues:

The speaker: Justice Minister John Turner. The time: a year ago almost to the day. The occasion: the debate on the government's amendments to the Criminal Code liberalizing the law relating to homosexuality and abortion.

Now Mr. Turner is back in the House for the third reading of another amendment to the Criminal Code: the government's hate bill. However, he has conveniently forgotten the determined intention so often expressed by himself and Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau to separate law and morality. Mr. Trudeau's famous statement was that law doesn't belong in the bedrooms of the nation. But neither does it belong in the hearts of its citizens.

Yet that's where the hate bill would put it. The bill is a clear attempt to legislate morality. Its main section would make it a crime to communicate statements that promote hatred. Why? Not because anything follows from that. Not because public order is disturbed. Not because windows are broken or a mob becomes unruly. Not because anyone is endangered or because there is an assault or a trespass or a breach of the peace or even the likelihood of a breach of the peace. It simply says it is wrong and a crime to promote hate. Period.

In this context it has nothing to do with the public order.

That is the answer to the hon. member across the way who has been asking questions.

Our history is littered with examples of the futility of trying to regulate morality. As Harry Arthurs, Associate Dean of Osgoode Hall, has repeatedly said, it just won't work. Belief in this kind of law "rests upon a miscalculation about the efficacy of criminal law".

Mr. Turner recognized the truth of this and applied it in that same debate on homosexuality and abortion. He concluded by saying, "A penal law is not a good law unless it is an enforceable law. A law which is not enforceable is not a good law. The same applies here. And as if to compound the folly, the government would make the hate legislation even less of a law than it otherwise would be by saying that it could only be invoked with the specific consent of the Attorney-General. That changes it from law to political discretion. It would apply not to all citizens. It would apply only to the citizens Mr. Turner wanted it to apply to.

On top of that, even when he did apply it, the law would mean different things at different times. An escape clause says promoting hate would be all right—there would be such a thing as justifiable hatred—if it was for the public benefit.

Each judge, each jury, at each different point of time will have a different answer. What one day was an exercise in freedom of speech another day could become a criminal act.

Hatred can't be banned absolutely. At least the bill recognizes that. There are so many willing, even eager, to be roused to hatred over innocuous statements that an absolute ban would be terribly unjust. But in trying to define what is socially useful hatred the government has entered a catacomb of confusion. It ignores that social attitudes cannot be ruled by law and that the strength of a democracy rests on the sanity and reasonableness of an informed public.

Those words are profound, Mr. Speaker.

As a spokesman for the Canadian Civil Liberties Association said when the bill was before committee: "Many useful utterances in a democratic society incite what could be described, at the very least, as bitter feelings." It is the citizens, not the law, who must cope with these feelings. If they fail, then our society fails. And only the law will be left standing righteous and indignant and alone.

I might refer at this point to another editorial on this subject which appeared in the same paper on May 18, 1966. It reads, in part:

In Canada we have heretofore jailed people for offences they have committed. Are we now to jail them for what they only intended to do, though the opposite may have occurred, or even to jail them for what they did not intend to do, and for what did not happen anyway? That is a net from which few poor fish, indeed, may escape.

What it comes down to is that truth and freedom are fashioned, always and forever, in a furnace of controversy.

This House has proved the truth of that statement over and over again.

Someone is always uttering something to incite somebody to hatred and contempt against some group or other, and sometimes it serves the public good and sometimes it does not. Therefore, if we create a law to stop the mouths of the ugly little neo-Nazis we create a law that sometime, somewhere may be used to stop other mouths—and those other mouths may belong to the prophets and the redeemers. In the past, they often have.

I would remind the Minister of Justice of the truth of that statement. I also wish to quote at this point the statement made by Dr. Frank R. Scott, a scholar on legal and political affairs. This is what he said when he appeared before a Senate committee in April of last year:

"I don't want the state in the sitting rooms of the nation any more than I want it in the bedrooms of the nation. I think my right to intellectual freedom is even greater than my right to sexual freedom."

This is the essence of his statement.

The protection of these basic rights must not include such action as would defeat its own purpose. With the greatest respect to the hon. members who sponsored this bill, and their reasons for doing so, I say that this measure, if enacted in its present form and if carried to its ultimate end, would result in freedom of the press and freedom of speech becoming a thing of the past. Extreme caution must be exercised; the outcome might be the suppression rather than the retention of truth and justice.

Again, I emphasize that within our free and democratic society there must not be a place for discrimination, prejudice or hatred, whether in relation to colour, creed or race. Basically we shall never achieve the desired goals of freedom unless men's hearts are changed, and the resulting attitudes permit people in all their diversity to live in tolerance and peace with their neighbours. The problem is much deeper than man-made laws can reach.

If this law were carried to its full extent, I am afraid it would cover any criticism, even the telling of an Irish joke. The president of the Montreal CNTU would be behind bars for what he said to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) a few weeks ago if Bill C-3 were the law. Paragraph 267B(2) would back up every separatist. Paragraph 267C could send the editors of Maclean's to jail for their attacks on certain groups.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I am afraid that his time has expired, unless he has unanimous consent to proceed. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Thompson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and my concluding statement will be short. If this bill were law, it could even put Dr. Davidson, the president of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation behind bars for many of the statements made on the CBC. For example, there was a CBC program last Monday night which attempted to generate hatred toward the citizenry of my own province, the province of Alberta. I doubt that the answer to racial hatred is a law which only emphasizes people's differences and opens the door to bigotry and endless litigation. All citizens of Canada stand equal before the law. It is my conviction that this is the best protection for every man and group within a free democratic concept.

I also want to tell the Minister of Justice that legislation such as this so-called hate literature bill would open the way for every imaginable evil known to mankind in our society, plus some not yet known. A virtual police state would be necessary to ensure that the law would be carried out to the letter. Censorship and book burning will only be a phase in the complete loss of freedom for every Canadian.

I do not speak as a lawyer, because I am not of that profession, nevertheless I am convinced that there are sections of the Criminal Code relating to the subject of criminal libel which do apply to the problem. I would appreciate it if the Minister of Justice would take note of this. Properly used, there is no reason to think they are inadequate to give protection to the person against whom hate literature is directed.

The applicable portion of the Criminal Code is found in section 248 (1) which provides:

> A defamatory libel is matter published, without lawful justification or excuse, that is likely to injure the reputation of any person by exposing him to hatred, contempt or ridicule, or that is designed to insult the person of or concerning whom it is published.

Section 250 provides that:

> Every one who publishes a defamatory libel that he knows is false is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for five years.

Section 251 provides:

> Every one who publishes a defamatory libel is guilty of an idictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years.

Each time a new law is passed, for every right that is granted, a freedom is taken away from someone else. A law like this definitely restricts freedom of speech and of the press. The present law relating to libel maintains a most careful balance between private freedom from libel and the public interest in freedom of speech. New legislation will tend to upset this balance. The world does have evil people as well as good. The exposing of this evil is a matter of public interest, and even sometimes a matter of public duty, even though this may come within the technical category of hate literature.

We must recognize that deliberately false hate propaganda is sometimes used to bring discredit upon respectable and bona fide publications of particular political views. The technique used is to obtain a quantity of the bona fide material, and send it out with scurrilous hate literature to selected persons, who will then tend to associate the two. Here, therefore, the libel is against the victims of the hate, and against the bona fide publisher who is unfairly associated with this hate. Possibly there is need for greater protection within the law for this situation. This could be brought about by amending the present law, by extending it, rather than by replacing it.

In closing, may I emphasize again that within our free and democratic society there must be no place for discrimation, prejudice or hatred, whether it relates to colour, creed or race. Man made laws might assist, but alone they will never solve the problem. Christ put it clearly and simply when He said that "the fulfilling of the law is love. When hearts are filled with love there can be no hatred". Until they are, this problem will be with us. Moral problems are associated with the individual and are something which, in my opinion, are beyond the reaches of a law such as this. Therefore, in this respect this legislation is redundant.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the speeches made on this bill one comes to the conclusion that there is little or no difference of opinion among the members who have expressed their views. All members have contempt for hate literature and hate propaganda, however disseminated.

There are those who believe that this bill must be passed in order to show that we are in good faith. In this respect my mind goes back to an illustration that is found in the New Testament, strikingly pointed out by the man of Galilee who lives enshrined in the hearts of a billion followers. He pointed out that we can be so pharisaical, and illustrated this by saying that many of us wanted to clean up the cup on the outside and forgot about the inside, leaving it with little or no attention.

This allegory can be likened to the hearts of men. I ask myself, is it not the hearts of people and what goes on there that is far more important than this bill or any man made law? All of us have seen laws and certain regulations passed, and having passed them we smugly sat down to rest. As a matter of fact, this reminds me of an old verse that used to be quoted in schools many years ago to tardy students. It concerns a little village that existed in Italy and which over some years prospered and grew. Then, it became smug and self-complacent. The story goes this way, that Atri, in Abruzzi, a little town of ancient Roman date, was one of those little towns that climbed halfway up the hill and then sat down to rest, saying "I climb no further, come what may".

This may very well happen to us when we pass this bill; we may sit down to rest. A war between good and bad is continually being waged in the this world, in the minds of men and this bothers me. Some of us in this House remember the Volstead Act which introduced prohibition and was passed with the best intentions in the world. It followed the line that the temperance movement had followed over the years in educating people against the use of alcohol. From the moment the act was passed, it was a dismal failure; and the temperance people sat down to rest. This legislation was passed to eliminate the ravages of alcohol. It would have saved millions of lives, millions of homes and millions of dollars. But it would not work. All it did was to spawn lawlessness and disorder across this continent. Murderers and racketeers were the end result.

This recital brings me back to the point that no law can take the place of sound teaching, and I refer to the example shown by our own society in our churches, our schools and above all in our homes. All of us must bear a share of responsibility in this permissive society, a society in which we have student unrest, strikes, protest marches. It should be our purpose, our ideal, to create in the hearts of society an atmosphere of goodwill and understanding, the very purpose we are dedicated to in the destruction of hate.

I find it very strange, though I have a very high regard for the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner), as I know we all have, that the minister has brought in this bill. The provisions of this bill can reach into our homes, yes even into our bedrooms. Indeed, we have the paradoxical situation of his leader, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), having brought in a bill providing that the law has no business in the bedrooms of the nation and yet this bill contains that very power.

Who defines hate literature or who can define it properly? This is what I ask myself. I believe this bill may hoax the very people it was supposed to protect and conceivably could be used to put them in a straitjacket.

As I look back over the years, I see the racial hatreds disappearing in my lifetime. I realize that over those years some of my best friends have belonged to groups that have found themselves on many occasions the victims of hate and suspicion. Today, with the freedoms we enjoy in this country, we see this situation is rapidly disappearing. The fact that everyone who has spoken in this House to date has been in favour of the principles of this bill illustrates and proves my point beyond peradventure.

Many have expressed the fear that the passage of this bill would slow down the progress of our people toward the point when there would be no class hatred. I sincerely believe, as pointed out by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson), that 99.99 per cent of the people bear good will towards their fellow man and that there are few class or religious hatreds among people today. I believe also that everyone deplores hate literature. I have never seen anyone gloat over hate literature and if I had I would feel he should see a psychiatrist right away.

It is my submission that the greatest security for these people who have been the object of hate literature and propaganda over the years or who might become the victims of class hatred, lies with this 99.99 per cent of the people. I have much more faith in those people than in any man made laws which may nibble at our freedoms and in the long run destroy us. Yes, I have more faith in the sermon on the mount than I have in any man made law. I believe this bill would defeat the very purpose for which it was drafted.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I welcome the opportunity to speak in support of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) and to give my endorsement to the position which he has so capably enunciated.

To properly set the stage for my remarks, I should like to begin by concurring with members on both sides of the House who have stated categorically that they believe this bill is a totally unnecessary piece of legislation. I suppose we could argue the pros and cons of the intent of this bill until the next flood or until the cows come home—an expression we use out west—but I think we would still be left with the fundamental truth that no government can legislate the thoughts and emotions of people.

At a time when members of this House agree that we are living in an era wherein we have many laws which are outdated, antiquated and ineffective, and at a time when we are in the process of revising and reforming the Criminal Code, the government sees fit to put another ill-conceived and unworkable law on the statute books. I feel that the government has simply become engrossed in the principle of ruling by divine right, irrespective of the consequences.

I am not a lawyer and I do not intend to concern myself with the legal ramifications of the bill. There is little doubt in my mind, however, that the best legal minds in this country will be hard pressed to make a fair and equitable interpretation of the provisions of this bill. Even here in Parliament where laws are made, it is difficult to find three members who can arrive at a consensus as to what the government is really trying to say in Bill C-3 or what it is trying to accomplish.

I am intrigued by the implication in this bill that any person who has passed the bar examination in any one of our ten provinces, and is admitted to practice, can then justifiably argue and adjudicate in matters of love and hate. For the first time in my life I am being asked to believe that human emotions can be directed and controlled by law in the same way as murder or auto theft, or other human acts. I reject this theory in totality.

Many of my colleagues and other members of the House have taken issue with the so-called safeguards against the misuse or abuse of the provisions of this bill. Where the provisions of a law are open to individual interpretation and the application of such interpretations are left to the discretion of the courts and jurists, then there are no safeguards for the one person who is entitled to that safeguard or guarantee, namely the one who is charged under the law. We have here a law that seeks to control and regulate the emotions of love and hate, and a law that allows the courts of the land to interpret an alleged crime in any way it sees fit. I fear this bill is an open invitation to the commission of gross misrepresentation.

The bill states that a person can legally dispense inflammatory material about other persons and groups if he can prove that such statements are intended for the public benefit. It further states that it is not an offence if the inflammatory statements are factual. I wonder whether this is some kind of a new political or legal jargon. I wonder whether this is a new language that is being written into the statute books. I wonder whether this government is trying to perfect a new and unique language of law, all on its own. If this is the case, perhaps the government will also operate classes in this new law for the benefit of the country's lawyers and jurists. I find it difficult to conceive of any traditional lawyer or judge being able to discharge his respective responsibilities and functions equitably unless he is let in on the open secret of this new terminology.

I am puzzled by the government's position that it can legislate against such an emotion as hate without first taking steps to remove the motivation behind such an emotion. Hate is not a physical quality. Hate is an emotion, a mental quality. So this government is trying to control events after the fact rather than attack the root causes of the problems.

The bill is meant to eliminate or at least minimize the risk of riots or other physical violence by making it illegal to express such public criticisms against a person or persons or identifiable groups on the basis of colour, creed or religion or ethnic origin. Perhaps the one paragraph that should have been included was one to the effect that if the bill were passed we would have an instant flowery utopia.

Hate Propaganda

Perhaps those who drafted this bill should have done a little more research into the effectiveness of other such laws already on the books, such as the laws concerning the illegal use of drugs, for example. We have strict laws with regard to the possession or trafficking of harmful drugs such as marijuana, LSD and so on. At the same time, the drug problem is becoming worse every day. But here again we find it is easier to have a law than to look into the root causes of the problem in an effort to find the motivation behind the usage of these drugs. Another example is the law which prevents farmers giving surplus wheat or other grains to their fellow human beings, even though these people may be on the verge of starvation. To me it is incomprehensible in this supposed age of reason, and in these times of alleged great affluence, these times when we merely pay lip service to humanity and humanism, that we should take up the important time of this House in dealing with a piece of futile legislation such as we have before us today. As much as I favour the efforts of mankind to eliminate hate and suspicion from the world, any attempt to legislate hatred out of sight and out of mind is an exercise in futility.

I dislike the word "hate". I would like to see it removed from the dictionary. I believe there certainly are other ways in which we can remove the hatred, if that is what we wish to call it, that exists in our nation and in other nations. Inequalities and iniquities of individuals in the same society are certainly the underlying causes of hatred and distrust. Any government would be remiss if it did not attack the problem from this direction rather than create a set of laws on top of the laws we already have. In this respect our present government is running true to form by taking the easy way out. As the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) capably pointed out in his speech last night, if this legislation is enacted the government then can sit back content that it has disposed of the problems of hatred and distrust among all our citizens and between our many ethnic groups.

I do not believe the problem can be disposed of so easily. Unfortunately, human nature cannot be packaged up and delivered in the right amounts to the right places when needed. Equality of individuals in their societies must precede legislation when one is dealing with human emotions. Equality means equal opportunity to act, to speak and to participate. Equality breeds respect for the individual. This is where the whole process of eliminating the root causes of hatred must begin. Before you have equality you must have mutual trust. That mutual trust can come about only through mutual consideration and understanding. Perhaps hon. members may feel I am somewhat old fashioned in my approach to the humanistic problems and perhaps more so because we are living in a very technocratic and complex age. Perhaps this is where we have gone off the track. I must confess I am old fashioned enough to still believe in the strong family unit as the cornerstone of any free and healthy society. We are all witness to the consequence of the collapse of the family unit as the basic unit in Canadian society. There is even stronger evidence of this to the south of us.

Do we need more evidence? Must we fall all the way to the bottom of the ladder before we realize we are losing our grip? I wonder how long it will take our present government to realize we must step back a pace or two in an effort to rescue the individual in our society from the oppressions of want and lack of equality of opportunity. I am one who believes we have everything in this country we need to eliminate the causes of hatred, the causes of discontent and the causes of distrust. I do not believe we need restrictive laws or legislation to control human emotions. Human emotions cannot be restricted. When one tries to restrict human emotions that are striving for expression in thought and ideals, I say one is inviting catastrophe. In Bill C-3 we have the seeds of an enormous catastrophe that will flourish unless we deal with root causes rather than trying to legislate against inevitable consequences. If the government is at loss for a starting point, if it is unable to establish guidelines for a program that would elevate the individual to his rightful status, I might recommend they start with the Ten Commandments. This set of basic tenets has served humanity well for almost 2,000 years.

Perhaps the government might re-emphasize these tenets and rededicate the citizens of this country to the application of the golden rule.

I do not know of anyone who has come up with a better set of standards for human conduct than these two I have enunciated. Of course, if the government should elect to try a basic humanistic approach to our social problems, this would be more difficult than pushing needless legislation through this House. But then perhaps it is time for the government to get up off its majority and get down to work. I could furnish the government with a long list of names of my constituents who think the government should get to work and face this issue squarely.

To return to the provisions of the bill that would protect ethnic groups from insult, discrimination and slander, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) last night, I can only say that I as a member of an ethnic group am not unfamiliar with the consequences of human indifference or intolerance for others. I, too, have suffered some consequences of intolerance, bigotry and insult. My particular constituency is composed of pockets of people of various ethnic origins. But, Mr. Speaker, neither I nor my constituents have ever believed, nor do we believe now, that such influences could be legislated out of sight or out of mind. I would not be so naïve as to suggest that I, as a citizen of Canada, would be a better Canadian if this law had been in effect when I was a young boy; nor do the people whom I represent feel they would be better Canadians if this legislation had been in effect for the last 100 years. Whatever insults they were subjected to have been eliminated only by hard work and by dedication to the basic human ideals in which they believe.

It is only by learning to appreciate the freedoms with which we are blessed that we can appreciate what it would be like if we did not have them. I say that chipping away at individual freedoms, such as freedom of expression and freedom of choice, will never restore human dignity or nurture human dignity. We need only restore that one quality that is needed to preserve our society and make it flourish. Many of my colleagues have mentioned the fact that we are being led by demagogues masquerading as parliamentarians. If this bill should become law and our fears concerning the real intent of Information Canada are realized, then there is little doubt that demagoguery will flourish in our midst.

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): I should like to speak in support of this amendment. I would say regarding the so-called hate literature bill that, however commendable its intent, I am convinced it is impossible to accomplish this intent by any legislative device. I believe further that the dangers of misuse of this proposed legislation far outweigh any small good that it might hope to achieve.

The first thing that comes to mind with regard to a measure like this is a statement attributed to President Lyndon Johnson of the United States. He said that every piece of legislation should be examined, not in the light of the good it will do if it is properly administered but in the light of the damage it will do if it is improperly administered. I say that there is a great deal of legislation that goes through that should be considered in this light.

I can well understand the strong feelings of some members of minority groups, notably members of the Canadian Jewish community who back this measure. They have suffered much from organized hate campaigns, and even today I suppose they continue at times to suffer some embarrassment and harassment. I deplore this as much as any Canadian but I do not believe that a legislative measure such as the one we have before us will end this persecution, and it could well bring about for other minority groups the very oppression its supporters seek to end. To the best of my knowledge no similar legislation anywhere at any time has been effective in controlling hate. On the contrary, I can see the very likely possibility of this measure being abused to a great extent.

This bill defines an "identifiable group" as being one distinguished by colour, race, religion or ethnic origin. Where would this leave Negroes who, in some cases, have adopted as their slogan "kill whitey"? How would it help them? Would it not work to their disadvantage if they used this slogan? Perhaps even the more reasonable groups would find it would work to their disadvantage.

This bill makes it a criminal offence for anyone to incite or promote hatred or contempt of any identifiable group within the community, and inciting or promoting takes in everything, even to "gestures".

Back at the end of February—to be exact on February 26—there were newspaper stories in the Globe and Mail about a panel discussion at Halifax on the cultural and religious life of people in the Halifax-Dartmouth area. During the discussion a young black man threatened to bomb Halifax city hall if Negroes in the community were not treated more fairly. If this bill were passed he would be wide open to prosecution. Is this the sort of thing that Canadians really want to see happen in a free society? Who is to say where rhetorical emphasis, such as many similar threats of violence really are, ends and serious advocacy of hatred and contempt begins?

Over the past two or three years similar wild threats, similar appeals to direct action and the employment of organized intolerance and hatred have featured controversy in our cities, on our campuses, and sometimes in our politics. I believe that the existing provisions of our Criminal Code are quite adequate to control deliberate propagation of hate campaigns and the dissemination of the so-called hate literature. The more law we have on the subject, the greater the margin for abuse.

To my mind, education and the gradual achievement of greater mutual understanding remain the best and only true means of ending such social diseases as discrimination and inter-group hatred. The Globe and Mail issue of February 26 contained an editorial about Contrast, a newspaper for blacks published in Toronto. It referred to a cartoon in Contrast showing Abraham Lincoln in the garb of the Ku Klux Klan and suggesting that he had been "a white man's president" only. The same newspaper subsequently stated that "the resentment against and hatred of whitey...is becoming more widespread".

If this bill becomes law, will discussion of the tensions between black and white, which were apparent in the above quotation, be suppressed by law? If so, will such suppression merely build up pressures that will eventually break out in real and bloody violence? We wonder if this is the real aim of Bill C-3.

If we take a close look at Canadian society today we will find many examples of groups within it that are in a state of great tension in their relationships. Events in the Middle East, for example, have bred intolerable tensions between the Canadian Jewish and Arab communities. Are such innocent participants in this struggle as writers of letters to newspaper editors, who are often carried away into intemperate expression, to be prosecuted under this proposed amendment to the Criminal Code? What about the continuing tension between the English and French language groups? Are we going to prosecute the spokesmen of the native peoples who frequently accuse the white Canadian establishment of pursuing a policy of genocide? When we look at some of the statements of one of the Indian leaders, namely Mr. Cardinal, we realize that many of them can be termed inflammatory. How would they fit into the context of this bill?

We even have great tension and disagreement growing up between one region of Canada and another. No one can deny that the West, for instance, is disenchanted to the point of talking about economic independence and even political and constitutional separation. Such a state of feeling breeds violent and intemperate words. Perhaps it is the intention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) to use this convenient amendment to jail western spokesmen who claim Ottawa is unjust and unfeeling.

There is so much afoot in our country today, so many areas of conflict, that hatred, contempt and ridicule are very easy to generate. But I do not believe for one moment that we can abate this sort of thing by piously passing an act of Parliament and then washing our hands of the situation until someone forces a prosecution against his adversary. To me, this bill is an open invitation to endless and barren legal disputes. All we are really doing is giving hatred and contention another dimension. Every group with a bone to pick with another group can now shift the battle to the legal and judicial arena. We would be far better employed in this House considering ways and means of broadening, understanding and modifying intemperate and dangerous public expression and action than in trying to legislate it under the rug.

It has been increasingly evident, and not only in Canada, that we feel we can legislate almost anything away and that legislation is the salvation of everything. If we have this much faith in legislation surely someone, the government possibly, could place legislation before the House on prosperity. A bill on that subject would be about as impractical as the one we have here. During this session we have had legislation to improve the Post Office and legislation with regard to language. Has the legislation improved the mail service? Has it improved the relationship between the language groups? I do not think it has been any more effective in these areas than it will be—

Mr. Woolliams: They are great legislators. That is all they do.

Mr. Downey: —in the area of hate. The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) mentioned a basic moral code and the ten commandments. I would add that what we need in this country is a basic pride of individualism, a basic pride in our country. This must be developed. We cannot continually downgrade our heritage, our institutions and the family unit and expect to substitute legislation for them. We cannot make citizens merely social security numbers, entirely divorced from personal responsibility, and then expect to fill this gap with legislation.

When looking at the proposed tax reform I notice that the idea of treating the family as a taxation unit has been left out almost entirely. This is only one area that tends to bind society together. We may find that legislation in many other areas is not necessary if we can conduct our affairs in a manner to perpetuate the individual and the family unit.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote from an editorial in the Globe and Mail of February 26, which I mentioned earlier. It reads as follows:

> Democracy depends upon there being a public that is predominantly sane and reasonable. A public that can discuss volatile issues—that must discuss volatile issues—and find fair and reasonable solutions. If the government has lost hope that this kind of democracy can continue to exist then it has lost faith in democracy itself. No law can produce this kind of public. No law can protect minorities where this kind of public no longer exists. There will always be those in whom hate can be readily generated. There may not always be those with the strength and skill to combat hate. The way to build those strengths and skills is not with laws written in fear. It is in providing the circumstances and the opportunity in which citizens can grow to their full potential. It is in providing good education, fair standards of living and an equitable and responsive system of government. Provide these and there will be no need for a hate bill.

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, from time to time in this House an issue arises upon which members have to make a choice in conscience. This is easier for members of the opposition than for members on this side of the House.

Mr. Woolliams: Do you want to join us?

Mr. Otto: I admire the members on this side who spoke in opposition to this bill, and I fully realize that it is a struggle to come to terms with the two issues in reality.

This debate boils down to two issues, Mr. Speaker. First, there is no doubt that this bill imposes some restriction on the freedom of speech and any amount of rationalization, any word trying to deny this, just will not be accepted. Second, the question arises whether indeed criminal law can deal with immorality. It is with these two points that I wish to deal.

When we examine freedom, we are inclined to imagine some Valhalla in which freedom is power. This country is a pioneer country where a man can stand up, speak up and be effective. Everyone can speak to himself, but to be effective speech must be listened to. Times have changed many stratas of society. In the union movement, for example, it is still possible for a member of the rank and file to say that he disagrees with the executive, but the consequences can be drastic. In many cases, he may find himself laid off rather quickly even if he has seniority. I know of many instances when opposition to the election of a slate of officers has not been effective.

When we say freedom of speech, what type of freedom do we mean? To be effective and to be listened to we must have some medium of communication. It is true that the powerful and the great have freedom. Of course, newspaper commentators who are widely read have freedom, as have television commentators. All those who have power are free but to the little fellow, the average citizen, freedom is meaningless. The whole idea of freedom of speech has changed from 100 years ago when everyone more or less had the same use of the communications media of the day. It is no longer sacred as it once was. We have to live with the facts of life, and we have to live with the restrictions on freedom of speech in corporate enterprises. We have to live with the restriction on freedom of speech in this House, where at one time members spoke as they saw fit and party politics were not as well entrenched. Today, a member does this at his own cost and it is no longer possible to say that any member of this House is free to speak according to his conscience. Freedom of speech is proscribed because there is a party structure, so there is no such thing as absolute freedom of speech, as the minister pointed out.

There is something else to be dealt with in connection with the bill. We have a new order of things in the world. Two, three or even four hundred years ago, race hatred was not too dangerous. Indeed, when nationalities and races were fairly immobile the differences did not much matter. When the Normans conquered England, and that period of history lasted for 400 years, the Anglo-Saxons hated the Normans and vice versa. When the hordes of Genghis Khan came in through south central Europe and settled in what is now Hungary and Roumania, hate existed for generations and was only solved by intermarriage and a complete merging. Consider what we have today.

McLuhan has said we live in a global village. Great numbers of people move from country to country. Canada has experienced immigration and the United Kingdom has experienced immigration. European workers go to England each year. People are mobile; groups are mobile and therefore at this time it is much more important to make sure that identifiable groups as defined in the bill are not the subjects of hatred because the consequences of hatred would be drastic in this country. Who would ever imagine that in the United Kingdom there would be public utterances, supported by many people, directed against West Indians and East Indians. This has happened. If that can happen in a country that treasures freedom, and that has never had a history of racial tension, then it can happen elsewhere. It could happen here. It has already happened here. Large numbers of immigrants have come in who must find jobs in our labour force. They will cause resentment. So long as it is open for anyone to pinpoint a member of a group and say, "that man is dangerous; he should be hated," the country may face trouble.

Let no one think that we have no history of racial tension. Recently at a legal convention I told lawyers about a very serious piece of legislation which affected a group of people of Japanese extraction on the West coast. They were born in Canada and were Canadians. This legislation rooted them out of their homes, took away their farms and scattered them throughout the country. You know, that was not so long ago; yet one would imagine it would be impossible for Canadians to do that today. What was done was done because the people's skins were yellow. No one could say they were a threat to the country, because most of them were second and third generation Canadians. Because their skins were yellow, they were singled out. Therefore, whoever says in this House that this will never happen again in Canada should pause and consider because it may.

May I say a word about morality and the law? I agree to some extent with those who say that morality cannot be legislated. On the other hand, who is to guide the mores of this nation? Not long ago the church guided us but not many would agree that the church today exerts effective control or guidance over the mores of this nation. I think the churches are floundering under the weight of this problem and have not solved it. Prior to the Christian era mores were dictated by the military establishment. That establishment dictated what was right and wrong. Later the churches told us what was right and wrong, but they have now lost much of their control. For example, not long ago the medical profession said, "We now are the ones to decide when a person is dead." They said when the mind no longer functions, the person is dead. Never mind his heart, and it does not matter if a man breathes. But there was no mention of a soul. Clearly, it is now the medical profession that says when a man is dead or not dead, and not the church. Euthanasia is being promoted by the medical profession.

A new philosophy has not arisen in our civilization for the past 100 years. Who, then, shall control the mores of the nation if the church does not? If the government does not control them, will it be the technocrats or the professional men or others? We have a drug problem in this country and, as an hon. member who spoke yesterday said, it is not the church that will determine the rights or wrongs of drug consumption but the lawmakers. There are many other problems, moral problems, in which the church is not involved. Therefore any argument that says the law has nothing to do with morality no longer applies. Morality is now part of the law.

It has been said in this debate that it should be the social sanction of the community rather than the law which ought to dictate morality. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the community no longer has any power of sanction in the social sense. That power does not exist. That original power of social sanction has been broken up into fragments; but we still have retained one power. That power is exerted by the awesome weight of the criminal law, which affects mores. I do not think there will be many prosecutions under this law because, as an hon. member said yesterday, the exemptions are wide enough to drive a herd of elephants through. I think he said, "Drunken elephants". The exemptions to the infractions are so wide that the bill is practically meaningless, except to this extent: children will no longer, we hope, hear their mothers, fathers, uncles or relatives say, "That person belongs to a certain race, and they all ought to be driven out of the country." When it becomes generally known that such talk is illegal, it will not be readily accepted.

Why do I say that? I say it because the criminal law is still very powerful and the awesome authority of the Crown is still something people understand. But even if there are no prosecutions under this legislation, it will still be effective. It will carry the stamp of approval of this House. The people of this nation will know that hatred because of race, creed, colour or religion is not acceptable and that the whole authority of the nation is behind the legislation.

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for giving me the opportunity to participate briefly in the debate this afternoon. I have listened to a goodly number of speeches, every one of them expressing something significant about Bill C-3. I want to draw to the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) certain information, certain facts and certain concerns about this bill. As I see it, this bill is being devised as a tool of the government. It will do nothing but suppress news. The people in the press gallery will wonder whether what they report in their papers will contravene the terms of the bill. I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that away back in 1935 the notable premier of Alberta (Mr. Aberhart) introduced legislation that would have served the same purpose as this bill. The title of the bill was different, but its purpose was the same. It was designed to suppress the free expression of opinion by that media. That legislation, passed by the Alberta legislature, was ruled ultra vires by the Supreme Court of Canada.

I do not know what other members think of the talents of our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) but I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that he gives a great deal of consideration to any legislation, particularly of this type, that may come before this chamber. I am sure he has carefully considered the fact that if he were to bring in a bill to suppress the freedom of the press, it would indeed become involved in legal precedents established by the Supreme Court of Canada. Indeed, it would be at variance with the Bill of Rights and other legal precedents.

I noticed with interest this afternoon when mention was made of Ron Gostick, who writes for the Central Intelligence Agency, that he was lightly passed off as being of something less than a credible character. This man has written some articles which I am sure are somewhat offensive. If they were written about me, I would feel they were offensive. Articles were written dealing with the history of the Prime Minister of this country and of another individual, Jean-Louis Gagnon, who was recently appointed to a position of some stature. This government has failed to take advantage of existing laws under the Criminal Code to prevent this type of publication being circulated amongst Canadians. I simply say that even though this government may feel this man is not credible, and that attention should not be paid to him, the fact is there are defamation laws that could prevent this man from writing articles of this kind.

Those Canadians who come in contact with the CIA publications are concerned about what is being written about some of our heads of state. Why the Minister of Justice or indeed the Prime Minister does not initiate proceedings to stop this kind of publication is beyond me. I suggest that the best way to stop it is to pass Bill C-3. It would automatically bring this writer under the terms of that bill and subject him to whatever punishment the court sees fit.

Bill C-3 is not going to prevent hate propaganda. It will not stop it. It may stop the publication of it, but it is not going to stop the verbal expression of hate propaganda. This afternoon the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) eloquently stated that no government, bill or legislation, intended, proposed or otherwise can legislate love, tolerance and compassion. What concerns me, Mr. Speaker, is that the Prime Minister has expressed a very strong view that he would like to see this country headed into a republic, indeed, a presidency. If such is the case, this may be the first step in that direction. This bill will prevent the press from expressing a point of view that might be unacceptable to the government.

Today we are conducting the functions of Parliament somewhere between the British parliamentary system and the system of the United States. If the Prime Minister is advocating a presidency, I do not want a bill passed which will stop the newspapers from reporting his intentions. I wish to know whether we are going to have a presidency like that of the United States or a benevolent dictatorship and, if so, what kind? I do not think it is fair to ask this House to pass a bill that will attempt to do nothing more than stifle the free expression of the press, which may well expose a government that is bent on destroying democracy.

I think this is the opportune time to talk about what has happened to date. We have read viewpoints expressed in the newspapers and have heard them over the radio and on television. We hear points of view expressed every night on the program "Viewpoint" following the national news which at times are extremely critical of the government, the opposition and indeed sometimes of this institution. I am not sure who is going to interpret the rules under which the free press of this country is going to operate. Recently, with the blessing of the Minister of Justice, the omnibus bill was passed. It has done nothing more than legalize amorality in Canada, homosexuality, indiscriminate abortions and uncontrolled divorces. Now, there is talk about legalizing pot. We are going to bankrupt the middle class of Canadians. We have set up Information Canada and now the government is introducing a hate literature bill which will prevent the press from expressing a clear point of view on all these matters. The government has taken from us the flag, our Military traditions, our respect in international affairs and has taken from the Canadian people their respect for Parliament. To date, the press has expressed a very strong point of view in this regard.

Under the guise of protecting the minority groups, I fear that Bill C-3 is designed to take from the news media that free expression of opinion. That is my main concern. I ask the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice, who is asking for this bill to be passed? Surely, it is not the French people. It is not the English people. It cannot be the Ukrainians. It is not the Jews. I know people in every one of these social structures of life. The most interesting after dinner speakers at banquets are usually Jewish. They tell more stories about themselves and their race than any other nationality. To suggest that they are the ones who want this bill passed is complete and utter nonsense. Since I am not able to establish who is asking for this bill, I ask the Minister of Justice to give me this information. What action on the part of the Government has prompted this sort of thing? Who is asking for this kind of a measure? Is it what I alluded to earlier, the fear of the government because they have some ulterior motive in mind in so far as the free institution of Parliament is concerned in the intervening years? The only way to accomplish their objective, the prevention of the exposure of their plan, is by legislative action to bring such statements under the terms of the hate literature bill.

The Minister of Justice knows we cannot legislate compassion, that we cannot legislate tolerance of one ethnic group by another any more than we can legislate tolerance as between one church group or another or between a man and his neighbour. What will this legislation accomplish, then? I say it will prevent the free expression of opinion in print, and this is what we should be concerned about.

Mr. Philip G. Givens (York West): I did not intend to speak on this subject. I took it for granted, naïve as I am, that there would be practically no problem about getting this legislation through Parliament. I guess I was mistaken. I have sat here during the last two days, concerned about this bill, as I have been for the last several years. Although I have heard many theories propounded I must say I have never listened to so much balderdash and tommyrot in my life as I have heard on this particular subject.

It is not just a matter of whether the government can get a bill through this House. It is a matter of how all the Members of Parliament who sit here feel toward this serious and important problem. One hon. member wants to know who has asked for this legislation. I have not made a survey in nine of the provinces of Canada. But I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that wherever I go in metropolitan Toronto hundreds of people ask me time and time again: What is happening to the hate literature bill? Why has it not been passed? Why is it taking so long? Many hon. members seem to be so concerned about the perpetrators of wrong-doing that they fail to express the slightest concern for the victims—those who feel hurt, those who believe they have a right to go to the government and say: Do something to protect us, something to remove the fear and anxiety we feel about this hate literature going through the mails.

Mr. Woolliams: Are you a victim?

Mr. Givens: Yes, I was a victim.

I heard one hon. member, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan), talk about literature which was being sent out attacking a certain race and depicting a swastika. Somebody said: "Who does that hurt?" Well, Mr. Speaker, it would hurt you if you were a member of the particular minority group which felt the sting of the swastika and everything it symbolizes.

Everybody says it is impossible to cure bigotry and hatred by legislation, that an educational process is required. Do hon. members not understand that it is part of the educational process for Members of Parliament to stand up, once and for all, and declare that the dissemination of hatred cannot be condoned in this country? I cannot understand how it is possible for members of the opposition to talk the way they have been talking. The province of Ontario has enacted this kind of legislation. I have in mind the Fair Employment Practices Act which has proven to be a golden chapter in the history of this country. Its provisions with respect to anti-defamation, fair employment practices and the establishment of the Fair Employment Practices Commission have been an example to all the other provinces of Canada.

There are those who say this legislation will not work. If it won't work, what are you worried about? So, it won't work. The time has come for us to do some experimentation in connection with sociological legislation. If those engaged in the field of science and technology were as afraid to experiment, as hon. members are afraid to experiment with this kind of legislation, we would never have put a man on the moon. If this legislation won't work, what are hon. members so afraid of?

When I was mayor of Toronto I used to look forward to Sundays with dread because some kook would go down to the park with a swastika on his arm and a bunch of henchmen. Thousands would be there, one never knew what would happen, yet there was nothing we could do about it because we did not have the legislative power to deal with that kind of situation. We were told we should go to the Parliament of Canada. Now hon. members say legislation is not the solution for everything. It is true that legislation against murder does not prevent murders from being committed; legislation against rape does not save people from rape. Nevertheless we pass laws against these crimes because they constitute anti-social conduct and because decent-minded people are opposed to these practices. If hon. members are opposed to the kind of practices we have been considering in connection with hate literature, they should stand up and vote for this bill.

I say to the Minister of Justice and to all who are concerned with the operation of the law that I have always felt there was a gap in the law here. If I were to punch another member of this House on the nose and draw blood, my action would constitute a cause for laying a criminal charge; it would constitute a cause for an action in a civil court for assault. But if a person belongs to a minority group, and the kind of conduct about which we have been talking for years and years makes him anxious, fearful for his citizenship, wondering whether his children have a future in this country, he has no redress at all. I say this is wrong. In this day and age we talk a great deal about mental health and emotional disturbance, and we usually confine our attention in this field to children. Unfortunately, there are people who still feel this way when they are no longer children. They are still hurt; they are still scared. When I sat in my office in that great City Hall, people came to me, rolled up their sleeves and showed me the tattoos they had from Auschwitz. I thought they needed some protection from what has been going on. I have visited Auschwitz. I have visited the camps at Birkenau and Mydanek. It was not only Jews who were destroyed in those places. Poles, Czechoslovaks, Ukrainians were murdered by the hundreds of thousands. Let us be mindful of this. We are not dealing with Jewish legislation.

I say it will be a disgrace to Parliament and to the country if we fail to pass this bill. We have passed bills protecting homosexuals, and rightly so. We have passed laws dealing with abortion, and rightly so. We have passed laws establishing breathalyzer tests because we were concerned about the hazards created by drunken drivers. We are not asking anybody to set aside $50 million as we did with respect to the Official Languages Act which was brought in to deal—by legislation—with another problem which has arisen in this country. We are asking for no money. If racism were virulent in this country it would be too late to pass this bill. We should pass it now because racism is not rampant in Canada. Then again, if we pass this bill and it proves to be took weak, or too strong, it can always be amended. I notice that 80 per cent of the legislation going through this House constitutes amendments to bills already passed. There is nothing about this measure which would make it unalterable, like the laws of the Medes and Persians. If it has to be changed it can be changed. In the words of Franklin Roosevelt, you have nothing to fear but fear itself.

Maybe hon. members just do not want to vote for this thing. I say they should pass it as a warning by all members of the House of Commons to the bigots and spewers of hate that the Parliament of Canada does not condone this kind of anti-social behaviour.

If hon. members do condone this sort of thing, of course, then I understand how they are going to vote. But I contend that if we do not pass this bill we will set back brotherhood in this country 100 years. All of the dinners I have attended in connection with brotherhood affairs, at which I have seen Members of Parliament, members of provincial legislatures and members of municipal governments sitting there nodding and ayeing, will stick in my throat if I continue to hear the sort of arguments that have been made at such functions and which are being re-echoed in this House.

Failure to pass the bill will set back the cause of brotherhood, the interfaith movement and the interrelationships between the various minority groups in this country 100 years. Everything we have done in the past to try to eradicate, to remedy, to ameliorate the situation in this country where there are so many minority groups, not simply two founding races, will all have been a hypocritical exercise in futility. I, therefore, plead with the members of the House of Commons, for the reasons I have indicated, please to pass Bill C-3.

Hon. Hugh John Flemming (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, the speech to which we have just listened is a very good indication that there is a great deal of difference of opinion between the members of this chamber. It was not my intention to make any extended remarks on the bill. However, I do think there are various aspects of the bill, and the principles that are behind the change that is suggested, that are deserving of more consideration than I think they have received.

In the first place, I think that any amendment to the Criminal Code—and I bring this particularly to the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner)—is in itself of sufficient importance to deserve much attention. Yet I observe that there are only about half a dozen members in evidence today supporting the government, with a few more members over on this side. It appears to me that, in view of the importance of this bill, it could very properly be said that we should have a little better attendance than we have this afternoon.

The previous speaker suggested that the bill is going to remedy the various matters of which he complained. I question whether the bill would have any such result. On the other hand—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Minister of Justice is rising on a point of order.

[Mr. Givens.]

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the hon. member, whom I have known for a long time, but I do not think he would want to leave the impression in the House that this debate has not been a very vigorous one, and throughout most of the time very well attended. This is the third day and perhaps interest is lagging as the debate goes on; but it has been a very well attended debate.

Mr. Flemming: Mr. Speaker, that interruption was absolutely uncalled for. I said that there were half a dozen members or thereabouts sitting on the opposite side. The minister apparently had to put something on the record to explain to anybody who reads it why there were not more of his members present. He said we have had three days of debate and the opposition kept talking for so long that they wore him out. I expect that will probably be his answer.

My concern about the bill, or part of it at least, is the threat that it poses to freedom of speech. I think it should be possible, within the limits of the truth, for people to express opinions on public platforms across the country. If their opponents suggest that those opinions are not justified, then their opponents have the opportunity to contradict them, or they have the opportunity quickly to propose an alternative opinion. Then, under out democratic system, people have the responsibility, for example in a general election, to decide which view is correct. That is the proper method and is something that we should cherish.

In my opinion, when we place on the statute books a law that might be construed as a restriction on freedom of speech, then we are dealing with a matter that is very vital to the well-being of every citizen of this country.

The previous speaker suggested that this bill would accomplish a great deal. I would question what it is going to accomplish.

Mr. Givens: It is worth trying.

Mr. Flemming: I do not think we should be experimenting. Before I go further in my rambling remarks, may I suggest that we have had some very illustrious ministers of justice. I hope my hon. friend, the present Minister of Justice, will go down in history as being among those great men; I believe he will. He has a home in my province so he has made a start in that direction as far as residence is concerned. However, neither the right hon. Mr. St. Laurent nor the hon. Mr. Lapointe found any reason to pass such a bill as this.

What has happened since the present Minister of Justice has occupied that position to bring about the need for this legislation? The hon. member who just made an eloquent speech mentioned that the Second World War ended in 1945, which is 25 years ago, so it appears nothing has happened recently to bring about the need for this particular bill.

Mr. Brewin: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Flemming: Yes.

Mr. Brewin: Has he had the advantage of reading the report of the royal commission, of which Dean Cohen was chairman and of which several distinguished members of this House, including the present Prime Minister, were members, which clearly pointed out in detail some vigorous, hateful, anti-Semitic and anti-Negro literature that was deliberately being circulated in this country? Has he had the advantage of reading the report and learning about those facts? If he has, then how does he square that with the remarks that he is now making?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Flemming: Not often do my friends opposite applaud remarks that come from the group to my left.

Mr. Loiselle: If they make good sense, we applaud.

Mr. Flemming: I should like to answer the question posed by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) by saying that it is my understanding that the matters which were complained of originated largely in the United States. This bill will not affect them at all. I would ask the hon. member who has just spoken why the authorities did not do something to ban such literature from the mails? That is the way to control hate literature as far as despatching it by mail is concerned.

The hon. member for York West (Mr. Givens), for whom I have great respect, talked about the city of Toronto. I should like to tell him something about the province of New Brunswick. I have never received so many letters urging me to take the greatest amount of objection to any bill as I have to this one. The people are fearful, they are afraid. They are concerned about what this bill will do to their liberties.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): More than the white paper?

Mr. Flemming: The white paper affects people's pockets, but this bill affects their freedom. This may not be important to my hon. friend from St. Boniface, but it is important to a lot of other people, and, as I say, they have expressed concern.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Let us go back to the amendment to the Criminal Code. This is only my own opinion but I suggest that an amendment to the Criminal Code which involves, after all, the behaviour of individuals, should not be passed by Parliament with less than a two thirds vote. These amendments are beyond ordinary acts of government which call for opposition and criticism. These things affect the lives of every individual. I express that opinion, but I do not expect it will have a great deal of effect because the bill is still before us.

I have strong views about additions to the Criminal Code. If we were dealing with something that was already there and wanted, as my friend who has just spoken suggested, to make a minor change, that would be one thing. But in this regard we are going into a brand new realm of activity so far as the Criminal Code is concerned, so the consequences should be examined very carefully.

I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether he will explain to this House why these additions are necessary. He has not done that as yet. Has there been any indication of hate propaganda, generally speaking, distributed in Canada in the last few years or since he became the Minister of Justice? I ask him to answer that question.

An hon. Member: Ask me.

Mr. Flemming: I will in time. Has there been in the history of Canada, and we have had many distinguished ministers of justice, any indication that there has been a demand for this sort of thing? The minister has not answered that question. Has there been anything in our history that shows that previous Ministers of Justice had such demands made on them for this sort of thing?

We have our law on libel and we have our law on defamation of character. We have various laws. I have always felt that the important thing about what people say about you is not that they say it, but whether or not it is true.

An hon. Member: Then, let us set up a defence.

Mr. Flemming: I would not say anything that would bother my friend directly opposite. He is a very nice young fellow actually, and I would not say anything against his character, you may be sure. I might differ with him as far as opinion is concerned, but I would not want to be put in jail for that. That would not be the proper thing because he has hardly grown up yet. But I was talking about ministers of justice, and we have had a lot of them. Is there anything on record to indicate that they have been concerned in the past about hate propaganda? We had the distinguished minister of justice from the province of Quebec, Mr. Lapointe. Is there anything on record that indicates this second in command under Mackenzie King for many years was concerned about hate propaganda in his province? In so far as I am concerned, the answer is no.

Did the ex-premier of Manitoba who was the minister of justice here for a good many years, the hon. Mr. Garson, leave anything on the record that suggests he was besieged by people worrying about hate propaganda? I suggest there is none at all. Did the hon. Mr. Fulton find anything of this kind when he was the Minister of Justice? Certainly there was nothing of which we know. Do we have anything on record to indicate that the Hon. Donald Fleming, who came from the city of Toronto, was worried when he was Minister of Justice about this problem? He apparently was not subjected to the same complaints the speaker before me referred to when he was the Minister of Justice. At least we heard no talk about this?

Did the hon. Mr. Favreau, when he was the Minister of Justice—he was a very fine and distinguished gentleman—find anything of this kind in so far as Quebec was concerned? We are not aware of anything. What conclusion can we come to? We can only come to the conclusion that something has happened recently that brought about this need. I do not believe the demand for this bill emanated under the present Minister of Justice.

Mr. Flemming: Will he answer the questions? We have the right to know the answers.

The only thing that makes me feel reasonably satisfied and reasonably content about this matter is the knowledge that no action can be instituted without the consent of the Attorney General. At the present time that is a safeguard in my opinion, because I have knowledge of the character of the man who occupies that position. However, I do not know who is going to occupy it a year or two years from now.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): It is the provincial Attorneys General.

Mr. Flemming: It is the provincial Attorneys General. Then, I take back everything I have said about being content. I am not content any more because if the Minister of Justice is not going to occupy that position he will not have anything to do with it.

On one occasion when I was in London, England, I went into Hyde Park. People were standing on boxes there criticizing everything the government was doing. They were criticizing royalty and the royal family. They were having a field day and a great time. As far as the government of the United Kingdom is concerned, this is perfectly all right and in order. We should learn something from this because that is an old, established society over there which has enjoyed Parliamentary government for a long time. Apparently the people in the United Kingdom are encouraged to get these things off their chests by talking about them. Having talked about them, they feel a lot better and perhaps do not do so much. In any event, that seems to be the general idea behind it.

Freedom of speech is one of the four things that those gentlemen decided were precious when they met off the Atlantic coast during World War II. They were the things that people fought for and in some cases died for. In view of that, I am alarmed and tremendously concerned about anything that interferes with the personal liberty of people to criticize. I expect they might even criticize me, and I certainly give them the right to do so. I also demand the right to answer. Then, I would be quite prepared to have somebody else judge which of us is correct.

I assume that we should understand from the fact that no action can be taken, that the Attorney General of a province may grant or refuse his consent. How could an Attorney General refuse consent? After a complaint is lodged he has to investigate the situation. If we look at proposed Section 267B(3) we find that there are certain ways a man can justify anything he says. What does this all add up to? According to the hon. member who spoke before me this will mean that these people will not get the advantages, benefits and improvements he has suggested.

I suggest that you cannot legislate love and you cannot eliminate hate by legislation. This is something which must come as a result of the ordinary process of tolerance and association. I had a reasonable amount of experience in a province which has different races of people. There are certainly different ethnic groups. In the business with which I am associated we found nothing of any consequence in the way of differentiation between races and people. I do not think this exists to a very great extent, at least in my part of the world.

However, I am alarmed and concerned. I propose to support the amendment of my hon. friend from Calgary North and to vote against this bill. I shall do this because I am fearful of the effect it will have on freedom of speech, one of our most cherished liberties. I have referred in this House before to a quotation from one of Shakespeare's plays, I believe Julius Caesar. One of the principals said, "How oft the sight of means to do ill deeds make deeds ill done". So, we have something here and it is said it is a great thing to have it because it will have a deterrent effect. I submit that it will not be a deterrent. The deterrence will be in respect of the person who wishes to express an opinion but is worried by a fear of the consequences.

In concluding these remarks may I say that this bill undoubtedly will pass. It is sponsored by the Minister of Justice. I wish he were not the sponsor, but he is so it will go through. I would hope he would recognize the principle that forbearance and tolerance cannot be legislated. So far as I am concerned, the difficulty and the danger in respect of this whole bill is that it may be a deterrent to individual freedom of speech and liberty.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments on this particular bill because it brings into conflict two civil rights issues, the rights of minority groups as against the right of free speech. If we support the bill, then we say that recognition of the problems of minority groups has superiority over the right of free speech at this time. What makes the situation more difficult is, as has been so well pointed out by previous speakers, that this is a bad bill. The fact is that this provision of the Criminal Code in my opinion will be quite ineffective. I accept the theory that the bill will be useless in preventing the dissemination of hatred and if it is pursued vigorously will limit the right of free speech in this country. I think it would have been far better had this bill, in its present terms, not been introduced at all. The fact is, however, that the bill has been introduced and brought before Parliament and the people of Canada for their consideration.

Last night I listened very carefully to my colleague from Hamilton West to whom the attitude in respect of this bill is very simple. Does Parliament respond sympathetically to a bill, however weak, which recognizes that minority groups have problems? To him the vote on this bill will reflect our views on the question of the protection of minority groups. In other words, the question simply is, are we for or against the rights of minorities in Canada? This is the simple manner in which I feel I must vote on this bill. This bill having been brought before us I have no alternative but to support my friend from Hamilton West. My legal training, as must his, leaves me really concerned about the limitation of free speech, the possibility of witch hunts under the provisions and aegis of this bill and so on.

This bill, as are so many others which we are now considering, in typically Liberal fashion is vague, uncertain and hard to define or enforce. We have before us in this House several similar bills. I think of the Canada Water Act as one which is meaningless in respect of any effort to enforce it. I believe this bill to be in the same category. It is a grand expression of intent and a grand expression of an ideal without any way of ever enforcing it. No specific terms of enforcement are included in it. The provision which would leave to the Attorney General the responsibility of defining at what time or under what circumstances a charge could be laid leaves the enforcement of the bill wide open. No one will be in a position at one time or another to know whether he may or may not be subject to the provisions of this bill or whether he may or may not be prosecuted. I think this bill is a tragic example of the sloppy, vague and ineffective pieces of legislation we have had placed before us. On balance, however, I think, when we vote on the bill, whether it is a good bill or a bad one, we will be expressing whether or not we have sympathy for the problems of minority groups in Canada.

I must say I am convinced that the answer of this Parliament must be in the affirmative. If this were the only bad piece of legislation we have or have had before us I might be persuaded to vote against it. Unfortunately, time after time we are placed in the position of having to decide how we shall vote on bills which have a good expression of intent but which have nothing in them. I shall vote on this from the standpoint of an expression of intent and therefore I feel I cannot support the amendment.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak at this stage of our consideration of this bill, but I think I must indicate my thinking at the present time in order to show what I intend to do in respect of the amendment and the bill. I find, along with many of my colleagues—and this has also been expressed by some members on the other side—that this bill is a compendium of good intentions and sloppy thinking. The way it is drafted means that an attempt is being made to put on the statute books a measure that potentially could be a legal monster, a sort of Frankenstein. Why? Because it has been amply demonstrated beyond a shadow of a doubt that this bill, which on the face of it can be called just law, can be used for unjust purposes. As has been pointed out by my colleagues, most of the persecutions by government that have been known have utilized laws justly passed, but the people were persecuted thereunder in their application. This bill is of that genus.

Let us take, for example, a group such as the Hutterites in my province. They are a troubled people under constraint from society. However, they are a peaceful people. But I can imagine circumstances whereby, if the populace were not as enlightened or if the government should move under the powers given to it in existing legislation on the statute books of the province of Alberta, for instance, and if the Hutterites were to take overt action in protesting against the treatment they would be getting, an attorney general could then move under the terms of the act that is presently before the House to put them down further. Then, we would say: where are the rights of minorities? Legislation inscribed by the Parliament of Canada has been used to put down the minority.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): This is not what we want. There is already in existence on the statute books legislation which achieves the main purpose of this bill. If our statute books were void of anything that would protect minorities, then I would say there may be a case for this legislation. There, I disagree with my colleague, the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) because I do not feel a compulsion to have this legislation on the statute books. The bill before us is a sort of embellishment of laws we already have, but to me therein lies the danger. I would hate to think that those minorities which seek the protection they feel this legislation will give them should become the victims of that legislation in later years under some unscrupulous government or individual in that government.

It is for that reason—and it is a short reason—that I want to support the amendment of my colleague, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). I fully understand the position of my good friend, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). I wish I could take him for a walk.

Mr. Alexander: I wish I could take you for a walk.

Mr. Mahoney: Which of the two stays with the script?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is a secret between the two of us. This position I can understand. But there are others who form a religious minority and there are those who are a political minority, yet why must any particular minority feel that it is aggrieved if this bill is not passed? I say that already we provide protection of minorities in this country. If we provided no such protection would our history be as it has been, and would it be different from those countries where minorities were persecuted? But minorities have not been persecuted here. The so-called documentation that was used as the foundation of some of the evidence—and some of it was pretty thin—for the Cohen report on this matter came from outside this country. I do not think that there was one iota of truth in the suggestion that the need for such legislation had its origin in this country. Why? Are we setting up an Aunt Sally? Are these to be straw men that we are legislating against? I do not think one should have to go through this process because someone suspects there might be a need for such legislation. I would say again that the inherent danger for minorities in this bill is far greater than the danger from which it purports to protect. This is all the more reason for supporting my colleague, the hon. member for Calgary North because legislation to achieve the goal which all of us have, to protect minorities, already exists on our statute books.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): All those in favour of the said motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 75, a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

The next motion is that of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin).

● (5:30 p.m.)

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood) moved:

That Bill C-3, an act to amend the Criminal Code, be amended by adding to section 267B thereof the following subsection:

If any person is charged with an offence against subsection (2) of this section, then the court may, if a breach of the subsection has been committed by the person charged or is reasonably to be anticipated, make an order in lieu of or in addition to the penalty set out in subsection (2) requiring such person to cease and desist from proceeding with or continuing or making any communication prohibited by the act and the order so made may be enforced as if it were made by the superior court of any province.

and that the following subsections of section 267B be renumbered accordingly.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on the last amendment we have had a very full and excellent debate with many high spots.

The amendment I propose is of a very different character to the one which has just been debated and dealt with. It is designed to strengthen the bill, to give greater remedies and more flexible penalties. Members who have followed this debate know that I have supported the principle and the spirit of the legislation and that in my view it is not such as to warrant the fears that have been expressed for it. The offences are defined in precise and clear language and it adds ample defences to appeal to those who may be fearful of its misapplication.

I support the bill, Mr. Speaker, but I do not feel any need to apologize for saying that it can be strengthened and improved by the amendment which I propose. This amendment deals with the appropriate remedy or penalty as applied to section 267B(2), the section which deals with the communication of statements which wilfully promote hatred. The proposal is that the penalty provided of liability to imprisonment for two years or punishment on summary conviction, in addition to which there may be a fine or a term of imprisonment, be replaced or enlarged by the right of the court dealing with the matter to make a cease and desist order; in other words, to enjoin the continuation of the offence.

Remedies are extremely important, Mr. Speaker. All sorts of legislation is rendered ineffective—and we are told this would be ineffective—because the penalty is either too severe or is inadequate. I suggest that if a person is found guilty of this offence it should be open to the courts to say, "We will not brand you as a criminal, will not send you to jail, not even fine you but will obtain from you an undertaking not to repeat the offence or, if you are unwilling to give that undertaking, we will make an order that you shall not repeat the offence." This is far more drastic and yet far more flexible and, in the end, a more effective way of dealing with this type of offence. It means that if a court comes to the conclusion that the offence was committed out of ignorance it could say, "go and sin no more". If it was committed by someone who did not realize the enormity or error of his action, he could be told to go away and not repeat the offence, without being branded as a criminal and subjected to criminal penalty.

I suggest this would remove some of the sting from the legislation for those who fear its application in too strict a sense. On the other hand, where there is deliberate propagation of material designed and calculated to arouse hatred there could be a warning that it must not be repeated. Then, if it were repeated the full power of prison for contempt should be used where there is a deliberate repetition of the offence.

In all legislatures, Mr. Speaker, it is a common practice to make laws and then forget about the extremely important matter of their enforcement. It is my submission that the additional remedies I suggest will make for a more flexible, less rigid, more fairminded and reasonable enforcement of this legislation which I believe we are going to approve when the occasion arises.

I therefore commend this amendment to the House not because I think the legislation should be weakened but because I think it should be strengthened and I believe it would be strengthened if the courts had this power. At this stage of the debate I do not propose to go into this matter of law or argue the constitutionality of it. I do not propose to detain the House to argue on the legal implications of a cease and desist order or the proposals which I make. I merely say that this particular method of proceeding has been found suitable in provincial legislation regarding racial discrimination. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I urge the House to support the amendment.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I commend the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) for his ingenuity in trying to develop ways and means to deal with offenders under this act without actually invoking the punitive sanctions. There is some precedent for this under the Restrictive Trade Practices Act and in the anti-combines legislation there is provision for it.

I should like to point out, however, why I cannot support it. We could probably use existing provisions in the Criminal Code which, with very slight alterations, could be adapted to deal with the problem he has in mind. Reading again from his own amendment:

> If any person is charged with an offence against subsection (2) of this section, then the court may, if a breach of the subsection has been committed by the person charged or is reasonably to be anticipated, make an order in lieu of or in addition to the penalty set out in subsection (2) requiring such person to cease and desist—

It is my proposition that we could make use of such sections of the Criminal Code as 717, 718 and 637, dealing with entering into a recognizance to keep the peace, which are simpler, far more expeditious and far more salutary in effect. If the conditions imposed in the recognizance were for a substantial amount it would have the benefit that those entering into recognizance for the person charged would have some pecuniary interest in insuring that there would be no repetition of the offence.

Now, I have only looked at these sections of the Criminal Code very briefly and we may well have to amend them. I do not believe in having new and unnecessary laws—we have too many already, including this. I think, however, that we can make use of existing legislation to cover the situation where an offence has been committed and in order to deter repetition of that offence some order of a court is required. It may be that we would require a recognizance of this kind to be taken before a magistrate or a county court judge, but I would prefer that to what the hon. member has proposed in his amendment. This could result in a very difficult, complex and probably more expensive procedure and for that reason I propose to vote against the amendment. In addition, there are other proceedings to cover the situation.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, may I just say a few words about the amendment of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin). May I refer to proposed new section 267c.(1). It reads:

> A judge who is satisfied by information upon oath—

That clearly means an affidavit, and is something we should take a look at. I continue:

> —that there are reasonable grounds for believing that any publication, copies of which are kept for sale or distribution in premises within the jurisdiction of the court, is hate propaganda—

I am not so sure that the consent of the Attorney-General is required in that regard. I do not think so. I continue:

> —shall issue a warrant under his hand authorizing seizure of the copies.

Really, what will happen is this: Someone will swear out an affidavit that he has reasonable grounds for believing that whatever is in a package is hate literature, according to the formula of this bill we have been discussing for two or three days. I will not go again into arguments I raised before. This proposed section would give anyone the right to swear out an affidavit saying that he has reasonable grounds for believing that the material in the package should be seized. Of course it may turn out, as a result of a hearing, that the contents of the package do not come within the provisions of this bill. Would it not be strange if, during an election campaign, I were to swear an affidavit that the literature of the Minister of Justice, literature in a package, fell within the ambit of this Bill? Of course, anybody could swear out an affidavit that he has reasonable grounds for believing that that kind of literature attempts to influence people.

Speaking seriously, though, this proposed section would confer tremendous powers. Almost anyone would have the right to swear to an affidavit, as a result of which material could be seized. I ask a very simple question. How are we to consider some of the books in our libraries? What about some of the books in the libraries of Canada? Is this the beginning of a new age? Is this the beginning of an age in which books will be taken out of our libraries because they may be read by speakers on a platform who would thus communicate, within the meaning of this bill, certain statements contained in those books to the people? As the hon. member for Peace River said yesterday, some of Shakespeare's plays may be affected. We need not mention their names. Somebody could swear out an affidavit saying that he has reasonable grounds for believing certain of those plays constitute hate literature.

Mr. Baldwin: Or, take Oliver Twist.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes. This provision could apply to Oliver Twist. The provisions of this bill will only enlarge the libraries of the court houses, or the number of books in the offices of court clerks. I suggest this shows how ridiculous this bill really is.

An hon. Member: It is a straw man.

Mr. Woolliams: Someone said it is a straw man. But is it not ridiculous? And it is not serious when you try to curtail free speech and free thoughts which flow from books that may be in the libraries of Canada? To carry this thought a little farther, did not dictators burn books in order to curtail free speech and free thought? When free thought and free speech disappeared, you all know what disappeared with them: the people were put in the dungeons. They disappeared. I know that the members of minorities are worked up about this bill, but I say this bill will not work in favour of minorities. It did not take Hitler very long, after he became chancellor, to burn down the Reichstag and blame the fire on the communists or tear up statutes which stood in his way and incarcerate people who were protected by them in concentration camps.

I see no difference between a concentration camp in Siberia or in Germany. This proposed section is very dangerous, and I ask all hon. members, when voting on the amendment of the hon. member, to consider particularly the wording of proposed new section 267c(2) which reads in part:

> Within seven days of the issue of the warrant, the judge shall issue a summons to the occupier of the premises requiring him to appear before the court—

Within seven days of the issue of the warrant you are to appear before the court. But, Mr. Speaker, in seven days a lot of harm can be done. That shows just how ridiculous this bill is. Not only is it ridiculous, but it is dangerous as well. We do not want a police state in Canada. Freedom will not result from it. I am glad I have taken the position I have expounded, and my conscience is easy. I respect the arguments that have been made on behalf of minority groups; I know how minority groups feel about these matters, but I am confident if they think this through they will see I am right.

Somebody in this debate used the expression "The dignity of the individual must rest on the freedom of speech." There is no dignity where there is no free speech and free thought. There is no free speech in the concentration camp, and there is no dignity. It just disappears where there is no free speech or free thought. Under this bill a man can swear out an affidavit of complaint, after which he has seven days to pick books out of Canada's libraries.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Shall I put the question on Motion No. 3?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): All those in favour of this motion will please say, yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): All those opposed will please say, nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Call in the members.

Mr. Baldwin: One moment, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, there have been some discussions and I think there might be general agreement to this effect: that the division, rather than being taken at this point today, be taken tomorrow immediately after the Orders of the Day are called. I wonder if perhaps we could make a special order of the house on those terms. It would be to this effect: that the division would not be taken this evening but that the two deferred divisions be taken immediately after the Orders of the Day are called tomorrow, and that third reading should commence immediately thereafter during tomorrow's sitting. If there is general agreement to that effect, perhaps that could be made an order of the house.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, may I say a word with regard to the business for tomorrow? In view of the order just made and since there is some prospect of making progress with the bill tomorrow, I should like to indicate that there will be a change in business and that we will not call the budget debate as previously announced. We will call first, Bill C-3, the bill presently under discussion, to be followed by the bill respecting the International Development Research Centre amendments involving the House approval of the Senate amendments, to be followed by second reading of the bill with reference to the Canada Grains Act.

Mr. Baldwin: What is after that?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): We will take the National Farm Products Act, the Standards Council bill and—

Mr. Baldwin: Six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STATEMENT BY MINISTER ON VISITS TO PARIS AND BONN

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, members of the House may be interested in a brief report of my visits to Paris and Bonn in the past week. I went to Paris to open the new Canadian Cultural Centre there and to talk to Mr. Maurice Schumann, the French Foreign Minister, and to Bonn to return the visit paid to Canada last year by Mr. Willy Brandt, who is now the Chancellor, and to discuss matters of common interest with members of the German government.

Our new Cultural Centre in Paris will assist Canadians in France, especially students, and bring to the French people information about Canada, reflecting our bilingual and bicultural character and the many cultural strands that make up the Canadian fabric. The director of the centre is Mr. Guy Viau who was assistant director of the National Gallery here before taking up his new responsibilities. Mr. Viau is particularly well qualified for the job and I am sure that the centre, under his direction, will forge new ties between Canada and France.

The interest of the French government and the people in the new centre and in Canada as a meeting place of two great cultures was well expressed by the French government's representative at the inaugural ceremonies, Mr. Léo Hamon, who said:

[Translation]

What makes your country unique is the imbrication and the juxtaposition of its two cultures. This centre will fully reflect the originality and the wealth of resources of a country intent on retaining its own personality in the New World notwithstanding the size and power of its southern neighbour, which can be achieved only by preserving its diversity.

• (2:10 p.m.)

[English]

In Paris I met with the French Foreign Minister, Mr. Maurice Schumann. The principal subject we discussed was our bilateral relations, and the most important part for me was Mr. Schumann's categorical statement that the French government has absolutely no intention of intervening in the internal affairs of Canada. If there is no misunderstanding between us about this, and I hope there is not, our problems will be easier to deal with in the future.

I explained to Mr. Schumann what I consider to be the three basic elements on which good relations between France and Canada should rest: First, that co-operation between France and Quebec, which we regard as being of first importance, must be carried out in consultation with the Canadian government; second, that co-operation between France and Canada must be practical in nature and not confined to expressions of good will; third, that France must avoid taking positions contrary to the Canadian constitution.

As a result of this frank exchange I feel we have laid a foundation for avoiding in future some of the incidents which have in the past caused unnecessary strain and tension between us.

In Bonn my objective was to establish a better mutual understanding of our respective policies on international problems of common concern, and to prepare the way for more intensive bilateral co-operation between our two countries.

I got a first-hand account from the German Foreign Minister, Mr. Walter Scheel, of the federal government's efforts to improve relations with their eastern neighbours and to develop a more integrated community in western Europe, efforts which naturally form an overwhelming part of German preoccupations at the moment. I expressed the admiration of the Canadian government for the courage, imagination and realism of the federal government in these efforts.

The Germans expressed their appreciation for Canadian understanding and support. They also stressed the importance they attached to the maintenance of an active Canadian role in both the defence and détente efforts of NATO. I reaffirmed the importance for Canada of our ties with Europe not only from the security point of view but also as a means of diversifying our external relations.

I discussed with several members of the German federal government ways of strengthening the functional co-operation between our two countries, particularly in the fields of science and technology, where both countries have something to contribute and something to gain from more intensive and systematic exchanges. We agreed to proceed in a pragmatic way to identify specific areas where the prospects for such exchanges are most promising. I hope it will be possible to send a mission to the German Federal Republic in the year to follow up these initiatives in greater detail.

I took the opportunity of these visits to let both the French and German governments know of the Canadian government's concerns about the repercussions of certain commercial and agricultural policies of the European Economic Community, particularly in relation to grain production and trade. Our desire is to increase consultations with the EEC on these matters so that the transatlantic co-operation to which we attach so much importance will be strengthened rather than weakened.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, we all welcome the minister back from his wanderings. I hope he will excuse me if I say I was given no previous notice of his intention to make a statement, nor do I have a copy of Sharp's Travels to assist me in my comments. However, after listening to him I can readily understand why that material might not be necessary.

We are happy that the minister visited France. Anything that can be done to improve relations between this country and France, and with the other European countries he visited, will be welcomed by us. No doubt we shall have an opportunity to comment further when we have examined the minister's statement in more detail.

The only further comment I would make is that it is probably unfortunate the minister did not remain here. He might have been helpful in preventing the action of the government and the Prime Minister in throwing away, by the introduction of bills and by other statements made yesterday, the legal works built up over a great many years by every Prime Minister from Laurier to the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson in establishing a claim to sovereignty over the Canadian Arctic. All of this was disposed of, notwithstanding the legal phraseology and the petty quibbling of the Prime Minister and the government yesterday.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, we in this party are very glad to see the Secretary of State for External Affairs back in his place. We have listened with interest to his travelogue which might be described as "Innocence Abroad". We also listened with interest to the report he has given the House. Certainly all of us share the minister's hope that our relations with France will be greatly improved as a result of his visit and as a result of the better understanding that has been developing in recent months.

I was disappointed in press reports during the minister's visit which attributed to him statements that appeared to pour cold water on a full-fledged conference between the eastern and western powers as the government of Finland has been urging. The minister appeared to follow the line that no such conference would be valuable until all the i's were dotted and all the t's had been crossed. I think there are a great many Canadians and people throughout the world who feel that such a conference would be useful, that events are moving at such a rapid pace that any delay in the holding of such conference could prevent beneficial effects flowing from it.

The minister made no mention in his statement whether or not he had any discussions with the governments of France and Germany respecting the situation in Greece. There is increasing concern in Canada about the actions of the military dictatorship in Greece. Canadians feel that being associated with this dictatorship in NATO does not strengthen the hand either of NATO or of democratic countries. If the minister did have any discussions with respect to the attitude that the NATO countries are going to take to the military régime in Greece, I hope he will make a statement. If he did not have such discussions, I trust that discussions will be opened at the earliest possible date.

The minister also mentioned some discussions about the European Economic Community. I had hoped he would be able to tell us whether or not he was able to enter into any arrangements with the government of France respecting closer adherence to the International Grains Arrangement, since France is now one of the major exporters and also one of the countries that has been selling grain considerably below the floor in the agreement. I hope that as a result of the minister's visit and any follow-up from it we can expect better co-operation among the signatories to the International Grains Arrangement than has been evident up until now.

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have only a brief comment after the statement just made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

I listened carefully to what he had to say about his trip and I hope the meetings he attended will enable us to improve our relations with the countries he visited. However, I am concerned about a news item heard here during his trip; the minister did not refer to it during his statement and it had to do with the negotiations aimed at recognizing Communist China.

Apparently, the minister declared in Germany that if Red China were recognized, the representatives of Taiwan in Canada would be asked to leave. I hope nothing will come out of this statement and that, if it becomes necessary to recognize Communist China, he will find a way to maintain cordial relations with the representatives of free China.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TAXATION

WHITE PAPER ON REFORM—REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT OF CHANGES

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. As the presidents of our largest petroleum and iron ore companies have stated recently that if the white paper proposals become law projects worth many hundreds of millions of dollars will not be economic and will have to be discarded, and as the Minister of Finance has said he intends to make changes in the white paper before it becomes law, will the government take the very earliest possible opportunity to announce to the country what the proposed changes are before we lose these very important projects due to the uncertainty which exists today?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I cannot give that undertaking as regards time. The undertaking has been made, and I repeat, that the white paper is for the purpose of discussion. After we have heard opinions from all sections of the community we will, of course, bring in legislation indicating the government's final opinion on all of these matters. In the meantime, beyond the commitment that we will examine all representations very seriously, I cannot make any statement at the moment as to whether we will have a second edition of the white paper. I do not, for the time being, think that that is called for.

ENERGY

DISCUSSIONS WITH U.S. GOVERNMENT ON SUBSTITUTION OF TARIFFS FOR QUOTAS ON OIL IMPORTS FROM CANADA

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has the minister anything he can bring the House up to date on regarding discussions he has had with Labour Secretary George Shultz, the chairman of the President's task force on oil imports, delaying with the subject Mr. Shultz discussed in Montreal yesterday when he said the United States would like to discuss quota-free importation of Canadian oil into the United States market and the substitution of tariffs for quotas?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have had no particular discussions with Secretary Shultz in this regard, although earlier in the year I had discussions with Secretary of the Interior Hickel when I reiterated the Canadian position that it would be to the advantage of both countries to have an open border in regard to crude oil trade.

Mr. Hees: As Secretary Shultz has said the United States government is anxious to discuss this matter with the Canadian government, would the minister get in touch with Secretary Shultz as soon as possible to see what he has in mind?

Mr. Trudeau: With hat in hand?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I believe as early as March of last year the President and the Prime Minister initiated discussions along these lines, and I am sure they will be followed in due time and in due course to the advantage of Canada, and particularly to that of the Canadian oil producers.

Inquiries of the Ministry

DISCUSSIONS WITH U.S. GOVERNMENT REGARDING EXCHANGE OF COMMODITIES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the statement made in Montreal yesterday by Labour Secretary Shultz of the United States, may I ask the minister whether there are any discussions going on between the government of Canada and the government of the United States regarding the exchange of energy commodities and, if so, who is carrying on these discussions on behalf of the Canadian government?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I do not believe there are any specific negotiations going on at the present time with the exception of the continuing discussions between United States officials and those of our embassy staff in Washington who are working on this matter on a continuing basis.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I have a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If I understood the minister's answer correctly, any discussions that are going on are being conducted through our embassy in Washington. What are the terms of reference from the Canadian government to our embassy in Washington under which these discussions are being carried on?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, the broad terms of reference are as I stated them. In respect of oil it is to the mutual advantage of both Canada and the United States to have an open market in the United States for Canadian oil, and also the present restrictions are not in the best interests of either country, as we stated very strongly at the time the presidential restrictions were put on. If I read correctly the press reports of Secretary Shultz's speech yesterday, it would seem that the Canadian view is now being substantiated, at least if the views of Secretary Shultz as stated yesterday express current United States thinking.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister if the discussions which are going on between our embassy in Washington and the United States government are confined exclusively to the purchase of oil or are any other commodities involved in these discussions?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, as stated there is no particular discussion on any other commodities. It may be that preliminary discussions are taking place. Certainly there is no Canadian posture or authority to negotiate the exchange of energy or sale of energy in any other areas at the present time.

CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

THE ARCTIC—U.S. REACTION TO CANADIAN POLICY

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Coast Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to direct to the Prime Minister. Has there been an official United States government reaction to our bold, imaginative and welcome Arctic policy announced yesterday in the House?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker; I know of no official United States reaction. There was, I believe, a statement made to the press by Secretary McCloskey, but I do not have the text of his statement here.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary arising from the question just asked. This matter was brought to my attention just before coming into the House and I believe it is very serious. I put the question to the Prime Minister. There is a report from the State Department of the United States and I want to find out whether it is correct. Has that country now denied Canada's rights so far as sovereignty over the Arctic waters is concerned and our sovereignty over the Northwest Passage. Is that correct?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I can only repeat what I said in answer to the previous question concerning our bold and imaginative policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: I have in my hand a communiqué of the Canadian Press with some very short quotations of State Department spokesman, Robert McCloskey. I do not see in here any denial of the substance of what the hon. member has just mentioned, but there may be some longer speech he made of which I do not have a copy.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. I take it from the Prime Minister's statement that he has not been officially notified that the United States takes that position. Could I ask the Prime Minister this? Has his government taken the position that Canada has sovereignty over the northern waters and northern islands of the Arctic? So far as Canada is concerned, have we made that clear to the United States?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, when I was answering the question I was referring only to the United States reaction to yesterday's bills introduced in Parliament and to my own comments. It would be wrong to say that at no time did the Americans express to us their opinion on the status of the Arctic.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a further supplementary question because this is important. May I put this to the Prime Minister. Has Canada made clear its position in this regard? If the United States has any question so far as Canada's rights and sovereignty are concerned, will there be any change in reference to the voyage of the Manhattan?

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, I believe the Secretary of State for External Affairs and myself have made clear Canada's position on previous occasions, but now that the bills are before the House and will be discussed I am sure we will have an opportunity to elaborate on it and I hope that the opposition parties will also elaborate their positions on the Arctic.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, could the Prime Minister say, before the decision was made to opt out of the International Court of Justice and not to claim sovereignty, whether discussions were held with experts on international law and whether the decision was made to do this because of the fact that the weakness and indecision of the Prime Minister more than a year ago in not re-asserting those rights has proven to be fatal to his case?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question as asked is not in order. The hon. member for York South on a supplementary.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I think every member realizes that if the Prime Minister has not seen a statement he cannot very well comment on it. I would like to ask the Prime Minister this question: in view of the reports that the United States State Department has rejected the 12-mile limit which one of the bills tabled yesterday proposes and Canada's alleged unilateral action with regard to the Arctic, can the Prime Minister tell the House whether he can give the House an assurance that when the statements are brought to his attention more fully the House will hear from him or from any minister he designates as to this country's position on the statements made in Washington?

Mr. Trudeau: Of course the House will hear further from the government on this matter. I understand the House Leader has scheduled a debate a week from today, and we will be very happy to engage in debate with the opposition parties on this matter.

TRADE

ALLEGED DUMPING OF CANADIAN SULPHUR IN U.S. MARKET

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Has his department or the government been advised directly or indirectly by the United States authorities of protests against the alleged dumping of Canadian sulphur in the U.S. market? If so, what has been the stand of the Canadian government and what further steps does the minister contemplate taking to prevent any sort of unilateral price fixing for this commodity?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I can only say that I have not been informed of this and I will find out whether others have.

GRAIN

WHEAT—PUBLISHING OF ACREAGE REDUCTION PROGRAM REGULATIONS—SECOND SURVEY OF SEEDING INTENTIONS

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): My question is for the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatchewan. In view of the fact that the government has now issued a second bulletin on operation LIFT, the wheat acreage reduction program, when will the minister issue the regulations authorized by the supplementary estimate and also promised with respect to the Canadian Wheat Board Act, and will the minister make a statement on motions in the House when these regulations are available?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): I have not decided about a statement at the time and, of course, as indicated previously, the regulations will be issued as soon as they can be put into final form.

Mr. Burton: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the government consider asking the Dominion Bureau of Statistics to undertake a second survey of seeding intentions on the prairies in view of the obvious deficiencies in the first survey which was released recently?

Mr. Lang: I will give consideration to that, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, with respect to the minister's answer a moment ago that the regulations have not yet been produced. On what basis has the government formulated its bulletins to the farmers telling them what their rights and prerogatives are if no regulations have been formulated, and if the regulations have been formulated why has the minister not tabled them?

Mr. Lang: The bulletins, of course, are based on the proposal which the government put forward, and the details are therefore in firm form. As the hon. member will appreciate, the regulations must be examined in light of all of their implications and from the point of view of correct draftmanship.

RETAINING OF PORTION OF WHEAT MILLED FOR FARMERS' OWN USE TO REPAY CASH ADVANCES

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, mine is a related question directed to the Minister without Portfolio. In view of the fact that a total of 50 bushels of wheat can be delivered to local flour mills to be milled for a farmer's own use but of the amount delivered half is retained to repay the cash advance, would the minister give consideration to allowing the total deliveries to be milled for flour so that farmers with large families will not be forced to buy flour over and above that obtained from their own wheat?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): The fact that a portion of the wheat delivered for gristing is required for cash advances is a consequence of wording of long-standing in the cash advance legislation coupled with the fact that the wheat in question is treated as board wheat in connection with the general policy of treating wheat for human consumption at the $1.95½ price.

[Mr. Burton.]

TRADE

JAPAN—PROSPECT OF INCREASED MARKET FOR RAPESEED

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): My question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce even though I would like to question some of the other ministers on the same subject. As a result of the minister's visit to Japan can he tell the House whether he has information indicating to him that Japan will be a ready market for an increased amount of rapeseed in the next year, particularly in view of the fact that there will be an increase in the production of rape this year?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): A first step has been taken by Japan in the liberalization of trade in rapeseed. We asked their minister of Agriculture to keep on the same course until the full liberalization of trade in rapeseed takes place.

TAXATION

WHITE PAPER ON REFORM—ANSWERING OF COMMUNICATIONS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Can he tell the House whether or not there has been such a large number of letters, communications and representations in connection with the white paper on tax reform that special action is being taken with a view to dealing with the backlog and providing replies to the questions that are propounded in the letters and communications?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am not quite sure whether the right hon. member is referring to correspondence directed to my office.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am referring to letters directed to the government in general.

Mr. Trudeau: I know of no particular arrangements which have had to be made to meet the very encouraging response to the white paper.

An hon. Member: Smile when you say that.

Mr. Hees: O.K., Alice, go back to wonderland.

An hon. Member: You should have been a candidate for the Academy Awards.

Mr. Woolliams: Why don't you bite your tongue?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: I used the word "encouraging" not necessarily in reference to the substance of these communications but in reference to their numbers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I think the government has been vindicated in its belief that by proceeding by way of a white paper rather than by statute or budgetary measure we have involved many Canadians in the process of participation in government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is nothing like the determination that comes from despair, and the Prime Minister has revealed that in his statement. Is he not aware of the fact that a special project has been set up at a cost of $190,000 for the purpose of answering the letters received so that answers may be given to those who send in their complaints or ask questions? Is he unaware of this wholesale expenditure which is to be made for the hiring of chartered accountants and additional staff?

Mr. Trudeau: I must confess that I was unaware of it, but I will say that we do not find it a waste of money to communicate with the Canadian people on subjects which are of interest to all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I always like to extend a helping hand and I bring to the attention of the Prime Minister the facts regarding the making of this expenditure. Because the Minister of Finance has on hand a backlog of approximately 5,000 letters, an establishment has been set up to work for the next three months, including a whole group of chartered accountants at fees up to $200 per day.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Surely the Prime Minister knows what is going on.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that was not a supplementary question but rather the conveying of information from the right hon. gentleman to the other right hon. gentleman.

Inquiries of the Ministry

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CALLING OF CONFERENCE ON LAW OF THE SEA

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the right hon. Prime Minister arising from the statement he made yesterday as a prelude to the introduction of Bill C-202 and Bill C-203. Has the government taken any initiative toward the calling of an international conference on the law of the sea in order that some of the inadequacies to which the Prime Minister referred in his statement may be done away with, thereby usefully extending the jurisdiction of international law to which the Prime Minister said we were anxious to adhere?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to answer this question, I wish to say that when I had discussions with the United States authorities we agreed that we would work together to try to bring about an international conference as soon as possible.

Mr. Barnett: A supplementary question. Can the Secretary of State for External Affairs give the House any indication of when it may be possible for such a conference to be held?

Mr. Sharp: I will take that question as notice and see when I can answer it later.

ISRAELI-ARAB CONFLICT—MESSAGE OF SYMPATHY FOLLOWING BOMBING OF EGYPTIAN SCHOOL

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Could the minister tell the House whether he has sent a message of sympathy to the Egyptian government following the report of the bombardment of a primary school near Bahr el Bakr which killed at least 30 young children and injured more than 40?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all members of the House, as well as the government, deplore the progressive escalation of military activities in the Middle East. Incidents of the kind referred to by the hon. gentleman are particularly distressing and regrettable. If press reports are confirmed, and so far they are just press reports, this incident will further emphasize the compelling urgency of achieving a peaceful settlement of the dispute. There have been many incidents in this war and I am almost tempted to say that if we made a protest about each one of them there would be very little more we would be doing.

INCLUSION OF MIDDLE EAST IN POLICY REVIEW

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): I would like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Could he indicate whether the review of the Canadian government foreign policy which is now going on will include the Middle East conflict?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, of course it is included in our general review of foreign policy but there will not be a specific study on the subject.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MEMBERS' PAY AND ALLOWANCES

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the Prime Minister a question. I would like to ask him if his government proposes amending the statute under which Members of Parliament receive their pay and allowances to allow those members who are opposed to raises in remuneration and pensions an opportunity to opt out?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Skoreyko: Mr. Speaker, I ask this question in all seriousness because I would like to reduce hypocrisy to a minimum.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether this would also apply to the income tax that we pay?

POST OFFICE

MONTREAL POSTAL DISPUTE—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT'S PLANS

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Following the failure of several ministers and one commissioner in their efforts to settle the Montreal postal dispute, can he now advise the House and the country what the government's current plans are for dealing with this long-standing problem?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board has answered this question on previous days. I can only repeat what he has said to the House, that a final offer has been made to the local concerned and an extension, I believe to April 15, has been indicated to them for their acceptance of the government's position based on the Goldenberg report, beyond which time, of course, if the members of the local involved do not accept this very generous government offer we will have to consider other measures. But we are optimistic that they will and therefore we are not talking about any other plans.

Mr. Macquarrie: In the consideration of these other measures has the Prime Minister in mind something bold and imaginative like assigning the highly qualified Minister of Regional Economic Expansion to deal with this difficult problem?

ESTABLISHMENT OF CROWN CORPORATION

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister.

I should like to ask him whether in making its proposal, the government has considered the establishment of a Crown Corporation.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is not the point. The government proposal was made to the union. Its broad lines are known and I stated several times that it is based on Commissioner Goldenberg's recommendation. It has to do with the integration of the workers into the public service where they would find not only the security which they have never known, but where they would also receive a salary equivalent to that which they were getting previously and also have much better working conditions.

[English]

HEALTH AND WELFARE

WARNING STICKER ON PACKAGES OF CONTRACEPTIVE PILLS

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the alarming statements and the great fear among women on the pill, and in view of the recommendation by the obstetrics and gynecology division of the Food and Drug Directorate at Washington that a warning sticker should be affixed to every package of pills setting out the precautions and the danger signals, is the department giving consideration to any similar proposal?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member may be aware, this whole matter is under study. A special committee of consultants was set up in the early part of March. They have been meeting to give expert advice to me and I expect their report some time in the early part of May. It will go into this very subject of the warnings in professional literature, whether these warnings should be on the packages, and the sufficiency of the warnings suggested. I cannot give the hon. member a more definitive answer until I get the report from that committee.

RELEASE OF PREVENTIVE MEASLES VACCINE

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, while I am on my feet may I say that yesterday the hon. member for Simcoe North asked a question about rubella vaccine, and I wish to advise him that the Food and Drug Directorate has received applications from three manufacturers to market rubella vaccine in Canada. The directorate has reviewed all research data and hopes to be in a position to issue a licence to one of the manufacturers within the next two weeks.

INDUSTRY

TIRES—CONCESSIONS TO MICHELIN COMPANY —MEETINGS WITH OTHER COMPANIES

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It concerns a question I raised with him on March 20 in which I asked him whether he was going to call together representatives of the tire industry to see if some policy could be worked out regarding the special concessions granted to the Michelin Tire Company. At that time he said he would do that. Has he convened such a meeting and, if so, what conclusions have been reached?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): This is being done now, Mr. Speaker. My department has already met with the presidents of two tire companies and the consultations will continue.

MANPOWER

LAY-OFFS BY DUNLOP CANADA LIMITED—RESPONSE BY ONTARIO MINISTERS TO TELEGRAMS FROM FEDERAL MINISTER

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Prior to the Easter recess I directed a question to him with regard to telegrams he had sent to the Ontario Minister of Labour and the Ontario Minister of Trade and Development concerning lay-offs at Dunlop Tire. Has the minister received answers to those telegrams and, if so, would he tell us the substance of the answers?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have not received any answers to my telegrams.

POLLUTION

ARCTIC WATERS—OBSERVANCE OF REGULATIONS BY NUCLEAR SUBMARINES

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Now that the government has claimed sovereignty over Arctic waters can the minister advise if such vessels as nuclear submarines, which frequently traverse these waters, will be required to observe anti-pollution measures and to post an anti-pollution bond?

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I will refer that question to the minister. It is not his duty day in the House. I think the hon. member has read the legislation.

Mr. Baldwin: That is why I asked the question.

INDUSTRY

CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTOMOTIVE AGREEMENT—STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Could he inform the House of the state of the negotiations between the United States and Canada with regard to the terms of the automotive agreement between the two countries?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, up to now some agreement has been reached with regard to statistics on exports and imports between the two countries. Negotiations should resume soon on the substance of the matter, that is on the Americans' wish to eliminate the "guarantees" now provided for in the automotive agreement, to which we are presently opposed.

POLLUTION

PRESENCE OF MERCURY IN OTTAWA RIVER

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. Has the minister been in contact with the Ontario and Quebec governments this week concerning the high level of mercury in the Ottawa River?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

DRUGS

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF LEDAIN COMMISSION

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the submission to the LeDain Commission made by the Attorney General of Prince Edward Island and also the statements made by the Prime Minister of Ontario regarding the policies of the governments of those provinces, when will the LeDain report be tabled in the House?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the government has not yet received the LeDain Commission report. I would expect it some time perhaps within the next ten days or two weeks, at which time the government will consider the matter of its disposition.

Mr. Thompson: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister assure the House that full exposure will be given to the evidence which was submitted in several of these reports regarding the danger of marijuana compared with the more potent drugs?

NATURAL RESOURCES

OFFSHORE MINERAL RIGHTS—MEETINGS WITH EASTERN PROVINCES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Can the hon. gentleman advise when he expects the meetings on offshore mineral rights now going on with the eastern provinces to come to a conclusion? At the same time would he advise whether the federal position is one of negotiation and sharing of future revenues or of maintaining that all such revenues would be federal?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there was a meeting in Montreal on Monday of this week at the deputy minister level between the deputy minister of my department and the top officials from the departments of the five eastern provinces. The federal government's position was clearly stated by the Prime Minister more than a year ago to the effect that for the purpose of assuring uniformity and continuity the administration should be federal but that we are perfectly prepared to share revenues with the provinces in order to achieve this accord that is required to assure federal administration.

POLLUTION

PRESENCE OF MERCURY IN RED RIVER

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. In view of a statement made a few days ago by his Parliamentary Secretary to the effect that there is mercury contamination in the Red River originating from sources in the United States, can the minister say whether he has yet found a way to cope with this matter?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Well, the frank answer would be no. The mercury is not at a high level there, but there is mercury in the Red River originating in the United States and coming into Canada.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is the minister planning to take up this matter with the people who are responsible for it?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, the Department of External Affairs has been in contact with Washington concerning the problem of mercury pollution in our international waters.

INCREASE IN RESEARCH ACTIVITIES BY DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the minister similar to the one I directed to him three days ago. Inasmuch as there is increasing evidence of pollution of the nature referred to by the hon. member and since the present research budget is the same as last year's and is, we realize, totally inadequate, can the minister now say whether he is recommending to his colleagues in the government an increase in the research activities of the department in order to short-circuit much of this kind of pollution?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): The answer is yes, Mr. Speaker.

COMPENSATION TO LAKE ERIE FISHERMEN FOR MERCURY CONTAMINATION OF FISH

Mr. H. E. Stafford (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. The federal government in co-operation with the government of Ontario recently announced certain advances of money to be made to commercial fishermen in Lake St. Clair, Clay Lake and the Detroit and St. Clair Rivers pending settlement of claims against those who have caused mercury pollution. Would this same policy apply to fishermen in Lake Erie if they are similarly affected by mercury contamination of fish?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, the same policy would apply. We have considerable evidence now that there will be no need for us to concern ourselves about the fishermen in Lake Erie because tests of the fish there show that they are low in mercury.

TRANSPORT

GRAIN—ASSURANCE OF SUFFICIENT RAILWAY BOXCARS FOR MOVEMENT

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister without Portfolio who reports to the House for the Canadian Wheat Board. In connection with the movement of grain, the Grain Transportation Committee has announced a shipping program that calls for the shipment of approximately 300 million bushels of grain in the remainder of the present crop year ending July 31. Can the minister assure the House that in fact sufficient railway rolling stock will be made available to move this amount of grain in the period prescribed?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the whole point of the work by the transportation committee was in connection with securing the co-operation of the various parties involved in handling this grain, and those assurances from those parties were indeed forthcoming.

INDUSTRY

GOLD MINING—POLICY RESPECTING GRANTS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

In view of the recent federal government decision to withdraw the grants previously allowed to gold mines, it would seem that certain mines in Quebec will have to close down. However, as the Prime Minister has stated that only a postponement of this decision would allow mine owners to continue their operations, I would like to ask him if he is willing to discuss such postponement with the Quebec government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this matter of grants to gold mines is the responsibility of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and I believe the question should be addressed to him. However, I will take note of it and mention it to him.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SHIPMENT OF MEDICAL SUPPLIES TO NORTH AND SOUTH VIET NAM

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the submissions by the Canadian Unitarian Medical Aid Committee to North and South Viet Nam, does the government still intend to refuse permission for the shipment of medical supplies to North Viet Nam until assurances are received that these will only be used for civilian purposes?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I will look into the matter.

Mr. Benjamin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister says he will look into the question and yet he and his department have already replied to the committee that this is the case. May I ask the Prime Minister about some real hypocrisy—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Benjamin: Will the Prime Minister assure—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member wish to ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Benjamin: Yes, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether, in view of the government's requirement that assurances be received regarding the shipment of medical supplies to Viet Nam, the government will now request from the government of the United States assurances that any arms sold to that country will not be used in Viet Nam?

NATIONAL SECURITY

DIRECTOR OF INFORMATION CANADA—SHOWING OF CLEARANCE TO FORMER PRIME MINISTERS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Since there is no independent civilian agency on security procedures, as recommended by the royal commission, would the Prime Minister agree to show to the former prime ministers of this country the security assurances he has received with regard to the director of Information Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, if this is customary I am prepared to discuss it with the former prime ministers. The assurance I have is one which was given several years ago and in effect under another prime minister when this kind of allegation was made against this same gentleman. The assurance was given then in the form of a letter by the then commissioner of the RCMP to the then prime minister. The results of the investigation at that time were that there were no reasons to doubt the reliability or the loyalty of the gentleman. If the Leader of the Opposition wants to discuss this with me, I will gladly do so.

[Mr. Benjamin.]

Mr. Nowlan: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the Prime Minister's answer. I do not raise this lightly and I do not like raising it.

An hon. Member: Not much you don't.

Mr. Nowlan: But in view of the answer—if anyone smiles at that or if there are any more epithets from across the floor of the House like there were yesterday and if the President of the Privy Council wishes to stand on his feet and say something—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nowlan: —then I will raise a point of privilege and do what I do not want to do.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am in sympathy with the point made by the hon. member. Perhaps he might ask his supplementary.

Mr. Nowlan: I appreciate that, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry I digressed. It is a paradox to me, since we are discussing the hate literature bill in this House currently, that we should experience this sort of incitement—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is again digressing.

Mr. Nowlan: I appreciate the Prime Minister's answer. I gather from that answer that there has been no security clearance—perhaps that is not the proper terminology—on the appointment since the director was appointed in another capacity? Does the Prime Minister consider there is any degree of difference between the gentleman's other appointment as a B and B commissioner and his appointment as director of this new vehicle, Information Canada, which is a fairly sensitive and potentially powerful media? Because of what the Prime Minister told me today, I may not ask any more questions. I hope perhaps we can leave the matter. However, from the information the Prime Minister has received and from what the commissioner of the RCMP said with reference to a previous position which was not political and not as powerful, has he assured himself that this person is satisfactory for this present appointment?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I still think the hon. member's question yesterday might more properly have been addressed privately to the Solicitor General or myself rather than draw this kind of matter to the attention of the public. However, if it will satisfy the hon. member, as a result of his questions I have none the less asked for a further security clearance from the department concerned. I will then act as I see fit at that time. I can only repeat that a previous allegation of the same nature led to an investigation. The result was there was no reason to doubt the loyalty and reliability of the said gentleman. I have done as I said.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Ryan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I have risen on every question, save for the first one, this day and I have not been recognized. I have a question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is not a question of privilege. Will the hon. member kindly resume his seat? The hon. member is in the same position as other hon. members who have sought the eye of the Speaker and unfortunately could not be recognized. Unless there is unanimous consent—

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. We have already gone five minutes past the time allocated.

Mr. Ryan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I trust then I will be recognized at the first opportunity tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING HATE PROPAGANDA

The House resumed from Wednesday, April 8, consideration of Bill C-3, to amend the Criminal Code as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, and Motion No. 2 (Mr. Woolliams) and Motion No. 3 (Mr. Brewin).

Mr. Speaker: The question was put yesterday, so the Chair will now call in the members. The question is on the following Motion No. 2, moved by Mr. Woolliams:

That Bill C-3, an act to amend the Criminal Code, be amended by striking out

Lines 26-28, both inclusive, Page 1 thereof
Lines 1-46, both inclusive, Page 2 thereof
Lines 1-44, both inclusive, Page 3 thereof
Lines 1-46, both inclusive, Page 4 thereof
Lines 1-9, both inclusive, Page 5 thereof

Division

and by adding thereto, next after Line 25 on Page 1 thereof, the following:

"(5) Where a person is convicted of an offence under this section, anything by means of or in relation to which the offence was committed, upon such conviction, may, in addition to any other punishment imposed, be ordered by the presiding magistrate or judge to be forefeited to Her Majesty in right of the province in which that person is convicted, for disposal as the Attorney General may direct."

The House divided on Motion No. 2 (Mr. Woolliams) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Mr. St. Pierre: Mr. Speaker, I did not vote for or against this motion because I consider the legislation unsatisfactory in its entirety.

Mr. Speaker: The question will now be put on the motion proposed by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), which is as follows:

That Bill C-3, an act to amend the Criminal Code, be amended by adding to Section 267B thereof the following subsection:

"If any person is charged with an offence against subsection (2) of this section, then the court may, if a breach of the subsection has been committed by the person charged or is reasonably to be anticipated, make an order in lieu of or in addition to the penalty set out in subsection (2) requiring such person to cease and desist from proceeding with or continuing or making any communication prohibited by the Act and the order so made may be enforced as if it were made by the superior court of any province..."

and that the following subsections of section 267B be remembered accordingly.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-3, to amend the Criminal Code as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to special order made yesterday, now.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to apologize to the right hon. gentleman but the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder whether, in view of the fact that the usual Thursday announcement was not made earlier today, the House would permit the Government House Leader to indicate the business for today and the next few days before we carry on with this debate?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I thank the hon. member for his—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There has to be agreement. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Obviously, there is not agreement. I recognize the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I did not speak on second reading of this bill or at any time throughout the debate. I followed the various speeches whether I was present or not. I am sure that, with the exception of two or three speeches, the House has dealt with this question in a way that was responsible and objective.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I want to say that, in so far as the presentations of various members are concerned, I am going to restrict myself to the mention of one, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) who, on behalf of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, outlined the views of this party with clarity and distinction.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No piece of legislation that has been before the House has given me the same concern as this bill has. I dealt with it in Toronto when B'Nai B'Rith had a dinner at which I was one of the speakers. I pointed out my opposition to this bill and outlined that opposition in general. One thing I will always treasure is the fact that, while many who were present did not agree with my views, when I concluded they gave me an unanimous ovation. This indicates the attitude of Canadians as a whole as we view those things which from time to time require to be decided and considered by the House.

Having endeavoured throughout my life to uphold freedom and to maintain freedom both at the bar and in Parliament, I am deeply concerned that what is taking place here is another step down the slippery slope to silencing the voice of disagreement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Through the years, judge me as you will, I have tried to stand for what I conscientiously believed in. As I look back in retrospect over the years, I trust that no one will consider me immodest when I point out that in 1922, when it was unpopular to take the stand I did, I took an appeal for French Canadian trustees against a conviction based on the teaching of French in the schools. It was an unpopular stand. It is the only reported case on this subject in the province of Saskatchewan. Of course it is one case to be remembered, because we who were counsel at the bar always remember the cases in which we were successful. During the darkest days of the war I stood alone in my party when the CCF took a strong stand in condemnation of the treatment accorded the Japanese people in British Columbia whose only offence was their colour. It was not popular to take that stand, but in the light of events it was right.

In 1945 when Gouzenko made his charges, I objected in this House against the denial of Habeas Corpus and against the substitution for the regular processes of law and of incarceration without the opportunity for the individual to get in touch with counsel. It was not a popular stand, but in the passing years I think what was said has been shown to be right. I do not have to say that I condemn and loathe the outrageous statements made about Jews, coloured people and individuals who belong to other religions. I have maintained this stand from the earliest days. The Jewish people indeed have been and are my friends. There is no one in this country who has received a greater number of honours and distinctions from the Jewish population everywhere in this country than have been conferred on me, and I say that in all humility.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member for York West (Mr. Givens) indicates his agreement. Therefore it has become a trying experience, something that exercised my heart as well as my mind, to take a stand against this legislation. Sir, the statements that have been made against minorities—and the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) dealt with that in eloquent terms—are repugnant to every Canadian; they are shocking to my conscience and conscientious beliefs. Racial hatred has never been an ally of mine throughout my life. It is in that spirit that I approach a discussion of this bill, which is about to become law. I may recall that in 1948 when my party came out in favour of outlawing Communism I opposed that stand. I said it was wrong. I said that law cannot outlaw ideas. It was not a popular stand to take. One has to take such stands through the year.

As I listened to my hon. friend from Hamilton West I recalled the stand I took at the Prime Ministers' conference, for which I was greatly condemned in both the years 1960 and 1961, and wrongly condemned for having forced South Africa out of the Commonwealth. I did no such thing. South Africa withdrew from the Commonwealth when it became a republic and then asked to return to the Commonwealth. I raised the question there were 12½ million blacks or coloured people in South Africa and 2½ million whites, but the blacks or coloured people had no representation in Parliament. I said that in the days of Botha and Field Marshal Smuts there were three members in a House of 160 to which Prime Minister Verwoerd replied that he would give them no such representation. I was the only white representative at the Prime Ministers' conference who took a strong stand, but when that statement was made a change came about. I said to the South African representatives you cannot, you dare not, adopt any other principle than that the minority shall have parliamentary representation and that the Commonwealth must be colour blind when nine out of ten belong to a coloured race.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As he knows, I have great respect for the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner). My regret is that he is the minister who had to bring this before the House of Commons. We will, I predict, look back on this day in the years to come as one that we would like to forget, just as we try to forget today our treatment of the Japanese. The uncle of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hogarth) and I were overseas together and remained life-long friends. I remember discussing the matter with him. He said, "This thing is wrong". Sir, the passing years do not make wrong right.

I shall not become involved in a discussion of the meaning of the word "freedom". It means something to each of us. To me it means the right to be wrong, not the right to do wrong. It includes the right to say what others may object to and resent. The only freedom of speech that has any meaning at all is the one that gives me the right to say the things that run counter to the general views of people as a whole, subject of course to the limitations of libel, slander, blasphemy and sedition.

Are we to define freedom as meaning the right to express only such views as are acceptable to the overwhelming mass of the people? That is not a very valuable kind of freedom. The essence of citizenship is to be tolerant of strong and provocative words. Liberty confers duties and responsibilities, one of its duties being to be tolerant of those who express views which may offend. We often hear certain words credited to Voltaire, who never used them at any time. It was Daniel Webster who used these words:

> Though I may disagree with everything you say, I will fight to the death for your right to say it.

Mr. Justice Brandeis of the United States Supreme Court, whose nomination as a Justice was opposed because he was a Jew, uttered these words:

> If there be time to expose through discussion the falsehood and fallacies, to avert the evil by the processes of education, the remedy to be applied is more free speech, not enforced silence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What he said represents my philosophy of life. From time to time I quote Burke, and he is quoted even by Liberals today. He said:

> The true danger is when liberty is nibbled away for expedients and by parts.

He also said:

> The people never give up their liberties but under some delusion.

Discussion is necessary to decision. If the objective of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald), or his apparent objective, on Monday to get this bill through quickly had been met, the Canadian people would not have had any idea of the nature of this legislation. One would almost think the contents of the bill were something about which one should not speak. One of the reasons I feel as I do is that throughout this nation today—and this has developed in the last two or three years—people are filled with fears. They do not know what is going to happen. They ask: Can we not have leadership that will raise our horizons? They fear; they wonder what is happening to pride of country and heritage.

• (3:50 p.m.)

I could deal with radio and television in this connection. If such power is given to Mr. Gagnon and to the chairman of the CRTC, that these two men could destroy the freedom of this nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Some might say, "not at all, because another election will come along and we can change". You cannot change what is done in this connection".

Mr. Marchand: Good.

Mr. Woolliams: Marchand says "good".

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister is one of those architects of repression to whom I did not intend to make reference, but I can only assume that an hon. member with his reputation would not make an observation in derision. What he said when he uttered the word "good" indicated his deepest and innermost thoughts, and that is a matter of deep concern to me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: He is one of the troika.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Today, the government can have anything they choose. If the government believes something is a matter of national import, it puts it over the CBC. Radio and television concerns are filled with fear in this country They are scared stiff, to use a colloquialism. Many are scared of the CRTC, and I will deal with that on another occasion. This is part and parcel of the fear that is developing among all the people of the nation about Canada's future.

Why do we have this legislation? The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) said "good" a minute ago. I want to point out the philosophy of this government as enunciated by him in 1968. I did not expect the privilege of an interruption from him that would make this possible. On November 13, 1968 I raised strong objection to the fact that there were coming into Canada individuals such as Rubin and Stokely Carmichael and other revolutionary riffraff of that kind. They ridiculed the Canadian government. They condemn our institutions, but at that time the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said:

—but it is not our view there can be any danger of uprising or strife—

I emphasize the word "strife".

—as a consequence of a free discussion of ideas. It is the cause of unrest which we try to correct.

Those were the days when they spoke of this new heaven and this new earth, the just society. The Prime Minister said: "We strive to remove the causes of unrest", and with that the hon. gentleman who, a moment ago, said "good" uttered these immortal words as recorded at page 2687 of Hansard. Is it not strange that I just happen to have them with me? He said:

Mr. Speaker, I believe the policy of the Department of Immigration in this regard is known. I myself explained it in this House, and I believe it had also been applied previously. When someone comes here, especially when he is sponsored by a well known organization in Canada, if he only comes to start a public debate and exchange ideas, without any pronounced intention of organizing a revolution or stirring up trouble, then, in the name of the freedom of speech, we allow him across our border.

Mr. St. Pierre: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister has one supporter. This was the philosophy of a few years ago, and today it is other than that. On February 14, 1969, when I pointed out that these people were coming in for the purpose of advocating revolution in Canada, that their work was to the detriment of our people, the Prime Minister said this:

—We cannot exclude all people because some of them might want to speak in terms of revolution.

Suddenly, the philosophy of the minister who said "good" and of the right hon. Prime Minister is now being brushed aside, and now they fear freedom of speech. I wonder to what extent their fear consists of political hopes and aspirations. During the election campaign a great deal of literature was disseminated across Canada regarding the Prime Minister. Lately, the same has been done regarding Mr. Gagnon. Mr. Speaker, if anybody wrote any of those things said of them about me I would sue him within 24 hours for criminal libel because I would know it was not true. The right is there, and yet the dissemination of these ideas continues.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

What is behind this legislation? I wish the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) were here because during the election campaign he gave an explanation for this policy of repression. On June 12, 1968, he so reported as having said the following:

The people behind this hate literature are diseased—

They must be isolated, quarantined, and, if possible, cured before they destroy us and the society we live in.

That is a job for the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Then, as acting minister of justice he enunciated his philosophy across Canada as follows, that they were going to go after those citizens who were distributing hate literature; they were going to ensure that this should not continue. Look at section 267c which by its wording indicates the possibility that it will be used to stifle those who write that which the government does not like, even though their writing does not refer to a class, a race or a colour.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In 1970 it gives the power to a judge to confiscate private property, and it presumes a person guilty unless he proves himself innocent. I ask do these circumstances give some indication of the reason for this legislation? Sir, I do not want to restress the meaning of free speech, but to me it consists in allowing others to be misguided, with the majority of people considering what is being said as wrong or evil.

What if debate had not continued beyond Monday and the bill had gone through the other day? The people of Canada would not have any idea what this legislation can be used for, while presumably passed for another purpose. Sir, one section provides that if I make a speech that is likely to create dissension on the basis of race, colour or the like, then I am guilty. That section is the greatest incentive to a person to make the speech. That is an incentive to the individual who makes the speech and to those who disagree with it to gather and object, and having objected because of the words used, the speaker then becomes liable to the penalty.

In other words the wrongdoers, these little fellows who spread their poison, will have a forum. I can imagine the attention the CBC would give to such people, parading them across the country.

A speech is made; the group of those who do not agree are in the audience and start to scream that what is being said shocks their consciences regarding race, colour or religion. Then, the proof of the intent and the commission of the offence is established. Incidentally, Sir, this legislation is almost identical in substance with one of the first laws passed in the U.S.S.R. in 1919. If you want to look it up I think you will find it in volume 16 of Americana.

It is strange that all of these things are happening at a time when the Supreme Court of Canada, over a period of eight, nine or ten years, has made greater advances in the interests of human freedom than in all its history. I realize that those who are in the establishment do not like the Bill of Rights. They ridicule the Bill of Rights. They opposed it over the years, and since 1960 when it became law, professors of different varieties of wisdom have condemned it. Inferior court judges have cast their eyes elsewhere.

Then came the case of Mr. Drybones. It is a beautiful name, Drybones. His case came to the Supreme Court of Canada, and what happened? The lawyers from the Department of Justice were there, and argued that the Bill of Rights had no effect. Mr. Christie, Q.C. led the argument, and he did it with power. They fought the Bill of Rights to the limit. Now, Mr. Speaker, the minister tells us that the Department of Justice has given its opinion that this legislation is constitutional. How do you expect them to be more right on this than they were in reference to the Bill of Rights which they opposed, argued against, and fought?

With respect to the decision in the Drybones case, I was particularly impressed with the fact that the two majority judges, Mr. Justice Ritchie and Mr. Justice Hall, had the support of the new Chief Justice of Canada, Mr. Justice Fauteux. If you divide your judges according to opinion as small "c" or small "l" I would have designated Mr. Justice Fauteux as a small "c" conservative, but he upheld the Bill of Rights. That judgment is a monumental one.

Some argue that the Supreme Court of Canada should develop along the lines of the United States Supreme Court and become an institution of social judgment and justice, thereby representing the changing views of the people. I hope that does not come about, although the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) last Sunday on television, as he spoke to the student body of Carleton, pointed out that Canada is going towards a republican form of government. When the Minister of National Health and Welfare gets into that field, I begin to fear.

Now, Sir, I have nothing to say against the United States Supreme Court, but do Canadians want anything along the lines of what has happened there on the two nominations to that court made by the President of the United States? Not at all. There is no question in the Drybones case of there being an advance by the court into the new field of social justice. There was an interpretation of a statute, the Bill of Rights, which will never be repealed because there is no government, however grasping its power-seeking members may be, that would ever dare do so.

As I look at the Bill of Rights and read the sections dealing with the right of the individual to equality before the law, the protection of the law, freedom of speech and freedom of assembly, I think there is every reason to believe that there is a strong argument that can be advanced that freedom of speech in 1960 meant freedom to say what one would, excepting for libel, slander, sedition and blasphemy. If that be so, and that rule is the rule of interpretation as I understand it, then this legislation contravenes the Bill of Rights very directly and definitely.

Sir, I have asked for the opinion of the law officers and the minister stated that they give the same opinion that they gave previously. Well, they are the same people who gave the opinion that the Bill of Rights was an idealistic declaration of idealistic uncertainty, euphoniously worded, but completely inoperative. And they learned a lesson to the contrary by that judgment.

That brings me to discuss the next question. What is this legislation going to be used for? I have been here a long time and I have seen a lot of governments. I do know what Mackenzie King would say if he were here and saw this legislation, or what St. Laurent would say. This legislation, it can be argued, is in keeping with the times. Is it in keeping with the times to reduce freedom in order to increase freedom? There is similar legislation in the United Kingdom, brought in by a socialist government, and it does not work. I am not going to mention one or two people who are right honourables in the United Kingdom and who make the most stringent statements against people of another race and colour, but the legislation has not been used against them. It has not been used; it has not been effective. It was pointed out, over and over again by many members of parliament in the United Kingdom that it would not work. I have here, but I do not have the time to place it before the House, a summary by the Canadian Press writer from London in which he concludes that it has not worked.

Now, I return to what I was saying a while ago when I was diverted by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. This fellow Rubin loved freedom so much that the minister and the Prime minister said in effect, "Let him come in." Let me read what he says. I will leave part of it out because it is too offensive.

We've got America on the run. We've combined youth, music, sex, drugs, and rebellion with treason —and that's a combination hard to beat—

This is the man who was allowed to enter Canada and given the red carpet treatment. This is the kind of thing he argued in universities across the country. I continue reading:

What's needed is a new generation of nuisances, a new generation of people who are freaky, crazy, irrational, sexy, angry, irreligious, childish and mad.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And when we read of some of the receptions he received, it is obvious that there are some who qualify fully for membership in those groups. He said that we now have people who lure our youth with music, pot and LSD. Then, he used a short word I will not use; it is familiar and has become part and parcel of Rubin's speeches. Then he said, "Subvert! That's the task of every young person." The government welcomed him. When some of these fellows were barred from Canada finally, the CBC interviewed them on television from Buffalo, and transmitted their story to all parts of Canada. Is it any wonder that there is a feeling of uncertainty in this country?

I cannot deal at this stage with these proposed sections in detail, because the bill has been read the second time. But this is what Dean Walter Tarnapolsky of the Faculty of Law in the University of Windsor has to say about the proposed new section 267B:

This section in effect creates a heckler's veto—

That is something with which I was dealing. I continue:

—so that those who object to the message given him not merely silence the speaker but in effect make him subject to prosecution.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

I have said over and over again I have no objection to the genocide portions of the bill, although Dr. Frank Scott thinks there is no need of them at all. How many hon. members of this House have read his words? I have not always agreed with him but he was the shining, effulgent leader of the CCF, and subsequently of the NDP in the field of civil liberties. His cause had many recruits. Many have followed him. I am interested to learn when it is that that party departed from the views expressed by him. On April 29, 1969, his name was sufficient to bring about silence, because he was the spokesman of freedom. Furthermore, I doubt whether there is a lawyer across the country affiliated to the Civil Liberties League who has not condemned this legislation.

What did Professor Scott say? He said that he did not need to contend that he was as much against hate propaganda as anyone but, nevertheless, he could not subscribe to the principles inscribed in this bill. He could not consider them anything but dangerous of adoption and inclusion in our criminal law at this time. Then, he gave four reasons for his opinion. He said, first, that this bill is retrograde. It certainly is. The advances which have been made and which culminated in the Drybones case are now to be sliced away. He said, secondly, that he thought it was unnecessary; third, that it was dangerous, and fourth, using a non-legal expression, that it was old fashioned. Well, when I see the youthful minister I wonder how it is that he brings in old fashioned legislation.

Sir, Dean Scott referred to the various cases in which the concept of human rights, in a series of magnificent decisions in the Supreme Court, has been increased throughout the years. There is the Boucher case, and five or six others. He concluded by saying that he thought this legislation was dangerous.

Is there a crisis at this time? Sometimes legislation of this kind is passed in a crisis. Can you tell me, sir, that one or two loud blabbermouths are sufficiently important that to affect this country as a whole? There is less discrimination in Canada today than at any time in our history.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why is this legislation being brought in? Sir, Dr. Daniel Hill, Director of the Ontario Commission on Human Rights, has stated that the Canadian public, because of its social stability and high standard of living, is relatively immune to extremist, anti-semitic and other hate materials. I think that is so. This is panic legislation, recommended by the Prime Minister who, over the years, was a member of the socialist party and, subsequently, a member of that committee that brought down the recommendations for it. The minister contends that it constitutes good legislation. Well, it may teach people that they ought not to preach hate but Dr. Scott said this bill will also teach them that the way you stop hate mongering is by having the police lay charges and putting men in prison. That is worse education than any good education which might flow from the bill. I will say no more.

I am deeply concerned about this legislation. Canadians everywhere are suddenly becoming aroused. The House seldom knows the amount of criticism that comes in from the people. Only today we found out that the Department of Finance has set up another force costing $190,000 to answer the letters that are coming in concerning the White Paper. But the Prime Minister did not know anything about it. People everywhere are concerned about this bill. Two world wars were fought for the freedom to speak, not the freedom to break the law.

The Prime Minister has every reason to be concerned over what has been written about him, but he can take action for criminal libel. Mr. Gagnon, the man who is actually determining Canada's future as vice-chairman of the B and B Commission which has already had $100,000 worth of sittings, must be disturbed too. He can take action for criminal libel. It does not take long. However, one statement allegedly made by Mr. Gagnon stands out. When somebody suggested that course to him he said, allegedly, "That was the mistake Alger Hiss made." Sir, we have enough law to protect us. Where there is wrong doing, let is be punished. Having said that, I repeat I am deeply conscious of the danger to our country arising from the passage of this legislation. I know many of my Jewish friends believe in it.

However, it is worthy of note that the Jewish Congress has never asked for such legislation in the United States, despite all the McCarthyism that has taken place in that nation. I cannot do anything to stop it being passed into law. I say, when turn back the clock of freedom in order to be able to punish a small minority. Does one use a Howitzer on a mosquito?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Coast Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to almost everything in this bill except its intent. I have no quarrel with the intent. I am sure this applies equally to most, if not all, hon. members of this House. The intent is to reduce to some degree the sour pus of hatred in the body of the Canadian nation.

To do this, Bill C-3 proposes to create three new crimes. As we all know, Mr. Speaker, we cannot create new crimes without some infringement on the freedom of citizens. Therefore, it is a step which this Parliament should always be most reluctant to take. I do not think I have to labour this point. This debate is in its fourth day and members, both those who support the bill and those who oppose it, have all shown a consciousness of this value of freedom for Canadians.

Personally, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that Bill C-3 represents a major encroachment on the freedom of Canadian citizens. I am not convinced this is a deep encroachment on the rights of citizens. I could go further and say that it is a significant infringement on freedom. If I believed this bill would result in a significant lessening of hate literature or a significant lessening of racial strife in Canada, I would support it. I would do so reluctantly, but I would support it. I am not so convinced.

It is my conviction that at best this law will not accomplish anything. It will merely be a piece of counter-propaganda put on the statute books. I am afraid that the results may be worse. I am afraid this legislation, if passed, will be welcomed by those sordid people who deal in hate literature. I think it will be a crown of thorns for them to pull down on their little pointed heads. I fear that it will cause other hate literature, more devious and vicious, to be published. I think that the residents of society's lunatic fringe are going to get an importance they do not deserve and in the process of circumventing this law, which they can surely do, they will produce a stronger poison than they are now producing.

I feel this is an attempt to legislate mankind into decency. I do not believe that is workable for reasons which I hope to make clear later in these remarks. I do not believe it is a proper function of the criminal law.

Before proceeding to do so, Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak briefly on my own limitations in participating in this debate. There is one limitation in particular which is serious. All my life I have been a member of the majority. My skin has always been the colour of most of those around me. My features, such as they are, have the shape of the average man. My hair, nose and the slant of my eyes have always been similar to those of the majority. I have never experienced first-hand the prejudice which falls upon a person who is in the minority. However, I have made it my business to observe it as closely as I can.

I have many friends who are members of a recognized minority. I refer to the Indian people. They have experienced hatred and contempt. Although I do not have personal experience with the problems of the minority, I am conscious of them and of the fact that there are few greater tragedies for a man than to be pre-judged. This above all is the element of hatred which is so damaging. Although it is damaging to the people who use it, it is even more damaging to its victims.

This is the position of a man who, because of the colour of his skin or some other reason, is not judged as an individual, but prejudged as being a member of a group. He is placed in the position of having to prove that he is equal to the majority of citizens before being accepted. Most hon. members in this House have not experienced this first-hand. We should remember this. I wish I could believe that Bill C-3 provides a cure for that sickness, but I cannot.

I had intended to speak at some length on what I consider to be the weaknesses of this proposed law in terms of enforcement. However, having listened for more than three days to a variety of speeches on this subject, I think it has been quite thoroughly covered. There is no point in my repeating this for those members present. However, I wish to deal with one or two defences provided. In Section 267B.(2), proving truth is a complete defence. This, Mr. Speaker, is a stronger defence than we admit for men charged with libel against individuals under the criminal law.

All newsmen know that a man can be damaged desperately and absolutely unjustly by the diabolical use of truth. With a birth certificate and medical certificate you may be able to prove that the man is a lousy bastard, but under the criminal law you will be punished for doing so unless in some strange way you can prove it is in the public interest to use truth in that way. In this bill we are permitting truth as a defence to a charge of defamation of large groups of people. It will be a defence for those who peddle hatred.

What about another subclause, subclause (c) of the same clause? I shall not read it in full. The words used are "if the statements were relevant to any subject of public interest..." and so on. I have studied this. I believe it was the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Roberts) who drew attention to the point earlier. I suspect Heinrich Himmler could have defended himself under this provision for his verbal attacks on the Jewish community in Germany. However, I shall not thresh this old straw again.

I should like to turn briefly to the genocide provisions. Some hon. members may say: How can anyone in any circumstances tolerate a society in which people can defend genocide? It is my own feeling that the handful of idiots in Canada who would advocate such a course might just as well reveal their idiocy to anyone who wants to examine it. Their influence is so small as to be immeasurable. But let us assume, for the sake of argument, that some promoters of genocide do attain a degree of public acceptance and do begin to make some headway in this country. I consider this unlikely, almost to the point of impossibility, but we are assuming this for a moment. It is my contention that there is provision in the law as it stands to deal with such a situation. I refer to a case which has been cited several times in the course of this debate, the case of Boucher v. The King, 1949-50. I am reading an excerpt from page 39 of the report of the Special Committee on Hate Propaganda in Canada. The last paragraph reads:

> On this interpretation of the Boucher case, classes of Her Majesty's subjects may be adequately protected as groups, under the existing Canadian law of seditious libel, from violence or threats of violence against them, whether or not the violence is directed primarily against them. But on any interpretation the protection to groups extends only to situations where the prosecution can prove that violence was intended.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, no one can advocate genocide without advocating violence. Genocide is violence.

Elsewhere in the Criminal Code, for instance, among the seditious libel sections, provision is made for criminal actions to be brought against people who endanger the structure of our society by the incitement of hatred and violence. Bill C-3 would go further. It would seek—in my view, ineffectively—to silence the lunatic fringe without necessarily requiring evidence that their words were endangering the peace and good order of the state. This, I maintain, is an attempt to use the criminal law to improve men's morals. I am not convinced that the criminal law can be effectively used in this way. I am not convinced that the law can be used to educate people. I am aware that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) does not agree. On Monday he told the House he feels the criminal law has a role as an educative force in Canada. I respect the Minister of Justice. I respect his integrity and his intelligence; I also respect his opinions. But in this case he and I have an honest difference of opinion.

Some of us were amused to hear the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) go into a peroration about dissension in the ranks of the government party which was going to drive the government out of office. What a high, faint cry that was from a defeated party anxiously grasping at any straw by which it might conceivably gain power. It is doubtful whether they would have a clear notion of what to do with power if they did get it. In the unlikely event that this bill is defeated, I would expect the government to promptly set down a motion of confidence; the hon. member for Calgary-North would then see very clearly where the members of the government party place their confidence and where they do not. But I disagree with the government on this piece of legislation.

In closing I should like to quote briefly from two articles on the subject. The first is part of a brief prepared by the British Columbia Civil Liberties Association. It is a very long brief but my quotation will not be extensive:

> Reasonable though such suggestions may sound it should be remembered that while a politically free self-governing people can rightly authorize its governmental tribunals and agents to do many things in its name, including of course the prohibition of many acts deemed harmful, it can never rightly authorize its governmental tribunals and agents to serve as censor or screen for the citizens' minds. To authorize that, even in one area, thereby diminishes the people's self-governing capacity and renders them less fit for their civic role. Any such authorization, moreover, provides the principle and the precedent by which the procedure may be extended in order to suppress other expressions of hatred, not only "hate", ideas.
> To the degree politically free people abdicate their sovereign, collective right to determine for themselves which ideas they shall hear or read, which proposed policies they shall accept or reject, which doctrines they shall advocate or deny —to that degree they have hedged their democratic commitment, giving evidence thereby of a failure of nerve.

I shall read, now, from another paper on this subject. This was contained in Chitty's Law Journal, Volume 18 No. 1. of January 1970 and the author is H. W. Arthurs, Assistant Dean of Law at Osgoode Hall. Incidentally, in his article Mr. Arthurs describes himself as a member of an identifiable minority group. He was speaking of the earlier bill; the bill has been amended since, but I doubt whether Mr. Arthurs opinions on it have changed. As appears on page 4, he says:

> "If this bill is enacted, the general community reaction will be "now there is a law, and the business of combating hate propaganda is the job of policemen and magistrates". Not so. The job of combating hate propaganda is, and always must be, the job of every citizen. To enact a law is to invite the citizen to slough off his responsibilities, to hand over to his paid servants the moral burden which is his alone. I would prefer to see individual citizens —from the highest to the lowest—constantly confront and shout down the hatemonger and the bigot, rather than permit them to bask in the illusion that the forces of law and order, by prosecuting a few sad individuals, have obliterated prejudice.

In closing, I intend to say something which may surprise some hon. members. I should be delighted to find that my opinions with regard to this bill are wrong. I expect that the bill will pass. If it does, I devoutly hope that it will serve a worthy purpose by reducing the flow of hate literature in Canada and reducing the level of hatred in Canada, slight though it may be. But such is not my expectation and I shall therefore vote against this measure. I thank all hon. members for their attention.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, this bill has been the occasion for some speeches of a very high calibre on both sides of the subject. It has led to declarations of continuing faith in the democratic process and in the freedoms which are basic to that process. I have been particularly pleased, indeed, elated, by the fact that all hon. members who have spoken, whatever their side, have recognized the sincerity of all other hon. members and have contributed on the assumption that every one of us is as concerned about basic freedoms as is every other member. This attitude has led to the discussion of the merits of the enactment of this legislation free from the usual tangents which often affect us in debate.

• (4:40 p.m.)

I was therefore rather disappointed once or twice this afternoon when references of a political party character were made and accusations or innuendos expressed to the effect that the bill is before the House for political reasons—for the defence of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), of some other minister, or something of that sort.

I am in favour of the bill. I have expressed my support of it on a number of occasions, but because of the very attractive speech delivered by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) I beg the indulgence of members of the House to express once again my reasons for supporting the bill.

As a matter of fact, the right hon. member for Prince Albert himself gave us the reason the bill is of value. In defining what freedom means to him, he said—I think I am quoting him correctly, if not word for word—that "it means to me the right to be wrong and not to do wrong". May I say in passing that, like all of us in this House, the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert uses his right to be wrong quite often.

It is precisely because freedom means the right to be wrong, and not the right to do wrong, that it forms the basis, at least as far as I am concerned, of the bill that is now before the House. It draws a distinction between the two. A lot of words have been used in this House about attempting to legislate hatred out of people, to legislate evil out of people, and so on. No one has suggested the bill is designed to do that. Those who say that we who support this kind of legislation are thinking that the kingdom of heaven will be on earth the moment this legislation passes take us to be much more naïve than we are.

No legislation will legislate evil or hatred out of the hearts and minds of those who have it. Indeed, I venture to suggest—I hope I do not sound too pessimistic—that so long as human organization continues to exist there will be prejudice, and that on occasion that prejudice will be turned into hatred in the hearts of some people. It is an historical and sociological fact that the majority in a society feels uncomfortable in the presence of a minority. It is an historical and sociological fact that a foreign element in a situation creates discomfort around it.

In every era in society there has been prejudice and hatred which has been based on religion, on colour, on race. I think it would be almost naïvely impertinent to think that we could ever eradicate the presence of prejudice and hatred by one group of another or by one person of another, and no one is attempting to do this.

What society has progressed in doing—and Canada is one of the best societies in this regard—is in persuading people in society, in legislating laws in society, which seek to limit the spread of both prejudice and hatred. This, in my opinion, is the very modest purpose that the bill seeks to serve. It does not seek to eradicate hatred or prejudice but seeks, both through the executive power of the law and through the educative power of the law, to limit to some extent the spread of hatred and prejudice.

No one in this House has greater regard for the civil liberties fences erected by the right hon. member for Prince Albert. But I say to him that his definition of freedom and the kind of—I was going to say self-righteous but perhaps that would be unfair to him—the kind of possessive way in which he talked about freedom, does not impress me very much. He was good enough to say when he left the chamber that he would be back when I was speaking. I do not blame him for not coming back; I just regret having to say this in his absence.

The southern racists in the United States believe that freedom gives them the right to have white children educated in one school and black children educated in another school. That is their definition of freedom. If the law did not intervene, they would exercise that "freedom" and continue to segregate the white from the black.

Take the case of the landlord in Ontario who says of his property: "My freedom in this society gives me the right to decide whether or not I am going to rent my property to one person or another. I do not intend to rent it to a Jew or to a Negro. If you pass a law which forces me to rent it to a Jew or to a Negro, you are interfering with my freedom", says this dark ages landlord.

The right hon. gentleman spoke a great deal about freedom and then patted himself on the back for wanting to keep Jerry Rubin out of Canada because he wished to come to this country to make speeches of which the right hon. member disapproves. The history of society is full of definitions of freedom, and they are used to serve whatever purpose people in society want them to serve. Appeals to freedom are as numerous, and frequently are as spurious, as quotations from the scripture that are used to satisfy and justify all kinds of acts.

What we are discussing here is not the question of freedom in any meaningful sense of the word. I have never known a piece of legislation that has been so misrepresented across the country as has this piece of legislation. I do not often get home early enough to listen to the program "Viewpoint" after the eleven o'clock television news, but I did happen to watch it last night. I heard an editor of the Globe and Mail, a man I do not know but who I am sure is a fine Canadian, and who I am told was, before he became an editor, a member of the cloth, I think a minister of the United Church of Canada.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Don't hold that against him.

Mr. Lewis: I don't hold anything against him except what he said. That gentleman, with the smug omniscience that a combination of minister and editorial writer makes possible said to the people of Canada: "You know, Pierre Burton is saying bad things about the members of Jehovah's Witnesses who will not permit their children to have blood transfusions. He can do that now with impunity, but one month from now he will be in jail if he says this".

I say to this editorial writer for the Globe and Mail that he does not know what he is talking about. He has not read the bill. He is indulging in hyperbole, in distortion, in misrepresentation, and he is not serving the people of Canada in any sense of the word. What kind of nonsense is this! Where in this bill is there this kind of prohibition?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It provides the very opposite.

Mr. Lewis: The bill provides, first of all, that in order to be convicted or to stand a chance of being convicted under the terms of this bill the Crown has to prove that the statements complained of are made in public; that they are calculated to promote hatred of an identifiable group; that the intention of the person making the statements is to promote and evoke hatred of an identifiable group, a minority in our society.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Then, it provides the defence that any decent discussion on a religious subject is a defence against any charge under this bill. So, there is no such possibility of Pierre Berton being in trouble for saying this, at least. I do not know what else Pierre may be in trouble about, but at least in this case he has nothing to worry about.

The same thing has happened in this House. It is easy to say this is terrible legislation and it will prevent this and that, but the fact is that these statements are incorrect, they are not true. They make a mockery of plain English when they are presented to this House and the people of Canada.

The right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert indulges in his usual attractive hyperbole when he reminds this House that a similar law was passed by the U.S.S.R. in 1919, I do not know, maybe it was; I have not the slightest notion. However, he does not tell this House what every member who has read the special report on hate propaganda knows now, that this law was passed by the United Kingdom, by Norway, Sweden, Denmark, France and Switzerland, indeed by every democracy in Europe which does not take second place to the democratic declarations of the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert or to the democratic declarations of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or anyone else in this House or in this country. Is it suggested that the people in all these countries in western Europe have not got as much regard for freedom and democratic rights as we have? What really is the sense and the purpose of a leading member of the Canadian community and in this House trying to besmirch and smear this legislation by reference to some law in a Communist country in 1919? What is the purpose of it, Mr. Speaker? Is that the way this kind of debate should be carried on? Is that the way to place this matter before the House and the people of Canada?

I have in my hand a copy of the relevant sections of the Race Relations Act of 1965 of the United Kingdom passed by the House of Commons, if my memory serves me correctly, with the approval and support in principle of the Conservative opposition at the time as well as the Labour government, and passed by the House of Lords which still has a majority, or at least a very large number of Conservatives in it. It reads:

> A person shall be guilty of an offence under this section if, with intent to stir up hatred against any section of the public in Great Britain distinguished by colour, race, or ethnic or national origins—
> (a) he publishes or distributes written matter which is threatening, abusive or insulting; or
> (b) he uses in any public place or at any public meeting words which are threatening, abusive or insulting, being matter or words likely to stir up hatred against that section on grounds of colour, race, or ethnic or national origins.

In substance this is precisely the kind of legislation that is now before this House, passed by the mother of parliaments to which the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert pays the greatest respect and attention, headed by the monarch to whom the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert pays the homage which the monarch obviously deserves. This is the parliament that passed the kind of legislation which is now before the House, and I think it is a little less than fair and a little less than the fairness of which the right hon. gentleman is usually capable to refer to this legislation as being compared with legislation in the Soviet Union. The fact is, as I have said, all other democratic countries in western Europe have passed similar legislation.

What is this bill all about, Mr. Speaker? Perhaps we ought to spend a minute on that in view of some of the statements I have heard—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Or read.

Mr. Lewis: —or read. What is this bill about? It prohibits the spread, or the advocacy or promotion of genocide. I do not expect that section of this bill will ever have to be used in Canada although, as I shall say in a moment, one can never be certain. But, we undertook an international obligation to put this kind of thing into legislation. As a country we solemnly signed and ratified an international convention on genocide passed by the United Nations, and undertook in that convention to pass this kind of legislation. This section is no more than the fulfilment of our international obligations.

As I said the other day on another subject, the cynical disregard for international obligations is the curse of humanity today, and if we take one small mincing step in fulfilling an obligation under an international convention, then I cannot understand any member of this House questioning this.

The second offence is, and forgive me for reading some of the actual words, because they have been so misrepresented:

> Every one who, by communicating statements in any public place, incites hatred against any identifiable group where such incitement is likely to lead to a breach of the peace, is guilty of—

Is anyone suggesting that it is improper to put into the Criminal Code a prohibition against the incitement of hatred that leads to a breach of the peace? Is there anyone here who suggests that there is something wrong in that or that there is an interference with freedom of speech when the Parliament of Canada prohibits this kind of behaviour?

If you will permit me as a lawyer, Mr. Speaker, let me indicate to you how false have been the editorials in certain papers and some of the speeches in trying to interpret this. A prosecuting attorney on a charge under this section will not have an easy time. He has to prove first that the statement was communicated in a public place, that the statement incited hatred and that the statement incited such hatred that is likely to lead to a breach of the peace. There are safeguards right in there, I suggest to you. That is not an interference with freedom in any meaningful sense. That is a provision and a necessary addition to the Criminal Code.

I think perhaps at this point I should call it five o'clock. I will have to continue in the evening.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members business as listed on today's order paper, namely, private bills, notices of motions (papers) and public bills.

[English]

PRIVATE BILLS

BRUNNER CORPORATION (CANADA) LIMITED

Mr. Philip G. Givens (York West) moved that Bill S-18, respecting Brunner Corporation (Canada) Limited, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in addressing myself to the second reading of this bill, I want to make it amply clear to the House that I am not connected with this company either directly or indirectly as an officer or shareholder. My name is attached to this bill simply because I was visited by the president and another official of the company which has a branch plant in my constituency. They asked me to be the sponsor of this bill as a result of representations they made to me.

I do not know how much detail hon. members of the House would like me to go into on this subject, but the sole purpose of the bill is to revive the charter of the company. What happened was that during the period between August 8, 1956 and June 6, 1968 there was a comptroller or official of this company whose responsibility it was to make the annual returns, including tax returns, for the company. He had a psychological block about bureaucracy and governmental returns. He just did not make them. Even though there were reminders from the government under Section 125 of the Canada Corporations Act, he failed to make the returns and as a result the charter lapsed. Therefore, the company was placed in this very invidious position.

• (5:00 p.m.)

The purpose of this bill is merely to restore the charter to the company, so that the company may be returned to the position it was in prior to the difficulty in respect of the filing of these returns. The tax obligations and liabilities of this company would remain as before. There are no privileges to be granted to the company. The company could make application for a new charter, but the difficulty and expense involved in doing so would probably result, in so far as the branch plant in my constituency is concerned, in the company going out of business. I, therefore, pray that the House entertain this bill and pass it for the reasons I have indicated.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Givens: Certainly.

Mr. Benjamin: Could the hon. member tell us whether the comptroller has been fired or whether the company has the same comptroller.

Mr. Givens: He has become as functus as the charter. He is no longer with the company.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, this is another example of the type of bill which I think the government is very foolish in pushing to this level. I accept the explanation given because it sounds illogically logical and, of course, the company would have been put to a great deal of expense to obtain a new charter. I have been involved in considerable discussion in respect of other bills concerning companies which were placed in this position. It was my understanding that the department would take a look at the situation to determine whether the companies involved were interested in maintaining their charter. Such action would make this type of operation unnecessary. There is an expenditure involved here of a considerable amount of money. I do not think this should be necessary. I think the companies branch should have to give a good explanation, because this would seem to be an exercise in futility.

As I remember the last such episode, the instructions given to the branch were that the company would be contacted to determine whether or not it wished to retain its charter. If the company did wish to retain its charter, then a penalty or whatever action was necessary could be applied. In this way the situation could be handled through the normal administrative procedures necessary for reinstatement. It seems to me that by following the procedure we have here we are putting many people, including the hon. member for York West (Mr. Givens) in a difficult position. The hon. member has already pointed out the position in which he has been put.

In my opinion, when this bill is discussed before the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders, the officials of the department should be asked to give a pretty good reason for having taken this particular step. I do not believe this procedure is a desirable one. I would think that there should be an alternative administrative procedure which should be adhered to by officials of the department.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR COPY OF LABOUR DEPARTMENT'S REVIEW OF MINIMUM WAGE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the Department of Labour's review of the minimum wage and its effect on the Canadian economy referred to by the Minister of Labour on November 3, 1969, as recorded in Hansard at page 402.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as will be clear from the terms of the motion which has just been read—and if I am speaking slowly it is to give the parliamentary secretary, who has just come in, time to catch his breath—it is moved because on November 3, 1969, as recorded at page 402 of Hansard, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) gave us a piece of information that was quite interesting. He was answering one of many questions put to him about the possibility of raising the minimum wage as set out in the Canada Labour (Standards) Code. He said this:

The department is now concluding a departmental review of the minimum wage and its effect on the Canadian economy and, particularly, its effect on programs financed jointly by the provinces and the federal government.

Mr. Speaker, in this age of participatory democracy, Information Canada, public involvement in the decision-making process and all these other things, it seems to me it is a most reasonable request for us to ask that this review, which the Department of Labour has made, be made public. Obviously this is not a document which sets out a policy or any secrets the government may have. We are told it is a review of the minimum wage and the effect of the minimum wage on the Canadian economy. Frankly, we would be much happier if instead of having a review, a white paper, or a document of this kind, we could have a bill amending the appropriate legislation, but as these things take time I ask why we should not be taken into the confidence of the government concerning what it has learned in this study.

Only today during the question period the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) took some credit for the government's policy of issuing a white paper on taxation. The Prime Minister went so far as to say the government was encouraged not necessarily by the substance of the replies it is receiving but by the fact that the people of Canada like to become involved in the decision-making process.

If that is the motto of this government, why not practice it? I suppose that there are times when we ask for certain documents that may have some confidential element in them, and hence there may be times when the government's refusal to acquiesce in a request that we make has some merit. Surely, that does not apply in this case. What we have here is a study of the minimum wage and the effect it has on our economy. Public money has been spent in conducting this study. Presumably it has been reduced to some kind of writing. I think that we ought to have it, and that is why I put this motion on the order paper. When it was called on November 26, 1969, the government asked me to withdraw it. That, of course, is just a way of provoking one to transfer it for debate.

It is not my intention now to indulge in lengthy debate or to divide the House on this as though it were the biggest issue that ever hit Parliament, but it does seem to me that my request, even though I make it in a low Key, is one that ought to be met. Surely, if there is something to the idea that we should know what is going on, here is a case in point. This whole business of how much government information is made available to the public has been put many times in a simple statement, namely that we should move from the era in which the government gave out nothing unless it absolutely had to, into an era in which the government should give out everything except something that it must absolutely keep secret.

I am told that there are members in the cabinet who argue for the latter position and argue for it very strongly. There are members in the cabinet who try to get the government to adopt the position, under which the people of Canada would be entitled to have every bit of information which the government has, unless there is something for which there are good, sound reasons for maintaining secrecy. I do not see how any reason, good, sound or otherwise, can be advanced for keeping this review secret. I hope now that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour (Mr. McNulty) has caught his breath he will be able to rise and say that the decision has now been made to grant this motion. Having done so, we can rise and call it a good afternoon.

Mr. Jim McNulty (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): I know the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has been around this chamber for quite a few decades and I am quite sure he is expecting to hear what I am going to say. This motion refers to the Department of Labour review of the minimum wage and its effect on the Canadian economy referred to by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) on November 3, 1969 as recorded in Hansard at page 402. As I mentioned last November 26, 1969, a study was prepared as a confidential internal working paper for the use of members of the Department of Labour, and I would again respectfully ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my view the nays have it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On division.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion is negatived on division.

Motion (Mr. Knowles, Winnipeg North Centre) negatived.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I believe there would be general agreement to calling it six o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the Chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING HATE PROPAGANDA

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) for the third reading of Bill C-3, to amend the Criminal Code.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, at five o'clock I was dealing with some of the clauses of the bill in an attempt to point out that the purport and effect of the bill, no doubt in good faith, have been widely misrepresented outside the House and to some extent, in my opinion, by some hon. members in the House. I had finished dealing with the second offence created in the bill, and now I want to say a word about the third offence and ask hon. members who feel uneasy about the bill whether their uneasiness is really justified.

In effect this measure prohibits public communication of statements which wilfully promote hatred against any identifiable group. I wish hon. members and some editorial writers would read the pertinent clause and not precisely what it says. First, it excludes any private conversation. Second, it prohibits the communication of statements which wilfully promote hatred. No matter how you define the word "wilful" in a particular situation, obviously what this bill says in simple English is that anyone who sets out to make statements deliberately intended to promote hatred against a race, or a group identified by racial or religious aspects, is committing an offence. It is not, therefore, saying something about Jehovah's Witnesses being wrong in not permitting their children to take blood transfusions. It is not any interference with anything that I or anyone else may want to say about Jews, Negroes, Catholics or Protestants.

In order to come within the ambit of this clause I have to say something dirty or scurrilous, and not merely say something dirty or scurrilous but say it with the intention of promoting hatred—say it in such a way, in such circumstances and in such a context that the court can find I deliberately intended to promote hatred against the identifiable group. I ask hon. members, where is that an interference with my legitimate freedom?

As I said earlier, I listened with great interest to the speech made this afternoon by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). I do not have his exact words, but I agree with him when he says freedom is the right to say something of which the majority may disapprove and with which the majority may disagree. Of course that is what freedom means. But then he added "subject to libel"; in other words, that I have the freedom to say something with which the majority may disagree, but subject to the laws of libel. Mr. Speaker, I say to the right hon. gentleman that the bill which he condemns so strongly is nothing more than a projection of the libel laws, from libel against an individual to libel against an identifiable group. The limitation which he himself placed upon the extent to which I can say something, namely, that it is subject to the laws of libel, is precisely the exception that this bill provides. It provides nothing more than that exception.

So what, in heaven's name, is all this misreading of the plain language of the bill which is before the House? True, the language may be improved. The bill may be misinterpreted by a court. I am a lawyer by profession; I have appeared in courts. Many times courts have interpreted language in a way which I disapproved in cases which I lost. If they had interpreted the language in what I considered to be the right way, obviously I would have won. It is quite conceivable that some court will misinterpret the language of this bill. It is quite conceivable that some magistrate or judge will read into its language what this Parliament does not intend and will apply the law in a wrong way. That is why we have the appeal process in this country, so that higher courts will be able to look at a wrong decision and correct it. But because a law might be misinterpreted and abused by a court does not in itself condemn the law.

There is not a single law on the statute books that has not been misinterpreted, if I may say so, by some court or judge; because judges—and I say this bearing in mind that I might have to appear before them from time to time, although my parliamentary duties do not permit it too often—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Careful!

Mr. Lewis: May I say, without being careful, that judges are human beings and they are no less capable of error, and probably no less capable of prejudice than any other human being, and therefore they may misapply the law. But what has that to do with the law itself and the merits of the bill before the House? Time and time again hon. members who have spoken have said, as have people who have written against this bill, that there is no immediate and present danger. In what way is that an argument against the bill? I suggest to this House, to the people of Canada and through you, Mr. Speaker, to hon. members of this House, that it is much wiser, much safer to introduce this kind of law when there is no crisis, when there is no present and immediate danger, than when there is a crisis.

When you introduce laws of this sort that try to order the behaviour of individuals and organizations in society at a time of impending danger, at a time of crisis, that is when they go overboard. If these laws come before the courts in times of crisis or panic, that is when they are misapplied, abused and misinterpreted. You hear the most sensible discussion of a law like this in times like these precisely because the danger is not so great as to make people too anxious, too obstinate and too inflexible. The law is before us now and it is good to know it is here at this time.

The right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert displayed great glee in referring to Frank Scott's presentation to the Senate committee. Let me say that Frank Scott and I worked together, as hon. members know, for many years. We have been personal friends, if I may say this now, because my age is well known as a result of many columns in the press of this country—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): For 40 years.

Mr. Lewis: —for 40 years. I have known Frank Scott and his delightful and talented wife for 40 years. We worked together in the CCF. In 1943 we wrote a book together.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): It couldn't have been a best seller.

Mr. Lewis: It was a best seller, let me inform the Minister of Justice. Indeed it was a best seller, and it had a very important title which is relevant to the present situation. I point my finger at the treasury benches when I say that the title was, "Make This Your Canada".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Professor Scott and I have worked together for years. He was national chairman of the CCF when I was national secretary. I have the greatest respect for him and I hope he has some respect for me. But I disagree with him. He is no more infallible in his thinking than is the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert, the Minister of Justice or anybody else. Frank Scott is capable of being influenced by a concentration of thought along one line, as all people are. When you concentrate your thoughts, energies and emotions along one line you are just as likely as anyone else, even if you are the most intelligent man in the country—and Frank Scott is one of the most intelligent men in our country—to be blinded as to other lines and other aspects of life. I say my friend Frank is guilty of just that in respect of this bill.

The hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre) quoted Harry Arthurs, another person I know very well and like to call my friend. What did Harry Arthurs say? He said that if we pass this law we will give people the illusion that everything has been done to stop prejudice and hatred and that they do not need to do anything else. That was the effect of what the hon. member read. I say to my friend Professor Arthurs that he is talking balderdash. Nobody is suggesting that that is what is intended. There is not a law on the statute books that stops the activities of ordinary citizens and ordinary organizations.

Just because you have a law that says society requires you not to do certain things, does that mean that groups in society are not capable of constantly educating people along certain lines? I say to Professor Arthurs that the contrary of what he says is true—that when the law embodies the moral conscience of society, the likelihood is greater that active citizen groups will continue to do good work and the effectiveness of their work will be greater. This is historically true. Because it is now possible to base activities on the provisions of this bill, the educational and other work of citizens and groups will go on more effectively.

I am not an alarmist, but I also am a member of a minority group of this country and other countries.

An hon. Member: A member of the NDP.

Mr. Lewis: I am a member of an identifiable minority group in this country and other countries, and I must admit that I am constantly aware of what happened under Hitler to people of my identifiable group. I am amazed at the complacency with which people say, "Oh, there are just a few lunatics in this country now; what are you worried about? Are you worrying about these fringe-lunatics. Don't worry about them." In 1922 and 1923, Mr. Speaker, there were a few fringe-lunatics in Germany concentrated in one city. No one took them seriously. They were looked upon with contempt and disdain and every political party in Germany in the early 1920s, including the party which I would support, the Social Democrats, said, "This is nonsense. We do not have to worry about this lunatic fringe. No intelligent people such as ours will fall for this kind of thing." Well, Mr. Speaker, they fell; and as a result the world was thrust into a world war and Poles, Ukrainians and Jews were murdered by the million. So what is all this complacency about?

I say to hon. members that Canadians, as far as I am concerned, are the best people on earth. But they are human beings and history shows that racial antagonism is present in practically all of us. Let us be honest with ourselves about it. If adverse social and economic circumstances appear, if there is a recession or economic difficulty, or if there are national problems such as we face in Canada today with two different languages, it is quite possible for racial difficulties to come to the surface as they have in the United States and in other countries. To anyone who says complacently, "We in Canada are incapable of this," I say, not as an alarmist but as an historian, "you are deluding yourself." There is no people in the world that is not capable of collective evil.

I mentioned once before in remarks in this House the title of a book written by a theologian, Reinhold Niebur, professor of Christian ethics at a well-known theological seminary in New York. He wrote a book entitled, "Moral Man and Immoral Society". The purport of the book was to indicate to humanity that individuals who are individually decent people, who live as individuals without any of the meanness that is regrettable in human behaviour, will when objective circumstances create panic and the kind of hysteria that can be created by difficulties and conflicts become in the mass an indecent and evil mob.

That is true of every southerner in the United States who has helped to lynch Negroes. I am sure that at home every one of them is decent to his wife, children, dog and neighbour; he is proud of the fact that he goes to church on Sunday and that he does not steal or swear. However, when the mass of the southern whites get together in a context which governs their hearts and minds, they tear a human being apart. This is the historical fact. It is the historical fact with every group and with every society in every part of the world. Every race, white, black or yellow, is capable of this kind of evil. If it does not occur, it is because of the educational influence in our society; the influence of broader, deeper feeling and thinking in our society. It is also because of the influence of the laws in our society which lay down the standards of behaviour of people, whether in the civil code or criminal code of any country.

These are the safeguards against evils which are capable of being produced in any society anywhere in the world. These evils are fewer in our society than many others: this is why I am proud to be a Canadian. However, I do not fool myself by thinking that there is not anti-Semitism in parts of this country. I know there are people who are anti-Semitic. There are Protestants who hate the Catholics, Catholics who hate the Protestants, English-speaking Canadians who hate the "Frogs", and French-speaking Canadians who hate the English. I do not try to fool myself; these elements are present in our society and in every other society. It is a recognition of these facts and an appreciation of these elements in any group of human beings that makes it necessary for a wise Parliament to try to pass laws which will, to some extent at least, limit the spread of prejudice and hatred.

As I said earlier today, this is all I claim for this bill. I think this is all the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) claims for this bill. No one with any sense will claim that this bill will eradicate hatred from people's hearts, or prejudice from people's minds. No one is naïve enough to think that. As I said earlier, it is probably impossible by any means ever to eradicate prejudice which may lead to hatred, but it is possible for organized society intelligently to take steps to limit that prejudice and hatred, particularly the deliberate spreading of hatred of an identifiable group.

There is nothing more reprehensible or corrosive of human behaviour and human decency in this world than racism. In my opinion there is nothing more evil, nothing lower in human behaviour than to regard another human being with disrespect and contempt because of race or religion. There is nothing more evil in society, and that evil should be dealt with. This bill deals in a modest way with preventing the deliberate spreading of hatred against an identifiable group. If the bill is read properly, objectively and honestly it will be seen that it does not interfere with any freedom, it does not interfere with any individual rights, it does interfere with the evil which racism presents to the world. I hope it will be overwhelmingly adopted by this House.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), and I also heard this afternoon the statement by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). The member who has just resumed his seat is perfectly right when he says that hatred should not exist, and I share his opinion fully. However, we must acknowledge the fact that hatred does exist in nearly all the countries of the world, precisely because some people will not admit that a human being, whether he be white, yellow, brown or black, whether he holds Catholic, Baptist or Pentecostal beliefs, has a right to existence.

We believe there is a God. The Roman Catholics believe it, as well as the Protestants and the followers of various other churches. There is only one God and everyone imagines Him according to the religion to which he belongs. However, one should not forget that all human beings, wherever they may be, have an undeniable right to life and to respect, but that, on the other hand, they must respect others.

The hon. member was speaking about hatred. There are people who are full of hatred in Canada and in all other countries. The hon. member for York South told us that he was a member of a minority group, but I think he feels well respected in Canada. In a country where he would belong to the majority group and which is called Israel, hatred is also to be found. When we hear about the skirmishes and the wars now taking place between Arabs and Jews and between Lebanese and Jews, we surely can say that hatred does exist there also.

Hatred was prevalent in the Congo a few years ago, and in Biafra fairly recently.

People kill one another precisely because they have lost their sense of values and respect. When we note what is going on in Viet Nam, it is not really edifying. Every evening on television, we can see films showing us small children, mothers and old people covered with blood, on account of a revolution, hatred and misunderstanding.

• (8:30 p.m.)

As far as our country is concerned, as the right hon. member for Prince Albert said this afternoon, we are afraid to prevent hatemongers from entering Canada. We already have our own hatemongers, but we see fit to import a few.

The moment a socialist, a rebel or a revolutionary sets foot on Canadian soil, he is invited to express his opinions on the CBC network, in English and in French. Visits by such people are given the full headline treatment by newspapers.

The federal Department of Immigration gave permission to teachers from Algeria, France and other countries to enter Canada, knowing full well their intention was to teach revolution to our children.

We can see the results today. In certain universities or CEGEPs, young people have been stirred up. The professors we have allowed to enter Canada in the name of freedom and because, we said, everyone is entitled to his opinions, have never lived so well in their own country as they do in Canada.

Not satisfied with their higher living standard in Canada, they seek to reduce it or, at least, to sow the seeds of complete destruction which will be a reality in a few years the way things are going.

Bill C-3 is a monument to inconsequence. Indeed, in the name of freedom, we accept in Canada foreign professors who are full of hate, embittered and unreasonable. We welcome them in the name of freedom. Once accepted, they start sowing the seeds of destruction. Then, when destruction has begun, Bill C-3 is introduced with these words: Now, for the sake of freedom, this bill to eradicate hate publicity or propaganda must be passed. That is the illogical gesture of a legislator, of a government reluctant to assume responsibilities.

In the name of liberty, rebels are accepted, and warned: Be careful. If you nurture hatred, you will be arrested and thrown into jail for four or five years.

I will give an example. I am not referring to a Jew from Israel or to a Russian from the USSR, or to the American, Carmichael, or to Castro. I will just take an example in the city of Montreal, 110 miles from Ottawa.

A man by the name of Michel Chartrand was on parliament hill this afternoon, accompanied by a group of some 100 people whom he was haranguing in front of the main Parliament building, using the language of a coward, a vulgar rascal, a foul-mouthed boor, attacking everyone, respecting no one, swearing more stupidly than the lumberjacks of old who were a match for anyone when it came to cursing.

Mr. Chartrand was on parliament hill this afternoon, blaming the authority, any authority, for he has no respect for anybody. Mr. Chartrand could not carry on like that for five minutes in Cuba, a country which he adores, or in Russia, where there already is a political system which he would like to force on us here. Mr. Chartrand would be facing a firing squad less than two hours after saying what he said this afternoon to those gathered in front of the parliament building.

Mr. Speaker, he was behaving like a lunatic and what is more pitiful is that this dangerous mad man was accompanied by family men, truck drivers from Montreal with children 10, 12 or 15 years old, who are ashamed for their children to hear the remarks made by a scatterbrain like Michel Chartrand, and who have been led to a dead-end, because the union leaders tell them: "Either you follow us or you are scabs. You are in this with us or we will smash you. That is, in effect, what has happened in Montreal, where they have destroyed private property, smashing trucks, slashing tires and attacking truck drivers who were delivering the mail.

Union leaders like Chartrand are dangerous men because with hate in their hearts they have no other purpose than to destroy Canadian society. The government is afraid when he sees that.

In the name of freedom let us allow anarchy and tolerate scatterbrains like Chartrand and company. Let us put up with all that and then let us pass legislation like Bill C-3, because society must be protected. Let us permit its destruction in order to protect it afterwards. There is the inconsistency of the present situation.

Mr. Speaker, threats are made when we denounce hate mongers. Yet, mind you, it is not with hate that I condemn Chartrand but solely because I want to state the facts. I nurse no grudge against him. I even wish him to go to heaven, but if only he could get there a little faster.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Caouette: However, there is a limit in seeing such people rouse employers against workers and vice versa, people who will stop at nothing and who go as far as saying: If bombs must be used, let us use them.

The other paradox is the publicity which is given those people. I might be accused of making publicity for Chartrand, but at least I am telling the truth about him.

It has certainly been noticed that CBC cameras were there this afternoon. In fact there were three or four of them. The cameramen were not responsible for that; they had been instructed by the Corporation to be there in order to take photographs of all those who were present. Tonight at eleven we will perhaps hear the enlightening remarks made by Chartrand this afternoon when he uttered the worst curse words, and blamed everyone. The other day the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) himself was jeered at by the same fellow here in front of the parliament building. I do not intend to defend the Prime Minister of Canada as a man, or as the leader of the Liberal party, but as Prime Minister of Canada. Whoever he is, Pierre Elliott Trudeau, Robert Stanfield, Tommy Douglas or Réal Caouette, the Prime Minister is, as it were, the symbol of Canada throughout the world and, of course, in Canada in particular.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Caouette: Thus, he deserves respect. Does Chartrand show any respect for him? The Prime Minister leaves the House to meet Chartrand who says to him: "Yes, you are well protected, you have your bouncers with you". Of course, this went with a lot of swearing.

Mr. Speaker, I do not say that Chartrand should be shot as he would certainly be in Cuba if he acted the way he does in Canada but I say that he should be brought to his senses, to reason.

• (8:40 p.m.)

Chartrand stirs up the workers. As for me, I ask the Prime Minister yesterday whether he was considering the possibility of giving Chartrand the contract for mail delivery in Montreal that he might hire men and prove that he is smarter than the others as an employer. That would be one solution. Mr. Chartrand could have tendered for the mail delivery contract in Montreal. Anyone could. Why did he not do so? He does not assume his responsibilities. It is easy to blame those who accept them.

That is a case of hatred. It is to be found in several other sectors. When there are strikes here and there in Canada, hatred is present. Individuals are stirred one against the other, but the system that is responsible for it all is left alone. It is ignored, no one speaks about it.

Bills are introduced to check hate literature and genocide. We agree with those who say: down with racism, long live humanity. Still, the necessary steps must be taken to uproot the causes of racism. Once the people, the whole world, have been brought around to understanding that the individual is entitled to respect, there will no longer be such tragedies as we now witness in several countries.

Even here, in Parliament, pro-Biafran members joined battle with pro-Nigerian members. Even now, Canadians are wrestling with each other. Separatism and the Quebec rebels are feared while there are rebels in Ontario and in other provinces.

Bottles were thrown at the Prime Minister at the time of the Saint-Jean-Baptiste parade in Montreal. Rotten wheat was thrown right into his face in Saskatchewan. So there are people in revolt throughout Canada. Why? Precisely because our economic system does not enable us to live decently. While citizens are fighting against each other, while employers are finding fault with workers and the latter with employers, capitalists sleep in peace and are well off. They have no trouble because they finance both sides and get much out of both. So as long as that is profitable, the system works.

[Mr. Caouette.]

Wars were waged that way. Even in the United States, people are worrying about the end of the war in Viet Nam, as cannon manufacturers would not only be deprived of their profits but the spectre of unemployment would show itself. It seems strange to think that there is money in the United States to pay soldiers but not to enable the unemployed to live decently. Is that logical? That is what is happening nevertheless.

Twenty-six billion dollars are spent annually for the war in Viet Nam. Canons, shells and other destructive devices are manufactured and aircraft built to bomb innocent people. Money is no object. However, if all servicemen were sent back home to the United States, they would be told that there is no more money to enable them to live decently. How strange! There is money to enable them to live over there, where they are sowing destruction, but there is none in the United States to enable them to live in peace at home. The system is as stupid as that.

Besides, the same system exists in Canada. In Canada the problem is a financial one. If there ever comes a day when money is at the service of human beings, there will be greater understanding. When people have the right to live, to have a house, a car, a garden or a farm of their own, when they feel at home, the danger of a revolution does not exist any more.

However, when people are dead broke, as they are at the present time in Canada, where the unemployed number over 650,000, the situation is far from satisfactory. These people have not asked to be unemployed. They know that Canada could afford to give them a decent living. However, they find it impossible to live decently in our country, said to be the richest in the world. In such a juncture, the seeds of revolution make their way among the masses.

The needs of revolution and communism find their way into those poverty stricken homes. Little by little, the idea develops. We had an enlightening example this afternoon, with that lunatic Chartrand, on parliament hill.

Mr. Speaker, as legislators, we have responsibilities. The government has even more serious and obvious responsibilities since it is in charge of the nation's business. However, all political parties and all members of parliament also have their own responsibilities. Their first responsibility is to tell the truth, to be honest and to propose solutions that will not promote hatred, but will allow individuals to understand each other better, whatever their origin might be, French, English, Jewish, Ukrainian or Polish.

The day people feel at home in Canada, individuals, fathers and mothers of families, then we will be prepared to defend our interests. And if all are ready to defend their interests, we shall have in Canada a true association of human beings instead of racism, religious feud and struggle between management and labour.

We shall be able to avoid that useless fighting. There will be different opinions, of course, and as many of them as there are individual members in the House. A human being is a world in itself. There is no such thing in Canada as two identical human beings. Therefore, let us try to set up a social, economic and political pattern allowing every human being to be himself, and to thrive freely according to his or her own aspirations, ability and will. Then and only then shall we have in Canada a just society, an understanding society, a society which will have no need for Bill C-3.

We need Bill C-3 because our House is a mess. We need a bill against hatred because there is cause for hatred. Let us suppress the cause and we shall achieve better results. We shall turn the Canadian people into a united nation living in a strong Canada which will stand as an example before the world.

[English]

Mr. Ian Wahn (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, quite properly this bill has provoked thoughtful and serious debate because it deals with an extremely difficult problem: how best can we protect minority groups against criminal defamation and incitement to hatred without endangering one of our greatest rights, freedom of speech? I readily understand why many members sincerely oppose this legislation; it is because they are afraid that in our desire to curb hate propaganda we may in some way impair or even destroy our most precious heritage, the right of free speech and discussion which we have taken centuries to win and to guarantee. We must protect freedom of speech. But we must also protect minority groups against hate propaganda, and we must fulfil our international commitments to outlaw genocide and racial discrimination.

This legislation which we are now considering is our attempt to reconcile these objectives, and I wish to record my strong support of it. This bill is not an assault on freedom of speech; it is designed to fill gaps in existing laws to prevent criminal defamation and incitements to breaches of the peace, and also to fulfil our international commitments to outlaw genocide and discrimination. I should like to make that the theme of my brief remarks this evening.

As a lawyer with great admiration for the way in which our legal system has evolved gradually over the years, I believed at one time that our existing law provided adequate protection against hate propaganda. However, the evidence presented to the special committee appointed in 1965 to study hate propaganda changed my views, and in the last Parliament I introduced a private member's bill designed to achieve the same purposes as this bill that we are considering.

The fact is that a great deal of propaganda is continually being directed against minority groups in Canada, usually Black, Jewish or Catholic. I myself have received hate propaganda and I am quite sure that most members from urban ridings have. For that reason I believe it is important that a bill such as this should be passed, and with a large majority, as a ringing declaration that this Parliament condemns all attempts to stir up hatred against any of the large number of minority groups which form part of our multicultural society.

Some members have said you cannot outlaw hatred by passing laws, and that this is a matter of private morality and not a matter of public law. I think this distinction was the one intended to be made by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) in his phrase that "freedom involves the right to be wrong but not to do wrong." This is a striking phrase, Mr. Speaker, but as it was pointed out by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), it illustrates the exact opposite of what the right hon. member intended.

This bill does not attempt to outlaw hatred, which is wrong, but rather it intends to outlaw overt acts based upon hatred. It intends to outlaw wrongdoing. We have outlawed criminal assault, we have outlawed murder, we have outlawed criminal defamation of individuals, and we can and must outlaw genocide and defamation of groups in order to protect the human rights of minorities.

In my province of Ontario we have a long and proud record of protection of human rights dating from 1793 when the first Parliament of Upper Canada passed an Act to Prevent the Further Introduction of Slaves and to Limit the Term of Enforced Servitude within the Province. Later provincial legislation proved very effective in preventing discrimination in housing and employment, despite the very same arguments that we have heard during the last few days that this type of discrimination based upon hate cannot be prevented by legislative action.

In fact, this legislation merely fills gaps in our criminal law. We have already criminal legislation to prevent breaches of the peace. This legislation makes it clear that this prohibition extends to breaches of the peace resulting from hate propaganda. We have already criminal legislation prohibiting criminal defamation of individuals. This bill simply makes it clear that this prohibition extends to criminal defamation of groups of individuals.

In Canada we have always been proud to be numbered among the strong supporters of the United Nations and the philosophy which it represents. The passing of this bill will help discharge our international commitments. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights adopted by the United Nations declares as follows:

> All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed with reason and conscience and should act toward one another in a spirit of brotherhood...Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status—
> All are equal before the law and are entitled without any discrimination to equal protection of the law. All are entitled to equal protection against any discrimination in violation of this Declaration and against any incitement to such discrimination.

The United Nations Declaration on the Elimination of all Forms of Racial Discrimination declares, in Article 8:

> —all propaganda and organizations based on ideas or theories of the superiority of one race or group of persons of one colour or ethnic origin with a view to justifying or promoting racial discrimination in any form shall be severely condemned.
> All incitement to or acts of violence, whether by individuals or organizations, against any race or group of persons of another colour or ethnic origin shall be considered an offence against society and punishable under law. In order to put into effect the purposes and principles of the present Declaration, all states shall take immediate and positive measures, including legislative and other measures to prosecute, and/or outlaw organizations which promote or incite to racial discrimination, or incite to or use violence for purposes of discrimination based on race, colour or ethnic origin.

[Mr. Wahn.]

The International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination states, in Article 4:

> States Parties condemn all propaganda and all organizations which are based on ideas or theories of superiority of one race or group of persons of one colour or ethnic origin, or which attempt to justify or promote racial hatred and discrimination in any form, and undertake to adopt immediate and positive measures designed to eradicate all incitement to, or acts of, such discrimination and, to this end, with due regard to the principles embodied in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the rights expressly set forth in Article 4 of the Convention—
> (a) Shall declare an offence punishable by law all dissemination of ideas based on racial superiority or hatred, incitement to racial discrimination, as well as all acts of violence or incitement to such acts against any race or group of persons of another colour or ethnic origin, and also the provision of any assistance to racist activities, including the financing thereof;

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, this bill is designed to carry out our obligations under these great international charters. It is not an assault on the freedom of speech. It is designed to protect human rights, and it deserves the strong support of the members of this House.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to participate in this debate, but I was in the House this afternoon and heard the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) speak. I was pleased, as always, to be in the House when he made his remarks, because as we all know he is a skilled orator and a brilliant debater with long experience in our courts and this chamber. For these reasons I looked forward, as always, to his performance in the House this afternoon.

He began with his flowing style and his appeal to sentiment and nostalgia, and it appeared he was in top form. But as his remarks unfolded I am sure every member of the House shared my disappointment. With nostalgia and sentiment he related so clearly and exhaustively his record as a defender of the liberties of individuals and our country and a fighter for civil liberties. As he further paraded before the House the adulation he received from the Jewish community in this country and others, it developed, in my opinion at least, that this was simply a façade to conceal the fact that he had nothing positive to contribute to the merits, strengths or weaknesses of this legislation.

It became obvious very early in the right hon. gentleman's remarks that his principal concern is that the amendment proposed to the Criminal Code offends the Bill of Rights which is now clearly established and which he regards as a personal possession. As if that were not bad enough, he then carried on what is obviously developing as a vendetta of the Conservative Party against Mr. Gagnon, director of Information Canada. Then he finally slid to the lowest depths of all, into a personal vendetta against the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) by making remarks indicating that the Prime Minister was attempting through this legislation to silence disagreement with him. This is not only insulting, it is irrelevant. His ultimate insult to the Prime Minister was his reference to remarks made about the Prime Minister during the election campaign of 1968.

The fact that these were the principal preoccupations of the right hon. gentleman might have escaped notice, and the fact that he really had nothing positive to contribute to the debate on the merits of this legislation may very well have gone unnoticed were it not for the fact that in my opinion a number of things he said this afternoon were patently absurd. I should like to refer to them briefly.

First, he said that freedom of speech in this country should be restricted only in areas about which we are talking—libel, slander, blasphemy and sedition. It seems to me somewhat absurd at this stage in the development of our country to refrain from adding to that list prejudice, bigotry, hatred and incitement to genocide. The hon. gentleman was quick to praise the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) as representing the position of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition. If that is the position of the Conservative Party, how can one explain the reluctance to add to areas upon which we agree, such as the restriction on freedom of speech in respect of libel, slander, blasphemy and sedition, those areas referred to by the right hon. gentleman, namely, restriction on freedom of speech in respect of prejudice, bigotry, hatred and incitement to genocide?

I noticed in the right hon. gentleman's reference to the rights of Rubin and Stokely Carmichael and the incidents which have occurred recently in respect of those gentlemen, a very clear and categorical inconsistency. While he was castigating the government for bringing forward this legislation which is designed, in his words, to restrict and attempt to prohibit propaganda disseminated to create hatred and prejudice, he said that in the past he has advocated that persons such as Rubin and Stokely Carmichael should not have been permitted to enter this country in order to say the kind of things they wanted to say.

When this government said they should be let in and should say what they wanted to say, because this would be recognition of freedom of speech, he objected and said they should be prohibited. Now he says this legislation is offensive because it attempts to prohibit something like that, but not exactly the same type of thing, I hasten to add. That is a glaring inconsistency in the remarks of the right hon. gentleman for which I find no explanation.

What is worse is that he went on to say that the Criminal Code, if used in the manner proposed by the government in Bill C-3, would in fact be an attempt to silence people who have something to say. A first-year law student knows that a salient feature of our Criminal Code is that there is no prohibitory word or phrase in it. It does not say that a citizen of this country is prohibited from doing such and such—thou shalt not do this or that. Each and every section begins by saying that every one who does such and such is guilty of an offence. In other words, it lays down what we as a government say is conduct which acts against the way we want to run our country, against the order we expect in our society. This is so fundamental that there is no possibility that the right hon. gentleman fails to understand that basic principle of our criminal law.

We do not prohibit by our criminal law; people can do what they want to do. But if they do certain things they are on notice, because of the criminal law, that can expect to be prosecuted and punished if convicted. They are not prohibited from doing anything. I find this inconsistency inexplicable in a person experienced in criminal law when the right hon. gentleman says that the criminal law proposed in Bill C-3 is in any way prohibitory.

What really puzzles me about the position of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition is the amendment which would reduce the bill simply to a prohibition against incitement or the promotion of genocide. All through the remarks of the members of the opposition we have heard that Bill C-3 constitutes a great offence to the liberty of the individual because it would restrict freedom of speech. Right on the heels of that argument they say it is all right to have this law provided we are talking only about genocide. So in their opinion it is all right to limit freedom of speech if freedom of speech is misused in order to promote genocide.

Is it reprehensible to go on from there and say we will restrict freedom of speech if a person goes so far as to say he wants to kill all those against whom he is promoting hatred, but if he is only promoting hatred against them as a group we will not interfere with freedom of speech? The right hon. gentleman's remarks in this respect I find totally inconsistent and inexplicable. He quoted Daniel Webster's words, "I may disagree with what you say, but I will fight to the death for your right to say it". Are we to understand that Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition is saying they are prepared to fight to the death for the right of people in this country to hate Jews, Catholics, Protestants or any other group of people? Is that their position?

An hon. Member: That is their position.

Mr. Jerome: It is proper to say that through enlightenment and education these prejudices will disappear or be overcome. If we had an enlightened and informed body politic it would not be necessary to enact laws restricting this kind of conduct. This ideal is something we have long since abandoned. If we had the ideal situation in the way people should respect personal property, we would not need laws against theft. If the human being was not filled with avarice and greed there would be no need for such laws. If some human beings were not basically dishonest, there would be no need for many of our laws. If some people were not depraved, there would be no needs for laws covering violence and sexual offences.

We have need for laws of this kind because we are an imperfect society. It is all very well to say that if we used the instruments of education, intelligence and enlightenment we would not need to restrict the freedom to say things which incite hatred and genocide. I agree that if we had perfect enlightenment we would not need laws of this kind. If we had perfect enlightenment we would not need any laws, because we would deal with one another in a completely honest and intelligent way. That is the ideal, the Utopia. It would be nice to have it, but we do not.

There is another point on which I take issue with my good friend, the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin who joined the chorus of critics on the other side. It has been said many times in this debate that Bill C-3 contains imperfections, difficulties and loopholes. In my opinion, the basic breakdown in that argument is that it applies to every law on our statute books today. I am sure no one who has defended a case in the criminal courts has deluded himself, when he left the court room with an acquittal, that the acquittal was because of his advocacy.

The right hon. gentleman referred to cases he had won. He does that, but I do not. I recognize that there are basic imperfections in every piece of criminal legislation on the statute books. I know that day in and day out there are murderers, rapists, bootleggers, prostitutes, and so on, who have been engaged in the kinds of activities that the legislation, by making them an offence, is designed to discourage. I know that some of them have been acquitted, and perhaps there are imperfections in the law that could be tightened up. The fact that some people who are probably guilty have been acquitted does not mean we should stop trying to use those laws, or that we should never pass a law or attempt to restrict any kind of activity unless we know that every time a charge is laid we will get a conviction.

That kind of spurious attitude toward criminal law would lead us to a set of regulations which would be so restrictive as to be inoperable or so completely comprehensive as to totally annihilate any concept of the liberty of the individual. Surely the criminal law is imperfect in many respects. There probably are defences about which no one in this House has thought, and there probably are difficulties and loopholes in Bill C-3. Perhaps some of them will be changed by amendment, and perhaps defences put foward will show us where they are.

No doubt there is restriction on freedom of speech, as has been said by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) more eloquently than I can say it, in the restriction on the privilege of leasing premises, of rendering service in a public restaurant or public institution, by landlords, and so on. We tell people in this country that freedom to use their possessions and their position is restricted. We tell them they are restricted in freedom of speech and other freedoms that they enjoy, if by using those freedoms they promote and encourage hypocrisy, hatred, racial or religious prejudice, or genocide. There are in Bill C-3, restrictions on freedom of speech, there are imperfections in it and we may run into difficulty when we attempt to prosecute, but I for one am not about to preoccupy myself with these difficulties.

The hon. member for Coast-Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre) displayed the kind of spirit that has gained my admiration and the admiration of many hon. members with regard to the issue of Arctic sovereignty when he prodded the government—indeed he was the single, very strong spearhead that prodded this sometimes unwilling government—to take the position it has now taken. His attitude then was that he was not much concerned about the legal technicalities involved. He said that we have to move in this area because we must preserve our sovereignty. This member has taken part in this debate and I still admire his spirit, but I disagree with him in the way that he disagreed with previous speakers and with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner). I disagree with him in the same spirit, because he is now saying that he agrees with the spirit of the legislation but because there are so many technical problems we should not go into them. If we had taken that stand with regard to Arctic sovereignty, we would not be where we are today—and I am proud of our position.

Imperfections or no imperfections, restrictions on freedom of speech or no restrictions, and putting aside all reference to other countries that have passed such legislation, even if Canada had been the only country to envisage such legislation or pass it, and if it is as imperfect and as restrictive of freedom of speech as has been suggested, I would still embrace it openly.

I am proud to live in the first country that has said to anybody who comes within our borders and does the things prohibited by Bill C-3, such as inciting hatred, racial or religious prejudice or genocide, that they cannot do that here and if they continue to do it we will take away their printing presses or the buildings from which they disseminate the literature and we will put them in jail for two or three years. The legislation is not stiff enough.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, for the last two or three days I have listened to the debate on Bill C-3. Various speakers have gone into some of the basic principles behind this bill, and my attitude has changed as different points of view have been presented with sincerity, seriousness and conviction. But I must say with the same sincerity, seriousness and conviction that if there is a reason for my stand against Bill C-3, it is due to some of the remarks—I emphasize it is only some—of the member who preceded me, the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome).

My reaction to his remarks may have been different from that of other hon. members, but it seems to me the hon. member has a habit of following the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and speaking about him whenever the latter is not in this chamber. One could almost compare him with a young child who had robbed the cookie jar and tried to get into the jam when momma or daddy left the kitchen. He always is critical when the man he is speaking about has left the chamber. He incited me, perhaps not to hatred but to a degree of emotion that is repugnant to me, basically on the grounds of generosity and good Irish feeling—and I do not like to be incited. He is not here now, so I will cease talking against him any longer; otherwise I will find myself hoist on the same petard.

It is an amazing coincidence that the hon. member for Sudbury always seems to follow the hon. member for Prince Albert, who is usually not in this House at this time of the night. That is understandable, because he spends many hours at night doing things on which the hon. member for Sudbury casts aspersions. The hon. member for Prince Albert deserves his rest at night and should not be exposed to the innuendos and insinuations advanced by the hon. member for Sudbury which incite me. This brings me to the heart of Bill C-3.

Be that as it may, the right hon. member for Prince Albert can defend himself. One of the reasons I am so honestly confused about Bill C-3 is that it was introduced on behalf of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) who gained one of his claims to fame by saying that we should not worry about conduct in the bedrooms of the nation. Yet this legislation involves the minds of men not only in bedrooms but everywhere.

I agree with the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) that we are not only speaking about the small sick or demented group. Many Canadians may by our standards be sick and demented, but this still has to do with the minds of men. I always listen to the hon. member for York South with a great deal of seriousness. I enjoy his contributions, which to my mind are among the most eloquent made in the House. However, I cannot speak on this subject with his conviction, nor do I pretend to do so.

Sometimes I wonder if a white WASP, Anglo-Saxon Protestant should contribute anything to this debate, because we cannot speak on the very sincere contributions that have come from those who are not WASPs and who have suffered discrimination because they are members of a minority. Perhaps I have not been exposed to what other hon. members have been exposed to, but it is only a question of time. I come from southern Ireland, and it was only a short time ago that Mr. Kennedy, one of the presidents of the United States, said in that there were signs put up in Boston which read, "Irish and blacks don't apply". That was not long ago. Personally, I have been saved that embarrassment. I have debated with myself for a long time as to whether I could contribute anything to the debate, or should even try to do so, because regardless of how long this debate may last it concerns some of the fundamentals of the Judaeo-Christian philosophy.

This is perhaps getting a little emotional, a little Irish and a little exaggerated, but basically the bill deals with the minds of men. It would be much easier for me to stand up in the House, like the hon. member for Sudbury, and say, "Of course I am against hate." I am against discrimination and I am against some of the things that he mentioned such as prejudice, bigotry and genocide. The one thing that he did hit upon that is in Bill C-3 is genocide, and there is not a person in this House who is not against genocide. But as far as I know, the words "prejudice" and "bigotry" are not mentioned in the bill.

There is something in the bill about inciting hatred with propaganda. I put it to hon. gentlemen that depending on where they sit, how they react, what the circumstances are, what the motivation and provocation may be, this becomes a pretty subjective thing. These are obviously things that should be involved. But I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that Jesus Christ could have been convicted, under some of the provisions of Bill C-3, by the Roman establishment of that day because he preached things which were anathema to and the antithesis of what the pagan Roman Empire believed, and he incited a breach of the peace.

I suggest to hon. members of this House that Martin Luther might have been convicted of inciting a breach of the peace under the terms of this bill when he posted his protest on the door in Wittenberg. Coming down to the present day and age, I say that Martin Luther King could very well have been guilty of some of the offences set out in Bill C-3 because of some of the things he said against the WASP establishment in the America of which he spoke—and I am not saying that the Canadian part of North America is any better. The only quality in which we are better is that we do not have the numbers that are involved in that very serious problem south of the border. As Abraham Lincoln once said, the problem of race increases in direct ratio to the numbers involved. That is why we in Canada sometimes take a smug attitude about problems of race and religion, because we have perhaps a more homogeneous ethnic composition to our Canadian fabric than the country to our south. But that does not make us any better. It does not make us any more tolerant. It does not make us any more of the things that the hon. member for York South mentioned today.

Will Bill C-3 cure this? I agree with the hon. member for York South and others in one respect, and that is that I am not quibbling about the legal imperfections of the bill. However, looking back on history I can say, and I repeat, that under the terms of this bill Jesus Christ could have been convicted. Under the terms of this bill Martin Luther could have been convicted, and under the terms of this bill Martin Luther King could have been convicted.

I agree with the hon. member for Sudbury that there was an inconsistency in the Speech made today by the right hon. member for Prince Albert about Reubin and Stokely Carmichael. I suggest that if they came into Canada now, and if this bill becomes law, they would be convicted under it because what they preach and what they say certainly does not help calm the minds and spirits of men, be they black or white. They create dissension. They stimulate ill will. This may very well invoke a breach of the peace. But, Mr. Speaker, knowing the sad history of minorities, be they in the United States or any other country, do they not have a right to speak? Returning to Carmichael and Reubin, and to Rapp Brown wherever he may be tonight, I ask could any of those gentlemen come into Canada and speak, without being convicted under the terms of this bill?

I do not necessarily agree with what they say. What they say sometimes disturbs me immensely, but I agree that they have the right to say it. I cannot begin to believe the things they have gone through, the things that provoke them to say the things that I find repugnant, but if I had gone through some of those things perhaps I would be saying the very things they want to say. My relatives were kicked out of southern Ireland because they did not believe in and conform to the establishment of that day. Thus, any exposure I have to this problem is only a vicarious one, and a pretty remote vicarious one at that, Mr. Speaker. I come back to this bill. To me it is repugnant because in so many places it shifts the onus of proof of innocence to a defendant. Some hon. members have suggested that there are protections and defences in the bill, but if a person is charged under it he has to prove that he comes within those defences.

However, the part of the bill that gives me more concern than any other has not been mentioned often in this House, and it is the reason I am speaking tonight. It is proposed new section 267C which outlines the procedures whereby a judge who is satisfied by a warrant, affidavit or information that there are reasonable grounds for believing that any member of this House, or anybody outside this House, has copies of material that he may want to distribute and which could be hate propaganda, can issue a warrant for seizure of that material, and this completely out of the blue so far as the person who has the stuff is concerned. Seven days later, under section 267C(2) the judge can then issue a summons for that person to appear, and he has to come into court and explain what the material is, and answer as to whether it is or is not something called hate propaganda.

Your Honour and some other hon. members of this House are experienced men at the bar. All I can say is that the two cases that I know involving Jehovah's Witnesses in Quebec, Roncarelli and Benoit, took 12 years from their beginning to the final judgment in the Supreme Court of Canada in order to resolve the legal problem. In his opening remarks for my party the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) had a great deal of ground to cover. I think he did it very well, but I do not think he dwelt on this point. Neither did I hear the hon. member for York South today mention proposed new section 267C. I listened to the hon. member from the time he started his speech until five o'clock, and I may have missed ten minutes of his speech after the recess since I did not return to the chamber until ten minutes past eight o'clock. Thus, I missed that part of his speech. With the conviction and the emotion that he can contribute to debate, I would have liked to have heard him speak about 267C, which to me is the most repugnant part of the bill. But I did not hear him say a thing about it.

I did not hear the Minister of Justice say too much about 267C. I thought the right hon. member for Prince Albert was going to say something about 267C, which I repeat is the most repugnant part of the bill to me. Under it, if I have certain material in my house tonight—perhaps my children may have brought it in; perhaps they were given it on a street corner; I may be exaggerating but we are talking about basics and I think it is fair to test this by the extreme point because extreme thought all through history has produced change—I could be prosecuted.

Now I wish to refer to two great speeches made by the Minister of Justice last month. The first was the speech he made on March 4 when he talked about a manifesto for law reform, at the University of Windsor. The second was his speech of March 11 at the Caribbean conference, the law conference held in Kingston. I refer to that just in passing, Mr. Speaker, and I wish to give some quotations from his speeches.

To me, that speech of the Minister of Justice was a tremendous reflection—I wondered as a Canadian why he would go down there and say what he did. He ended his speech—I will not read some portions of it because I do not think they bear on Bill C-3—with these remarks, to be found on page 17 of the press release:

> —we are witnessing what has been described as a 'new search for human values and relationships —relationships between man, and between men and government—that have meaning in the technological and psychological context of our age.'

Then he quoted as follows:

> 'What this search and the accompanying changes demand is not a law and order that freezes man into predetermined patterns, but a law and order of change, of movement, of options. Yesterday's order, if it is unresponsive, becomes tomorrow's oppression.'

I believe he was quoting the words of Justice Cardozo. Perhaps he can tell me whom he was quoting.

Mr. McCleave: Certainly he was not quoting Justice Carswell.

Mr. Nowlan: I believe it was Justice Cardozo, a man who is known for his views on civil liberties and for his interest in them.

The minister ended his speech with these words:

> We want a law in motion—a law that will never stand still again.

To me, the danger of Bill C-3 is that it will encourage that danger the minister mentioned when quoting from that eminent speech of Justice Cardozo. There is a potential danger that men's minds and opinions will be frozen. The minister is as good a student of history as I am and he knows that sometimes the crank or the oddball, the man who is sometimes ahead of his time and uses language that does not conform to that used by the establishment, has been a catalyst of change.

In this connection I could mention Jesus Christ, Martin Luther King and Joseph Howe, a man who looms large in the history of Nova Scotia and who put up a strong resistance against the ruling party of the day. If I had had time I would have come to the chamber prepared with his speeches. He said what he believed. People who say what they believe may run into difficulties with regard to Bill C-3. He helped to establish a free and independent press which we must have in a democracy if it is to be truly democratic. We must not merely mouth the word "democracy" in this chamber.

Those who have spoken for or against the bill have done so seriously and honestly. There are differences of opinion. But to me, this bill runs counter to the position the Minister of Justice has taken. Unless we tolerate these catalysts, be they Stokely Carmichael, Rapp Brown, Martin Luther or Jesus Christ, man's true spirit will not be emancipated. You cannot emancipate it by placing a yoke on the throat and by putting a smothering blanket over free expression.

I refer again to a speech of the Minister of Justice, as contained in a press report of March 11, 1970. On page 4 of his address entitled, "The Legal Profession Confronts the Future", the minister had this to say:

> —law schools should preserve a balance between the life of the intellect and the life of the spirit.

Many things have been said by some here showing that they disagree with the concept which allows free expression of the spirit. I believe they have the right to express their views. But when the minister argues in this House that the saving grace of this legislation is that every prosecution needs the consent of the Attorney General, I say that argument is an exercise in sophistry. Where does the Attorney General come from? I am not reflecting on any one Attorney General in this country. When one becomes involved with Attorneys General one immediately descends—I use the word "descends" advisedly—from the realm of law to the realm of politics. We are all political animals in this chamber and do not take second place to anybody. We have ten Attorneys General at least in this country, and you could very well have ten different interpretations of what is hate propaganda or what constitutes an incitement under the terms of this bill.

The debate that has gone on for the last two or three days has interested me. Some people have said, "Oh, well, in Quebec in the old days Duplessis was wrong; he was corrupt." When Duplessis was in power in Quebec there was a little group that called a spade a spade and challenged him. They are now sitting on the government benches and in other parts of the House. They may pride themselves because of the political battles they fought there, but it was the Jehovah's Witnesses who first protested against some of the power being usurped there.

In retrospect, it is easy to say what was right or wrong. I am not saying Duplessis was bad for Quebec; I am not vindicating Mr. Duplessis. I am merely stating a proposition. Under Bill C-3 I do not think the Padlock Law could have been changed, because those proposing the change could have been jailed. I refer again to the minister's speech. It had spirit, Mr. Speaker. He said, again, on page 4:

> If we are to be truly intellectual we must take into account all relevant factors. We may often be thinking about the wrong things and may be devising wrong solutions to false problems.

At page 8 of his speech, in talking about the future of the legal profession, he said that the legal profession is concerned with the over-all restructuring of society. He also said:

> Law, which touches the nerve centres of man and society, and which touches us in a very prescriptive way, can be a profession in the vanguard of reform.

He also said this on that page:

> Indeed, law is not the enemy of revolution but can make possible revolution through law.

I suggest, because of the restrictive nature of Bill C-3, that if there is a spirit of change which sometimes even starts in the recesses of sick minds, minds which are perverted and prejudiced, it will not kindle any response in the hearts of men. It does not matter whether the spirit begins with a Rapp Brown, a Stokely Carmichael or a Martin Luther King. Does anybody in the House think that the Attorneys General of Louisiana and Georgia would interpret a bill like C-3 in the same way as the Attorney General of Massachusetts, whoever he may be, Pennsylvania or California?

• (9:40 p.m.)

Bill C-3 has been advanced by a certain minority to help their conscience and to help their mainstream in a life to which I will never be exposed and therefore cannot fully appreciate. I say it is a trap for that minority. The hon. member for York South spoke about Europe. He knows as well as I that some churches in Europe have been preaching anti-Semitism for 1,500 years. That did not come into effect overnight. The master race philosophy was in vogue for over 100 years before Hitler. Perhaps because of this background, preaching in a public place by members of churches against their fellowman, which is so repugnant to those on this North American continent, was outlawed. I can understand this in certain countries of Europe, but it is not the situation in Canada.

I quote again from the statement of the Minister of Justice:

> Law is not just an agency of social control; it articulates the values by which men seek to live. It is not just a system of enforcement techniques, but a guarantee of fundamental rights.

At page 9 the minister said:

> The problem is, however, that if this conflict between authority and freedom is endemic to all societies, it is particularly so, and particularly dangerous, in societies reaching and moving beyond the development take-off point. For developing nations are vulnerable to the search for stability and the temptation of economic advances at the price of freedom. The rule of law in a free society can be precarious for a new nation—

At page 10 the minister said:

> The criminal law is the paradigm case of the controlled use of power in society. As Professor Herbert Packer of Stanford University has pointed out, there are limits to the use of the criminal sanction. This is particularly relevant for new nations which must guard against the invocation of the criminal sanction for political objectives rather than as a "neutral" instrument of crime control and due process. We have continually to humanize the use of the criminal sanction.

That, Mr. Speaker, is one of the most confusing parts of this whole matter. Bill C-3 has laudable social objectives, but it is invoking the criminal law to implement them. When the Minister of Justice introduced this bill in this House, he did no say there were limits to the use of the criminal sanction. I believed his speech on March 11. I believe it today. I believe it conforms to that degree of democracy we have reached in this country, with all its imperfections. While I think the objectives of Bill C-3 are laudable, I find repugnant the use of the criminal sanction to try and implement them because they involve so many cross-currents of human philosophy, conduct and behaviour. The Minister of Justice agreed to that very principle.

If there is doubt in anyone's mind about the philosophy, I refer them to section 267C, which allows a Judge to authorize someone, on the information of anybody, to seize literature in a person's house about which someone has sworn an affidavit saying that it is hate literature. Within seven days that person will be told to appear to answer the charge in court. If there is anything more repugnant to the common law, the criminal law of Canada or the criminal law of the British jurisprudence system, I would like to know what it is. I heard very little explanation from the Minister of Justice with regard to section 267C, which is the reason I feel motivated to participate in this debate.

This section has horrendous implications. What would happen if a man like Hitler used section 267C and had one of his "brownshirts" swear out an affidavit that the Minister of Justice had something in his house, not Pogo or Mickey Mouse but something that could be termed hate literature? The words in the section are "hate propaganda". While the minister is in the House talking about justice, there could be a knock at his front door while his wife is in the kitchen and a man could walk in and seize the literature. Seven days later the minister would receive a summons to appear in court to justify and defend his having hate propaganda in his home. Even though this literature might have been brought home by the children, he would have to defend himself.

In a case involving two eminent Jehovah's Witnesses it took 12 years to resolve who was right and who was wrong. While there is no one in this House who believes any person will go to the extreme I have illustrated tonight, the power is there. I ask, why is it there? It is an affront to the parliamentary process and to the judicial process.

I do not intend to deal this evening with the fact that the onus is shifted to the accused to come within the scope of the four defences outlined in the bill. That point has already been well covered. However, section 267C has hardly been mentioned. As a lawyer, parliamentarian and Canadian I have publications in my house that may or may not conform to what someone may think is correct. Some day I could be exposed because of this. As we have heard, there are many great works of the masters that might be in breach of this section covering hate propaganda. These could perhaps include the "Merchant of Venice" or other Shakesperean tales. Enough said about that.

Section 267C is the most iniquitous part of this bill. I would like the Minister of Justice, the man who speaks for the just society or any member opposite to stand in this House and try to justify the power of a judge to authorize someone to come into my home on the basis of an affidavit of some kook, oddball, hippie or perverted, sick character that I have hate literature there.

In some of the great speeches made in this House on behalf of the minority by hon. members who were serious and sincere about this bill they dealt with freedom of expression and freedom of speech that was not available in Europe. How did Hitler prostitute the minds of men and do what he did in infamy? It was because there was not free speech. The people who spoke out were carted away. I do not wish to see any person given the unqualified right to come into my house on the basis of an information and, before I am convicted, seize property in my home.

Some of the hideous things that happened in Europe occurred because of lack of freedom of speech. I say this is a trap for those who have spoken so eloquently in support of this bill in order to help protect the minorities who have suffered so grievously. I have already stated that the consent of the Attorney General is of no help because he is a political creature. He has been appointed by the majority and represents the establishment. Is he going to help the minority? The power of consent assigned to the Attorney General becomes, in effect, almost a power of veto. In any event there are ten Attorneys General, each of whom will exercise discretion according to his own standards, standards which are bound to vary widely.

• (9:50 p.m.)

An hon. Member: Some bureaucrat will do it for him.

Mr. Nowlan: Yes, it could be a bureaucrat, as my hon. friend suggests. It could be the youngest member of the staff, someone straight out of law school. The assumption is that the minority will benefit, but this will not turn out to be the case. We are on a collision course between common sense and the law. The Minister of Justice suggests, speaking with sincerity and in tones of conviction, that there is an educational factor involved here which increases the value of the bill. I ask him this question: Since when has the Criminal Code become a schoolbook from which we learn the principles of decency and fairness to all mankind? If we have reached this stage in our society, we are a lot sicker than I thought we were. To me, the Criminal Code provides sanctions in case of offences against individuals and property. I do not believe it should be a schoolbook for those needing primary courses in conduct. We are supposed to learn these things in other ways.

I realize my time is limited, Mr. Speaker, and I should like to conclude by making one or two quotations which illustrate the concern felt in this issue by hon. members, especially on this side of the House. In the words of Justice Holmes, if there was a clear and present danger presented by the ills which this bill is supposed to cure, there might be justification for approving the proposals put forward by the government. I do not think there is such a danger. The bill is negative in quality. It will have a chilling effect not only on the occasional oddball who may be prosecuted but on many other persons who may from now on be afraid to speak out lest they become liable to the penalties set out.

I conclude by quoting the words of Mr. Justice Jackson in the case of American Communications Association v. Dodds, 339 U.S., 382, as recorded at page 442. Justice Jackson said, among other things:

> The danger that citizens will think wrongly is serious, but less serious than the danger of atrophy through not thinking—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired. He can continue only with the unanimous consent of the House.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

An hon. Member: No.

Another hon. Member: That was Mr. Mahoney.

Mr. Nowlan: I was about to finish a quotation.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member might be allowed to finish the quotation he started.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Agreed.

Mr. Nowlan: I thank the House for its qualified approval. It is only because I was in the middle of my concluding quotation that the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney), who was not even listening—I do not blame him for that—said no. Mr. Justice Jackson, among other things, said:

> It is not the function of the government to keep the citizens from falling into error. It is the function of the citizens to keep the government from falling into error.

Every time the House passes a negative, repressive piece of legislation which restricts the full expression of opinion, even though the opinions expressed may be odious, we fall into error and a lever is removed by means of which bad government could be corrected.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Perhaps I can make one point before Your Honour sees it is ten o'clock. I would say on behalf of my hon. friends that the vote this afternoon on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) is an accurate reflection of our attitude regarding the disposition of this measure as a whole. I say this in order that our views may be identified on such an important issue.

I do not intend, when the debate is resumed, to go over the ground I covered during an earlier intervention, but I should like to make three short points. I am afraid I cannot make them in 30 seconds, so I trust hon. members will accord me their indulgence if I ask you to say, Mr. Speaker, that it is ten o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Before the House rises, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might be permitted to make a statement as to the business of the House for the next few days.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baldwin: Why didn't you do it earlier?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Because your hon. friends refused me permission to do so earlier. Tomorrow, as hon. members know, will be an allotted today, the subject matter being chosen by the New Democratic Party. On Monday we would call as the first item third reading of Bill C-3 currently under consideration, and would hope to follow shortly thereafter with second reading of the Canada grain bill. It is anticipated this will be a popular subject matter and we therefore expect to spend some part of Tuesday on its discussion. On Wednesday the budget debate will be continued for the fifth appointed day, and on Thursday we shall consider Government Order No. 87, Bill C-202 in connection with measures against pollution in the Arctic seas.

At 10 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

ENERGY

ANNOUNCEMENT OF FINANCIAL AID FOR DEUTERIUM HEAVY WATER PLANT

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce that the government of Canada has decided to make available assistance involving some $41.4 million to the province of Nova Scotia to help in the rehabilitation of the Deuterium heavy water plant at Glace Bay.

I have advised the premier of Nova Scotia that Atomic Energy of Canada Limited has been authorized to negotiate an agreement with the province formulating the details of two of the three forms of assistance which the government of Canada is prepared to provide.

[English]

The government of Canada is prepared to authorize such an agreement on condition, first, that AECL be satisfied with the selection of a new plant operator, as well as with the responsibilities and powers entrusted to such operator and his plans for rehabilitating the plant; and second, that AECL is satisfied with arrangements the province of Nova Scotia is understood to have made with Jerome Spevack releasing the province from certain secrecy obligations and guaranteeing that the government of Canada, among others, will not be subject to any claim Mr. Spevack might otherwise have attempted to make.

I should point out that the present contract between AECL and Deuterium calls for the delivery of 5,000 tons of heavy water at an average price of approximately $18.50 per pound; production at the rate of 400 tons per year was to start in May, 1968, and was to continue for 12½ years from October 1, 1969.

AECL is now authorized to offer a price of $20.50 per pound for the heavy water to be produced by the Deuterium plant. This will involve an additional sum of approximately $20 million over the present contract price.

The second proposal is the prepayment of one year's production of heavy water in the amount of $16.4 million.

The province has requested earlier payment of a $5 million incentive grant under the ADA legislation. However, under this legislation as it now stands, such a grant would be payable only when the plant comes into commercial production and in subsequent years.

Nevertheless, I have informed Premier Smith that, subject to agreement on the points mentioned above, the government of Canada is prepared to ask Parliament for authority to pay such a grant on a phased basis during the course of the work required to bring the plant into production.

Hon. members will recall that the first delivery of heavy water from this plant was due in 1966. The failure to make delivery to this date has necessitated purchase of heavy water from the United States at an additional cost of roughly $25 million to Canada's nuclear energy program.

To sum up, we are prepared to make arrangements for the prepayment of $16.4 million, for a development grant of $5 million, and for an additional sum of $20 million in the price over the contract period, in the interest of bringing into production a plant whose product itself is needed in Canada's nuclear reactor program and in the interest of easing the burden of bringing the plant into production, a burden which the province has stated would be very great indeed if it had to proceed without this assistance on the part of the government of Canada.

While we believe that these proposals by the government of Canada will assist the province in rehabilitating the plant, I should like to emphasize that, according to information made available by the province, there will still be an annual shortfall on capital and interest recovery in the neighbourhood of $5 to $6 million during the life of the new contract.

Finally, I should add that Atomic Energy of Canada has advised the government of Canada that it will be possible to rehabilitate this plant and bring it into production in accordance with the study made by DuPont.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that the heavy water plant at Glace Bay has an important part to play in the development of Canada's nuclear reactor program, in fact in the development of Canada itself. The increasing problems caused by other forms of power generation in Canada through pollution, through shortage of hydroelectric sources and many other matters, including the sales of nuclear reactors outside Canada, made us heavily dependent upon development of a Canadian heavy water power capability. Therefore we welcome the announcement just made by the Prime Minister and sincerely hope that the engineering problems at this plant can be satisfactorily overcome.

From time to time we have heard in the House rather snide remarks or references to the difficulties that this plant has encountered. I am glad it has been recognized that these difficulties are engineering problems, that they have been such from the beginning and were not commercial or political difficulties.

I think that the government has approached these problems in the proper manner. We would also concur with the Prime Minister's words at the bottom of page 3 of his statement, namely, that the burden was one "which the province has stated would be very great indeed if it had to proceed without this assistance on the part of the government of Canada." We say no more than that we hope that, with the assistance that has been offered by the federal government, the province will be able to proceed with the development of the heavy water plant that is so necessary to the development of Canada's great resources.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the story of the Deuterium heavy water plant at Glace Bay is not a very happy one. When the House first discussed the construction of a heavy water plant in Canada, it will be recalled that I raised the question of the process that was going to be used. This was interpreted in some quarters as a criticism of the location of the plant in Glace Bay. I had no preference as to where the plant should be located, but I was concerned because I knew that the process in question had been looked at by several governments in various parts of the world. Consequently, I was most anxious that some information be secured, either through the building of a pilot project or through further investigations, as to the feasibility of the process itself.

Unfortunately there have been difficulties. Whether these relate to the process or to construction or engineering operations I do not know, but this plant was supposed to be in production by 1966. It is still in difficulty. I see no value in crying over spilled milk. The government has taken the only action it could take. In view of the amount of money that has been spent the Canadian government certainly had to give financial assistance in the hope that this plant can successfully produce heavy water at a competitive price.

The Canadian atomic reactor program is most vital to our future industrial development, and if we are going to sell atomic reactors around the world we must be able to guarantee a supply of heavy water when these customers demand that service. Consequently it is very important that this project be successful.

By making this additional offer of $41,400,000 I think the government will give the project a chance to succeed. I am sure that members in all parts of the House are hopeful that the project will succeed, that this plant will be able to produce heavy water and that it will be of great assistance to Canada's atomic reactor program.

The experience with this plant ought to be a warning that in future, before large sums of public money are invested, the processes involved should be thoroughly and carefully investigated. I do not know whether my information is correct, but I am under the impression that Atomic Energy Limited of Canada never approved this process. Having invested this money we all hope that the results will be beneficial and that this project will be brought to a successful conclusion.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I feel it is a good thing for the government to get involved directly in the problem of the heavy water plant at Glace Bay, Nova Scotia.

Despite the difficulties experienced in the last five or six years and more particularly in the last four years, I believe it was urgent for the federal government to take position in the matter.

Reorganizing and bringing the plant into production will naturally entail expenses, but it will do a great deal to promote economic expansion in Nova Scotia and hence in the whole country.

Nova Scotia needs this plant and, as I said before, despite the difficulties which we had to face, I believe it is wise on the part of the government to take this decision so as to encourage as much as possible the reorganization and operation of this plant. Needless to say that this program will inject new vigour into the economy of Nova Scotia and that of Canada as a whole.

PRICES AND INCOMES COMMISSION

TABLING OF REPORT ON TINPLATE

Mr. Paul Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of introducing the Prices and Incomes Commission's report on tinplate, in both official languages.

AGRICULTURE

ARRANGEMENTS TO ASSIST WESTERN FARMERS TO MEET OBLIGATIONS—BASIC ADJUSTMENT PROGRAMS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. It is based on the darkening prospects for western agriculture and the complaint that the government in Ottawa does not appreciate the real problems there. Will the minister not reverse the decision he has made and, on the basis of the government's undoubted jurisdiction, direct the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act administration to provide assistance to, or provide arrangements for, those farmers to meet their obligations as they fall due so that they will not be subject to foreclosure and debt action?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, without in any way, shape or form accepting the preamble to the question, I should like to advise the hon. member again that if the revisions he has asked for under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act were in fact put in place they would be of no benefit to the farmers unless the interest decreased substantially. Whether or not this will happen in the marketplace very soon is something neither the hon. member nor I can predict with accuracy.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. May I say to the minister that obviously he did not understand the question. I am not referring, of course, to interest rates. I am referring to general relief against debt foreclosure. Does the government intend to do anything for the farmers of western Canada in respect of this problem?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I have recited in this House many times what we are doing. A number of farmers have advised me that this is really helpful.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the minister and other government spokesmen from time to time have referred to the fact that the government intends to announce basic adjustment programs, can the minister indicate to the House when he will be in a position to announce these basic adjustment programs? Also, in respect of the question asked by the hon. member for Peace River, would he advise whether he might give consideration to a program enabling debt consolidation?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, so far as basic adjustment programs are concerned I think hon. members opposite will appreciate that a number of the things we are doing in fact are basic adjustment programs. There are some people who do not agree with all of them, but that does not change the fact that they are sincerely designed to deal with these problems. So far as a debt adjustment program is concerned, I am sure the hon. member realizes this really falls more within the provincial jurisdiction than the federal jurisdiction.

Mr. Baldwin: Nonsense!

Mr. Olson: In so far as we are capable under the provisions of the Farm Credit Act and other acts that the federal government does in fact administer, we have been very helpful in this difficult situation.

Mr. Baldwin: Just like an undertaker.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Minister without Portfolio has made quite clear that the program he announced recently is a crash program and would be supplemented by basic adjustment programs, would the minister not agree there is a difference between the wheat acreage reduction program and the basic adjustment programs which are being requested by the farmers?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's supplementary question is posed in the form of an argument. It is not acceptable in this sense.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether or not the government has considered reinstating the debt legislation originally enacted in 1934 to make it apply at this time of emergency in 1970?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, a number of acts were introduced at that time but, as I said, the interpretation that the hon. member for Peace River puts on this act is completely inaccurate.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, the minister indicated that debt relief arrangements would be under the jurisdiction of the provinces. Has he not heard of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act which is a federal statute?

GRAIN

WHEAT—ACREAGE REDUCTION PROGRAM—UTILIZATION OF UNUSED FUNDS TO ASSIST WESTERN FARMERS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): I have a question, Mr. Speaker, which I wish to direct to the Minister without Portfolio responsible for the Wheat Board. In view of the fact that evidence now clearly indicates that the LIFT program will not be applied by as many farmers as was originally predicted, for reasons beyond their control such as previous voluntary reduction in acreage and soil erosion, and since the $100 million that was originally earmarked for the program will only be partially utilized, could the minister indicate whether any consideration is being given to a supplementary program to assist those who are unable to apply operation LIFT? I say this in the light of the critical cash shortage that exists in the western provinces, and furthermore it now appears that the LIFT program will—

[Mr. Burton.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has asked the question.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): The hon. member's question is of course based on a hypothesis. He asserts there is evidence for what he says. At this stage it is very difficult to know to what extent there will be participation in the program. The figures are very difficult to arrive at at this stage. Certainly farmers without surpluses are likely to continue growing about the same amount of crop as they had in previous years. This is what we anticipated in thinking of programs to help them, particularly by keeping other farmers, the ones with wheat surpluses, out of the non-wheat crops. I am still optimistic that with a growing understanding in the regions where surpluses exist of the advantages to the producers of taking land out of production there will indeed be a very substantial participation in the program.

Mr. Mazankowski: In light of the minister's answer, I wonder if he will give consideration to removing the penalizing effect which the cancellation of the unit quota system will have on those small farmers in the small mixed farming areas?

Mr. Lang: The question about the unit quota is one that stands rather separately on its own and would take more time than is available to me at this stage to answer properly. The quota committee did recommend that the unit quota be abolished and gave some of the reasons for this action.

[Later:]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a question with respect to the fact that the wheat acreage reduction program, according to him, was designed not only to reduce the amount of land seeded to wheat but also as a means of injecting purchasing power into the western economy. If present indications continue and it is found that the full $100 million which the House has approved is not utilized, can the minister assure the House that any money which is not required for that program will be used to provide other assistance to western farmers?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I answered that question fairly fully earlier when I indicated it was completely hypothetical, and that I would be waiting until I see how far the program utilizes the $100 million which has been granted as a budget item for it.

APPLICATION OF ACREAGE REDUCTION PROGRAM TO VETERANS LAND ACT FARMERS

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): I have a supplementary question with regard to the Veterans Land Act. I wonder whether the minister has consulted his colleague, the Minister of Veterans Affairs, with a view to changing the present Veterans Land Act in regard to those who have entered into agreements with the government on a crop-sharing basis so that the veterans who are farming can participate in the benefits under the minister's new program?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): I will be glad to give consideration to that comment.

WHEAT—ACCEPTANCE OF ALL GRADES UNDER EIGHT BUSHEL QUOTA—DELIVERY TO ADDITIONAL POINTS

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): May I ask the minister whether he is in a position to guarantee that all grades of grain will be taken in on the eight bushel quota in the next crop year?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Present indications are for significant markets for the whole range of grains which are available in the prairie region. Some people are concerned about the lower grades, but of course these are very much in demand by some of our best customers.

Mr. Korchinski: In view of the fact that at the present time many of the elevators are refusing acceptance of lower grade grains, despite the fact that there may be a market for them, and are only taking dry No. 2 and better quality, will the farmers be given the opportunity to deliver to other points, not only one additional point but three or four if need be, in order that they can make deliveries where space is available?

Mr. Lang: The quota committee did recommend alternative delivery privileges to at least a second point, and consideration will be given to this. However, I think hon. members should appreciate the fact that there may be different action than in the past on the part of elevators at the present time with the block system in effect and with the advance notice which elevators receive about the kinds of grains which will be taken in the next shipping series.

Inquiries of the Ministry

WHEAT—INCREASE IN DELIVERY QUOTAS PRIOR TO SEEDING

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the quota system is causing a great deal of the trouble in those areas where farmers have a one bushel or two bushel quota, is the minister in a position to express any hope for these hopeless people that there will be a reasonable increase in their quotas between now and the beginning of seeding?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): In some areas, Mr. Speaker, of course seeding is not very far away, but the transportation committee not long ago outlined the delivery program through Thunder Bay for the balance of the crop year with what are really record unloadings of cars within that period, so that we will be seeing a fairly rapid movement of grain from the prairie region.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That does not happen to answer the question I asked. With respect to those areas where there are one or two bushel quotas the Saskatchewan Pool reports that there are 492 on a one bushel quota and 340 on a two bushel quota. Will the minister advise whether or not in these areas there will be action taken to increase these very unjust and very discriminatory quotas that prevents these farmers from being able to secure even a modicum of what they should be able to secure?

Mr. Lang: I think it should be obvious to the right hon. gentleman that as the grain moves to the Lakehead these quotas will in fact open.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, Mr. Speaker, I asked the minister whether there is going to be an increase in the quota. It not being obvious as to what may happen, is there going to be an increase in the one or two bushel per acre quotas? That is what I asked.

Mr. Lang: Well, of course, Mr. Speaker, the Wheat Board has indicated that there will be an equalized four bushel quota throughout the region by the end of the crop year, and the quotas will open in the individual areas just as soon as movement of the grain can be handled.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No wonder the farmers call it the "WARP-ed" program.

Inquiries of the Ministry

SUPPLY OF BOXCARS FOR MOVEMENT OF WHEAT—PRIORITY TO LOW QUOTA POINTS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): In view of the fact that the minister on previous occasions in debate in this House has given commitments and assurances that record volumes of grain will move in the period between last February and the end of July, and in view of the fact that farm marketings last week were one million bushels less than in the same week last year, what efforts are being made to have the railways increase the number of cars in grain movement, and what official date has been set for the opening of navigation at the Lakehead? Further, will priority be given to places still on one bushel or unit quotas in terms of increased quotas?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, there are many considerations involved in the selection of the points and the blocks from which grain is moved in order to meet the requirements of the marketplace. I believe that navigation is opening on Monday, although I do not have official word on that. The drop in deliveries has resulted from the fact that the space available at the Lakehead was filled prior to opening of navigation. The railroads as well as the terminals have met with the Transportation Committee, in fact they are part of the Transportation Committee, in laying out the program for the movement of grain required for the shipping season.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre for a last supplementary, but we should really go on to the next subject.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, in view of the replies from the minister, the commitments given and the fact that July 31 is the day of reckoning for him, I wish him luck.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GREECE—POSSIBLE DEATH SENTENCE ON DIONYSSIOS KARAGEORGAS—REQUEST FOR CLEMENCY

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of the recent trials in Greece of a number of opponents of the military regime in that country. I gave the Prime Minister notice of this matter through Dr. Head, his legislative assistant.

According to information I received last night, the prosecution asked for the death sentence in the case of Dionyssios Karageorgas, a professor of economics, and he has been convicted and sentenced to death. Will the Prime Minister consider favourably and urgently making an official appeal to the government of Greece for the commutation of this inhuman sentence?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having given notice of this question; it permitted me to make inquiries. The information I have from External Affairs, who are following very carefully this case of Dionyssios Karageorgas is to the effect that although the death sentence has been requested by the prosecution there has been as yet no conviction and sentence.

Mr. Lewis: I hope the Prime Minister is right, Mr. Speaker, but may I ask him whether he would instruct our ambassador in Greece to watch developments carefully and instruct him that, if the death sentence is imposed on this gentleman, he immediately convey the Canadian government's request for clemency?

Mr. Trudeau: The first part of the suggestion is already being carried out, Mr. Speaker, and the second part is a hypothetical question.

COMPLAINT RESPECTING OFFSHORE BROADCASTING INTO GREECE

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Has the government received any complaint from Greece with regard to those people who are on a ship off the shores of that country broadcasting news into Greece to try to overthrow the military government, some of these people aboard the ship being Canadians representing a party in this House?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have no such information but I will ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs to check into the matter.

[Translation]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SUGGESTED ADJOURNMENT ON QUEBEC ELECTION DAY

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister, in case he is not aware that there will be a general election in Quebec on April 29 next.

In view of the importance of this general election, would he consider an adjournment of the House on April 29 so that hon. members and federal employees living in Quebec may carry out their duty as citizens?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe this to be customary, but we, on the government side of the House, have made arrangements, in case some hon. members should be absent on that day in order to remain in Quebec, not to feel their absence too much.

[English]

NATIONAL ART GALLERY

SUGGESTED REMOVAL OF PLAQUES BEARING OFFENSIVE LANGUAGE

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question will be for the Prime Minister. In view of the incredibly offensive language used on the galvanized iron wall plaques now on display on the main floor of the National Art Gallery, will the Prime Minister ask the Secretary of State to use his best efforts to have the Twenty-four Hourly Notes of the works of Greg Curnoe removed from display immediately?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will take the question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—POSSIBLE PRICE INCREASES BY ALUMINUM COMPANY OF CANADA

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question would be for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs but as he is not here and because the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has a peripheral interest I shall direct it to him. In light of the announcement by the Aluminum Company of Canada of their intention to advance prices on the export market for several aluminum products and that they are considering the price structure in Canada, would the minister advise whether officials of his department or that of his colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, are discussing this matter with the Aluminum Company of Canada so that there will not have to be a post facto movement to get any price increases rescinded?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, my officers were in touch with Alcan this morning and were informed that Alcan was only studying at this time the possibility of increasing or attempting to increase the price of their commodity in Canada, so this is only in a state of being studied.

TRADE

ALLEGED DUMPING OF CANADIAN SULPHUR IN U.S. MARKET

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, while I am on my feet I might confirm the answer I gave yesterday to the member for Edmonton West having to do with a possible protest by the United States authorities against alleged dumping of Canadian sulphur on the United States market. The government has received no protest from the United States government on that subject.

[Later:]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the minister's reply regarding sulphur. He says there has been no official communication or protest from the United States authorities, but is the minister aware of protests within the United States against the alleged dumping of Canadian sulphur and, if so, does he agree that the pattern is similar to that preceding the situation with regard to potash and that the extraordinary solution arrived at in that case should not be repeated in the case of sulphur?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I am informed that the reported dissatisfaction of some American companies has not even been brought to the attention of the United States government, so it would be difficult for us to protest against a protest that has not been made.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SHIPMENT OF MEDICAL SUPPLIES TO NORTH AND SOUTH VIET NAM

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I might also try to answer a question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre having to do with the refusal of permits for the export of medical supplies to North Viet Nam. I was then under the impression that the hon. member was badly informed. I am now in a position to confirm that the facts are that export permits have been granted to the Canadian Unitarian Medical Aid Committee and other organizations that furnish medical supplies to North Viet Nam. Antibiotics, drugs and medicinal preparations in dosage form, and dental and surgical apparatus, if they are goods that originate in Canada, may be exported to North Viet Nam under a general permit. In the case of goods of United States origin, however, it is not the intention of the government to grant re-export permits that will authorize the evasion of the United States export control regulations.

Mr. Benjamin: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I understand the hon. member is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Benjamin: Yes, Mr. Speaker. That was the point of my question yesterday, the export from Canada of medical supplies manufactured in the United States. The minister has confirmed the reasons for my question and therefore I was perfectly correct in my information.

VITAL STATISTICS

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT OF ACT TO ABOLISH COMPULSORY ANSWERS TO SOME QUESTIONS

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I wonder if the minister would give consideration or is consideration now being given to amendments to the Vital Statistics Act so that answers to surveys conducted by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics in many cases can be on a voluntary basis and not compulsory with persons subject to heavy fines for failure to comply, as is the case at present?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am under the impression that there is no legal obligation to answer questions on vital statistics, for obvious reasons at times.

An hon. Member: What is her name?

Mr. Pepin: The difficulty we have had in recent times for example with respect to a previous question raised by the hon. member for Oxford, if I recall correctly, was that on some occasions the investigator happened to be a neighbour or a person very closely associated in some way with the person being questioned. In these instances there are possibilities, for example, of appealing to the regional officer of DBS or to the Member of Parliament who could in these circumstances bring it to the attention of DBS or the minister. Remedies are usually found but I shall investigate further in the particular case the hon. member will certainly want to bring to my attention.

Mr. Cullen: The minister has confirmed that the advice I gave yesterday not to answer some of the questions—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka.

POLLUTION

MERCURY—DEVELOPMENT OF SYSTEM OF COMPENSATION

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry but in his absence I shall direct it to his Parliamentary Secretary. In view of continuing concern over mercury pollution in various Canadian waters, is the government developing a system of compensation by way of grants, advances or loans to persons who suffer because of government action in closing down their means of livelihood?

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to say that we do not hope to be developing assistance but we do hope that the action of governments, provincial and federal, will clean up this pollution problem without costing this government any money. We organized in Ontario a system of advances to fishermen to carry them over this unpleasant time. We are optimistic that the polluters will take care of the cost and stop polluting. This is our main concern, and concentrated efforts are being made in this area right now.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in connection with my previous question concerning grants to persons suffering from the loss of their livelihood. Is a system being developed which will apply generally, not just to fishermen but to others who suffer from the loss of their livelihood as a result of government action in preventing pollution?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I do not know of any general system being evolved with the exception of the precedents at Placentia Bay and Lake St. Clair. On the current problem with regard to mercury pollution, a joint federal-provincial committee of officials has been formed, and persons who have suffered injury as a result of the closing of the fisheries are making representations to that committee on which will be based some form of aid until they can recover damages from the polluters.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, a further supplementary question. Will the system being considered now apply generally throughout Canada or is it just in connection with the Lake St. Clair fishermen?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, strictly speaking this comes under the Department of Fisheries and the loans made in Placentia Bay were under the authority of the Department of Fisheries. I think this is what is being done at Lake St. Clair, but I do not believe there is any broad policy going into effect in other areas at the present time. If there is some wider policy applicable to all Canada, I am sure it would be announced in the House in the normal manner or by legislation.

NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON TREATY RESPECTING CONTROL

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has the government or the minister entered into negotiations with the United States government with a view to entering into a treaty or agreement with that country in the general area of continental pollution and pollution control?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have made representations in regard to the banning of phosphates to my counterpart in the United States, the Secretary of the Interior, but nothing has come to date of that initiative. I think the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry has stated that there was a protest sent to the Department of State in regard to pollution in Lake Erie caused from American sources in regard to mercury spillage, but I do not think there has been any formal initiative on a broader basis leading to a treaty arrangement in regard to general pollution measures.

Mr. McGrath: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it the government's policy to seek a treaty with the United States? Otherwise our pollution legislation will have no effect without similar legislation by that country.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any government decision in that regard yet. I think it is quite clear that if our measures are to be efficacious on joint waters, particularly on the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence, there will have to be some formal arrangement with the United States or with the boundary states which probably would be most effectively implemented in a treaty so that antipollution measures are co-ordinated and that we can work together with the United States in order to achieve a better quality of boundary waters.

SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—PAYMENT OF COMPENSATION BY POLLUTER

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): I have a supplementary for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry with regard to his statement that the government was hopeful that the industries polluting our streams with mercury would co-operate. In view of the statement made by the minister on Wednesday to the executive council of the Canadian Manufacturers Association in which he emphasized the fact that the polluter must pay, I ask the Parliamentary Secretary if negotiations have been entered into by the government or if arrangements have been completed for payment of compensation by the Interprovincial Co-operative Chlor-alkali plant at Saskatoon which the minister stated earlier this year was the main, if not the sole, source of mercury pollution in the Saskatchewan River?

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Discussions have taken place, Mr. Speaker, but I do not think they are finalized at this stage.

Mr. Simpson: A supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to bring to the attention of hon. members that there are just a few minutes left in the question period. We have covered only two subjects. Hon. members must realize that if we spend 20 minutes on two subjects many hon. members will be left on the sidelines at the end of the question period. I urge that we go on to another subject.

POST OFFICE

MONTREAL POSTAL DISPUTE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PRESENT POSITION

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Further to yesterday evening's meeting with representatives of employees of G. Lapalme Inc., could the minister tell us what is the present status of negotiations?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, last night we reiterated explanations about the government's offer. It was agreed to clarify the matter of seniority which is being done today.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Could the minister indicate to the House whether the government is prepared to recognize the CNTU as the bargaining agent for the employees of G. Lapalme Inc., once the latter have been incorporated into the public service?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, the law provides that, as far as government employees are concerned, the choice of the bargaining agent is for them to make contingent on the decision of the Public Service Staff Relations Board.

URANIUM

DEVELOPMENT OF RESOURCES BY FOREIGN-OWNED COMPANIES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It arises out of an announcement by the Gulf Mineral Resources Company, a subsidiary of the Gulf Oil Company of Pittsburgh, that it has found sufficient uranium in Saskatchewan to warrant the establishment of a mine and mill, provided the problem of foreign ownership can be resolved. Since this company and many other foreign-owned companies are exploring for uranium, what steps does the government intend to take to see that these developments can be proceeded with but at the same time adhering to the announcement he made that foreign ownership would be restricted to 33 per cent?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will recall that in the statement I made announcing the government's policy in this regard there is an exception with respect to ore bodies established prior to the date of the Prime Minister's announcement. I believe the right hon. member for Prince Albert asked me about that at that time. That exception was put in specifically so that where an ore body has been found and where in the normal course they would be permitted to go ahead, the decision will not have a retroactive effect which would prevent them from proceeding. It is believed that the Gulf development in Saskatchewan falls within these guidelines. I will be seeing the president of that company on Monday when he will be presenting his plans.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In the event this turns out to be a very large operation, which we all hope it will, does this mean that the 40 per cent of the uranium industry now controlled by Canadians will decline and that the percentage of Canadian control of the uranium industry is likely now to drop below the 40 per cent level which was in effect at the time the Prime Minister made his announcement?

Mr. Greene: That is a hypothetical question to some degree because we do not really know what this new mine represents or what its ore resources are. It was believed at the time of the announcement that it would be very unfair to make the rules have a retroactive effect. It was felt that this company, although not a Canadian company, which had brought this mine to the virtual stage of development should have the same privileges as existing companies and that it would only be in the event of sale that the new regulations would come into effect. If this is a very large mine, it might have the effect to which the hon. member referred. However, it was felt that this would be the only fair way because of prior development.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are three minutes remaining in the question period. I urge hon. members to co-operate with the Chair and give me an opportunity to recognize three or four members before the end of the question period. Perhaps the very important matter raised by the hon. member might be continued on Monday.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I have one short question. Are the regulations which I understand are to be issued under the Atomic Energy Control Act ready and will they be tabled fairly soon?

Mr. Greene: They are not ready, Mr. Speaker. However, we are giving them critical appraisal and moving ahead with them as quickly as possible. I hope they will be ready shortly.

AIR TRANSPORT

UNLICENSED FLYING TRAINING OPERATIONS

Mr. Jerry Pringle (Fraser Valley East): I have an urgent question for the Minister of Transport. Is the minister aware that flying training is being conducted at various airports in Canada by operators who have not applied for or received an air transport licence? They are in direct competition with duly licensed flying schools operating under existing stringent rules as prescribed by the Department of Transport and the Canadian Transport Commission.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, it has been called to my attention that there have been allegations of the nature outlined by the hon. member. I have asked the Canadian Transport Commission to investigate. I will report as soon as I have an answer from them.

Mr. Pringle: A supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am afraid there is not time for supplementaries.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I have an urgent question for the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister use his good offices over the weekend to come to the aid of expelled John Lennon and thus prevent a break-up of the Beatles?

CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

THE ARCTIC—U.S. REACTION TO CANADIAN POLICY

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I wish to ask a follow-up question to one I asked yesterday. The Prime Minister said in reply to my question:

> I do not see in here any denial of the substance of what the hon. member has just mentioned—

In view of the apparent conflict that now seems to exist between the Secretary of State for External Affairs and Mr. Robert McCloskey with reference to this matter, has the Canadian government received any official formal protestation from the United States with respect to the Arctic legislation presented to the House and with reference to Canada's position on sovereignty in the north?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As I said yesterday, Mr. Speaker, I know of no such formal protestation having been made. I can repeat the same thing this morning. I have not been in contact with the minister. I undoubtedly would have been told if there had been a formal protestation.

Mr. Woolliams: May I ask a supplementary?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will recognize the fact that I disallowed a supplementary by the previous speaker.

Mr. Woolliams: This is an important matter. I waited 30 minutes to put it before the House. It is going to be debated on Monday.

Mr. Speaker: I will recognize the hon. member if there is unanimous consent of the House when we have completed the question period.

PUBLIC SERVICE

EMPLOYEES EXCLUDED FROM COLLECTIVE BARGAINING—REPORT OF ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON PAY AND EMPLOYMENT CONDITIONS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board. It relates to the advisory committee on the pay and conditions of employment of public servants excluded from collective bargaining. The committee, under the chairmanship of the Hon. Mr. Clyne, was appointed some time ago by the government in response to a recommendation by a joint parliamentary committee. Can the President of the Treasury Board say whether the government expects a second report from the Clyne committee at an early date? If I were permitted to ask a supplementary question, I would ask if the minister will expedite this matter?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Clyne and his committee have been asked to make a further review to bring up to date their recommendations. I am not sure of the date by which we expect to receive the results of such a review but I assure the hon. member the committee is being pressed to complete their work.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

USE OF DRIFT STATIONS IN ARCTIC RESEARCH

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton-Centre): Mr. Speaker, on December 12, 1969, as reported on page 1901 of Hansard, I directed a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I should like to direct it now to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It reads:

In view of the intensified Arctic research by the Soviet and American governments through the use of drift stations, will the minister take an early opportunity to inform the House what Canada is doing in this area?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): As the hon. member has indicated, this concerns a matter which is largely within the jurisdiction of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. However, I would be glad to draw the attention of the minister to the question the hon. member has posed and provide the information for him.

Mr. Paproski: A supplementary question or, if it is not supplementary, a related question. Most of us have read in the newspapers that people from the minister's department—and there was reference to his Parliamentary Secretary—were in Venezuela or in the Caribbean looking at currents—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As was suggested earlier, perhaps the hon. member for Calgary North might be allowed to ask a supplementary question now concerning a matter which is obviously of importance.

CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

THE ARCTIC—U.S. REACTION TO CANADIAN POLICY

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): In view of the answer given to my question, in which the Prime Minister said he was aware of no firm or formal protest by the United States, would the right hon. gentleman, in his official capacity as Prime Minister of Canada, determine whether the United States has made a formal objection with reference to the position we have taken with regard to the Arctic and the legislation which is to come before the House on Monday? I ask this having in mind the fact that Robert McCloskey says there has been no consultation, while the Secretary of State for External Affairs says there has been.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): There has been consultation. There has been a fair amount of discussion with United States officials on this question. As to whether there will be a protest, or whether there has been a formal protest, let me say I am sure that if one is made I will hear about it sooner or later.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

AIR TRANSPORT

UNLICENSED FLYING TRAINING OPERATIONS

Mr. Jerry Pringle (Fraser Valley East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, with respect, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to ask a supplementary question which I deem to be most important to the success of the smaller companies which are encountering a great deal of difficulty.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pringle: In view of the fact that properly licensed flying training schools are required to invest heavily in order to qualify for air transport licences, can the minister assure the House that the regulations will be revised to plug existing loopholes before properly licensed operators are forced out of business?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I am delighted to reassure the hon. member, in view of his legitimate concern over this matter, that either amendments or new regulations will be introduced as soon as possible to correct the situation he describes.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYMENT, MANPOWER AND LABOUR RELATIONS POLICIES

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby) moved:

That this House condemns the government (a) for its failure to provide a program of full employment, (b) for its discriminatory and ineffective manpower policies, and (c) for its destructive labour relations with its own employees.

He said: After the election of June, 1968, the Canadian people, for the first time in history, had reason to believe they had a government which would be led by a man who combined in his personality two very desirable qualities, intellectual competence and moral concern.

Thousands of Canadians voted for a party which would be led by this Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in the expectation that it would help bring about meaningful social and economic reform. What we have seen, what Canadians from one coast to the other have seen, is a government which has demonstrated not moral and intellectual innovation and concern but rather moral and intellectual bankruptcy.

In a democratic society, people have legitimate expectations that their government will be concerned with the improvement of the spiritual and material conditions of the majority particularly of the poor. However, the government has demonstrated a complete incapacity—to put things in the best light—or callous indifference—to use the most extreme terms—concerning this responsibility.

In the time available to me, I should like to demonstrate this contention by referring to three areas. The first concerns the general economic policy of the government; the second, its manpower policies, which I maintain are discriminatory and ineffective, and, the third, its labour relations with its own employees. Others in this party will, later in the debate, enlarge on these points.

Let me first of all say something about the general economic policy of the government. As all economists in the western world know, there are two general approaches to managing the economy of an industrial nation. We can either concern ourselves with maintaining price stability or we can commit ourselves to a policy of full employment. In Canada and the United States, the prime concern of governments has been with price stability. The result is that we have experienced a significantly higher level of unemployment in every year since the war than countries in western Europe which have chosen the alternative policy, namely, the creation of conditions of full employment. I refer to the writings of Mr. John Deutsch, former head of the Economic Council of Canada. In a recent article he said just what I have said.

There are ethical and moral choices which can be made. Governments are not bound by deterministic happenings in our society. This government has consistently opted in favour of price stability, though this has resulted in high rates of unemployment, 5 per cent as against 1½ per cent in a country like Sweden.

We are now faced with the morally reprehensible highest level of unemployment in five years. Let me begin at the lowest figure, that of Ontario, which is 4.5 per cent, far exceeding the level that would be tolerated by any government in western Europe. The prairie provinces have 5.3 per cent unemployment; British Columbia 6.7 per cent, Quebec 8.7 per cent, the Atlantic provinces 11 per cent, and in Newfoundland the fantastically and tragically high rate of possibly 22 per cent. The national average of 6.5 per cent is, to repeat, the highest level in five years.

Of particular significance in these figures is the one for the youth category, the young members of the labouring force, the rate of unemployment being some 13.5 per cent. This is the most rapidly growing sector of our unemployed and the rate is bound to increase, I suggest, after June when more students come on to the labour market.

The meaning of this condition is callously disregarded by the government. Unemployment means a sad life for those affected. It means the absence of a sense of satisfaction that a man or woman obtains from contributing his share of labour to society. It also means, of course, a serious lack of income, thus affecting the well-being of his dependants. This means, in turn, a necessary decline in the sense of happiness or well-being of the family and its environment. This is a situation that cannot be cynically dismissed. It should not be regarded simply as one little statistic with which we have to live. The point is that other governments in the world do not tolerate this kind of unemployment rate. This government does.

I think that it is now being seen that there is moral inadequacy on the part of the government, a moral bankruptcy. This is being seen by all, I suggest, but the most hackneyed of Liberal partisans. But what is not so readily seen is the intellectual bankruptcy that has gone with this. Even if one were to be primarily concerned with inflation, the diagnosis of the present government is profoundly wrong. We are not in an inflationary period which has resulted from the under production of goods confronted with an excessive demand.

That was the condition in the early 1950's. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) referred to this fact in his speech a short time ago and he tried to draw a parallel with the present. The fact is that today we have a surplus of goods. One has only to come to my constituency to see the number of automobiles there are around. The same point can be made in many ridings in this country. There is an abundance of goods. But we have people out of work who cannot purchase them. I suggest a parallel between now and the early 1950's simply is not valid.

Another indicator that one would assume an intelligent man would look for to see if we were significantly threatened by inflation would be the export figures. The evidence, however, is encouraging. For example, I checked the figures for one month ago and found that our exports are up 16 per cent over the same period a year ago. So that our exports are not diminishing.

The third example of the intellectual incompetence and moral dishonesty of the government on the question of inflation is the refusal to state openly to the Canadian people that the overwhelming cause of our inflation is the almost virtual integration of our economy with that of the United States. When the United States is undergoing inflationary pressure, we get it too as an inevitable by-product, and it is time that the government said so honestly.

If the government wanted to do something about inflation, the first move in a serious, long-run strategy would be to take measures to create an independent economy, or an economy as independent as one can have in a modern world. The hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) and my other colleague from Regina East (Mr. Burton) recently issued a statement on the subject of inflation and dealt with this problem at some length. I am not going to repeat their cogent arguments, but I urge any member of the House and anyone who is interested to check with that source to see how we may begin in a serious way to get a more independent economy. If we are to concern ourselves with inflation, then this is an essential first step.

There are, of course, other matters to be dealt with. One is not arguing that there should be no concern with inflation, or that one should not be concerned with people who are confronted with its results. Those on fixed incomes need to be protected by a law that provides for permanent escalator clauses in private and public pensions. We require better trade union legislation in the provinces that will provide for increases in trade union memberships so that workers are in a better position to get higher wages through the process of collective bargaining, thus enabling them to deal with an essentially rigged market structure. There are other measures too that could be taken to protect those people who are now most seriously affected by inflation.

However, the point that I wish to emphasize is that inflation is not our major problem. It is not or should not be our major social concern: this should be maintaining full employment. It is time that this government woke up to this fact and began to deal with the real question that affects the vast majority of the people of this country, namely the lack of jobs. In view of the two-year time period, and because of the minister's prime responsibility in this area, I say in all seriousness that the government should demand now the resignation of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). It is absurd for this country to continue with that man heading the finance department, given the results that the department has produced for this country.

I want now to leave that area and say something about our manpower retraining programs. Before I do so, I should like to point out that a sensible economic policy for this country is one that constitutes a coherent whole. We must not only have the government committed to a plan of full employment as a matter of general economic policy; we must also have a government that seeks to establish manpower retraining programs that mesh carefully with that policy. Instead, of course, we have a government that is not concerned with full employment at all, and which produces a hodge-podge of manpower retraining programs.

The present minister of manpower has indicated that the manpower retraining programs are, to quote him, "dedicated to helping Canadians get better jobs". The minister has said that retraining programs "are designed to fill the gap between capacity and skill". I take that quotation from a press release dated December 5, 1969.

In introducing the Adult Occupational Training Act on March 3, 1967 the present Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) said the following, as reported at page 13738 of Hansard:

> We want to provide a second chance to the people who need it most. These are the men and women who missed the chance to acquire a skill during their youth—

• (12:20 p.m.)

In terms of the stated objectives on the part of two present ministers, the manpower program has been a disastrous failure, a failure largely I would suggest still unnoticed by the majority of Canadians. Why do I say this?

First of all, those who need the training most are either ineligible or not permitted to take the training for a long enough period of time.

For example, all those men and women with less than grade eight education who, by the way, constitute some 43 per cent of our labour force—a shocking statistic and the worst record of any advanced industrial nation in the world—find themselves in difficulty. This group of Canadians are crucially important if we feel we want to do something about improving conditions in our country.

Let us consider those with less than grade eight education in conjunction with the regulations in respect of this program. We immediately see the bind in which these unfortunate people find themselves. According to departmental regulations a man can take only 52 weeks of academic training plus 52 weeks of training in a skilled trade. However, and this is the catch, to take training in a skilled trade one must have a grade ten level of education. What does a man do if he starts with a grade seven, six, five or even a grade four level of education? It is impossible for such a man or woman to attain a grade ten level in 52 weeks. If the individual is lucky he may attain a grade nine level of education, but most do not get even that far.

What does happen to the few who begin our manpower retraining courses with that kind of low level of education? We find that at the end of the year we have unemployed people with a grade nine level of education instead of unemployed people with a grade six level of education. Is this any way to treat that part of our population which I suggested at the outset should be of prime concern to a democratic government? What is needed is a change in the regulations which would permit such men and women to go beyond the 52 weeks if an extended time period is required for them to attain the grade ten level. At that time the individuals would be able to take one of our trade courses.

The favourable statistics provided by the government about these courses are misleading. The fact is that only people with higher levels of education tend to take the courses because they know they can complete them. The others know that unless they have almost a grade ten level they do not have a chance to take a trade course. So, the trotting out of a lot of statistics regarding the ability to get jobs as a result of taking these courses is a profoundly misleading thing. We have to consider the thousands of Canadians with less than a grade eight education who do not take these courses because they sensibly realize they would reach a dead end. The time period of the courses must be extended to enable these people to be re-educated and eventually obtain better jobs.

One important category of people excluded from this training program is the young working group. This group is effectively excluded by the requirement that to receive training with allowances an applicant must have been a member of the labour force for three years. How could a young boy or girl aged 17 or 18, out of school and no longer a dependent, qualify for such training? Obviously such an individual could not qualify. This is one of the reasons I suggest this category of unemployed people between the ages of 16 and 19 is increasing and represents a vivid unemployment statistic. These people are out of jobs and are ineligible for our retraining program. This situation must be changed immediately.

This same regulation effectively excludes the majority of Eskimos, Indians and Métis who have never been members of the labour force. These native people represent a fair percentage of the population of this country. They are Canadians and should have the same rights as the people in my constituency. How can they have the same rights when the requirement is that one must have been a member of the labour force for three years before being eligible for financial assistance when taking these courses? Our native people, in short, are effectively excluded from this program.

Another failure of the manpower program is to be found in the level of allowances provided. In 1969 the average level of allowances paid to a recipient with three children was $71 per week. This is below the poverty level in this country for a family, according to the Economic Council of Canada. We say to a man we will retrain him but he must keep in mind that he will have to live below the poverty level while he is being trained!

Furthermore, according to the Economic Council of Canada in its fifth report, the average family living at the poverty level has four children. The requirements of the manpower retraining scheme prohibit allowances for more than two dependants. This provision excludes the average family man who we might feel in statistical terms should be eligible. Those who are most in need of manpower training, poor large families, are effectively excluded from meaningful financial support because the level of allowances does not provide for the support of all their children.

The point is that the manpower retraining program would be excellent for a middle class family but very few of the people in this category need such training! For this reason, we need the following changes. Allowances must be brought up at least to the poverty level for any family, whatever its size, a member of which is taking part in this manpower retraining scheme.

The third failure of the manpower retraining program is the result of it being operated in what I can only describe as a context of administrative chaos. This point is well documented in the report of the Association of Colleges of Applied Arts and Technology of Ontario dated December 1, 1969. Let me quote from that report as follows:

> The Canada manpower centre and the local educational facility operate, as had been said, in administrative vacuums, with little or no constructive consultation at either the policy formulation level, or in the day-to-day administrative routine. Apparently the federal department feels its prerogatives are better protected with things this way, making the erroneous assumption—we would presume—that education and retraining can be purchased in the same perfunctory way the housewife buys her weekly groceries.

That quotation does not come from a partisan source, but rather from a serious group of teachers and administrators. It represents an objective assessment of the manpower retraining program. Further on in the same report it is clearly demonstrated that there is absolutely no attempt made to co-ordinate the planning of programs of the federal manpower department, which is the ultimate executive and financial authority, with those of Ontario manpower authorities who provide the educational facilities. This is a serious economic matter. Quite apart from other shortcomings, there is no adequate long term forecast in respect of manpower needs. I emphasize the word "adequate" because there are of course long term forecasts.

The point made in this study is that there is a complete failure on the part of provincial and federal authorities to integrate their planning so that the real manpower needs of Canada are met. The inevitable result of course is that countless Canadians are being trained for jobs which do not exist, and that there are jobs presently available on the market for which there are not trained men.

Another failure of the manpower department is the colossal lack of leadership in respect of the retraining programs. It has failed to encourage new approaches or help those imaginative efforts which have existed outside governmental departments.

I should like to refer to the particular case of Frontier College. This college is a private institution dating back to 1899. By an act of Parliament of 1922, this college was given a charter and special recognition by the government. The purpose of Frontier College is to serve that category of people to which I referred a few minutes ago, namely those who live on the outskirts of the central core of our economy such as the Eskimos, the Indians, workers on the railways in outlying districts, loggers, and so on. This college has had a highly successful program for bringing education to these people and for bringing them community programs.

Frontier College is widely respected by every authority in the field throughout the country. I see that time does not permit me to give some detailed examples of the work done by this college. I only mention that they have done exceptional work in the Northwest Territories, Newfoundland and other parts of the country. When the administrators of this college requested this government for a mere $50,000 to carry on this work, the manpower department refused their request and gave them a piddling $5,000. Another $5,000 I understand came from the Department of Labour. Here, we have an effective group of young people, in the main graduates, who give up a substantial income amounting to thousands of dollars, to work with the people whom they are teaching. They work as labourers during the day and teach at night. There are always considerable numbers of young people who apply for these positions. These people have been callously treated by this government. They have been performing a function which should be performed by the Department of Manpower in these areas, and yet they are not receiving the recognition and encouragement they should receive. Instead they have received indifference and discouragement.

I have tried to suggest that the manpower department has failed in four areas. It has failed to train those people who are most in need of training. It is not providing adequate allowances and there is administrative planning chaos. Finally, it lacks any kind of imaginative approach and leadership in respect of getting to the people in the outlying districts. Before leaving this area, I should like to mention something which should be, but unfortunately is not, obvious to all. An intelligent manpower training program does not constitute a long-range cost to Canadians. The contrary is the case. Quite apart from the benefits it could provide directly to the people involved in this program, it has been estimated that for every dollar spent on occupational retraining $3 in economic growth for the country would result. The conclusion then, is that such training programs are both beneficial to the people involved and to the economy of the country.

I should like now to say something briefly about the government's attitude toward its employees. So far I have attempted to show that it has been indifferent in respect of the working force outside the government sector. I have attempted to show that its manpower training programs are grotesquely inadequate in terms of meeting the needs of the country and the needs of the people who require training. Now, I wish to demonstrate the lack of concern on the part of the government, and its misdirection, in respect of its own working force. Recently a survey was made among the employees of the government. What has this survey turned up? I have time merely to cite a few examples. The first is a common one.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired unless he has leave of the House to continue beyond his allocated time.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Broadbent: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The first example may appear to involve a trivial point. Nevertheless, it is something which affects almost every civil servant in this country. There are reports that there have been significant delays in providing back pay. According to the regulations, back pay should be provided within a period of 90 days. Reports have been received in the last few days to the effect that many civil servants in this country have waited as long as 10 months to receive their back pay, money which is legitimately owed them by the government. This is a single point, but it does suggest something concerning the attitude of this government toward its employees.

Consider also the postal workers. I shall say nothing about the Montreal situation.

Recently a union official in my area pointed out to me the present situation in respect of current negotiations with the government. First of all, the government does not wish to provide job security for elected union officials. This, of course, is essential. If a union officer is to do his important job for the men whom he represents, I suggest it is necessary that he have job security so that if at some time in the future he should not be re-elected to his union position he could return to his employment. Most good employers in the private sector provide this as an automatic right. The federal government, in the postal sector at least, seems to be quite callous on this point. Second, the Post Office Department has recently gone over the heads of the negotiating team in respect of its own employees. This is a typical example of the bad management practices which undermine serious constructive collective bargaining. The Prime Minister referred to this in a negative way in respect of another matter some days ago. He should have a look at the Post Office.

Another example is that of the Customs Department. There are 700 outstanding grievances in this department. Many of these are of a routine nature, but some are not. The point is that in this department every grievance goes the full route. Normally, there are four steps through which any grievance may go, but it need not go through all these steps. If the grievance is not settled in step one, then it goes to step two. This department, however, has insisted that every grievance go the full route. There were actually some 1,400 grievances in that department but believe it or not the department lost about 700 of them and there is no longer, therefore, any record. One might ask what this indicates in the way of attitude toward, and respect for, people.

The Public Service Staff Relations Act is deficient in a very significant way. At the present time government workers can have arbitration on three or four matters only—rates of pay, hours of work and leave entitlement. There is omitted from that act important items which currently concern working people. These are retraining, technological change, work conditions, job security, and job reclassification. This act needs to be changed to include these matters within the arbitration category and needs to be changed soon.

The last department to which I wish to refer is the Department of National Defence. There are many within the department who believe that the government now has a five year plan, a phasing out operation throughout this country. The government knows when they are going to close down station X or station Y, but they are not telling the workers. This means that if a station is closed down, a worker can be transferred to another station, and within another two years that one can be closed down, too. The point at issue is the very important matter of the right of the working man in this country, regardless of whether he is a government employee or a private worker, to know something about his future. The point at issue is the government's refusal, even when it has information available to itself, to tell its employees what its management plans are.

Why, I ask, can the government not tell in advance the employees of the Department of National Defence at different stations across the country that the station will be closed down? Sure, there will be some political reactions, but let us face them. Let us have a discussion of whether a station should or should not be closed down. What we cannot do, and what the government should not tolerate, is the kind of practice which leaves the working man, so dependent on the power of others, uninformed about his future. Those of us who perhaps on the whole have superior education, and are in superior income positions, are not involved in this kind of threat to our future. We are in a position to better control it. We are lucky. The government however has an obligation to make its plans known in advance to those in less fortunate positions and it is failing to do so.

The last point I want to make about the government's attitude toward its own employees concerns its austerity program. Clear evidence is provided by a number of departments that what the government has done has been to force reclassification on people. In some cases it forces people to go down to a lower category or, if it wants to raise the incomes of certain officials, it effects lay-offs of others. The point is that this austerity program enforced by the government is implemented in a unilateral way by the departments, thus affecting very unjustly the employees involved. The question of reclassification is not negotiable. It is unilaterally imposed and it is the workers who suffer at the hands of officials who are given such arbitrary power by a government which is not basically concerned with what should be regarded as the ordinary rights of citizens and of working people everywhere.

I thank the House for giving me this extra time, and I will not go into more detailed comments on other government departments. Other members from this party will pick that up later in the debate. I hope I have said enough to make it clear that the government itself, instead of being an outstanding example of what an employer should be in this country, is setting a lamentably low standard.

This government, as I said at the outset, is led by a man who many of us thought had both moral and intellectual gifts of a high order. What I hope to have made clear is that if we consider the well-being of the average or poor Canadian, if we look at the government's general economic policy and at its manpower training programs, if we look at its attitude toward its own employees, we must conclude that we have a collection of men running this country who are committed simply to bureaucratic efficiency at whatever the cost, a collection of men quite indifferent to the legitimate aspirations of the vast majority of our people. I say therefore that the Prime Minister deserves to be condemned by all of those in our country who have any sense of moral justice.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): I want to speak briefly on the motion introduced by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). The motion reads:

That this House condemns the government (a) for its failure to provide a program of full employment,

And indeed, they should be condemned.

(b) for its discriminatory and ineffective manpower policies,

Here again, for the reasons outlined by the previous speaker, they should be condemned.

and (c) for its destructive labour relations with its own employees.

I do not plan to go into detail in respect of all the different departments. Some of them have been mentioned by the previous speaker. If anyone had any doubts as to the relationship between the government and the employees of the government, all he has to do is think about the man who has great persuasive powers and who is always so friendly, courteous and kind to everyone, including the workers. I refer to the Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): I hear applause from a displaced person across the way. Undoubtedly, he misunderstood my words. They were said with complete sarcasm and meant exactly the opposite. He does not have sense enough to understand it.

Mr. McBride: But you are never sarcastic.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): The displaced parson across the way does not seem to understand English.

Mr. McBride: You are a nice fellow at heart.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): He will continue to emit sounds while seated and then get up a little later to try to deliver a sermon, something which he did not seem to do so successfully in past years. In any event, in reply to the member from somewhere—McBride is the name but one sees him so rarely here that it is difficult to know where he is from—

Mr. McBride: I am here every day.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): In any event, I will say to him in reply that a fellow by the name of Eisenhower, a great man, once said that in politics one should take everything seriously except oneself. I commend that to him because later he will have an opportunity to speak if he wishes and we will be very glad to listen to one of his crazy sermons.

Mr. McBride: I have been trying to be nice to you.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): As someone once said in this House: When you are going after big game you are not dissuaded by rabbit tracks, which seem to be appearing across the way. Mr. Speaker smiles and nods his head, so I am sure he feels the way I do.

Mr. Lewis: You cannot drag in the Speaker; that is very improper.

• (12:50 p.m.)

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): May I say, in rising to say a few words on this motion, that we find the economy to be in great trouble, although I am sure that members across the way will not agree with us on that. We have, to put it mildly, serious inflation. We have a growing balance of payments problem. Taxes have increased to the point where Canadians are paying the highest they have ever paid in peacetime. Then, of course, we are paying farmers not to grow wheat, and this again creates great unemployment. We are paying them not to grow wheat, despite the fact that there is so much starvation in the world today.

We are confronted with news headlines like, "Rising Jobless Find Government No Help," in the Ottawa Citizen and "Unemployment Starts to Mount"; "Jobless Highest Since 1964."

Mr. Comeau: And "Cosmos Closing Down."

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Yes, firms closing down all across the country. Recently a plant in Cornwall closed down, as did the Dunlop Tire plant in Toronto, throwing 600 out of work in one case and I believe 800 out of work in the other. We have a plant closing at Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, or at least Cosmos is talking about closing, and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) has not given us a policy with respect to these situations.

Mr. McBride: Oh, oh.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): I, Mr. Speaker, would gladly yield the floor if this supercillious creature across the way, the disjointed parson, has something to say. Perhaps he will say it a little later. If we are going to listen to his interjections, I call on Your Honour to ensure order in the House. It would appear he likes to remain seated on whatever little brains he has, and yak at the same time. There is nothing comes out of the uppermost part of him, so it would appear it is all coming from the other direction. So, Mr. Speaker, if I could prevail on you, would you try to straighten out this poor individual? Of course, he is an expert. He has been here for a long period of time, and he knows the rules so well.

Mr. Comeau: He is a Liberal as well.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): That explains it.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, I would think that the government, in view of what we see transpiring from day to day, have such a disregard for our long-cherished parliamentary process that they may well be wondering why the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) would have such gall as to bring in a motion condemning them for their failure to bring in a program to provide full employment. For once, I might be tempted to agree with the government because, while we engage in this debate here, we know that the government already stand condemned of this charge by the people of Canada. All members of this House meet people everyday who are complaining about, condemning and damning the actions of this government.

On the one hand, the government has virtually put a plan into force to create unemployment in order to combat inflation. I do not know if all the economists agree with this position, but certainly it seems a weird, strange idea to induce unemployment in order to combat inflation. There surely must be some other method. We can quote endless statistics in this debate showing how the government have brought misery into the lives of countless thousands of Canadian citizens. However, I do not think that is the answer because the government have a well-trained habit of hiding behind and, if necessary, of distorting statistics—as mentioned by the previous speaker.

We must look beyond the statistical data related to this scandalous issue and so must the government. While the government may attempt to hide behind the statistics, I wonder how long and how well they can hide behind the stares of the unemployed searching vainly for work, behind the misery of the young, who are finding quickly that opportunity is virtually non-existent today. People who are coming out of university cannot find jobs and students cannot find summer jobs. The government cannot hide behind the questions of the man thrown out of work in the prime of his life who has been told, with the old shrugging, "Well, it's necessary so that we can give you a better life."

What is this better life to a man who cannot find a job? What is this better life, this just society? Well, maybe I am not supposed to mention that. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) recently said at Carleton University that he thought we should bury that phrase now. It served its purpose of getting him into power, so, we should quietly put it away. Yes, the government is already condemned, and condemned by its very arrogance in its approach to this problem. On its own admission, it stands guilty of the charge. Hasn't it admitted that it must create unemployment to defeat inflation, and hasn't it defended this plan? Well, we still have inflation, and the highest unemployment rates for six years.

How far does the government intend to go in boosting unemployment in this land of ours? Is it to continue? Is unemployment to go higher. The Prime Minister, in a pre-Christmas statement before he went skin-diving, or doing some skiing, or taking some other vacation of the many that he has had in the period of a year—

Mr. Pepin: That is cheap, Bob.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce should not comment.

[Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys).]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There was nothing very cheap about it.

Mr. Comeau: They are expensive trips.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Yes, they are not cheap. However, the Minister knows we are telling the truth and that is why he resorts to the statement, "That is cheap, Bob." He does not mean that. Smiling Jack is always smiling, and he does not really mean that. He knows it is unfortunate that we have a Prime Minister who is so happy and so willing to go on so many vacations. But when there are problems, great problems, surely he should not be always out of the country or going on these many trips.

I say that in all sincerity. I think he should stay around here and try to solve these problems with his great expertise, his great knowledge, and that amazing staff which he has. One wonders how he finds time to speak to the 75 members of the staff that he has in his office. I suppose they speak to each other, and one asks, "What are you doing". Then the other asks, "What are you doing"? and they really do not know.

The Prime Minister says he could live with 6 per cent unemployment. We are already beyond 6 per cent unemployment. He said it would not worry him. I ask what rate of unemployment is the government prepared to set as a safety limit so far as it is concerned? There is no safe limit so far as the unemployed are concerned. What is the acceptable unemployment rate now in the eyes of the government? What is the cut-off figure, a figure that might be used as a gauge by the government itself to know when the limit has been reached and that it had better think again instead of monkeying with the lives of so many Canadian citizens?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): It being one o'clock I do now leave the Chair until two o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): The hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, just prior to the luncheon adjournment I was posing a number of questions to the government with reference to unemployment. One was, what is the acceptable unemployment level in the eyes of the government? What is the cutoff figure that might be used as a gauge by the government itself to know that the limit has been reached and that it had better take action instead of monkeying with the lives of many Canadian citizens. I am sure we do not want smart alec answers like those received from the Prime Minister who, when questioned on the subject, replied, when did you stop beating your wife? We want to know how far down the road to recession the government is leading the country by using these peculiar methods to control the situation.

The unemployment situation in Canada has reached frightening proportions and to my mind it has done so as a result of misguided and muddled thinking of the first order. We know that the government can live with 6 per cent unemployment but those who think that a man can live on $30 a week should get out on the streets and talk to the men and women who are feeling the whiplash of these academic exercises that went out the window years ago. I suggest the government get out and speak with the people because it is obviously not getting the message. However, the message is being carried now in the Toronto Globe and Mail. A series of articles in that paper carried these headlines: "Rising unemployment appears to be an unhappy by-product of the fight against inflation. Here is how it has affected three of the 526,000 Canadians without work." I am referring, of course, to the latest in this series which appeared in the Globe and Mail this week.

In the lead story, we read that the roles of father and mother will be reversed shortly in the family of Gordon and Patricia Rehel, unless Mr. Rehel, an unemployed factory worker, somehow finds a job. The story reads:

> Since December they have been living with their three children on unemployment insurance of $48 a week in their 1½ story home on Natal Avenue, Scarborough.

It is said that Mrs. Rehel will go out to get work while her husband stays home looking after the children. Let me continue to quote from this story:

> Gordon blames the federal government's methods of fighting inflation for the fact he can't get a job. People are being told not to buy, so less goods are produced, so jobs disappear.
> Whatever else Pierre Trudeau may be, he is no friend of the working man, he said.
> We find it impossible to understand how they think they can better the country by putting people out of work, said Patricia (his wife).

In the second story we read that Fred Leveley is already the homemaker while his wife goes out to work as a carhop at $1.35 an hour. Says Mr. Leveley:

> I don't mind cooking. But sometimes there isn't much to cook—spaghetti, hamburger, things like that. We can't afford chickens or roasts and eat spaghetti two or three times a week.

These extracts were from the Globe and Mail. If we look at the Toronto Star, we find this story:

> What is acceptable to Prime Minister Trudeau is not acceptable to us. We will not hold still for an unemployment figure of 6 per cent.
> Not even in the sacred cause of fighting inflation should it be tolerated. Canada must find better ways to straighten out the economy than to let unemployment grow into a monster.
> A figure of 6 per cent, translated into people, means that 480,000 men and women cannot find jobs. If one allots them only one dependant each, that still means that almost 1,000,000 Canadians have been plunged into hard times.
> The maximum benefit a man with children can draw from the Unemployment Insurance Commission is $53 a week for 52 weeks. That works out to $2,756 for the year before a man has to go onto welfare.
> This is well below the poverty line for a family in Canada.

• (2:10 p.m.)

The monster of unemployment is with us. There are many, many people living below the poverty line in Canada today. Does this government really care?

In recent months there have been massive lay-offs in private industry. I referred earlier to some of these. We have had delegations of unemployed workers here from Dunlop Tire Company and, as we all know, there have been demonstrations outside this building because of blatant government attempts to smash unions which over the years have fought for the rights of workers. I am referring to the Lapalme workers and the CNTU. If hon. members have any doubts about this, I suggest they look at the Montreal postal situation. In a year when the government can unveil Information Canada to improve information services, it throws the basic communication service of Montreal into complete utter chaos. Anyone in Montreal can tell you about the problem with the mail service. Yet the government is having to pay more money to bail itself out of the mess than it would have had to pay in its Scrooge-like approach to the mail truck drivers and their union.

I wish to deal now with the manpower policies. Just how effective are these policies?

I could again quote statistics, but I prefer to go beyond that. A report prepared recently by United Community Services of the Greater Vancouver area indicates the result of their examination of Canada manpower and other employment programs. Page 22 of this report reads:

> How does the consumer feel about the efficacy of manpower services? During the past months, United Community Services has interviewed numbers of those receiving social assistance in regard to "hang-up" in the welfare system; their comment about manpower have been devastatingly critical. These criticisms are not without support, indeed, one social service administrator bitterly stated: "It is as if they had the brand of Cain on their forehead when manpower finds out they are on welfare." The Director of the John Howard Society states "Our referrals are quickly categorized by manpower as untrainable, and therefore not adaptable to their procedures."
> In the basic conflict within the Manpower Department between their two "clients", the employer and the employee, the B.C. regional office has opted to serve the employer. This philosophy was expressed by a manpower representative on an open-line show on December 2, 1969; he repeatedly told critical callers: "We have no responsibility to you; our responsibility is to the labour market."

The report prepared by United Community Services of the Greater Vancouver area mentions retraining programs. Here again we find evidence of discrimination.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I regret I have to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired. Does the House give unanimous consent to the hon. member continuing?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I wish to thank the members for their kindness. I will not be very long. This Part of the report of the United Community Services of the Greater Vancouver area reads:

> Perhaps the most alarming statistic in this study is that of 27 per cent of registrants in the age group up to and including 19 who "want and could use upgrading" only 5 per cent were given manpower training courses. Present manpower regulations militate against this age group. Only those who have been out of school at least one year are eligible for enrolment in training courses, and three years must elapse before they can qualify for maintenance while training.

The member who introduced this motion today mentioned that the government had now increased to three years the time that an individual must be on the labour market before he or she can receive training. It is often the case, particularly with young people, that they must just walk the streets for three years with nothing to do. They sometimes lose their ambition in that period while waiting to receive training. The report continues:

> The absurdity of these regulations is illustrated by a Vancouver woman given an academic upgrading course by the social welfare department to help her on the road to independence; she found herself disqualified for manpower training allowances for the next three years.
> Of all the applicants for occupational training courses, only one in ten is accepted. It is obvious that since the primary object is to satisfy the employer, training is almost unavailable to those whose skills are least and whose income is most likely to be well below the poverty level.

In the Atlantic provinces, the unemployment rate is almost twice the rate for the rest of Canada. In certain regions, particularly in Newfoundland, it ranges as high as 20 to 22 per cent unemployment. This is not good, Mr. Speaker. It is a very sad situation. This situation is not helped by the government's policies with regard to freight rates in the Atlantic provinces. As a result of this freight rate policy prices are rising in the Atlantic provinces and, in many cases, industry is being driven out of the area because it cannot cope with the increased rates. Questions have been directed to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) regarding this situation. He is always most co-operative and in my opinion works well with all members. I hope he will prevail upon the CNR to roll back these increases in order to assist the economy of the Atlantic provinces.

I completely agree with the motion that has been put forward. In fact I go a little farther than that. I would like to add a few words to the final line of the motion moved by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard) that the motion of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby be amended by adding thereto the following:

> —and particularly the failure of the government to provide freight rate subsidization in the Atlantic provinces, where unemployment rates are twice the national average, in order to relieve against the hardship of high prices and unemployment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Mr. Muir, (Cape Breton-The Sydneys), seconded by Mr. McCleave, moves that the motion be amended as follows:

> —and particularly the failure of the government to provide freight rate subsidization in the Atlantic provinces, where unemployment rates are twice the national average, in order to relieve against the hardship of high prices of unemployment.

Mr. McCleave: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The motion was seconded by the hon. member for Saint Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard). I would have been very pleased to have been identified with it, he is the seconder.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): The record will be changed accordingly.

• (2:20 p.m.)

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to start my remarks by reading the motion under consideration:

That this House condemns the Government (a) for its failure to provide a program of full employment, (b) for its discriminatory and ineffective manpower policies, and (c) for its destructive labour relations with its own employees.

Mr. Speaker, in the light of existing conditions, I believe it would have been difficult to find a more appropriate motion than this one which is complemented by the amendment moved by my friend from Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. Muir).

Mr. Speaker, in 1965, three new men arrived on the federal political scene to join the Liberals. Until they took their final decision, these three doves, as they are called, were not known for their unflinching faith in the ideas of the Liberal party. They were identified rather with the CCF party or the NDP.

An hon. Member: Or with the Progressive Conservative party.

Mr. Ricard: Considering the past of these three newcomers, the workers could have rightly expected that their problems would be rapidly solved in the future.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), for one, played a very active role, as everybody knows, in the famous strike of the asbestos miners. He identified himself at the time with the interests of the workers and once arrived here, as Prime Minister, the workers would have had the right to expect from him that he would take care of them in a very special manner. As far as the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) is concerned, he also is recognized as an old trade-unionist because of the part he took in the CBC strike. And the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) made his first appearance in public life with the CNTU and achieved an enviable reputation which is recognized by everyone.

Those three newcomers on the federal scene held important positions with the unions. They therefore owe much to the working class. It is surprising, Mr. Speaker, to note that in 1970, the three doves, as some took pleasure in calling them, instead of helping the working class which had supported them, so to speak, for so many years, should have decided to turn their backs on them. Is it any wonder then, Mr. Speaker, that the reputation of those three gentlemen, each of whom holds a very important post within the Canadian government, should deteriorate constantly. Most of the workers are sorry they trusted those three gentlemen. Several of them even see treachery in the present attitude of one of them in particular, namely the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

I am sorry he is not here in the House now, because I have a message to convey to him on behalf of the workers of my riding which is going through a depression such as it has never known before. The words I will use might be a bit harsh. However, this must be made known, and I would not change them if he were here. I am even sorry he is not in the House, because it would give me some pleasure in saying them in his presence. Because of the roster system which has been adopted, this is not one of his days to be in the House. But I must not, because of that, be deprived of making my remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to dwell for a few moments on the present situation of the working class. The most recent statistics, as published by the Federal Bureau of Statistics on February 21 last, reveal that there were at that time 526,000 unemployed Canadians. In the province of Quebec alone, there are 195,000 unemployed at the present time, which represents 8.7 per cent of the Quebec labour force. The unemployment rate for Canada as a whole is 6.5 per cent.

According to an inquiry made by the JOC (Young Catholic Workers' Association) among the young workers in the province of Quebec, there are 57,000 unemployed young people. Which means that one young Quebecer out of ten is unemployed at the present time and that young people represent 42 per cent of the unemployed in Quebec. What will happen in a few months from now? Students will begin their holidays and will also invade the labour market, looking for a job so as to be able to pay a part of their fees. It is just too bad, but many of those 640,000 new job seekers throughout Canada will not be able to achieve their goal which is to pay much of their tuition.

The only ones responsible for that are those who sit at the present time on the treasury benches. And just to emphasize their responsibility, I just have to go through the 1965 Index of the debates of the House to see that those who were then in the opposition blamed unemployment on the ministers of that time, on the Progressive Conservative government.

I will simply mention four speakers from the Liberal party: the hon. Chevrier, Martin, Pearson and Pickersgill. You will notice at a glance that during the third session of the 23rd Parliament, the hon. Chevrier made 38 contributions about unemployment, blaming the government for not providing the necessary jobs for the Canadians who were able to work.

The hon. Paul Martin, whom I need not present, made 123 contributions here in the House to condemn the government headed by Right Hon. Mr. Diefenbaker for not taking the necessary steps to check unemployment.

I remember the Right Hon. Mr. Pearson, the Leader of the Opposition at that time, who on 34 occasions, took part in the debates of the House to upbraid the Progressive Conservative members for not providing the Canadian workers with jobs. He was supported by the hon. Pickersgill who took the floor on 34 occasions also to blame the government for the ills that plagued the Canadian workers because of lack of jobs.

I shall not mention the remarks made by other members. I was here at that time and unemployment was the curse of the day then. Today, we are witnessing a situation which is strangely similar to that which prevailed when the Liberals were on this side of the House. What answer do they suggest?

What is the Cabinet doing now to fight unemployment? Nothing at all. They leave to their own devices heads of families who lose their jobs because the government is failing in its duty.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to take a few minutes to deal more particularly with the sorry plight of our workers. I do not want to overdo it, but I shall simply relate the facts as they are.

At Saint-Hyacinthe, in my riding, conditions are so serious that people attending church services last Sunday were urged to pray so that unemployment will end and that our leaders will be successful in their fight against it.

Furthermore, I want to put into the record a letter signed by the highest religious authority in the Saint-Hyacinthe diocese, his Excellency Bishop Sanschagrin and sent to the hon. Jean Marchand, Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. The letter reads as follows:

> The priests of the Saint-Hyacinthe area deplore the stagnation which affects the workers of the area. As shown in the briefs submitted by the Confederation of National Trade Unions and the Goodyear retraining committee, 20 per cent of the labour force is unemployed and therefore up against a situation of poverty detrimental to the workers themselves, their families and their community.
> We believe it is most urgent for us to make representations to your department so that measures are taken to remedy the situation. We join the two bodies mentioned above, as well as municipal authorities and intermediary bodies in asking that the economic subdivision of Saint-Hyacinthe be designed as a special area or in any other way, or that other effective steps be taken to cope with that serious problem which can only deteriorate if nothing is done.
> And we have signed,

The signatures follow.

Up to 1954, the conditions in the city and area of Saint-Hyacinthe had always been rather satisfactory, and the area was known for its prosperity. But since 1964, things have gone from bad to worse.

I have tried as often as possible to draw the government's attention to that problem, but I must admit that it was apparently to no avail. Nobody heeded my warnings, and yet they were only made in the best interests of my fellow-citizens.

In 1964, there were 6,059 jobs in the Saint-Hyacinthe area. In March 1970, there were only 4,944. What happened to those people who lost their jobs? They joined the increasing number of unemployed; they often had to leave their own country. In some cases, they had to put up for sale the house they had built with the help of members of their family. To sum up, for many families, the worsening of unemployment in the Saint-Hyacinthe area as a result of the lack of planning on the part of our governments has spread panic and want everywhere.

I have here the report of a study prepared by University of Montreal students. It has been published in the Wednesday, March 18, 1970 issue of Le Clairon, and here is what it reveals:

• (2:40 p.m.)

A staggering document

—Unemployment: 20 per cent—employment reduced by 18 per cent—

—the lowest salaries—brain drain

—1,000 people have left the Saint-Hyacinthe area —serious anemia

If a city or a region is to experience continued prosperity, it is necessary for new industries to come and settle there.

I have on hand a table of the industries that went into operation and folded up in the period from 1964 to March 1970. A total of nine new industries settled in Saint-Hyacinthe and they created 153 new jobs. During the same period, nine industries closed shop depriving the area of 484 jobs. We are therefore short of a great number of jobs.

From 1945 to 1970, the number of jobs at the Goodyear Tire Co. went down from 1,250 to 400. According to my information, this number will be further reduced. At Yamaska Shirt, there were 300 employees in 1945; today there are only 75. Penman's had 700 employees in 1959; it has 325 today.

Just a few weeks ago, 30 workers were laid off at the Volcano Ltd. plant. Last week, Penman's laid off 50. Casavant Frères also laid off some workers. Goodyear Tire has, I believe, fired 147 workers recently.

If that is not a sufficiently sad picture of what is happening in the town of Saint-Hyacinthe and the adjacent area, I wonder what is needed to stir up the ministers whose responsibility it is to do something to solve the problem.

I have made representations to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) which were, I repeat, supported by the bishop of Saint-Hyacinthe, by intermediary agencies by municipal authorities, but all to no avail.

Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate to see a minister who owes everything to the labour force turn his back on those who made him. I am anxious to have him take note of my representations which have been forwarded to me to be brought to the minister's attention.

Mr. Speaker, those people, when they belonged to the opposition, when their political "fathers" belonged to the opposition, always managed to blame the then Conservative government for the ills that existed—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired and unless he has the unanimous consent of the House, he will not be allowed to continue his remarks. Does the House agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Agreed.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I only have a few words to say before I am through.

As I was saying, their "political fathers", who were here a few years ago, blamed the Conservative government who had inherited an unemployment problem from the previous administration, and they should try to take a few minutes every day to advise the government, as they used to do in the past when they were in the opposition. They should make a point of urging the ministers to take their responsibilities and to do something for our workers who deserve better than to see their ministers turn their backs on those who "made" them.

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I have to speak in English, because I did not have time to prepare my speech in English and even less in French. I intend to discuss the main part of the motion introduced by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent)

[English]

—the central portion dealing with discriminatory authority and policies of the government.

These are, of course, big words, that are dropped now and again against a background of a biblical wrath that one fails to relate to modern language and to our modern society.

When one speaks of discriminatory policies one would also have to understand what is meant by that. It was unfortunate I was not able to be here in the morning to listen to the speech made by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). I wonder whether he considers it a discriminatory policy for manpower officials to go into federal penitentiaries and set up a training program for convicts to prepare them for the time when they will be released. There is an outstanding example of this program, at Kingston penitentiary, for instance where training is being provided in computer and business machine services. Is it discriminatory then, to provide this kind of service? Is it discriminatory to provide services for the thousands of immigrants every year who come here to settle? Is it discriminatory to offer them training for a period of six months to enable them to learn one of the two official languages of the country, thus providing them with an opportunity to better understand the new society? This policy has been devised by the department of manpower. Is it discriminatory to work out arrangements with our Indian people, in spite of all the difficulties resulting from arrangements made by other departments which perhaps do not permit such a quick approach to that type of training as one might wish, particularly in view of the weaknesses the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby indicated this morning? I think there is no question about that.

When it comes to the manpower policy of any nation, we are speaking of the philosophy underlying the approach to the development of human relations in a nation. Therefore, it provides a background against which dialogue and debate will take place as to priorities and techniques. Of course, because of this, this is one of those policies which lends itself to criticism no matter what approach you are going to take. There will never be sufficient resources in the minds of politicians when it comes to the allocation of funds for the development of the human resources of a nation.

I understand that $250 million was spent last year for the development of human resources in our country. This is three times the amount spent during the last year of the previous program, and has permitted thousands of people to be brought into a scheme of retraining. The program has increased the average earnings of trainees in one year by $16 a week over the amount they earned prior to receiving training. According to statistics, almost 85 per cent of those retrained were able to find employment right after receiving their training. Whereas 55 per cent of the trainees previously were unemployed, after training only 15 per cent could be considered to be still unemployable. So, this program has brought about a sharp decrease in the percentage of those unemployed. Is this inefficiency, as has been suggested by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby? Would an increase of $16 a week in the earning capacity of the trainees and a reduction in the unemployment figure from 55 per cent down to 15 per cent, be the result of an inefficient approach to manpower training?

What is the meaning of the big words used by the hon. member? These words should be accompanied, of course, by some selective explanations. In every system of such a broad scope there will be built-in weaknesses and there will be certain examples of problems and inaccuracies on the part of the administrative arm. But this is no reason to totally condemn the program. The criticism, of course, becomes useful when it helps the administrative arm detect and rectify the weaknesses. I presume that in his cricitism of ineffective manpower policies the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby included a lack of imagination. If so, then this should be corroborated by facts. Our experience has been to the contrary. We have seen instances in which the manpower policies have been adopted with a substantial degree of flexibility and imagination. I might cite the following examples.

In winter time there usually is a greater number of men belonging to labourers unions who are unemployed. A year ago representatives of a labourers' union approached manpower people and asked what could be done during the idle winter period to retrain some of their members. A scheme was devised whereby over a period of 12 or 16 weeks—I am not sure of the exact period—these men were upgraded within their own trades from a totally unskilled level to what one might describe as a semi-skilled or higher level. The scheme not only was successful but was repeated this winter. I would agree with the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby if he means—as I did not understand him to mean—that perhaps our manpower policies should be aimed more intensively at training people who are already employed in order to bring them to their full potential. In this way vacancies would be created at the lower unskilled and semi-skilled levels in which there are large numbers of unemployed people and members of our labour force would be moved up as their potential permitted. If this were the hon. member's suggestion, personally, I would agree with him. This is a highly desirable objective in respect of Canadian policy or the policy of any nation.

There is the question of whether the resources of the manpower department should be devoted to this end or merely to the retraining of unemployed people or divided between the two programs. I presume that would be a difficult decision for any department or any minister to make. This, however, is not what the hon. member suggested. He condemned the whole system and described it as discriminatory and ineffective. If one takes a look at the ads in the newspapers, it becomes obvious that there is developing in our country a chronic shortage of skilled people. I refer to those who have the ability to meet the increasing demands of industry and commerce. These ads continue to appear. We do not seem to be able to meet this type of demand. For the total expense of 10 cents one can carry out a survey in this respect by looking at these daily ads. It is a costly process to upgrade the training of those who are already employed in order to enable them to fulfil their potential and thus reduce the pressure on those who are most vulnerable at times of economic recession, those who become unemployed at the first signal.

Had the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby referred to the necessity for a stronger policy in respect of training handicapped people, I would have agreed with him wholeheartedly. Our agreement with the provinces in this regard requires not only close attention but also a very thorough review. In Canada there are several hundred thousand people who might be described as handicapped. These people are unable to contribute to society to their full potential because we have not yet been able to develop a comprehensive policy, federally and provincially, to bring these people into the mainstream of productive society.

I agree in some respects with the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby concerning the three-year clause. The restrictive effect of this clause can be seen in some areas, but it has very great merit in others. This is the reason, I presume, the matter stands where it has stood for some time. There certainly is great merit in leaving it as it is now in order not to encourage school drop-outs. This, however, has a negative effect in respect of our immigration policy if it is our intention, as it is, to try to attract to Canada young immigrants who have just graduated from technical schools. If upon arrival here these young immigrants could receive some type of adaptation training, they would benefit tremendously. Such training is not available at the present time, and this is one area in which perhaps this clause has a negative effect.

I would suspect that the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) could not resist the temptation of pointing at Sweden as the country whose example is so legendary that everyone has to look to it for inspiration and guidance. But I wonder whether in so doing the hon. member took the trouble to look at the inflation index in Sweden in the last 10 to 15 years during the process of economic planning which they have introduced.

It is very true that the Swedes have been quite successful in achieving a very high rate of employment, but they have done so at the expense of those who are living on fixed incomes and of those who have suffered and still do—I saw this last year when I was over there for a short visit—from an inflationary trend which is by far the highest of any western nation. All I am saying is that when we praise another system, although it is highly desirable that we look at other nations we should take the trouble to put forward all the facts.

Mr. Broadbent: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Caccia: Yes, Mr. Speaker, at the end of my speech. I do not know whether the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby took the trouble—I hope he did—to mention the necessity of a manpower policy aimed at older workers. This area deserves attention in our society which makes obsolete people who do not have the benefit of certain training.

We also see in some segments of the industry a pattern, which seems to be repeating itself, whereby certain industries are not able to remain competitive and have to close down and put out of work a high percentage of older employees. I believe this area requires our attention if only to ensure that we do at least the minimum in helping those who have not been able to secure employment so far because of limited education and a modest technical background.

In conclusion, one can only assume that the motion put forward by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby is based on isolated cases. That may be quite legitimate, but it does not give the total picture of the effect the manpower policy has on the development of the human resources of our nation. In this respect, although no politician would ever be able to say that $250 million a year is enough or will ever be sufficient, with the resources available and within the limitations that exist I think the record of the Canadian nation in the field of manpower training is pretty outstanding.

Mr. Broadbent: I will be very brief, Mr. Speaker, because other members wish to speak. The hon. member referred to the rate of inflation in Sweden. He may find in his notes which someone picked up this morning for him that this is precisely the issue about which I was talking. You have to choose between inflation on the one hand and stable prices and unemployment on the other. I admit that if you are to have an economy geared to full employment there will be some inflation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please.

Mr. Broadbent: My question is: Would the hon. member not agree that it is better to have some inflation and 1½ per cent unemployment than an economy that is geared to beat inflation and 6 per cent to 10 per cent unemployed?

Mr. Caccia: The answer cannot be as short as the question, but it would seem to me the question is based on the assumption that one policy excludes the other and that therefore we have a choice between one or the other. I do not believe it is a choice between black and white many other factors have to be taken into consideration.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, while we are wondering whether it is better to have inflation when there are fewer unemployed, or to have inflation with more unemployment, the unemployed are still without work.

Meanwhile, economic conditions are unchanged. As we talk, entire families are deprived of the necessary commodities, not only in a given region but throughout Canada.

Earlier, I heard the member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard) relate facts such as, for example, the aggressivity of Liberal members against certain ministers when the Progressive Conservative party was in office in Ottawa about the number of unemployed in Canada. Indeed, there were nearly 1 million people out of work in 1961-62 under a Progressive Conservative administration. It is true that at that time the former ministers or members were putting questions to the ministers and defying them to find jobs and pass legislation that would ensure full employment in Canada.

Today these same Liberals are in power. The Progessive Conservative members now question the Liberals who have become Cabinet members. They blame the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand), the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), all the ministers, and say: There are as many unemployed in the country as there were under our administration. Problems are as numerous. This shows therefore that the two parties are exactly alike. The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe proved it a short while ago when he stated that the government had problems in 1961. It is just as true that the government has problems in 1970. These two governments do not want to solve their problems. They do not want to do anything against a system which is responsible for the situation. Within that system nothing would be changed even if the New Democratic Party came into power. Even if the Créditistes were in power, we would be in the same dead-lock.

Some think of financing production instead of consumption. People are told to produce more, but they are also told to tighten their belts.

To increase the standard of living it is necessary to increase productivity and in a trice the wheat producers are told: We will pay you if you do not produce wheat. As far as the Quebec milk producers are concerned, they are told: we will punish you if you produce too much milk. The corn producers in Ontario are told the same thing.

And in the face of such penalties and such stagnation, our friends from the New Democratic party are presenting a motion. I forgive them however for failing to supply me with a French text, as my N.D.P. friends are not used to the French language. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) could very well have translated it as she knows French very well, but it seems that her colleague did not ask her to do it.

But here is the wording of the English motion, since English is one of the official languages in Canada.

[English]

That this House condemns the government (a) for its failure to provide a program of full employment, (b) for its discriminatory and ineffective manpower policies, and (c) for its destructive labour relations with its own employees.

• (3:10 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I will deal with part (a) since I am not so much concerned about part (b) which says:

—ineffective manpower policies—

Part (b) is linked to the first. But the first part says: The government's failure to establish or provide a program of full employment in Canada. Talk about full employment in Canada! I was told that certain members and even the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Douglas) asked the government to assist western farmers who have to cope with a wheat surplus. The solution proposed is to pay the wheat producers for not producing wheat, as there is too much of it already.

So, they are told: Sit quietly at home and we shall give you $6 per acre left idle, up to a maximum of 1,000 acres. That means $6,000 so that they will not produce any wheat. On the other hand, the members of the New Democratic Party suggest a full-employment policy.

On the one hand, assistance is requested in the form of grants so that some people will not produce and, on the other hand, full employment is advocated. Workers have jobs but we have too many products in all fields.

In the automobile industry, for instance, thousands of workers are being laid off because there are too many automobiles.

The problem is the same in the clothing and food industries: There is surplus production. Yet, at the same time, there are some who would introduce a motion to create more jobs, who would call for more production. But why produce so much? We cannot even now keep up the production in our plants because of excess goods. Yet some clamour for full employment.

Mr. Speaker, whoever advocates full employment is bluffing. It cannot be achieved if we accept automation. The only way we can achieve full employment is by setting aside science, progress, machines, development and going back to the days of the ox, small ploughs and oil lamps. Let us turn the clock 75 years back; and then perhaps, in view of our needs, we can achieve full employment. But with the use of machines, never.

That reminds me of a story I used to tell a few years ago. Some people wanted full employment and intended to fight the machine. For instance, we have seen under certain winter works projects, some municipalities keep machines and mechanical ploughs stowed away in their garages and warehouses in order to be able to give work to the unemployed in winter. The streets were cleared of snow with small shovels. Man was not smart enough to use the machine to improve the lot of man. The machine was stored and men were put to work like beasts of burden. And that was supposed to be reasonable. There will still be some in Quebec, on April 29, who will vote for the Liberals or the Union Nationale. That is good enough for them.

There was once two men around a gravel pit watching a crane loading trucks. The trucks then drove away to unload this gravel which was used for road construction. One of the two unemployed, who were both carrying their own small shovels, said to the other: "Well, joe, without big crane, you and I might get a job as well as 50 guys like us. The machine punishes us."

The other one, who was far from stupid, answered: "Well, if it is only a matter of providing employment, instead of two guys like you and me, or even 50 guys each with a small shovel, why not hire 250 men with teaspoons? They would do just the same amount of work, and everybody would get a job."

As for me, I suggest that motions or resolutions such as the one now before us are just about as sensible as the reasoning of the man who wanted to replace the machine with teaspoons.

Mr. Speaker, the machine was devised to serve man and not to punish him. There is only one answer to the problem: it is to give to those replaced by machines enough purchasing power to enable them to buy the products made by the machine. It is as simple as that. However, people do not understand yet.

In the House, they talk about increasing productivity. As concerns the unemployed, we have not determined yet how many of them there are. The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard) said a while ago that there were 540,000 unemployed, whereas I read in yesterday's newspaper that they number 653,000, while some civil servants say 438,000. Anyway, we know that there are people out of work and that, on the other hand, there are too many products; nevertheless, some would like to find jobs for the unemployed in order to increase production. That is contrary to common sense.

In 1970, our national production will be worth $72 or $75 billion. Yet Canada's national income will total only $52 or $55 billion. This means a discrepancy of $20 billion between our national income and our national production. The goods are there, but not the money.

And whenever we say that a dividend must be distributed to everybody to allow them to purchase such goods—which would allow industries to manufacture other goods, because those they had already manufactured had been sold—we are told that this would bring about inflation. However, quite the contrary would be true, and everybody knows that.

Mr. Speaker, if you go into some store to buy something and you pay cash, any merchant will grant you a discount of 15 to 20 per cent. If I buy $1,000 worth of furniture and can pay cash, I shall certainly get a discount of 20 per cent. This means that I would pay $800 for goods marked $1,000. On the other hand, if I have no purchasing power and cannot pay cash, instead of getting a 20 per cent discount, I will have to pay a 20 per cent charge, representing $200 in interest. This means that I would pay $1,200, instead of $800 for the same merchandise or a difference of $400 according to the purchasing power I have or do not have. That is called inflation.

• (3:20 p.m.)

We are not asking the government to grant a national dividend so that everyone will be rolling in money, but for a dividend based on the difference between what we produce and what we earn.

Some fear that people will become lazy. However, the unemployed who actually receive $40 a week although they have a family, or those who get welfare allowances of $125, $130 or $135 a month to support their wife and children, cannot make ends meet. They merely exist, they do not live, at a time when goods are available because stores are full of goods of all kinds.

In Montreal, Ottawa, Hull, Rouyn-Noranda, Val d'Or, Winnipeg, stores are over stocked. Nobody is afraid of not finding tomorrow something he needs. There are all kinds of things, but the only solution to the problem does not lie in production, but in consumption. Indeed, it is not a matter of producing more. Instead of insisting on full employment, why not insist on full spending, that is, on what we spend to buy what we produce. To achieve full spending, we must plan the purchasing power accordingly.

Let us not take anything away from the wage-earner, but let us pay him a dividend. The standard of living of the individual with only his dividend will naturally not be as high as that of the wage-earner, and that is normal. Indeed, if I earn $100 a week and get a $50 dividend, I will have $150, while the unemployed will only have $50.

[Mr. Caouette.]

The national dividend would be in itself an incentive to work. No citizen would refuse to earn $100 a week because he would receive a $50 dividend. And this is so true, Mr. Speaker, that the experiment should be tried. After all, if those on welfare or who receive unemployment insurance benefits up to $53 a week were told: a job has been found for you which will allow you to earn $45 a week, but if you accept it, you will no longer get your allowances or your benefits, I believe that most of them would refuse it. On the other hand, however, if they were told that they could still draw their $53 benefit and a salary of $45, totalling $98 a week, they would not refuse to work. Everyone of them without exception would be willing to work, even for less than $45 a week, were they to receive on top of that their unemployment insurance benefits.

Now this is not what is happening. If an unemployed person who is drawing benefits finds some casual work for two or three days, and tries to keep it a secret, he runs the risk, if caught, of losing his unemployment insurance benefits, in order to earn $18 or $20. Then, Mr. Speaker, he is punished. And so the man says: they won't catch me again. Before losing my unemployment insurance benefits, I will make sure I have a paying job. The Canadian legislation is to blame rather than the worker.

To come back to the point I was making, the national dividend would not encourage laziness, but would be an incentive to work. In fact, it would allow the individual to develop a creative mind. But we are afraid of that type of dividend. We are thinking all the time of production. Let us finance production! Let us finance production! And this when the consumer is unable to buy that production.

And what is the result of this? The great number of bankruptcies taking place in Canada at the present time. It also brings about economic stagnation and chaos such as we are now experiencing, as well as worries and hatred between employer and employed.

It also breeds hatred between labour unions and governments, as was seen yesterday on Parliament Hill where Marcel Pépin, Chartrand and others gathered. Are we to believe that the boys from G. Lapalme Inc. of Montreal came here for fun?

Obviously, these people do not like to do what they did yesterday. What do they want: the right to a decent and safe life. Yesterday's demonstrators all know that production of goods is abundant in Canada. Everyone knows it. Purchasing power is not great enough. Is not every dispute between management and labour essentially a question of money? As a matter of fact, discussions cover vacation leave, leave without pay, sick leave, bereavement leave, maternity leave, etc. When things are no longer going right, there is always a financial problem.

All the time, a $1 raise is asked for in order to get 25 cents, or a $3 raise to get 75 cents. More is asked in order to obtain the largest amount possible. That is what labour disputes are all about. Hatred and destruction are becoming prevalent. People no longer get along. Property is damaged, no one is safe. This is not surprising.

Meanwhile, legislation is introduced to create full employment. The demonstrators yesterday were not asking for full employment but for security and freedom. In my opinion, we can only assure security and freedom by granting citizens sufficient purchasing power to buy what they need, consumer goods, houses, cars, clothes or services, including drugs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired. Does the House agree to let the hon. member finish his speech?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): The hon. member for Témiscamingue.

Mr. Caouette: I only need two more minutes, Mr. Speaker. I thank my colleagues for allowing me this extra time. I was on the point of closing my remarks by saying that we do not suggest anything just for the pleasure of doing it.

Liberals accuse us of playing politics, of being partisans, of making irresponsible promises—

An hon. Member: We never said that.

Mr. Caouette: I see the hon. member for Huntingdon-Laprairie—

Mr. Corbin: I don't know him.

Mr. Caouette: He never said it, but someone said it for him in his riding.

An hon. Member: In the Madawaska-Victoria riding.

Mr. Caouette: Ah! Madawaska. Someone said it in his riding.

Mr. Speaker, we are not trying to play politics, we are merely suggesting a way to solve the problem.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), presently in his seat, knows very well that our suggestions are logical.

I took part in a debate with the Hon. Lionel Chevrier, at the University of Ottawa. The moderator was the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. At that time, he liked Social Credit very much.

Mr. Pepin: Its leader.

Mr. Caouette: However, on that evening, the minister told me that he was contemplated seriously the possibility of giving courses on Social Credit to his students at the University of Ottawa.

Mr. Pepin: I was also teaching marxism, socialism, capitalism, communism and other "isms".

Mr. Caouette: But at that time the minister told me that Social Credit seemed to him clearly above all these other theories.

Mr. Pepin: Above communism only.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Caouette: That evening, the minister came to see me after the debate. We talked at length without making it an issue of electoral policy. But he and I were looking for solutions to the existing problems. There was no question of fighting in Parliament or elsewhere. Therefore I sincerely believe that the government should consider with a constructive mind the Creditiste proposals whereby production will be financed through the consumers. Let us settle the case of the consumer and, by the same token, we shall settle that of production. That is quite clear.

I know that certain banks will not agree with this, although we are not suggesting at all that banks be nationalized. We know that if interest-free loans are granted to municipalities, school boards and provinces, they will eventually award contracts for the construction of hospitals, roads and public buildings to private enterprise. The contractors will be paid either by the municipality, the school board or the provincial government, but they will not keep the money in their pockets. They will go and deposit it in chartered banks. The chartered banks in turn will continue to grant loans to private enterprise, they will have more liquidity to promote the development of private enterprise, whereas the public sector will be financed direct by the Bank of Canada. It seems to me that you don't have to be able to set the Thames on fire to understand that. The hon. member for Chambly (Mr. Pilon), who is a former bank manager, has grasped this long ago.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that the solution we are proposing is sensible. We are given this afternoon an opportunity to express our views. The motion of my good friend, the member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), makes it possible for us to propose our solution. His own proposal is worthless because it is impracticable. If we are to use machines, science and progress, we will never achieve full employment. But we can, however, arrange for full spending by organizing the purchasing power so as to enable us to buy the goods, thus creating new employment, because factories will resume production. Then we shall achieve full employment through full spending. Consumption would be perfectly balanced with production and, consequently, so would be the Canadian economy.

That is what we hoped for. In my opinion, the present government can do it. I sincerely believe that the government members should take the trouble to look fully into this problem, perhaps not in the House, but in caucus or at the Cabinet meetings, because it is high time it were done. Let us not wait until it is too late. Indeed, let us not wait until bombs are placed under our seats in order to blow up the whole economic or administrative structure of Canada. Let us act while it is still time and if we assume our responsabilities right now, we will avoid the worse. I actually predict that in five years, the situation will be disastrous.

[English]

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the minister has been in the chamber for part of this debate. I am not going to give the whole picture, which was presented so well this morning by my colleague the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), but there are certain aspects of it that are especially important and which I should emphasize. I think it is important that we have people from different parts of the country to deal with this important matter.

In spite of the expectations of the people that great things would be done by this government, they are beginning to realize that in the important things the bread and butter issues, this government is showing a deplorable lack of efficiency. If there is one matter on which this government prides itself, it is the fact that it is efficient. It feels that although it may be lacking with respect to some less important points, it is impossible to find points where it is not at the height of efficiency.

However, many Canadians are coming to the conclusion that Canada simply cannot afford to continue the government's policies of creating unemployment through lay offs of public servants, cutting down public services, appeals for restraint to private industry and measures of compulsion in respect of persons with low income. All this has a tendency to create the psychology of recession—a psychology which is ill-suited to the country in which we are living. Canada has such good resources that we still have emigrants coming from other countries. Other nations still look upon us as one of the greatest treasure houses of the world.

These government policies of creating unemployment are far too costly even for a country with our resources. Throughout Canada the relief rolls are increasing. Taxpayers are becoming more and more alarmed as they see their money being used to keep people idle, people who should be working and, more important, people who want to be working and can find no opportunity to do so. In my own province of British Columbia the number of individuals and families receiving public assistance has almost doubled in the past 8 years. As the years go on, the rate increases. Today the number of people on the relief rolls is frightening, and this number is continuing to rise at an alarming rate.

The worst thing about relief is that once it is necessary for a family to accept it, the tendency is for the family to stay on relief. This applies not only to the family presently on relief but to generations which follow. In some cases we see that the third and fourth generations born into relief situations are unable to get out of that trap of poverty. The young people have no chance to escape. It is too costly to continue in this manner, not only for the taxpayers who are paying money unnecessarily and the people who want to be working, but the economic loss in productivity to our economy is staggering.

The Economic Council of Canada estimates that the loss to our economy of unused human resources is between $2 billion and $4 billion every year. Because we do not use the human resources at our disposal we are allowing this great amount of hard cash to be drained away. I do not understand how a government can claim to be managing the affairs of this country efficiently in the face of those two situations, the completely unnecessary heavy drain on taxpayers and the country having to sustain an economic loss of between $2 billion and $4 billion yearly.

The situation is even more costly from a human standpoint. Lives are being wasted on a very large scale. There is a great loss of human wealth. People are not able to use their abilities to serve their community in the way they should. What I am saying is not fantastic or unrealistic; it is a sober statement. Canada has gone to much trouble in the past to bring great human wealth and capacities from other countries to our shores. We have tried to develop good conditions for our own people. However, because of the mismanagement policies of this government in deliberately creating unemployment, these good results are being lost.

There is much talk about the need to educate people for increased leisure time. People need and have a right to leisure, but they also have a right to work. We are in danger of losing sight of this human right: it is being lost on a very large scale. People need to work; in fact, they want to work, no matter how many fancy words are used in saying that people now can live in a state where the Puritan ethic of work no longer applies.

I do not care how many fancy words are used about the development of a state approaching paradise, where no one has to work and where we can all sit around playing harps and wearing crowns, or their modern equivalent of guitars and beads. The world is not like that. Indeed, we ought not to wish for a world of that kind because it is only through work, through one's occupation, that it is possible to grow and develop. Work is one of the most valuable things there is.

Today, machines have taken away many of the more disagreeable tasks. It is up to the government to give the lead in developing other forms of work which will give people an opportunity to serve their fellow human beings in various ways. In removing the need for a great many kinds of work, machines have led to a need for new kinds of work—work in the service occupations, the human occupations such as teaching, working in libraries, in travel fields, in recreation. These new jobs need to be pioneered. This is what the government should be doing instead of firing civil servants and cutting down employment. If private business cannot do the pioneering work in providing these jobs, the government should be giving a lead.

A new approach is required. We need to create new skills and the jobs that go with them. I turn, now, to the necessity for a fresh approach to manpower policies. At present the emphasis is focused on the needs of existing employers; people are trained to fill empty slots in the existing employment picture. I am sorry the minister has disappeared at this critical moment. Perhaps he is just behind the curtain: if so, I wish he would let me know he is there because I should like to address these words specially to him.

We ought to place the emphasis in manpower training on the placement of the unemployed and the underemployed. Private employment agencies are increasingly taking over the job of finding recruits for private business. This is the case in my own province and I believe it to be the case across Canada. Our new policies ought to be built, not around industries but around people and their needs. We should be using the development incentive legislation in such a way as to assist necessary industries which can best provide jobs for people. I am glad to see the minister back in his place. I intend to repeat that sentence because he may not have heard it all. I believe we should be using the development incentive legislation in such a way as to assist the necessary industries which can best provide job opportunities on a wide scale. This is the type of industry we should encourage—new industries which will provide jobs increasingly, especially in service occupations.

In this regard I wish to make two or three comments upon shortcomings of the Adult Occupational Training Act. There is scarcely need to do more than underline what has been stated before the Senate Committee on Poverty in the course of many able and important briefs. My hon. friend from Oshawa-Whitby has mentioned one of these briefs in particular, the Frontier College brief. One from the Adult Education Association was also outstanding. There were many others briefs deserving of notice.

One of the organizations whose representatives appeared before the committee was the Unemployed Citizens Welfare Group Council from my own city of Vancouver. I want to refer to them because they drew attention to a remark which had been made by the new minister of welfare in British Columbia—it is a remark which ought to be enshrined in the records of this House as it will be enshrined in the memories of the unemployed in British Columbia. The minister said on one occasion recently that he plans to categorize all adults on welfare "so that they can be treated as human resources and kept in storage." Could anything better illustrate the typical old-fashioned approach to manpower training?

How many human beings do we keep in storage? One of the earlier speakers referred to some who are kept there in penitentiaries. Others are kept there on welfare rolls. When we keep human beings in storage we prevent them from developing, from growing, from living. I believe our manpower policies ought to be changed so that human beings are taken out of cold storage and allowed to become people with blood coursing through their veins and ideas coursing through their heads. This is impossible for far too many people under the present system.

There are three or four things in the Adult Occupational Training Act which need to be changed, as has been pointed in a number of the briefs submitted to the Senate committee. First of all, the provision that no training program can exceed 52 weeks in artificial and stultifying: it should be discarded. In effect, it cuts out everyone whose educational level is lower than grade eight, and most people whose level is lower than grade ten. I recall one hon. member raising the case of a busload of young Indian people who had been taken to a manpower training centre and who had to be sent back to their scattered homes because it was found that their basic schooling was insufficient for them to enroll. If the program were not limited to a period of 52 weeks I am sure we could begin to deal with the problems of those whose earlier training had failed to fit them for enrolment in manpower courses. As it stands, this provision discriminates against poor people, against people who have had little or no schooling. It discriminates against minorities.

The second thing to be changed in the manpower legislation is the section which lays down that a student must have definite vocational goals before he can enroll. University students coming from comfortable, middle-class homes often do not have the faintest idea of what they are preparing for in life even after two years of study. If young people from homes which provide them with all kinds of opportunities cannot decide ahead of time on a fixed goal, how can we expect people from underprivileged homes to have a firm goal before they enter these training centres? I cannot understand how this provision got into the manpower legislation.

I want to see it made possible under the manpower act for women to be considered as human beings in the full sense of the word. I want to see a provision in the act to provide that when a woman has been engaged in the domestic services of her home for three years, she shall be considered a person who has been in the labour force and is eligible for full manpower training and the vocational allowances that go with it. I am sick and tired of hearing people take it for granted that only the woman who goes out to sell ships, shoes and sealing-wax is working. The woman within the four walls of the family home looking after her husband, her children, and sometimes aged parents is working within the full meaning of the word and should be brought under the provisions of the act. This has been the objective of my bill, to bring women within the full meaning of this act.

I want to give one or two instances of just what this unamended act means in everyday life. Of many dozens of letters I have received I have picked out one that came to me a few days ago from Ottawa. You can see, Mr. Speaker, that my constituency is very much broader than Vancouver-Kingsway. This woman writes:

> I am a married woman with two young children, recently separated and with a necessity to return to work. After a 7-year absence and returning to the work force as a secretary, I find that I am categorized as a beginner (I am 38 years old). The maximum salary I could earn, even at the top of the scale, would not be enough to support myself and my family. I do not have the experience or the training to compete for a higher category position. I do, however, have the desire to learn and, I believe, the capacity, for something more challenging and less dead-end than secretarial work. However, on applying to Manpower for retraining, I was told that I must be back in the labour force for at least three years before I could be eligible (what a waste of time) and, secondly, that there are no programs offering better scope than secretarial training.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member, but I have to interrupt her because her time has expired. She may continue with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mrs. MacInnis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Since I would have been the only one today who had been refused, I am glad I was not. This woman concludes by saying that she considers this situation most discouraging and wasteful, and so do I, and I know the minister will too. Let him admit women to the labour market, which has been far too much confined for far too long to men. I am referring to the official labour market; I know there is plenty of labour outside the official labour market. I think it is high time this situation was recognized.

I should like to refer to some statements made by the executive director of the Visiting Homemakers' Association, who was speaking in Ottawa the other day. She was addressing a meeting of homemakers which was also attended by the Children's Aid Society, the Catholic Family Service and the Family Service Centre of Ottawa. At the meeting Mrs. Pincock expressed concern about Canada manpower legislation which restricts potential homemakers from receiving a training allowance if they have not been in the labour market for three years. She went on to say:

> Women who have raised their own families and who are now ready to embark on a second career are in this category, which is probably our best source of supply.

And so I believe. I believe that in neglecting the source of supply of labour that women can provide, we are cutting down our source of national production and services in a most unnecessary and alarming way. I want now to read a letter that came to me from an administrator of the manpower retraining program. Obviously I am not going to identify him or his city. The letter is dated April 2 and reads:

> Thank you so much for your persistent interest and awareness of the Adult Occupational Training Act, with special emphasis on your recent amendment, Bill C-199.
> Since 1967, thousands of women have been discriminated against because of the narrow interpretation of this aspect of the act.
>
> As an administrator of Retraining Programs, I am appalled, shocked, and angered at the manner in which Canada Manpower officials apply the numerous rigid regulations to the citizens of Canada.
> OTA students are considered less than welfare cases when it comes to medicare, compensation, pregnancy, eye glasses, nursing care, and practically all forms of medical attention.
> Candidates are continually forced into courses supposedly to meet the demands of the labour market which no one really knows, least of all, manpower officials.

Do not forget, Mr. Speaker, that this letter was written by an administrator of manpower retraining programs.

> Students are forced off courses prior to completion because time has run out on them.
> Surely in 1970, we should be big enough to admit that skill training is secondary and only education for living is the essential ingredient for personal success. Our people need new goals, broader horizons, enriched attitudes, they need to stand taller and feel personal worth and success.
>
> While we train welders, industry gears up for laser; electronics is constantly changing, and secondary skills become obsolete almost daily.
> Anything dedicated legislators can do to improve social and economic conditions for so many needy Canadians is greatly appreciated by those of us at the grass roots.

I hope the minister will be impressed by how one of his own administrators feels at the grass-roots level. I should like to conclude by saying that the motion before the House today condemns the government for policies that push people out of jobs and into poverty and then close the door to any possible escape in the form of training them for the new service jobs that are essential in today's world. I hope the minister will open that door at least a crack before this debate is finished.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I suppose it might be in order to commence my remarks by making an observation that is only less serious than the terms of the motion itself, and that is that on a topic as important as the unemployment situation in Canada, which I would have thought was the most chronic problem facing the nation at this moment, there has been at times this afternoon less than a quorum in the House and at the present time there is barely a quorum. I feel hon. members should note this fact because it reflects what is perhaps a lack of concern among Members of Parliament from all parties for the serious problems in question. Indeed, this lack of concern continues from day to day.

I was disappointed that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General (Mr. Caccia) saw fit to speak for 15 or 18 minutes and then quickly disappear. I was hoping to have an opportunity of reacting to his very pointed but narrow remarks in interpreting the motion before the House. The motion before us makes reference to the serious unemployment problem, the government's discriminatory and ineffective manpower policies and the destructive labour relations that exist in government departments.

The parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Davenport, chose to speak almost solely about that part of the motion that referred to ineffective manpower policies. He made no mention of unemployment or the psychological depression that is taking place in the Canadian nation today. Listening to other members gives me cause to wonder whether many Members of Parliament, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), top level civil servants, bureaucrats and those who make decisions on how to spend the government's $13 billion are really aware of the serious unemployment situation and the day to day problems faced by unemployed men and their families. As a matter of fact, yesterday I moved a motion to the effect that the serious unemployment situation in Canada today be referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration for discussion. Again, of course, we did not receive unanimous consent.

I wonder how many of the 20 members out of 264 who prefer to sit in the House on Friday afternoon to debate a motion such as this when most of the members are heading toward their constituencies or have been there all week, understand what unemployment is all about and what effect it has on a family.

An hon. Member: What about 1962?

Mr. Lundrigan: How many understood in 1962, asks the hon. member for Renfrew. Is it Renfrew? How many members know what unemployment is all about or what it feels like to be unemployed? Let me ask members from the interlake area around Winnipeg, from the northern areas, from British Columbia, from the slow-growth areas of Ontario, the whole of the Quebec nation—province, rather—and the east coast of Canada, when they stand up in the House and talk about employment and the effect it is having on our population, how many of them actually appreciate what this means?

When I refer to the fact that in my own province 22 per cent of the population is unemployed, I wonder how many members actually understand what that means. We have two types of people, those who are unemployed and those who are in fear of becoming unemployed. We have people who are almost ashamed that they have jobs because they are living next door to men who do not have a job, whose children are not as well dressed, fed or schooled as theirs. They are living in homes where the whole standard of living is low. Everything in relation to their standard of living is low, including the food they purchase at the corner store—at the little shops, as we call them. How many people actually understand what that means?

I sincerely feel it is a total waste of my time to stand here in the House of Commons talking about unemployment. I am talking to about 40 people. Perhaps a couple of them will take into consideration what I say. Perhaps one or two will remember a word or two of the speech of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). Perhaps another one or two will take into account a word or two of the speech of the hon member for Davenport. Perhaps one or two will remember a few words said by the Minister remember a few words said by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. MacEachen)?

I am sure only half a dozen members here have been paying attention to the business of the nation. That would be the total number of members who know what has been said in the House of Commons. I think this debate is a waste of time. If I knew of any House rule that would allow me to move the adjournment of the House so that we could just go home and call it a day, I would so move. If I knew of an appropriate motion I would move it, because I think this debate is a waste of time.

Some hon. Members: Move the motion.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, a lot of my colleagues are urging me to move that motion. If it is in order, I would move that the House do adjourn.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows that a motion cannot be made in the House without a seconder.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I so move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken).

Mr. Speaker: There is another rule the hon. member has overlooked. The motion has to be in writing.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, if the House will approve, I will put it in writing. Perhaps it is more important that I have drawn attention to this fact than that the motion be accepted. I want to use the 15 minutes which I have left. I am sure I have drawn attention to the fact that perhaps by and large it is a waste of time to be talking on this motion because there are very few ears of the Canadian nation listening.

The fact that we have a Department of Regional Economic Expansion and a Minister of Manpower and Immigration, who undoubtedly is very concerned and is making an effort, is the only saving grace in respect of what appears to be bad policy on the part of the government. A previous speaker said that the government has actually launched a program of creating unemployment. That hon. member was not coining a new phrase; as a matter of fact he was referring to a statement made by ministers of the Crown, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), and the Prime Minister himself. Obviously, they have not felt any of the effects of the anti-inflationary policy of the government, in their departments or personally. The fact is that the government itself admits that this is a means it is using in an effort to cure or offset the inflationary trends in this nation.

This is the government's policy, and the only saving grace is that we have a Department of Regional Economic Expansion and a Department of Manpower and Immigration with limited funds trying to put a little bit of molasses on a dry slice of bread. This is a policy of push-me-pull-you. We have a government deciding to go in one direction, and in order to take the sting out we have a couple of departments trying their best to offset the over-all impact.

These government departments are perhaps to be commended for the work they are attempting to do on a limited budget. I would be dishonest if I did not say that in my opinion Canadian Manpower offices have done a commendable job with a limited budget in attempting to bring the supply of and demand for labour together. Unfortunately, this effort and the manpower retraining scheme are totally ineffective in overcoming the devastating effects of unemployment. This is unbelievable, and most Canadians will not accept it. If I could speak to our 22 million Canadians today they would call me a liar if I told them 20 persons out of every 100 in my province are unemployed at this time.

As a matter of fact, I looked at the statistics for the days referred to by members from across Canada as the dirty thirties, and found that in 1935 in the country of Newfoundland—it was then the country of Newfoundland; it was not a province—16 per cent of the population was dependent upon some form of government assistance or welfare: sixteen per cent of the people were forced to accept government assistance in the form of welfare or dole. In 1970, 35 years later, after 21 years of Confederation, we have 20 per cent of the population unemployed. We have 87,000 people who depend upon some form of social assistance. This is the most chronic period of our history since 1949.

I guess I am wasting my time by relating these facts to the House of Commons. I have talked to many groups across Canada, in Alberta, British Columbia, Prince Edward Island, Ontario and most other provinces in the last couple of years. I talked to them as far back as 1965 when I spent two years in the very affluent province of Alberta. It is not as affluent today, I might add. These people continually asked me questions such as: "What do you want? We have been giving you this, we have been giving you that, and we have been giving you something else. What is it you want?" I almost began to develop the feeling as a Canadian—not as a Newfoundlander—that there was something second-class or wrong about our getting equalization payments and benefits from the federal government in order to help overcome our disadvantaged position of 1949.

Today I think I can look at the rest of Canada, if I classify myself first as a Newfoundlander, and say that it owes us a tremendous debt because we, along with people in other slow-growth areas, are now paying the full price of the anti-inflationary measures imposed across this dominion. I challenge any member of this House to stand up right now and refute those remarks. Newfoundland, with a population of 500,000, is paying a higher price as a result of the government's anti-inflationary policy than any other part of Canada.

The Minister of Finance stands up in this House, when he is here—almost once a month—and says that the government has launched an anti-inflationary policy and is laying off postmistresses and postmasters of little post offices all along the coast. He says the government has closed post offices all across Canada, that it is not going to build any more wharfs even though they are justified, it is not going to create any more manpower centres, particularly on the east coast of Canada, and it is going to lay off people in all government departments across Canada.

The minister says we are doing these things to help the people on fixed and low incomes and the seasonally unemployed. Often in this House I have said those on fixed and low incomes, as well as the seasonally unemployed are the people who are carrying the full load of the government's anti-inflationary policy. I stand here and I tell the Prime Minister that I am wasting my time. I tell the Minister of Manpower and Immigration that

I think he understands the situation but the cabinet is dictated to by three or four big cheeses who make decisions on a theoretical, book approach they have been working on for 20 years and which they now find they are in a position to implement. This, of course, has an impact on the Canadian nation.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Davenport spoke for 10 or 15 minutes and then left the House. He asked how we can implement manpower policies with the resources we have in order to offset the government's policies. Well, the Committee on Regional Development last year went on a junket out west—that is about all it was. We did not receive any evidence, but we toured the countryside and observed a number of projects. We observed the ARDA project in northern Alberta and in Edson. We looked at the beautiful New Start program in Lac-la-Biche and in Prince Albert. We visited the neglected interlake area of Manitoba which under the Department of Regional Economic Expansion had a great plan which has not materialized.

As an educator and as a person involved in a good deal of research before coming to the House of Commons, perhaps unfortunately, I was most impressed by the work done under the New Start program. This was an experimental program in which the government was looking at ways in which people at the bottom of the scale in terms of employability, training and education could be upgraded, retrained and perhaps given an injection of new hope and a change of attitude.

Many of the people involved in this program were deserving people. I remember well the Lac-la-Biche and Prince Albert experiments. After several months in this program the people involved were tremendously different. It was planned that this experimental program would be taken from the experimental stage after the research and technocratic approach and would be applied across the nation. This would have been a major program.

I would have thought, if the government were to launch the program it has now of creating unemployment, it would at the same time have tried to involve the people in a comprehensive program of retraining and upgrading so that those who are forced out of work and are on unemployment insurance and social assistance could receive a little bit of assistance from the government. If they were brought into a program of retraining, perhaps they would be in a position to fill the void in the labour market because there are many opportunities which people cannot accept due to lack of training. Such a program would have improved the over-all potential of this nation. But this was not done.

The minister will probably get up after I have finished and say I have rocks in my head and am unrealistic. I am sure, however, that the minister is unhappy with the budget he has in order to do the massive job he must do. There is not a prosperous nation in the free world in which money spent on education, retraining and upgrading has not produced great dividends. The minister knows this. There is not a single economist in North America who would disagree when I say that money put into these programs does pay dividends. When a nation can give priority to this type of program, it is an indication that it is a prosperous nation.

Mr. Speaker, I am trying to make suggestions and to be constructive. I have sufficient material that I could continue for many hours. I should like to see Parliament—not any particular minister—not announce great flowery programs but take the matter of unemployment in Canada very seriously and set up some kind of special committee aside from the committees which from time to time travel around the countryside listening to briefs and then return and spend many days listening to more briefs.

I should like to see Parliament set up a special committee to look at the unemployment picture in a very deep manner in order to obtain a clear picture of the situation. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics gives a diluted, watered-down version of the situation. They talk about an unemployment figure of 13 per cent in respect of Atlantic Canada while it is really closer to 20 per cent. People who are not on welfare or the unemployment insurance books find they are not included in many of the sophisticated statistics published by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

If a special committee were set up for this purpose, I would be willing to spend many hours as a member of that committee looking at the unemployment situation so that Parliament could have an appreciation of how devastating is this kind of situation on families and on people. It is totally unacceptable that part of Canada today—almost all of Canada—should be involved in a desperate unemployment situation and that one area should have an unemployment figure of 20 per cent. Even if I were to stand up today and become totally irresponsible in drawing attention to this matter, I would consider that to be worth while.

There is another matter on which I should like to touch. It concerns a situation that is not at all parochial. It shows the effect on the over-all economic problems when the Canadian economy is slowed down. When I was a very young Canadian, most of the people from my community and the surrounding communities would leave in the spring of the year to go to Toronto. They became expert in the construction field. They obtained seasonal employment. Many of these people became expert in lathing, steelwork and other construction activities. Over a period of time they picked up great knowledge and experience.

These people were well rewarded. They received the large salaries that were received by the people in central Canada. They would leave their small communities on the east coast to travel to the more affluent and advanced parts of Canada. Today the people in these parts of Canada cannot provide employment for their own dependants. Consequently, when employment slows down in slow-growth areas the people in those areas have to stay at home. No matter how affluent the people are, they have to tolerate the devastating effects of the unemployment situation. I want to emphasize this because it shows that what we have today is certainly not a provincial but a national problem.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I certainly do not wish to say that the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) has rocks in his head, as he suggested I might. I found his comments to be constructive and I thank him for the well-deserved reference to the members of the Canada Manpower centres in Newfoundland and the other provinces who are working at the grass-roots, and not in a theoretical or speculative way, with the problems of the people in all the communities of Canada.

• (4:20 p.m.)

I appreciate his comments about the problems of the Atlantic provinces because it is obvious to all of us that the economies of certain parts of Canada, including the Atlantic provinces, have not created inflation. But as the battle against inflation is waged, the Atlantic provinces are bound to be affected, and because they are weak areas of the country they are bound to be affected more adversely. It seems to me that the moral of the debate is that all of us have a definite interest in the success of the battle against inflation in Canada. Our long-term objective is to maintain and accelerate economic growth in the country, and no part of the country has a greater stake in long-term economic growth than the less developed parts. The long-term growth of Canada is threatened at present by inflation, and unless we succeed as a country in licking the problem, the consequences to which my hon. friend has referred will be even more apparent and more difficult.

I regret that I was unable to hear the hon. member for Broadbent—

An hon. Member: Oshawa-Whitby.

Mr. MacEachen: —the hon. member for Waterloo.

Some hon. Members: Oshawa-Whitby.

Mr. MacEachen: I am sorry—the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). I know him by his ability and his intelligence, not by his name or his constituency. Anyway, I regret not having heard his speech. I would have stayed in Ottawa had I not arranged a meeting this morning with the Premier of Nova Scotia to convey to him the official response of the government of Canada to his request for assistance in the rehabilitation of the heavy water plant at Glace Bay. That was an important decision in terms of the development of Nova Scotia and the Atlantic provinces. The amount of federal assistance in various forms is in excess of $40 million. This certainly is an indication of the interest of the federal government in supporting the provinces, and especially the weaker provinces.

The question put to the House is that the manpower policies are ineffective and discriminatory. I want to deal with the expression "ineffective and discriminatory" later, but in addition to that charge there is the general suggestion that the economic and development policies of the government as a whole are ineffective. It may be the weakness of the motion that it overstates the case. So often in the House of Commons a case is lost because it is overstated.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The minister should know that.

Mr. MacEachen: This is certainly an instance where an attack has been launched against one of the most effective and best programs in Canada, the Canada manpower training program. By implication the suggestion is made that this program along with others is not working effectively in the interests of Canada. Recently we have had several example of how this department responds in order to help the workers involved in the case of a lay-off or a technological change.

There are also training courses which go unmentioned and unsung until an error is made at a local office by an official who may have misinterpreted the directive, and then all hell breaks loose and people forget the day-to-day contributions that are being made to the people of Canada under this program.

We know of several recent examples, but let me take one or two from Nova Scotia because I started the day in the capital city of the province talking about development with the Premier. I want to mention the threatened closure of an important industry in the province, Fairey Aviation in Halifax. As hon. members recall an announcement had been made by the company that the plant would close at the end of March. Questions were asked in the House, but several departments of this government and of the provincial government had been working quietly in order to rescue that plant. The result of that quiet and effective work is that the plant has been rescued and a new operator has been secured, not by accident, not just by somebody wishing it, not by a question in the House but by the effective collaboration of three departments of the federal government. The Department of Regional Economic Expansion will provide a substantial incentive grant, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce will provide a substantial development grant, and the Department of Supply and Services will renegotiate the contract that had been in existence with the former company.

The result is that Fairey Aviation has been transferred to a new owner and there will be the possibility now of a new technology in the Atlantic provinces, a new technology centre in Nova Scotia. There will be minimum disruption in employment levels and there will be a new element in the transportation industry of Canada. That is a success story.

There is another about EMI Electronics which had decided to give up and close down. Through the efforts of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, through the efforts of my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), and those of the provincial government, that plant is also saved and will continue to operate. We hope it will be an even better source of employment to the people of that area.

We had the illustration in Toronto of the closing of the Dunlop plant. It is simple to ask questions in the House about an issue of that kind and it is relatively easy to give the answers. Fourteen manpower counsellors specially assigned to Dunlop registered all the unemployed workers. They listed their skills, they are seeking out jobs, they are examining training possibilities. They have that case well in hand. I regret it was not possible to have had the kind of economic analysis and examination for the benefit of workers that I advocated. At least we will have contributed some real input to the solution of this problem for the benefit of the workers.

I welcome this discussion of the Canada Manpower Department. We do not claim perfection, but we do claim we are making a businesslike, effective contribution with the resources available to us, to the manpower development of Canada. I will not go into the whole variety of programs that we administer in the placement field, in agricultural manpower, in student manpower, and in immigrant settlement. I will not go into manpower adjustment and manpower mobility, but I would like to talk about the Canada Manpower Program and the contribution it makes to the manpower development of the country.

In my department this year we will be spending a total of $273 million to train adult workers in Canada. I want to tell the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate that we got $25 million more for the budget this year than we did last year. We would have liked to have had more, but we were competing with other government departments for the available resources. We will be looking for more money next year, and if we have $25 million or $50 million more we could do more and train more.

Mr. Lundrigan: Are you expecting more unemployment next year?

Mr. MacEachen: I am not expecting more unemployment. The job we are doing is a necessary job in a period of unemployment. It is equally necessary in a period of economic expansion when jobs are opening up, and we have a responsibility to train adult Canadians for these jobs rather than take in people from abroad, as we do now in many cases. I think it is a good idea to encourage immigration. I simply indicate that we do take many people in from abroad to fill skilled jobs opening up in the country for which we do not have the skilled manpower. We are doing the best we can. We have increased our budget. Last year we put into courses 320,000 adult Canadians. The budget for Canadian manpower training has increased quite substantially; it has been one of the fastest growing budgets in the government over a three-year period.

The hon. lady talked about occupational goals. I do not know fully what she meant and it would require more discussion to ascertain, but we do insist that clients who come to manpower centres for expensive training and allowances, should have objectives that are related to the labour market. We want to help them get jobs and increased incomes. Unless there is a chance that they will get jobs and increased incomes we are limited in our help because our purpose is economically oriented. We are not in the field of general education. It is essential that we don't accept people because they like culture or they want to study music.

Cultural activity is fine, but our program is economically oriented and there has to be a connection between the labour market, the income prospects and the training we provide. I am sure the hon. lady will agree that that is sound philosophy.

Are we training the right people? The hon. member who opened the debate made the point that we are not training the right people. What is the test? We must train people for jobs that are available in the labour market. We do our best to assess the availability of jobs and to match the training to available jobs. That is essential. Basically, we train people who are underemployed and who are unemployed, and whose prospects for increased earnings will be enhanced. I also want to make the point that while it is basically an economic program, it has very important social and anti-poverty objectives.

In Canada we are engaged in a war against poverty, and in my judgment one of the most effective tools in waging that war is an effective manpower program which reduces dependency and which enables individuals to compete successfully on the labour market. So, Mr. Speaker, it is an anti-poverty device. What kind of people are we training? I know that in 1968 we spent about $100 million on the training of people who were poor or under the poverty line. So, we are attacking that very important element of the problem.

Then, Mr. Speaker, I want to make the point that our training is concentrated in areas where unemployment is highest. For example, we spent $55 per capita of the labour force in the Atlantic provinces in 1969-70; we spent $37 per capita in Quebec; $24 per capita in Ontario; $24 per capita in the Prairies and $20 per capita in British Columbia. As part of our deliberate policy we tilt the training to the parts of the country where unemployment is greatest. An examination of our allocation of resources will indicate that we have achieved that objective also.

In addition to the regional distribution of the funds, we attempt to spend the money in the seasonal period of high unemployment. We know that the Canadian economy is subject to seasonal lay-offs regardless of the buoyancy of the economy. We have a considerable seasonal problem and we undertake training in that period. Hon. members are worried about the extent of unemployment in the country today. They would be more worried if it were not for the large numbers in training which are four or five times greater in January, February and March than they would be in other months of the year. We think this is good business.

The hon. member may be reassured that we train mostly people who are unemployed, and it seems to me there is not a better basis upon which to make the choice if at all possible. Some 55 per cent of our trainees are unemployed when they start training. Surely one of the most important criteria for providing trainees is employment status.

The suggestion has been made that we are not getting at the really disadvantaged. We are always conscious of getting to people who are on the border of the labour market. I am not saying for one moment that we have at the present time the specialized services that will enable us to get at and service this disadvantaged group in the manner that we would like to. We have under consideration additional programs of a specialized character that we will put into place when we have the resources, but in the meantime we are making a substantial contribution to the disadvantaged, to the poor. As I say, some $100 million was spent in 1968-69 on training the poor, and proportionately there are now more people under the poverty line in training.

Are you training the poor? That question was asked. I reply, yes, we are training proportionately more of that group than of any other group in the economy. What are you doing about the lack of education classes? That is another question which was asked. I wish to tell hon. members that 43 per cent of our trainees have grade eight or less at enrolment time.

Mr. Broadbent: Forty-three per cent of the labour force?

Mr. MacEachen: Forty-three per cent of our trainees have grade eight or less when they enter the courses, yet the hon. lady said we did nothing in this field, or words to that effect. We are aware that there are people in the labour force who, to use the current expression, may be functionally illiterate—they cannot read or write; they cannot perform the elementary functions that are required to learn a trade or indeed even to get a job. We do our best and we recognize and are exploring this field more and more. We are penetrating it. We cannot fully replace the general educational system in the long term. We try to supplement it in the short term.

• (4:40 p.m.)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. I regret I have to interrupt the minister, but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Does the House give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, does the minister not have 30 minutes?

Mr. MacEachen: I thank the House for giving me a chance to finish my remarks. I will try to complete them as quickly as possible. We do attempt to get into the least schooled portion of the population.

Mr. Broadbent: Will the minister permit a question? It is a factual point on which he has made a mistake. I heard the minister say that 43 per cent of the Canadians taking departmental courses have grade eight education or less. Should that statistic not be 43 per cent of the Canadian labour force over the age of 17 have grade eight education or less?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker. If I must correct the statistic I will do so later, but my understanding about the course is that 43 per cent of our trainees have grade eight education or less on enrolment. In 1968-69, for example, we trained approximately 22,000 workers who have less than grade six education. About three weeks ago a young man in his twenties came to see me. Although he was employed as a cook, he could not read nor write. He told me how he managed to follow recipes and develop new ones. It was rather interesting, but laborious. He wants to be upgraded. This is a big problem for the federal and provincial governments. We are trying to get into this area even more than we are at the present time.

I wish to make the point, Mr. Speaker, that we do not want these training courses to become welfare schools. It is a temptation for individuals in low-income areas to take the training because of the allowance. This is not a long-term solution to their problems. Nothing will do more to discredit this program than if it is understood that it is a substitute for welfare or if it happens that trainees who complete these courses do not take jobs or improve their incomes.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, as there are only 15 minutes left in today's sitting, I wonder if the minister will permit a question at this time. I have been sitting here listening to him for half an hour. I am sure when the minister reads his speech he will be impressed to learn how long he can speak without getting down to the nitty-gritties. Can the minister indicate what new initiatives are being taken by his department in view of the fact that we have a chronic unemployment situation and that right now we have university students by the thousand? In view of the fact that his budget has been increased, is his department going to take new initiatives or will we be having a little more of the same? I would like the minister to get around to this point.

Mr. MacEachen: I do not need any help from the hon. member in making my speech because I know his help is not well-intentioned. His question is based on the fact that he is impressed with the rather important contribution the department is making. If he thought I was wasting time, he would not want me to change the nature of my speech.

This year my department is spending $273 million, a good deal of it in the Atlantic provinces. There will be hundreds of thousands of trainees. Surely it is a matter of important debate in this House to know whether this money is being spent effectively. I know perfectly well if we do not do a good job and relate these efforts to the economy, earnings and job possibilities, this program will collapse. It will not be maintained by the government, Parliament or public opinion as a welfare program. As the hon. member has said, it must have credibility. We have done two things in appraising the results of the program and we are not finished yet.

We cannot yet give the final answer. We have tried to determine whether this program is putting as much into the economy as it is taking out by way of taxes. We have run the best possible cost-benefit analysis that we could devise in co-operation with the best research agencies in treasury board. Hon. members will be glad to know there is a very positive cost-benefit result from the program. The benefit received is greater than the outlay: it is three to one. It would be better if it were ten to one or one hundred to one, but there is a very favourable cost-benefit ratio.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the minister permit a question? Is he willing to table a copy of that cost-benefit study?

Mr. MacEachen: I think someone has asked for that. There are a lot of print-outs. We will do everything we can to put this before the House in any reasonable way. I will consider that. We have made this cost-benefit analysis and we are continuing to improve it technically. We have also had a follow-up survey of our OTA graduates. The survey was conducted three months after they completed the course to see how these students had done. We have the preliminary results of this survey. They show that nearly 80 per cent of 8,000 students from the Canada Manpower Training Program were employed when surveyed three months after completing the course. Only 41 per cent were employed before the training. We will continue with further surveys to validate this information. The survey shows that the training has had a very positive result in getting these people into the employment market. What we are after is getting jobs for people.

We also wanted to determine by this survey whether their productivity and earnings improved as a result of training courses. The preliminary results show that income increased by 15 per cent, approximately $55 a month, within three months of graduation. If these courses help to get jobs for these people, keep them employed, increase their earnings and improve their situation, we can have confidence in the effectiveness of the courses. I say without any oratorical flourish but in cold truth that there is no program in the government of Canada that has been more rigorously examined from the point of view of cost-benefit analysis to determine its effectiveness. We do not think we can get more money for this expanding program unless we can demonstrate that it is effective. We cannot maintain the confidence of Parliament and the public unless it is effective. We know there will be complaints. Of course, there will be complaints in individual cases about procedure and so on. We know there are ways in which we can improve the program. We are examining this aspect all the time.

Might I turn for a moment to an important proposal for a change in the program? It is related to the so-called three-year rule. In order to qualify for allowances there has to be a three-year waiting period. At first glance, one might ask why the department does not allow a person to undertake training and receive an allowance immediately he leaves school. He would learn good habits and receive good orientation while still young. This idea has a certain appeal. But given the fact that there is a budget of $273 million this year, we have to decide as a department and as a government how the money available can be spent to best advantage. The more people we bring in, the less intensive the coverage becomes. The program was conceived as a means of helping those workers who obtained their education many years ago and who now find it insufficient and obsolete.

My colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) said the purpose of the program was to give people a second chance. We know that in Canada today there are people in their twenties, their thirties and their forties who have missed out. We know that the level of scholarship in Canada is not as high as it is in the United States. We realize that if these people are to get into the mainstream of society and compete successfully on the labour market they must receive training. We realize, too, that a heavy proportion of public funds is being spent on young people.

Some hon. members advocate removing the three-year rule. If this were done, there would undoubtedly be a heavy demand from young people for training and allowances and ultimately we should have to cut down the training available to older people. This is one of the issues which arise in terms of the allocation of resources within the system.

There are other issues concerning the relationship of the scheme to the regular educational system and to the support we give to the post-secondary education structure.

Nevertheless, I want to assure hon. members that I do not take a casual attitude toward this question. We realize in the department that whatever decisions are made will affect the pattern of training available to all members of the labour force, especially the older workers who require it most. We want to be sure we make a right decision; we do not want to shoot from the hip. At the present time a research program is going on in collaboration with the provinces on this very problem. The question has also been referred for advice to the national Canada Manpower and Immigration Council. Last June I asked the council to take a careful look at the occupational training of adults to determine whether the provisions of the program, including allowances, should be extended to groups not presently eligible. I went on to say to them:

> I would like you to do this, bearing in mind the need to maintain the present intensity of coverage of groups now included in the training program and the nature of the federal government's role in adult training.

With the help of the research program undertaken with the provinces, and advice from the national council, we shall be able to arrive at a policy on bringing additional groups into the training program, bearing in mind our wish to do the best job we can within the budget now available.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) mentioned the 52-week period. We have this matter under consideration now. We are working toward making it more flexible; our desire is to do more by way of upgrading, to go beyond the 52 weeks. This is very much in our minds and we hope to reach some decision on it. We have made some changes in our commuting allowances—

Mrs. MacInnis: May I ask the minister whether he intends to do something about removing discrimination against women?

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member puts the question in a way which I do not accept. She is speaking of a rule which is applicable to all persons, men and women, in relation to their attachment to the labour force. What she is really asking is whether we would remove discrimination—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: I do not mind the word "discrimination" here, because when you make a distinction of any kind it amounts to an exercise in discrimination. In this case it is not a discrimination against women because it relates to all members of the labour force.

Mrs. MacInnis: May I put my question more clearly? Is the minister considering declaring that women who have been engaged for three years in the labour of their homes shall be counted as members of the labour force for the purposes of the act?

Mr. MacEachen: That would imply a major policy change. Obviously, we shall consider it. The hon. lady has a private members' bill on the Order Paper in her name and she has made her case today. We shall consider it. May I conclude by thanking hon. members for raising this subject and for giving me an opportunity to expose the splendid Canada Manpower Training Program.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You have certainly exposed it.

Mr. Baldwin: Indecent exposure!

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, April 13, 1970

The House met at 2 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DOUGLAS (NANAIMO-COWICHAN-THE ISLANDS)—STATEMENTS BY MINISTERS RESPECTING AUDITOR GENERAL

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting the rights and prerogatives of Parliament. My question of privilege has to do with the statements which have recently been made by ministers of the Crown respecting the Auditor General of Canada.

On March 25, on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation national news, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) said:

—we don't regard it as being his responsibility to criticize the underlying policy involved in certain decisions. It is Parliament's responsibility and the government as approved by Parliament for deciding on the policy. We don't think it is the Auditor General's prerogative to comment on that.

More recently, on the CBC program "Encounter" on April 11, 1970, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), referring to the Auditor General, said:

He has expressed his view as to the appropriateness of some government policies. Now, in this sense he is pitting his judgment as to sound business practice, sound governmental policy, against the government, and not unnaturally you would not expect a government in every instance to agree with his judgment. I wonder myself whether the Auditor General should cast himself in this role or whether we should look for really another kind of person to be Auditor General—

No one needs to remind the House that the Auditor General is an officer of Parliament, that it is his duty to report to Parliament any improprieties or wasteful expenditures which he encounters in the pursuance of his duties. Naturally there will be times when the members of the government will disagree with the opinions expressed by the Auditor General in his report. If they disagree they have two courses of action open to them. First, if the government finds that the criticisms of the Auditor General are uncalled for and unjustified, it can place its case before the Public Accounts Committee. That is the place for the government to argue that the Auditor General has exceeded his responsibilities and has dealt with policy matters rather than expenditures. The government at that time is in a position to explain any extenuating circumstances as to why the government made expenditures which were not authorized by Parliament and not made on the basis of statutes.

The government has a second remedy open to it. If it believes that the Auditor General is incompetent and that he is incapable of interpreting his responsibilities accurately, the government can introduce a motion into both Houses of Parliament calling for his dismissal. The House at that time would have an opportunity to hear the government state its case and to make a decision on the basis of all the facts presented. These are two things the government can do.

I submit to you, Sir, that what it cannot do is harass and intimidate the Auditor General, nor bludgeon him into silence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): It seems to me very clear that the government has two choices. If it is dissatisfied with the services of the Auditor General it should introduce a motion into this House to fire him. If it does not care to do that it should contain itself, let us argue the question out before the Public Accounts Committee, and allow the Auditor General to continue his work of being the watchdog of Parliament and the protector of the public purse.

My question of privilege is that an officer of Parliament in the pursuance of his duty is being intimidated and harassed in such a manner as to interfere with the proper pursuance of his responsibilities as the Auditor General. If Your Honour finds that there is a prima facie case of privilege, I am prepared to move a motion to that effect.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands has given the required notice to the Chair of his intention to raise this very important matter by way of a question of privilege. During the last few hours I have had occasion to reflect very seriously on the point raised by the hon. member, to study precedents and look at the authors of the original decisions, and to prepare for a decision in light not only of the notice but of the arguments now presented to this House by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

The hon. member knows that the ruling which the Chair has to make at this time is a procedural one, that is, to determine whether, according to our rules of practice and precedents, in these circumstances alluded to by the hon. member there is a prima facie case of privilege. Hon. members are aware, of course, of the traditional definition of parliamentary privilege. It has been my privilege from time to time to give what I thought was the proper definition of this very important aspect of the rights, duties and responsibilities of members in both houses, and my definition has always been based on the one reported in May's Parliamentary Practice.

According to May, Parliamentary privilege is the sum of peculiar rights enjoyed by each House collectively and by members of each House individually without which they could not discharge their functions and which exceed those possessed by other bodies or individuals. Perhaps I should stress here that the reference by May is to the discharge of their functions by Members of Parliament themselves, not by an officer of Parliament or an official of the House of Commons. Thus, privilege, although part of the law of the land, is to a certain extent an extension to the ordinary law and an exemption in a way from the ordinary law of the land. In the words of the learned author, it is when these special and exclusive rights of members appear to have been impeded that a prima facie case of privilege, and a motion founded thereon, can be considered either by the House or by a committee.

Is criticism of an official responsible to Parliament, such as the Auditor General, in the terms allegedly used by the President of the Treasury Board or earlier by the President of the Privy Council, tantamount to a breach of parliamentary privilege?

In attempting to answer this question one must remind hon. members that if it is the conduct of a minister or ministers of the Crown that is under question, then the matter can be considered by this House only by way of a substantive motion. I do not believe this is what the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands had in mind. But if this were the approach he presented to the House and if he wanted to bring before the committee on Privileges and Elections the conduct of members of the government or individual members of this House in respect of the Auditor General's discharge of his responsibilities, then this could be done only by way of a substantive motion.

Hon. members are aware of the well-known decision of Mr. Speaker Michener reported in the Journals of the House of Commons for June 19, 1959 at pages 581 and following, which I think is relevant and has been quoted by subsequent Speakers on numerous occasions. If it is a grievance which the hon. member has against the administration, then the matter might be raised more properly by way of a censure motion against the government.

The third point I should like to propose for the consideration of hon. members has been made in a sense by the hon. member himself in his presentation of a moment ago. It relates to the fact that the Auditor General's report is now before the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. It may well be that the Committee on Public Accounts rather than the Committee on Privileges and Elections is the proper forum for the consideration of the matter raised by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. This, I would think, is a conclusion to which I would like to come. All things considered, and without in any way minimizing the importance of the matter raised by the hon. member, I do not think it should be considered by the House in the form of a question of privilege.

[Mr. Speaker.]

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

AUDITOR GENERAL

CRITICISMS BY MINISTERS—REQUEST (MR. BALDWIN) FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I intend to ask unanimous consent under Standing Order 43 for the purpose of putting a motion to the House. In doing so I am fortified by the excellent presentation by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) who has laid the first foundation for my motion.

The continued attacks on the Auditor General in the exercise of his duty by members of the government, including the statements made by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) in a television interview on April 11, constitute an unprecedented and arrogant threat to the Auditor General which would result in limiting supervision of the spending of the taxpayers' money. Without the means and opportunity to defend himself, the government should not stoop to attacks of this kind which weaken the position of the Auditor General and his effectiveness in dealing with the public accounts of Canada. If they are satisfied that he is in breach of his duty they have a remedy under the Financial Administration Act.

I therefore ask leave to put the following motion:

That this House regrets the continued attacks by members of the government on the Auditor General of Canada who, in the exercise of his duty, has justified the confidence of the House by making annual reports to Parliament without fear or favour.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Peace River. The motion can be put at this time for consideration by the House if there is unanimous agreement. I must ask whether there is unanimity.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Since there is not agreement the motion cannot be put.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. Diefenbaker: Trampling on the rights of Parliament!

An hon. Member: The just society!

CRITICISMS BY MINISTERS—REQUEST (MR. KNOWLES, WINNIPEG NORTH CENTRE) FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I too rise to ask for the consent of the House to make a motion under Standing Order 43. The Standing Order reads as follows:

A motion may, in case of urgent and pressing necessity previously explained by the mover, be made by unanimous consent of the House without notice having been given under Standing Order 42.

The explanation I wish to give is very brief. The situation which has been the subject matter of the last two interventions is a very serious one, but there is something we can do in a moment to resolve it. I ask that when the Prime Minister hears my motion he request those on his side of the House not to object to its being put.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Aiken: What about the Prime Minister?

Mr. Diefenbaker: What a hope!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I accept your ruling, sir, that there was not a question of privilege as privilege is defined, but by unanimous action the House can do something to resolve the situation. I respectfully request that consideration be given to the granting of unanimous consent, and on that basis I move:

That this House reaffirms its confidence in Mr. Maxwell Henderson as Auditor General of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fairweather: What about that, boys?

An hon. Member: Say "no".

Mr. Speaker: I will not make a ruling at this time on whether it is in order according to the Standing Orders to have more than one motion on the same subject under Standing Order 43. I have never seriously considered the point, and this would not be an appropriate time to make that kind of ruling. With this reservation I will accept the motion proposed by the hon. member from the procedural stand point, and ask whether the House gives unanimous consent under Standing Order 43 for the motion to be put now?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is no unanimity and therefore the motion cannot be put.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is there not some way for those who said "no" to identify themselves?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister is included.

An hon. Member: The hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth rises in his place.

Mr. Bell: Make him a Parliamentary Secretary.

Mr. Trudeau: Maybe even a minister.

An hon. Member: Give him a judgeship.

PUBLIC SERVICE PERMANENT AND CASUAL EMPLOYEES

Question No. 732—Mr. Coates:

1. What was the total number of permanent employees in the Public Service of Canada at the time that the Prime Minister announced the government's austerity program?

The following figures are approximate gross expenditures by CBC English and French-language services for U.S. program purchases, the cost of which was recovered, with minor exceptions, through commercial revenue. APPLICATIONS RECEIVED FOR LICENCES FROM PATENT COMMISSIONER

Question No. 1,385—Mr. Saltsman:

1. What applications have been received under the Revised Patent Act for licences from the Patent Commissioner to manufacture or import and sell patented drugs up to the end of February, 1970?

2. What applications have been approved or refused by the Patent Commissioner?

3. What reasons were given for those drug patent applications that have been rejected?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): 1. Up to the end of February 1970 the Commissioner of Patents has received, under the Revised Patent Act, 62 applications for licences, of which 5 are applications to manufacture and sell patented drugs, and 57 are applications to import and sell patented drugs.

2. The Commissioner has issued to Micro Chemicals Limited of Toronto, Ontario a licence under patents registered in the name of Hoffmann-La Roche Limited to manufacture and sell the drug Diazepam. The Commissioner has issued detailed decisions to grant licences to import and sell drugs on five applications, as follows: (1) To Novopharm Limited of Scarborough, Ontario, a licence under patents registered in the name of Hoffmann-La Roche Limited to import and sell the drug Chlordiazepoxide Hydrochloride. (2) To Frank W. Horner Limited of Montreal, Quebec a licence under patents registered in the name of Hoffmann-La Roche Limited to import and sell the drug Diazepam. (3) To Sterilab Corporation Limited of Rexdale, Ontario a licence under a patent registered in the name of Etablissements Clin-Byla to import and sell the drug Acepromazine Maleate. (4) To Sterilab Corporation Limited of Rexdale, Ontario a licence under a patent registered in the name of Chas. Pfizer & Co. Inc. to import and sell the drug Oxytetracycline Hydrochloride. (5) To Novopharm Limited of Scarborough, Ontario a licence under a patent registered in the name of Chas. Pfizer & Co. Inc. to import and sell the drug Oxytetracycline Hydrochloride.

The Commissioner has so far refrained from issuing these 5 licences because his jurisdiction to grant licences to import and sell patented drugs has been questioned in an action before the Supreme Court of Ontario.

The Commissioner has decided to grant interim licences to the applicants in the first three of the above-listed applications. These interim licences will be issued in the course of the next few days when the applicants have complied with the statutory requirement to file a guarantee bond with the Commissioner.

Processing of all applications is being proceeded with as quickly as possible so that compulsory licences in all appropriate cases will issue automatically when the courts decide the Commissioner's jurisdiction to do so is upheld.

3. The Commissioner has refused to grant to Sterilab Corporation Limited of Rexdale, Ontario, a licence to import and sell the drug Hydrocortisone Sodium Succinate under a patent registered in the name of the Upjohn Company, for the reason that Sterilab's application failed to meet the statutory requirements. Sterilab later filed a corrected application, which was accepted for consideration.

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): 1. Lili Bay, The Narrows, and Steep Rock.

2. Nil. Through an editing error the Department's Annual Report indicated that these parks had actually been established, whereas it should have indicated only that preliminary investigative work was done and a decision taken that parks should be developed at these sites. Since the preparation of the report, there has been a further decision that work on the parks will not be done as a part of the Interlake Fred Plan but will be carried out by the provincial government in the future.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

AUDITOR GENERAL

CRITICISMS BY MINISTERS—REQUEST FOR EXPRESSION OF CONFIDENCE BY GOVERNMENT—SCOPE OF FUNCTIONS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether, in light of criticisms of the Auditor General made outside the House by members of his government, he could indicate that his government has confidence in the Auditor General and, if his answer is yes, will he request the members of his government to stop expressing non-confidence in the Auditor General?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the government has confidence in the Auditor General. Within his terms of reference he is a watchdog—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Who does the interpreting? The Prime Minister?

Mr. Trudeau: —over government spending. We find that this is a very important function, but of course when the Auditor General embarks upon the area of criticizing government policy we feel he is impinging on the rights and duties of the opposition, which perhaps they do not fulfil very well.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, knowing that the President of the Treasury Board was a deputy minister when a former Auditor General found some fault with some horses on the payroll I can understand the sensitivity about the matter, but I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether the view expressed by the President of the Treasury Board that it would be preferable to have another kind of person as Auditor General constitutes government policy?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker. Assuming that that is a correct quotation, I cannot say that this is government policy. I would assume that if that was said it might be interpreted to mean we want another type of function fulfilled by the person who is fulfilling the job now, not some other person.

Mr. Stanfield: One final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether these statements by the President of the Treasury Board and the President of the Privy Council, and the refusal of the Treasury Board to grant the salary classifications requested by the Auditor General for members of his staff so that he can retain the kind of staff he feels he needs to satisfy his obligations to this House, all constitute deliberate harassment of the Auditor General with a view to provoking his resignation?

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Auditor General has a thick enough skin that he would not call this harassment.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister the following question: would he or any other member of his cabinet undertake to make a statement to the House indicating in what way and in what respect the Auditor General has gone beyond the authority given to him under the relevant statute? In view of the fact it is important that the Auditor General perform his duty without any cloud over the way in which he performs it, I therefore ask the Prime Minister whether he would have the courage and the courtesy to tell Parliament and the people of Canada in which respect the Auditor General has exceeded his jurisdiction?

Mr. Trudeau: As stated in those terms, Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if the government feels it should be the sole arbiter and interpreter of what are the functions and duties of the Auditor General, who is an officer of Parliament and not of the government?

Mr. Trudeau: Obviously not, Mr. Speaker. The Auditor General is responsible to Parliament and it will be for Parliament, in the way it desires, to judge his conduct. That will take place in due course. Government members are also Members of Parliament. The opinions as related to me which were expressed by the two ministers of the government had to do not with the function of the Auditor General in checking the accounting procedures of the government with a view to certifying whether or not they are honest and adequate and whether they are proceeded with with proper probity, but with that other function, that of criticizing policy, that of criticizing government decisions, which I think is not one for the Auditor General but for the opposition.

Mr. Baldwin: He has never criticized policy.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As the Prime Minister has indicated that the Auditor General has criticized government policy and as the words used by the Auditor General which have been criticized by the President of the Treasury Board and by the government House Leader did not indicate any criticism of government policy, would the Prime Minister indicate what policy the Auditor General is accused of condemning?

Mr. Trudeau: When the report comes before the proper parliamentary place we will be delighted to answer that type of question.

Mr. Hees: He has not criticized any government policy. You just don't like your expenditures being criticized, that's all.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe the hon. member for York South was deprived of his opportunity to ask a supplementary question.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister in answer to my earlier question about him or some other member of cabinet making a statement to the House regarding the way in which the Auditor General exceeded his jurisdiction have a negative answer. He said he would not do it. May I now ask the Prime Minister whether he would advise the President of the Treasury Board to appear before the Public Accounts Committee and give to that committee the basis on which he made his attack on the Auditor General?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: May I also ask the Prime Minister whether he would consider it right for the Auditor General to reply in kind, as in my opinion he has every right to do, to the President of the Treasury Board?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has misinterpreted his own question. The question was whether I had the courage to do such a thing and my answer was that I did not answer this type of question.

Mr. Lewis: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Prime Minister, without any such adjective—I am not interested in playing games with him—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: You like to play them alone.

Mr. Lewis: I say, Mr. Speaker, that I am not interested in playing games with the Prime Minister. I ask the Prime Minister whether he or the President of the Treasury Board or any other member of cabinet will make a statement either before the House or before the Public Accounts Committee indicating the ways in which they accuse the Auditor General of having exceeded the jurisdiction given him by Parliament?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not know the need for this. The report of the Auditor General has already been referred to a committee of Parliament and, of course, if the committee wants to hear the President of the Privy Council or the President of the Treasury Board they can ask them to testify on this and other matters.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister and members of government are putting their own interpretation on the scope of the duties of the Auditor General. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether it is not true that for some time the Auditor General has been pressing the government to introduce legislation to strengthen the office of the Auditor General and to define, presumably precisely, his duties? I should like to ask the Prime Minister why, instead of proceeding with this legislation, he and his ministers prefer to pick at the Auditor General and undermine his prestige and authority?

Mr. Trudeau: It is not a question of either/or, Mr. Speaker. We believe that we will be able to do both. We hope the legislation will be introduced before the end of this session.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Justice. Has the Prime Minister or any other member of cabinet asked the Minister of Justice to have the legal officers check into the facts and law to see if the Auditor General has in fact and in law exceeded his jurisdiction as stated by the Prime Minister?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, that is a fairly difficult question for me to answer under the rules.

Mr. Hees: You mean the rule whereby the Prime Minister says "shut up".

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I should like to reshape the question. I am not asking a question of law, and I ask the Minister of Justice to reconsider the question. Has the Prime Minister or any other member of the government asked the Minister of Justice to ask his legal officers to determine under the statute whether the Auditor General has exceeded his legal authority in the statements he made?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I would think, Mr. Speaker, that not only is the content of any advice of the law officers of the Crown given to the Prime Minister or any other minister of the Crown privileged, but perhaps it is also privileged as to whether that advice has been sought or given.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I do not think I quite understood the full import of the latter portion of the statement of the Minister of Justice. Is he saying that the opinions of law officers of the Crown are not available to the House of Commons? Only a few days ago did he not speak about a couple of bills before Parliament and say they had been declared to be within the power of Parliament?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Annapolis—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the answer is given by silence because it is a fact. Now I ask the Prime Minister, as he smiles and sneers at Parliament in a way that he has not exceeded at any time in the past, what was the purpose or reason for including the word "honest" in referring to the conduct of the Auditor General? Were his criticisms honest? Is an opportunity to be had in order to have the matter brought before the House of Commons? Is there any suggestion in the use of the word "honest" that the criticisms are only considered dishonest because this government does not like them?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am sure if the right hon. member will check Hansard, he will see that I referred the word "honesty" to the accounting procedures of the government. I said that was the function of the Auditor General. One of his functions was to check into the honesty of government accounting. As far as I know he has no reproach to make on that score.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, does the Prime Minister consider that an independent officer of the prestige and position of the Auditor General should never criticize the almighty goodness of this government?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Annapolis Valley has a supplementary question and then perhaps we can go on to another subject.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of Information Canada. In view of the remarks he made over the weekend in Toronto—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is this a supplementary question?

Mr. Nowlan: Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is very much a supplementary question. In view of the remarks the minister made that Information Canada would open further the doors and windows of government, would the Minister without Portfolio check with the President of the Treasury Board and talk to his colleagues so that they do not close the door on the Auditor General?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): Glad to, Mr. Speaker.

BASIS OF GOVERNMENT CRITICISMS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Is the government's contention that the Auditor General has invaded the field of government policy based on the Auditor General's criticism of the government for paying out over $180 million to the automobile companies by Order in Council because these companies could not comply with motor vehicle tariff order No. 1965? Is this the basis of the government's criticism? Does the government consider this to be an invasion of government policy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think that this is an area of government policy. It may be that government policy is not right or is not effective or appropriate, in which case we hope that we will be criticized roundly by the opposition. But it seems to me that this is an example where there is a criticism of policy and not of honesty or procedure.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some serious doubts whether we are not now entering the field of detailed debate on this important matter. I hope that hon. members will not suggest that we should, at this time during the question period, go into a detailed study of the Auditor General's report.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me this is a very important point and the government ought to explain its position. I would ask the Prime Minister if I understood him correctly to suggest that the Auditor General is acting improperly in criticizing the government for spending money without any statutory authority by Parliament?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Does the Prime Minister not agree that the functions of the Auditor General are those set out in the Financial Administration Act and not those given to him by the government?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again I would suggest that we are embarking on the field of debate. I suggest that we recognize the hon. member for Hillsborough.

POST OFFICE

MONTREAL POSTAL DISPUTE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PRESENT POSITION

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister dealing with the Montreal postal dispute. Considering that the government's imposed deadline is almost upon us, can the Prime Minister advise whether there has been any recent change in the government's position? I ask this today particularly because of the widely disseminated weekend reports that two of his ministers had gone to Montreal to advise the CNTU to hang on.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, there is no change in the government's policy. It is being explained to the members of the union as clearly as possible. We hope they will accept it. As to the latter canard, I have no knowledge of it. If any ministers were in Montreal, it certainly was not for that function.

CRIMINAL CODE

ABORTION—INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER AMENDMENT

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. In view of the legislation just passed in the State of New York making abortion a private matter between the pregnant woman and her doctor, is the minister considering amendment of the Criminal Code to bring about a similar situation in Canada?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Not imminently, Mr. Speaker, although we are reviewing the statistics pursuant to the recent amendments to the Criminal Code.

Mrs. MacInnis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister take an early opportunity to outline on motions the government's policy for removing the discrimination between Canadian women who can afford to go to New York for an abortion and those who cannot do so?

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DEVELOPMENT OF ABM SYSTEM—SUPPORT FOR MORATORIUM REQUESTED BY U.S. SENATE

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the resolution passed last week by the United States Senate in which they asked the President of the United States to announce a moratorium on any further developments of the ABM system before the re-opening of the SALT talks in Vienna, would the minister state whether he has approached the U.S. government and backed up the resolution of the U.S. Senate on this matter?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it would not be appropriate for the Canadian government to support the actions of a legislative body in that way. I can assure the hon. member, however, that we have been working as effectively as we can to bring about the success of the SALT talks and, of course, on part of those talks depends the question of whether we can stop the proliferation of these massive weapons of destruction.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

SPECIAL AREAS—SIGNING OF AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Is he in a position to tell the House when agreements will be signed with the provinces on the new special areas program announced in the House last month?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the answer last time was very, very soon; now it is very, very, very soon.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The agreements were to have been signed by April 1. May I ask the minister—if he does not agree that this is a very serious matter, the provinces concerned do—if it is his intention to have these agreements signed before the estimates are reported back to the House so that the standing committee may have the opportunity to examine the agreements?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I hope the agreement will be signed very soon. It is a mere formality as there is complete agreement between the parties.

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SPREAD OF WAR IN SOUTHEAST ASIA—RECONVENING OF CONFERENCE OF GENEVA ACCORD POWERS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding the suggestion by the government of France that the Geneva Accord powers might be reconvened in the hope that it might be possible to stop the spread of the war from Viet Nam into the neighbouring countries of Cambodia and Laos? Has the government of Canada made any representations to the joint chairmen of the Geneva Accord powers, Great Britain and the Soviet Union, with a view to using our influence to have that conference reconvened for the purpose the French government outlined?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. We have not taken action of that kind. When I was in France the Foreign Minister of that country brought to my attention the initiative being taken by France. Since that time we have had it under consideration to see whether it would be useful for us to support that initiative, but I do not think the multiplication of initiatives will achieve anything.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As a member of the International Control Commission Canada has played a role in the situation in southeast Asia. Has the government considered favourably adding Canada's voice to those who are seeking to have the Geneva Accord powers reconvened?

[Translation]

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

PROPOSED CREDIT RESTRICTIONS—ACTION OF CERTAIN FURNITURE DEALERS

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Some time ago, the Minister of Finance announced in his budget speech that steps would be taken, probably during the present session, in view of restricting credit to consumers who make purchases on the instalment plan.

Could the minister tell us whether he is aware of the spectacular advertising now being presented by certain furniture firms, inviting their customers to anticipate the legislation, and could he make inquiries in order that consumers may be protected in this regard?

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of some such advertising in British Columbia; I am not aware of any such advertising in the province of Quebec. I would appreciate it, if the hon. member has copies of it, if he would send one to me.

INFORMATION CANADA

SELECTION OF CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEE FROM AN OPPOSITION PARTY—INDEPENDENT REPORT TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister without Portfolio responsible to the House for Information Canada whether, when the appropriate committee of the House is established, he contemplates recommending or is prepared to recommend that the chairman of that committee be selected from one of the opposition parties?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I have the right to make any such recommendation. I think the estimates of Information Canada have already been referred to a committee and the committee can call for the examination of those estimates at any time.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the importance of Information Canada and the concern that many in the House and outside have about it, would the minister be prepared to recommend the establishment of an official corresponding to the Auditor General, an ombudsman, if one likes, along the lines recommended by the task force, with particular reference being given to his making an annual independent report to the committee on the work of Information Canada?

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, that in particular, was not recommended by the task force, but I would be glad to have any suggestions from the Leader of the Opposition or other members as to how this review might take place. I am not sure that an information ombudsman would be more effective in the ongoing criticism of information services than would be the work of the media or the opposition. I would certainly be willing to consider any suggestions the Leader of the Opposition might have in this regard.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I have made a suggestion. Will the minister accept it?

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, if I understood the suggestion and exactly what it meant, I certainly would consider it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanbury: But I should like to know more about how this person might be appointed and what his function might be before I would want to give any answer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST FOR APPEARANCE OF DIRECTOR BEFORE COMMITTEE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, the Minister without Portfolio could not understand what the Leader of the Opposition said.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is no tribute to his understanding.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I want to ask a very simple question and I hope he will understand the significance of it and give an answer. In view of the widespread allegations and the criticisms being made of Mr. Gagnon—

An hon. Member: By the Tories.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —would the minister have him come before the committee and place before that committee a biographical sketch of himself?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): It is surely up to any parliamentary committee to summon the witnesses it would like to hear and question them as it felt appropriate.

An hon. Member: Don't be so innocent.

[Mr. Stanbury.]

IMPLEMENTING OF THIRD RECOMMENDATION OF TASK FORCE

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Is it the intention of the government to implement the third recommendation of the task force on government information that the information policy suggested by that task force be referred to a committee of Parliament—not merely the estimate in this regard which will come before parliament on May 18?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): I do not think the hon. member has quoted correctly from the report. The third recommendation has been accepted in principle by the government, as was stated by the Prime Minister some weeks ago. The way in which it might be implemented has yet to be worked out. I would appreciate suggestions from hon. members as to how this might be done. I believe the committee should consider the whole question of government information services and how they might be made more effective.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—ROLLING BACK OF TINPLATE PRICE INCREASES

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): My question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It is based on the report that price increases affecting tinplate will lead to an increase in the price of containers which will, in turn, raise prices to consumers purchasing food and beverages packaged in those containers. This situation is foreseen by the Prices and Incomes Commission, and I should like to ask the minister whether he intends to approach the steel companies and ask them to roll back the price of tinplate?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): For the time being the contents of the report are being considered by several departments. They will study it before anything is done.

Mr. Saltsman: Can the minister tell us when this examination will be concluded and when he is likely to be in a position to report to the House as to the action he intends to take?

Mr. Basford: Within a day or so, Mr. Speaker.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON INTEGRATION OF DEPARTMENTS OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would he take the first opportunity on motions to outline to the House what he had in mind when he said in the course of a CTV interview last night that he endorsed the integration of the operations of his department with those of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that the regular way to inquire about statements made outside the House is to ask the leader of the government whether those alleged statements represent government policy. Perhaps the question might be phrased in those terms.

Mr. Hees: Very well, Mr. Speaker, I shall bow to your ruling and ask the Prime Minister—after his rapid consultation with the minister concerned—whether his colleague was voicing government policy when he made the statement to which I have referred?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, an attempt is being made by the government through its officials to study this matter and come to grips with the question whether or not it would be useful to integrate government personnel working abroad. We have no set position on it yet. The Secretary of State for External Affairs was posing the question and indicating one of his views as to the way in which it might be answered, but there is no firm government policy on this yet.

BROADCASTING

EFFECT OF CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION COMMISSION REGULATIONS ON FREE PUBLICITY FOR CHARITABLE ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a question for the Secretary of State, Mr. Speaker. Will the Secretary of State investigate complaints sent to members of this House by the Canadian Red Cross, the United Appeal Association and other charitable organizations with respect to regulations by the CRTC which will allegedly come into effect tomorrow and, if he thinks it advisable, will he take appropriate action? It is complained that these regulations would almost completely eliminate the free publicity at present being given by radio stations to these voluntary public service organizations which are so essential to the health and welfare of Canadians.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): In the opinion of the CRTC, Mr. Speaker, the probable result of these new regulations will certainly not be as described by the hon. member. If he wants to know the reasons for these proposals, the document in which they have been explained by the CRTC has been made public and he can obtain a copy anytime he wants.

I should like to add only that when the CRTC announces certain proposed regulations, that is the same thing for the Commission as a white paper for the government. This is why such an announcement is inevitably followed by hearings open to anyone wishing to voice objections against proposed regulations.

[English]

Mr. Nesbitt: In view of that reply, perhaps the minister could tell us why the Red Cross and the United Appeal Association of Canada take a view of the regulations different from that taken by the government.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

STATUS OF CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION COMMISSION PRONOUNCEMENTS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Did I understand from the minister's answer that the pronouncements of the CRTC are to be considered as a white paper on broadcasting policy by the government?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Not the pronouncements nor the decisions. I think the hon. member did not hear me well. Guidelines on programming have now been published by the CRTC and arrangements have been made for a hearing on the 16th. Obviously, since there is to be this hearing, we are not dealing with provisions which have been permanently adopted by the CRTC but with the general direction of their thinking on the basis of the studies they have been conducting. The commission has indicated that anybody in the country, particularly, of course those who are directly interested who wish to do so, can have a full day in court to tell the CRTC that it is not going in the right direction. I should not like to leave the House with the impression that when a document of that nature goes out from the CRTC, that is the end of it. Exactly the opposite is the case. Opinions can be heard with regard to the projected guidelines which are proposed by the CRTC.

Mr. Nowlan: In view of the far-reaching implications of some of the pronouncements and proposals of the CRTC concerning Canadian content, which will be the subject of the hearing that starts tomorrow, would the minister use his good offices to have the CRTC attend before the Committee on Broadcasting after these hearings have been completed in order to explain these proposals before any final decision is made?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, I can say the CRTC does not need any encouragement from me in that regard. Indeed, representatives of the CRTC promptly accepted any invitation of the Parliamentary Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts to appear before it. Furthermore, they have always been happy to do so.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVES ACT

INQUIRY AS TO INCLUSION OF TOURISM

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Is the government considering the introduction of amending legislation this session so as to include tourism under the Regional Development Incentives Act?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): No, Mr. Speaker.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

CORNWALL—CONSIDERATION OF INCLUSION IN SPECIAL AREAS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I have a question, Mr. Speaker, arising out of a question asked a moment ago. Two or three weeks ago I raised a question concerning Cornwall. Cornwall has now been described as "Canada's worst job-depressed city" and it is stated that in the tri-county area of Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry the picture is no brighter, with 13.7 per cent of a labour force of 30,000 currently out of work. In these circumstances has the minister or the government given further consideration to the inclusion of Cornwall under the provisions of the recently announced plan?

[Mr. Pelletier.]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I know that my deputy minister visited Cornwall a few weeks ago and that this is a situation which we are following very seriously.

Mr. Stanfield: A sort of vice-regal visit.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): If the right hon. gentleman is speaking about unemployment figures, I can produce many other cities in Canada where unemployment is more serious than that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: We know that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that was the greatest admission that we have had from the government, that unemployment in Cornwall has soared to 20 per cent. There are a lot of other cities that are worse, replies the Minister. We thank him for that revelation.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

PUBLIC SERVICE

TORONTO—LAY-OFF OF PUBLIC WORKS EMPLOYEES

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. Is the minister aware that the Toronto district of his department is currently laying off some 19 people with seniority ranging from 5 to 10 years? If the minister is not aware of this, would he investigate the situation and report back to the House in the near future?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, there were some projected lay-offs of employees in all departments of government; I think my total was 37. If the hon. member now tells me that there are 18 or 19 employees being laid off, they are probably included in the 37. We have told these people that they will have priority for returning to the department when we require them.

POLLUTION

WATER—ADMINISTRATION OF CONTROL

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the provisions of Bill C-204, which was given first reading on Friday and which effectively passes control over water pollution to the Department of Fisheries and Forestry, has a policy decision been made that administration of water pollution control in Canada should be given to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. Control is divided between the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who is responsible for the application of the provisions of the water act, and the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry.

Mr. Aiken: A supplementary question. Might I ask the Prime Minister which of these ministers is responsible in the case of a conflict between inspectors under the two acts?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will give me an example of a conflict I will answer his question.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

TIME OF SECOND READING OF BILL AMENDING FISHERIES ACT—PROPOSED ITEMS TO END OF APRIL

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the House Leader with respect to Bill C-204 amending the Fisheries Act. In view of the importance of this measure, could the minister predict when the bill might be considered for second reading?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, this is among other bills which are awaiting second reading stage and to which we should like to give priority as soon as possible. We very much hope that the debate on the amendments to the Criminal Code can be finished this afternoon and that the Canada Grains Act can be moved ahead, along with the National Farm Products Marketing Council legislation and the two bills dealing with sovereignty over adjacent seas. In other words, we hope that by the end of April all of these bills will have completed second reading. With any luck at all, and with the best of co-operation, perhaps we could call Bill C-204 for consideration next week and have it forwarded to committee at that time.

Inquiries of the Ministry

GRAIN

SUGGESTED PAYMENT TO ALL WESTERN GROWERS INSTEAD OF SUMMER-FALLOWING

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that western farmers had indicated before the government's wheat acreage reduction program was announced that they intended to reduce wheat acreage to 18.5 million acres and are showing a reluctance to reduce acreage further by the doubtful farm practice of once again summerfallowing, as advised by the government would the minister consider an alternative method of assisting the farmers to reduce wheat acreage, such as making a payment available to all western grain growers?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the program that we have announced is in fact available to all western grain growers. It must be borne in mind that the statistics that were published by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, I think on March 18, were based on replies that they received from individual farmers prior to the date on which operation LIFT was announced. We are assuming, and I think quite properly so, that there will be a profound change in the intentions of farmers as a result of their consideration of LIFT.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister advise the House how a farmer who had no wheat last year can expect any money from operation LIFT?

WHEAT—ACREAGE REDUCTION PROGRAM—POSITION OF CANADIAN FEDERATION OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Canadian Federation of Agriculture was supposed to meet with the government today, may I ask the Minister of Agriculture whether the federation presented its misgivings about the acreage reduction program and also indicated there is an acute shortage of cash in western Canada? How does the government propose to look at those two problems?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we had a very useful meeting with the Canadian Federation of Agriculture this morning. I am sure that the hon. member either has or will have before long a copy of the submission. He can, of course, interpret it as well as I.

Mr. Gleave: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has just about run out of time for the question period, but the Chair would like to recognize the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar for one supplementary on this point, and then call on the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar.

WHEAT—REQUEST BY CANADIAN FEDERATION OF AGRICULTURE FOR FLOOR PRICE OF $1.95½ PER BUSHEL

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Might I ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he can assure the House that the government will give serious consideration to the request of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture for a floor price of $1.95½ per bushel, basis Thunder Bay, for all wheat moving into international trade, in other words, into export markets?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the government has given serious consideration to this and, as the hon. member knows, has gone a long way in guaranteeing the floor price for all wheat, going into domestic human consumption.

FEED GRAIN—REQUESTED INCREASE IN FREIGHT RATE ASSISTANCE

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Agriculture and arises out of the requests made by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture this morning. Will the assistance made available under the feed grain freight assistance act be increased instead of decreased?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we had a useful discussion about that particular matter this morning. There were two or three aspects of the whole matter to which the federation agreed with us further consideration should be given, including whether or not the policy should be based on the total amount of money or on rates in view of the fact that volume changes from year to year, depending on a number of circumstances. But I can advise the hon. member that we had a very useful discussion about that question this morning.

[Mr. Olson.]

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING HATE PROPAGANDA

The House resumed from Thursday, April 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) for the third reading of Bill C-3, to amend the Criminal Code.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan) aroused my curiosity when he took part in the debate on Thursday evening and pointed out some of the great figures of the past who would have suffered had this particular measure been in effect in their country. I gave this some considerable thought while looking at my own modest library over the week end, and I came to the conclusion that a lot of us are going to be in a great deal of trouble, in view of the types of books we have been purchasing, if this measure is put into operation.

For example, I think that no home should harbour such an insidious document as the Bible, either the Old Testament or the New Testament, because there are clearly chapters in both the Old Testament and the New Testament that would incite hatred against an identifiable group in a manner that is likely to lead to a breach of the peace.

I quarrelled with the hon. member for Annapolis Valley in my mind at the thought that Jesus would or could be a victim of this particular bill, and I thought of His sermon on the mount "Blessed be the meek". But when one thinks of the disorder that arose as a result of His peaceful teachings, one can only conclude that anything that contained His teachings would have to go. As a result, the Bible would be a sadly emasculated document if it were to survive as a book that could be freely sold and read in our times and contain no passages that would offend the particular measure with which we are dealing.

Then, when story time for the children came around, I picked up a book about Robin Hood. In the edition that I have Robin Hood has some pretty harsh language to use against the Normans who a few years before good old Robin got into action had carried out the Norman conquest. The Normans, I would suggest, were a clearly identifiable group because of race or ethnic origin, and so it almost becomes a criminal offence to have Robin Hood in the House.

Examples from Shakespeare are well known. The period during which he wrote these words was the period of the development of English Nationhood, so that is the sort of thing which is likely to lead to at least contempt or ridicule of a minority, if not actual hatred. Even the dictionary would not be free from condemnation under this bill, at least certainly not Dr. Samuel Johnson's dictionary because he defines oats as something eaten by English horses and Scottish people. If that does not hold out to ridicule an identifiable group distinguished by race or by ethnic origin, I do not know what would. Dickens' Oliver Twist is an obvious example and even the famous six books in the Barset series, by the gentle Anthony Trollope, perhaps the most enjoyable single group of books I have in my library dealing with a life that was somewhat leisurely paced in Victorian England, come under the gun as a result of his reference to certain money lenders.

Mr. MacLean: Would the hon. member permit a question? Is he aware that England is world famous for its horses and Scotland for its people?

Mr. McCleave: Yes, I would say England was well known for its horses, just as a former deputy minister was famous for his horses on the payroll.

An hon. Member: The hon. member is just feeling his oats.

Mr. McCleave: Someone else prompted this remark but it is too good to allow to go unrecorded, in case it was missed by Hansard. The hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean) is feeling his oats. To top it off, my forebears escaped from Scotland at one time and that is why I am in Canada.

Rudyard Kipling took on large masses of people in some of his works during what one would call, the golden age of British imperialism. I hope I am not held up as an example of one breaking the provisions of this bill because I seem to be getting after the British. I was afraid, after my experience with Robin Hood, to pick up other books of fairy tales or Mother Goose stories because heaven only knows what sort of incitement to hatred I would find in them. Seriously, at the time these creations came forth they were written in such a way as to escape trial and attack for some of the feelings they expressed. None the less, they were there for a purpose in their time, and that was to strike out at certain people or certain groups. I suppose when this bill passes any martial song that makes up part of our singing traditions will have to disappear. I do not know what would have happened to all the Lutheran polemics that sprang up in the years immediately following the first steps taken by Martin Luther. I think they all would have been outlawed, or at least subject to seizure and the authors subject to court action. We would have had no reformation and no counter-reformation if this particular bill had been in existence at that time.

A question has been asked in respect of Adolph Hitler's Mein Kampf. I would think this particular work could have been dealt with under clause 1 of the bill. I have no particular quarrel with that because that is the direct advocacy or promotion of genocide. If the provisions of the bill were separated, I could quite easily vote for clause 1. It is the other two offences created by the bill which bother me enormously.

A few days ago when I took part in the debate I mentioned some of the soul searching going on in my own particular area with regard to the problems of certain of its residents. I neglected to mention one outstanding incident, namely the visit to Halifax of Sol Alinsky, who is perhaps the chief apostle of social activism we see operating out in the open on the North American continent. This visit gave citizens with grievances a great opportunity to present their views at a very well attended public meeting.

One of the people who expressed his views was a young black gentleman who felt that any attempts at reform that had been made within the Halifax area were not satisfactory. His cure was to pick up a gun and kill all the whites. His answer was just as simple as that, though I have expressed his viewpoint in reasonably modest language whereas he used some obscenities when he expressed it. Be that as it may, it was a cry from the heart of a person who felt very frustrated and ill used, and had all sorts of problems which came to the fore at this Alinsky meeting. In effect this meant, what is the use? Nothing can ever be done, so let us shoot the whites. I suppose he would be guilty under clauses 2 and 3. It seems to me his remarks could be taken as inciting hatred against an identifiable group in a manner likely to lead to a breach of the peace, so it would seem to me, at least on the surface, he would come within the four corners of that particular paragraph.

Yet, I think the most undesirable thing in the world would be to take action under the Criminal Code against that person for what he said, or against anybody else who made similar extravagant statements. If we took action, I think we would turn these people into martyrs. They would feel this was just another attempt to muzzle their expression of thought. The problems about which he tried to speak in his frustration would remain unsolved. The consciences of a few who think that one cannot go around in public using indecent language and making statements of that sort might be relieved by the laying of a charge.

To me, it would be much better to have such a person making complaints on behalf of those who have grievances about houses, about jobs and about opportunities, rather than putting him away. This point of view makes sense, because we all know how intolerant Russia was under the Czars. It is still intolerant but I use that as a specific example of how the terrorist philosophy of Necheyev written on little bits and pieces of paper scraped from here and there, led to the philosophy adopted by Lenin, the philosophy of kill anybody who stands in the way. This philosophy found favour with certain middle class people who did carry it into effect and who did substitute Bolshevik terrorism for the other form which existed before, Czarist terrorism. We know what practical effect that had. That was the result of the imprisonment of people like Necheyev for long periods of time. This illustrates the dilemma you get yourself into if you try to deal with different philosophies by simply saying that those who express them are unworthy to be at large in society.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Even if those people, the Necheyevists and the Leninists, were the ones who philosophically backed the policies which brought about the revolution, or even if they took an active part in it, the fact is their actions prove that even the most well-meaning oppressions of thought simply will not work in society. So, as I say, sir, I hope the dialogue in Halifax continues until those grievances are overcome. The mood now seems right for it. I know there are many people who have held discussions as a result of the meetings I described earlier and as a result of the Alinsky encounter. I know they will not be satisfied so long as their consciences are in that state. I think they would take an entirely different attitude if there were not the right of free expression to get issues before the public.

[Mr. McCleave.]

That one instance alone is the reason I would vote and intend to vote against the bill. I do not think it will help the black minority in Nova Scotia to have this bill in force in Canada. I think these provisions could so easily be turned against them if there were anyone cruel enough or with a sharp sense of injustice who would use them. The provincial attorneys general across Canada are all fine, decent men and I suppose no one would quarrel with any decisions they would make under this bill. But that will not always be the situation. We could have attorneys general who would use measures that go against a particular religious sect. We know this has happened in Canada. There have been instances in the past, which I shall not relate, in which there have been repressive measures directed at certain groups within society and the sores from those are still visible. So, as I say, in my opinion this bill would not protect a minority group.

I regret I must disagree with my hon. friend from Hamilton West, who certainly delivered the most eloquent speech I heard in this debate. It came from his heart, from his soul and from his mind. It was a total expression of what the man believes. It was well delivered. He and I share the same objectives. Let there be no doubt about that. We want to see the problems of the black, Indian, Métis or any other disadvantaged people in Canada overcome. Yet, thankfully, in this place we have the right to disagree concerning the best method to bring this about. My friend says this can be done by passing the hate bill and I say the hate bill worries me very much. I say it would prevent the people from expressing themselves about their problems and would not give them a chance to reach out and touch the consciences of other people. Therefore, I say this is a bad measure.

In concluding, the example I gave earlier in respect of the Sermon on the Mount comes to mind. In that example, a man went about teaching that the meek were blessed because they would inherit the earth. One would have thought that message would have touched the consciences of all within the range of that voice, but it really did not. It touched the consciences of some and their numbers have multiplied so that today, most of us in this country are His followers, but not all. Be that as it may, the majority of the people in His own time heard these very mild words and one would not think that would have excited extraordinary passions in the breasts of the people. Yet, had this bill been in effect at the time, He clearly would have come under the section about inciting hatred against any identifiable group likely to lead to a breach of the peace. I give that example as proof that changing circumstances and times can bring about very drastic changes in the attitude one has toward legislation. I should like to think we would make a decision that would stand as a landmark for a long time and which would emphasize the right of a person, as a free citizen, to have his say.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to prolong the debate, nor in the strict sense of the word do I intend even to debate. The debate has been exhaustive and I think largely honest. I have followed it closely because I needed guidance in determining what I should do. I am not myself aware of having been a member of an identifiable group subjected to the despicable activities which this bill is intended to proscribe and punish. Perhaps if I were, my attitude would be different and my decision easier. That is the reason I have needed the guidance. The fact that two members of this House who are members of such identifiable groups have stood in their places during the debate and have expressed opposite conclusions concerning the bill's wisdom and efficacy, conclusions which coincidentally have been opposite to the views taken by the majorities of their respective parties, will I think make very understandable the difficulty which I, and I am sure other hon. members, are experiencing.

As I said I do not intend to debate; but I do feel it is my duty to tell my colleagues and my constituents why I will vote against this bill on third reading. I did not vote against the amendments put forth last Thursday because they would not cure the provision which compels me to vote against the entire bill. I decided that if the bill were to pass at all, it might as well pass unamended in so far as the amendments put on Thursday are concerned. I must vote against the bill because of the rejection of the amendment to clause 267A proposed by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hogarth). Whatever doubts I have about the other clauses are not to me conclusive, nor would a recitation of those doubts add to the body of human knowledge. I do feel, however, as repulsive, obscene and offensive as the concept of genocide is and as repulsive, obscene and offensive as any person is who would advocate or promote that concept, that person ought not to be deemed a criminal unless that advocacy or promotion has some public aspect, however slight.

Just a few days ago we were made aware of an instance here in Ottawa when an RCMP officer obtained entry to a private home when no adults were present and questioned a 13-year-old child. This child, in the absence of its parents, was questioned about things that had been done and said in that home. I can conceive of only one greater internal threat to freedom in a country like Canada, which already enjoys freedom, than a police force imbued with missionary zeal. That greater danger is a Parliament which demonstrates a like missionary zeal to proscribe and punish an evil, whatever the means.

Certainly, it would be difficult to conceive an end more appalling than genocide. It would be difficult to devise an objective more worthy of obliteration. One might be tempted to agree that any means is justified. I cannot accept that. I still hold the conviction that an idea advocated or promoted in the home, regardless of how totally evil it may be, however revolting must be the person who would entertain much less advocate or promote it, no criminal investigation, no criminal prosecution and no criminal conviction should follow where no public consequence has followed.

There are those who say that the concept of genocide is so repugnant that its promotion or advocacy, even in the most complete privacy, must be a crime. It is a tempting proposition but one that I cannot buy. Surely in Canada if we are not to impair freedom of thought there must be some place where every idea, however obscene, however repugnant to universally held standards, can be advocated and promoted. If that place is not in the privacy of one's home, where is it? This bill does not preserve it.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity of participating in this debate on second reading and since then I have had the opportunity of doing some soul searching and some research, particularly over the weekend. Certainly, I make no apologies for rising to participate at this time on third reading because I am deeply concerned about the subject and I think it is fair to say that many other Canadians are deeply concerned as well.

I am opposed to this piece of legislation because I believe it is an invasion of the right of freedom of speech. I believe that this legislation is totally unnecessary and it is not in keeping with the Canadian parliamentary, constitutional and political traditions. I further submit that if this bill becomes law, it will work to the disadvantage of those minorities which it has presumably set out to protect. I can only conclude that there is more to this bill than immediately meets the eye.

One wonders just what this government intends to accomplish by making such a law. One also wonders what they wished to achieve by imposing rule 75C, or the official languages act. We wonder what motivation lies behind this carefully laid plan. I have recently wondered about the broad sweeping powers that have been granted to the CRTC, the subject of considerable debate and controversy which is taking place right here in Ottawa at this time. We wonder, as do many Canadians, about the eventual effects of Information Canada upon the daily lives of Canadians. We are also increasingly concerned about the recent attempts to muzzle the effectiveness of the Auditor General by decreasing his staff, while in fact it should be increased, and by subjecting him to a great deal of criticism inside and outside the House. His effectiveness as the watchdog of government spending has been lessened and he has been subjected lately to the threat of being removed from his office.

We wonder just what is behind proposals such as the one with which we are dealing now. I have said that this law, so far as I am concerned, is unnecessary, given the Canadian Bill of Rights and the libel laws in the Criminal Code. When you take those laws into consideration, I say that this bill is redundant. The Canadian Bill of Rights was passed by Parliament and sponsored by that great Canadian and great humanitarian, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). The Bill of Rights assures the rights and freedom of all Canadians when it recognizes and declares "the right of the individual to life, liberty, security of the person and enjoyment of property". I submit, furthermore, that every Canadian is further protected by the laws of libel and slander as already expressed in sections 246 to 251 of the Criminal Code.

The other day the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) asserted as recorded at page 5693 of Hansard, that this bill, —is nothing more than a projection of the libel laws from libel against an individual to libel against an identifiable group.

[Mr. Mazankowski.]

After having done some research on this aspect I humbly submit that this is not so and, furthermore, that this is a phony analogy. I support my argument with the words of a much greater authority on the law than myself, namely, the late Justice Ivan Rand of the Supreme Court of Canada in his 1957 ruling against the notorious padlock law of the province of Quebec which sought to repress the propagation of communism. The following is a quotation of a statement made by Mr. Justice Rand from the book entitled "Leading Constitutional Decisions" by Peter H. Russell:

Mr. Tremblay in a lucid argument treated such a limitation of free discussion and the spread of ideas generally as in the same category as the ordinary civil restrictions of libel and slander. These obviously affect the matter and scope of discussion to the extent that it trenches upon the rights of individuals to reputation and standing in the community; and the line at which the restraint is drawn is that at which public concern for the discharge of legal or moral duties and government through rational persuasion, and that for private security, are found to be in rough balance.

But the analogy is not a true one. The ban is directed against the freedom or civil liberty of the actor; no civil right of anyone is affected nor is any civil remedy created. The aim of the statute is, by means of penalties, to prevent what is considered a poisoning of men's minds, to shield the individual from exposure to dangerous ideas, to protect him, in short, from his own thinking propensities. There is nothing of civil rights in this; it is to curtail or proscribe those freedoms which the majority so far consider to be the condition of social cohesion and its ultimate stabilizing force.

So that at best the aim of Bill C-3 could be to prevent what is considered a poisoning of men's minds, or to protect the individual from exposure to the most scurrilous and vicious of men's thinking. We have heard before, and I said in my first speech, that we cannot legislate against the emotions of hatred or prejudice. Therefore, it is better that it be in the open where we can keep an eye on it, as the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) just pointed out. Personally, I would rather have my enemy attack me in the open where I can see him than underground or behind my back.

This leads me into my second point, that I do not believe this bill will in fact protect those minorities, which it allegedly sets out to do, from the injustices which may affect those people. It is more likely to constrict and condemn their leaders. I am sure many of you have heard of Mr. Harold Cardinal. I do not know how many of you have heard him deliver a speech or have read his book "The Unjust Society". But I believe it is fair to conclude that in his book, and in many of his speeches to which I have had the opportunity of listening, he does incite an element of hatred. Could he not incite his enemies to a breach of the peace? What about Martin Luther King, Abraham Lincoln or Joseph Howe? Should these men have gone to prison for incitement likely to lead to a breach of the peace?

Men like Harold Cardinal are angry men. They feel an injustice. They feel that their people have been deprived of the riches that many of our other Canadians enjoy. They feel that they are being disadvantaged, and they feel a sense of frustration and injustice. I ask you, Mr. Speaker is it right that we should take away their right to articulate their views simply because they are angry, simply because they may appear to be somewhat militant, simply because they feel the lethargy of our society forces them to be militant in their modes of expression?

I wonder what Bill C-3 proposes for dealing with the 97 per cent drop-out rate of Indians from school, or what in fact it would propose to do about providing the equal opportunity that is necessary to enable these people to participate in the full riches of Canadian life. I wonder what this bill proposes to do about supplying them with an adequate water supply, or adequate housing, or about providing them with adequate jobs. And I wonder what it could do to remove the frustration that presently exists among the Indian population in Alberta with respect to medical treatment.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) visited my constituency some two weeks ago just to talk about medicare. The members of the Indian community there are very frustrated, and are apprehensive about the matter of medical care. The minister blames the situation on the provinces, but well before medicare came along they had full medical coverage and there were no problems. These are the types of situations that promote an element of hatred.

I am not an advocate of violence, Mr. Speaker, and I recognize that indifference and lethargy sometimes lead to violent words and violent action. Last week in this debate a number of speakers referred to the Ontario Human Rights Code. It certainly is an admirable document, but here again we have to consider its constitutional validity. As far as I can see, it is a declaration of good intentions, and I would be one of the first to sign my name to such a declaration should it come before the House. But the Ontario Human Rights Code states that its aim is "to create a climate of understanding and mutual respect among our people." No act of this or any other Parliament can create a climate of understanding. No law can impose that feeling of mutual respect because, as I said before, mutual respect comes from mutual consideration and understanding, and that only comes through education and the free expression of opinion.

I wonder how much discrimination we do have in this country, and will Bill C-3 help us to find it out? Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, I do not see how it can. As a Member of Parliament from an area containing several identifiable minority groups I want to know what kind of propaganda is being spread about them, or is being spread around. I say that if you force such propaganda underground it is liable to spread like an evil and uncontrollable plague, similar to the situation we have with respect to the control of drugs. Certainly our present laws are not going to remove the drug problem. We have all heard the slogan, "Cancer can be beaten." But it can only be beaten if we have a thorough and understanding knowledge of it. I say let us keep the lamented few in the open, where we can see them. Let us not take their advice. Let us not take the advice of those who advocate repression.

This leads me to my third and final point. I believe this bill represents an invasion of our sacred right to freedom of speech. In fact, I suspect this bill is unconstitutional and will be so declared the first time it is tested in the courts. I base this view not only on the Canadian Bill of Rights but also on our whole constitutional and political tradition.

On August 4, 1960, as I said before, this House passed the Canadian Bill of Rights. The Bill is unequivocal in its declaration and recognition of the existence in this country of the right to freedom of speech, and moreover there are no conditions or limitations attached. Perhaps it might be well for hon. members to take note of the second section of the Bill of Rights which states the supremacy of the Bill of Rights over all other Canadian laws:

> Every law of Canada shall, unless it is expressly declared by an Act of the Parliament of Canada that it shall operate notwithstanding the Canadian Bill of Rights, be so construed and applied as not to abrogate, abridge or infringe or to authorize the abrogation, abridgement or infringement of any of the rights or freedoms herein recognized—

From that section only, I assume that Bill C-3 must conform to the Bill of Rights if it is to be upheld in the courts. I think, as the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) pointed out, the validity of this point was clearly established by the Supreme Court of Canada last fall in the Drybones case.

Even without the Bill of Rights there is some question whether this bill could stand up before the courts. Parliamentary democracy has always been predicated upon complete and unreserved freedom of speech. As pointed out by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Skoreyko), during the 1930's the government in my province of Alberta tried to limit freedom of speech through a series of acts one of which, the Accurate Views and Information Act, tried to control the press. In ruling the act unconstitutional in 1938 the then Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, Sir Lyman Duff, stated:

> There can be no controversy that such (i.e. Parliamentary) institutions derive their efficacy from the free public discussions of affairs, from criticisms and answer and counter-criticism, from attack upon policy and administration and defence and counter-attack; from the freest and fullest analysis and examination from every point of view of political proposals.

He went on to say:

> —it is axiomatic that the practice of this right of free public discussion of public affairs, notwithstanding its incidental mischiefs, is the breath of life for parliamentary institutions.

I referred earlier to the padlock case and the judgment of Mr. Justice Ivan Rand. I would like to quote just one more excerpt from it, and again I am reading from "Leading Constitutional Decisions" by Peter H. Russell:

> —That the scene of study, discussion or dissemination of views or opinions on any matter has ever been brought under legal sanction in terms of nuisance is not suggested. For the past century and a half in both the United Kingdom and Canada, there has been a steady removal of restraints on this freedom, stopping only at perimeters where the foundation of the freedom itself is threatened. Apart from sedition, obscene writings and criminal libels, the public leaves the literary, discursive and polemic use of language, in the broadest sense, free.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Any nation, Mr. Speaker, knowing that its own society is based on certain values, beliefs and philosophies should, I believe, always listen to the voices of dissent and reform. They may be the first voices of the future. No matter how repugnant the message of dissent may be to a particular generation, that lonely voice could well become the voice of the future. Any nation that stifles dissent or criticism can only experience a past and a present, it has no future.

Sir Winston Churchill said much the same thing in different words, and I quote:

> Criticism may not be agreeable, but it is necessary.
> It fulfils the same function as pain in the human body: it calls attention to an unhealthy state of things.

I submit that we should not stifle freedom of speech in the name of freedom. I know what it is to suffer certain abuse, a form of discrimination. Certainly, with a name like Mazankowski, I know what it is to be teased and to be called names. But discrimination is no basis upon which to stifle freedom of speech. Quite frankly, as far as I am concerned, discrimination and ethnic or racial hatred are not nearly as bad today as they were 20 or 30 years ago. I believe one of the main reasons for this is the fact that we have had freedom of speech. There has been an equalization of opportunity through education, integration and intermingling. If those who are discriminated against had not had the opportunity of expressing themselves vocally or in print, we would never have moved to the point where we are today.

A considerable amount of emotion has been injected into this debate, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for York West (Mr. Givens) was very emotional the other day when he delivered his speech, as was the hon. member for York South. I believe that emotion only deviates from the principle of looking at this bill very objectively with a cool, sober and open mind. It is with these words, Mr. Speaker, that I would ask hon. members to search their souls in order that we may vote in the interest of preserving the tradition of our democracy and our basic civil liberties.

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, it is certainly not with any sense of pleasure that I rise today to participate in this debate on the motion for third reading of Bill C-3. It is not that the debate has been bitter or rancorous, because I believe that its standard has been high.

However, it appears to me that many members have not taken the opportunity afforded by this debate to state their own views and those of their constituents. I can appreciate their difficulty. The proponents of this piece of mischievous legislation are relying on man's natural good intentions to carry it through. At least one hon. member spent a great deal of his time pointing out flaws and weaknesses of the bill and then concluded that, in spite of all this, he was compelled to support the bill to demonstrate his concern for minorities.

I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that while that argument is attractive, probably because all of us are members of some sort of minority group or other, it does nothing to advance the cause of minorities in this country. To my mind, that argument is a classic example of fuzzy-minded, small "l" liberal, bleeding heart, do-gooder thinking. This is the type of thinking that has, in my opinion, resulted in the very policies which have produced today's permissive society that appears to be getting ready for an authoritarian takeover.

I understand the views of those who have suffered as a result of prejudicial talk and statements designed to bring a certain group into contempt. The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) made reference to certain actions taken in this country during the second world war. When that war broke out I was six years old. My family lived in a small community and we were the only family with a distinctively German name. Unlike other members of this House I was not taught, nor did I believe, that the second world war was imperialistic or otherwise bad.

While I was too young to understand the reasons that lay behind that outbreak of hostilities, I did believe then and believe now it was necessary in all the circumstances that prevailed. However, irrespective of my beliefs at the time I was still subject to ridicule and abuse as a result of my name. So, I believe I have some understanding of the objects of this bill. Notwithstanding its objects, Mr. Speaker, I can only describe this as a bad bill. While the basic argument used to advance it is the one I have already referred to, I am not prepared to impute the same lofty, if misguided, motives to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who must take the ultimate responsibility for it being before us today.

In my view this bill is just one of several devices being used by the Prime Minister to bring the people of this country to heel. What other reason is there for it? We all know the apparent reason for the bill arose out of a vile and filthy outbreak of antisemitism in the city of Toronto six or seven years ago. But, Mr. Speaker, this isolated outbreak has receded into insignificance and is virtually nonexistent today. In other words, there is no clear and present danger in the country to justify this legislation. If there is, where is the evidence? Does the government have evidence that it has not laid before this House? Does the government have some evidence that disaster is about to befall some racial or religious group in Canada? If the government has such evidence it should have been presented to this House and to the country, Mr. Speaker. If there is a real and present danger to a particular group of people in this country we have a right to know all of the facts so that we can deal with them now.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that there is not, in fact, a real and present danger to any individual or group in this country because of racial or religious or ethnic affiliation or origin. I will grant that there is a danger to not only some Canadians but to all Canadians. That danger stems from the group across the floor of this House wielding the power of an absolute majority. I suggest that the present government, unable to find answers to real problems, is erecting safeguards against imagined and improbable events of the future. I urge the government to deal with present problems first, and leave imaginary problems for the future, preferably the distant future.

The present government is saying to the Canadian people that they cannot be trusted to develop and mature within the framework of the society that they have preserved and nurtured over the past century. This is an arrogant and authoritarian attitude. The present government did not invent or devise our present form of parliamentary government. The present government does not have a mandate to invent or devise a new form of government and impose it on the people. They have a mandate to preserve the form of government that was handed to them by the people in a free vote. We are considering Bill C-3, Mr. Speaker, because the present government is determined to control and regulate the quantity and quality of dissent in this country. There can be no other reason for such a measure. The present government has demonstrated over and over again that if the people of this country do not like the quality of government they are getting, they will just have to learn to like it.

I would venture to say that every ethnic group in the country has been and is represented in the House, and that has been the case throughout most of the years this Parliament has existed. I do not need Bill C-3 to protect me from any member of this House,

Mr. Speaker; I do not need Bill C-3 to protect me from anyone in my constituency or to protect any of them from me. Apparently, though, the government does not share my views in that area. Apparently, there is a real and present need on the part of the government to secure protection for itself from something or someone. It has been my experience that the government is very much in favour of dissent. The Prime Minister has taken pains to tell us that he is not in favour of controlling or regulating the freedom of the hippies and kooks in their efforts to do their thing. No, the Prime Minister is in favour of dissent, as long as it is not directed at his government.

Could it be, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister feels there is a real and present threat to the government; that his government might be rendered extinct by genocide? If that is the case, I urge the government to let us have the facts, to let us deal with them. I would not want this government to be rendered extinct in such a manner. I want them to stay around so that Canadian voters can render them extinct two years from now. I want them to stay around so that the Canadian voters can vent their anger and frustration on this ineffective and inhumane power group. It is time, Mr. Speaker, for the present government to stop worrying about being rendered extinct through genocide and start legislating for the benefit of the Canadian people. Bill C-3 legislates against the Canadian people and presupposes that the government is responding to pressures from groups rather than from the majority of the country's citizens.

It has been pointed out by other speakers that this government has taken onto itself the enormous task of eliminating hate and distrust from our society without taking the people into its confidence and without asking the people to help. This is not the government's problem alone. It is a problem that involves and concerns the people at large and it will not serve any good purpose if we sweep the problem under the rug by passing Bill C-3. In an area of human activity and human emotion where understanding and education are called for we have, instead, an arbitrary measure designed to stifle the very thing we are pledged to defend, the right of dissent.

I urge the government, Mr. Speaker, to get out among the people and see what they are really like. The Canadian people are not bent on self-destruction. The Canadian people are not looking for ways and means of destroying their neighbours because they might be of a different race, religion or ethnic group. The Canadian people want to build, to create, and to better themselves and their society. I say to this government, stop being so concerned with yourselves and start showing some concern for the Canadian people. I say to this government, stop showing contempt for the minds and motives of the Canadian people and start exercising the responsibilities, as well as the powers, that those people have entrusted to you.

There is one scant consolation to be found in this type of legislation, Mr. Speaker. The present government, by betraying the trust granted to it by the Canadian people, is building the platform for the opposition party in the next general election. The present government fails to take into account that, whatever damage they might do over the remaining years before the next election, the Canadian people will have one thing left: the right to a free vote two years from now.

This legislation may be classified in either of two ways. Some people say, "Don't be too strong in your opposition to it, because it really does not mean anything. It really never will be used; it is just window dressing, a sop to certain pressure groups who feel that it is necessary, and therefore it is all right to let it go through." Mr. Speaker, I did not come here to discuss or vote on window dressing. That is not the function of the House of Commons of Canada. If the bill means something, then someone will be charged under this bill and will be given a forum in which to spread his filth more widely in our society. We do not need that, so I cannot see how anybody can support this legislation on any grounds. I certainly intend to vote against it and I hope that the House of Commons will say that this legislation ought not to be passed.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, on this very important subject these will be my only utterances, for which all may be thankful. It has been, sir, a most interesting debate, stimulating and wide ranging. Perhaps it has been such a good debate because there has been so much soul searching. I have noted, in my brief experience here, that quite often the finest debates in the House take place on matters upon which there is no question of party rigidity as to the point of view being expounded. I believe, perhaps, that we have too much partyism in our deliberations. I say this as a great believer in the party system, because I believe, as Lord

Bryce has stated, that no democracy can function without parties and that parties are older than democracy and essential to it. But there are many matters such as this upon which, I submit, it would be difficult for one to derive a party position.

This issue is not only one of conscience it is, in many important respects, a question of philosophy. Perhaps at times it comes close almost to a theological point of view that hon. members must debate. I think that we do not in this House add lustre to the institution of Parliament or its reputation when we take a party line on every item that comes before us. As one philosopher once said, if there is any large group of people all thinking the same thing, you can be sure that in that large group of people there is more than one who is not thinking at all.

There was obviously much uncertainty in the minds of hon. members. This was clear from the debate, and I envy those who can be so sure of the rightness of their stand or the precision of their voting pattern. I am not in that position. I think I have never been all that sure as to which is the better course of action. I can only, sir, after a long process of reading, study and introspection, come to some point of view, choose my course and vote in the way which I think will contribute to the betterment of our society rather than the reverse. In other words, my resolution does not come with any startling clarity from an ideological point of view, but rather from a process of weighing advantages and disadvantages.

I suppose, in a sense, I have been comparing some aspects of the measure which appeal to me, against some which I find repugnant. I am not ashamed of that, because I regard as one of the great pronouncements on the political process this famous statement Burke made:

> All government—indeed every human benefit and enjoyment, every virtue and every prudent act—is founded on compromise and barter.

That was said in days, some generations ago, before the word "compromise" had become downgraded in meaning.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Many people are deeply concerned, and there has been much careful study of the bill by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), whose brilliant legal mind and careful research has done much to bring about a greater understanding of the measure and, indeed, a greater knowledge of its various aspects. There are of course, disconcerting features in the bill. It is filled with aspects which cause concern to thoughtful people. These have been detailed vigorously and brilliantly by many men in this House learned in the law and in parliamentary procedure. Of all the things about it, what distresses me most is the matter referred to by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan) the other day in connection with section 267(c). I find this totally repugnant and though I cannot forecast what other people may do, I hope that somehow this particular feature can be cast into the limbo to which it belongs.

There have been interesting evocations of history in the course of this debate. One or two members said the bill would have caught Christ. Others said it would not be strong enough to catch Hitler. So there is a wide difference of interpretation here in the House, even before the legislation gets to the courts. I do not know whether it was hatred of Christ or the love of Christ which brought him to his destiny but I am sure there have been times in the 2,000 years since when Christian communities in various parts of the world might have found themselves aided rather than harassed by a measure of this kind. The bill makes it hard, often, to distinguish things, because it is not, in my opinion, a well-written bill, but, surely, we must all distinguish between dissent and the wilful promotion of hatred against an identifiable group. There is an immense difference here. We can go back through history for fascinating examples, but even if this bill is bad it is not likely to cause our governors—and I use the word in its broad sense to mean those who are governing us—to take leave of their senses. Surely, a measure of common sense will survive the passage of this bill; a society without some measure of this quality would not be able to survive in any case.

Another objection stems from the fear in some minds that an orator who stirs a multitude to riot would find this legislation aimed at him while, presumably, the rioters would go free. However, it seems to me that the state is not bereft of power and authority to deal with those who destroy life and property. Nor can we postulate that the passage of this measure would inhibit the state if it came to dealing with riotous and destructive behaviour; it could deal with such offences just as it does, now.

No one has a monopoly of concern for free speech and civil liberties. We all care. But we know that even the greatest of our freedoms are not really absolute. Free speech is not an absolute; it has to be curtailed. Freedom of religion is not an absolute; there are many activities which religious groups seek to carry out and which the state forbids. Freedom of assembly is not untramelled. Just try holding a mass meeting in the centre of some square in any large city during the day and see how you get along. In establishing norms of behaviour for society and in passing laws, we have to make judgments concerning the relationship between individual rights and the common good. As a Jeffersonian liberal, my tendency is always to give first place to the former, to the rights of the individual, but sometimes we have to surrender a measure of individual rights for the good of the generality of society. This is what civilized community living is about. I believe that in the long run the right to promote and incite hatred is not one which can be regarded as among our inalienable rights. We cannot, of course, by legislation remove hatred from the hearts of men, or successfully implant love therein. But we can say, I believe, with some hope of success, that hatred shall not be activated against other sectors of society in the manner in which this bill, albeit inadequate, seeks to describe.

There are signs enough that there still are great dangers from the dissemination in Canada of hatred directed toward identifiable groups. We are not immune from activist prejudice. Far from it, alas. It cannot be argued that because certain long depressed groups are now taking the place in society which they have always deserved means there is no danger of grave problems arising here. It is the sad history of race and group prejudice that the backlash is often most vicious when long ascendant groups feel themselves threatened by a recently emancipated group.

While I am concerned about certain of these provisions, I feel that in addition to understanding and studying the laws they pass, legislators should also consider the spirit of those laws. The philosopher Montesquieu dealt with this question a long time ago in memorable words which are still of value to people today. We must note the relationship between mores and the law, and, indeed, between morals and the law. So, I look not only at the contents of this bill but also at its intent. Having done so, I am prepared to support the bill—not that it is a perfect one, far from it, but, rather, because we are an imperfect society. While I am always an optimist and always a progressivist, I do not believe in the perfectability of human nature. Not in my time nor in the time of anyone here will we reach a situation wherein kings will be philosophers and parliamentarians, saints.

Though we would long to live in a society where hatred did not exist and in which there would be no need to restrain the outpouring of hatred, we do not, alas, live in such a society. This being the case, I do not believe we are proposing a backward step—indeed, I hope it is a helpful step—to declare that the espousal of group-directed hatred is an evil thing which our society thus formally, and in this manner, should and must condemn.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I did say when I was speaking on the report stage, that I did not intend to take part in the debate on third reading. I shall try to preserve the spirit of that promise to the House, but certain things have been said in this debate which I feel it is my responsibility to answer. Since I believe the interpretation placed on some of the things I said has been misleading, I trust hon. members will bear with me for a few minutes.

Today, I wish to discuss five aspects of this subject. I want to consider the many references made to minorities, and in doing so I intend to mention the work of the committee. I wish to talk about the constitutional aspect of the bill—I think this legislation is unconstitutional and should be included among the subjects considered by the Supreme Court of Canada for decision in this connection. I wish to deal, in particular, with a point which I made during my first speech in reference to this measure, and repeated subsequently. I wish to discuss the contention that a defence available under one section does not exist under another. I am referring to that clause that gives the right to somebody to take out a simple affidavit on reasonable belief and seize literature. Then, you have to come in and defend yourself. That sounds something like the Spanish inquisition.

My first point is this. We have heard a lot about minorities. Canada, if it means anything, means that it consists of groups of minorities of various nationalities and various religions and environments who came here to have freedom. I am not a parliamentarian, or a lawyer for that matter, who believes that we could in these instances, using the words of the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher), implement and legislate division.

I said in my speech that if this bill does anything, to the best of my legal understanding and I believe to the best of the legal understanding of the best constitutional lawyers—I do not include myself in this category but I have discussed it with them—the bill will likely work, as I will point out, against minorities in Canada.

Just on that point, surely if we are to build a nation and a just society, the great thing that Canada is 100 years after confederation, we must forget whether we are Polish, or German, or Scottish, or English, or Irish—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Or Welsh.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, or Welsh—or whether our religion is Jewish, Anglican, Roman Catholic, Presbyterian, Methodist, Hindu or any of the others, and simply be people who work together, who understand the cultural environment that we have here, and build a nation as Canadians.

I am tired of hearing about people who cry and wring their hands about minorities. I realize there has been abuse in the past, particularly in the case of certain names. Here, I mention the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski). He is a good friend of mine, and I refer to his name, Mazankowski, only in the metaphorical sense because I know I am not allowed to refer to him in the House by his name. He said that people had referred to his name.

I have also experienced that sort of abuse in this environment. I come from British stock, three generations Canadian. The first thing my grandfather and father saw when they arrived in the city of Saskatoon (1903)—and I use this as an analogy only—was a notice that said: "No Englishmen need apply". I do not know whether it was because they were so urbanized that they could not ruralize, though I think that was my grandfather's and my father's problem; they could never get into the rural atmosphere.

My father wanted to escape the pavement, but when he got into the rural atmosphere he did not know whether to plant posts or plant potatoes when using a post auger. These people were not wanted because they were no use to the development of Canada in the materialistic approach used in the pioneering days, and as a result you saw these signs saying that no Englishmen need apply. I suppose that disturbed him. When I was sent to a rural school dressed in brown velvet with shining buttons, these ruralites really took me on, and I do not blame them. It did me no harm. As Shakespeare said, "Sweet are the uses of adversity which, ugly and venomous like a toad, wears yet a precious jewel in his head". Only in adversity do we build character, so let us not get all drippy over the subject of minorities because we have all suffered together in building a great nation—Canada. Bringing the culture of all of us together with understanding and education is the only way, to my mind, that we will continue to build a great nation. We should not legislate division.

With that introduction I should now like to refer to one of the problems in the debate at this stage of third reading. I am one of those who, when the rule changes went through the House of Commons, questioned two particular rule changes. I used all the ability at my command, both in my party and in the House of Commons, to stop them. Firstly, I still maintain that the power of this institution lies in the power it held over the purse strings. When the government took the power over the purse strings away from this House and assigned it to a committee, we lost power.

Secondly, I do not say that every bill should be studied in the committee of the whole clause by clause, but our system of studying bills has been completely reformed. I think most people here—and I am getting a little unkind in this regard—are followers, not leaders. Some people are so frightened of the medium of communication that if they read a bad editorial they run and hide. If somebody says that Parliament must be reformed, they say: "That is what you have to do because votes cannot be won." We must lead. When we cease to lead, the medium of communication has to step in and lead for us. Because this bill goes to the very root of human and civil rights of Canadians, it should have come before the House of Commons and been studied clause by clause.

What is the weakness of the committee system? We have a fairly good legal affairs committee, though I will have something to say about how unprejudiced and prejudiced it was at certain times. The number of Conservatives who attended the committee was limited, as was the number of Liberals, New Democrats and Creditistes. Perhaps there was only one Creditiste on the committee, and he would have to go back to his caucus and, with all his wisdom, tell them what was in the bill. Most members of parties attached to the House of Commons are so busy that you would be lucky to have an important piece of legislation like this discussed at one or even half a caucus meeting. So, we are into this debate today, and I say with the greatest respect—and this may be why the interest is waning—that our knowledge of it is not as good as it might have been. We should have studied this bill clause by clause. I would have liked to have seen what would have happened when the House, in committee of the whole, reached section 267C, the provision about seizing documents. There would have been a filibuster and we would have killed it.

I say that this particular section is unconstitutional. If we want to streamline our committee system, that is fine. Hitler streamlined things, and so did Mussolini. I know the minister does not like this, and the people who want rule changes shake their heads. But I would remind the minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, that I have the right to say what I have said, and I will continue to say it.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Would the hon. member permit a question. No one is disputing his right to say anything in this House, but would it not have been open to any member, in accordance with the new rules, to submit an amendment at the report stage 24 hours before debate began and without any limitation whatever?

Mr. Woolliams: The minister is talking about the report stage. I wrote the minister a letter and he was very courteous and replied. I said that I hoped the bill would not come before the House until we got the reports of the committee. The minister did carry out his word. I got the reports of the committee, but where was I when the reports came out? The House had adjourned for the Easter recess and the bill was called the first day we all returned. I had these reports airmailed to me special delivery during the Easter recess, and no other member had time to study them. We had to draw up our amendments—(and I am sorry the minister had to raise this point)—based on the old bill because the new bill as amended by the committee, was not printed. In fact, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) had to call me to ask where he could get a copy, and asked why it was so secret.

The minister says: "Why doesn't somebody in your party stand up and complain?" Well, I am complaining. If this is the kind of committee work and consideration we are going to give this bill, then our general knowledge will be limited. With the greatest respect to the minister, we should have had the opportunity to deal with this measure clause by clause, with every member as well informed as the committee members. This is not an easy piece of legislation. Therefore, I say at the outset that the standing committee is unable to function well.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Let us take another look at committees. We have some free minds in our committees. I am always impressed by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hogarth). On the other hand, there are other members, some members of this party and some members of other parties, who sort of line up along political lines. Every committee is controlled by the government and most committees have government chairmen. If I were writing the Cohen report I would not be like the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan), because he not only wrote the report that recommended the legislation but he sat on the committee which decided whether it was good or bad legislation that should or should not come before this House.

The Lord Chief Justice of Great Britain said that justice must not only be done, it must be seen to be done. I do not know whether it is my training in the law that makes me unfit to appreciate these parliamentary niceties, but if I walked into a court of law which resembled this committee I would take a chance on my bar association and challenge that judge such as this member as being prejudice. I would succeed. I am just pointing this out to those who talk about fair committees and how they work. I am not impressed with this committee system and I never will be impressed with it.

I do not suggest every bill should be studied in committee of the whole, but certain bills that change fundamental rights should be studied in this House clause by clause so every Member of Parliament knows what is in it and has a capability of voting. We are now considering a bill in respect of which there is division in the House. People will vote according to their conscience, but they can only come to a conclusion according to their conscience when they have knowledge.

The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) was a very active member of our committee. He took his position on the hate bill according to his conscience, as a result of his knowledge. I know he admires my position and I admire his, but that is a different situation. There are people, and make no mistake about it, who do not know what is in the bill or what it says. The minister knows that.

There are members who are listening to me now in this House who know nothing of the contents of this bill. There is where I find fault with the new committee system.

Let me now come to the second point I want to make with reference to the constitutionality of the bill itself. Before I do that there is perhaps another point I should make. I want to go along with what the minister is recorded as having said at page 5552 of Hansard for Monday, April 6. He said:

> It purports, on the face of it, to eliminate a few lines of the bill. But what it does is truncate and absolutely vitiate the bill, and if adopted by the House would kill the bill. I do not think we can prevaricate about that. That is exactly what it will do.

He was referring to the purpose of the amendment. In that regard the minister and I are on fair, square and just grounds. He is correct.

I want to refer specifically to one member but I cannot refer to how all members voted individually. In any event, anybody on the government side who voted against the amendment and then spoke from the other side of his mouth against the bill cannot really justify his position. He has either done so from a lack of knowledge of the bill because of the trouble I mentioned earlier of not being a member of the committee, or perhaps because he has some problems at home in his constituency. I leave that for his judgment, not mine.

Let us get down to the constitutionality of the bill. I say at the outset with the greatest of respect, and I should like to have more time to discuss this, I believe this bill is unconstitutional. It is unconstitutional because it goes to the very roots of our freedoms. What are some of our freedoms? I think they have to be repeated, just briefly.

Let me refer to the Supreme Court of Canada decision in the famous Alberta statute case when the late Mr. Aberhart, the former premier of Alberta, was introducing censorship of the press. This was not Information Canada, it was censorship. He wanted the newspapers to write what he wanted to read, not what they were writing. At that time they were drawing some pretty horrible cartoons of that particular individual. He was inciting the people against the depression, against unemployment and against economics. Mr. Aberhart would never have survived under the hate literature bill, not if any attorney general was doing his job. Anyhow, he brought in censorship of the press.

What the Supreme Court of Canada said in that case, and I have not time to go into it in detail, was very simple. The judges of the Supreme Court, as I understand them, said that they looked at the preamble of the BNA act and came to the conclusion that there were certain inalienable rights there for the protection of individuals. They said that the British had developed these over a thousand years because the customs of the Anglo-Saxons became crystallized into traditions; the traditions in turn became crystallized into common law, and the common law was interpreted by the courts. This was the basis of the common law in our written statutes, and all of it protected the rights of the individual. They made reference to the Magna Carta, and various other acts. As I understand it this was supported by Professor Tarnopolsky. So, the Supreme Court of Canada came to the conclusion that the preamble of the BNA act had built more than just a little house.

The Supreme Court judges said that all the rights our forefathers fought for, died for and worked for, were protected, and included in the BNA act. They suggested in that famous case, which was the start of the constitutional interpretation, that these rights were in the BNA act and if any act infringed upon them then such act, whether it was passed by this place or a legislature, would be ultra vires. There was a reference to the right of the individual to life. That has reference to genocide and although I suggested taking that part out of the bill, I can see some weaknesses in the Code. I have never been impressed with the idea that we need any part of this bill. We have these rights of liberty and security of person and of property.

A boy or girl who sets out for school from his father and mother's home and gets to school safe and sound does not do so because of the Prime Minister here or the premier of his province. The accomplishment is based on the fundamental rule of law which is based on the common law I discussed. These inalienable rights are spelled out in the unwritten portion of our constitution and in the British North America Act. We have now set up a very fine committee to study the constitution.

When the Supreme Court of Canada decided that first case in reference to the Aberhart law it said, as the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) later stated in the Bill of Rights, that there was inherent the right to life, the right to individual equality, freedom of religion and freedom of speech. How can you have freedom of speech without freedom of thought and freedom of communication? I will have something to say about that. The Supreme Court also said there was the right of freedom of the press.

So, the first decision that came from the Supreme Court of Canada found that the BNA act was not a dry old document, but included all the inalienable rights I have talked about which are found now in the Bill of Rights and are now part of the statutes of Canada by interpretation. I will have something to say about the Drybones case in a few minutes because it shows the development in chronological order of our freedoms and the fact that the constitution is subject to the Bill of Rights. These freedoms are written into our statutes.

Let me make the point now with emphasis that I am convinced in my own mind, if we have the kind of judges we believe we have on the judiciary in Canada with imagination and creative ability, this monstrous legal document will be declared to be ultra vires and thrown out of our society. I repeat, it will do nothing for minorities. There will be nothing in it for minorities on the basis of religion, race, colour, creed, individual or group. It does not even mention class, as I said earlier. I say it is unconstitutional in view of the Provisions of the BNA act, and the Bill of Rights.

I say this is the point to which we should direct our attention when voting. Before I go on to discuss the question of law, let me suggest to the minister that he should take this out of our hands right now. He should not again make the mistake he made in proclaiming the breathalyzer law. He should request the Supreme Court of Canada to determine whether the opposition in this regard is right or wrong. I am getting tired of these ministers who stand in their places and say they have talked to the legal officers and know what the certain law is.

• (4:40 p.m.)

In the Lake Louise case the law officers were wrong: They were wrong then and they have been often wrong throughout the legal development in this country. As the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert said, the very men who were drafting the Bill of Rights, according to instructions, argued against the Bill of Rights in the Supreme Court of Canada. Well, lawyers are lawyers and law is not an exact science. I am making this point: take this legal monstrosity and find out whether it is constitutional. However, but do not stand up please and tell me that it is constitutional because you have spoken to somebody.

We found out how good the legal officers were today when we wanted to ascertain whether or not the Auditor General had exceeded his jurisdiction. The minister said it was a bad question. He meant to say it was an embarrassing question when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) acts frivolously as he does. The minister is never frivolous; he accepts his job with responsibility. Naturally, I put him on the spot. I wanted to find out what he meant when he said it was illegal. So, naturally when the minister tells me this bill will be constitutional—and I can guess that argument—I say let us get on with it. I say this bill is unconstitutional because of the Bill of Rights. What did the Supreme Court of Canada say about the Bill of Rights? As a lawyer I was always bothered when the Bill of Rights was before the House. I could see how it would affect legislation already enacted by Parliament. What concerned me was the effect it would have in respect of legislation not yet passed. That is where I had a legal hangup in respect to the Bill of Rights.

I spoke to various people about the Bill of Rights. The Supreme Court of Canada went a long way. The Chief Justice, who has now retired, has answered my problem. What a great Chief Justice he was! He is now retired and therefore I may speak of him. When I was a very young man I appeared before him and was as nervous as a church mouse. I did not need a better counsel because he assisted me when I was weak in argument. He was understanding. Here is a former Chief Justice of Canada who, in respect of the Drybones case, actually disagreed with his brother judges in his Court. When he stepped down he said that now the majority of the court of Canada has found it is the Bill of Rights which determines whether this legal monstrosity is constitutional or not. The Chief Justice said to the other courts that they now have to carry out the rules as set out in the Drybones case. I spoke to one judge, in Calgary whom the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) appointed. He just laughed me out of the office before the Supreme Court of Canada decision on the application of the Bill of Rights.

The highest court in the land now has told the district courts, the trial courts and the courts of appeal they are bound by the Bill of Rights. That is really what the Drybones case is about. I repeat, what a great name for it when one considers the name of the fellow and the fact that he was charged with being drunk; his bones must have been pretty dry! This is what the court said. It was held by Ritchie, Fauteux, Martland, Judson, Spence and Hall that there was no dispute about the facts. They went on to say:

—the words of sec. 2 of the Canadian Bill of Rights afforded the clearest indication that they were intended to mean—what they did mean. Judges would never accept that they meant what they said. They did not have the imagination or the creative capacity of the Supreme Court of Canada in respect of the Aberhart case, as I call it, to apply the preamble of the BNA Act to all the rights we inherited from the mother country when Canada became a country. These people had imagination and creatibility. Thank God we have men of knowledge and their creativeness.

I do not get tied up emotionally on this at all. I get tied up legally. The Supreme Court of Canada has made the law clear. In my opinion, in view of the decision on the Bill of Rights, this legal monstrosity would be declared to be a lot of nonsense, and unconstitutional. I listened with great interest to my friend from Hillsborough who paid me a great compliment. He is an historian and a man of great knowledge. Maybe I see it too clearly; perhaps I am too close to the forest to see the trees. This is what the majority of the Supreme Court of Canada held in the Drybones Case."

—if a law of Canada could not be "sensibly construed and applied" so that it did not abrogate, abridge or infringe one of the rights and freedoms recognized and declared by the Bill, then such law was inoperative unless it was expressly declared by an Act of the parliament of Canada that it should operate notwithstanding the Canadian Bill of Rights.

Now, what is the duty of the Minister of Juntice (Mr. Turner)? Well, I appeared before a judge for whom I have a good deal of respect, Mr. Justice Riley of Calgary. He is a liberal with a small "l". He was a Liberal who was a Liberal. I do not mean the new brand of liberalism. He believes the Bill of Rights, must be applied. What is the duty of the minister if this bill is passed? This is found at page 110 of Tarnopolsky's "The Canadian Bill of Rights". If the minister finds that this bill is contrary to the Bill of Rights, then he must get these officers of the Crown who are opposed to the Bill of Rights to prepare a certificate saying that the hate bill is contrary to the Bill of Rights. That is his function. Let us read what is said here:

Another criticism arose over a private member's amendment to the old Fisheries Act. This amendment purported to re-enact the old Act, and then it included a clause at the end to the effect that the Act should be brought into conformity with the Bill of Rights. The Minister of Justice was charged with failing in his duty as he had not certified or reported that the Bill was consistent or inconsistent with the Bill of Rights. He replied that he had discussed the proposed amendment with the Speaker and they had decided that it was not yet properly before the House for second reading, and that until that time there was nothing upon which he could report. The time for the report, he said, was when a Bill is called for second reading and is ruled by the Chair to be properly before the House for second reading.

Now, of course, we are considering third reading because the principle of the bill is discussed at the third reading stage.

In the debate on the Fisheries Act and the Narcotic Control Act it became clear that all members of the House might not agree with the Minister's advice that a proposed Bill was or was not inconsistent with the Bill of Rights.

Then, he pauses there and says if that conclusion is arrived at—and it is important to the inalienable rights of Canadians—then isn't it the duty of the Minister of Justice to refer that bill to the highest court of the land to find out. We are not supposed to speak here as constitutional lawyers. We speak here as parliamentarians. The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) made a very intelligent speech on this subject. It is not necessary to quote all the constitutional cases he referred to this afternoon. They should give him a law degree.

I shall continue the quotation:

In the debate on the Fisheries Act at least two members of the Opposition, Mr. Howard—for whom I have a lot of respect.

—of the New Democratic Party, and Mr. Carter of the Liberal Party, stated that the new Act was still not in conformity with the Bill of Rights because, inter alia, the burden of proof of innocence rests with the accused—

Let us pause here for a few moments, because I shall quote a great legal mind. This is a person who used to be known as our wheat expert. He has gone to the other place.

In the debate on the Narcotic Control Act, Mr. Martin of the Liberals stated that the denial of the presumption of innocence in it was a violation of the Bill of Rights. Since that time every session has heard allegations that some Bills or proposed regulations are not in accordance with the Bill of Rights, and that the Minister has not exercised his responsibilities—which he should exercise, and which I say he should do.

Let us apply that thinking for a few moments to this monstrosity. Let us just see how this bill would be interpreted by the Supreme Court of Canada or by Paul Martin. If he were seated here he would be eating the Tories out, as he used to do, even if there were 208 of us—chewing us like nails—if he had to put up with this. A judge who is satisfied by information upon oath, just a plain affidavit such as one can swear in certain offices all the time, that there are reasonable grounds for believing that any publication, copies of which are kept for sale or distribution in premises within the jurisdiction of the court, is hate propaganda, shall issue a warrant under his hand authorizing seizure of the copies. I have in my files the Cohen report which is full of copies of alleged hate literature from the United States. When this bill becomes law, will someone come to my office with an affidavit and go through my political files on the pretence he is looking for hate literature when he is really looking for other material? That is the point!

The Supreme Court of Canada, in view of their interpretation of the Bill of Rights and the BNA Act, would declare this bill unconstitutional. I hope I have time to develop this point. The hate law demands that one prove one's innocence. Take this little old picture of Prime Minister Wilson. The other day in the Daily Mirror he was referred to as a poodle dog. They said he sniffs and snorts at the public often and then hangs his head. If one had in his possession some document in respect of an identifiable group, whatever that means, and it were seized, then in seven days he must come before the court and prove he is innocent.

What kind of jurisprudence is this? What kind of nonsense is it? As an average Canadian, an average pleader and an average lawyer, I cannot believe that any court in this land will hold this kind of law constitutional. How can the minister believe in this law: If he does not believe it, then I ask him to do what the professor said in his book—seek advice. Make sure that it is either constitutional or unconstitutional, let the courts of Canada decide. But the hon. member for Calgary North is not going to approve this bill with that provision in it because I say it is unconstitutional. In any event, the bill would work against all minorities and against all people in any place where there is freedom of speech.

Now, we come to the constitutional problem of the Bill of Rights. Mr. Justice Hall from Saskatoon, an able pleader and a great lawyer before his appointment said in the Drybones case:

> The social situations in Brown versus Board of Education and in the instant case are, of course, very different, but the basic philosophic concept is the same. The Canadian Bill of Rights is not fulfilled if it merely equates Indians with Indians in terms of equality before the law, but can have validity and meaning only when, subject to the single exception set out in section 2, it is seen to repudiate discrimination in every law of Canada by reason of race, national origin, colour, religion or sex in respect of the human rights and fundamental freedoms—

Perhaps the only point which should be emphasized is that the Bill of Rights is far superior, not only superior as a form of document but superior in relation to its use of the words "race, creed and colour". These words have been used by many orators because they are so effective. The bill refers to "identifiable group" as meaning any section of the public distinguished by colour, race, religion or ethnic origin. Therein lies the difference. On this legal ground this hate bill is unconstitutional and should never have come before us. What a hangup most people have had? Tarnopolsky said:

> In interpreting the Canadian Bill of Rights the courts should not look to the preamble for statements of substantive law.

That is what the Supreme Court did in the Drybones case. You cannot equate an Indian with an Indian, and fancy trying to equate an Indian with a person off the reservation. An Indian could not get off the reservation to come and see me in my house. I buy him a few vodkas and he gets drunk. He is guilty and I am not because we are in a private place. It took ten long years for judges with imagination and creativity to properly apply the Bill of Rights. My main point is that the hate bill is unconstitutional.

Before I sit down I want to make one more point. I am convinced that many great men have had to be radical, and thank goodness they were. We would never have got children out of mines and factories, we would never have got unions formed, nor achieved justice and dignity for labour. Groups that have been separated by colour, or religion would never have obtained the freedom that they enjoy today in Canada if somebody had not incited trouble. That is why Martin Luther King is recognized as a reformer. He incited the people of the United States; he told them about the deep prejudices in the south, and as a result of that incitement change was achieved. The cost for that incitement was his own life. We should take a good look at the clause in the bill which says that everyone who, by communicating statements in any public place, incites hatred against any identifiable group where such incitement is likely to lead to a breach of the peace is guilty of an offence. The defences under the bill to which the minister referred do not apply. I would like every member in the press gallery to pick up this bill and read page 2, section 267B. The defences do not follow that section; they are in reference to the other section which reads:

Everyone who, by communicating statements, other than in private conversation, wilfully promotes hatred—

These persons are guilty unless their statements are true. How can you prove whether a religious statement is true or untrue? Clarence Darrow in the monkey case illustrates the point. The section goes on to read: "if, in good faith, he expressed" an opinion upon a religious subject. The defence does not apply to the section about incitement. The hate bill should come to a knowledgeable vote. First of all, it segregates Canadians and does not build up the Canadian spirit; second, it is unconstitutional; and third, there is only one good thing that can come from this bill being approved by Parliament. If a person is charged with an offence, and that person so charged takes the case to the Supreme Court of Canada the hate bill will be declared ultra vires. The people of Canada will then know what horrible legal monstrosity has been passed to destroy the faith of minority groups and our right to speak our thoughts.

I say that without incitement there can be no charge. Read the editorial in the Globe and Mail of this morning. It points out that the past leaders of our national parties who brought about confederation would have been put in jail under this bill. John A. Macdonald and Laurier have stated matters of hate. As long as I am in parliament and changes are necessary, I will incite people to obtain reforms. If, as a result, I cause a breach of the peace and some attorney general wants to lay a charge, I am prepared to be a martyr because one could not give a man a better cause. All great men have accomplished reform in human behaviour and relationships by inciting people. What kind of pantywaists are we?

Amendment to Standing Orders

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motion.

• (5:00 p.m.)

PRIVATE MEMBERS' NOTICES OF MOTIONS

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SUGGESTED RULE CHANGE

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni) moved:

That the Standing Orders be amended by adding thereto the following:— 117. The Standing Orders shall be amended only by the affirmative votes of at least three quarters of the Members of the House of Commons.

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with regard to the irregularity or illegality of the motion moved by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett), specifically with regard to its wording.

The motion reads as follows:

That the Standing Orders be amended by adding thereto the following:

The addition to the Standing Orders of a new rule, that is Standing Order no. 117, is being proposed.

117. The Standing Orders shall be amended only by the affirmative votes of at least three quarters of the members of the House of Commons.

I should like to point out that the motion is not worded in the usual terms: That, in the opinion of the House, the government should study the possibility or the advisability of doing such or such a thing. That motion is not proposing an amendment to the B.N.A. Act, which says under section 49:

Question arising in the House of Commons shall be decided by a majority of voices other than that of the Speaker, and when the voices are equal, but not otherwise, the Speaker shall have a vote.

Now if the motion, as worded, were passed, it would mean that the Standing Orders of the House have priority over section 49 of the British North America Act. I think this motion, in its present form, should be declared void by the Speaker, in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 51 which says, and I quote:

Whenever Mr. Speaker is of the opinion that a motion offered to the House is contrary to the rules and privileges of Parliament, he shall apprise the House thereof immediately, before putting the question thereon, and quote the standing order—

In that connection, one must refer to citation 67 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms dealing with the historical background of that question and particularly to citation 13 which says, and I quote:

A statute regulation—

such as section 49 of the British North America Act,

—supersedes, and cannot be abrogated by, any order of the House to which it applies.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest you refer to such citations as well as to page 228 of Sir Erskine May's 17th edition. Certain precedents are given and then it says:

[English]

A statute overrides, and cannot be superseded by, an order or regulation of one House or of both jointly.

And there follows an explanation of that principle.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I contend that the motion in its present form is absolutely void, that it should be declared out of order and rejected by the Chair as contrary to section 49 of the British North America Act which stipulates that decisions in the House of Commons are not made by a 75 or 90 per cent majority but should be made by a majority of members.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on the point of order that has been raised by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Forest). I may say at the outset that in this party we have different views and I might not be 100 per cent in favour of my hon. friend's motion, but I certainly defend his right to present it to the House for the consideration of hon. members. The Parliamentary Secretary relies for his objection to the motion on section 49 of the BNA act, but then goes on to say that the Speaker must advise the House of anything that is contrary to the rules and regulations of the House. I noted in particular, when he read that rule, that there is no reference there to the BNA act.

On the other side of the coin I draw Your Honour's attention to citation 71(5) which appears at page 61 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, and which reads as follows:

The Speaker will not give a decision upon a constitutional question nor decide a question of law, though the same may be raised on a point of order or privilege.

[Mr. Forest.]

That seems to give the Parliamentary Secretary every right to raise this point of order and to have it discussed, but it seems to me that if, as he himself has said, the issue is a constitutional one then you, Sir, are barred by citation 71(5) from making a ruling on it.

I know that section 49 of the BNA act seems rather clear when it says:

Questions arising in the House of Commons shall be decided by a majority of voices other than that of the Speaker, and when the voices are equal, but not otherwise, the Speaker shall have a vote.

But it does not say what kind of majority, and I can see lawyers, who get more concerned over details than of course I would—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I hoped that remark would not go unnoticed. I can see them arguing over the fact that there can be different kinds of majorities. There can be simple majorities, two-thirds majorities, three-quarter majorities and so on. Then we have, right in the BNA Act itself, in section 91, a provision with respect to entrenched clauses that departs somewhat from the usual majority rule. In this, Mr. Speaker, I am not purporting to say what section 49 means but I am asserting that it is open to legal argument, and that that is precisely the reason for Beauchesne's citation 71(5) which protects the Speaker from having to make decisions on a constitutional point.

I draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that a few years ago we had a bill, or a resolution, in the name of the then hon. member for Lotbinière, Mr. Choquette, who wanted to make some change in the monarchy or in parliament's relation to the monarchy. The former hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) objected on a point of order. If I recall correctly there was a debate on the point of order, and Mr. Speaker took the position then that this was a constitutional issue on which Parliament could make a decision if it wanted to, but it was not the prerogative of the Chair to decide on a constitutional question, so the motion was allowed.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, irrespective of whether we want to go along with the 75 per cent rule suggested by my colleague and friend, it does seem to me he has the right to present the motion and that the House has the right, if it wishes, to decide by a majority vote on a three-quarters majority rule. If someone thinks that that is unconstitutional then the place to take it is to the Supreme Court of Canada, not to Mr. Speaker sitting in the Chair of the House of Commons.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, while I think it is a very interesting point of order which the Parliamentary Secretary has raised, one that can lead to an interesting discussion, one we would all greatly enjoy, I think Your Honour's prerogative in the matter is clearly limited by citation 71(5) which says you shall not give a decision on a constitutional question.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I thank both hon. members for their contributions, and I will agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) when he suggests that it is an interesting point of order which has been raised by the Parliamentary Secretary. What I would like to do is to exercise another option available to the Chair, the option to reflect on the point of order, and in the event that this motion comes to the point where a vote has to be taken, at that point I would certainly be ready to render a decision. In the meantime we might proceed with the motion without prejudicing the point of order raised by the Parliamentary Secretary.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I cannot say that the point of order raised on my proposed amendment to the Standing Orders came as a complete surprise to me. I regard this interesting point, as it has been referred to, rather as a matter of debate than as a point of order. In opening my remarks on this motion I might say that I believe that any sensible interpretation of section 49 of the BNA Act is that it obviously was intended to prescribe the manner in which the House would arrive at decisions on public questions, on matters of public policy, rather than having any relationship whatsoever to the internal management of the House of Commons itself, and the rules under which it should govern its proceedings. I may have some reference during the course of my remarks to what another member of this House had to say on this very point in an earlier debate.

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, this motion is intended to draw the attention of the members of this House to a debate which took place in this chamber last July; in fact, a debate which commenced on July 7, 1969 and came to a conclusion at ten minutes to two on Friday, July 25—a.m. that is. I mention this to recall to members of the House that we had a very extensive debate at that time on the question of the proposed changes to the rules of the House. This debate, because of its length, because of its fury on occasion and also because of some of the very fine contributions, indicated a crisis about the manner in which this House should operate, and the principles behind the rules of Parliament.

As far as I have knowledge, Mr. Speaker, there have been three principal occasions in the lifetime of the House of Commons of Canada when the question of the rules and the operation of the House has reached what one might describe as a fever pitch. One occasion was last July and, another was during the course of what is commonly referred to as the pipeline debate. These are the two of which I have personal experience. The third occasion was the crisis in the proceedings of the House arising out of what have been referred to as the great naval debates of 1913, and the procedural debate which resulted in the adoption into the Standing Orders of the House of the rule of closure.

Of these three occasions on which the debate of the House on its rules and operations reached fever pitch, the one last July was the most useless, the one for which there was the least excuse. Indeed, it could not have come into being had it not been for the inexperience and arrogance of some members of the present government. The House of Commons had been functioning in a mood which was conducive to a change in the rules by the ordinary method. The procedures committee of the House, during the earlier part of this Parliament, had brought to fruition a drastic reorganization of our procedures. These changes had, in turn, been the result of an extended period of meetings of the procedures committee begun during the period following 1963, when the Right Hon. Lester Pearson became prime minister of Canada.

I should like to recall to the attention of the House, Mr. Speaker, that during all of that period prior to the commencement of this Parliament in 1963, the procedures committee had sat with the Speaker as its chairman and had maintained the traditional attitude that the rules of the House were the property of the whole House and should be divorced, as far as any discussion of their change was concerned, from the hands of the government. This is a position which I believe had been maintained throughout the entire lifetime of the Canadian Parliament with the exception of one particular occasion when there was unilateral action taken by the government of the day in 1913 to introduce a motion to amend the rules of the House. This was done without references to any procedures committee.

This sort of action, Mr. Speaker, lives long in the mind of Parliament. I know that when I first came to this House, quite recently really, the memories and echoes of that debate of 1913 were still in the minds of many of the more experienced members of this chamber, even though none of them had been in the House when it took place. The dean of the House then was the Honourable Chubby Power who, I believe, was first elected to Parliament in 1917.

But, Mr. Speaker, the advent of that particular rule, not only because of what it was but because of the method employed to bring it into the House, did grievous damage to this institution. In the minds of many people in Canada it was only overshadowed and faded into the background as a result of the crisis period which developed during the pipeline debate. The atmosphere of ugliness of the pipeline debate had all but disappeared from the minds and memories of members of this House when last July the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) abandoned the standing practice and procedure of this House concerning amendment of the rules, for, apparently, a practice which is still to be maintained. Now, the Standing Committee on Procedure is to be a committee dominated by the government, as is any ordinary committee of the House instead of following the practice where His Honour the Speaker traditionally was chairman of that committee and the Clerk of the House of Commons was the clerk.

Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, I do not expect the House to give easy passage to my proposal today. Indeed one or two of my colleagues have indicated that they have questions on its advisability. But I very deliberately put it on the Order Paper because I had hoped that when it came up for discussion in the House there could be some quiet reflection upon just what happened last July. Perhaps then the mood of the House would be to think how far we had departed from the tradition and practice of Parliament in the debate which took place then, which included the use of closure to enforce a new form of closure rule. To some of us, this was about the ultimate, except that as the time, and today, more important than the particular subject matter of any of those rules was the state of mind which would allow the crushing mass of an official government majority to force rule changes through this House of Commons. As far as my understanding goes, Mr. Speaker, this happened only once before, and that was during the adoption of the original closure rule to which I have already referred.

May I point out that because of the growing recognition of the need to streamline parliamentary business, recent rule changes had already achieved a great deal. In the discussion last July there was no argument, nor was there in procedural committees for a period of years prior to that, about the need for change. Indeed, in all the procedural committee meetings in the years following the aftermath of the pipeline debate, no one at all seriously suggested the abolition of the closure rule about which there was such a serious battle at the time of its introduction, a battle that was bitter not only because of the proposed change in the rules but also because of the manner in which it was enacted. The government of the day, led by the right hon. Mr. Borden, decided, in order to achieve its purposes, to force this change of the rules through the House unilaterally. That is why for so many years the mere mention of the closure rule was a nasty thing in the minds of so many parliamentarians, and in the minds of so many people across the country. Indeed, it was also the reason the pipeline debate had the impact on the Canadian people which was indicated in the results of the general election next following.

• (5:20 p.m.)

I should like to refer just briefly to one or two of the things that were said in that debate on the matter of the closure rule in 1913 to indicate something of the atmosphere and the temper under which that motion was introduced. I note that the Leader of the Opposition, who was Sir Wilfrid Laurier, was not granted the normal courtesy of the House. He was not allowed to follow the Prime Minister when he introduced the motion but, by a motion that somebody else be heard, the government's majority denied the leader of the Opposition the traditional right to reply to a statement coming from the leader of the government. That was symptomatic of the atmosphere which had been generated in the House by the government. Mr. Borden moved his resolution in April, 1913. I am about to quote from page 8426 of Hansard for April 23, 1913. Mr. Macdonald, the member for Pictou, was speaking, and he said in part:

> Talk about parliamentary rules and parliamentary amenities? They have become a thing of the past as a result of the attitude of hon. gentlemen in regard to this matter. The hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) referred to the unconstitutionality of this resolution.

This is not the first time that questions of constitutionality regarding procedural amendments have been raised. The Hansard report continues as follows:

I venture to say that the Minister of Justice will not assert that the Government had any right to submit this resolution in the form it is submitted. What was the position? There being no express rule of this House providing for a method of amending the rules of the House, you proceeded to rule I and found that the custom and usage in England before 1867 governed, and in 1867 there never had been a rule amended except by referring it to a special committee of the House of which Mr. Speaker was a member. Therefore, these hon. gentlemen broke the rules in trying to impose this tyrannous Tory proposition upon the people of this country and upon this House. If any municipal body proceeded to pass a by-law as the Government are passing this resolution, that by-law would be declared illegal and invalid by every court in the country.

The next man who spoke was the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, the man who, according to my reading, was the real architect of the closure rule. The Hansard report continues in this vein:

Mr. Meighen: Would the by-law be also illegal and invalid if it were put through in the way the hon. member wants the resolution put through, by a committee of the House and then passed by the House?

Mr. MacDonald: Oh, not at all; it would depend on the statute and usage governing the municipality. My hon. friend is at his old trick in making a suggestion of that kind but it will not do. My proposition was that if the proper method to amend the rules of the House was to proceed under the usage of the Imperial Parliament as before 1867, the Government are not proceeding along these lines.

You see, there is the nub of the whole issue stated on April 23, 1913, in the debate on the resolution introduced by the prime minister of the day to put the closure rule into the Standing Orders of the House. The fact of the matter is that this House, in its Standing orders, has never had any rule covering the Standing Orders because, until very recently, with this one exception, it was never considered that it would be necessary to have in the Standing Orders provision for an amendment to the constitutional practice of this House. This is the whole point of my motion. If we are to have a government which adopts the attitude that it can bring any kind of motion at any time it wants in order to amend the rules of this House, then there must be written into the rules some kind of protection for the minority of the members of this House. I would much prefer that the rule of gentlemen prevail, a rule sometimes referred to as the rule of the ancient usage and customs of Parliament, the long standing effect of which is that it is unthinkable for the rules of this House to be amended except after discussion and consideration by a committee of which Mr. Speaker is the chairman. The fact he is Chairman emphasizes the fact that the committee referred to is a committee of Parliament and not a committee which in any way is a tool of the government. That, Mr. Speaker, is the issue; that is the point of my motion.

If I could get some kind of assurance from the government that it realizes this was not a proper and orderly method of amending the rules, that it would not happen again, that it was prepared to revert to the normal usage and practice of Parliament and that it would not infringe on the rights of the House, then I would be overjoyed to withdraw my motion from the Order Paper. But unless and until we are given some kind of understanding that the rules of the House are not pawns of the government, I intend to press for something along the lines I have suggested to be written into the Standing Orders. Whether it should be three quarters of the members to constitute a majority is a question that is open to discussion and debate. Certainly, we should not amend the rules of the House at the whim of the government and its supporters in the House of Commons. This, to me is the issue, the fundamental issue.

I should like to point, in closing my remarks, to just one other aspect of our rules. When we talk about the rules and usages of Parliament, let us remind ourselves that while we voluntarily agreed to some restrictions in our rules, up until very recently in the history of this Parliament one dissenting member could prevent any alteration of the Standing Orders of the House. In other words, it took unanimous consent to suspend the rules. If that does not underline the basic principles that I am trying to get at in this resolution, I do not know what can do it better. The fact that one member could say, "nay", after which Mr. Speaker said, "This will not be done at this time", is an indication of the long practice which has existed of protecting the right of minorities in this institution to which we belong and which is, in the last analysis, the keeper of the freedoms of the people of Canada.

Amendment to Standing Orders

• (5:30 p.m.)

Mr. D. Gordon Blair (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I believe every member of this House shares some of the sentiments which have been expressed by the hon. member who moved this motion. All would agree, I feel, that the general interest of the House is best served when procedural changes are made only after the widest search for a consensus and only after seeking the concurrence of all hon. members or, at least, of all the important parties represented in the House of Commons.

However, it has been shown by the history of this chamber, as indeed it has been shown by history at Westminster, that this type of consensus cannot always easily be obtained. During the first session of this Parliament I had occasion to look very carefully at the many changes which have been made in the rules at Westminster in recent years. We pay great attention, and I think properly so, because of the long history of that Parliament, to its rules, usages and procedures. The work which was undertaken in reforming and revising the rules of this House owes a great deal to the experience of our fellow legislators at Westminster.

I found that many of the recent rule changes at Westminster were proposed by representatives of the government party. Many of the most important were passed only after debate and after recorded divisions. On reading those debates and the comments on them I did not find anywhere the suggestion that it was improper for a majority of members to make a decision to change the rules. In fact, what press comment I saw was to the effect that the government had not moved quickly enough or gone far enough in proposing these changes.

My first contention is, therefore, that it is not improper or in any way anti-democratic, or against the interests of a parliamentary system, for the rules of this chamber to be altered by decision of a majority of its members. Indeed, speaking in terms of democratic principle I would suggest it is much more difficult to assert the view that a small minority in this chamber should have the power of veto to prevent changes being made—that a small minority should have the power to paralyse. I do not hesitate to advance this contention. It is a demonstrable democratic fact that the group which is held accountable by the people of Canada for the actions of this chamber is the majority party.

There is no democratic mechanism, as far as I am aware, which can call to account a small minority which may impede important and necessary changes. On the other hand, the power of the majority must be exercised with prudence and discretion; if the majority acts unwisely, at least the people know who is responsible. If improper action is taken, the people have their right and they can exercise it against the majority. But I say it is impossible for the people acting in this fashion to call to account a small minority which may on given occasions have the power to veto important changes in this chamber.

[Mr. Barnett.]

There is one example which will be recalled by all hon. members. As they know, the constitution of the United States provides that the President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur. I suppose there was no sadder decision in all recent history than the decision of the United States Senate not to ratify the League of Nations. We all know in retrospect that this was a terrible decision. The proposal received majority support but not the necessary support by two-thirds of those present. We remember, of course, the words which ring down through the doleful history of our times; the late President Wilson's description of the "little group of wilful men" who frustrated him in taking an action which to a large extent, in the opinion of many people, might have obviated the slaughter we experienced later on.

It is my contention that in terms of democratic principle it is proper that decisions as to changes in the rules of this House should be left with a simple majority.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blair: The majority is accountable. The majority will suffer if it acts improperly. On the other hand, the minority is not accountable. It cannot be found. There is no way in which the public can express its views on the inaction imposed by the minority in circumstances which might arise if the proposed motion were passed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): They could defeat the minority at the next election.

Mr. Blair: Well, that has been happening for all the elections I can remember. The minority has never obtained the degree of confidence from the public which would enable it to form a government. I say this in no unkindly way. I appreciate the desirability of securing approval for proposed changes from as many hon. members as possible. But I should hate to see us placed in a position where we were paralysed, where we were subject to the veto of minority groups and where we could not act if action became necessary.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. member whether he really understands what he has been saying. He says a majority party has never been defeated, which implies there has never been a change in government in Canada since Confederation. A minority has been increased so as to become a majority many times, and the contrary has also happened. Is this not correct?

Mr. Blair: Certainly the whole nature of our politics is that parties change, that governments change, and I have never yet heard anybody contend that this is not in the public interest. What I am saying is that when particular actions are taken in this House, whether by the enactment of legislation, the passage of substantive resolutions, the passage of estimates or the passage of procedural rules, somebody is accountable for what takes place. Under our present system the persons who are accountable, by and large, are the members of the majority who support the government then in power. If they make improper use of this power, if they act unwisely, then there is, as we all know, a very fast and sometimes overly efficient way for the public to deal with them.

I do not think that the view which the public takes of this chamber is one that should compel any hon. member to feel that we should adopt a procedure which would paralyse us in the nature of making further amendments to our rules. I have said before, and I have no hesitancy in saying again, that the view that the public takes of this House is, unhappily, far from being a laudatory one. I think all hon. members, whether they sit on this side or on the opposition side are aware of the fact that the public feel that many of our procedures, notwithstanding the great reforms that have been made, are outmoded, that we still are not in tune with the times and with the necessity for transacting large and important items of public business in time to confer essential benefits on the community.

I cannot share all the criticisms that are made of this chamber because some of them are made in ignorance of the true nature of the parliamentary process. But there is indubitably a feeling in the country that we are not quite doing our job, and I think that the public at large would view with alarm and dismay any suggestion that further reforms of procedure in this Parliament could only be possible if very rigorous procedural rules could be met.

As an example, Mr. Speaker, of the current view of our Parliament, let me refer to an editorial which appeared in the Iroquois Post for Wednesday, April 8, written by Peter Ward who is said to be a Toronto Telegram syndicate reporter. The article is entitled "It's a sad Parliament" and reads in part as follows:

> Early in the daily proceedings of Parliament comes that 40-minute exchange between the opposition and government known as the "question period". It's basically a time when cabinet ministers can expect to be put on the griddle for their sins, hence that 40 minutes often produces the best news copy of the day.
>
> The question period certainly hasn't been the same since the Pearson-Diefenbaker personality feuds have been replaced by the Trudeau cool and the Stanfield stammer.
>
> The opposition in this Parliament has been terrible. There has been no concentrated probing for government weaknesses, although Lord knows there are many, and very few strong personalities have emerged from the non-government side of the House.
>
> Some of the few opposition backbenchers who have tackled the government have received little or no help from the more august names in the front row, where the occupants seem bent on playing the worn-out game of party politics, forgetting that public opinion has consistantly rejected such shenanigans for years.
> The old-liners have lost their credibility.

It is a hard thing for us to accept the fact that this kind of editorial column comment is made across the country about our proceedings, but it does reflect what is a basic view of this Parliament. I suggest that not only in terms of democratic and parliamentary principle, but in keeping the mood of modern Canada it would be a mistake for us to adopt a proposal such as that made by the hon. member and lock ourselves into a position where any important changes in the rules of this chamber could only be made over the power of a small group of members to veto and defeat them.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when I intervened on the point of order I suggested that I was not completely happy with the proposal made in my colleague's motion. However, in the light of the debate there are one or two comments I want to make. The aspect of the motion that bothered me was the attempt to fix a rigid formula by which our rules would or could be changed. I do not like it being done in that way. I prefer the way that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) talked about, the method that we used for many decades, namely, consensus among the members of all the parties in the House.

Having listened to my hon. friend from Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Blair) I gather that it is the view on that side of the House that we should confirm the practice that we have had for a couple of rounds, namely, letting our rules be amended on the vote of a simple majority. If we are going to have a rigid form, then let us have one that protects the minority, and on that basis I would support the resolution now before us.

I would say, however, that common sense tells us that we should not rely on either of these formulas. Let us not have it confirmed as the practice for all time that a simple majority can dictate the rules of the House. Let us not have even a three-quarters majority so confirmed. Let us have the rule of consensus that has worked so well for many years. I am speaking not simply of the history I have read but of the history of some of the years I have been in this place.

I am afraid that my hon. friend from Grenville-Carleton confuses two things. He confuses the passing of legislation, the deciding of issues, and all the matters that come before Parliament and which a government that has been elected is committed to do something about, with the rules of this place, the constitution of this establishment, the things that were here when we came to this chamber, no matter which side of the House we are on. It is one thing to say that the government has the right by a simple majority to put through its program after debate, but it is another thing to say that the government of the day owns the place and has the right by a simple majority to change its rules.

Mr. Gibson: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. The hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Gibson) on a point of order.

Mr. Gibson: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I thought the hon. member was raising a point of order.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Gibson: Well, would the hon. member permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): That is not a point of order. If the hon. member wants to ask a question, he requires the permission of the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He has it, but I think he should ask for it and not raise it as a point of order.

Mr. Gibson: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for the erroneous manner in which I got to my feet. I wish to ask the hon. member a question.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Go ahead.

Mr. Gibson: The hon. member just made reference to the constitution, the provisions of the British North America Act. I believe unintentionally he gave the impression that the wording was different from what it is. Has the hon. member got the section from which he quoted, because I am sure the words used are not the words that are in the act?

• (5:50 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In my reference just now I was not talking of the constitution, the British North America Act; I was talking about the rules, the set-up, the way in which this place is constituted. I suggest that is something that has been worked out by consensus of the Parliaments we have had in the past 100 years, and that no one government here between two elections has the moral right to change that without the consensus of the House as a whole. We have been back and forth over this point. We went through it, of course, at great length in the debate last June and the debate the previous December.

I submit my friend the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is right, that the consensus way is much the better way. I am very sorry to hear the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton state the position from that side of the House that because they are in power they think they have the right to change the rules of this place. I might in parentheses ask what we stayed here for last July. We stayed around all that month on the infamous rule 75-C which has never been used. Of course, it cannot be used anyway, so we wasted that month.

As for this line that is constantly handed out that the public thinks we are not doing our job, I suggest if the public has any dissatisfaction with this Parliament, it is not over the time it is taking on the issues that come before us but it is the absence of issues that are worth taking our time. That is an aside and someone should have called me to order. Back to the issue itself, I think the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is to be commended for asking this House seriously to consider whether we should not get back to the old tried and true way of dealing with the rules of this House, namely, by a consensus of all concerned, not by the dictatorial action of the majority of the day.

[Translation]

Mr. Forest: Mr. Speaker, you have postponed your decision on the motion introduced by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) and I suggest that the issue might be a constitutional one. It seems obvious to me that the motion, as introduced by the hon. member, is quite illegal and void if you consider the very clear provisions of the British North America Act, because it does not express a desire or a wish. It should have been worded as motions of this kind usually are: that, in the opinion of this House the government should consider the advisability of amending the Standing Orders so that they could not be changed except by an affirmative vote of a certain number of members.

[English]

Mr. Barnett: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Parliamentary Secretary is obviously reviving the point of order he raised at the outset. I should like to point out to Your Honour that I did have consultations as to the drafting of this motion. It is not, as most motions are, a request that Parliament ask the government to consider the advisability of doing something. This motion is, quite properly, the property of the members of this House, not of the government.

If the Parliamentary Secretary wants to debate this point of order, he should recognize that my motion would not have appeared in this form had it not been the proper form for a subject matter of this kind. Questions as to the form of a motion are checked with the proper people before a motion is put on the Order Paper. I am not asking the government to consider the advisability of anything; I am asking the members of this House—and this is my point of order—to consider a proposal to amend the rules of the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Forest: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member when he claims that he is introducing his motion in a positive way so that it has the effect of bringing about a change in the Standing Orders of the house.

However, the Chair has not made a decision with respect to the point of order. In my opinion, it is still consistent with the Standing Orders to talk about this point of order raised when the motion was introduced at the beginning of the private members' hour.

If the motion in its present form were to be passed, it would constitute a precedent, for it would have the effect of blocking the implementation of section 49 of the British North America Act. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has dealt with a point which reflects the weakness of his argument. Indeed, he maintains that the majority is not defined in the British North America Act, and that it may be a matter of a majority of 75, 80 or 90 per cent.

Now, I do not find that argument very serious, and the more so since, in the same section, it is pointed out that should the votes be equal, the Speaker shall decide. It is clear—and such has always been the practice in the House—that the majority, that is half the votes plus one, decides when a question is put to the House.

However, Mr. Speaker, reverting to the motion before us, the proposed amendment would mean that in order to amend the Standing Orders—and they no doubt have to be improved—198 yeas out of 264 votes would be necessary.

I heard some hon. members mention that we still have to modernize our Standing Orders. Now, to require a majority vote from three quarters of the members of the House would by no means be a proper way to improve or modernize them.

I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre when he says that, generally speaking, amendments to the Standing Orders require unanimous consent from the hon. members. In most cases, we have proceeded accordingly, and the government never imposed its own views, because some committees sat for months and for many years in order to study the Standing Orders and suggest changes. All parties were represented on such committees. They could make their views known, and several recommendations made unanimously by the committees were adopted by—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until 8 o'clock.

At 6 o'clock the house took recess.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING HATE LITERATURE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) for the third reading of Bill C-3, to amend the Criminal Code.

Mr. Douglas A. Hogarth (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I will take only a moment on third reading of this bill. As one member who moved an amendment to this bill which was defeated in the committee and in the House, I am anxious to go on record in this debate as saying that despite the defeat of my amendment which dealt solely with one aspect of the bill, in my opinion on balance the bill will be for the benefit of the Canadian people.

When I spoke earlier I did not deal with other than the provisions in respect of genocide. To my mind the further provisions are the most important aspect of this legislation. The Cohen committee found there is need for the legislation proposed in this bill. I refer, without reading it, to page 59 of their report. The Senate was concerned, the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs of this House was concerned, and with the qualifications and reservations expressed by many of us this bill has now reached third reading stage.

I was finally persuaded by the speech of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) of Tuesday, April 7, as recorded at page 5609 of Hansard. Accordingly, bearing in mind the conscientious, honest and learned opinions of the right hon. gentleman and other members of this House who have contrary views, I shall vote for the bill in the hope that it will show that in this country we give more than lip service to racial and religious equality and that, in addition, we will not tolerate statements made in public which incite hatred when such statements are likely to lead to a breach of the public peace nor will we tolerate persons wilfully promoting hatred other than in private conversations without any justification or excuse. No such conduct, to my mind, should ever come under the guise of freedom of speech or communication in a modern state such as Canada is today.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? I respect his legal opinion. Does he think the bill, taken in its entirety, is constitutional?

Mr. Hogarth: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, although I have not participated previously in this debate I have listened to many of the speeches and have been quite impressed with the sincerity of those who have participated. This debate has produced a great deal of smoke and some heat with very little fire. My ancestors were very outspoken people. They came from northern Ireland. I say "came" because they were driven out of that part of Ireland because they protested and became known as Protestants. They went to Scotland, and even the Scottish could not stand them. Then they went to Canada and settled and helped establish the community of Orangeville. Over the years in northern Ontario, where many of them subsequently went, they were able to mix with other people and thus moderated their views. Now they express moderate protests against various things and even against various people.

Legislation of this type has been passed in other countries. If one were to examine the legislation passed in Germany one would find that that country had similar legislation. Charges were laid under it. We are all aware of the final result in that country.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the Bill of Rights, which was to establish for people rights in respect of other pieces of legislation, has not accomplished all the good which it was anticipated would result from it. I am of the opinion that this legislation also will accomplish nothing unless the people of Canada wish it to do so. Personally, I am not interested in cluttering up the statute books of our nation with legislation that will exist only because the people themselves accept it. In Canada we have not needed this type of legislation for 100 years, and I can see no justification today for the passage of this bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the said motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my view the nays have it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

CANADA GRAIN ACT

ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMISSION, PROVISIONS RESPECTING GRADING, LICENCES, ELEVATORS, ETC.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture) moved that Bill C-196, respecting grain, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill before us is a very significant piece of legislation providing for an updating and revision of the long-standing Canada Grain Act. This act is a key instrument in achieving an orderly and effective grain marketing and handling system in Canada, providing as it does for quality standards and quality control and for standards and procedures for the handling, transportation and storage of Canada's grain crops.

In the average year Canada produces approximately 1.5 billion bushels of grain, and in terms of dollar value this represents in the neighbourhood of $2 billion. To cope with an industry of this magnitude we must have an effective grain handling system and storage facilities. To market grain efficiently we must also have a rational and efficient grading system which effectively serves the available market.

Canada's trade in grain is a very large and very basic component of the total economy and contributes very substantially to the well-being of Canada. The ability of Canada to achieve and maintain her share of the world market will depend in very large measure on the quality of Canadian grains and on effective segregation of the grain into grades reflecting quality differences and the needs of the market. Here I might mention in particular the quality specifications and requirements of our customers.

Advancing technology, Mr. Speaker, is having a major impact on the grain industry of the world. Important developments have taken place in almost all the advanced nations in new and advanced processes relating to milling, baking, malting, macaroni making and other forms of the utilization of grains. For example, bread may now be produced by newer methods based on physical dough development and continuous baking systems instead of on the traditional methods through yeast fermentation.

There has also been considerable progress in methods of scientific evaluation and in control techniques and procedures. These developments have resulted in correspondingly more sophisticated requirements and specifications for grains in world markets. These specifications must be met, especially in view of the fact that alternative sources of supply from other countries have become more and more competitive.

Taking into account these quality requirements of our customers, the legislation that is before the House tonight has been designed to place Canada's industry in a position to meet these new challenges in export and domestic markets. It provides the flexibility to make changes and will enable us to change our standards and our grading from time to time in view of further developments.

The present Canada Grain Act, Mr. Speaker, sets out the grade standards for the various grains in the act itself and therefore can be changed only by an amendment brought before this House. This new bill sets out the grade standards as a schedule to the act. Therefore, the Governor in Council will have authority to change present grade standards, to establish new grades and generally to change the schedule of grades set out for any of the grains included in this act.

In urgent situations, for example, changes in the schedule of grades set out for any of the grains included in this act can be brought about quickly. I suggest that this is essential because opportunities sometimes come quickly and we must be in a position to respond to those changes. As a general rule, however, and in the interests of continuity we think it will probably take at least eight months to change any of these grades. I say that because there is, of course, a very important financial involvement so far as the inventory on hand that has been purchased from the producers is concerned, because that has not yet found its way through the gathering and transporting system to be loaded as export cargo.

The bill also provides for the inclusion of other quality factors such as protein content of wheat in establishing grain standards. This bill places the government in a position to implement, just as soon as is practicable, new grain standards for wheat which include protein as one of the quality factors. It, similarly, places the government in a position to deal with changes in other grade standards which may arise from time to time.

The authority of the Board of Grain Commissioners, named the Canadian Grain Commission under the new act, is also broadened to give the commission the ability to exercise authority, as the situation warrants, over the entire grain elevator system, including facilities such as feed mills and elevators associated with the processing industry. In the past their authority has been restricted to country, terminal, transfer, eastern and mill elevators. The elevators will be classified according to their principal use and will be licensed in a corresponding fashion.

The bill provides for a more complete control of railway cars and of grain movement. Authority, for example, to allocate available railway cars among shipping points will be continued. The Governor in Council will have authority to require elevator or railway companies to place at any particular point railway cars for the carriage of grain. In addition, the Governor in Council will have the authority to decide which minister or agency of the government shall exercise the powers of allocation of railway cars among the points and, indeed, among elevators at a particular shipping point. The bill provides the legislative base for the block system of grain transportation that was recently introduced into western Canada.

What has been done in the past few months really has been within the ambit of an agreement among interested parties to conduct their part of the block system in such a way as to achieve its objective, that objective being that the Canadian Wheat Board can be reasonably if not absolutely sure that precisely the kind of grain they have called for to be brought forward will be in fact the kind of grain that is in the railway cars and being delivered to the terminal elevators during a period when those kinds are needed. The reason behind this is that we do not wish to block, plug or congest the terminal system or railway system with the kind of grain that is not saleable at that particular point in time, to the detriment of our sales commitments with respect to that grain that is saleable.

In summary, Bill C-196 represents a complete revision of the Canada Grain Act. It is based on a study in depth covering an extended period of time and extensive consultations with industry representatives, ranging all the way from the producer to the ultimate terminal operator who loads the grain into our customers' ships. Furthermore, it will place the government and the Canadian Grain Commission in a position to serve the interest of the Canadian grain producers and the total grain industry. It is my firm belief that this act provides for the co-ordinated and efficient grain grading and handling system which we now require in the 1970s. It also equips us to make changes that may be needed to meet new developments and to meet new challenges in our domestic market and, more particularly, in world markets.

The general objective of this act is to protect the interests of the producers, to safeguard the quality of Canadian grains, to provide for an effective handling system and to achieve maximum acceptability of Canadian grains in domestic and export markets. A more specific object is to update the act so as to conform with present-day practices in the grain industry and provide greater flexibility in meeting requirements of export and domestic markets.

The act is divided into eight parts; I shall not refer to specific clauses, but just to the eight sections. The first deals with the constitution of the Canada Grain Commission; the second deals with grain grades, grading and inspection; the third part deals with licences and licensees; part four, with elevators and grain dealers; part five, with the carriage of grain, and part six, with enforcement and enforcement procedures. The seventh part is general in nature, and part eight has to do with transitional measures and consequential matters such as the repeal of the present act and the commencement of the new one when the regulations supporting the various statutory provisions are in force.

The last major revision of the Canada Grain Act took place in 1930, since which time many changes have occurred in the grain industry at home and abroad. We are all aware of this. The grain market, which was then mainly Europe-oriented, is now worldwide. A far greater percentage of our grain is used in Canada, particularly for livestock feeding. This is taken into account in the amendments.

The Canada Grain Act was designed to provide legislative authority for the control of the grading and movement of grain in both the private and the publicly-owned elevator system. This control is established in two ways; first, by setting up grade standards for the quality of all Canadian grain and imposing the requirement that grain movement through commercial channels should meet these standards; second, by establishing a licensing procedure which enables the board to control licensed elevators and ensure that the objectives of the act are attained.

In administering these provisions the board is required by the act to establish grades for new grains when required, maintain quality of standards for grades already established and provide for the proper segregation, storage, and treatment where necessary of all the grain moving through licensed facilities. All licensees are required to provide adequate insurance and bonding for the protection of grain while in storage. Tariffs for handling and storing grain are approved by the board. The board is also required to investigate all complaints made against licensees and to settle disputes arising within its jurisdiction. Broad powers are provided to arbitrate claims and disputes in the grain industry between parties other than licensees if there is agreement between the parties involved that the board should act as an arbitrator. The board also ensures the ordinary movement of grain by public carrier; it is empowered to exercise limited control in this area. The act also provides for a more extensive control over grain transportation by authority of the Governor in Council. Finally, as I said, the act provides the legislative basis for the block system.

In drawing this statement to a conclusion I should say that requests have been received from farm organizations and spokesmen for the grain trade in the last few years for a revision of the act. Over a two-year period the board has met with various segments of the industry and with departments and agencies of the government to discuss in general terms the changes which it is felt should be incorporated in the next act. I think it is fair to say there is general agreement that changes are required and that the changes proposed here reflect, in general, a consensus of the views expressed to us.

The proposed bill is a complete package. No further amendments are contemplated except perhaps one, and this has to do with whether or not there ought to be a levy or a check-off of some kind against producers to be used to support such agencies as the Canadian Grain Council and for other research, whether market research and development or in other fields. We should like this bill to be referred to the standing committee, at which time representatives of the producers could appear before the committee and indicate how they would expect a fund of this kind to be administered.

It would be fairly simple if the total amount were to be handed over or transferred to the Canada Grain Council which, of course, has a large producer-organization representation on it. But if other purposes were to be supported by this fund, it seems to me it would be advisable to hear from producer organizations how they feel the fund ought to be administered for these and other purposes. We would then be prepared to entertain an amendment which would reflect those views. It should also be noted that hon. members of this House, many of whom are in close touch with grain growers, are in a position to give us an indication of the manner in which a research check-off ought to be administered. No doubt hon. members will give us the benefit of their views in committee.

We have no particular resistance to making provision for this in the Canada Grain Act, but it seems to me that if we were to include a clause dealing with the matter before hearing from hon. members and from representatives of producer organizations we would be obliged to go fairly comprehensively into the manner in which such a fund would be administered. I think it should be done the other way around; that we should first hear what they have to say and then bring in an amendment in such a way as to ensure its acceptability not only to hon. members but to the representatives of the organizations concerned.

The bill is a revision of the present Canada Grain Act. It does not enter into any new areas of authority, with one exception. It covers essentially the area covered by the present act. The exception is that it changes some of the provisions respecting grades and these, of course, will be studied at length when we get into the committee.

In summary, the bill provides for an essentially greater degree of flexibility and for a better integration of authority in this field. The bill represents a complete revision of the act. It was based on an in-depth study that covered an extended period of time, made by a committee that I am happy to say was thoroughly familiar with the Canadian grain industry. It is also significant that the act will provide for a greater degree of flexibility with respect to dealing with the changes made in grade specifications. When discussions in this regard are undertaken there is little doubt that the subject of protein as a grading factor in segretating Red spring wheat will be raised.

It must be emphasized that the bill provides only the mechanics for dealing with this new grading criterion. As far as the inclusion of protein in our grading system is concerned, the board has made a number of proposals the details of which are under consideration. The details of a workable procedure will not be completed perhaps to the point where they can be reflected all the way back to the producer before the bill becomes law. It could take as long as two years fully to implement a segregation system for wheat which would include protein as a factor. One of the main problems in this respect, of course, is in dealing with the very large inventory of wheat we already have in commercial channels.

I also want to advise hon. members that we do not intend to wait until we have a completely integrated system that reflects these changes in grade standards all the way back to the producer before we take some action to respond to our customers' requirements so far as minimum guarantees of protein are concerned. I believe there are some things we can do now, even with the inventory that we have in place, to segregate grain according to minimum protein content. To the extent that we are capable of doing that, I think we should begin very soon. Indeed, some experimentation has been done along this line already. What is more, the millers of Canada who are aware of where the various levels of protein grade grain are to be found—this is done by shipping points—in fact place orders at particular shipping points depending on the protein tests made on wheat grown in the area in any given year, though this changes from time to time.

Another factor is that some of the grain coming out of that shipping point may be current year grain or grain stored from last year, or indeed the year before. This makes for more imperfection, of course, but the fact is that the mills which have been calling grain forward on this basis for their own purpose have been able to get grain with about 1 per cent higher protein than the average level for the whole crop.

I commend this bill to the members of the House of Commons for their consideration and trust that hon. members will very shortly see fit to send it to the Standing Committee on Agriculture which will call experts and go into the detail of the various clauses. In conclusion, I suggest the bill does meet the modern requirements of our grain handling system, and I hope hon. members see fit to pass it in time for the government to put many of the provisions into effect with the beginning of the new crop year.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I should first like to reply to the statement of the minister that he believed that some action should be taken in regard to giving an assurance to our customers that we can supply a certain level of protein wheat, even at this stage. I do not think there would be too much reaction, particularly at this time of glut, if the government were to decide to take immediate action in this regard. In fact, I am rather surprised that there has not been any effort made in the last little while to accomplish this.

Mr. Olson: Yes, there has.

Mr. Korchinski: I realize that the block system is part of the over-all plan. However, I think we should proceed one step further and actually tell our customers that it is quite a simple matter to draw wheat from a given area. However, I will not go into the detail of that.

With regard to another suggestion that the minister made concerning making a check-off, I have an entirely different reaction. I believe there will be a certain amount of opposition to this suggestion, and for this reason perhaps the minister has hesitated in introducing it. He nods his head to indicate that is not the case, but whatever the reasons may be, in view of the fact that the government went to the Canada Grain Council for advice on the LIFT program, all the producers in the west, and in the east too for that matter, will be very reluctant to accept a check-off system.

Although this bill is long overdue and it has many aspects of which I approve, nevertheless I am surprised that the LIFT program should have been introduced at this stage. I suggest we should have examined the merits of other courses of action. The task force on agriculture made the suggestion that we wait ten years before cutting down on total acreage. Yet the government thinks this can be done overnight and makes no provision for a period of adjustment.

The introduction of a measure to bring the Canada Grain Act up to date will probably be better received by the western farmers than was operation LIFT, and there are several reasons for this. First of all, the farmers are conditioned for the measure. They know the merits of it, they have discussed it and, as the minister indicated, they have asked him for it. Secondly, and perhaps a more valid reason, more farmers feel they will gain advantage from the changes in the Canada Grain Act. The LIFT program was a sort of negative program, whereas this is a positive piece of legislation. However, even though it is positive its passage will create many difficulties. The people who feel they will benefit from it most are the farmers within what is called the Palliser triangle. That, of course, does not include all grain farmers. The Palliser triangle includes only two-thirds of the western farmers. This will exclude one-third of the people from what they consider to be the benefits of the provisions under which protein grading will become a more important factor. Let us not look for miracles because of protein grading.

We are trying to regain ground we have lost—and the loss has been tremendous. During the last war we held about 40 per cent of world wheat markets. We have dropped to holding about 18 per cent of those markets, and that is a tremendous loss. So we really are trying to regain this lost ground. The U.S.S.R., Australia and the United States have been guaranteeing their cargoes for many years, and the United States has had protein grading since 1958. That is not to say that we should have adopted protein grading in 1958. From 1958 to the present we have enjoyed large sales. Back in 1962 we sold no wheat to Russia, and the next year we sold them 234 million bushels. Two years later the sale was repeated to the extent of 202 million bushels. These sales were effected at a time when we did not have protein grading.

The point I want to make is that great emphasis has been placed on the protein factor and a lot of people have tended to use the lack of this system as an excuse for our loss of sales. Let me immediately bring the House back to reality by pointing out to the minister and anyone else who cares to listen that we will not immediately find ourselves flooded with requests for our wheat: world wheat markets will not suddenly beat a path to our door to buy our wheat.

We must remember that other factors are involved and play a part in world markets. Having once lost a market, it is very difficult to regain it. There is in Regina a group which has just been organized. This group is a lobby of southern growers which calls itself the Palliser Triangle Wheat Growers' Association. The article to which I refer indicates that about 65,000 farmers will stand to benefit. That is only about one-third of the farmers, because there are approximately 190,000 altogether. These figures may not be completely accurate, but if you relate the percentage to the higher protein level they may be close to being accurate. These people feel they have a tremendous amount to gain by this switch in grading, perhaps to the extent of 30 cents or 40 cents a bushel. That seems to be the impression.

There is no mention of the protein factor in most of the quotations I have seen. There is mention of price. But I understand that only during final negotiations does the protein factor enter into it. While it is important to some customers, it is determined only after there has been negotiated what is considered to be a reasonable price. I point out that we will not immediately be flooded with requests for our wheat and that this change will not perform the miracles we so badly need.

Some of the other figures I have been able to obtain would indicate that two-thirds of the farmers are located in what is considered to be the Palliser triangle and that this excludes the northern and outer perimeters of that area. All our research up to the present has been directed toward this high protein grain area. This may have been desirable when we were selling under the old system, but the government must have been aware of this intended legislation. The government was aware of this grading several years ago, because it was mentioned then.

The government should have made a great research effort several years ago in respect of what is considered to be feed wheat. Research in this respect has been sadly lacking. This one piece of legislation has come forward and there has been a total absence of research in respect of other factors which may make this system work. The federal task force on agriculture had this to say:

> The highest protein-content wheat is produced in the Palliser triangle ... thus, if land is to be withdrawn from high quality wheat and used for feed grains, oil seed, and high yielding grains, it may be desirable that this occur in areas other than the Palliser triangle.

This brings us back to the fact that there will be an area wherein this legislation will not have a direct effect. We are told the world wants high protein wheat, yet the LIFT program indicates that we should not grow that kind of wheat. Rather than pouring $100 million into that, area we should allow the farmers there to continue growing high protein wheat, because of the government's opinion that this is the kind we can sell. We should use the $100 million for a crash program to work out solutions to problems facing the other one-third of the people affected. We have had little research in this field.

The Economic Council of Canada has pointed out that in terms of yield technology Canada has most substantially lagged behind the United States. Canada has achieved a rate of growth of labour productivity and agriculture well above that recorded in other sectors of the economy, and I will roughly compare comparable dimensions to the rate of growth of agricultural labour productivity in the United States. In contrast, Canada has advanced in the area of mechanization but not kept pace in yield technology. This is part of our problem. I am concerned about the other one-third of the farmers. Part of the study conducted by the council suggests for emphasis:

> In 1965, for example, the yield of corn in the United States was 68 bushels per acre; this compares to a yield of 22 bushels per acre of wheat in Canada. On the basis of post-war trends, per corn yields in the United States have been increasing at an annual rate of about 2.0 bushels per acre, whereas wheat yields in Canada have been increasing at a rate of only 0.2 bushels per acre.

This represents exactly the type of competition we will be facing in those areas which will not immediately receive the benefits of this program. At the present time the Agricultural Committee is studying the very serious problem which exists in respect of depressed prices of feed grains. We find that barley prices are depressed. I have a quotation from the Regina Leader Post of April 11 in respect of a James Richardson and Sons newsletter. It reads:

• (9:20 p.m.)

The Commodity Credit Corporation in the U.S., as expected, accepted bids from exporters of around 57 cents a bushel f.o.b. Duluth-Superior for a little better than 5 million bushels of barley.

With a price of 50 cents a bushel it will be very difficult for these people to realize the effect of these changes. To some extent there is a glut in respect of barley and oats. Something like 3 per cent of our export trade is in feed grains. I have a clipping here from the Edmonton Journal of February 3 under the heading "Barley future 'uncertain' ". In other words, in addition to the uncertainties and the problem we are studying before the Agricultural Committee today, we are also involved in the problem of feed wheat or any other grain that it may be necessary to grow in this particular area. I believe this situation will be very difficult for many farmers to understand until a government program is devised to provide for their needs.

It will surely appear to these farmers that the reduction the government desires will affect them mainly. There can be some manipulation as a result of bookwork. For example, if we take out the area known as the Palliser triangle, it is interesting to note that if the 13.5 per cent protein rule were applied, Canada's wheat acreage would have been cut from 25 million acres to 18 million acres in 1968. This 73 per cent of the 1968 acreage would have produced 373 million bushels of wheat or 70 per cent of the 1968 total of 533 million bushels.

So with this type of arrangement the government could conceivably some day make the statement that it had solved the bread-wheat problem. But what really is the situation? Another problem has been created in the process because until now not enough attention has been focussed on this situation. Special consideration, once this legislation has been implemented, must be given to the people who will be excluded. It will be difficult for some people to understand how anyone in that area can compete with people in tropical areas where there is plenty of rain and sunshine, and be expected to produce yields when there is no research in respect of our weather conditions. In some tropical areas several crops can be grown in one year, while we are limited to a season.

For the benefit of those who may be interested in what is known as the Pallister triangle, I should like to explain the situation. It is bounded by a line running almost straight north from the U.S. border to just north of Edmonton, and then roughly it follows the main line of Canadian National Railways through Saskatchewan and into western Manitoba. From there it drops sharply to the U.S. border again. All areas outside the line—the Alberta foothills, the Peace River Valley, the Saskatchewan parklands and most of Manitoba—averaged less than 13.5 per cent during the 40 years in the period in which the study was conducted. Manitoba will be particularly hit; only about 30 per cent of its wheat will be particularly hit; only about 30 per cent of its wheat will be in the protein area.

One can see the effect this legislation will have on Manitoba. The bill contains no provisions for adjustment. There is no provision in respect of the types of feed grain, and so on. There is no provision for a storage payment to farmers to provide some income during the period in which the grain is held until called forward by the board. Naturally, there will be a holdback by the board; the grain will have to be held for a certain time for blending purposes.

There is no provision in the bill in respect of the complex storage facilities which will be necessary for the blending of protein grades, and so on. I can visualize a situation at the terminals where 14 per cent protein grain can be obtained by combining 1,000 bushels of 15 per cent protein grain and 1,000 bushels of 13 per cent protein grain. In fact, I suppose, this is one way of doing it. I can imagine the amount of bin space that will be required. There is no provision in this regard. It will be necessary to reconstruct the whole elevator system if we are to provide storage at elevators. The government will have to come up with a system to haul grain to the inland terminals or provide terminals somewhere else. I suggest the adjustment should be made wherever it will be most helpful. Research might be considered to be a large factor. We are away behind in this regard. There should be some sort of crash program.

This bill will provide the government with extreme powers. There may be a necessity to provide criteria in respect of the changes to be made. The bill will give absolute power to the minister rather than to the grain commissioners. Perhaps this situation should be considered. I think somewhere along the line, if it is found that changes in respect of the Canada Grain Act would be mutually beneficial we should trust each other in this regard and not place absolute control in the minister. If the advice given was rejected by the minister, the onus would be on him to give an explanation. In addition to the men just running around checking on the elevators, and so on, I think on the basis of their experience they could furnish valuable information to the minister.

I know there are other points which could be raised at this time. I certainly wish to see the bill reach the committee as quickly as possible. If the Agricultural Committee should decide that certain areas should be visited, I believe either the committee or a subcommittee should look into the question in order to see what adjustments can be made as quickly as possible and bring this matter to a head immediately.

On the basis of the evidence that can be obtained, I hope this bill will receive as speedy a passage as possible. But I also hope the government and the minister will heed the advice I have tried to give at this time, especially in respect of the thousands of farmers who will find themselves in an even more difficult position than the one they are in now.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, we have waited some time for the announcement which the minister has made to the House tonight, and some of the things which he said, such as that this bill is a key instrument in the marketing of our grains, are, of course, quite true. The efficiency of our marketing system depends to a very considerable extent on how well we grade our grain and how well it is prepared for market.

One is somewhat shocked when one sits in committee and asks one of the experts what is the difficulty in getting barley to a particular market and the expert replies it has too much wild oats in it. Of course, any really adept farmer will get the wild oats out of the barley, so this is not a problem. In an instance like this the problem is to make sure that the regulations are such that a second-rate type of product is not offered on the market.

The minister said we should be able to change quickly and that we have to meet the needs of advancing technology. One cannot substantially quarrel with this point of view regarding flexibility, and so on. But what we really need to consider is what are the priorities which we are seeking to establish in this act, and what are the aims? The following is stated in the act at page 12:

> Subject to this act and any directions to the commission issued from time to time under this act by the Governor in Council or the minister, the commission shall establish and maintain standards of quality for Canadian grain and regulate and supervise grain handling in Canada, to ensure an efficient grain handling system and maximum acceptance of Canadian grain as a commodity of dependable quality in domestic and export markets.

This sets the case for the need for this act as succinctly and as carefully as it could be said. The part about the act about which I would be concerned is its reliance on Order in Council to change the grades, to establish procedures, to control whole mechanisms of the act. Repeatedly in this act reference is made to Order in Council. The minister spoke of protein grading, quite properly so; but this act as drafted does not provide for protein grading. It is left open.

Mr. Olson: It provides the authority.

Mr. Gleave: That is true. If you go back in the act to where the specifications of the grades are set up, you will see that certainly we have done away with one of the top grades. I would judge by this that the milling grades will be the top three grades. This is some change from what we had before, but essentially as the grades are specified within this act and as they are set out it is the sight and weight grading procedure which we use now. By Order in Council this year, next year or the succeeding year these grades can be changed to include any factor that the minister or the cabinet may decide it is advisable to include under the act. This is a pretty substantial change.

The Canada Grain Act has a long and honourable history. At times in the past it has been described as the Magna Carta of the western farmer because it enshrined certain procedures on the basis of which the farmer could claim his rights. Those procedures were established by Parliament and they could only be taken away by Parliament. We recognize the minister's plea for flexibility, but I think he has carried it too far in this act.

It is said in the act that we shall have certain commissioners, who may appoint certain assistant commissioners. Do we need them, or do we not? If they are essential, the bill should read that certain assistant commissioners shall be appointed. If we do not need them, why should this be mentioned in the act? Was it not possible for those who drafted the act to make up their minds whether or not they needed assistant commissioners?

The act does not cover new ground. We are not dealing with a subject which is unknown. This act, or rather its predecessor which this bill replaces, has been in effect for a long time. We know how many elevators have to be supervised. Therefore, we should know how many people it takes to supervise them. We should know whether it is advisable to supervise them with the aid of assistant commissioners or with other staff. As I read the act, it will change the character of our method of handling grain so that we may mix grades under the supervision of the commissioner. This was not permitted under the old act. I suggest that considerable pressure will be put on the commissioners once this act comes into effect to permit mixing within the terms of the act.

All those who are experienced in grain handling know that under these circumstances the tendency is to mix down to the minimum of the grade, which does not always work in the interests of what is desirable for the quality of Canadian wheat. I question whether this power needs to be in the hands of the commissioner. Again, if I read the act correctly, it is proposed that wherever excessive overages occur, they can come back to the Canadian Wheat Board or the Board of Grain Commissioners. This, of course, is a protection, and as far as that goes it is overdue. In the country elevator system we permit the elevator companies to keep whatever they might make. Under these changes it is proposed that if the terminal elevators make something in excess, we will take it away from them. That may be some protection, but I am still somewhat leary of the proposal that permits mixing in terminal elevators.

The bill also makes substantial changes in regard to the right of the individual to order cars. It does away with the car order book because it has been said that this will no longer work with the block system. But where does it leave the ordinary farmer with regard to getting cars? Again, as I read the bill, in the final analysis he must go to the Board of Grain Commissioners if he wants a car.

The minister should concern himself with this factor. I had a carload of flax that sat in the elevator for over a month while I ordered a car to ship it, and if I had not let it sit I would have lost the value of the screenings that were in the flax. So I held it until eventually I could get a car. In the meantime, the price was going up and down and I was paying storage on the flax. When I said to the elevator agent, "Look, I want a car to haul my flax," he replied, "All I can do is phone Edmonton. They tell me what I am going to get as far as cars are concerned and I cannot argue back. It is a one-way line, and until they decide to send me down a car, your flax will have to sit in the elevator." I must say that I did not attempt to make any extra effort to do something about it, but the farmer's right to get a car and to move his product to the market when and as he wants should be protected in this bill. I doubt that his right is protected in it at present.

Under the old Canada Grains Act we had that right with the car order book. It may not have been protected under present conditions with the block system, and so on, and it may be that the car order book could not effectively protect the farmer's right, but I do not think his right is protected in the short references that are made to it in this bill. This is important because he is the lone individual in a very highly organized grain handling system, and if Parliament does not protect his rights you may be very sure he will sing a long time to the Board of Grain Commissioners or to the elevator companies to get his rights protected. This is one matter to which very careful consideration should be given, and I hope the government will look at it. The new provisions appear to provide for adequate inspection. Of course, we will have a chance to go into this in some depth when the bill is examined by the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I say there is an excess of Order in Council in this bill, and we are not writing enough provisions for the protection of the farmer. We are not writing enough provisions so that the rights of the farmer will stand clear and without question and so that it will be stipulated which grades will remain and which will be standard under the legislation.

I imagine that if I were responsible for operating a grain company I would probably be rather uneasy if I felt that the government, by Order in Council, could change the requirements of grades for the grain that was sitting in the elevator system. That is a pretty heavy stick to hold, covering flax, rapeseed and barley. I think that those regulations and standards should be known.

I do not understand why the Board of Grain Commissioners and the government, with the experience and the knowledge they have, cannot at this time make definite recommendations to the House as to the protein standards that should be used, and why such recommendations cannot be put before the House rather than the suggestion by the minister that in due course, if advisable, when it is thought right, when the time has come, we may use protein grading. It should be ensconced in this bill if it is going to be a part of the grading system, and it should be part of the grading system. Everybody agrees with this.

Mr. Olson: It will be.

Mr. Gleave: If you were in England, as I was last week, and talked to people on both the purchasing side and the selling side, you could come to only one conclusion, that we should not be thinking just of protein grading today but we should have been thinking of it yesterday, or a year or two ago. It is difficult for me to understand why it is not in the bill and why this Parliament cannot consider it, pass on it and judge the effect it will have on the ordinary farmer.

I have not got too much confidence in Orders in Council over this whole scope of activity. The minister may smile, but when I see a government go out, as this one has, and propose the things it has proposed to the farmers of Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba within the last month, I think it would have been a lot better if it had been obliged to come to Parliament and put an act through this House. If so, it would not be making the blunders that it will have to live with in the very near future and with which unfortunately the farmers will also have to live. By bringing these matters before the House for full discussion, protection could be provided for the farmers. That, to a large extent, takes care of the points which I wanted to make in regard to this bill.

There is too much Order in Council and not enough real protection for the producer, and the two are not mutually exclusive. We had both under the old act. For example, as this bill now reads, if a farmer has grain of a certain grade and quality, is the elevator company at the point at which he has his quota obliged to take that grain, or not? The act is not clear in this regard. It says that the commissioners may decide whether that elevator has to take his grain. But the commissioners are in Winnipeg, and he is on an elevator ramp somewhere out in the country.

These were the rights under the old act, and I think they are not now stated clearly enough so that the farmer's rights are protected. If this is so, of course it will also affect the elevator companies. While they would like to take as much leeway as they can, I still think they would prefer to operate under an act wherein the rules of the game are clearly set down, rather than under an act where they know the rules can be changed.

In regard to a check-off on grain, I am prepared to discuss such a matter when the government chooses to bring it in and when they put concrete proposals before this House or the Standing Committee on Agriculture. The same would apply to protein grading. I do not know how we can discuss this matter when there is no provision in the act for any such thing.

Mr. Olson: You could make a concrete proposal.

Mr. Gleave: I could, but I do not know why I should, Mr. Speaker. In the offices of the Board of Grain Commissioners are charts which have been prepared for a good many years showing the protein pattern all across that Prairie region—

Mr. Olson: I mean with a check-off.

Mr. Gleave: —so why should I batter my brains out to try and put it before this House when the minister has all that high-priced help and could have had it here this evening? I am ready to discuss protein grading when the minister brings it in to this House. I hope when that occurs that the minister or some of his aides will have something concrete to offer on the subject. I hope they will be prepared to say that this or that proposal could go into the act, and not leave us to do it all on our own.

There is one other matter which might be worth mentioning in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, and this concerns the new varieties. I wonder if this act gives enough leeway for the handling of new varieties. I notice it follows the same pattern as the old act, that any new proposed variety will be dealt with by the Western Grain Standards Committee and the Board of Grain Commissioners. This was a very good system, but I wonder if we would not have been well advised to provide further assistance for testing and working on new varieties in terms of money, personnel, and so on. Other than grading, this is one more area which I think could come under the responsibility of the act. We should consider providing assistance for the development of new varieties, getting them tested and into the hands of farmers a little faster.

The record of the Board of Grain Commissioners in regard to protecting the quality of Canadian grains, not only wheat but others as well, has been very good and I would hope that the body which emerges under this act will be as responsible and efficient. This has always been regarded as of prime importance in our grain business and merits a little more attention in terms of money, time and personnel.

Aside from the points I have raised, Mr. Speaker, I am very happy that the minister has brought an act before us that we can consider and work with. I hope that when we get it into the committee the minister will see fit to make changes along some of the lines suggested.

Mr. Peters: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question? The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters).

Mr. Peters: May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the House that the Chair now call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At 9.57 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, April 14, 1970

The House met at 2 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CROUSE—MINISTERS' OFFICES IN CONSTITUENCIES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which affects the rights and privileges of every member of this House, and I raise this matter at the earliest possible moment. My question of privilege relates to a return tabled in the Commons yesterday for the Conservative member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates).

The information given in the Commons return states that 11 of 13 ministers have offices in federal buildings but the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) rents an office at $7,360 a year in his Montreal Mount Royal riding, and the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) rents an office in Montreal Maisonneuve at $1,675 a year. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) and the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Andras) pay their one-man staffs in their ridings, Toronto Rosedale and Port Arthur respectively, up to $10,000 annually out of the public treasury. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) is the only minister with a two-member staff in his riding, Medicine Hat. Each is paid up to $5,000 annually.

The Prime Minister's and the Secretary of State's constituency staffers each receive $7,500 annually at the maximum. Other ministers with constituency offices and the maximum publicly paid salaries for their staffers are as follows: The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), Kingston, $7,500; the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene), Niagara Falls, $7,500; the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Côté), Longueuil, $7,500; the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey), Verdun, $7,500; the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford), Vancouver Centre, $5,000; the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), Drummondville, $5,000; the Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans), Montreal Duvernay, $7,500; and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. MacEachen), the only Nova Scotian, no publicly paid staff.

An hon. Member: There is the economy drive.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, in view of the economy drive and in view of these facts as tabled in the Commons I therefore move:

That the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections consider whether members of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada holding offices as Ministers of the Crown have violated the provisions of the Senate and House of Commons Act respecting the independence of Parliament by accepting allowances and profits out of public moneys to purposes not authorized by vote of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has given the Chair the notice required under the Standing Order, which has given me the opportunity to give some thought to the point raised by the hon. member. As he and other hon. members know, this is not the first time this kind of situation has been brought to the attention of the House. It has been considered by Speakers before me.

The question that has to be decided at the present time is not whether there is a grievance, whether there should be a debate on this matter or whether it should be considered by the House or by a committee at some time, but whether there is a question of privilege. I had the opportunity yesterday of considering in some detail what was the nature of parliamentary privilege. I indicated what I felt was meant by parliamentary privilege and breach of parliamentary privilege.

I doubt very much that the privileges of any individual member are affected in the circumstances outlined by the hon. member. I have little hesitation in reaching the conclusion there is no question of privilege which should be studied by the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The hon. member suggests in his statement or proposed motion that there has been a contravention of the Senate and House of Commons Act. Whether this is correct or not, to my way of thinking this is a point of law rather than a question of privilege. If the hon. member questions the propriety or impropriety of a minister's action, this again, as I pointed out yesterday, can be brought to the attention of the House or discussed by the House or by a committee of the House only as the result of a substantive motion and cannot be done by way of a motion to refer a question of privilege to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. With this in mind the motion of the hon. member will not be put to the House.

TABLING OF REPORT ON OUTLOOK FOR PRIVATE AND PUBLIC INVESTMENT IN CANADA

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with Standing Order 41 (2), I should like to table in French and in English a report on private and public investment in Canada, outlook for 1970.

POST OFFICE

MONTREAL POSTAL DISPUTE—TABLING OF DOCUMENTS SUBMITTED TO SPECIAL COMMISSIONER

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, last week the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) requested the tabling by the government of the documents examined by the special commissioner appointed to look into the trucking contracts for the postal service in Montreal. I have communicated to Mr. Goldenberg the nature of this request and he has forwarded to me all those documents submitted to him which were given to him on other than a confidential basis. I should like to table these.

[Mr. Speaker.]

MAIN ESTIMATES 1970-71

RESCINDING OF PREVIOUS ORDER RESPECTING CERTAIN VOTES AND REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE IN MISCELLANEOUS ESTIMATES

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions both in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs and among representatives of the parties with regard to the work of that particular committee. I think it has been found there is general agreement that the estimates which on February 18 were referred to that committee might better be dealt with by the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates. Therefore, if the House is in agreement, perhaps the following could be made an order of the House:

That the provisions of the Order of the House made February 18, 1970, in relation to the reference of estimates to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, be rescinded and that the said estimates namely;

Votes 1, 5 and 10 relating to the Department of Finance;

Votes 1, 5, L10, L15, 20 and 25 relating to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce;

Votes 1 and 5 relating to the Department of National Revenue;

Vote 10 relating to the Tax Appeal Board;

Vote 25 relating to the Economic Council of Canada;

Vote 25 relating to the Tariff Board;

be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

As I say, if that is found to be generally agreeable, perhaps it could be made an order of the House.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): That is quite correct, Mr. Speaker. That is agreed. It was felt by the committee, since there would be so many thousands of valid objections to the white paper on taxation which would take up the time of the committee, that the time could be better served in that way.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

POST OFFICE

MONTREAL POSTAL DISPUTE

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the new situation created by the final breakdown of negotiations between the government and the Montreal postal mail truck drivers and the announcement of the government to hire a new staff tomorrow to replace the present employees, which will bring great hardship to them and may lead to a complete disruption of mail services with its consequent serious effect on the entire population of Montreal.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members who have heard the proposed motion will agree, I am sure, that this motion is deserving of the most serious and careful consideration. The substantive aspects of the matter which is suggested for discussion later today under Standing Order 26 cannot be overlooked and their importance cannot be minimized.

At the same time, the decision which the Chair has to make in such circumstances is essentially a procedural one, taking into account the limitations prescribed by the Standing Order.

Some weeks ago the hon. member for Peace River proposed the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing the postal situation in Montreal. This motion was granted and a debate ensued. Then on April 6 the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands asked leave to move the adjournment of the House to discuss the Montreal postal situation and, to quote the hon. member, "the need for Parliament to consider alternative courses of action". This motion was denied, having regard to subsection (d) of section 16 of Standing Order 26 which reads as follows:

(d) the motion must not revive discussion on a matter which has been discussed in the same session pursuant to the provisions of this Standing Order;

Thus, the Standing Order prescribes that there can be only one emergency debate about a given situation during a session of Parliament. On this basis, the proposed motion had to be refused. The ruling of the Chair did indicate that there may be a point in the course of a developing situation where new aspects, new factors or new facts would justify a second debate in the sense that the House would then be dealing with a new situation.

The question to be resolved in this respect is: when does a continuing emergency become a new emergency so that a debate would not in effect revive discussion on a matter which has already been discussed in a previous emergency debate? The answer is not entirely clear to me in the light of the circumstances as they exist today.

Without reaching a conclusion on this aspect of Standing Order 26, I remind hon. members of the other difficulty provided by the Standing Order. The rule enjoins the Speaker to consider whether the matter can be brought before the House within a reasonable time by other means. Since it has been agreed that there will be a continuation of the budget debate tomorrow, I cannot ignore the fact that this will automatically provide an opportunity for debate within 24 hours. I do not see how the Chair can overlook this aspect of the relevant Standing Order. Therefore, taking into account mainly the fact that there is an opportunity for debate as early as tomorrow, I must conclude that the motion should not be put today. At the same time, I can assure hon. members that I will not feel so strictly bound by subsection (d) of section 16 of Standing Order 26 that an emergency debate on the situation might not be possible later.

Mr. Lewis: May I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I hope Your Honour will forgive my presumption, but may I ask Your Honour whether you took into account the fact that the situation with respect to the truck drivers in Montreal is that by midnight tonight the present situation will end and new employees will be hired. Therefore a debate tomorrow might not serve the purpose that a debate at eight o'clock this evening might.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Of course the hon. member has to assume that the Chair has taken into account all circumstances. As he will realize, and as all other hon. members will realize, this was not an easy decision to reach. I felt, all things considered, that perhaps there should not be an emergency debate today. I thought that the procedural difficulties under the terms of Standing Order 26, for today at least, were insuperable and that the Chair should not be placed in the position where these two very serious roadblocks could be ignored in the present circumstances. I realize how touchy the whole situation is and I am hopeful that a decision that there should not be an emergency debate today will not adversely affect the development of the situation in Montreal.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I might correct an assumption made by the hon. member for York South. The deadline of which he speaks does not expire tonight but tomorrow night, Wednesday night.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

FINANCE

BANK OF CANADA INITIATIVE TO LOWER INTEREST RATES IN VIEW OF UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. As it has now become clear that unemployment has become the No. 1 problem facing the economy, and as high interest rates are slowing down the economic activity that provides employment, is the government giving consideration to having the Bank of Canada give the lead in a gradual lowering of interest rates so that economic activity and employment may increase at the fastest possible pace?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, as it is well recognized that the lowering of interest rates would stimulate the economy and increase employment, will the government give consideration to this important step so that unemployment may cease to rise at the present alarming rate?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker, as soon as we have an undertaking from the hon. member that he believes inflation is licked.

Mr. Hees: That I what?

POST OFFICE

MONTREAL POSTAL DISPUTE—TERMS OF GOVERNMENT PROPOSAL TO LAPALME EMPLOYEES

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the fact that he has not seen fit to make a statement to the House about the negotiations which he has had with the truck drivers in Montreal, may I ask him whether it is still the government position that the seniority of the men to be hired is to be retained for a period of three months, or whether there has been any change in that position? I understood it would be retained for a period of three months in the postal unions in the Public Service and that after that there would be a rearrangement of seniority. Will the minister explain the present situation?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has suggested, the present proposal is that for a period of three months there will be a special seniority arrangement for the incoming drivers of G. Lapalme, and this has been offered with the consent of the Council of Postal Unions. At the end of the three month period the seniority list of drivers in the Public Service now and up to that date and of the one-time drivers of Lapalme will be integrated into a single list.

Mr. Lewis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. First, does that mean that the Lapalme drivers would be dropped to the bottom of the list as having only three months seniority as against the service of other men?

Second, when the government discussed this with the Council of Postal Unions was it taking upon itself a decision as to the bargaining unit and the representation which these drivers were going to have if they joined the scheme that the government has now proposed, and was it the government's business to decide what union they might later on be members of and what bargaining unit they should belong to?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, it was not the government's business to decide what union they might later be members of nor did the government intend to endeavour to force these or any other drivers into a particular union of its choice. The law is quite clear on this point and the choice is a free one made by the employees themselves. The government has not and will not endeavour to exercise any right to affect that choice or to make it for them. I have said that this offer of a special arrangement for three months' seniority was done with the consent of the Postal Workers Union. This would cover the period at least following entry into the Public Service, with the consent of the union to which they would belong.

Mr. Lewis: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. There was another statement in the news release issued by the minister on April 7, which is the document on which I am basing my questions, that the wage of these employees if they agreed to join the public service would be $3.25. I should like to ask the minister whether that $3.25 was to be a permanent wage or a temporary wage until settlement between the postal unions and the government? Assuming that the Public Service Staff Relations Board integrated these drivers with the appropriate section of the postal unions, was the $3.25 to be a temporary wage which might later be reduced or red-circled or what exactly was it to be?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I think it was made fairly clear in the document on the question that the rate of $3.25 was to obtain from the time of entry until such time as a new agreement between the Council of Postal Unions and the government was signed. From that date all the members of the Council of Postal Unions and the workers of Lapalme in whatever unit they might be would be governed by that new rate.

Mr. Lewis: If the rate was reduced in negotiations these drivers would have to accept—

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): David!

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, there are negotiations going on. Don't say, "David", Don. I know as much about it as you do. In view of the fact that negotiations are going on and the matter is before a conciliation board and that the Treasury Board offer was $3.16, not $3.25, does that mean that if the settlement for the rest of the workers should be below $3.25 these men are to look forward to a reduction in their pay?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that perhaps negotiations are going on here as well as elsewhere, but the question is really hypothetical. I say that whatever rate is agreed upon between the Council of Postal Unions and the Treasury Board will be the rate at which, from the date of signature, all the drivers in the Post Office will be paid.

MONTREAL POSTAL DISPUTE—COST OF NEW DELIVERY SYSTEM

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Considering that much of this trouble started with an ill-starred effort at economy, was the last offer which the minister made to the workers such as to be similar to the total cost of the operation under the contractual system?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure that I understood the question. If the hon. gentleman would rephrase it, I shall try to answer.

Mr. Macquarrie: I shall do my best, Mr. Speaker. I am wondering if at the stage of the minister's latest offer, which he called a generous one, the total cost to the government and the department for operating the service was less than the contractual system which was being abolished under the Postmaster General's reform?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I think I can say without equivocation that the total cost of the terms and conditions offered will provide a better postal service for Montreal than was had at a higher cost in the past.

MONTREAL POSTAL DISPUTE—LEGALITY OF GOVERNMENT PROPOSAL TO LAPALME EMPLOYEES

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): In view of the procedures followed in hiring Public Service employees, may I ask the President of the Treasury Board if the offer to the employees of Lapalme has followed Public Service procedures? If not, has he had an opinion from the law officers of the Crown—without telling me what that opinion is—to the effect that he is proceeding properly?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I have been advised by our legal advisers that we are proceeding entirely legally.

TRADE

WHEAT—POSSIBLE SALE TO PAKISTAN

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Is the minister aware that Pakistan is seeking to purchase 30 to 40 million bushels of wheat and could he tell the House whether he intends to contact the Pakistani government with a view to negotiating a contract for the sale of wheat, if possible?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I repeat that in such a case it is quite exceptional for the Canadian Wheat Board not to be aware of such important offers. However, I shall inquire and make sure the Board knows about the situation referred to by the hon. member.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

UTILIZATION OF CF-5 AIRCRAFT

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Has a decision now been arrived at as to the use which the 115 CF-5 aircraft ordered by the department will be put to in view of the fact that a number of these aircraft have now been delivered to the department?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, we are now using whatever aircraft have been delivered—perhaps 35 or 36. We have formed a conversion unit at Cold Lake and we are also forming a squadron at Bagotville. At the present time all the airplanes which have been delivered are being used.

Mr. Harkness: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does this mean that these aircraft are essentially being used for training purposes only and that no decision has been made as to what their actual use will be?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, there are two types of aircraft. Some of them are trainers with twin seats; others are single-seaters. The double-seaters, of course, are used for the primary purpose for which they were built, training. The others form part of an active squadron. Fortunately we do not have to use it for the purpose for which it is meant.

AVAILABILITY OF NAVAL LIMITS TO ASSIST ASTRONAUTS IN CASE OF EMERGENCY

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Has Canada any naval units at sea in the North Atlantic or available for duty at sea? Also, have such units been offered to the United States government in case an emergency forces a landing of the astronauts in the North Atlantic area on Friday?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, but I will inquire.

Mr. Nesbitt: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If units are available, would the minister offer them to the United States government in the event that they should be needed?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I believe that naturally we should respond to such a request.

An hon. Member: Put the Bonaventure to sea.

AIR TRANSPORT

ROUTES GRANTED TO TRANSAIR—REQUEST FOR DELAY IN IMPLEMENTATION OF DECISION—PUBLIC HEARINGS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, on March 18 I directed a question to the Minister of Transport which he took as notice, as reported at page 5179 of Hansard. My question had to do with the fact that the Canadian Transport Commission had granted to TransAir Limited the right to travel from Winnipeg to Toronto via Thunder Bay and Sault Ste. Marie. The question I asked the minister was whether, since no public hearings had been held and in view of the personalities involved, the government would bring pressure to bear on the chairman of the Canadian Transport Commission to call public hearings and, if not, whether the government would be prepared to institute an investigation to see whether patronage and favouritism had taken place in the granting of these air routes?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have now received three appeals in connection with this particular granting which have been filed in appropriate order, and I am in the process of considering them now. The answers to the hon. member's questions, those that are relevant to the decision, will be included when that decision comes forward.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the Minister of Transport of Ontario, Mr. Irwin Haskett, has said publicly that the government of Ontario is asking the government of Canada to reverse the decision of the Canadian Transport Commission pending public hearings, does the government intend to accede to this reasonable request?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, one of the appeals to which I referred is from the government of Ontario and it is to the Minister of Transport. I am in the process of considering it now.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can I ask the minister when he expects to make a decision and whether he will announce that decision to the House?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I cannot indicate with any precision when the decision will be made, other than to say as soon as possible. It has not been the practice to make such announcements in the House but I certainly have no objection to doing it that way, or to tabling the decision in any event.

TRENTON, N.S.—DISCONTINUANCE OF SERVICE BY EASTERN PROVINCIAL AIRWAYS

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I ask the Minister of Transport why it is, in view of his statement that he will hear appeals from interveners in the Transair application, that in the matter of Eastern Provincial Airways discontinuing service at Trenton Nova Scotia, he would not consider an appeal by an intervener in that case?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it was not a matter of my deciding not to hear the intervener. The hon. member is so persuasive that I would have heard the whole of Nova Scotia, had he asked, but I did not have the legal authority because that case is quite different from the one in question.

CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

THE ARCTIC—UNITED STATES NOTE PROTESTING CANADA'S POSITION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I wished to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but in his absence perhaps the Acting Minister or the Prime Minister might be interested in answering. Has there been received recently a very stiff note from the United States government to Canada protesting against the attempt by the Canadian government to assert jurisdiction for a distance of 100 miles from the mainland and the Arctic islands in the north? Does such a note contain the indication that very stern sanctions will be exercised, economically and otherwise, by the United States in this respect?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as it is not the minister's day to be in the House may I be permitted to answer. I know our ambassador in Washington has been asked, I believe in the past hour, to meet with an official of the Secretary of State's Department in that city. Of course, I have no knowledge of what the note will contain. I take it that the hon. member opposite has?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: We do have our sources of information, Mr. Speaker. A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the debate on this bill is scheduled for Thursday, will the Prime Minister undertake to make known before that date the contents of this particular note if he receives it so that in the debate which takes place proper regard will be paid to the note?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not know about international procedures; I am not sure if a note of this kind is intended to be made public. I am sure that if the American government wants the opposition to have a copy of it they will ascertain that that is done.

Mr. Baldwin: Read your press releases.

ESTABLISHMENT OF ARCTIC COMMAND POST

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has the government taken a decision to establish a military headquarters and/or base in the Arctic? Also, when will he be in a position to outline the details as to time, place and purpose?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as to the decision, it has been taken. The purpose of the trip I made last week was to ascertain some details and obtain new facts. As a matter of fact, these additional facts—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): —are being distilled now, and I hope to make an announcement some time this week.

Mr. Nowlan: Is that a fact?

Mr. MacLean: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the contemplated establishment require a supplementary estimate in the present fiscal year or are the costs included in the estimates for the fiscal year that have already been established?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Cadieux: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member can trust me. It will be within the ceiling that has been allocated for national defence.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the Minister of Transport let the minister in on his plans for sharing between the Department of Transport and the Department of National Defence the responsibility of properly guarding the Arctic?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, it has been my contention all along even more now than ever, that there must be some co-ordination between all the efforts in the north, not only by the Department of National Defence and the Department of Transport but also by other departments of government. I believe that there is an acceptance of that fact among all the ministers.

Mr. MacInnis: A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. As the minister failed to answer this question on another occasion, has he now made up his mind since the Minister of Transport has also taken over defence?

TRANSPORT

STANDARDS RESPECTING SAFETY OF AUTOMOBILE TIRES

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Having in mind the announcement by the United States Department of Transport to the effect that the Goodrich Tire Company has agreed to withdraw 43,000 passenger car tires as failing to meet standards in the United States, can the minister say what the situation is here? Do we have tire standards dealing with safety?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): With regard to the latter part of the question, as the hon. member knows the standards for Canadian tires, automobiles and accessories are now being drawn up and will be published under the authority of the act recently passed. I am grateful to the hon. member for having sent this particular news item to me. I will check to see if it has any application as far as Canada is concerned.

AIRPORTS

SITE OF THE INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT PROPOSED BY PARTI QUÉBÉCOIS

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

Since the construction of an international airport at Drummondville is one of the priorities of the Parti Québécois, could the Prime Minister tell the House whether the government would agree with René Lévesque in this matter? Since expropriation has begun at Ste. Scholastique, could he also tell us whether this would mean that the government could resell its land?

Mr. Speaker: In my view this question is hypothetical, at least as far as the first part of it is concerned.

POLLUTION

SUGGESTED ANTI-POLLUTION WEEK—ASSISTANCE TO GROUPS IN FIGHT AGAINST CONTAMINATION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): As usual, Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a non-provocative question. It is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Having regard to the wonderful attitude on the part of university students across Canada—I refer to the Universities of Victoria, Saskatchewan, Toronto and others—in convening organizations for the purpose of joining in the fight against anti-pollution—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacLean: The fight against pollution.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The fight against pollution. Because of the tremendous energy, enthusiasm and initiative of these young people in facing a problem which is even more important to them than to the present generation, will the minister give consideration to having a week set aside as Environmental Problems Week or Anti-pollution Week? Also, will the government give assistance to recognized groups across Canada who are doing their part to join in every way possible in the greatest fight that we have in our country?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I will attempt to give a non-controversial answer to that non-controversial question. Certainly, it should be a source of inspiration for those of us who are concerned with the problems of pollution that so many young people in particular and so many citizens in general are anxious to join the war against pollution. Certainly within my department we are striving very hard to find a federal vehicle whereby concerned citizens can play a part in the federal fight against pollution. I will take the suggestion of the right hon. gentleman into consideration in that regard.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister if he borrowed these guidelines from the very successful war on poverty?

DISCHARGE OF MERCURY INTO ST. LAWRENCE RIVER

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, this is a serious question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: I wonder if the minister would investigate those firms that have now admitted they are pouring mercury into the St. Lawrence River? These firms have made this admission. If this is correct, will the minister discuss this problem with them in the war against pollution as it is a very important subject with regard to that part of Canada?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I will be very pleased to do so, Mr. Speaker. I think probably the most effective tool with respect to mercury pollution, until the passage of the Canada Water Bill, is under the existing Fisheries Act. I will be pleased to draw this to the attention of the Minister of Fisheries and to consider with him effective action with regard to this situation.

[Later:]

LOCATION OF SOURCES OF MERCURY CONTAMINATION

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question that is supplementary to questions already directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I should like to ask the minister whether his department and the Department of Fisheries are undertaking a crash program to locate and to remedy mercury pollution sources which are now appearing all across Canada?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there is inspection being carried out by the Department of Fisheries, by our people and by provincial departments. I do not know that I can undertake that every plant will be checked immediately. Considerable research is being done by the Department of Fisheries in their research establishment in Winnipeg in regard to mercury pollution, and I believe the situation is extremely well in hand at the present time.

NATIONAL REVENUE

REPORTED CHANGE IN FORT ERIE EMPLOYEES WORK SCHEDULES CONTRARY TO AGREEMENT

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. Will the minister investigate reports that work schedules of employees of his department at Fort Erie crossing are being changed, in clear contravention of the agreement under which they are working, in order that their day off will fall on the holiday that comes later in May?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister of National Revenue): I will check on that, Mr. Speaker.

TRANSPORT

ASSESSMENT OF CHARGES AGAINST OWNERS OF "MANHATTAN" FOR SERVICES OF ICEBREAKER

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): I wish to address my question to the Minister of Transport. Will the minister advise the House if user charges are being assessed against the owners of the Manhattan for the services of the icebreaker St. Laurent?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker, not in the precise meaning of the term as I understand the hon. member to mean it. To that extent it is a co-operative venture. However, in terms of fuel and some other supplies en route, these are being provided from on board the Manhattan. There is no per diem charge or anything of that nature.

SHARING OF INFORMATION FOLLOWING VOYAGE OF "MANHATTAN"

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Have arrangements been made between the government and Humble Oil Company Limited for the sharing of information after the current voyage of the Manhattan, or is this subject to future negotiations?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): There is an understanding between those who are representing the Humble Oil Company and the government of Canada that there will be an exchange of information. In addition to that we have our own authorities on board both the Manhattan and the St. Laurent who are accumulating a good deal of information on their own during the trip.

Mr. Nesbitt: A further supplementary. Will the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps I will allow the hon. member's supplementary, but we have reached the point in the question period when I have to warn hon. members that we are running short of time and should cut down on the supplementaries.

Mr. Nesbitt: I will be very brief, Your Honour. Will the minister table the information when it is received from the Humble Oil Company after the voyage is completed?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I suspect that will depend entirely on the nature of the information. If it is a matter of beneficial public information as opposed to something that might perhaps be advantageous to competitors or the like, it will be tabled to the extent that it is possible.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Because of his absence, I have checked the roster and I find that the Acting Minister is Mr. Martin. I ask the Prime Minister how questions are to be addressed to Mr. Martin?

AUDITOR GENERAL

DELAY OF LEGISLATION PENDING CONSIDERATION OF ALLEGATIONS BY PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): My question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Public Accounts Committee has referred the matter of allegations against the Auditor General to its steering committee for consideration, does the government intend to delay its proposed legislation until this consideration has been completed?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will gladly take that into consideration, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Aiken: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the government intend to abolish the position of the Auditor General?

Mr. Trudeau: In no way, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Jamieson.]

[Later:]

ASSURANCE OF CONTINUANCE OF ROLE

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister in regard to the proposed legislation in connection with the Auditor General. Will the Prime Minister give every assurance to the House that there will not be any change in the role of Auditor General, that the role of the Auditor General will not be altered, thus affecting the non-partisan nature of that position and destroying the Public Accounts Committee?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is indeed no intention on the part of the government to introduce any legislation which might affect the non-partisan character of the Auditor General.

Mr. Bell: A further supplementary question. Can we have every assurance that the Auditor General as such will not be removed to make way for some political hack, as has been—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[Later:]

REDUCTION OF POWERS BY LEGISLATION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question that is also supplementary to those asked by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka of the Prime Minister. Is it the intention to introduce legislation to alter, reduce or change in any way the powers of the Auditor General?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, but we would hope that there will be a clarification of his role, as understood by all parties.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to those asked about the Auditor General. Has there been any decision by the government to bring his salary in line with other increases in salary, or is he to be starved out?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Broadview.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I think I asked a question that was perfectly legitimate within the scheme of things within Canada today. I asked whether the Auditor General's salary was going to be adjusted in view of circumstances. I think that is a perfectly proper question. I have asked it—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. McCleave: —and I am hoping for a reply.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There is no suggestion on the part of the Chair that the question is not proper. It was just not answered, and that is why the Chair went on to the next questioner.

Mr. McCleave: If Your Honour would excuse me, may I ask for an elaboration of your ruling. I have understood that when questions like this are asked, if they are in reasonable order—and I think mine was—the ministry should at least decide whether they should be answered or not. Your Honour seems to have taken the position that that sort of question should not be answered.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has misunderstood the Chair. I indicated that the question was perfectly valid but since it was not answered I recognized the hon. member for Broadview, who has the floor.

Mr. McCleave: Thank you, Mr. Speaker; I am glad my question was in order.

URANIUM

DEVELOPMENT OF MINE BY GULF MINERAL RESOURCES—FOREIGN OWNERSHIP RULE

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): My question is addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I ask the minister whether the intended meeting was held yesterday between himself and representatives of Gulf Mineral Resources of Denver with regard to the foreign ownership rule? Also, has the minister assured Gulf Mineral Resources that they may proceed with their development of the uranium mine in the Wollaston Lake area?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I had the meeting to which the hon. member refers. I explained to them the rules as indicated by the government's statement in the House with regard to Canadian ownership of uranium resources. Certainly I have no authority to give assurances. The rules are there and they will be enunciated in greater detail when the regulations are promulgated and announced. It is, of course, up to each individual corporation to determine for itself whether it fits those rules and comes within the definition of a Canadian corporation in the uranium industry.

Mr. Korchinski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that there is an area of uncertainty here, even though a few days ago the minister himself indicated in the House that since this company had been involved in exploration beforehand the rule would not apply, is the minister now denying the statement that he made in the House?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is debate. I suggest to the hon. member that his supplementary question is not in order, and we might perhaps give an opportunity to another hon. member.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will try to return to the hon. member, but we are running short of time.

INDUSTRY

TIRES—CONCESSIONS TO MICHELIN COMPANY —MEETINGS WITH OTHER COMPANIES

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address this question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In light of the answer he gave me the other day that he was meeting with the presidents of some rubber companies, may I ask the minister whether he is giving the same tariff concessions to established Canadian tire companies as he has offered to the Michelin Company?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the offer to Michelin would be a matter for the Minister of Finance. What I said the other day was that my department was consulting tire companies with a view to rationalizing the industry in Canada. These conversations are continuing and I will report to the House in due course.

Mr. Saltsman: A supplementary question. Is the minister saying that he is seeking to include automobile tires in the Canada-United States auto agreement, and are negotiations to this effect being conducted?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, this would be my view, but discussions are going on and we still have to deal with the United States position, which is to progressively eliminate the safeguards presently in the pact. Conversations are going on with the United States on this subject.

COMMUNICATIONS

TELESAT CANADA—LAUNCHING OF SATELLITE —IMPLEMENTATION OF SYSTEM

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications. Would the minister say whether a timetable has been established for the launching of the satellite portion of Telesat Canada and for the implementation of the Canadian domestic satellite communications system?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, there are some dates that are tentative and subject to negotiation and the progress that is made in the matter of research and development for Canada's particular needs. I am not in a position at the moment to give an up to date timetable other than to say the latest date is still the end of 1972.

TRADE

JAPAN—PROSPECT OF INCREASED MARKET FOR RAPESEED

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I would direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. On April 9, in reply to a question asked him in the House, the minister stated that the first step had been taken by Japan in the liberalization of trade in rapeseed. Would the minister inform the House what particular action he was referring to and at what time it was taken?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I was referring to a one-third reduction in tariff unbound, for one year.

HOUSING

ONTARIO—DECLINE IN STARTS—MEETING WITH PROVINCIAL REPRESENTATIVES— INTEREST RATES

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister in charge of housing. In view of the report in today's Globe and Mail that there is a 42 per cent decline in housing starts in Ontario, is it the intention of the minister to call together the appropriate representatives of the provincial government to work out plans to increase the number of starts?

As a supplementary I should also like to ask, with regard to the drop in the interest rates, whether it is the intention of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to drop their interest rates so as to set an example for other companies to follow?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, both matters are under constant consideration.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON SCHEMES TO INCREASE MORTGAGE MONEY AND REDUCE INTEREST RATES

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In view of the concern expressed by the minister, wherein he indicated he was looking at all schemes whereby more money would be placed in the market, is the minister in a position to advise which scheme to increase mortgage flow and reduce interest rates he finds most attractive?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This kind of information ought normally to be given by way of a general statement. The hon. member might invite the minister to make such a statement in due course.

Mr. Alexander: Then perhaps I could rephrase my question, Mr. Speaker. Keeping in mind the preamble to the question asked, would the minister at the earliest opportunity make a statement in this regard.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): I will give that consideration, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

INTRODUCTION OF BILL RESPECTING CO-OPERATIVES

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture.

Could he tell us whether representations have been made to him by consumers or leaders of farm organizations concerning the introduction of special legislation on co-operatives? Could he also tell us whether his department or the government intends to introduce such legislation during this session?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker, and at the meeting yesterday with the Canadian Federation of Agriculture the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, who will be bringing in this legislation, made some comments about it to the effect that it would be brought into the House reasonably soon.

HARBOURS

MONTREAL—MEASURES TO DEAL WITH REDUCTION IN PORT ACTIVITY

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport.

Considering that the activity in the Montreal harbour has declined by about 30 per cent since 1964, what measures does the minister intend to take in order to deal with the situation?

Mr. Speaker: I venture to point out to the hon. member that he seems to invite the minister to make a rather general statement. The hon. member might wish to make his question more explicit so that the minister can answer immediately.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I think the minister has understood my question and I will be quite happy if he is willing to answer.

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if the import of the question concerned the bringing forward of some important revisions of general policy regarding ports, which would include Montreal, I can say I hope to do that before the summer recess.

POST OFFICE

MONTREAL POSTAL DISPUTE—APPOINTMENT OF A MINISTERIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the President of the Treasury Board.

I should like to ask him whether he has decided to establish a cabinet committee to keep an eye on the postal dispute and to keep up to date with developments which could occur or whether the decision rests with him alone?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows quite well that the decisions are subject to cabinet approval.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the President of the Treasury Board to clarify the following points for me. Is there a cabinet committee appointed especially to gather information on the developments in the Montreal postal dispute and to take the necessary decisions? Was this decision taken by the cabinet as a whole or was a special committee appointed to that effect? This is clear.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, as the need arises, I consult with my colleagues, collectively or personally. There is no definite rule.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA GRAIN ACT

ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMISSION, PROVISIONS RESPECTING GRADING, LICENCES, ELEVATORS, ETC.

The House resumed from Monday, April 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. Olson that Bill C-196, respecting grain, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, last night I inadvertently became involved in this debate because of the lack of farmers in the House. As a result, I have had a look at this bill and I now want to say only a few things about it.

In the last few years there has been considerable agitation for changes in the handling of grain, not the least of which has been the operation LIFT program which, in effect, will take wheat out of production this year and put the land into summerfallow. This would establish in Canada the basis for an opportunity to start handling sales in a different manner. If this program is totally satisfactory then the new Canada Grain Act will have provided a new basis for the grain trade.

Presumably this is good legislation because it has a number of potentials. However, it also has some weaknesses. These weaknesses, in many cases, stem from the fact this is open ended legislation. This piece of legislation, along with other legislative measures necessary for western Canada will obviously change the whole structure for marketing grain. This measure will undoubtedly be considered in the light of our ability to subsidize agricultural production. As an industrial nation, we have for 20 years paid-up service to the concept of developing cheap food, but we have not supplied food at cost as have other countries. Certainly France, the United States and Great Britain have done this for years, as have other agricultural countries. They have subsidized agricultural production. We have done things a little differently. We have not even asked the people receiving the benefits of low cost production to pay the subsidy out of the general treasury; we have asked the farmer to pay this subsidy out of his pocket. We have not done much, nor will we do much in this bill, to assist the farmer in getting a better price for his produce.

• (3:10 p.m.)

The legislation we are now considering, and the marketing legislation which is next on the Order Paper, should be geared to the development of a new marketing structure. If these measures are successful, they should provide the producer with a better return on his production. It has been pointed out by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, and I will not quote their figures because hon. members have had an opportunity of considering their brief recently submitted to cabinet, that most farmers in Canada receive less than $2,500 annual cash income. The federation points out that less than 50 per cent of Canadian farmers receive more than $5,000 in annual cash income. The agriculture industry certainly is not in good shape and there must be some reason for this.

On a number of occasions I have had the opportunity of accompanying the agriculture committee to the offices of the Board of Grain Commissioners in Winnipeg. We have had numerous discussions and discovered the complexity of the grading system which has grown up over the years. Under this system, we find there are 400 grades of grain. Obviously, these 400 grades do not fit into either domestic or international price categories. They are grades established in respect of specific conditions. They have become so complex they are of no real value to the producer in assessing the grade he may expect, and of no value to the government in establishing a grade that is generally understood in the export market.

I remember a former Minister of Agriculture saying in this House that everyone knew Canada had the best wheat in the world and wheat of the highest protein content. These people have not beaten a pathway to our door to buy wheat. They have not really been convinced of the superiority of Canadian wheat. If they have been convinced, they have not been interested because the price was not right or because the commodity did not meet their needs. There is a chart on the wall of the grain commissioners offices which allows them to ascertain the exact protein content of wheat from a given area. They know the area protein content of this year's crop, and as soon as the new crop is ready for harvest they can make a decision and a projection for the following crop year.

We have been playing around with protein content and yet a decision has not been made in respect of whether we are to establish protein content as the major factor in our selling machinery or whether we are to establish another grading system. I am concerned, as I am sure many other farmers are, about what the international grading system is. For instance, what grading system is used by Australia, Russia or Great Britain; what is the relationship between protein and the type of wheat the markets of the world want; what is the ultimate protein content for wheat; what is the protein content for bread and what is the most advantageous method by which to establish a grade? As was pointed out by speakers last night, our export sales have dropped considerably from what they were three years ago. Certainly, we are down considerably both in our ability to sell and in our ability to receive a reasonable price that would equal our cost of production.

I agree with the minister that if we are unable to sell wheat at a reasonable price, then we might as well take it out of production and ask our farmers to switch to something else. But before that happens, we should have a pretty good assessment concerning where the difficulty lies. It seems to me it doe not lie in the selling. With relation to the establishment of this new act, I would like to know what the international grading system is. If we in Canada cannot say that the system we are using is the type of system that would meet international standards, then it is the wrong system. If the minister can say there is no such thing as an international grading system, then it is about time we helped develop one. Whatever the international grading system is, we should participate in it and we should be marketing our grain on the basis of that grading system. Let us not talk about the domestic market being in a different category, because we do not have a market of any size there.

If we buy a bag of flour from Czechoslovakia, when that bag arrives in Canada the protein and grade will be marked on it. All the particulars will be there. If we buy a bag of flour from Canada, we will be told that it is Canada's finest, the best procurable or that it is 100 per cent pure or something else which does not relate to grade. In Canada, we do not demand that there be any standard marked on the bag when the flour is for domestic consumption. The type of information marked on the bag is to the effect that it is general purpose flour or pastry flour. There is nothing which has any relation to grade, either internationally or domestically. There is no indication whether it is first or second grade, frozen, or has stones in it. Really, we are interested only in international grading. We must come to some understanding in respect of what that grade is, what our relationship to it is and what steps we should take in this regard.

In relation to this bill, the minister indicated that there will have to be more flexibility in our grading. He said the grading will be done by order in council. He said that new grades will be established by order in council when necessary, with certain limitations, provided certain other emergencies do not develop. I am not sure that is a bad thing. I am not sure it is good either, because I really do not know on what basis we are to establish these grades. I am of the opinion, however, that in Canada we have been overly protective of a system which may have become archaic many years ago. As everyone knows, we have developed recently a certain type of wheat with a low protein content but a very high yield. If we are to continue the production of wheat for feed grain purposes, then obviously it will be necessary to increase our production per acre in order to reduce our cost of production because that grain certainly will not sell at the same price as high protein wheat. So, I agree that there will need to be flexibility. But I believe there has been flexibility, although there has been reluctance on the part of the grain commissioners to accept that flexibility.

It was not too difficult for this particular minister, rightly or wrongly, to make the decision almost immediately that several new types of wheat would be released. This is really the first release in respect of a new type of wheat. There had been slight modifications over the years, but this is the first time in many years that a totally new type of wheat has been introduced into the grading system. So, there is flexibility.

Mr. Olson: That is progress.

Mr. Peters: I am not arguing that it is not progress. I think it is. But we had this flexibility under the old act, and also had a certain stability which in my opinion protected some farmers who were of the opinion—and they were certainly so advised—that the type and grade of wheat they were producing should not be reduced because the world was depending on No. 1 Northern high protein wheat. It seems that this really is not true. I hear that even Great Britain is buying wheat today on a straight protein basis from places like Argentina and Australia and apparently we are not able to meet that demand.

To be fair to the minister, I think he has done a number of other things, good and bad, which have had some effect on this situation. One of these has been the establishment of the block system. I think this system was established on the basis of the original concept of the terminal elevator. It was originally intended that certain grades could be established at inland and terminal elevators and delivered in both boat and trainload lots to the port terminals. However, over the years there has been a tendency for the country elevator to get rid of the type of grain that is most difficult to dispose of and at the same time fill up the elevator again because that is how they make their money. I can remember one Member of Parliament a few years agc telling us that he was lucky enough to have loaded a car with flax seed or mustard seed and when this boxcar arrived at the coast it just happened that it was in the right position at the right time. He was able, therefore, to sell it for two or three times the amount he would have received otherwise because the buyer was there when the car was in position at the coast.

There has been considerable loading and shipping without any relationship to the ability to export or sell that commodity under a reasonable price structure. This has created some problems. I still do not understand why a transport controller has not been established. I realize the block system partly solves the difficulty in this regard, but we have had problems and I expect this fall and next year we will have problems again. I believe we will have these problems until someone is made totally responsible for the movement of the boxcars. I think that with a modern communications system we could probably connect that system with the boat shippings and other things involved in the movement of grain. When we do this we always are able to move a great deal of grain in this country. We seem to become involved in a good deal of difficulty when we let the railways handle the movement of grain themselves.

• (3:20 p.m.)

The block system is applied mainly by the Wheat Board and the Board of Grain Commissioners to get the wheat into position, but we still need someone to move it along the track. This would seem to me to be the role of a transport commissioner who would have sufficient authority to oversee the movements and decide when the time is right for the sale program to be put into effect. Until we appoint a person who will be solely responsible for that operation, the block system will not function as well as it could, although it has already brought about a great improvement. The minister is to be congratulated for this.

Mr. Olson: That authority is sought in the bill.

Mr. Horner: That and a lot more.

Mr. Peters: The minister says that authority is sought in the bill. This raises a problem that I discussed with him personally concerning the individual car order book. The use of the individual car order book would mean that a person could order a car, have it delivered to his elevator and then load that car. He would have the right to do this. Probably this operation is not as practical as one could hope for, but nevertheless it was available. The block system may make it impossible for the farmer, if he is in the wrong protein grain area, to get loadings. This would be one of the responsibilities which I would give to a transport controller.

The new commission—and we will be interested to discuss this in the committee—will go some way toward the establishment of a relationship with the feed grain industry. A great many problems have arisen as a result of the fact that originally the feed grain industry was outside the jurisdiction of the Wheat Board. Sometimes officials of the Wheat Board come before the Agricultural Committee and say that barley is selling for 85 cents a bushel, and yet when they are questioned they admit that it is actually selling for as low as 35 cents a bushel. Yet, it is the first figure that is presented to the minister. If I were the minister I would be very angry about this because he has to take responsibility in the House for those figures, and yet the members of the Board have admitted they knew these figures were not correct. They were not really sure what the exact figure was. So, by giving control of the feed grain industry to the grain commissioners, we will eliminate some of the major problems that are developing because a large portion of our sales in specific grades do not come within the control of the national agency and chaos is developing in that area.

I did not intend to speak for this long, but there are a couple of other comments I wish to make. They concern the relationship between these problems of production and sales, particularly export sales, and the operations of the producers themselves. There is probably no industry in Canada with which the government is more involved in an authoritative way than the agricultural industry. The involvement is not in money. It has not really made much of a contribution in monetary terms, but it has certainly made a great intrusion into the agricultural community through regulations. In the last few years the government has been saying to farmers: "Go out and expand. You cannot exist unless you have an economic farming unit". In western Canada, this means you need several sections of land and a very large expenditure for agricultural machinery. At the same time, the government said to the farmers: "It is not entirely our responsibility to sell your products". We lent a great deal of money to farmers to expand their farming units and to establish economic farm units. Then, we said to them: "We cannot sell your produce and we cannot do anything about the sales structure, so we will take your land out of production this year but we will pay you your cost of operation. We will not give you any money but we will pay you the cost of summerfallowing your land. We will not give you the money to pay the interest on your loans, nor will we give you any other consideration."

Tied to that proposal by the government is the new regulation which will affect every farmer who in the future will produce wheat and will sell that commodity to the Canadian Wheat Board under this grain legislation. We have told farmers what they can do and what they cannot do, but we have not given them much assistance. Now, we are establishing a whole new structure which will have a very definite effect on deciding whether or not western agriculture will be successful. We will say to the farmers: "Your whole grading system has been changed and the marketing of grain will be related to the area from which you come. If you are in the Palliser triangle your grain will be of a considerably higher grade", because for some peculiar reason the protein content of the grain in that area is considerably higher than in other areas.

So, we have told the farmers, what they can do and what they cannot do. We have told them how to handle their products, to whom to sell them and how to do it. We lent them money and then we said: "If you sell wheat, you have to pay us half the money". We say to the farmers in western Canada: "You must sell 10 bushels of wheat because you must give five bushels of that wheat to pay off your cash advance". Everyone knows they will not sell 10 bushels of wheat because their quota will not be that high. The farmers do not expect more than a five bushel quota, so we will only get half the amount.

We have intruded into wheat production, and we have done a great deal to control it. I think that the grain Commissioners and the Wheat Board are to be congratulated on the reputation that they have helped Canada establish in this area. It is unfortunate that we waited until that reputation became tarnished before making this kind of change. However, I suggest to the minister that there are a number of things for which we are responsible to the farmer. We must provide the wherewithal for a total revamping of the grain handling system and we must provide new facilities for the handling of grain in western Canada. We are still in the horse and buggy days. Every elevator that is being built in western Canada is being built to accommodate a wagon, not even a truck. It is being built for out of date facilities. An hon. member shakes his head. If farmers agree with him, it is for the simple reason that they own many of those facilities and they would lose their equity if they had to dispose of them.

I believe that the types of box cars we use, which are not built for the types of elevators we have, and that the types of docking facilities which we have, should all be up-graded and revamped to meet modern transportation needs in the handling of our grain. The new production levels that we establish will have to be high enough so that we can legitimately decide in Canada, whether or not we have a subsidy, that we will be able to produce the quantity of grain that will give a reasonable return to the farmer in order that he may stay in business. The farmer has to be assured of that.

A floor has to be established so that the farmer is provided with a production level, with a quota structure, that will give him a reasonable standard of living. I do not believe the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) considers it a reasonable level when 25 per cent of the farmers in Saskatchewan have an income of less than $2,500 in an average year. Our quota structure must produce a reasonable return for the farmer or he will be in serious trouble, and in the end both agriculture and the Canadian consumer will be in difficulty. There is no point in boosting one segment of the agricultural economy if we do not stabilize agriculture all across the board. The change proposed here has to be made in conjunction with other changes.

One of our major needs today is an export sales program. As a member of the Agriculture Committee I have been shocked to note the lack of decisiveness shown by those people who are selling our agricultural products. We seem to depend on the type of person who will be selling Argentine wheat this afternoon, French wheat tomorrow, and who will be peddling Canadian wheat the next day. These people are not selling wheat just because it is Canadian wheat. They are selling wheat because of the opportunity they find in the market place, and they get a commission on their sales. That is not good enough. There are very few countries in the world that are not using their financial resources to promote sales in export markets. This has created chaos, and if Canada is not to lose all its agricultural industry I think we will have to provide our farmers with some of the same advantages that other countries provide theirs in this troubled time of export surpluses.

The minister is to be congratulated on introducing this bill. Knowing the minister, his background, his history, and his recent agreement to the committee proposal with respect to dairy policy, I am sure he is willing to accept suggestions and amendments. I believe that after serious study of this problem this bill, or an amended version of it, will give some advantage to Canadian farmers who, without a doubt, have suffered because they have been producing a top quality product. They have been meeting the standards which were set for them, but now they are told that these standards are not the type which the international markets demand. As a result, farmers have not been able to cover their costs of production. I hope the bill will receive the type of consideration that will allow for an orderly transfer from the old legislation to the new, with provision for innovations that have been long overdue, to the advantage of all people concerned.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, on rising to take part in the discussion on Bill C-196 I do so with concern for the agricultural industry. Not since the 1930's have we seen farmers in western Canada, where the provisions of this bill will apply in particular, so anxious about what may be in store for them. We have seen the government offer western Canada $140 million, and then admit that only $100 million will be needed. But even following that, members of the government say, "We don't know how much of that will be used." The latest report by one Department of Agriculture official expresses his fear that farmers will not sufficiently reduce crops. Then comes this bill.

I listened to the speech made by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters). He was eager to compliment the government for introducing this bill. But does this bill mention protein grading? It does not to any real extent. As recorded at page 5816 of yesterday's Hansard the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) said protein grading should be provided under the terms of this bill, and the minister replied, "It will be."

Mr. Olson: It will be provided.

Mr. Horner: Again he says it will be provided. What else will be provided in this bill? Rigid, authoritative controls are also going to be provided through this bill. Elevators are to be licensed in four different ways. Now, grain dealers are to be licensed. Whether licensed dealers will be better than unlicensed ones I do not know. The bill practically limits the type of grain that one can produce because of the application of the block system.

We have seen the government attempt to limit farm production. Now, we see it attempting to bring about a protein grading system. I wish the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) and the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Lang) in charge of the Wheat Board could get together on their respective programs. If the Minister without Portfolio is going to bring about any wheat acreage reduction he is going to do so in the area that produces high protein wheat. If he is going to bring about any increase in wheat production, it will be in the areas that produce low protein wheat.

Now, we see the Minister of Agriculture trying to establish that the reason our sales have gone off is that we have not really sold wheat under the protein content grading system. The idea of this system has caught fire in western Canada. A number of farm writers have said we should have adopted the protein grading system a long time ago, and that that is the reason why our sales have fallen. But let us not be misled in this House. Protein grading should have been adopted years ago but we did not lose all our markets because we did not adopt it, and now that we are going to adopt it this does not necessarily mean that buyers will be attracted to our door. We will still have to go out and sell our wheat.

If you have a product that is not moving and you cannot sell it at a discount, then you give your salesmen a little more incentive and maybe they will work a little harder to sell it. The President of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange has asked why a salesman should sell Canadian wheat. He has said such a man would make more money selling four cases of dog food to Japan than a full boatload of wheat. One of the brighter members of the agriculture committee replied that there were more people in Japan than dogs, and so there should be a better market for wheat there.

Is protein grading the real answer? I will go into that in detail. Will the program outlined by the minister in charge of the Wheat Board bring about a reduction in high grade protein wheat in western Canada? I think it will and I am going to outline why I think so and why that program will work directly contrary to this piece of legislation if, in fact, this piece of legislation brings about protein grading. What does protein content mean? I should like to read briefly from "Wheat Chemistry and Technology", page 31. Writing on protein content, the Author, Lawrence Zeleny states:

• (3:40 p.m.)

Protein content in wheat varies from about 6 per cent up to about 20 per cent, depending in part upon variety and class but more largely upon environmental factors during growth. Abundant rainfall during the period of kernel development usually results in low protein content, while dry conditions during that period favour high protein content.

Dry conditions produce high protein wheat. Is it going to pay farmers to summerfallow in low moisture areas where low yields are attained and where high protein wheat is produced? There will be no surplus wheat in those areas. Any reduction in wheat acreage will not be because of the program introduced by the minister but because high protein wheat is not produced in surplus. This bill links the block system into the quota system and the regulation of the elevators is going to favour high protein wheat. This system does absolutely nothing for the producers of low protein wheat, other than to declare it feed wheat which will have to be sold to the licensed dealers. Whether those licensed dealers will have the right to transport it across provincial borders or all across Canada is not stated in the bill.

We have two pieces of legislation here which are diametrically opposed insofar as high protein areas are concerned. The area outside the high protein area is completely insignificant. Does that area always have to produce low protein wheat? The book "Wheat Chemistry and Technology" goes on to explain, in dealing with testing methods, that protein content can be considerably influenced by the availability of nitrogen in the soil and by the addition of nitrogen fertilizer. However, this bill does not mention what system of testing would be used.

How is the minister's program working? His own farm is in my riding. He attended a meeting there and discussed whether the LIFT program would help the farmers. I came along a few days later and attended a meeting with the same farmers. I asked them whether I explained the program any differently from the minister and they said that we had both explained it in the same way.

Mr. Olson: It is all those bulletins we have been sending you.

Mr. Horner: The minister says it is all the bulletins he sent. But did the minister find that the farmers were accepting his program? I do not think he got any different reaction than I, when three farmers stood up and said they could take advantage of the program. At another meeting where 100 farmers attended, only four indicated their acceptance of the program and one of these told me afterwards that he shouldn't be counted as he will have to seed in order to live.

There is no general acceptance of the acreage reduction program that the Minister without Portfolio and the Minister of Agriculture introduced. It is definitely linked with this protein bill now before us and with the whole block delivery system. This bill and the block delivery system will eventually affect the quota system; the two go hand in hand. At a meeting in Brandon, Manitoba, attended by 700 farmers, only nine stood to indicate that they could take advantage of the quota. Surely, before this legislation is passed the man in charge of the Wheat Board, in consultation with the knowledgeable Minister of Agriculture who has long left the farm, will adjust the wheat acreage reduction program.

If the government has $100 million available for western Canadian farmers, should they not be bold enough to outline a plan that the farmers could take advantage of instead of one outlined and devised by academics? How can farmers in Saskatchewan take advantage of it when last year 18 million acres were under summerfallow and 16 million acres in wheat? How can they take any more land out of production? What effect will all that summerfallow have on the protein content next year when we are told that will be the basis upon which grain will be graded? The minister knows that you get low protein wheat but a higher yield under higher moisture conditions.

In an article appearing in the Calgary Herald on Saturday, April 11, 1970, an expert in the Department of Agriculture is quoted, under the heading "Farm Crop Cuts Not Yet Enough", as follows:

> J. S. Carmichael, an economist with the agriculture department's markets information division, studied the prairie grain situation on the basis of the DBS survey. His report concludes that farmers need to reduce their planting intentions still more.
> Canada already has 950 million bushels of hard red spring wheat on hand.

I do not believe Canada has that much wheat on hand, Mr. Speaker. This government, through the application of that acreage reduction program and this bill, are attempting to reduce the storage costs on wheat so that they will save the Treasury some money and not help the farmers one bit. That is why they kept storage space empty at the Lakehead for two months last winter, because storage costs the government one cent per bushel per month. This is the purpose of this bill.

Mr. Lang: Nonsense.

Mr. Horner: Its purpose is to directly regulate the handling of grain, to keep commercial storage costs at a minimum and thus save the Treasury money. In the long run, this program might cost the farmer a lot but let's tell the whole story. The minister said that is not quite so—

Mr. Olson: I said that is exactly not so.

Mr. Horner: It is exactly not so, he says. Let us take a look at what Mr. McNamara had to say before the Standing Committee on Agriculture on April 18, 1969. As recorded at page 1243 of the evidence, I had asked him to comment on whether the selling of our wheat by protein content would give the Wheat Board greater latitude in pricing under an international grains agreement. He replied:

> Dealing with the last question first, I feel that if we were to revert to a policy of selling on a basis of guaranteed protein not only would it necessitate—

This is the point on which the minister said "not so", and I want to emphasize that:

> —a complete revamping of our handling and selling systems but I cannot see where we would benefit by it. We have explored this with many buyers of the world and we find that they are not prepared to pay a premium although they would like to have it guaranteed. If we take the cream off our crop I am very much afraid that the residual quantity at the lower protein would mean a lower return for the producers.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. McNamara is the chairman of the Canadian Wheat Board, so I suppose he is in disfavour. We have to admit he is one of the most able men in the trade. He is over 70 years old and is still kept on by the government, not because of his youth or flexibility but because of his knowledge. He said we shall have to revamp our whole handling system. This bill is designed to revamp it and to reduce the quantity of wheat held in commercial storage, so that the government can get out from under the provisions of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act of 1956. This act says that the government must pay the storage charges on wheat in storage in excess of 178 million bushels. This bill is one means whereby the government will attempt to get out from under the provisions of that act. Mr. McNamara goes on to say:

> We are geared to a bulk handling system, and I still think it is the most efficient system—

The chairman of the Wheat Board is saying that if we adopt a protein grading system we must change our handling system. He makes that very clear, from my reading of the committee proceedings. He further says that this new method of protein grading and the changes in our handling system will entail mixing at the terminal; but the minister did not say anything about that in his speech. This bill is full of verbiage; the wraps have not even been taken off it and we do not know the minister's full intention. Answering an earlier question he said, yes, that it will include provisions relating to protein grading. I do not know whether the question was asked of him with respect to mixing in terminals.

Mr. Olson: Yes, it was.

Mr. Horner: Certainly, it will have to provide for the mixing at terminals. Mr. McNamara has something to say about mixing at terminals. I say that this bill will enable this government to reduce the expenses connected with commercial storage in terminals. It is designed to save the government money, and farmers will have to pay more. That is the name of the game.

Mr. Olson: That is absolutely wrong.

Mr. Horner: The minister says that is absolutely wrong. Let the minister stand up and deny that next year less money will be paid under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act of 1956 in connection with wheat stored in commercial storage.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, all I want to do is to direct the hon. member's notice to the fact that the payments made under that act are not determined by the criteria the hon. member has outlined.

Mr. Horner: The minister has not denied what I have said. He tried to hold me off, but did not deny what I said.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the hon. member was using a wrong premise.

Mr. Horner: Let the minister in charge of the Wheat Board deny that next year payments under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act of 1956 will be lower than before. He will not deny that.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Horner: Perhaps the minister could ask it when I have finished. If he wants to deny what I have said, he can.

Mr. Greene: The hon. member would be stuck for the right answer.

Mr. Horner: Mr. McNamara went on to say this, as reported at page 1246 of Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence No. 32 of the Standing Committee on Agriculture:

> I am very much opposed to terminal mixing. I know that there is a wide school of thought on this, and I can see that in some of the lower feeding grades, commercial grades, and so on, modifications are required, but I think, personally—and I am not speaking necessarily for my Board on this; because I have held these views for years—that for us to have terminal mixing of our higher grades would result in a much lower quality of product going into the foreign markets.

What he says about foreign markets is pretty clear. He goes on to say:

And one thing we need to maintain at this time is the quality of our exports. Recently there was a case in Japan where the Americans got into a lot of serious trouble. This was mainly because of terminal mixing at the west-coast ports. The quality was not satisfactory. They had to take steps to correct it. Therefore, speaking as Bill McNamara, my voice will always be heard against a change in the regulations which would allow terminal mixing of our top three grades, at least.

I say, as a result of the full application of this bill, terminal mixing will take place. Let the minister deny that charge.

Mr. Olson: Under the supervision of the Board of Grain Commissioners.

Mr. Horner: Now, he says it will take place under the supervision of the Board of Grain Commissioners. Did Mr. McNamara ever believe it would take place under no supervision. He fully believed it would be supervised.

We are told that by revamping our grading and handling systems we may possibly sell more wheat. We may, but not necessarily. In this connection, I have raised questions before the Standing Committee on Agriculture repeatedly over the past ten years. May I refer to Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence No. 41 of the Standing Committee on Agriculture. At page 1586 Mr. Treleaven of the Canadian Wheat Board is answering questions about British sales and why sales have dropped off to Europe and Great Britain. He says this:

...there are two or three factors that enter into a decrease in our total sales volume to the United Kingdom.

Mr. McNamara has touched on one and that is the fact of the changes in milling technology. This is a very, very sophisticated milling country, changes in milling technology have allowed them to use less of the strong wheats—

I emphasize the word "strong" because a strong wheat is spoken of when people mean high protein wheat. I continue:

—in their grist and still get an acceptable loaf of bread. So there has been in general a decrease in the proportion of high quality strong wheats that they have bought.

He goes on to say:

Today more and more of that trade is going by trans-shipment from northern European ports—through Rotterdam, Antwerp, and Amsterdam.

He also said that the United Kingdom is buying wheat from central European countries, including Spain, and that they are melding all this wheat into a grist, still using Canadian wheat as the basis, to get the cheapest commodity they can and still produce an acceptable loaf of bread. Although I accept the idea behind protein rating, I do not see that it will bring about gigantic increases in our sales. It could be that the regulatory controls envisaged in this bill and the increased red tape will mean that farmers will obtain less cash for the same amount of work.

The government is saying to western agriculture, and to Canadian agriculture in general, "Please take your reserve land out of production." If Canadian farmers could only produce enough feed grain, we could produce enough hogs, cattle and poultry to supply the needs of this country. Last year, 7 per cent of the beef consumed in Canada was imported; last year we imported 60 million pounds of pork, which is about 400,000 hogs. If we could use our surplus grain profitably, we would not need to import poultry, eggs and all the rest of it. We would not need to import over $10 million worth of poultry and over $20 million worth of eggs. That sounds like a lot of eggs.

Mr. Olson: What about exports?

Mr. Horner: The minister talks about exports. True, we exported quite a bit of beef and pork, but we could export more. We should not necessarily cut back our production. The farmers are looking for hope; they are looking for leadership and do not want to be told, "Cut back, and we will give you $6 an acre to quit farming certain land." That $6 per acre would not even pay the interest on the money that is tied up. Has the minister ever said that he intends to introduce a moratorium on Farm Credit Corporation loans or on loans used for the purpose of buying machinery from farm machinery companies? Some companies are foreclosing. I ask the minister whether he would not look into the operations of the farm machinery companies and whether he would not be willing to use, if necessary, the recommendations in the Barber Commission as a means of curbing the activities of some farm machinery companies. But no; we have two ministers in this area, under the old maxim of divide and rule. The Prime Minister went out to Winnipeg some time ago and said, "Why should I sell your wheat?" He did not sell it, but made two ministers responsible for agricultural matters. One of those ministers has introduced a program that is unacceptable. The western farmers would like to be able to accept it. Last week I asked the minister in charge of the Wheat Board if he would accept a change in the guaranteed eight bushel quota. Why could it not be transferable to barley or some other crop?

Although 75 per cent of the farmers in western Canada do not have a surplus of wheat, they may have 50 per cent of their land in summerfallow. They may have a quota. They are going to seed wheat this year because the eight bushel quota is the only guarantee they are given. The sad thing about most of that area is that the northern part and along the foothills, which produces the low protein wheat, will not be covered by this bill. We see confusion at its best.

The minister, who may well have been on the farm at one time, happily left the farm. He has had the farm problems dumped in his lap and has now come up with an economic trick that is causing a nightmare throughout western Canada. The farmers are attending meetings, 700 farmers in Brandon, 12,000 in Regina, 6,000 in Saskatoon—

Mr. Olson: More than that.

Mr. Horner: The minister says, "More than that". The minister will have more than that on his doorstep here if the two ministers do not get together and give the leadership this federal government is bound to give. I am not referring to the type of leadership displayed by the Prime Minister when he said, why should I sell your wheat? The farmers should be told what they can produce and the government should be prepared to sell it. The government should spend $30 million selling wheat rather than giving that money to the farmers not to produce wheat.

Mr. Olson: We do that as well.

Mr. Horner: If the government is spending $30 million selling wheat, why is there not a salesman going on an extended trip such as the Prime Minister intends to take? He plans to spend two days scuba diving rather than talking to our Pacific rim customers. Why cannot he have such talks when visiting that area? The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is to be amalgamated with the Department of External Affairs. It is only right that someone knowledgeable should go along on the trip.

What are the facts with regard to protein grading of wheat and the grading of wheat in other countries? Approximately 82 per cent of the wheat produced in Australia is low protein. Is the wheat acreage being cut back in that country? The 1970 figure shows that Australia has not cut back one bit. I see the minister shaking his head. I suggest that he read the report on wheat marketing prepared by Mr. Hudson for the Economic Council of Canada.

What about the United States? That country is supposed to be selling wheat according to protein content. According to the report of the agriculture committee the United States is not doing too well with mixing at the terminals, and has got into trouble with Japan. Is that country cutting back on wheat acreage? They are not cutting back at all. In fact, the northern states, Montana and the Dakotas, have been encouraged to increase their wheat acreage because of Canada's action. What is the net result? Canada is the only country of the five major wheat exporting countries that has said, we quit. Canada is the only country to take that negative approach. The minister shakes his head. He can make his own speech later if he likes. Canada has acted negatively and continues to do so. This bill may or may not do much for us. I am not prepared to judge it as good or bad until I have had an opportunity to examine it fully in committee.

There is no protein grading. Is it the French grading system we are to adopt? Are we going to adopt the Russian system? That country grades on the basis of protein to some extent. Are there two levels of cellulose and protein content that are going to be judged? We are not given this information. Will we be in a better competitive position with France? It is France that seems to be undercutting the price in the International Grains arrangement. I talked to the former minister in charge of the Wheat Board. I asked him whether Canada had notified the French government that Canada was anxious because of their price-cutting, but he said we had not done so. It was left up to the Wheat Board. He informed me the International Grains Arrangement countries were going to be meeting somewhere at some time. That is not good enough.

Farmers in western Canada have never wanted subsidies or handouts. They want a chance to produce. They have proven that they are very efficient, because they have gotten along with less subsidies than the farmers of any other country of the world. Western farmers want the government, the Wheat Board and the Board of Grain Commissioners to sell their product. If these agencies are unable to sell it, the farmers would like at least an honest effort to be made. This government has failed to do that. The Prime Minister in a shrugging, fanciful way said in Winnipeg, "Why should I sell your wheat?"

As far back as 1935, the Wheat Board was the responsibility of the government. The Wheat Board officials were appointed by the government and were therefore the direct responsibility of that minister of the crown who had nothing else to do but look after the Wheat Board and encourage the farmers on to greater heights. He has not done a good job. That minister, too, has accepted a negative line of thinking. The minister says, if we cannot sell it, then we had better not produce it. We are the only country in the world to adopt this attitude. The United States cut back wheat production in an orderly way 20 years ago, but they have not cut back any more in the last couple of years. The minister holds out a report which purports to say otherwise. In the last two years in particular, the United States has not cut back wheat acreage.

This program will bring about a wheat acreage reduction in the areas producing high protein wheat. While selling and grading on the basis of protein content may be used as a scapegoat by the government to show why we have lost sales. I say we have lost sales because we have not paid enough attention to the selling angle. We were ready to accept the negative approach that we should curtail production.

The government stated that they were prepared to give to the western farmers $140 million and then said, knowingly, that the figure amount used would be $100 million. In their hearts, they know that only $30 million or $40 million can possibly be accepted by these farmers, even with the best conditions in western Canada. Is the government prepared to adjust its program so that the farmers can take advantage of the $100 million they reportedly are prepared to give them? Neither minister is prepared to adjust his program. Both ministers know that under the program farmers cannot accept more than $30 million or $40 million. The minister shakes his head. He knows better because he has been meeting the same farmers as I have and has been hearing the same results. The Minister without Portfolio knows better. This is shown by reports from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. These reports show there will be a voluntary wheat acreage reduction by the farmers of 26 per cent and a 5 per cent increase in summerfallow. Under the government's program, the farmers will only be paid on the 5 per cent increase in summerfallow. Five per cent of $100 million is $5 million. I was over generous when I said $30 million or $40 million.

Mr. Olson: That was before the program was announced.

Mr. Horner: I have not heard of any major changes since the program was announced. If the minister has heard of any changes, I ask him to stand up and tell this House. How many people in Brandon did the minister say would be taking advantage of the program? Was it 7 out of 700?

An hon. Member: Nine.

Mr. Horner: How many people before the program was announced were going to reduce their acreage?

Mr. Olson: That was not the question.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. Horner: The question in western Canada today is, "Is the government serious? Do they have $100 million for western Canada or are they just baiting and teasing us?" Do they mean it or do they not? If they do, then the program should be adjusted so all farmers can take advantage of it. If you are honest and fair with western Canada, then western Canada will treat you more than fairly and honestly.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on Bill C-196 I would be the first to say that I am in general agreement with the aims of this bill, which is to revamp the Canada Grain Act, something that has stood for over 40 years. It is significant, in view of the rapidity of change in our modern world, that the Canada Grains Act is only now being revamped, and this indicates that the original act was either exceptionally good or that changes in our grading system have not occurred to a marked extent.

This revamping of our grading system, mainly in the field as I understand it of protein grading of wheat, is at least five years overdue. This bill brings into sharp focus the case for the government passing the standards bill that is now on the Order Paper. Government proponents of the standards bill indicate that voluntary standardization is not enough, that it is much too slow to be effective in a modern world. On the other hand, grading regulations have been entirely under government control and have not been changed for 40 years. This seems to indicate that there is no real evidence that governments move particularly fast when they are called upon to review regulations in a particular industry. Indeed, the slowness of the government in dealing with the Canada Grains Act would be a good indication that the standards bill will result in a similar slow down of changes in standards rather than accelerate them.

The indications for change in this bill have been brought about mainly by the need for protein grading in our export sales of wheat. Knowledgeable people to whom I have talked in the grain industry do not feel that protein grading will in itself increase sales of wheat in the export markets, but that unless this is carried forward we will be unable to maintain even our diminishing percentage of the world market. We in Canada are particularly dependent on the export of wheat to support the basic plank in the western grain economy. This income has in general a very marked effect on total income not only in western Canada but in the whole of Canada. Indeed, the export of western resources such as wheat, meat, oil seeds, oil and gas, minerals and forest products are the means whereby Canada is able to have a standard of living second only to that of the United States.

At the present time various factors are at work within the Canadian government structure that seem to be doing their best to antagonize our customers abroad. At the same time we are involving ourselves in an extremely heavy welfare-orientated government program; the government is proposing to cut down investment level by implementing its white paper on taxation; and it is attempting to create a bilingual political and economic system. All of this makes us a less competitive nation in the markets of the world. Recently we began to engage in curtailing foreign investment in our resources.

Protein grading of wheat may well be used as the scapegoat for all our ills and lack of export sales. In fact, though important, it has been only one of the many hard facts we have to face. For example, more countries of the world are becoming self-sufficient at this time in cereal grain production, and competition is becoming greater and more intense.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

Just three years ago it was suggested that Canada could grow all the wheat it could, for which a ready market would be found. The present state of our grain sales indicate that this is not so.

In the report of the Economic Council of Canada the commissioner pointed out that:

> Canada has achieved a rate of growth of labour productivity and agriculture well above that recorded in other sectors of the economy, and I'll roughly compare comparable dimensions to the rate of growth of agricultural labour productivity in the United States. However, the substantial disparity between the two countries in the absolute level of agricultural labour productivity has widened significantly. Mechanization and yield technology have contributed in nearly equal proportions to growth in the United States. In contrast, Canada has advanced in the area of mechanization but not kept pace in yield technology.

This would indicate that merely researching the guaranteed protein content is not the panacea when we consider the marketing problems of western Canadian wheat. It also indicates that we should be having a second look at the main factors that influence the productivity of the Canadian farmer. Family farms handed down from generation to generation must be virtually bought back from the government. Payment of estate and capital gains taxes and increased tax on the middle income group mitigate against easy acquisition of Canadian farms by a new farming generation.

Canada's percentage of the grain market has dropped from 24 per cent to 19 per cent in recent years and strenuous efforts will be needed to regain this share. Nevertheless, so far as this bill is concerned, protein grading should be introduced without too much dislocation of our markets in the world.

The complexity of marketing problems and changes that might have to be necessitated in wheat grading are indicated by a recent study of the Canadian-American Committee of the National Planning Association and the Private Planning Association of Canada. One of the commission members, Mr. Arden Burbridge of North Dakota, suggested that our grading system may have discriminated against developing countries that could have been major customers of ours by setting champagne standards for customers with beer budgets. He is quoted in today's issue of the Globe and Mail, April 14, as follows:

> These undeveloped countries have a need expressed more in terms of tons of wholesome nutrients without great concern for fine points of quality (such as bread colour, low volume and baking time).

With limited foreign exchange, it would seem that they would prefer to be able to negotiate price to take advantage of their lower quality demands.

Thus, by holding a fixed, rigid price, the exporting countries discriminate against our greatest potential future growth market.

He also suggested that unrealistic demands for high quality wheat prevent the switch to higher yielding semi-dwarf varieties whose quality, while slightly lower, would be adequate for this important market. The switch to protein marketing will have quite far-reaching and serious consequences on the pattern of grain growing in western Canada. For many years the Palliser triangle has been the area of Canada which usually produced the high protein grain that would bring a premium in world markets and which also contained the gluten and baking qualities necessary to meet the requirements of markets in Europe and Japan.

The whole parkland area outside the Palliser Triangle poses a problem in that it has been growing wheat for many years and the farm economy is geared substantial to wheat growing. If this area were not able to produce high protein saleable wheat, and if the discount on what they produced was too low then this whole area would be economically disadvantaged. However, should markets remain available in countries where low protein wheat is acceptable, then it may well continue its role as a wheat growing area in western Canada.

Also there seems to be substantial evidence that the protein level of wheat can be increased by judicious application of nitrogen so that in most years, even with the present varieties of wheat, substantial quantities of high protein wheat can be produced in parkland areas. It would seem possible that high yielding protein wheat can be developed for this parkland area and research would be indicated in this field. Otherwise, if there should have to be a cessation of wheat growing in much of the parkland areas of western Canada, there would be great economic dislocation and hardship. With this in mind, I should like to point out the possibility, that with the United States using protein grading right at the farmer's bin, this would seem to be much more fair than attempting to have a particular area designation.

There is one important aspect of this bill in respect of which I reserve judgment, and that is that all changes in grading are at the whim of the Governor in Council. This means that in the future any changes in the grading system can be made with simple disregard for Parliament. It has been 40 years since the Canada Grains Act has been amended. It would seem to have been a reasonable success, and it has remained under the control of Parliament. This usurption of power is becoming an everyday occurrence on the part of this government. It would appear they consider that in future all changes in the grading of grain should not be in the hands of Parliament but only in the hands of the Governor in Council.

The minister has stated it is necessary to move quickly, so power must be retained within the government at all times. There have been no major changes in the grain act for 40 years and it has always been the government's prerogative to introduce legislation at any time to make changes. Protein grading should have been instituted some years ago, yet the government has shown that it has not been worried about this problem. So far at least, changes in grading should be made only after reasonable consultation with the producer and marketing groups, and finally with elected representatives in the House of Commons.

Recent changes in the acreage quota by order in council leave much to be desired. Just recently we had operation LIFT proposed by the minister, which seems to have been introduced after very little consultation with producer groups. Under the LIFT program, the minister hoped that no wheat would be grown in western Canada during the coming year. To have followed up the minister's idea in its entirety would have been a disastrous economic move for the grain farmers and the western economy in general. Fortunately, the farmers seem to have more sense than the Minister and seem to be thinking about a modest reduction to approximately 15 million acres of wheat. This seems likely all that can be done in one year.

The minister in charge of the Wheat Board has indicated that he expects the Wheat Board will only buy from the producers somewhere in the neighbourhood of 250 million to 300 million bushels of wheat based on an eight bushel quota. Obviously, he further expected that the normal intake of about 450 million bushels of wheat from a crop year would be reduced.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member referred to figures concerning the amount of wheat expected to be produced next year by the farmers, as though those figures had been given by me at some time. These figures are completely in error. If you consult the figures at the time the LIFT program was announced and make a calculation on the basis of 53 million acres and eight bushels per authorized acre, you will find that 53 million times eight works out very close to the 425 million bushel figure to which the hon. member has referred.

Mr. Ritchie: I am glad the minister made that statement, because no matter how you figure this, on the basis of only eight bushels per specified acre it does not work out. Many farmers will not have the wheat to fill their acreage quotas unless they grow wheat. It does not seem reasonable that the Wheat Board will be obligated to take from the producers as a whole more than 300 million bushels of wheat. If every farmer had wheat to fulfil the eight bushels per authorized acre quota, then we could expect to have 400 million bushels of wheat. I suggest there will not be anything like this distribution of wheat.

In other words, through operation LIFT, the minister is asking that grain farmers reduce their deliveries by 100 million to 150 million bushels unless there is an increase in the amount specified for delivery to much above eight bushels per acre, and he has not indicated to my satisfaction that he intends to do that. What he proposes will help out the storage position of the Wheat Board, but I would submit that at this time it is too much to ask the grain farmer to reduce deliveries by 100 million to 150 million bushels based on the eight bushel allocated quota. With this in mind, I have considerable reservation about grading being entirely the prerogative of the Governor in Council, and I would hope that this phase will be very closely examined in the committee.

Another important feature is the block system of moving all grain. This seems to have considerable advantages but has shown weaknesses in the movement of flax and rapeseed into export positions during the past year. There is no doubt that during this last fall flax and rapeseed sales were lost because oilseeds were not in position. One of the reasons seems to be that the block system is not too helpful in moving these relatively small quantities of grain into forward positions at all desirable times.

[Mr. Lang.]

As far as the minister's comment on the checkoff for research purposes is concerned, I will only say at this time that this should be carefully examined by the committee and that some recommendations should be brought forward. This is an exceptionally complex bill which involves very difficult phases of the Canadian grain trade. No doubt committee hearings will throw a great deal more light on the functions of this act.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, other hon. members of this party and other parties in opposition have directed their attention to some of the intrinsic difficulties in the bill and have made a very convincing case why it is so essential that this bill be subjected to the closest possible scrutiny of the committee, particularly as to its objects. I have other objections which I should like to put before the House at this time. I am not going to infringe upon the rules, but in order to make my case I must say that the objectives of the bill, as set out in large part in clause 11, constitute such a grave infringement of the traditional restrictions on the kind of power given to the government it taints the whole bill and justifies a complete review.

What are the objects of the proposed Canadian Grain Commission which presumably will administer the act. They are set out in clause 11 of the bill which reads in part as follows:

> Subject to this Act and any direction to the Commission issued from time to time under this Act by the Governor in Council or the Minister, the Commission shall establish and maintain standards of quality for Canadian grain and regulate and supervise grain handling in Canada—

This is the first part in respect of which I take grievous exception. To begin with, as I read this clause, the commission and the Governor in Council can extend these objectives beyond grain, as defined by Parliament in Part I, to include for example any seed. The clause places two duties upon the commission, each one to achieve a purpose. The clause spells out the means by which the commission is to achieve those purposes. The first purpose is to ensure maximum acceptance of Canadian grain as a commodity of dependable quality in domestic and export markets. This purpose is to be achieved by maintaining standards and quality for Canadian grain.

The second purpose is to ensure an efficient grain handling system, which is to be achieved by regulation and supervision of grain handling in Canada.

• (4:30 p.m.)

This definition of purposes and means appears to be qualified in two ways. The definition is made subject to this act and, more important, to any directions to the Commission issued from time to time under this act by the Governor in Council or the minister, as I have read from proposed clause 11. These restrictions cannot be understood unless some of the excess verbiage is cleared away. The words "subject to this act" are meaningless. In the first place, clause 11 will be part of the act itself and can hardly be subject to itself. In the second place, the words "subject to", as here used, are analogous to "not inconsistent with this act". Mr. Driedger, a one-time eminent civil servant, a deputy minister and now a lecturer of law, in an authoritative text on this subject states:

> Sometimes authority is conferred to make regulations not inconsistent with the act. These words are unnecessary. Even in their absence it would not be permissible to make regulations contrary to or inconsistent with the act itself.

In other words, under the rules of statutory interpretation, the duties of the Commission as expressed in clause 11 must be carried out by the Commission in a manner that does not violate the specific provisions enacted by Parliament elsewhere in the act. We are then left with the words "subject to...any direction to the Commission issued from time to time under this act by the Governor in Council or the minister." These words are indeed restrictive on the Commission in its duty to carry out the two objects expressed in clause 11; but they constitute a delegation of power to the Governor in Council and to the minister this is unrestricted and unconditional in terms and confined only by the title of the bill. Presumably it will be argued in rebuttal that these words are descriptive; that is, they relate to powers elsewhere delegated in the bill to the Governor in Council and to the minister. But this argument cannot be supported. In the first place, if the phrase is only descriptive of delegated powers defined in other parts of the bill, why are the words "under this act" used?

Again, it is my submission that the Canadian Wheat Board or the Commission, as the case may be, is restricted to dispose of overages as directed by the Governor in Council. This is not a provision that affects the objects of the Commission. There is indeed no need to refer to it in clause 11. The next delegation of power is in clause 78, which empowers the minister to review the Commission's refusal or revocation of an elevator or grain dealer licence and to direct the Commission to issue or reinstate a licence. This is an appeal procedure and does not run counter to the objects expressed in clause 11. I consider this to be a very serious breach of the type of parliamentary condition which should be laid down when a minister is permitted to sit in judgment and render a decision which affects the rights and liberties of the people of Canada, including those to whom a licence has been issued by the commission. The commission is given further authority with regard to the issuing of licences and the conditional revoking of licences. Then, the bill provides that from that commission there can be appeal to a political person or tribunal, without the protections which we in this country want to maintain.

I have not established this argument to the extent I might have, but I should like to make plain that I object to this granting of authority to the minister to sit as a court of appeal upon decisions of a commission. More than ever, I object to the fact that clause 11 is an unlimited, uncontrolled and improper delegation of power to the Governor in Council and the minister to make laws for any purpose they may see fit pertaining to seeds. This government has become a genius in giving to itself large chunks of power by the writing of regulations and the passage of orders in council. I have continuously objected to this procedure. I think some day the country will wake up to the fact that it has made a very serious error in giving away to a group of people, such as any cabinet or government, the right to do some of the things we have given them the right to do. But this bill would go further. In effect it would authorize the Governor in Council to legislate in respect of objects beyond those included in the bill. This is what we are doing. Apparently we are doing this quite willingly. The government backbenchers are quite happy about it. I am not. I think this is something we should regard far more seriously.

I prepared a reasoned amendment which under normal circumstances I would have moved. However, for reasons I shall set out, I do not intend to move this amendment at this time. This amendment would have been to the effect that this bill be not procedeed with now as it conflicts with the principle of this House that this House will not give the government or a minister of the government legislative power to amend or define the purposes and provisions of an Act of this Parliament or the objects of a body created by that Act. For other reasons, I am now of the opinion that I should object to the bill generally and therefore it becomes unnecessary for me to move this amendment. These other reasons, stated succinctly, are the following. This is a money bill. As there must be, there appears on the first page of the printed bill the recommendation. His Excellency the Governor General has recommended to the House of Commons the present measure respecting grain because it involves the expenditure and appropriation of money.

Over the last few days, we in the opposition have been involved in a rather traumatic experience with regard to the opportunities which exist for the officials of this House to scrutinize and call to the attention of the House what, in their opinion, are the errors of omission and commission of the government, of government departments, of government tribunals and of Crown corporations in connection with the expenditure of money which has been voted by this House. I am referring specifically to the Auditor General. Because of the attitude taken by this government, particularly by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) and the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald), I take strong exception to this House granting the right to this government to appropriate money unless and until this particular situation has been clarified. For that reason, speaking for myself, I am not prepared to give approval to the passage of this legislation. I shall set out as clearly and in as short a fashion as possible, my reasons for this attitude.

What is to be the fate of the Auditor General, whoever he may be, when he scrutinizes the expenditures made under the Provisions of this bill? When I refer to these expenditures I have in mind the enormous powers I have cited which give the government the right to set forth completely any objects unrelated to the proposals in the bill. What is to be the fate of that money? To what extent are we in this House, who have a duty here as the servants of the people who have elected us, to have an opportunity to conduct a searching and close examination of these expenditures? I submit that what has taken place constitutes a valid reason for me to say to the government that it cannot have these powers until it clarifies precisely where it stands on this situation. If the government introduces a money bill, it must be prepared to indicate at this time, in my view, that a clear and definite responsibility rests upon it with regard to the audit of the money which will be granted.

Let me go over this briefly. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald), in a television interview not so long ago, stated:

> We recognize the fact that it's his responsibility to audit the accounts and to account for the manner in which the funds have been expended. We don't think it's his responsibility to give legal opinions with regard to the manner of carrying out the policies and, in particular, we don't regard it as being his responsibility to criticize the underlying policy involved in certain decisions.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Does the hon. member disagree with that approach?

Mr. Baldwin: Part of it.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): What part?

Mr. Baldwin: The minister should arm himself with patience and give himself an opportunity to be educated. Then, he will probably change his views on this matter.

What about the other president who, before a television audience consisting of millions of people, supported his colleague, the President of the Privy Council when he said, in response to a question:

> Now, in this sense he's pitting his judgment as to sound business practice, sound governmental policy—

Whether or not this government could ever have a sound policy is a very debatable point. However, we will go into that later.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): How would you know about sound policy?

Mr. Baldwin: The president went on to say:

> —against the government, and not unnaturally you wouldn't expect a government in every instance to agree with his judgment. I wonder myself whether the Auditor General should cast himself in this role, or whether we should look for really another kind of person to be Auditor General—

How can we in this House dare appropriate any money for this government when that is their approach to the examination, scrutiny and checking of the expenditures which the government is making? We would be delinquent in our duty if we permitted this bill to go through under the circumstances which prevail today.

What about the Prime Minister who yesterday in response to a question from the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) said:

I would assume that if that was said it might be interpreted to mean we want another type of function fulfilled by the person who is fulfilling the job now, not some other person.

The reference was to the Auditor General. In other words, the right hon. gentleman said yesterday, beyond any shadow of a doubt, that the government is planning a change in the role of the Auditor General. He repeated that later in response to a question which I asked when he chimed in the chorus of the two other presidents and said:

—and whether they are proceeded with with proper probity—

He was dealing with the accounting procedures.

—but with that other function, that of criticizing policy, that of criticizing government decisions, which I think is not one for the Auditor General but for the opposition.

That is absolute nonsense. There must be an opportunity for the Auditor General to criticize government decisions when those decisions represent an expenditure of government moneys which is not in accordance with the views expressed by this House, which is not in accordance with the policy laid down by this parliament. The Auditor General is a servant of Parliament. It is parliament's policies which he cannot criticize. If he did criticize a policy laid down in this House, I for one would agree that he is not doing his job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Baldwin: But when he criticizes the government for spending money in a way not authorized by this House, then I would say he is doing his duty. However, steps should be taken against him if he fails to point out to Parliament in his annual report, and to the people of Canada, that what in fact has been done by the government is not in conformity with what Parliament has authorized. That is what the Auditor General is doing. I defy any hon. member opposite to examine the Auditor General's report and find there one iota of criticism of the policies of this Parliament. It is the policies of the government in carrying out these functions that he criticizes. That is at issue, and he is entitled to criticize them. Heaven help us when he fails to do so.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Would the hon. member permit a question? Would the hon. gentleman then explain the nature of the criticism with regard to the Northumberland crossing?

Mr. Baldwin: There was no criticism. If my hon. friend would take time to read that part of the Auditor General's report carefully, as I did several times, he will see that it constitutes a bare recital of the facts. There is not one word of criticism. It may well be that the hon. gentleman and his government do not like that bare recital of the facts because a simple examination by any person of average intelligence shows there has been some stupidity on the part of the government, but that does not mean the Auditor General is criticizing.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Was there any misappropriation of funds under those circumstances, or were they illegally applied?

Mr. Baldwin: Of course not, but I see my hon. friend wants me to throw in his face the actual provisions of the statute under which the Auditor General operates. Let me read them. Subsection (1) of section 70 of the act reads as follows:

The Auditor General shall report annually to the House of Commons the results of his examinations and shall call attention to every case in which he has observed that

(a) any officer or employee has wilfully or negligently omitted to collect or receive any money belonging to Canada,

(b) any public money was not duly accounted for and paid into the Consolidated Revenue Fund,

(c) any appropriation was exceeded or was applied to a purpose or in a manner not authorized by Parliament.

That one, for example, deals with many of the recommendations made by the Auditor General. I am not referring to the specific one mentioned by the President of the Privy Council. Many of the items in the Auditor General's report deal with cases where appropriations were applied to a purpose or in a manner not authorized by Parliament. The subsection goes on to read:

(d) an expenditure was not authorized or was not properly vouched or certified.

(e) there has been a deficiency or loss through the fraud, default or mistake of any person or

(f) a special warrant authorized the payment of any money, and to any other case that the Auditor General considers should be brought to the notice of the House of Commons.

At the time I was chairman of the Public Accounts Committee seven years ago, the Auditor General carried on the practice which has been sanctified by time and tradition of bringing to the attention of this House any case where there may have been what he calls non-productive payments, where payments have been made which do not produce any result. It may well be that the government may try to make out a good case to say that these were productive payments. But the Auditor General has a duty, which he exercises, to bring to the attention of the public of Canada and of this House any instance where the payments have been non-productive.

The hon. member may shake his head. He should read the Auditor General's reports for the last six or seven years and he will find this has been done over and over again. As a matter of fact, for years there was a schedule attached to the Auditor General's report in which he itemized dozens and dozens of non-productive payments. Suddenly, however, for other purposes—not for this one, this is not what the government is getting at and we know this—the government has decided they do not like the Auditor General. They have an aversion to him and they dislike what he has been doing. Their sensitivities have been hurt.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Would the hon. member state any instance in which I made a personal remark about the Auditor General?

Mr. Baldwin: I am not suggesting the hon. gentleman has.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): You say I have an aversion to him.

Mr. Baldwin: In his official capacity. I would think the minister likes me, but he probably has an aversion to me if in my capacity as a member of the opposition I have been too critical and reprimanded him.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Or when I have trouble getting a straight answer.

Mr. Baldwin: The minister simply does not listen. Let him not divert me. I was just getting started. I finished with two presidents, now I will finish with the Prime Minister in a minute or so.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Olson: Talk about the bill that is before us.

Mr. Baldwin: I am talking about the bill. In response to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson), I am saying that I, as a member of this House, with a responsibility to my constituents in particular, and to the country in general, have an aversion and dislike to granting to the government the right to spend money and appropriate money until they have clarified where they stand with the Auditor General. That is why I do not like the bill.

Mr. Olson: What has that to do with the administration of the Grain Act?

Mr. Baldwin: I think the Minister of Agriculture probably is a little punchdrunk as a result of his travels through western Canada and the beatings he has taken from the farmers in the west.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to polish off the Prime Minister I point out that, today, in response to a very alert question from the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), he admitted beyond any shadow of doubt that the government has in mind a new role for the Auditor General. The Prime Minister is going to clarify his duties. He is going to clarify him right out of existence, stopping him from being an effective weapon in connection with the parliamentary scrutiny of improper government expenditures.

This, Mr. Speaker, is extremely important. Are we in this House, under these conditions, to allow a government of this description, a government which has expressed these sentiments, the privilege of appropriating money and spending it? They have given every indication by the statements made by the President of the Privy Council, by the President of the Treasury Board, and by the right hon. Prime Minister that they are avowed and determined to secure a new Auditor General's Act which will diminish the role and the effectiveness of the Auditor General. In addition to that, no doubt they have in mind a replacement of the present incumbent. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I think any hon. member who will take the time and the trouble to read what has been said, to examine these comments of the ministers in question and of the Prime Minister, and to look at the Auditor General's Act under which he secures his authority, will see there is an ominous trend developing.

Here is an autocratic government avid for power, lusting not only for what power it has but for new power. All governments of this kind dislike criticism. They like to be free to hide, conceal and pigeonhole the mistakes they make. They dislike the glare of publicity which the Auditor General throws on their operations. They are trying to get rid of him and to minimize his role. For that reason it is incumbent upon us to say to them,"Until you clarify your stand and tell us exactly what you want to do, we have to be very careful indeed." I am giving my personal views on this, Mr. Speaker, as one who has been deeply concerned about the drift in this government, as one who for some years had the honour to be chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, and as one who is greatly concerned about the direction in which Parliament is heading. I hope that the attitude I have taken will be supported by other hon. members.

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the enlightened addresses by my colleagues from Mackenzie and Crowfoot, supported by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie), and now the speech we have just heard from the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) with regard to the legal technicalities of Bill C-196, I think the House will be impressed with the fact that all is not well with respect to this legislation, and with the fact that it is not going to be a cure-all. With respect to this revision of the Canada Grain Act, Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be brief because many of the problems have already been covered by my colleagues.

I want to serve notice on the government that the proposed revision of the Canada Grain Act in Bill C-196, referred to as an act respecting grain, is not going to be a panacea for the present economic problems facing western Canadian grain farmers. Neither is operation LIFT, or what our farmers refer to as the Farmers' Income Reduction Plan, going to be the answer, as both the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) and the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Lang) responsible for the Wheat Board very well know.

In my opinion the emphasis being placed both on this legislation and on operation LIFT is greatly overrated, and is basically an admission of the government's failure to sell wheat. There is no doubt that the Canada Grain Act, first developed in 1930, needs updating. The legislation at that time was enacted for the protection of the producers, and set standards for Canadian wheat, which not only was recognized as the best bread wheat in the world but because of the grading system could be sold anywhere in the world by sample.

Although most of our wheat will still be sold by sample, it has become apparent that a new grading system is needed to satisfy some of our better customers as to the protein content of the grain offered. This is particularly so in West Germany, Japan and Britain, where new baking techniques are being used. In my study of the bill I failed to find any reference to protein grading, but as explained by the minister in his opening statement authority is provided whereby grades may be changed at any time by Order in Council. In fact, it is this provision giving the minister authority to make changes, allocate boxcars and generally direct the movement of different kinds and grades of grain to the terminals, that I find a little disturbing. Certainly, the government will be involved in the grain business, whether the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) would like to shrug off the responsibility or not.

The bill provides that the grains Commission will have authority to licence all grain handling facilities, including feed mills, to regulate and supervise grain handling in Canada, as well as to establish and maintain standards of quality for Canadian grain, subject to directions issued to the commission from time to time by the Governor in Council, or the minister. The protein grading of wheat brings up some very interesting questions. I believe that I am right in saying that sales of wheat made in the past to the Communist countries have been in the lower bread grades of No. 3 and No. 4 Northern. Is it possible that in the future these countries will want to buy their grain on a protein basis?

I hope that in changing the grading system, and re-arranging our transportation and grain handling facilities, it will not be forgotten that practically all areas of western Canada must grow wheat as part of their crop rotation, and all grades will be needed as part of our export pattern. This is a point that was brought out last night by my colleague from Mackenzie when he opened this debate, because he comes from an area of western Canada where approximately 35 per cent of the farmers may not be able to sell their wheat under a protein grading system.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas)—Industry—Criteria for payments to automobile companies; the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave)—Agriculture—Feed Grains—Requested increase in freight rate assistance.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, Public Bills.

Mr. Forest: Mr. Speaker, it has been agreed that we would proceed with Bill No. C-38 in the name of the hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather).

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

LOBBYING CONTROL ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR IDENTIFICATION OF LOBBYISTS, ETC.

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey) moved that Bill C-38, respecting the control of lobbying, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in speaking in support of this bill, it is my intention to divide my remarks into the following categories: first, I wish to outline what the bill aims to do and what it does not aim to do. Second, I wish to cite something of the public need for this type of legislation. Third, I wish to quote from existing United States legislation in this same field and, finally, to ask that hon. members consider whether the subject matter of the bill could be sent to an appropriate committee for consideration as raw material for a useful piece of Canadian legislation?

• (5:00 p.m.)

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote from the explanatory notes of the bill as follows:

> The purpose of this bill is to require the identification of lobbyists, persons who, in the interest of others, seek to influence senators or members of the House of Commons to vote or use influence for, or against, a matter which may come before Parliament. Nothing in the bill restricts lobbying, paid or otherwise, or in any way interferes with the right of the public to make representations to members of the Senate and of the House of Commons. Similar legislation in effect in the United States requires that lobbyists register with the Clerk of the Legislature and secure an identification card from the said Clerk.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard).]

The definitions and regulations are contained in a few clauses and, if I may, I should like to quote briefly what I think are the key points:

> (a) "employer" means any person who has an individual lobbying for him for compensation or expenses;—
> (d) "lobbyist" means a person who engages in lobbying;

That is in line with the definition described in the "employer" section. Control of lobbying requires that:

> No person shall engage in lobbying until he registers with the Clerk of Parliaments and secures an identification card from the said Clerk.

And the penalty involved for not following these regulations is a $500 fine or three months in prison or both.

I want to emphasize two things which this bill does not seek. First, there is nothing in it to discourage lobbying nor is it my intention that it should be discouraged. All that is sought here is to identify the lobbyist. Second, the bill does not apply to members of the public making representations to Members of Parliament.

As I said earlier, legislation along the lines of my proposal is in effect in the United States where it is called the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act. I have a copy here and it sets out in detail the definitions and the regulations regarding accounts of moneys paid to lobbyists and the statements to be filed with the Clerk of their House. The key point as far as my proposal is concerned, that is the registration of lobbyists with the secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House, is also dealt with in detail. The United States act goes further and is tougher than what I have in mind here. The United States legislation carries a fine of not more than $5,000 or imprisonment for not more than one year, or both.

It may well be asked, Mr. Speaker, what is wrong with lobbying? Not that I seek to stop it, but what is the danger or the unfairness of it in our form of democratic society? It seems to me that an organized interest group represents a concentration of power. It is a means by which individuals, or individual units of power whether of business, agriculture, labour or such groups as, say, the Pharmaceutical Association or the tobacco industry, may seek to have or to gain a greater impact upon the conduct of public affairs. This could give such groups a tremendous advantage over comparable unorganized citizens.

I believe that to counteract this unfair advantage and to expose who is doing what, for whom, why and for how much, we need some legislation such as that which I have put forward this evening, the important point being that it would require identification of the lobbyists.

On the question of how lobbying works in Canada and in Ottawa, I have never read anything better than the comprehensive article prepared by our own research branch of the Library of Parliament which was published in the Parliamentarian of January, 1970. Before I quote from that article, it might be of interest to hon. members that lobbying in Canada goes back to 1858, when the Canadian manufacturers, before they had an association, marshalled their forces in favour of higher tariffs. The article reads:

> Organized pressure and interest groups often exert their pressure by means of the professional lobbyist. Professional lobbyists, as they exist in Canada, are usually experts who help interested parties, particularly businessmen, to understand the government procedures and regulations which affect them and in turn provide advice on the best course of action permissible under the existing circumstances. The yellow pages of the telephone book list these experts as business consultants, representatives, or agents. The spectrum of such lobbies includes lawyers, general representatives, and individual experts and the professionals employed by trade and group associations. The Toronto Financial Post suggests there are ten different categories of lobbies in Canada's capital—
> Estimates made in 1968 suggest there are 200 national associations that have offices in Ottawa with many companies maintaining their own man—
>
> Perhaps one of the best examples of lobbying on a large scale is found in the nationally organized Canadian Manufacturers' Association (CMA). To carry out its profusion of activity the CMA has a budget of over $700,000 stemming for the most part from dues of over 6,000 member firms which represent more than 75 per cent of Canada's manufacturing capacity—
>
> In the United States there are some 300 registered lobby groups with a membership of more than 5,000 Congressman, . . . Not counting the hidden lobbies, this group apparently spends over $5 million annually on direct lobbying. In Washington the greatest effort is directed toward individual Congressmen—
> The art of putting pressure on government in Canada even though employed in anonymity, usually reaches the most intensive stage when a particular piece of legislation is about to be passed. Examples of such intensity are plainly evident from the activities of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers' Association of Canada (PMAC) in 1968 and the Tobacco Industry in 1969.

That concludes the quotations from that source, Mr. Speaker, but I should like to add a final one from an editorial in the Toronto Star in July, 1968, which reads:

> Canadians are entitled to know a great deal more about professional lobbies at least than is available now. It's time Canadians had a chance to know in a regular way and systematic way who they are what they are after and how much they are paying to get it—
> After all, it's the public that finally pays when the lobby prevails over the general interest.

That is my view exactly, Mr. Speaker, and in line with that I would urge hon. members to allow the subject matter of this bill to proceed to the appropriate committee. Inasmuch as members will recall that some months ago the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was reported to be carrying out a research study with a view to promoting the introduction of legislation requiring the registration of lobbyists, I would think that this proposed legislation could be referred to the appropriate committee. If that is what the government wants, it is what I want too, Mr. Speaker.

• (5:10 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Guy LeBlanc (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I express my humble views on the legislative proposal presented today by the hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather).

In spite of the many interesting explanations he has just given us, I must say honestly that I am against this bill for the following reasons.

First, without being a strong supporter of the status quo in all fields, I suggest that we must maintain it for some time with regard to this matter.

As a matter of fact, since I was elected to the House in 1965, the problem of lobbyists who come to see members of the Commons or the Senate in both chambers or in the committees, is not a very serious one. In my view, there is no such problem.

Even if I am opposed to this bill, this does not mean that the arguments submitted by the hon. member for Surrey are not valid ones. On the contrary, he expressed himself in a sober and sincere manner; he was well documented to show the validity of his assertions. However, I wish to come back to a principle which I have often voiced in the House and which is dear to me: there is no perfect institution on this planet. In fact, we must always try to improve, to progress with the flow of the best evolutionary process, which is an attitude becoming more and more fashionable in all fields. Furthermore, I feel that any modern man must recognize this principle and arrange his life in keeping with this evolution.

As pressures made in Canada by certain groups of people who engage in lobbying, as it is usually called, are linked to the nature of parliamentary institutions, I feel that we must consider the possibility of improving in a general and global way these parliamentary institutions as well as this lobbying.

That is why when we talk about improving our parliamentary institutions—be it the operation of the House of Commons, of the committees, of the Senate or our relations with the public—I suggest that a task force made up of independent, competent and free men should first make a thorough study of the situation.

As recommended by the member for Surrey, we must apply our energies to improve certain things in order to ensure the proper operation of the government and of our judiciary system.

If each of us tries to improve such or such an aspect of our institutions, as the member for Surrey is doing today with respect to lobbying, next another member will ask for a reform of the international organization of the House, and later another member or group of members will make representations regarding the working conditions of members of Parliament and Senators.

With all due respect to the House, I think this procedure is too haphazard. It is a little like a doctor trying to cure an organic disease which causes headaches by ordering his patient to take aspirin only. It might relieve the patient but it would not eliminate the cause of the disease. That is why I am convinced that for the moment it is better to maintain the status quo.

In my opinion, the House has more important duties. It would be more desirable to maintain the status quo until experts have summarized our needs and tried to determine how we can improve our parliamentary institutions of which we can be proud. The principles they stand for remain but parliamentary institutions could be made better, at least as far as the application of these principles is concerned.

When I refer to the status quo, I am thinking about lobbying, the action of lobbyists who try to influence the work of the government or even that of members of the judiciary. I think that it would be advisable to ask ourselves what our present institutions are worth and to make the necessary distinctions.

[Mr. LeBlanc (Rimouski).]

Allow me to quote Standing Order 114 concerning the role of parliamentary agents. I think, as stated by the mover of the bill, that the role of the parliamentary agents can be related to that of lobbyists who wish to influence Parliament in one way or another when a piece of legislation has to be passed.

The Standing Order in question reads as follows:

(1) No person shall act as parliamentary agent conducting proceedings before the House of Commons or its committees without the express sanction and authority of Mr. Speaker, and all such agents shall be personally responsible to the House and to Mr. Speaker, for the observance of the rules, orders and practice of Parliament and rules prescribed by Mr. Speaker, and also for the payment of all fees and charges.

(2) A list of such persons shall be kept by the Chief Clerk of Private Bills and a copy filed with the Clerk of the House.

(3) No person shall be allowed to be registered as a parliamentary agent during any session unless he has paid a fee of twenty-five dollars for such session and is actually employed in promoting or opposing some private bill or petition pending in Parliament during that session.

Standing Order 115 sets out what the parliamentary agents are liable to if they wilfully act in violation of the rules. This order reads partly as follows:

—shall be liable to an absolute or tempory prohibition to practice as a parliamentary agent, at the pleasure of Mr. Speaker; provided that upon the application of such agent, Mr. Speaker shall state in writing the ground for such prohibition.

Mr. Speaker, I was not able to present my speech as clearly as the hon. member who spoke before me as I express myself from a few notes that I had time to take down during the presentation of this bill which interested me greatly.

I noticed that in the explanatory notes of this bill, mention is made of an identification card and it is said there also that nothing in the bill restricts this kind of activity, paid or otherwise, or in any way interferes with the right of an individual to make representations. Reference is made also to a similar legislation in the United States.

I was wondering why this bill is introduced.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Listening to the explanations of the hon. member, a while ago, I understood why he wanted the bill adopted.

But, it seems to me that, for the time being, this is not very important because, when I compare the United States with Canada, with regard to political activities, I see a huge difference between the two countries in this regard.

As I said a while ago, as far as I am concerned lobbying has not been a problem here in Canada, in the last few years. On the other hand, I believe the same does not apply in the United States because I have been told that there were people over there who specialized in lobbying and made a profession of it.

Mr. Speaker, clause 3(2) states and I quote:

> The identification card delivered by the Clerk of Parliaments authorizes lobbying before the Senate and the House of Commons or any committees thereof.

Now, I thought that, at one point, the member meant groups or individuals who wanted to meet a particular senator or member of Parliament, in connection with the committees of one house or the other, I feel that under the rules now governing election agents, who are usually lawyers, those people have as many privileges as their counterparts in the United States, if I understood the explanations given by the mover of the bill a while ago.

As for the representatives of groups of farmers, workers, etc., who want to appear as witnesses before the committees of one house or the other, it seems to me that to date these arrangements were made without too much trouble and that, either on the suggestion of a member, with the approval of the committee, through the chairman or the steering committee, all those calls and those representations to the committees went on smoothly. I am not referring here to the groups asking for interviews with certain members of Parliament and with caucuses. It seems to me that up to now those calls, interviews and meetings went on smoothly because flexible and even efficient methods were used.

Mr. Speaker, I was astonished at the provisions of clause 3(3)(d), and I quote:

> To the extent that can practically be determined in advance, the money paid or to be paid or the value of any other consideration given or to be given to the applicant for lobbying and the expenditure of same.

I wonder whether we should concern ourselves with all that since we are so proud of working and acting in a climate of freedom, the Canadian Parliament being one of those that respect the most group and individual liberties.

In fact, since we still believe in the free enterprise system which has made it possible for us to build a country of which we are proud, I wonder why we do not let a group, a private company or another organization give the people representing them the expense allowances they want, provided such lobbyists abide by the rules, and by the general principles concerning respect of laws and moderation.

• (5:30 p.m.)

On page 3, of the bill, one can read this:

> (4) All applications and registrations shall be open to the inspection of any Senator, Member of the House of Commons or any member of the Press Gallery in Ottawa.

I appreciate that in our country, as also in the whole western world, the press plays a substantial information role.

Despite all the respect I have for the members of the Press Gallery, I wonder why one of them should be appointed to review applications and registrations, and the more so since, sometimes, some lobbying may be somewhat confidential.

I wonder why the members of the Press Gallery should be specially mentioned, besides senators and members of the House of Commons, and why reference should not be made also to members of some other organizations. The following subclause reads as follows:

> (5) It shall be the duty of the Clerk of Parliaments to have published in the Canada Gazette the name of each registered lobbyist.

I know that matters of discretion are always present when it comes to the freedom of groups which are not always interested, for serious reasons, particularly at the beginning of certain endeavours relating to big interests in the public field, and where some indiscretion might prove prejudicial.

As for the registration which shall take place in the first week of each session of Parliament and shall terminate with the prorogation, I for one know well as the hon. gentleman who has just spoken that nothing prevents lobbying. However, a lobbyist wishing to be duly heard in Parliament would have but one week, at the beginning of each session, to comply with the requisites. If this clause were passed, we would cause considerable harm and we would go against progress in many fields in Canada, because we all know that during a session, different problems may come up for reconsideration for various reasons which need not be mentioned.

Everyone here is aware that for many reasons, a month or two after the beginning of the session, or toward the end of a session, it may be in the public interest that lobbyists come to make representations to their member of Parliament. As for the penalty; the bill provides as follows:

—five hundred dollars or imprisonment for three months, or both fine and imprisonment.

I am still wondering why the hon. member imagines that anything so serious can take place in this field as to call for a $500 fine or imprisonment for three months or both. Furthermore, he refers to the case of a Canadian citizen, remunerated or not. What difference does it make whether a Canadian citizen, to act in this capacity, is remunerated or not? If someone has lobbying to do, it can be presumed that he will not be remunerated. However, when a company or a group has representatives lobbying on its behalf, we all know that remuneration is normal.

What about groups such as the Catholic Farmers' Union in eastern Canada—the area where I come from—which having to make representations to the Canadian legislators, would be subject to these rules, whatever remuneration is paid to its representatives, or even whether or not it is represented.

There are very important pressure groups in Canada. The hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather) has already indicated it to the House. I think there is no need to remind hon. members that these groups are made up of persons who are endeavouring most of the time—if not all the time—to get the Canadian government to take action in their interests, and that without going against the public interest, enabling us nevertheless to get to know the needs of Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I am afraid his time has expired.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to compliment the hon. member who has just resumed his seat, and the distinguished government whip who must be one of the most successful and industrious lobbyists in Ottawa. I say that because it takes real lobbying to get some of these very worth-while private members' bills talked out. Today we have witnessed an example of a really professional lobbyist at work. The government whip could not have picked a better member to make such an eloquent but lengthy speech, though I am still not sure whether or not he supported the principle of the bill.

I am glad to see the government House leader in his seat, because I think it is about time Parliament took a long, hard look at the provisions relating to private members' hour and private members' legislation. The order that we are debating this afternoon seeks merely to refer Bill C-38, an act respecting the control of lobbying, to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. At that committee the bill would receive the type of detailed examination and study that the subject deserves, the speech that has just concluded could more properly be made, the questions the hon. member has raised could more properly be directed to witnesses who would appear before the committee and the whole subject of lobbying in the Parliament of Canada could be studied in depth. Unfortunately, we go through this meaningless charade where the government whip, the champion of all lobbyists, musters government troops to talk out private members' bills which then die on the Order Paper.

I disagree with the principle of the bill. I believe that lobbying is a legitimate part of the democratic function. I see no reason why we should create another privileged group in Ottawa by bringing in legislation making it mandatory for those engaged in the process of lobbying to register with the government. Lobbying is a legitimate exercise and a very useful function; for example, legitimate organizations have offices in Ottawa which do very good work keeping Members of Parliament informed as to various things going on within the industries they represent. In this connection I think of the Fisheries Council of Canada. Surely no one would suggest that this organization should register as a professional lobbyist. I think also of the Grocery Products Manufacturers' Association of Canada. Both these organizations have their offices in Ottawa.

My main point is that this is a subject which deserves the type of study and examination which can be given only in committee. Therefore, I find it difficult to understand why a bill of this nature should be subject to the influence of the government whip and talked out. If the government agreed to refer the bill to committee, we would then be in a position to examine the whole question of lobbying in Ottawa. Perhaps there might be a case for having lobbyists registered, although

I am not convinced there is. This is one of the things committee examination would bring out.

I suggest there is a case to be made for having a private member's bill of this nature, serving a useful function in spotlighting this subject—if private members' hour is of any use—sent to committee. The government must take a hard, long look at such bills and at least refer them to committee where they can be examined. When such bills come back to the House at the report stage or for third reading, the government whip could then do his work and they could be talked out.

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to engage in debate on a private member's bill introduced by the hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather). Over the years I have had the pleasure and privilege of engaging in debate with him during private members' hour in respect of a number of bills and resolutions he has presented. It is therefore with pleasure that I take a few minutes this afternoon to again engage in debate with him.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I always enjoy listening to speeches by my colleague the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. LeBlanc), because he speaks clearly and slowly enough to allow a beginner like me to understand him.

[English]

Having handed out these bouquets, I regret very much having to say to the hon. member for Surrey, a fellow British Columbian, that this is a pretty funny bill.

An hon. Member: Then say something funny about it.

Mr. Deachman: Clause 2(e) of the bill provides as follows:

> "promoting", "advocating" and "opposing" means any act, speech, communication or conduct within the Parliament Buildings on the part of a lobbyist which influences or is intended to influence a Senator or a Member of the House of Commons to vote or use his influence for or against any matter which may come or is pending before either House of Parliament or any committee thereof while Parliament is in session.

I wonder what is meant by the word "influence". I do not feel when someone comes to me and gives his opinion in respect of a matter before the House of Commons, or if I listen to an explanation from someone who is making representations before a committee of the House, that I am necessarily being influenced. I am gathering knowledge which in due course may assist me in making up my mind. I do not believe I am being influenced or that I am under the influence of anybody or anything.

Mr. McGrath: Is ten minutes enough time?

An hon. Member: He is not under the influence of the clock.

Mr. Deachman: Nor am I under the influence of the hon. gentleman. I never pretend that I have influence to use for or against any matter which might come or be pending before either House. I think the word "influence" is badly chosen and I should like the hon. member to have another look at that clause and come back to the House on another occasion, as I am certain he will, and present his bill. I refer particularly to clause 3, the only operative clause in the three pages of this bill. It is very short, comprising four lines. It tells us what this bill is going to do, and provides:

> No person shall engage in lobbying until he registers with the Clerk of Parliaments and secures an identification card from the said Clerk.

That is all this bill would do. The man comes in and says to the Clerk of Parliaments, "I am a lobbyist, pure and simple. I am here to promote, advocate or oppose something and I am hoping to influence"—as it says in the bill—"Senators and Members of the House of Commons. I want a card to do this." The Clerk of Parliaments gets out his pen and his little stack of lobbyist cards, writes on one of them the name of this gentleman, gives it to him and then he performs his lobbying.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Deachman: Yes, I would be delighted.

Mr. Orlikow: The hon. member left out a small but very important fact upon which the lobbyist would have to agree when he asked for this card. That is, he would be saying in effect, "I not only want to promote such and such, but I am being paid to promote it." Is that not a fact, under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. Deachman: I am not sure that is so, but I will look at the bill and see what it says.

Mr. Orlikow: Why don't you read it before you talk?

Mr. Deachman: It simply says that no person shall engage in lobbying—not lobbying for hire. It says that lobbying means the practice of promoting or opposing the introduction or enactment of legislation, and that a lobbyist is a person who engages in lobbying. Nowhere does it say that a lobbyist has to be hired for what he does, or receive money. Perhaps my friend could show me in the bill where it says that a lobbyist has to receive money in order to qualify to see the Clerk of Parliaments and ask for this card. I do not think the hon. gentleman, who sits with the hon. member for Surrey to assist him, can point out in the bill now before us where it says a lobbyist must receive an indemnity for his work.

Mr. Orlikow: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member is questioning what I said I would ask him to re-read clause 2, the interpretation clause, because I suggest it provides precisely what I said.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I remind hon. members that we are debating second reading of the bill. The practice, which has always been vigorously enforced by the Chair, at this stage is that we discuss the principle of the bill. I would not like to see this interesting discussion, which should be saved for the committee stage, pre-empted at this stage.

Mr. Deachman: I am very glad indeed, Mr. Speaker, that you have brought this point to mind, because I am about to pass on to a discussion of another aspect.

Mr. McGrath: There is nothing left to discuss.

Mr. Deachman: This afternoon I went to the Parliamentary Library to look up some works on the subject of lobbying. It would astonish hon. members to know that there are in the Parliamentary Library about 40 books on the subject of lobbying. There is a shelf of these books as long as the arm of the hon. member for Surrey, and he is a tall fellow. Practically without exception all these books were written in the United States, because that is where lobbying has developed to a very high science, a much higher science than we find here. In the United States, particularly in respect of committees, there is very intense lobbying.

Here the procedure is much simpler than in the United States Congress. Lobbying in the United States has developed to a very fine art compared with lobbying in Canada or even in Great Britain. One reason, of course, is that the United States is a large country with great riches and groups of people, companies and organizations are very interested in the influence they can bring to bear on legislation.

I brought into the House of Commons this afternoon a text entitled "Co-operative Lobbying—The Power of Pressure" by Donald R. Hall. This is a very recent book on the subject of lobbying in the United States. It is very interesting to read a paragraph or two concerning what this man has to say about the practice in the United States. He says:

> The lobbyist is both artist and scientist, a person of whom high standards are demanded. His education and income compare favourably with those of other white-collar professionals in America. The elite among lobbyists are public figures, socially acceptable in high places, often the confidants of Presidents and other high officials.

There is a little paragraph in which he tells about one of these individuals. I know it would be of interest to the House if I were to pinpoint exactly what he means when he refers to this type of person. I read from page 8 of the text:

> The most "in" lobbyist in Washington these days is a highly social specimen. Tall, white-maned, mild-mannered Dale Miller is a genuine son-of-a-lobbyist whose father got Lyndon Johnson his first Washington job as secretary to a Congressman. He has been the President's friend for 30 years.

Mr. Mather: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Deachman: I would be very glad to.

Mr. Mather: As much as I like helping the hon. member talk out my proposal, I wonder whether he wants to put himself and his organization on record as holding back a proposal which is merely to send to committee a proposal in respect of identifying lobbyists.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker, I do not think any member of the House of Commons would want to hold back debate. At a time when I am taking part in a debate I am astonished that the hon. member would say I would withhold it. In fact, it is my desire only to see that we debate this subject as long as Your Honour will permit the debate to continue. I continue reading the quotation:

> Miller has had it all: a bridge for which he secured $600,000 in federal funds has been named after him; his daughter works on the White House staff; his wife Scooter has replaced Perle Mesta as Washington's most adept hostess; the President tabbed him to be his inaugural chairman; and the Johnson daughters call him "Uncle Dale."

That shows the extent to which lobbyists go in their effort to influence legislators in Washington. I conclude by reading the following:

"I think", he says, "a person acquires influence in Washington through integrity and effort—not through contacts." Mr. Miller does not say, however, whether he believes in a flat earth and werewolves.

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Deachman: I do not want to come to the question for a moment; I believe there are speakers to follow me. I want to read something which I think hon. members will find extremely interesting because it shows the extent to which various associations in the United States are interrelated in the process of lobbying the government. The title of this chapter which appears at page 172 is "Methods of Intergroup Co-operation". It shows the extent to which various associations are allied in presenting their case to the government.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA GRAIN ACT

ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMISSION, PROVISIONS RESPECTING GRADING, LICENCES, ELEVATORS, ETC.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Olson that Bill C-196, respecting grain, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, when the debate on Bill C-196, an act respecting grain, ended at five o'clock to allow for private members' hour I was commenting on the remarks made previously by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski) who was seriously concerned about a large number of our western wheat farmers who might find themselves in a low protein area if proposals in the bill are brought into effect. He had a very valid point and I would like an explanation from the minister as to how these farmers would be treated if they should be limited to the sale of wheat growing in those areas and were not able to conform to the level of proteins set forth in any of the new grading systems.

Any government decision to phase out wheat in certain areas for some mythical supply management theory would be repugnant to the average western farmer who has found little to be happy about in decisions supposedly reached on his behalf by those in authority at the federal level. Recent discoveries which show that protein content in grain can be successfully increased by the application of nitrogen at the proper time would indicate that farmers outside the Palliser triangle will be able to grow top-grade wheat under protein grading. Will these farmers be protected under the new block system? Any program, such as that under the Canada Grain Act, must be fair and equitable to all farmers, just as the initial Grain Act was. It was accepted by the producers as a boon to western agriculture when it was enacted. Let us hope now that the new act can achieve the same wide acceptance.

Has the government taken note of a resolution that was passed by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture at its annual meeting in 1969 in Quebec city which might have some bearing on the problem of income to the lower protein areas? I should like to quote as follows from one of the resolutions passed at that meeting, listed under section 8 and entitled "Grain production and grading":

(a) Varieties

Whereas there is a potential market for non-bread wheat for human consumption as well as for livestock feeds; and

Whereas there is a need for higher yielding coarse grains;

Resolved that the Canadian plant breeding efforts be intensified toward achieving the objective of higher yielding varieties:

(a) of grains within the present quality standards;

(b) for higher yielding coarse grains;

(c) for non-bread wheats for human use and livestock feed.

However that no such varieties be licensed unless such varieties are readily distinguishable from the high quality wheats presently licensed and have been adequately tested.

(b) Grading

Whereas there seem to be far too many grades of grain in the Canadian system of grading (in the case of wheat there are over 200 grades); and

Whereas we believe that we could get along with a much smaller number of grades, thus relieving the storage problems in our elevators and terminals;

Resolved that we request that the Board of Grain Commissioners review the present grading system with a view of reducing the number of grades.

This follows the line of some of the testimony we heard in the Standing Committee on Agriculture when we travelled across western Canada last year. At present I am in favour of a serious look being taken at our grading system, but let us not go overboard and think that it will be the complete answer.

I feel that the government has been very lax in the area of market research. This problem was emphasized a year ago last March at the conference of the Agricultural Congress when a report was tabled suggesting we were way behind some of our competitors in market research, that Canada should have a competent body which could advise farmers at least five years in advance what the consumer demand trends were likely to be for various agricultural products, and that we should govern ourselves accordingly. In other words, it is too late to close the door after the horse has been stolen. That, in effect, is what the government is now trying to do by way of a crash program.

The Agricultural Congress suggested that we might have to cut back some wheat acreage over a ten-year period, but no suggestion was made that a program should be carried out such as the present administration is trying to force on western farmers. Like other western members, I have never seen our agricultural industry in the state of chaos it is in today. Farmers are faced with highest machinery costs, highest land taxes, highest interest rates, and the highest cost of living in history, not to mention the lowest returns related to input costs.

Now we find that contrary to what the minister has stated, and to add insult to injury, our neighbouring American farmers in North Dakota and Montana are stepping-up their hard wheat acreage this year by as much as 10 per cent or 15 per cent, according to some reports emanating from across the line and coming into my riding which adjoins the U.S.A. in that area. It is no wonder that our farmers are confused with a program like Operation LIFT when they see U.S.A. farmers stepping-up their production of hard wheat, laughing at Canada behind our backs while we withdraw production and fiddle around with amendments to the Grain Act instead of doing something more positive.

[Mr. Southam.]

This bill, in the course of the next two years, may assist us in a more or less superficial way to increase wheat sales in some of the world markets, but what the government ought to be doing now is injecting at least $150 million into the western farm economy on a straight acreage payment system, with no strings attached, to tide farmers over this emergency, especially in view of the fact that grain farmers will not receive any final Wheat Board payments this spring. The government owes our farmers this, in view of its partial responsibility for the collapse of the International Wheat Agreement at the Kennedy Round talks in Geneva and for the resulting loss of wheat sales and lower prices.

My next suggestion is that another $30 million or $40 million should be immediately placed at the disposal of XCAN to set up a sales force around the world, to carry out a function similar to that undertaken by sales firms like Dreyfus, Cargills and Bungys. These sales people should be placed in about 50 countries on a salary plus commission basis, and should be supported with far more flexible trading policies, in so far as wheat is concerned, than is now the case with the Wheat Board. I want to go on record as saying that I have always supported the Wheat Board and the system of orderly marketing, but the Wheat Board can be no more effective than the government policies which back it up.

My next suggestion, which I think may be the most important, is one that I have made previously. It is that our Prime Minister, his Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister without Portfolio responsible for the Wheat Board should journey to Washington, and behind closed doors without benefit of press, radio or television discuss with President Nixon and Clifford Hardin, the U.S. Secretary of Agriculture, the very sensitive area of price-cutting under the IGA. The U.S.A. and France have been the chief offenders in this regard, and it is high time it was impressed on them that they should carry out the agreement on pricing wheat under the IGA rules. This action would not only be doing a favour to Canadian farmers but to the farmers of Australia, Argentina, France and the United States as well. The floor and ceiling prices under the original IWA worked for 18 years and can easily be made to work again if united action is taken to make them work.

I do not think for a minute that consumers expect primary producers to subsidize them by producing basic food commodities at less than cost, and I am sure that Canada cannot compete in a price war with the United States, especially when the U.S.A. consumes about 85 per cent of its wheat production whereas in Canada the figures are just the opposite.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I again emphasize that the mere changing of our grading system is no guarantee that we will automatically increase our sales of grain. I agree that we must be prepared to meet competition in highly competitive situations. If changing the act will make it easier for us to meet our customers needs, that is all to the good; but the fact still remains that the cash position of the western farmer will not improve appreciably until he can move his grain into commercial positions. Until then the farmer is going to find it increasingly difficult to finance his operations, or indeed to stay solvent under present conditions.

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, I am hesitant to impose on the time of the House at this stage of the bill, but I believe that on occasion more time should be taken in an effort to attract the minister's attention to the problems faced by the western grain industry, because the government does not seem to be taking any effective steps to meet the problems that exist in western Canada, problems which have resulted in a real crisis in western agriculture.

The big problem is that grain is just not selling, and nobody on the government side seems to want to talk about sales. They want to talk about inventories; they want to talk about grading; they want to talk about several other really minor items, but they refuse to get down to the basic problem which is the selling of wheat. As long as that problem is ignored, none of these other government measures will be of any use. To a large extent the low sales have been caused by the total failure of the government to handle our grain properly, and in some instances to move grain that has already been sold. We have had examples of ships coming to Canada to load grain that had been sold, but they had to leave empty because they were unable to receive their cargoes, either through sloppy labour-management relations at the terminal elevators or because the government could not properly organize the box car situation and have the grain on hand when it was needed. As I said at the outset, Mr. Speaker, this has resulted in a severe crisis in western Canada.

As has already been pointed out by other speakers, farmers are now getting the lowest income from grain that they have experienced in a good many years. At the same time, as is evident from the DBS figures released today, their costs have certainly not declined in proportion to their income. We now find that the government, with all its great brain power, has been successful in coming up with only two rather piddling projects to solve this major problem. The first is Operation LIFT, which I believe has been correctly lettered. I believe the National Farmers Union, instead of calling this program "Low Inventories for Tomorow" is calling it "Lower Income for Tomorrow." I think that is the proper appellation to give it because it will certainly not result in any increase in the farmers' prosperity.

In my view we are experiencing today a completely medieval approach to agricultural problems. That is what they used to do back in the Middle Ages in an effort to control the prosperity of people in Europe: they used to withhold production in order to keep prices up. Surely that is no way to approach agricultural problems today, or any of the other problems of the country. Canada needs production; it does not need restraint on production—but this is what the government has been doing with Operation LIFT. This program will not result in any injection of cash into the western farmers' pocket. In order to obtain money under it he has to do some summerfallowing; he has to pay the labour and other expenses involved in that and he also has to pay his land taxes. How will this program put extra purchasing power into his pocket?

I suggest that if the government was sincere about assisting the western farm economy—and I suggest they have not been sincere—they would have used the $140 million which they said they were going to inject into it, to subsidize the export of our grain. In this way we might have recovered some of the markets lost through their gross inefficiency in the handling of the agricultural affairs of this country. At one time we had 40 per cent of the world export market of grain, but it has now shrunk to 17 per cent or 18 per cent through the carelessness of this administration. One of the most effective ways to recoup our loss would be to use this money to subsidize exports.

The government could also have made some useful changes in the quota system of grain had they been really interested in lowering the production of wheat. As the quota arrangement now exists there is a positive incentive for farmers to grow wheat. At its initial price, a bushel of wheat is worth between $1.20 and $1.25, whereas a bushel of barley for example is worth only 60 cents, yet a bushel of barley uses up the one-bushel an acre quota of the quota book the same as a bushel of wheat. The government could demonstrate its interest in wheat reduction by rewriting the quota regulations to allow farmers to grow whatever is most efficient. Certain areas of the country can grow barley much more efficiently than wheat, but the farmers are forced by government regulation to grow wheat in order to maximize the income from their land. Therefore, to a large extent we have the government artificially stimulating the production of wheat whilst at the same time trying to reduce it through the ridiculously stupid operation called LIFT. The government could do this without legislation such as Bill C-196. This is but another arm of their weapon against the farm program and against farmers in general.

Mr. Speaker, this bill will not achieve much in solving the problems of the farmer. It was heralded as a means of obtaining protein grading, but I suggest we do not need a bill the size of this one to achieve that, and I question whether it is a significant step forward in the marketing of our grain. The same result could surely be obtained by an amendment to the present legislation, the excellence of which is proven by the fact that it has remained virtually unchanged since 1930. However, it appears that the government is taking advantage of the problems created in large part by itself in order to justify the introduction of legislation such as Bill C-196.

To my mind, Mr. Speaker, this bill will go a long way toward regimenting the western farm economy. Apart from removing the control for grading of grain from this chamber to the cabinet, the bill will give the government power to licence all forms of grain handlers including truckers, railroad companies, grain elevators and feed mills. I suggest that this type of legislation is totally unnecessary and is laying the groundwork for another incursion by the government into the day-to-day affairs of its citizens. This, Mr. Speaker, is what this government seems to do at every opportunity.

I do not see any reason why the regulatory body to be established by this legislation should be required to issue a licence to a farmer who wants to transport his grain from one province to another for the purpose of processing, when he intends to haul it back for use on his farm. As I read the bill, that power will be given to this regulatory agency.

I think that all we are doing here is expanding a bureaucracy which has already grown beyond acceptable limits. Surely the Canadian Wheat Board as presently constituted is greatly overstaffed, and savings and efficiencies could be effected there. It should look after the marketing of wheat and not be concerned with the other grains such as barley, oats, flax, rapeseed and others.

In my view, Mr. Speaker, this bill reveals the government's lack of faith in the market economy. The government does not believe that people are capable of looking after their own affairs and can plan and conduct their activities for their own advantage. The bill lays the groundwork for another large, government bureaucracy and I think this House and Canadians at large will regret the day it delegates more authority to the executive in this regard. When considering this measure the committee should be very careful not to allow these tendencies to go any further.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, during the last 12 years, any time the subject of agriculture has come before the House I have argued in favour of protecting the small family farm. With the large international grain market in the past I have felt, perhaps with some justification, that the large farm was in quite a good position. However, with the collapse of the world wheat agreement the whole agricultural structure of western Canada has come down in ruins. I can no longer attack this problem, therefore, from the narrow concept of giving a guaranteed income to the family farm.

I do not think this bill will get to the root of our problem though, in fairness, perhaps it is not so designed. The problem in western Canada is the collapse of international markets. The attempt to produce high quality grains may be a partial answer, and I compliment the government in this regard, but the problem is much bigger than that. I do not apologize for enlarging the thought, because this is our only opportunity to give the government the benefit of the experience of most of us from western Canada. Most of us have been raised on the farm. We have been at one time or another actively engaged in agriculture and we have had to think about it a great deal. We have spent lots of time riding the plough or working on the farm.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Agriculture is a way of life farming people do not want to give up. They are willing to co-operate and accept leadership of the proper kind. They are willing to take risks along with any other industry of the world, and they have done so. They have become efficient. They were told they had only to become bigger and everything would go well. These are not partisan remarks at all, because all governments so far have gone along with this policy. Farmers over the years have been encouraged to take out large loans and become bigger and more efficient. We have become efficient and now we have a large production; I will not say overproduction because I think people farming the grain fields of western Canada have a duty to perform, that of feeding a hungry world.

The problem is not just one of satisfying grain farmers and their concern for their farms. The question is, are we as a nation and is the government as a government doing everything possible to eliminate not only the grain farmer's problem but a very serious world food problem by encouraging the production of the very best, hard, red spring wheat with which this bill is intimately tied up and which can be used in eliminating hunger?

I think we have to look a little beyond this bill. We have to look at an idea which is not new; it was trotted out ten years ago and has to do with a world food bank. If we are to have a world food bank we must have storage facilities. I cannot think of a better place than Canada to store grain that is to be distributed on a worldwide basis. Mr. Speaker—I say this knowing the minister is listening—I think we should improve our grain storage facilities far beyond what they are today, especially if we look ten years ahead and pay attention to stories of the horrors of the growth in world population.

Ten years from now, instead of telling farmers to curb production we may be looking desperately for open fields and sunny places on the surface of the earth where we can grow good, hard, red spring wheat in order to feed the hungry peoples of the world who will have increased by 1.5 billion or 2 billion. They will need more food. So any long-term policy we have should look not only at immediate profits for western farmers but should examine this whole problem from the point of view of a world citizen. I do not think it would be idle dreaming to say that perhaps defence money could be spent, and sensibly spent, in developing a world food bank. Incidentally, a world food bank should not be concerned only with wheat; it should be concerned with pork products, fish and all other foods. Anything connected with food for humans should be integrated into a world food policy. Because this concept is relatively new and has never been tried on a global scale is no reason why Canadians should not be foremost in its development.

We cannot afford the moon race, we may not be able to afford an armaments race any more, but we can certainly make a great effort to fill the empty pantries of the world. This might be, as the world population explodes, the greatest contribution we can make and will be far better than any pious talk at the United Nations. Speaking under the shelter of the eagle's wing, we mumble about place in the world. We cannot do anything about it anyway, but we can do something about feeding people. So I think we should take a very serious view of establishing a world food bank.

This is not to say we should do less with regard to the project now being considered. I think it does not go far enough. I think a great deal more research must be done to determine exactly what kind of grain we should produce in future. But I am entirely opposed to the idea that we should put land back to fallow as long as there are so many hungry people in the world. I do not think it is beyond the imagination or organizing ability of the Canadian people to find a solution to both these problems at the same time. I do not think enough research has gone into our export needs.

Let us not consider our wheat only from the point of view of its high protein content or milling quality. Let us take an imaginative view of it in relation to the control of pollution. I understand, and I stand to be corrected, that if we produced a fuel for automobiles which contained 50 per cent grain alcohol, we could reduce air pollution in our cities by 75 per cent. There is an answer to the wheat surplus. No commodity is more efficiently utilized in the production of grain alcohol than wheat. It does not necessarily have to be high protein wheat. We have experience in western Canada in the production of this commodity. We might produce it on a commercial scale and surprise people. To add a little levity to my speech, in case people think

I am being too serious, let me say that we have in Canadian industries some experience in using alcohol in this regard.

I am quite sure that grain alcohol can be produced as cheaply, if not more cheaply than gasoline. If the gasoline we are using, which is polluting our atmosphere, could be diluted with good grain alcohol, if in North America the fuel for internal combustion engines were to consist of 50 per cent grain alcohol, North America would be able to utilize the total wheat production of Canada. That is why I say this bill does not go far enough and is not as imaginative as it might be.

I mentioned storage facilities. They are important because, provided we can recover the markets we have lost and enlarge present markets along the lines I have suggested, these facilities are necessary in order to move our grain efficiently to the markets of the world. Another thing which leaps to my mind is this: we should develop more efficiency in transporting grain from the farm to storage facilities and from storage facilities, wherever they may be, to tidewater.

With unemployment rising rapidly—in this regard I disagree within the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), because I do not think unemployment in itself has any virtue—I think we would do well if we put thousands of people to work building up-to-date, modern and ultramodern facilities in transportation and in storage. In this way we would be able to compete with sellers of grain whether or not it was high protein. Of course, in most cases the storage facilities would be the same whether the grain was high or low in protein.

There is a crisis in agriculture, Mr. Speaker. I am not speaking so much about the crisis in other branches of agriculture; I am speaking primarily of the grain industry. I do not do this with any shame because that industry, so far as western Canada is concerned, is the key to the whole agricultural economy. Our farmers cannot stay in business if inflation continues to rise at the rate of 5 per cent per year. At present there is no solution for this. This is what I heard today over the radio, and I see no reason to doubt it. The farmer is not receiving, nor is he hoping for a 5 per cent increase in his selling price. There is only one way he can hope to remain in business, and that is by cutting down his overhead.

During the past week I received several long-distance telephone calls from irate and desperate farmers concerning the loans which we thrust upon them a few years ago. From time to time the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) and I have had verbal exchanges in the House. The minister was very keen to boast about the hundreds of millions of dollars loaned at very reasonable rates of interest in order to assist our farmers. These farmers begged me to do what I could—and goodness knows how little that is—to at least maintain the rate of interest at which they borrowed this money. In a great many cases they have no income whatsoever, yet the interest rate on government guaranteed loans is being increased by the banks from 3½ per cent to 7 per cent more than the original rate. No such boasts were made in this House, on the hustings or in the Department of Agriculture generally when the farmers were encouraged to take advantage of farm loans and participate in our growing agricultural industry. These farmers now face a situation of no markets and an increasing interest rate on loans. They are desperate and have asked me to do something about it. What can I do but appeal to this House, through Your Honour, and ask that something be done? These farmers believe we can do something. They believe we have the right to set interest rates because of the change in the ceiling of interest rates a year or so ago.

At that time the public was informed that if we removed the ceiling on interest rates, money would flow freely into the proper channels and people who needed loans would be able to borrow at a reasonable interest rate. Money was being loaned at exorbitant interest rates by the loan sharks. I am receiving long-distance telephone calls from farmers complaining that the government is not renewing their loans at the original 5 per cent or 6 per cent rate of interest; the banks are now demanding 8½ per cent to 12 per cent interest. In some cases, because they are in financial straits, farmers must obtain permission from the minister to renew their loan so that the banks will not foreclose. Farmers who have some security in mixed farming are being forced to sell their cattle because they cannot sell their grain. This is necessary to pay off the loans which were obtained only a few months ago when the government was boasting about the hundreds of millions of dollars available to the people of Canada. The farmers were told that they never had it so good. Apart from droughts and acts of God, the farmers never had it so bad!

Farmers were encouraged to become larger in operation and more efficient. They were urged to purchase the farms of inefficient neighbours, to plow the land more efficiently and to use fertilizers, which were bought with cash. It is not necessary to be Jeremiah to see that these people are now starving in the midst of plenty. They owe "x" number of dollars, no money is being earned and the banks are asking to be paid. These people are becoming alarmed.

Are we to assume that the financial institutions of Canada have more influence on this House than farmers who are in these terrible straits? Parliament encouraged these people to get into this unenviable position. Some of these farmers had a small quarter-section of land; the mother and the children helped with the chores. They were encouraged to become more efficient and to grow more bushels per acre of better quality grain. They were told that this benevolent government would see to it that everything would be fine.

For 12 years I have been begging the government to obtain markets. The government has become deeply embroiled in the agricultural industry and is now telling farmers how to run their business, even though they know a great deal more about it than the government. I suggest it is time for the government to pick up the tab. Anyone can make sales when you have unlimited markets. It is possible to make money selling hot-dogs to a large crowd of fairgoers on a sunny day. However, the storm clouds of competition are now upon us. World markets are no longer forced to rely upon us; they have become very competitive.

It is necessary to streamline our policies. We must do more than produce high quality grain. We must do a great deal more than simply amend the regulations which state how the grain shall qualify for market. We need salesmen. These salesmen should be in a position to sell good quality wheat at reasonable, world prices. It must be worth while for our farmers to produce grain. If the world wheat agreement has broken down, we are a free agent and can no longer rely on that agreement. We must determine whether Canada will again participate in a world wheat agreement. If the old agreement is out of date, I suggest there should be a new one along the lines I have mentioned. It should be based on the need to fill hungry stomachs. Canada can pioneer in this field. This can be compared with defence: it is better to spend a billion dollars a year to feed hungry people than manufacture useless weapons of war, nerve gases and all the other things necessary for the game of war. This game is tied up with the subsidizing of privately-owned factories producing weapons of war.

Any institution that is conducive to poverty in this country is a menace. In this regard I think a great deal more homework must be done. From the short-term point of view I would suggest to the Minister of Agriculture that he convene a national conference of farmers to decide just where the farmers are going in agriculture today, what should be our long-term policy, what should be our world policy in agriculture, what our national policy is going to be, our provincial policy, and what the farmers themselves are going to do about all this. Any negative policy that asks farmers not to be farmers will not work. A policy must be devised, even at the eleventh hour, that will show the farmers how they fit into their job of producing food for people. If we are sincere, I think problems of price, storage, transportation and grading will fall into their proper place.

I firmly believe that there is and always will be a great future for agriculture. I believe that the efficient farmer is the man who loves his job and his land the farmer who is more interested in his way of life than in so-called dollar efficiency; the farmer who finds farming the most satisfying way to earn his daily bread. I suggest any government policy that tells farmers to leave their land fallow is inadequate even in the short-term, and certainly over the long-term. It is not only against humanity but against nature. When policies are inhuman and do not take into account human values, when your policies try to put dollar efficiency ahead of enriching individual human life, such policies are doomed to failure. If your policies put human values first along with quality of life, I think you will find that those little problems of financing and marketing, efficiency and distribution, storage and so on will find their rightful place.

Having observed the evolution of agricultural policies over the past 12 years, I have come to the conclusion that we have been on the wrong track. More and more we have had government interference, the taking over of land by the state and the adoption of an inhuman, unrealistic approach to farming. You cannot conduct a farming operation in any country unless you have the man on the soil. I know of no way to force a man to be a good farmer. Farming is a way of life. It is man's oldest profession and is one of man's noblest professions. When a heartless state takes over the responsibility of telling farmers what they will grow, how they will grow it and where they will sell what they grow, farming becomes no longer a profession but just another form of slavery. Under such circumstances farming is not worth the long hours that are required. It is not worth facing the weather and taking a gamble, pitting yourself against nature and your intelligence against the elements, endeavouring through good times and bad to produce the best and the cheapest food.

I suggest we have not given enough thought to the future of farming. We have given too much thought to making the farmers farm our way. This approach does not work. If you lend a farmer money, if you force him to borrow money, I think you have the duty to see that he is able to repay that loan. If you ask him to be efficient, do not criticize him when he becomes efficient. We have asked our farmers to expand their operations, and they have expanded. All the farmers ask now is that the government, which already has interfered too much in their way of life, present them with a reasonable program to protect the financial position in which they find themselves.

I suggest that the government should keep faith with the farmers and let them repay the money lent to them at the original interest rate of the loan. Secondly, our agricultural policy in all phases should reflect positive rather than negative thinking. We must find some way of making the land productive and able to pay its way. The suggestion of putting certain wheatland which perhaps should never have been plowed back into grass is sound, but even this must be done carefully. The price of grass seed today on the Prairies has skyrocketed. Even if the farmer wanted to return his land to grass and take advantage of what I think was a well-meant program, this is almost beyond his financial grasp. If a farmer already owes money, by the time he has bought grass seed at exorbitant prices he will owe a lot more. In most cases it just cannot be done.

The government is making an effort to pump money back into the Prairies. This is the reason no member from the Prairies has stood up and said that he wants nothing to do with this program. I think all western members are hopeful that there will be some positive help given by the passage of this bill. Certainly I think improvement in grading of grain will assist. I also think we should give the farmers an incentive of some kind to produce the high quality grain that will sell on the limited market that we have. In addition to this I beg the minister to take a much broader and imaginative look, I might even say a daring look, at our agricultural policies, and to turn back the pages of time and adopt a natural attitude to farming, a natural trust of individual farmers, their old-fashioned thrift and their self-sufficiency.

When offering the farmers a loan, I would say that the best advice of all is to tell them not to take it unless they need it very badly. But if in its kindness the government does make a loan available to the farmers, I hope they will keep their good faith and allow the farmers to repay it at the same interest rate as the original loan, particularly in times like these when they find it very hard to exist and to keep their families on the land they love.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-196 is another move by the government to try to do something about a problem which is becoming difficult. As I see it, this is an attempt to regulate the handling of grain, the movement of grain and the juggling around and trying to regulate in some way the grading of grain. Having looked at this bill, I think it would be very fair to say that it really is not aimed in the direction in which our agricultural problems lie. This bill misses the boat. The real problem relates to the loss of our markets in the world. Markets for wheat have been dropping continuously ever since the Liberals took power, not too long ago. A few years ago Canada possessed about 33 per cent of the world wheat market. That position has now slipped to approximately 17 per cent.

At the present time there is a surplus of wheat in the world of 2 billion bushels or a little more. We also know that half or more of this surplus exists in our own country; half of that world surplus is in Canada. If we look a little further into the problem to determine who are the wheat producers of the world, we find that Canada produces only about 5 per cent of the world's wheat. What does this reflect—this loss of sales from 33 per cent to 17 per cent, with half the world's wheat surplus in a country that produces only 5 per cent of the world's wheat? The situation is getting progressively worse day by day, yet the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) sits back reading a newspaper while a speech on this very important topic is being made.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Yewchuk: This indicates that the minister may not think the problem is as serious as it really is. Part of his suggestion is to change the grading of wheat from the old system to a protein grading system. Nowhere in the bill does it say how he is going to do this, who is going to do it or where the physical facilities needed for this type of grading are located. What is the use of passing a bill that cannot be implemented? What is the use of introducing a grading system for which no physical facilities exist at the present time? I see this as just another snow job or smokescreen to cover inactivity. It gives people something to talk about but does not offer any real, concrete solution to the problem we face.

In the past five or six years in my own area half of the farmers have quit farming. They have quit because the economy of the farm has become more and more difficult. The farmers' income has been dropping continuously at an accelerated rate, particularly since 1962. Farmers are leaving the farms at the rate of about 10 per cent a year. If we carry this to its logical conclusion, how many farmers will we have five or six years from now? We must remember that we are losing 10 per cent per year and we have lost 5 per cent to 10 per cent per year in the last five years. Even more farmers are being uprooted from their homes. They are leaving the farms to go to the cities, or moving to towns.

These people have spent years working the soil and trying to eke out an honest living. Their reward in this country is a move to town at age 55 to try to get a job as a janitor sweeping somebody's floors, so they can make a living until they reach the age at which they can draw the old age pension. That is not a very colourful picture, but it is what we have in this country today. I hope the Minister of Agriculture, who is a farmer, does no face that prospect when he reaches age 55, assuming he is not 55 now.

What are the reasons for this difficult situation? I think they are very obvious. In the past 20 years the price of farm produce has remained the same or has dropped. The price of wheat, for example, is lower now than it was in 1950. The price of beef and hogs is about the same, or maybe a little less at times: it does fluctuate, but for all intents and purposes we can say it is about the same. Let us compare the price of farm machinery in the same period. What is the price of a tractor today as compared with the price in 1950? The price of a tractor has more than doubled.

We have a situation in which gross income has stayed about the same. The price of produce has not increased; it has remained roughly the same or has decreased a little. On the other hand, overheads, farm expenses, the cost of machinery and labour have more than doubled. Nothing at all has been done about this situation. There has been a lot of publicity and talk about the Barber commission which studied the price of farm machinery and equipment safety. About six months ago that commission came out with a report on farm safety. At that time I stood in the House of Commons and asked the minister whether he was going to take any action. He simply stood up and said no, he was not. He lived up to that answer; he did not take any action. We waited another six or eight months and—

An hon. Member: That is one of the promises he kept.

Mr. Yewchuk: It is one of the promises he kept.

Mr. Bell: He promised nothing, and he did nothing. He is an honest man.

Mr. Yewchuk: The official report of the Barber commission came out about two or three months ago. At that time the Minister of Agriculture was a little more optimistic. He said he thought the report was pretty good and he was going to do something about it. I have quit holding my breath because I have not seen any activity in that direction and there does not seem to be any evidence that he is in fact doing anything at all to lower the price of farm machinery.

That commission report contained substantial suggestions in respect of farm machinery prices. I have not seen any action toward the implementation of those recommendations.

Mr. Olson: We are talking about the Canada Grain Act, or at least I thought that was what the bill was about.

Mr. Bell: It is all related.

Mr. Yewchuk: These matters are extremely important and they are very closely related to the bill we are discussing. I want to make a few comments about the LIFT program, which stands for "Lower Income For Tomorrow" for farmers. What the minister and his colleague from Saskatoon are doing is asking the farmer to give up one year of his income. I wonder what other group in this country would tolerate that. What other group of people would sit back and accept the government's suggestion that they quit work this year and take a holiday without pay. This business about $6 per acre for working the land is a big hoax: in most cases it will not cover the cost involved in summerfallow.

The publicity given to the LIFT program and giving the farmer a holiday with pay is a big laugh. The government, is just asking the farmer to give up a year's salary. They disregard the fact that almost every farmer has tremendous debts and that they have been getting progressively deeper and deeper into debt during the past several years. Their income has progressively decreased. We are now asking them to completely give up their income for a year. The government is not making any suggestion as to how farmers will meet their payments to the banks and the farm machinery companies, or in respect of farm improvement loans or, for that matter, to the grocer. I know of some farmers in Alberta who do not even have access to credit at the grocery store any longer because they are so deeply in debt. Their prospects are extremely grim.

If the government is truly concerned about trying to do something in respect of the agricultural problem, from the point of view of solving the wheat surplus and at the same time assisting all the farmers, I think it could come up with something a lot more original than simply asking the farmers to stop growing wheat. If it cannot come up with something original, it could look back at the situation in the years when the Conservatives were in power. It could learn something from that. When agricultural conditions were difficult at that time, they gave the farmers an acreage payment. When the crops were snowed under, they gave them a snowed under bonus. Every farmer who has been in the west for some time would say that the Conservative years were good years for them. It is a well-known fact that Liberal years have not been good years.

An hon. Member: Lean years.

Mr. Yewchuk: Yes, Liberal years are lean years; that is a good slogan. If the government truly wants to spend the $140 million it indicates it has available, I think it should try to help the farmer in a better way. One way would be to provide an acreage payment. They could use a few dollars as an acreage payment, but I think more importantly the government should re-establish Canada's position on the world market. We should increase our sales rather than stop producing. This is a simple solution. It just requires a little action. But for some reason the government seems to ignore this very simple suggestion.

There are several ways in which new markets could be gained. One would be to subsidize the price of wheat. This would allow us to recapture a good deal of the world market in which Canada has been undersold by other countries. We could use some of the LIFT money to do this. We could try to get back the 33 per cent of the wheat market we had during the Conservative years. We might also try to advertise a little. We should set up a marketing agency concerned solely with the marketing of Canadian wheat.

I think these suggestions would prove to be very useful if the government attempted to implement them. I have been a member of the House for only two years, but that short period of time is long enough for me to notice that the Liberal government bounces from crisis to crisis. It does not seem to be able to look at a problem and predict that it may become worse. The government does not seem to recognize the seriousness of a problem in time to bring in a policy to prevent a crisis occurring. The Minister of Agriculture and the government just will not do that.

I think the Minister of Agriculture knows the problem pertaining to farming. Being a farmer himself, he should know the problem. But I wonder why he does not do something useful in an attempt to solve it. When he was appointed Minister of Agriculture as his just reward for joining the party in power, we thought maybe this would be pretty good. We thought here is a man, a farmer himself and an Albertan, who is very familiar with the western agricultural problem and we were looking forward to a good deal of relief for western farmers.

I am sorry to say that not only I but all the farmers I know, and many whom I do not know, have been extremely disappointed because in spite of the fact that the agricultural minister is familiar with the farming problem, he repeatedly refuses to develop long-term and intermediate policies which would pull the farmer out of the terrible mire in which he now wades. Let us, for example, briefly summarize what the minister has done in the past few years to help the farmer improve his income situation and his standard of living. The first thing was to increase the interest rate on farm credit loans. I think the Minister of Agriculture thought this was a good thing for the farmers, but I am not sure it was. Another thing he did was increase the amount a farmer could borrow. Perhaps that is all right in some respects, but all it really did was get the farmer deeper in debt. The ability to borrow more money by itself is of no value unless the ability to repay the debt is also developed. This is the most important thing.

To date the Minister of Agriculture has done absolutely nothing to increase the ability of the farmer to repay his loan. That is why I repeat the old slogan that the Liberal years are bad years. What we need in this country is a return to a Conservative government. I do not say that with partisan feeling, but because I feel it would be good for agriculture in the west and in the east.

If I might return for a moment to the LIFT program, recently I conducted a survey among farmers who are friends of mine, in a fairly large area of northern Alberta. It is very obvious that the LIFT program is a sham. It will not help many farmers in the area I surveyed. As a matter of fact, in a radius of 50 miles not one farmer said that he would benefit from this program. So it is just another snow job on the public. It is another cover up for the inactivity of the government and its inability to sell wheat, as well as its general inability to cope with an agricultural problem which progressively has become worse over the past few years.

I think the Minister of Agriculture should be able to do a little better than he has. I know he is intelligent. As I said, he is a farmer himself and I think he knows the problem. He is the minister responsible, and therefore I ask why he repeatedly lets us down and sits idly by as the agricultural industry day by day slips slowly down the drain.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, before the minister closes the debate I should like to ask a question. This question may have been asked before, and if so I apologize. I understand that under the former act the Auditor General was the auditor for the Canadian Grain Commission. In Bill C-196 I do not see any indication that the Auditor General is to be auditor in so far as the Grain Commission is concerned. Perhaps the minister would answer this question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am bound under our Standing Orders to point out to the House that if the minister speaks now he closes the debate.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, of course the Auditor General does in fact, under the statutes setting up the office and the Financial Administration Act, have the authority to audit the books and accounts of what is now the Board of Grain Commissioners. Whether or not it is specifically stated in each act does not negate the provisions of the Financial Administration Act. So of course the Auditor General will have an interest in public expenditures amounting to slightly over $10 million by the Board of Grain Commissioners as it now exists and which will be called the Canadian Grain Commission when this bill has passed all stages and becomes an act.

Mr. Hales: May I take it from what the minister said that there is to be no change from the previous arrangements?

Mr. Olson: That is correct, Mr. Speaker. In so far as a number of other questions that have been asked are concerned, it seems to me that it would be more appropriate if I were to meet the members of this House in the standing committee where we would have an opportunity to examine Bill C-196 clause by clause. I will be able to reply to a number of questions that have been raised when we reach those clauses.

It is perhaps unfortunate that a great deal of the debate has centred around subjects that in my view at least are really not related to the Canada Grain Act. Notwithstanding my views on that, I want to say that I do not intend to violate the rules of Parliament by dealing with them when this bill is before the House. However, there were a number of questions raised with respect to the new grading schedule that will be attached to this act and amended from time to time by the Governor in Council. This, of course, will be dealt with when we get to the particular clause in the act that deals with grading.

While it does not at this point in time spell out in detail how the grading schedule will be devised, it certainly asks Parliament for the authority for the Governor in Council to amend this grading schedule from time to time. We have more than one example of what the schedule of grades will be, and indeed attached to this act now is an example of what it will be. But, of course, as hon. members have pointed out, there is provision in this act for it to be amended from time to time, particularly for the purpose of making changes that will take into account the changing requirements of our customers. I would be prepared to deal with that matter in greater detail when we are before the standing committee.

A number of other questions were raised, but in my view it would be more appropriate for us to deal with them when we are specifically dealing with certain sections of the act that are applicable to those questions.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Baldwin: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING AGENCIES BILL

ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL MARKETING COUNCIL AND AGENCIES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture) moved that Bill C-197, to establish the National Farm Products Marketing Council and to authorize the establishment of national marketing agencies for farm products, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-197 is a very important and new departure in federal legislation. I intend to deal more specifically with the objectives of this act and indeed some of the specific provisions in the act within the next few minutes. However, I would like to set the preamble to that discussion by making the comment that the situation we have respecting the marketing of foreign products in Canada, in my view at least, makes it at least desirable if not essential that we have enabling legislation on the statute books, that is, authority from Parliament for the government to respond from time to time to the requests of a substantial majority of producers in this field.

The farming industry of Canada is made up of over 400,000 individual farmers all of whom are making decisions, in many cases independently of one another. Over the years governments have considered it essential to provide the legislative framework which would make it possible for farmers to work together in solving some of their problems. This is particularly important with respect to farmers' efforts in marketing the products of the farm in today's highly organized economy.

I think it is important that we place our agricultural industry in a position to improve our marketing systems. Rapid improvements in production methods and capability, combined with increasing complexity and diversity of the markets for farm products, underline the importance of expanding and improving our efforts in the field of marketing.

There are serious problems in the agricultural industry associated with fluctuations in farm income mainly due to instability of product prices. There are undoubtedly opportunities to expand markets. Hon. members referred to this from time to time in the course of the debate just ended. There are opportunities, I suggest, to improve the efficiency of our marketing systems. There are wide fluctuations in the supply of products which are available for marketing. Producers are investing more and more money and know-how in production facilities and production programs. Therefore I think it is important that we provide for some form of national co-ordination of these marketing programs.

I think it would be appropriate for me to give some historical background. For example, the federal government introduced fairly broad marketing legislation in the early 1930s. This legislation was later ruled by the courts to be ultra vires or outside federal jurisdiction. Since then provincial governments have implemented marketing legislation which has enabled producers to organize a number of provincial marketing boards, agencies and commissions—several other names have been attached to these—under the authority of the provincial marketing legislation.

About half of Canada's farm products today are marketed under the aegis of some type of provincial or federal marketing agency. But the provinces and the producers generally have been frustrated in their attempts to do an effective job of the orderly marketing of farm products, that is, working through individual, provincially organized marketing bodies, and the need for national legislation of the type which we have set before you has become evident.

I will refer to this a little later, but over the last two years there has been a series of meetings which I attended—and indeed there were meetings before that—where provincial ministers met with the federal minister and the Department of Agriculture with a view to putting some co-ordinating measure in place at the national level which would allow these provincial boards, and additional marketing structures for other commodities, to be more effective in achieving the desired result, which is a uniform price structure and stability for producers.

In the past provision was made through specific legislation for marketing agencies under the jurisdiction of the federal government. An outstanding example of this is the Canadian Wheat Board. But we have concluded that there is now need for legislative authority which places the federal government in a position to design structures and orderly marketing programs to deal with specific but greatly varying circumstances related to different farm commodities.

The constitution provides the federal government with authority for the general overseeing of the marketing of farm products in interprovincial and international trade, and the provinces with authority over marketing of farm products within a province. National structures must therefore relate closely to the provinces and to the provincial marketing boards where they exist. In a sense, therefore, Mr. Speaker, this legislation provides for a bridging of the jurisdiction in this very important area. The provinces, for example, may delegate responsibility over intraprovincial marketing to agencies established under this legislation. The complexity of this jurisdictional question, the varying circumstances associated with different products and the need for taking action promptly when it is appropriate to do so all underline the importance of the Governor in Council having authority to proceed under the mandate which this legislation will provide.

The legislation also provides for the establishment of a National Farm Products Marketing Council. This council will be a very important body. Operating under this legislation it will provide guidance and advice in the first instance as to whether or not a scheme should be considered. It will basically determine the nature of schemes which are to be considered under this legislation and will carry the responsibility for continuing scrutiny and guidance of agencies which are established under the legislation.

The council will also have the responsibility of maintaining very close liaison with provincial marketing councils and with provincial governments generally. It will have among its functions the promotion of improvement of marketing of farm products in Canada. The legislation vests with the council the responsibility to assure that the policies of agencies which are carried out are such as to maintain and promote an efficient and competitive agricultural industry. It is also their responsibility to have in mind not only the interests of the producers but also of the consumers and others who are interested in the farm product which is being marketed.

The council will hold public hearings before recommending any plans. This is in order to assure that all interested parties have an opportunity to study and to consider proposed marketing plans and to make their views known with regard to them. I do not see the formation of national marketing agencies as a panacea for all our problems but, Mr. Speaker, on the other hand this legislation does mark real progress in placing us in a position to respond to requests for specific marketing schemes that are designed to provide improvements through national agencies for specific commodities.

As said a few moments ago, the objective of this legislation is to provide for more effective marketing of farm products by placing the federal government in a position to respond to and to create national marketing agencies for specific commodities as the need arises. For example, this bill will provide for the establishment by the Governor in Council of a National Farm Products Marketing Council, which will provide advice with respect to the establishment of and supervision over the operation of specific commodity agencies established under this bill. The bill will also provide for the establishment by the Governor in Council of national marketing agencies authorized to administer an approved marketing plan related to a designated farm product or farm products.

Due to the nature of the organization of the farming industry, with a great many producers making individual decisions, it has been accepted that the producers should have the opportunity to organize for more orderly marketing of their products. To a large degree the provinces have proceeded to implement farm products marketing legislation providing for the establishment of producer marketing boards, and more recently for other types of farm product marketing agencies as well. As a matter of fact, there are now approximately 120 provincial or sub-provincial marketing agencies in operation across Canada.

It has become evident to producers that there is a further need for a national approach to such marketing schemes, at least for some of the commodities, because of the limited effectiveness of segmented and uncoordinated provincial schemes. In addition, there is good reason to provide for national leadership in this area having regard for the interests of the economy and the efficient use of resources devoted to agriculture in the various regions of Canada. Without legislation such as this, producer groups and provinces could place the onus for lack of co-ordinated action in the marketing field on the federal government, and indeed they have done so.

As I said, over the last 24 months we had a number of meetings with them dealing with this matter. As I have also said, the bill provides the Governor in Council with the authority to establish agencies which would exercise some or all of the federal powers over the marketing of a named farm commodity within a region or within all of Canada. The Governor in Council could approve a specific marketing plan and appoint an agency which would be authorized to administer the plan. The bill thus provides for the design of specific marketing schemes tailored to the requirements and the peculiarities or particular commodities, and such schemes of course could be approved individually by the Governor in Council.

On the one hand, the agencies established under this bill could be granted very limited powers as necessary to achieve a minimum co-ordination, or promotional function. On the other hand, a range of powers could be granted as appropriate to carrying out a more comprehensive marketing function, including such things as selling, pricing, assembling, packing, processing, transporting and the storing of designated products involved in interprovincial and export trade.

The marketing agencies established by the Governor in Council would be in the position, on the concurrence of the Minister of Agriculture, to receive a delegation of powers from provinces in order that the agencies would be a in position to exercise provincial as well as federal authority over the marketing of a designated farm product or products. The federal government generally has jurisdiction over the interprovincial and export movement of products, and the provinces over the marketing of products within a province.

The bill also provides for the appointment by the Governor in Council of a National Farm Products Marketing Council. This council will have considerable responsibility with respect to the design, review and the overseeing of the operation of marketing plans and of marketing agencies established under this legislation. Considerable emphasis is placed in the bill on the maintenance and expansion of an economic and competitive farming industry, and on a dependable supply of high quality products to the consumer. The council is vested with the prime responsibility for determining that such plans are in the interests of the agricultural industry and have regard for other sectors of the economy, including the consumer.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I should like to advise hon. members that there have been extensive discussions with a member of producer organizations, particularly the poultry producers, who are most anxious that the government establish a structure that will enable them to set up a national marketing agency. It has been decided to proceed with general legislation rather than with specific commodity legislation, and the nature of this bill and the support for it has been indicated by producers during these meetings.

In addition, the matter has been discussed with other more general farm organizations and groups of farmers and other interested persons. The indication is that there is a general support, and in some cases very strong support for this type of legislation rather than some of the other objectives that would be open to us. I want to repeat that the matter has been discussed in detail with the provinces at both the ministerial and official level, first in the context of the specific request that came forward, for example, from the poultry industry and more recently in the context of the proposal to provide this enabling legislation. I should say that the provinces generally support this type of legislation. Indeed, much of it was designed because of the essential nature of their participation, in line with some of the suggestions they made to us.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation does not directly affect any other bill or policy that I am aware of. It is, however, closely related to the Agricultural Products Marketing Act which provides for delegation of federal powers to similar provincial boards, a practice which has been used many times in the past.

With respect to international ramifications, the bill does not provide the opportunity to give marketing agencies established under it direct or, indeed, automatic control over the importation of agricultural products. In certain circumstances authority could be delegated to these agencies, but I should like to make it clear that Bill C-197 does not automatically provide the exercise of control in international trade.

The bill has very important federal-provincial ramifications, as marketing of farm products is an area that is under both federal and provincial jurisdiction. I have said that we see no serious problems in that regard due to the extensive consultations with the provincial authorities and to the provisions in the act for agencies established thereunder to receive delegation of provincial powers and to name bodies established under provincial legislation as agents, within a province, of the national marketing agency.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that many farm organizations in Canada have waited a long time for this kind of legislation. I should like to conclude by suggesting to hon. members, and indeed to Canadian farmers generally who think that national marketing legislation is as simple as providing the authority for somebody to set production quotas and prices, that in my view this will not solve the problem of the marketplace. That has been tried without success and is one extreme in the attitude toward national marketing agencies. The other extreme is to shy away from any suggestion of marketing boards, commissions or agencies and have nothing to do with any kind of structure that would give the producers greater influence in the marketplace.

In my view, Mr. Speaker, the adamant refusal to recognize that producers, and particularly farmers, ought to have a greater influence in the marketplace through their own efforts is also wrong. Had I time I could name specific commodities which experienced difficulty because of lack of co-ordinated effort between producers and where in retrospect it would have been possible to have had a more uniform price structure had there been some co-ordination of effort under the aegis of this kind of legislation. In its absence there were, instead, very depressed prices throughout the whole marketing season notwithstanding an excess of supply and market demand. Either extreme position is wrong, in my view. We have to find some area in between where national marketing agencies are not so compulsory, where they have not only one thing on their minds and that is to set production quotas and prices. There must be an area in between for co-ordination amongst producers.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that in this area of supply management—a term which is being overused these days and which does not relate only to production—a great deal of benefit could flow to farmers if there was a co-ordinated agency which could manage the flow of production into the marketplace in relation to what the market could absorb on a daily, weekly or even on a monthly basis.

I hope hon. members of this House will give this legislation careful consideration with these concepts in mind. It could become a useful instrument in assisting agricultural producers in Canada to have a greater influence in the marketplace for their own benefit and indeed for the stability of the industry all across Canada.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, as a farmer who has produced various commodities I find this as damnable a piece of legislation as any I have seen introduced in what is supposed to be a free enterprise country in the free world. The government labels itself as supporting free enterprise, but I do not think they can expect the opposition or indeed their own members who realize the consequences of this bill, to support what amounts to a blank cheque.

• (9:50 p.m.)

I do not know how many times the Minister of Agriculture mentioned Order in Council. I shall count the number of times tomorrow. He is asking Parliament for the authority to say, "I will direct the farmers in the country. I will tell them what to do. I will tell them where they are to do it, how much they are to produce and at what price. I will say through what agency we will sell, to whom we shall sell and, if we are keeping the commodity within the country, the time of the sale." I think I have said enough on that point to illustrate that no one in the free world would expect a minister in Canada to introduce such a bill and plead, as he did, for the House to give it consideration.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Korchinski: He mentioned the Wheat Board as an illustration of a selling agency.

Someone said the chicken farmers are the group primarily which wants this type of legislation. The Wheat Board did not tell me what to produce until this government came along. The Wheat Board was an agency of the farmers, acting on behalf of the farmers, and the minister cannot see it. This agency acted on behalf of the farmers. In this bill the minister is seeking to control even the type of board that is to be set up—and not only the type of board but the type of agency the board can appoint. I might as well go home, as might the rest of hon. members who are backbenchers, because if we are to be saddled with this, it is too much. Do you know what notation I have made opposite the word "Minister" in the definition clause? In capital letters I have written GOD, because that is who the minister thinks he is.

I have never seen anything in all my days that has excited me more than this bill. If the minister or the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had come to this House and said, "Canadians, we are dissolving Parliament and turning over all our powers to the Russians" I could have accepted what was said because at least I would know where I stood. I would know I have absolutely no say in anything, I have no rights, and I am dominated. I would expect that from that type of authority, but I do not expect it from the Canadian Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Korchinski: I do not think the minister ought to expect this type of legislation to go through without someone in this country being aroused, because I certainly read it differently from the way the minister reads it. In my speech yesterday I thought I was cooperative. I tried to illustrate some of my misgivings about the bill. Now I am told an inspector can enter my premises. I could talk on and on. I wish somebody in this country would realize what is happening. I wish Canadians would wake up for once, because one by one the things they stand for are being taken away. The government is dictating to us. They talk about the wheat problem and say, "Mr. Farmer, you are No. 1 on the list because you own a wheat farm." I wish I could say to our people, "Mr. Farmer, Mr. Businessman, Mr. whoever you may be, Mr. Canadian, look at Bill C-197, because that is a good indication of where this government is going." It is telling us absolutely what to do.

I have never been licensed to produce anything, but this bill does that. It says if you have no licence to produce certain things, you can be put in jail for two years. That is what the bill provides. My God! Where art thou, my God? Surely you will have compassion on us, because this government certainly has none.

Without even starting to say some of the things I wanted to say, I can tell hon. members that the explanation given for the bill was very smooth. I do not know whether the minister's efforts were intended to placate us. I cannot be placated by a bill with these provisions. I quote clause 34(1) which reads as follows:

> An inspector may at any reasonable time enter any place, other than a private dwelling place or any part of a place that is designed to be used and is being used as a permanent or temporary private dwelling place, in which he reasonably believes there is any regulated product produced for, or intended to be marketed in, interprovincial or export trade and may examine any books, records or other documents in such place that on reasonable grounds he believes contain any information relating to the regulated product and make copies thereof of extracts therefrom.

I have already said you can go to jail if you do certain things. Who would keep a cow in a house? Who is going to keep a pig in the house? Obviously, these animals will not be kept in the house but in some other place, and the inspector will go to that other place. Oh, yes, he is not going to enter your dwellinghouse. But I have seen houses that are attached to barns; that is in Europe, in the old European style and not in Canada. Had this bill been introduced in Europe it would have provided the farmer with a certain kind of immunity. But in Canada we separate houses from barns. This minister, thinking he has all the answers, seeks to extend his bureaucratic control.

I believe that all Canadians should once and for all understand what is happening. It is not merely this minister's doing, because obviously this bill is approved by cabinet. This minister is only an instrument for putting through a bill based on the ideology of this government. He is only one minister of the government. All I have to say is, Canada beware, because we have gone further than we dreamed in the two years this government has been in power.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, before we proceed to the next item of business would the minister, the acting government House leader, confirm that the business for tomorrow will be the budget debate?

Mr. Olson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am advised that is the intention. The House leader, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald), will advise tomorrow what other business is to be considered.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

AGRICULTURE—FEED GRAIN—REQUESTED INCREASE IN FREIGHT RATE ASSISTANCE

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will not be unnerved by my standing up to take part in a debate on agriculture. Having managed to survive Hon. Paul Martin's discovery of the soybean, the House can probably survive my remarks as well. I speak on behalf of 9,500 farms in Nova Scotia. I speak of a problem, however, which affects not only my own provinces but all other provinces. It has to do with feed freight assistance. I have no quarrel, really, with the answer that brought us here. The minister gave as full an answer as could be given on the Orders of the Day, but I think it would be very helpful if he would elaborate on this question when he replies to me in a few minutes' time.

Let me relate the dimensions of the problem. Nova Scotia in 1965 grew 17 per cent of the grain for its own consumption, and in 1950 it grew 32 per cent of what it consumed in total. So that looking over the figures which are supplied to me by the Nova Scotia Federation of Agriculture, it is clear that for the last 20 or 25 years roughly 80 per cent of the grain needed for Nova Scotia farmers has had to be imported.

On Saturday night I spoke to a group of people in the farming industry. They asked that this matter be raised in Parliament. I understand that the farming industry is affected in this order. About 80 per cent of the expense in the pork industry is for grain, and about 70 per cent of the expense in the chicken industry is for grain. I pause to point out that both these farming endeavours can be carried out on non-productive land; that is, hogs and chickens are penned and fed. The best estimate the Nova Scotia dairy industry could give me is that 30 per cent to 40 per cent of the cost of raising livestock is attributed directly to grain. In other words, the dairy farmer would have an opportunity if some other program were substituted which would help him to clear land thereby enabling him to grow grain to feed the livestock. However, the farmer who produces swine or raises chickens would not be in the same position. The Maritime Federation of Agriculture has pinpointed the problem in this way:

> Whereas Maritime farmers import in excess of 50 per cent of the feed grains, used in these provinces and, whereas the poultry and broiler industry rely almost entirely on imported feed grains, and
> whereas the dairy, beef and hog phases of agriculture in the Maritimes are in an expansion program based to a large degree on imported feed grains, and
>
> whereas feed freight equalization is one of the most direct methods of helping development in the Atlantic region, particularly in the production of poultry, hogs, livestock, livestock products and allied industries, and
> whereas the government of Canada is seeking to eradicate the regional disparities in Canada, and more especially, to eradicate the regional disparity between the Atlantic region of Canada and the Ontario-Quebec region of Canada.

There is then a resolution asking that the levels of assistance to Maritime livestock farmers as they existed during 1967-68 and 1968-69 be maintained. Maritime Co-operative Services Ltd. made a submission recently to the minister. I quote from paragraph 7:

> Therefore be it resolved that the government of Canada be requested to provide adequate funds to the Canadian Livestock Feed Board so that the rates of feed freight equalization can be restored and maintained at the 1962 levels and that vegetable proteins be included in the program.

The point was also made in a brief of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture which was submitted to the minister on Monday of this week. I quote from paragraph 37 on page 12:

> In the present circumstances of restricted markets for western grain, and increasing pressures on the structure of Canadian agriculture, the maintenance of the Feed freight assistance program seems more than ever justified and necessary. It contributes both to a fair balance of regional opportunity in livestock production, and to the fullest utilization of western feed grains in Canada's domestic agriculture.

The point I want to make is that Maritime farmers could grow grain, but they would not do it as well or as economically as the western farmer. The western farmer is crying for markets; therefore it makes good sense to ship as much grain as possible to the Atlantic farmers. Why pay the western farmers not to grow wheat and ask the eastern farmers to do something that the western farmers can do better?

I have two questions for the minister. First, is the amount of feed freight assistance being cut per ton, or will it be cut; if so, at what level? Second, are there long-range plans to cut out this program which is of such great assistance to Atlantic agriculture?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I should like to cover as much ground as I can during the three minutes at my disposal, but to give a detailed explanation in reply to the number of comments and questions raised by the hon. member would be impossible in that length of time. I should advise the hon. member that making estimates with respect to a program such as feed freight assistance is very difficult. This is an open-ended program under which we offer to pay a certain number of dollars per ton of total volume offered for movement, for example from Thunder Bay and other places in Ontario farther east, in any year.

Last year we had a situation where there was a significant upswing in the total volume of feed grain coming into certain parts of Ontario, and indeed into the Maritime provinces, in substitution for what had been supplied through production of Ontario grain in the past. As a result, the government ran into additional expense. When we realized this was happening to a very large degree in September, 1969, we made some adjustments. We adjusted the rates into many areas, but primarily we wanted to equalize the disparities that had shown up between various zones as a result of changes in transportation costs.

What we want is a form of equalized payment so that the balance of the payments that a livestock feeder has to pay, whether $2 a ton or $3 a ton out of the ten, is reasonably the same for all. However, when transportation costs change, this does become distorted. Another thing we did was to add by way of a supplementary estimate another $1 million, raising the total amount from $221.5 million to $222.5 million, to take care of the increased volume. I also realize there were reductions in the rates that had an affect in all areas from Ontario to the Maritimes.

So far as the amount for 1970-71 is concerned, it is true that this is down, from a total expenditure of $22.5 million in 1969-70 to an estimated expenditure of $17.6 million in 1970-71. We have not changed the rates. It is too early at this point in time to be able to predict with any accuracy how much will be brought forward for this feeding season. However, that is a matter we will have to look at as we see what the total supplies of locally grown grain from Ontario, Quebec or the Maritimes amount to, and this will not be known until later.

So far as the long-range plans are concerned, I am aware that ministers ought not to give commitments extending far into the future committing future ministers as well, indeed, as future Parliaments and governments. However, as far as I am concerned—and I have said this many times across the country—I think feed freight assistance is a good, sound, economic program for Canadians both in the grain producing area and in the livestock feeding area; in other words, at both ends.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.12 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. RYNARD—ADEQUACY OF ANSWER TO ORDER PAPER QUESTION

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege in respect of question No. 1,443, the answer to which appears at page 5768 of Hansard for April 13. On March 5 I placed this question on the Order Paper:

1. How many companies, building plants in designated areas, are controlled outside of Canada?

2. How many are Canadian companies?

3. What was the cost in dollars for machinery and equipment purchased outside of Canada by companies controlled outside of Canada?

4. What was the cost in dollars of machinery and equipment purchased in Canada by foreign subsidiaries?

5. What percentage of machinery and equipment was obtainable in Canada at competitive prices?

The purpose of the first part of the question was to elicit information concerning the number of foreign-controlled subsidiaries qualifying for assistance in designated areas. This is a question of extreme importance to the Canadian people who are supplying the money to these designated areas.

Next I wanted to know the number of Canadian companies so that we would have a comparison between foreign-owned subsidiaries and Canadian-owned companies qualifying for assistance. The third part of the question concerned how much machinery and equipment for these industries was purchased outside Canada which could have been purchased in this country at a competitive price from Canadian factories employing Canadian workers.

I would have thought the government would be pleased to furnish this information to the Canadian people. The curt answer given on April 13 in effect was that the information is denied because no Act of Parliament makes the government give this information, and it is then stated in the answer that the information is not available. I believe this published answer to be false.

Why is this information hidden from the Canadian people? As the humble servant of my riding I ask that this information be made available to the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It will be my pleasure and duty to consider the point raised by the hon. member for Simcoe North to see whether I can be of assistance to him with regard to the point he has raised.

GIRD AND IRDA PROGRAMS—GRANTS TO FIRMS

Question No. 168—Mr. Broadbent:

1. For the years 1965, 1966, 1967, 1968 and 1969 (a) which and how many non-resident owned or controlled firms have been awarded financial grants or incentives under the tax incentive program for research and development formerly referred to as GIRD and the new grant program called Industrial Research and Development Assistance Program, administered by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and (b) in each case, what was the total financial grant or incentive allotted?

2. For the same years (a) which and how many Canadian owned or controlled firms have been awarded financial grants under the GIRD and IRDA programs, and (b) in each case, what was the total financial grant or incentive allotted?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The Industrial Research and Development Incentives Act received Royal Assent March 10, 1967. Regulations were passed May 25, 1967 and initial payments made under the Act occurred in Government fiscal year ending March 31, 1968. To qualify for a grant an organization is required to be a Canadian corporation. No restrictions with regard to ownership exist, however each applicant receiving a grant must pass the "Benefit to Canada" requirements of the Act.

Individual grants under the Act are made on a confidential basis and details of such grant are not made available.

The following provides the extent of the information that can be given in response to the above question: 1. Financial Incentives to Non-Resident Owned or Controlled Firms

	1967-68	1968-69
(a) Number of firms	13	137
(b) Amount ($000s)	976.6	8,554.7

2. Financial Incentives to Canadian-Owned or Controlled Firms

	1967-68	1968-69
(a) Number of firms	53	190
(b) Amount ($000s)	975.4	10,773.6

In additional financial incentives were given to the following firms for which there is no conclusive evidence as to the residence of the principal owner.

	1967-68	1968-69
Number of firms	15	39
Amount ($000s)	179.3	264.0

Note: (1) Corporations have been classified as non-resident owned or controlled where official information filed with the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act Administration indicates that more than 50 per cent of the voting stock is directly or indirectly owned by non-resident shareholders and there is a concentration of such ownership. Corporations not reporting under the Act have been classified as non-resident owned or controlled if available public information indicates that more than 50 per cent of the voting stock is owned by non-residents and there is a concentration of such ownership.

(2) Corporations have been classified as Canadian-owned or controlled where official information filed with the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act Administration indicates that 50 per cent or more of the voting stock is directly or indirectly owned by Canadian residents or where although more than 50 per cent of the voting stock is held by non-residents there is no foreign parent or concentration of foreign control and the effective control rests with the management and directors of the Canadian company. Companies not reporting under the Act have been classified as Canadian-owned or controlled if available public information indicates that 50 per cent or more of the voting stock is owned by Canadian residents. Certain of the companies are exempt from reporting under the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act and conclusive evidence of the country of ownership is not available from other public sources. The number of such companies and the amount of the incentives given are shown separately.

GENERAL ADJUSTMENT ASSISTANCE—GRANTS TO FIRMS

Question No. 170—Mr. Broadbent:

1. For the years 1968 and 1969 (a) which and how many non-resident owned or controlled firms have been awarded financial grants or incentives under the General Adjustment Assistance Program administered by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and (b) in each case, what was the total financial grant or incentive allotted?

2. For the same years (a) which and how many Canadian owned or controlled firms have been awarded financial grants under the General Adjustment Assistance Program, and (b) in each case, what was the total financial grant or incentive allotted?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Three forms of assistance are available to manufacturers under this Program: insurance of up to 90 per cent on commercial loans from private lenders; direct, repayable, interest-bearing loans and consulting assistance grants. No assistance was provided in 1967-68 as the Program was then in the early stages of formulation and no direct loans have been made to date. The loan insurance and direct loans are only approved if the General Adjustment Assistance Board is satisfied that the financing for a sound project is otherwise unavailable on reasonable terms and conditions. The Board may authorize grants to applicants ruled eligible for loan insurance or loans to assist them to develop sound proposals but only if the costs of the studies would be a significant burden on their resources. These criteria inhibit assistance being provided to subsidiaries of large wealthy parent companies. Subject to the foregoing the program does not distinguish, however, between Canadian and foreign owned firms.

The General Adjustment Assistance Board adheres to the policy of commercial lenders by preserving the confidential nature of the financing made available through the insurance of loans by chartered banks or other private lenders and does not without the borrower's or insurer's consent reveal details of individual loans. Although the individual applicants' names and specific details with respect to loan insurance authorizations cannot be disclosed, information is supplied below in reply to this aspect of the question. Recipients of consulting assistance grants are listed. No direct loans were made in the periods specified.

1. (a) None. (b) Nil.

	1968-69
2. (a) and (b)	No. of Firms	Amount ($000s)
Insurance of Loans	7	2,713.0
Consulting Assistance Grants
Keith-Day Limited		1.3
Northland Sportswear Ltd.		1.7
Spices and Botanical Products Ltd.		2.0

Note: Corporations have been classified as Canadian-owned or controlled where official information filed with the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act Administration indicates that 50 per cent or more of the voting stock is directly or indirectly owned by Canadian residents, or in cases of companies which are exempt from reporting under the Act where there is other conclusive evidence of Canadian ownership or control.

Questions

AUTOMOTIVE ADJUSTMENT ASSISTANCE—GRANTS TO FIRMS

Question No. 171—Mr. Broadbent:

1. For the years 1965, 1966, 1967, 1968 and 1969 (a) which and how many non-resident owned or controlled firms have been awarded financial grants or incentives under the Automotive Adjustment Assistance Program administered by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and (b) in each case, what was the total financial grant or incentive allotted?

2. For the same years (a) which and how many Canadian owned or controlled firms have been awarded financial grants under the Automotive Adjustment Assistance Program, and (b) in each case, what was the total financial grant or incentive allotted?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The Automotive Manufacturing Assistance Regulations, which comprise the automotive adjustment assistance program, do not provide for the awards of either grants or incentives. They do, however, provide for the making of repayable interest-bearing loans to certain eligible Canadian firms. Generally speaking, the eligibility criteria are concerned with the nature of the firm's business and prospects and not with the country of residence of its principal or owner.

The Adjustment Assistance Board, which administers the Regulations, adheres to the policy of private term lenders of preserving the confidential nature of loan transactions and does not, without the borrower's consent, publish or otherwise reveal details of individual loans. Although individual borrowers' names and specific loan details cannot appropriately be disclosed, the following information is supplied in answer to the question.

Adjustment Assistance Board Loans:

1. To Non-Resident Owned or Controlled Firms

(b) Amount ($000s)	8,037	14,151	7,755	16,043	11,380

Note: (1) Corporations have been classified as non-resident owned or controlled where official information filed with the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act Administration indicates that more than 50 per cent of the voting stock is directly or indirectly owned by non-resident shareholders and there is a concentration of such ownership. Corporations not reporting under the Act have been classified as non-resident owned or controlled if available public information indicates that more than 50 per cent of the voting stock is owned by non-residents and there is a concentration of such ownership.

(2) Corporations have been classified as Canadian-owned or controlled where official information filed with the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act Administration indicates that 50 per cent or more of the voting stock is directly or indirectly owned by Canadian residents or where although more than 50 per cent of the voting stock is held by non-residents there is no foreign parent or concentration of foreign control and the effective control rests with the management and directors of the Canadian company. Companies not reporting under the Act have been classified as Canadian owned or controlled if available public information indicates that 50 per cent or more of the voting stock is owned by Canadian residents.

REPLACEMENT OF SHIP, "ACADIA"

Question No. 361—Mr. MacEwan:

Has the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources received a communication from the Mayor of the Town of Pictou, N.S., asking that one of the newer ships of his Department be based at Pictou to replace the Acadia and, if so, what decision has been reached on this matter?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources received a telegram from Mayor Clarence MacCarthy urging that another ship be based at the Port of Pictou, Nova Scotia to replace the retired Acadia. No decision on this matter has been reached at this time.

PREVENTION OF "DUMMY" CORPORATIONS ESTABLISHED TO AVOID INCREASED POSTAL RATES

Question No. 862—Mr. Robinson:

Will the federal government set up the necessary inspection machinery to see that organizations do not set up "dummy" corporations to operate as publishers of the organizations' periodicals and thereby avoid the increased postal rates?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): The Post Office Department has not established inspection machinery as referred to in the question, but all necessary precautions are taken so that only newspapers and periodicals which meet all requirements of Section 11 of the Post Office Act are registered as second class mail.

YUKON—ROAD MAINTENANCE BUDGET

Question No. 1,152—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. What was the road maintenance budget for the Yukon in 1965, 1966, 1967, 1968 and 1969?

2. How many persons now work on road maintenance in the Yukon and what was the number for each of the above years?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1 and 2. In so far as the Department of Public Works is concerned the following are the expenditures and employment figures for maintenance work on the Northwest Highway System in the Yukon Territory.

Fiscal Year	Expenditure	Man Years
1965-66	$3,097,929.	247

SPACE RESEARCH DEVELOPMENT—NASA

Question No. 1,262—Mr. Broadbent:

Has the Government of Canada received a request from the United States' Government to participate in space research development through the NASA organization and, if so (a) what was the nature of the offer (b) what was the response of the Canadian Government?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): (a) While no request to participate in space research development has been made by the United States Government, Dr. Thomas Paine, Chief Administrator of NASA, visited Ottawa last December to outline United States plans in the post Apollo period and to indicate the United States Government's willingness to examine sympathetically any proposal from Canada regarding possible participation in the NASA space program, or any specific aspect of its program. (b) The Canadian Government looks forward to continuing the successful pattern of cooperation already established with NASA. The form such cooperation will take in the future is under active study at the present time.

*CANADA LABOUR (SAFETY) CODE REGULATIONS

Question No. 1,275—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

Have all the various sets of regulations under the Canada Labour (Safety) Code been passed, and (a) if so, what industries are covered (b) if not, on what date will the regulations for industries not yet covered be passed?

Mr. Jim McNulty (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): The answer to starred question No. 1,275 is as follows: No, all the various regulations have not yet been passed. To date, the following have been authorized: the coal mines (CBDC) safety regulations; and the Canada boiler and pressure vessel regulations.

Questions

With reference to (a), the only particular industry now subject to specific regulations is the underground workings of the Cape Breton coal mines.

With reference to (b), 16 sets of regulations covering every major aspect of employment safety and having general application to all industries subject to our safety code are at an advanced stage of development and are expected to be issued progressively during the next six to eight months.

CBC—HOTEL RESERVATION EXPENSES

Question No. 1,295—Mr. Godin:

1. Has CBC presented an account for expenses incurred during the fiscal year 1968-69 through the reservation of hotel rooms not subsequently used and, if so, what was the total of such expenses?

2. Will the government require the employees of the corporation to provide receipts and statements?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: As a matter of policy CBC employees are required to account to the Corporation for expenses incurred on CBC business. Normally the responsibility to cancel hotel reservations not actually required rests with the employees concerned. However, under extraordinary circumstances and upon satisfactory evidence and explanation, expense incurred by not using reservations may be borne by the Corporation. Prior to coverage of the U.S. political conventions in 1968 it was necessary to make reservations and advance deposits for hotel accommodation through the Republican and Democratic housing committees in order to ensure availability of hotel accommodation for both CBC English and French network production personnel covering these conventions. In the case of the Republican convention, reservations had to be made before exact requirements were determined and $100 was forfeited when two of the rooms booked were not needed. At the time of the Democratic convention in Chicago, the accommodation reserved for the CBC was left unused due to the development of riots, which altered CBC coverage plans and led to arrangements for alternative accommodation, notably a move to other quarters in the interest of safety for CBC personnel who had originally been assigned a hotel in the midst of the riot area. A total of $700. was therefore forfeited in connection with the Chicago convention coverage.

DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES—PURCHASE OF BOATS

Question No. 1,339—Mr. MacLean:

1. Has the government ordered some yacht-type boats designed and built by DeVries Lentsch of Amsterdam, Holland for use by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and, if so, to what use are these boats to be put?

2. Were boat-building firms in the Atlantic Provinces invited to tender for the supply of these craft?

Mr. R. J. Orange (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): 1. The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources has not ordered any yacht-type boats. A contract was awarded to the low bidder, Canadian Dredge and Dock Company Limited of Kingston, Ontario for a hydrographic survey launch to facilitate survey operations on the Great Lakes and also to provide services for conduct of the water quality survey program. This Company is importing a bare hull from DeVries Lentsch of Amsterdam, Holland to be fitted out in its own shipyard at Kingston. This procedure apparently is more economical than Canadian construction of the hull itself.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): 1. No, but the Department is aware of the recommendations issued by the Crop Science Department of the University of Saskatchewan.

Question No. 1,546—Mr. Southam:

In relation to the planting of forage crop under the current Wheat Acreage Reduction Plan, would the government allow a forage nurse crop to be seeded in the Spring rather than July 15 as previously announced?

Questions

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, oats may be sown as a nurse crop before July 15th, 1970, but to retain eligibility for acreage payments, the oats must be cut down or otherwise dealt with in such a manner by July 15, 1970, as to render threshing of the crop impossible.

MEDICAL OFFICER TRAINING PROGRAM

Question No. 1,553—Mr. Corbin:

1. During each year 1960, 1961, 1962, 1963, 1964, 1965, 1966, 1967, 1968, 1969 and to date in 1970, how many officers enrolled in the Medical Officer Training Plan have applied for release from obligatory service?

For each year (a) how many officers were refused a release (b) what are the names of the individuals, the medical school or university attended and their home address at the time of application for release (c) what were the 10 most common reasons for refusing to grant a release, in order of frequency?

4. What is the procedure to follow in applying for release through "normal service channels"?

5. Are officers informed that they may apply for release and are they told what the "normal service channels" are at the time of their enrolment in the MOT Plan or subsequently?

6. What were the Medical Officer requirements in the Canadian Forces for each year 1960, 1961, 1962, 1963, 1964, 1965, 1966, 1967, 1968, 1969 and to date in 1970?

Mr. D. W. Groos (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1, 2 and 3. Records are not maintained in a manner which would permit this information to be readily identified.

4. An officer enrolled in the Medical Officer Training Plan seeking release submits a letter or memorandum to his base commander, through his university liaison officer, stating his reasons for requesting release. The base commander, or an officer delegated by him, then submits his comments and recommendations to Canadian Forces Headquarters for consideration.

5. Yes.

[Mr. Southam.]

6. Annual requirements vary and depend upon a number of factors, such as the number of medical officers resigning or being released each year, the number graduating from the Medical Officer Training Plan and entering the Forces, manning levels, etc. Since integration in 1964, enrolment quotas for the Medical Officer Training Plan have been as follows: 1965-66, 55; 1966-67, 50; 1967-68, 1968-69, 1969-70, 65.

8. (a) Within the Canadian Forces, the establishment summary details the number of positions at each rank level that may be filled by medical officers. (b) Prior to integration in 1964, the requirements for medical officers was calculated for each of the three services, whereas now it is calculated in total for the Canadian Forces.

9. As of March 31, 1970, 162 medical undergraduates and 49 interns are enrolled in the Medical Officer Training Plan.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the discussions with provincial governments about proposed federal securities legislation have taken place not by correspondence but through a series of meetings of the Federal-Provincial Committee of Officials on Financial Institutions and Securities Regulation, and more recently between myself and the provincial ministers concerned. Because of this there is no correspondence, or else the correspondence that is required in this motion is of no material substance, and I would request the hon. member to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is dropped.

Motion dropped.

The minister feels that he cannot accept this motion as the study contains information provided in confidence to the department on the understanding that it not be disclosed. Such disclosure would prejudice the department's ability to obtain similar information in the future. In view of this the minister hopes the hon. member will withdraw his motion.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is transferred for debate.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the Hon. Otto E. Lang, Minister without Portfolio, that no correspondence has been exchanged between the government of Canada and the Ministers of Agriculture of the governments specified in this motion related to application and enforcement of the regulations of the Canadian Wheat Board between the stated dates. STUDY OF EFFECT OF FREIGHT RATE INCREASES ON REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

Motion No. 399—Mr. Skoberg:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I move this motion on behalf of the hon. member for Moose Jaw, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the study is part of a continuing assessment of how the slow growth regions of Canada might be affected by a great variety of possible policies and changes in economic circumstances. Such studies are not designed to produce formal reports. In view of this I would ask the hon. member if he would kindly withdraw his motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might address an inquiry to the Minister of Transport who is usually very co-operative in these matters. When may I expect the production of the document requested in Motion No. 395? It is a simple matter of annual financial reports of a public body incorporated by an Act of this House. The Act requires that the financial report be tabled annually by the minister. This motion has been on the Order Paper for nearly a month and I am wondering when it will be dealt with.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I must confess I have no idea why this has not been brought forward more rapidly and I do not see any reason for the delay. I shall look into it immediately.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining Notices of Motions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PROGRESS OF DISCUSSIONS WITH ORGANIZED LABOUR

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. As the Prime Minister stated in the House on March 16 that conversations were continuing between the Prices and Incomes Commission and the leaders of organized labour, would the minister take the first opportunity on motions to outline to the House what progress the Prices and Incomes Commission has made in persuading the leaders of organized labour to give that co-operation without which no inflation control program is feasible?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure what recent conversations have been held. The chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission discussed this matter in a speech yesterday in Calgary, which the hon. member may know about. I shall discuss the matter with the chairman and see whether it would be appropriate to make a further statement.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TRANSFER OF NERVE GAS FROM OKINAWA TO UNITED STATES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding the transportation of a large quantity of nerve gas from Okinawa to Bangor, Washington, passing through the Strait of Juan de Fuca. In view of the growing concern in the United States and Canada regarding the hazard which might follow any mishap, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he can tell the House whether there has been communicated to him the date on which this shipment will take place, what precautions are being taken, and if the minister is satisfied with those precautions as they affect the lives of Canadian citizens?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the first question, I do not think that the United States government has yet made a decision on the date of shipment. As to the second question, we have received from the United States government, in response to our request for information and our expressions of concern, information about the precautions being taken. This information is being studied by the government. We are also expressing to the United States government, more formally than in the past and on the basis of the information received, the grave concern we have about the possibility of an accident.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister if he intends to ascertain the date when the shipment will take place and if he intends to have his study completed in sufficient time so that the government of Canada can express to the government of the United States any concern it may have about the inadequacy of the precautions which are being taken?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that the United States government has not yet made a decision as to when the shipments will begin. On the second point, we are of course concerned notwithstanding the kinds of precautions that are being taken. We understand these are very thorough and very extensive. But there always remains the possibility of an accident, and therefore it would not matter what information we received about these precautions; we would still have reason for the concern that I have expressed to the United States government.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of National Defence. Are the E.M.O. forces of the country aware of the possibible transportation of this nerve gas, and, what steps will they be taking to provide against any mishap which may occur?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I know that the Department of National Health and Welfare is concerned about this problem, as is the Department of National Defence. So far as the Department of National Defence is concerned, my hon. friend knows from my repeated answers in the House that we have an expertise in precautionary measures against these dangers, and no doubt if the situation warrants our being alerted in a special way we will respond to whatever the indicated danger is.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Secretary of State for External Affairs quite properly has stated that no matter what precautions may be taken there will still be the danger of an accident. Our Emergency Measures Organization does not have the facilities to meet any potential danger in this connection, and the minister has mentioned that naturally there are certain experts in his department who would have some solution for such a situation. Because the people in Vancouver and Victoria are greatly concerned, I ask whether there are available at the coast today any officers of the armed forces trained particularly in this field who would be available to meet an emergency when these five tugs that are going to bring this gas start through the strait?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, the answer as to whether we have qualified and trained personnel in this instance is obviously yes. We have been conducting for a number of years experiments at the Suffield establishment and I am confident that we have the ability to deal with the situation confronting us. Whether those men are stationed now on the west coast I do not know, but obviously if a situation arises which necessitates their being stationed on the west coast they will be.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, will the minister give the assurance that he will give instructions that those who have this particular scientific training will be placed on the coast to meet any potential emergency?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I can give the assurance that as soon as we are informed that the shipment is coming we shall have such personnel on hand on the west coast.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the concern over the shipment of this gas, can the minister indicate whether there is really anything that the Emergency Measures Organization could do, besides evacuating the area, in case of accident?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, this is really a speculative question. I really do not know how to answer a question like that. All I can say is that we have an expertise in taking defensive measures in situations of that kind. That is all I can say. If a situation arises where we should have qualified personnel in attendance on the west coast to be ready for any emergency, then I can give the assurance that we will have this personnel.

Mr. Saltsman: A supplementary question. Is it not important at this time, in view of the experience that most people have had with nerve gas and the conclusion they have reached that there is no antidote or protection against nerve gas, to inform the nation to this effect?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): The hon. member is making an assertion that I contest. We could, of course, get into a long debate; however, I would need to have technical people to advise me in order to rebut what the hon. member said. In answering questions from the opposition I have been asserting all along that the establishment is very useful in developing defensive measures against occurrences of that kind.

PLACE OF MANUFACTURE AND PRECAUTIONS TAKEN IN SHIPPING NERVE GAS TO OKINAWA

Mr. D. W. Groos (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a further supplementary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. For the information of this House could he establish whether this nerve gas in fact was manufactured originally in the United States and shipped from there to Okinawa? If so, what special security precautions were taken at that time with the shipment, and what route did it take then?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will take that question as notice.

AUDITOR GENERAL

INTENTION OF GOVERNMENT RESPECTING POSITION AND ROLE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact the government's confrontation with the Auditor General has now reached acute, if not crisis, proportions, will the government now come clean and tell the people of Canada precisely what it intends to do so that the Canadian people will know if there is any reason for the great alarm that is being expressed universally throughout this country?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will realize it is difficult for the Chair to accept a question couched in those terms. If the hon. member wants to rephrase the question, it will be easier for the Chair.

Mr. Baldwin: Having expressed my sentiments, I will now contract the question. Will the Acting Prime Minister inform the House precisely as to the government's intentions with regard to the position and the role of the Auditor General?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Perhaps Your Honour will permit me to comment on the first question. There is no confrontation between the government and the Auditor General.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: I hope that members of the opposition will agree with the government that the role of the Auditor General should be clear beyond any doubt.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sharp: That is the only purpose for any action the government may take. I hope the members of the opposition will join with us in trying to get this situation settled.

Mr. Baldwin: A further supplementary question. In view of the fact that the pertinent provisions of the Financial Administration Act have stood unassailed for a great many years, can the minister indicate why there is now any doubt as to the role of the Auditor General?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, there have been some doubts expressed—

Some hon. Members: By whom?

Mr. Sharp: —not only in this House but outside the House—

Some hon. Members: By whom?

Mr. Sharp: —about whether the kind of reports that have been made are fully within the responsibilities of the Auditor General. I think it is very important for the health—

An hon. Member: Of this government.

Mr. Sharp: —of this establishment that the responsibilities of the Auditor General should be unquestioned. That is our purpose. I hope it is the purpose of the opposition.

OPINION OF LAW OFFICERS ON JURISDICTION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): In view of the answer of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the effect that he is interested in defining the jurisdiction of the Auditor General, may I address a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the Acting Prime Minister, the Prime Minister or any other member of the cabinet asked for the opinion of the law officers as to the jurisdiction of the Auditor General with reference to this confrontation?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I am taking the position that the rules respecting the matter of advice which under statute I am from time to time required to give to the Prime Minister and other members of the cabinet protect any advice I might give or, indeed, whether advice has been sought or given, and I am going to maintain that position again today.

Mr. Woolliams: I rise on a question of privilege. Yesterday a minister of the government said that he had sought information and advice from the law officers of the Crown. That is recorded in yesterday's Hansard. One minister cannot have his cake and another try to eat it. Either they can tell us that information or they cannot. I say it is a privilege of this House to know whether advice has been sought. I have not asked for the legal advice. I merely asked if advice was sought. The Minister of Justice is hiding because he is frightened of the Prime Minister and his dictatorial attitude.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question arising out of his comments about curtailing the role of the Auditor General? Are we to take his statement to mean that the government's idea of a just society is one in which the propagandists are appointed and the critics are fired?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that the question is not in order and I doubt whether it would be in order to reply.

Mr. Sharp: I rise on a question of privilege. I have never suggested at any time that the functions of the Auditor General should be curtailed.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): A supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. If, as the Acting Prime Minister has just stated, there is no confrontation between the government and the Auditor General, will the Acting Prime Minister request the President of the Treasury Board and the President of the Privy Council to stop snapping at the heels of the Auditor General and causing him such embarrassment?

CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

ARCTIC POLLUTION, TERRITORIAL SEA LIMITS —REPLY TO U.S. NOTE—PUBLICATION OF NOTES

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will the minister tell the House whether a reply has been prepared to the note from the United States regarding the Arctic? If so, is he prepared to make it public in this House?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Perhaps I ought to say first, Mr. Speaker, that we have received a note from the United States respecting the legislation introduced in this House. The reply to that note is in course of preparation. Today the United States Secretary of State also released a statement of the position of the United States. This has been made public. The question of whether the notes themselves should be published is a rather delicate one which strikes at the roots of interchanges between governments. I hesitate to say that we will publish these notes. It will depend upon the views of both the United States government and our own government regarding the wisdom of such action. The statement made by the Secretary of State of the United States in relation to our legislation gives a very clear indication of how that government views our legislation.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): A supplementary question. Has Canada asked permission to publish the notes if the United States government has no objection?

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I asked my Under-Secretary to raise the question informally with the United States. The view of the United States government, which I can understand and for which I have some sympathy, is that it is better to avoid the publication of these kinds of notes and to rely upon the ordinary communications that take place in public. There are occasions when it is very desirable that governments should be able to exchange views confidentially.

Mr. Fairweather: A further supplementary. I appreciate that, Mr. Speaker, but can the minister dispel the unpleasant news stories contained today in such newspapers as the Wall Street Journal that the United States note threatened economic sanctions? I think this should be dispelled if it is not true.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I can deny that part of the statement categorically. There is no reference whatever in the note to any such retaliation.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I have a supplementary question. Without being happy about the minister's suggestion that the notes may not be published, in view of the fact that a debate on the relevant legislation will begin in the House tomorrow I ask the minister if he will do two things. First, will he ask the House to append the statement of the Secretary of State of the United States to today's Hansard? Second, will he undertake to issue a summary or statement of the reply Canada makes to Washington with regard to the note the government has received so that we may at least have in communiqué form the position of both governments?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I sympathize with the desire of the hon. member. I have a copy with me today of a telegraphed report of the statement released by the State Department at noon today, and I would be happy to have this inserted in Hansard. It is my intention tomorrow to take part in the debate on the Arctic waters pollution bill and I shall be making an extensive reply, in the course of dealing with other matters, to the contentions of the United States.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the document referred to be appended to today's Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: For document referred to above, see Appendix "A".]

Mr. Lewis: I do not intend to participate in the debate tomorrow but my leader will. Unless the Secretary of State for External Affairs happens to be speaking first for the government on the bill, his survey of the situation will not be of very much help to those who speak ahead of him. I therefore ask him whether he would not consider placing on the table a full communiqué regarding Canada's reply to the United States note.

Mr. Sharp: I would have no objection, if it met with the approval of the House, to speaking out of turn; it had been my intention to be the second speaker from the government side, but if the House would like me to follow more closely after my colleague the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development I would be happy to do so.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Since the Secretary of State for External Affairs has seen fit to answer the question whether or not there was any threat of sanctions in the note, can this not be taken as the basis for the House having the right to see this document and ascertain what, in fact, are the true circumstances rather than to accept the interpretation of the minister? Surely he should be willing to produce this document. If he is not, which appears to be the case, will he say whether there is any justification for the report over United States radio and in the press of that country that it will be too bad for Canada if the policies of the present government in connection with northern sovereignty and anti-pollution are carried out?

Mr. Sharp: Let me make it clear that I have no objection whatever to the publication of the notes, in terms of the notes themselves. But the right hon. gentleman was once Prime Minister and he knows that sometimes it is better to keep exchanges of this kind confidential.

An hon. Member: Quiet diplomacy.

Mr. Sharp: It is practiced universally throughout the world in appropriate circumstances. But I take the comments of the right hon. gentleman very seriously. I certainly would not wish there to be any misunderstanding, any impression that there is something being withheld, and I will raise the question with my counterpart, the U.S. Secretary of State, to find out whether he would agree to make an exception in this case. Nor would we have any objection to the publication of the reply.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then I ask the minister this: does he intend to allow, without comment or complaint, the right of the United States to issue a press summary of the objections expressed in the note without the note itself being produced? Surely that would be a complete breach of diplomatic practice by the United States.

Mr. Sharp: The right hon. gentleman misunderstands the nature of the statement released by the Secretary of State.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I saw it.

Mr. Sharp: The Secretary of State was expressing the views of the United States in that published statement. He also expressed the views of the United States government to the government of Canada in a separate note. This happens from time to time. It happens on many occasions, and I do not think the United States is to be faulted in that respect. I do understand, however, that it would be most undesirable if rumours were to get about that there was something hidden in this note which was reprehensible or which would produce friction between the two countries.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Is it the intention of the government to remain firm in the stand it has taken in this regard or to back down ignominiously as it so often has in the past?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: May we have an answer, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Douglas A. Hogarth (New Westminster): Is the whole basis of the minister's position with respect to these notes the application of protocol with regard to such communications generally, or is there anything particular in these notes which would prevent their publication?

Mr. Sharp: These are notes of a kind which are exchanged from time to time between governments. There is nothing exceptional about them. There may, however, be exceptional circumstances in which, in order to avoid misunderstanding between two countries, they should be published. That would be the only reason for urging the Secretary of State to abandon the general rule.

Mr. Fairweather: I should like the minister to consider taking this course: tomorrow, he says, he is participating in the debate. If the debate is not to be held in a vacuum, this note ought to be available to us. Otherwise, let us postpone the debate.

Mr. Sharp: I will certainly put that point to my counterpart in the United States in relation to the desirability of publishing the note. On the other hand, I would not be so discourteous as to publish it without the consent of the United States government.

ARCTIC POLLUTION, TERRITORIAL SEA LIMITS —UTILIZATION OF INFORMATION CANADA TO DRAFT PRESS RELEASE

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): I have a question I should like to address to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of Information Canada. Would the hon. gentleman consult with his colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and draft a press release in reply to the United States press release utilizing the services of Information Canada to answer the statements made in Washington?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): I am always happy to consult with the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Nowlan: Yes, but after consulting with him, would the minister act in a constructive way? It might be the only constructive thing done by Information Canada.

POLLUTION

PHOSPHATE DETERGENTS—DOOR-TO-DOOR DISTRIBUTION OF ARCTIC POWER

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs which has its relevancy to the questions that have just been asked, as Your Honour will notice. In view of the fact that a considerable number of Edmonton women are protesting against the unsolicited dumping on their doorsteps of Arctic Power, a high phosphate detergent, will the minister consider measures to protect these and other consumers from unwarrantable invasion of their privacy?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I will examine the situation to see whether it is within the terms of reference of the Arctic pollution bill.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. MacInnis: Will the minister seek some unprotected legal advice on this matter from the Minister of Justice?

[Mr. Fairweather.]

DISCHARGE OF MERCURY INTO ST. LAWRENCE RIVER

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Fisheries. It has to do with pollution. In view of the past experience of the government in connection with mercury discharges similar to those attested to by three offending Quebec companies, and since two of these companies are situated on rivers which flow into the St. Lawrence in areas where commercial fisheries are valued at between $250,000 and $350,000 per year, will the minister consider undertaking an immediate examination of the situation of these companies in order to determine, before the fishing season opens, the amount of mercury discharged, and would he then enforce measures to end mercury discharges from these sources?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Plans are under way to investigate the sources referred to. Fish downstream of those locations are being tested in Winnipeg at the present time. Our inspection service is also testing all fish destined for sale. None are being released which show any degree of contamination. We have not run into any incident of that kind as yet.

HISTORIC SITES

ACQUISITION OF RESIDENCE OF SIR ROBERT BORDEN

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development; it is so urgent that it may already be too late.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Macquarrie: I wish to ask the minister whether, through the Historic Sites and Monuments Board or through other arrangements, anything is being done to acquire for the nation Glensmere, the long-time residence of Sir Robert Borden, which is now in imminent danger of demolition?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of that problem. Of course, we consider that that residence has historical significance. However, from the information on hand, our appropriations are not sufficient for us to purchase that residence, the price of which seems quite high.

[English]

POLLUTION

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION TO PROTECT ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC COASTAL WATERS

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. Can he tell us whether it is the intention of the government to introduce legislation in respect of our Atlantic and Pacific coasts which will provide parallel protection against pollution from shipping to that which is being proposed in the bill in respect of the Arctic, so far as our territorial and contiguous zones are concerned?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. As I have indicated on a number of previous occasions it is my hope to bring forward a considerable number of amendments to the Canada Shipping Act during the current session. I have, on the best advice available, felt that it was wise to withhold this until we see the ultimate fate of the Arctic waters bill in the House because the two are more or less companion pieces of legislation. The amendments will be brought in as soon as possible.

HARBOURS

CARIBOU, N.S.—IMPROVEMENTS TO FERRY TERMINAL

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Following the Easter recess, can the minister now advise when tenders will be called for work on the ferry terminal at Caribou, which is the Nova Scotia base for the P.E.I.-Nova Scotia ferry service?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Within a very short time, Mr. Speaker. I had some conversation with the government of Nova Scotia and the plans have been drawn. I have seen them within the past two or three days. The obective is, as I understand it, to get the work finished within the 1970 calendar year.

Mr. MacEwan: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the minister can advise us that the government is still considering the possibility of a third ferry for that service?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence and he can take it as notice if he wishes. I would ask him whether the bulldozer airdropped by the armed forces in western Canada was the same bulldozer used by a Liberal minister in starting the construction of the P.E.I. causeway before an election?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ADVICE BY CONSULTANTS ON ACHIEVING ACCEPTANCE OF POLICY—HIRING OF W. I. C. WUTTUNEE

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Because of the rejection by Indian people in various parts of Canada of the government's proposals for a new Indian policy, has the government hired or entered into a contract with a consultant or consultants to advise the government on means of gaining acceptance of this new policy by the Indian people?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we have met with several people and inquired about the best ways to air the new Indian policy. We have hired several persons to give us information on publicity, and so on. However, I do not know exactly whom the hon. member is alluding to. If he would be more specific, I should be glad to reply.

[English]

Mr. Simpson: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the minister whether Mr. W. I. C. Wuttunee, who has been such a strong advocate of this new policy, was hired on a $200 per day, plus expenses, government retainer to advise the government on means of getting the Indians to accept the new policy?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the supplementary question should be placed on the Order Paper.

Mr. Orlikow: I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe the hon. member has a point of order.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Simpson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege that not only affects the members of this House but a large majority of the Indian people of Canada. I asked the question because the government has indicated on many occasions in the House that it will not put this policy into effect without full consultation with the Indian people. The Indian people have interpreted this as being an indication that the government is willing to accept amendments to the new policy. We now learn that the government has asked for the opinion of these consultants as to how to gain acceptance of the policy by the Indian people, and as it now stands I think a question of privilege is justified.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will appreciate that it is difficult for the Chair to place that interpretation on the question he has asked. In view of the hon. member's explanation and the fact that the minister is rising on the question of privilege he might be allowed to reply to the question.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I should like to reply to the question of privilege. It is true that this man has been hired by the department as a consultant. He is a lawyer of Indian background. I want to point out that we spend thousands and thousands of dollars through the Indian Association. Many of them are not in agreement, but we hope to give them money to have a real public debate. We are happy to give them money to make sure that a public debate will take place and for the best facilities—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

DISCONTINUANCE OF SCHOOL LUNCH PROGRAM

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Is it the policy of his department that all school lunch assistance, including lunches in public schools, milk, lunch tickets, and lunches prepared by lunch committees be discontinued as part of the government's austerity program?

Mr. Speaker: I should think that this question might be considered at the time of adjournment if the hon. member wants to discuss it at greater length.

[Mr. Speaker.]

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

VANCOUVER MILK PRICE INCREASE—ACTION BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. What steps is he taking or does he plan to take in regard to the increase in the price of milk in Vancouver yesterday?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, when rumours of such an increase occurred I referred the matter to the Director of Information and Research under the Combines Investigation Act who is inquiring into the matter. If any offences are committed, action will be taken. At the moment there has been only one increase, and I would hope other dairies would not increase—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have allowed the minister to reply to the question, but I wonder whether this type of question is in order and whether we should during the brief time we have at our disposal from day to day ask about individual increases in prices of individual commodities in individual cities. I have some doubt whether this is in order. In any event, the hon. member has obtained the information he is seeking.

FISHERIES

APPOINTMENT OF PRESIDENT AND DIRECTORS OF CANADIAN SALTFISH CORPORATION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minster of Fisheries. When is it the intention of the government to appoint the president and the board of directors of the Canadian Saltfish Corporation, especially now that we have the anomalous situation of the chairman of the corporation having been named?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, we will be announcing the appointment of the president hopefully this weekend, possibly on Friday or at the latest next Monday.

DEPARTMENTAL ACTION RESPECTING MARKETING OF SALTFISH

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): In view of the fact that the corporation is not off the ground and that the trade has been eliminated from marketing, can the minister say what initiatives are being taken within his department in lieu of corporate efforts in order to have the fisheries of the east coast of Canada adequately represented in the trade markets?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, all possible initiatives have been taken with the particular help of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce abroad.

Mr. Lundrigan: In view of the fact that the minister has indicated that nothing more than initiatives are being taken, would he be prepared to make a statement on motions some time before the week is out in order to outline the work done, in view of the tremendous concern on the part of the fishermen and the trade as to the loss of markets on the part of the east coast industry?

Mr. Davis: The hon. member is really referring to the sale of this summer's catch of fish, as he well knows. We will be announcing prices for the first time in the history of the industry in May; that is the price the fishermen will receive during the summer. That is important. We will be able to sell this summer's catch readily, I am sure, and I hope at an improved price on the world market.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will allow a supplementary by the hon. member for St. John's East, but I must remind the House that we have only four minutes left.

Mr. McGrath: I will be brief, Mr. Speaker. I want to ask the minister whether there is anybody in the markets now booking orders so it can be determined what the price is going to be? Otherwise, what are you going to base the price on?

Mr. Davis: There is no one in the market now booking orders, but there is not normally at this time of year.

Mr. Lundrigan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the minister in responding to the question certainly took advantage of the House to drop a couple of broad hints about the fisheries situation. Perhaps his hearing aid is not working correctly. Would he now take the opportunity to indicate whether he will make such a statement on motions? He did not indicate this in his previous response.

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I do not see the reason for a special statement in the House at this time, but we will be announcing the appointment of members of the directorate of this new corporation over the next couple of weeks. It will be fully established and operating within the next three or four weeks.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GREECE—CRITICISM BY COUNCIL OF EUROPE—CANADIAN ACTION

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Following the resounding criticism by the Council of Europe of the government of Greece for its infringement of the civil liberties of its citizens, has the Canadian government taken any action in the form of constructive criticism made to its ally in NATO on this question?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the resolution of the Council of Europe was based upon a report the contents of which have not yet been made available to us. When the report is made available to us we may have something to say.

Mr. Broadbent: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister try to speed up his action? He gave the same answer, in the same tone, four months ago.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

MONTREAL—CONSTRUCTION OF COMPLEX

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Since three ministers were in attendance in Montreal yesterday when the announcement was made of the building of a $100 million complex according to a project designed by a French Canadian company, and as the government representatives gave an indication that they were willing to invest $30 million in the venture, could the minister inform the House how this amount of $30 million will contribute to the carrying out of the project?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, it will be a complex consisting of three towers.

[Later:]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I thank you for allowing me to repeat my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Inquiries of the Ministry

I was not being facetious at all when I asked the minister to tell us if the $30 million required to build this important complex would be supplied as grants or loans?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, this building is to be built and paid for by the federal government.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PROGRAMS FOR RIVERS AIR BASE

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. It arises from a news release in Manitoba today that the remaining training units at Rivers are to be moved, one to Portage and one to Edmonton. Is the minister now in a position to indicate the programs that will be substituted for these units?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I hate to rely on the stock answer I have given for quite some time, but actually I have no immediate information that would be useful. We have alternative proposals but they have not yet come to fruition.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, is the minister contemplating consultation on this matter with the communities concerned?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): I would, if I were sure this would help, but I do not think it would. So I am trying to do my best to fill the voids that are necessarily taking place, and I hope that eventually I will have good news to announce.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think I should bring to the attention of hon. members that the question period expired about two minutes ago. However, with the indulgence and unanimous agreement of hon. members perhaps we might hear the hon. member for Elgin who has been waiting for a few days to ask a question. Also, the hon. member for Joliette has been deprived of the opportunity to ask a supplementary.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of extreme urgency because it has just occurred. Perhaps I could direct my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Will he be having consultations on the matter with the communities concerned?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I did not get the question, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. La Salle.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. We might return to this question tomorrow. The hon. member for Elgin.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

APPOINTMENT OF JUDGES

Mr. H. E. Stafford (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice of which I have already given notice. In the exercise of the minister's established and proven impartial judgment, does he give first consideration to those judges who have proven their worth as members of the lower courts before appointments are made to higher tribunals?

An hon. Member: A question cannot be asked in that form.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, through one of those intuitive communications flowing between the House leaders I understand the government House leader is anxious to tell us the business for the remainder of this week and for next week.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to place on the record the telepathic communication which has already taken place. Tomorrow, as hon. members know, we will consider Order No. 87, second reading and reference to the standing committee of Bill C-202. It is anticipated that this debate will continue on Friday. On Monday next we will consider Order No. 89, second reading of Bill C-204, to amend the Fisheries Act. Tuesday of next week will be an opposition allotted day. On Wednesday we will discuss Order No. 88, the bill in respect of the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act. This will be followed by continuation of the debate on the national marketing council. Thursday of next week will be the final day of the budget debate.

PRIVILEGE

MR. WOOLLIAMS—OPINION OF LAW OFFICERS ON JURISDICTION OF AUDITOR GENERAL—REFUSAL TO ANSWER QUESTION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I did not do so during the question period because I knew members were waiting to ask questions of certain ministers. This matter arises from the question of privilege I raised earlier today. I should like to refer to page 5823 of Hansard, where the hon. member for Annapolis Valley asked the President of the Treasury Board whether he had sought legal advice from the law officers of the Crown. This is the answer given yesterday by the President of the Treasury Board:

Mr. Speaker, I have been advised by our legal advisers that we are proceeding entirely legally.

On the strength of that answer given by the President of the Treasury Board I asked the Minister of Justice whether the government had sought advice from the law officers in reference to the jurisdiction of the Auditor General. If the President of the Privy Council was entitled to give that kind of answer yesterday, how can the Minister of Justice try to hide under the rules and refuse to give the same answer to the same question on a different matter but basically on the same grounds? Surely that usurps the rules of the House, if it is not really a thrust against the integrity of those men sitting opposite.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, on the question of privilege, I gave no such answer yesterday.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): It was the President of the Treasury Board, Mr. Speaker. The President of the Treasury Board was asked a question about Montreal and the hiring of postal employees. He was asked whether he had sought a legal opinion and whether this conflicted with the Public Service Employment Act. I did not ask what the opinion was, but the President volunteered that not only had he sought it but that he had been informed the government was proceeding legally.

So I think the point raised by he hon. member for Calgary North is most valid and most relevant because today, even though I can appreciate the difficulty of the Minister of Justice, the hon. member for Calgary North was not asking for the opinion; he was asking whether an opinion had been sought. From my brief experience here, and I think the experience of all other hon. members, surely this is a type of question which can be asked. We cannot find out what the opinion is but we can certainly ask if an opinion has been sought, and this answer has to come from the Department of Justice or the Solicitor General.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, if I might I should like to say a word in respect of the question of privilege. I think the position I have taken has been well established under our rules and under the rule of the House at Westminster, and I maintain my position.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on the question of privilege may I say that I found considerable fault with government members in this regard when the Devco situation was examined. Members of the government cannot distinguish between the law officers of the Crown and the legal officers of the various departments. It would be good advice to tell them they should make themselves knowledgeable on this matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Without going into all the difficulties of the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Calgary North, it may be that the hon. member is right. But at the same time there is a well-known citation to the effect that an hon. member cannot raise as a question of privilege the refusal of a minister to answer a question. Whether or not the minister has the right to refuse to answer the question asked by the hon. member is quite clear under the rules. I have allowed the question. So far as I am concerned, from the standpoint of the Standing Orders and precedents the question is in order, but a minister can refuse to answer this or any question. I suggest to the hon. member that in view of the precedents and citations this cannot be raised as a question of privilege.

Mr. Nowlan: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I agree in part with your ruling, temporary as it was, in that the minister can refuse to answer any question. But surely if the minister answers the question and his answer is incorrect, any member of this House can raise a question of privilege to clarify the situation. This is a point which I think should be considered by the Chair.

Mr. Speaker: But the hon. member raised a question of privilege and when he had made his point I tried to reply to the original point to the best of my ability by referring to the relevant citation. I do not think there is much point in pursuing this particular aspect of the question of privilege.

Mr. Bell: The answer is yes, anyway.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Thursday, March 19, consideration of the motion of Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I enter this debate in order to deal with the problems that have arisen as a result of the mismanagement by the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans), and later by the government, of the postal situation in Montreal. I do that because Your Honour yesterday held you could not allow a motion under Standing Order 26 and suggested that one of the reasons was the opportunity that the budget debate would give us to deal with this matter.

I hope Your Honour will not think me presumptuous if I take advantage of this opportunity to suggest very respectfully that an omnibus budget debate is really not a substitute for a debate on a special matter of specific importance. I took the occasion this morning to notify the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) and the Minister of Communications that I intended to seek the floor this afternoon, and I indicated the purpose for which I would seek it.

I notice that the President of the Treasury Board at least is in the chamber. If he intends to sit through my remarks, I wish to express to him my appreciation. But I do hold, as I said, with the greatest respect, that whatever the situation in the past may have been, under the new rules an omnibus debate such as the Throne Speech debate or the Budget debate does not really meet the situation usually sought by a member for a special debate to deal with a special emergency for which he considers it important to have a debate in the House.

There may have been other reasons for Your Honour not allowing the motion, but I thought that with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would make the comment that it is a small consolation to be able to make a speech in an ominbus debate instead of having the attention of all hon. members directed to one point which a motion under Standing Order 26 would do.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Apparently the President of the Treasury Board does not intend to sit through my remarks, and this will emphasize the value of this kind of intervention at this time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He has come back.

Mr. Lewis: At the outset I want to make clear that my colleagues and I regret very much the violence which has taken place in Montreal as a result of the difficulties that have arisen. Not only do we not condone that violence, but I take the liberty to express the hope on behalf of my colleagues and myself—and I am sure on behalf of every member of this House—that the violence will end, that whoever may be responsible for it will avoid escalating it so that some solution may be found in an atmosphere other than one of violence.

There has been talk, particularly by the Minister of Communications, about not yielding to blackmail. I say to him that as one who has had some experience in labour relations I am thoroughly fed up with an employer talking about blackmail when his employees are making certain demands. I say to the minister and to the government that if the word "blackmail" is applicable in this situation at all, it is applicable to the occupants of the treasury benches who are saying to the employees involved, "Either you sign up by midnight, Wednesday, April 15, or you are without a job". If that is not blackmail, I would like to know what is. But in any case, using the word "blackmail" does not help us very much one way or the other.

It may well be that the wrong road along which the government has travelled on this issue has brought it into a corner so that it now has no alternative but to stick by its present position. It may well be that the situation in Montreal is now so complicated and so perverse that it is impossible for the government to reverse its position and take another line. I hope not. I hope the government can still see its way clear to do what in my submission should have been done in the first place.

But if it is in that corner and if, as a result, there should be greater disruption and continuing violence in Montreal which, as I have said, I hope with all my heart will not be the case, I say that the responsibility will be entirely that of the government and of every member of this government, particularly those members whose labour history many of us respect very deeply, as I do. I refer in particular to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand). That a government which has him as a member, as well as the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) and the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier), who was once on the staff of the CNTU in Quebec, should have so utterly, completely and callously mismanaged the situation in Montreal I suggest to you, Sir, speaks volumes for the fact that when this government comes to deal with ordinary people, with working people, with labouring people, it does not deserve to govern. There is no other conclusion possible.

I think that what has happened in this case has been a complete negation of some very basic principles to which this government should have been committed. I will try to suggest to Your Honour and to the government that what has happened in this case is a complete negation of the spirit of the Freedman report which the Minister of Labour has said he intends to legislate upon as soon as he produces his intended amendments to the relevant statute.

What did the Freedman report say in effect, without referring to the actual words? What Mr. Justice Freedman said was, in moral and social terms—and the President of the Treasury Board had better not smile because I suggest to him that this is accurate—

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make it clear that my smile was not in relation to the seriousness or otherwise of the matter but to the preface—

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lewis: I assume—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I assume the minister is seeking the floor on a point of order or a question of privilege. The hon. member for York South has the floor.

Mr. Lewis: I assume that is what he was rising to say, Mr. Speaker. What Mr. Justice Freedman said, and what every modern thinker on labour relations and industrial democracy in every western country has said, is that in the modern society it should not be free to an employer, or indeed to a group of employers, to make changes in their operations, to introduce efficiencies in their operations at the expense of the employees without consulting the union concerned before the decision to change the operations is made, and without working out some program which will at least reduce the hardship imposed on the employees as a result of that change. I will indicate, I think factually, that the government—perhaps not all of the government was involved in the early stages—or at least the Postmaster General and Minister of Communications violated that principle.

Aside from what Mr. Justice Freedman has said, it seems to me clear that the government of Canada, and the government of any democratic country, ought to be a model employer. It ought to act in such a way that every citizen in the country can see the concern which government has and which society collectively has and should have for the rights and the welfare of ordinary working people, and the rights of the union that represents them.

Thirdly, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the action of the minister and of the government in this case has been another denial of all the protestations about participatory democracy, in any meaningful sense of that term. What happened in this case? The Post Office authorities, perhaps for good reason—I do not know—decided that the arrangement which they had had in the past and which was to end on March 31 of this year was inefficient and that they wanted to change it. So they called for tenders from contractors to do the job of picking up and delivering the mail.

What was the first duty of the government, Mr. Speaker, if it was a government with any principle whatsoever relating to decent labour relations, if it was a government acting in a way in which everyone in this House and everyone in Canada has the right to expect it to act? What should have been the first thing the Postmaster General should have done in his invitation for tenders? I suggest that the invitation ought to have contained, as a condition of the tender, a guarantee of the job security of the employees, a guarantee of their wage schedule and a guarantee of the continuation of their bargaining rights. I have looked at the documents that were filed, and I can say that the failure to have any one of those conditions in the invitation to tender was a callous disruption of the lives and the security of some 450 workers and their families. In a moment I will indicate why, in my opinion, that was not done, Mr. Speaker.

So the Postmaster General got five contractors every one of whom, according to my information—four out of the five, at least, according to the documents tabled by the President of the Treasury Board—

Mr. Drury: There were only four.

Mr. Lewis: Well, four contractors; and all were shadow corporations that were not in existence. They did not exist as corporations; they were merely individuals who signed letters of intent with the government, I suppose undertaking to go through the necessary legal steps to incorporate themselves for the purpose for which they were tendering. These shadow corporations, from which the government did not have any bond and from which the government could not obtain any guarantee, were allowed to sign agreements with the government, and the government signed contracts with them, to do this job without any guarantee for the security of the workers, for their seniority, for their wage rights or for their bargaining rights.

Is anyone in this House or in the country surprised that when that was done the workers resented it, and that they would take whatever steps, in their desperation, they thought were open to them at that time.

Mr. Drury: Condoning violence?

Mr. Lewis: Not including violence, Mr. Speaker. I have said already that I regret the violence. But I say to the President of the Treasury Board that it is easier for him and for me to advise that people contain themselves and control themselves than it is for people who are hurt to do so. It is the fault of those who provoke the situation that creates the violence, just as much as it is the fault of those who engage in the violence. I am not condoning the violence, but I say that the Postmaster General, his department and his associates in the government who acted so meanly as well as so stupidly provoked a situation which they should have known would lead to violence, and it is their responsibility just as much as it is the responsibility of those in Montreal who have engaged in violence.

It is possible for the people in Montreal to stop their violence, as I appeal to them to do, but it is apparently not possible for the people in Montreal to get the government to reverse its stupid and mean actions of the past. Now the workers are in the position that either they accept the conditions the government is forcing on them or they remain unemployed, with their families in the condition in which the families of unemployed people usually find themselves. It is the government's fault, Mr. Speaker, and not the fault of the people concerned.

[Mr. Lewis.]

Having heard about this, having had the pleasure and the honour of being visited by a committee of the union in early March—I did not bother looking up the date—when they told me about the situation in Montreal—

Mr. Kierans: It was early February.

Mr. Lewis: Yes, it may have been in February.

Mr. Kierans: Do little more research.

Mr. Lewis: I did not hear the minister, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Kierans: I said, do a little more research.

Mr. Lewis: The Minister of Communications ought to have the humility not to make that kind of remark, in view of the mess for which he is responsible. If there is a minister of this or any other government who has been responsible for as many messes in labour relations in a department as he has been in the Post Office, I think that government ought to look at itself very seriously.

When I had the pleasure of being visited by a committee of the union—the minister has reminded me of when it was, and in a moment I will tell the House why he knows the date—some time in February and I listened to their story of this situation, I immediately remembered and drew to their attention a section of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, under which the union of course had been certified by the Canada Labour Relations Board.

I immediately drew their attention to section 9 (3) of that act which permits a bargaining unit for more than one employer if all the employers concerned consent thereto. I said to the union that it seemed to me that was their answer, that they should persuade the government to make a condition of the contracts with these contractors that they should all consent to one bargaining unit for all their employees collectively, under section 9 (3) of the act, and if necessary they should go to the Canada Labour Relations Board for confirmation of that. Then their bargaining rights, their bargaining unit and the bargaining agent would continue as previously and there would be no disruption of their situation.

The members of the union committee who were in my office at the time said, "Mr. Lewis, the government won't do that." I asked them, "Why do you say no?" They replied "Because the present contractors cannot meet the requirements of our present collective agreement, and therefore the government will not be able to twist the arms of the contractors to agree to one bargaining unit as provided in the law."

• (3:30 p.m.)

Realizing the seriousness of the situation in Montreal, I took it upon myself to visit the Minister of Communications the day following or within a day or two of having met this committee. He was good enough to express to me some of the problems he had in the situation. Obviously, they were very real and very serious problems: I do not deny that. I drew his attentiotn to the same section of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act and urged him to take steps to get the contractors to agree to have the one bargaining unit continue as the bargaining agent. In this way, he could have both objectives. Instead of having one contractor doing the job from one headquarters in Montreal, he could have had his four contractors, with the resulting economies which he hoped to achieve by dividing Montreal into four regions. At the same time the workers would have had their seniority, job security, wages and so on guaranteed.

He had not known about that section in the act. I do not blame him for that because it was not his field, as it had been mine for some years. He told me that he would immediately see the Minister of Labour and the Deputy Minister and discuss it with them. Some days later when I asked in this Chamber what had happened, the minister replied that he could not do that because one of the employers was connected with the Teamsters Union. I do not have the answer before me, but that is my clear memory of it.

I have investigated that statement, Mr. Speaker. I regret that it was given by a responsible and respected person—because I do respect him. His reply to my question was the kind of half-truth which demolishes the integrity of the person giving it. I did not speak to the employer concerned, but I am informed that it is true that one employer had some connection with the Teamsters Union. However, the separate unit that was to be created for carrying out the operations under the Post Office contract had nothing to do with the union.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister has risen on a point of order.

Mr. Kierans: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I simply want to say to the hon. member that the person who got the contract was already unionized by the Teamsters, and that the person who had lost the contract was not unionized by the Teamsters. In other words, what he is suggesting is that in order to make that particular section of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act work, we should have cancelled the contract with the contractor who had it because he had the Teamsters Union in there and was, therefore, from his point of view, no longer eligible.

Mr. Lewis: Not at all, Mr. Speaker. What I am saying to the minister is that there was a corporation which had a contract with the Teamsters, that a separate corporation was going to be set up for the purposes of a contract with the Post Office, and that separate corporation did not have any contract with the Teamsters and could not take over the contractual right of the Teamsters with the other corporation. The two corporations are legally and entirely separate units; the one had nothing to do with the other.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The minister rises on a point of order.

Mr. Kierans: Mr. Speaker, I simply want to say that legally the contractor, H. Lapalme, who got that contract, had a contract with the Teamsters. He could have formed any other kind of corporation he wanted. But he is the only one who had a contract, and the connection with the Teamsters which the hon. member is suggesting—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the minister this is not a point of order. At the same time, I wonder whether the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) who has the floor is not pleased that he is getting this debate out of his participation in the budget debate.

Mr. Lewis: I am, Mr. Speaker. I do not mind at all, because I think the minister's interventions show clearly that he did not care about the situation. He did not try to understand it. He did not get any legal advice, and he does not know what he is talking about.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: H. Lapalme had a contract with the Teamsters as H. Lapalme. That does not give him the slightest connection with the Teamsters as an entirely different corporation which was going to be incorporated for the purpose of carrying out the contract with the Post Office. The Teamsters were not in the picture at all. Had the minister the slightest concern for the situation he could have found that out from a junior lawyer in any firm doing labour relations work.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that there was no obstacle whatever to the minister doing what I suggested. I take no credit for the suggestion; anyone who knew a little about the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act would have given the same advice. Here we had four contractors and one previous bargaining unit. The law provides that you can have one bargaining unit for employees of all contractors if they consent to it. He was one party to the contract with these people and he could have said to them, "As a condition of the contract you have to agree to the employees being in one bargaining unit." That would have made good sense, aside from the difficulties in Montreal.

No employer who wants industrial peace, no employer who is not interested in disrupting labour relations would be happy with a situation where you had four contractors, all doing the same work, the employees of each contractor doing the same work, four separate bargaining units and four separate contracts. No employer in his right mind wants that. Perhaps that is the answer—that the right mind was not there.

When it was suggested to the minister that he get these contractors to agree to one bargaining unit, the suggestion was not merely a concession to the workers. It was a good suggestion in itself from the point of view of labour relations. It was much better to have one contract and one bargaining unit for employees of all contractors doing the same work than four competing contracts with four competing unions trying to outnegotiate each other. There was an easy, simple, human solution, but the Postmaster General would have none of it. Why? Because he did not want the CNTU to remain.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: One of the reasons why I say this, Mr. Speaker—I do it with some hesitation, but I think the situation is so serious that it ought to be made public—is that I am informed on the best authority that there is in the hands of Mr. Goldenberg, the commissioner, a memorandum made at his request in which the Minister of Communications and/or one or other of his officers is quoted as saying that one of the purposes of the entire exercise was to get rid of this CNTU local in the situation in Montreal.

[Mr. Lewis.]

The existence of that memorandum about which I was assured and from which the person who spoke to me had made notes at one point—how he obtained it, I do not know—made me ask the other day that all the documents in Mr. Goldenberg's possession be tabled. When the minister yesterday tabled the documents other than those that were confidential, I shouted across the floor, perhaps improperly, Mr. Speaker, that of course the interesting documents would not be there. Of course they were not, because I suppose that was a confidential document.

That is the first point I make, Mr. Speaker; that the employees and the union concerned were convinced that one of the purposes of the exercise of four contracts of a certain type in a certain context was to get rid of the union. The suspicion was confirmed by what was seen in a memorandum in the confidential possession of Mr. Carl Goldenberg. In Mr. Goldenberg's report there is a clear statement of the reason why the Postmaster General did not want to do what was obviously the right thing, namely, get one bargaining unit and the same bargaining agent. At line 7, page 7, of Mr. Goldenberg's report he deals with the various contracts with the employers as follows:

• (3:40 p.m.)

I am not in a position to pass a proper judgement on their bids but, on the basis of contemplated wage rates and the attitude to labour relations disclosed to me, I am of the opinion that they——will be unable to fulfil their commitments within the fixed price and, at the same time, maintain industrial peace.

Namely, the contractors.

In plain English, as I read Mr. Goldenberg's words, he is saying that the Postmaster General signed the kind of contract with the contractors which made it impossible for them to pay wage rates to the truck drivers which the truck drivers were then receiving, that the contractors had indicated they were not interested in decent labour relations and that therefore the whole thing could not work. That is why nothing was done about using the instrument of the federal labour law in settling the problem in such a way that the employers and the union concerned would have no difficulty.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member at this time, but his time has expired unless there is unanimous approval of the House that he continue. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lewis: Sir, I did not realize the time had slipped by so quickly. That was the way, in my submission, to have solved the problem and guaranteed the people the rights they were entitled to. As Mr. Goldenberg points out in that report, we are not dealing with novices, with men who had just started work in this field. We are dealing with men with very considerable service. Mr. Goldenberg sets this out right at the opening of his report, at the bottom of page 2. Of these employees 20 of the 450 had a seniority of 20 years or more, and 88 had a seniority of between 10 and 20 years. So a total of 108 had a seniority of more than 10 years. Of the other employees, 85 had a seniority of between 5 and 10 years. Therefore, a total of almost 200 had a seniority of more than 5 years, and 159 had a seniority of between 2 and 5 years. Of the 450 employees, 360 or so had a seniority of more than two years and about half of that total had seniority of more than ten years. That is a considerable length of service.

In our modern society a man does not work for wages alone. He does not merely acquire wages. In a good union and labour relations situation he also acquires an equity in his job resulting from seniority and other benefits he is able to win collectively through his trade union. By ignoring this, the government caused desperation among these men for no reason whatsoever. That is what made the men so angry about the situation. There was no reason for its happening.

The Postmaster General had it within his power early in February to act wisely. Indeed if he had taken advice, as he should have months before that he would have been able to settle the problem in such a way that the CNTU local would remain and the CNTU bargaining agent would remain, the people concerned would have been reassured about their wages and job security. All this could have been done months ago by the simple application of section 9(3) of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act.

Even though he did not do this before February, and even though his attention was drawn to this matter—it so happens I was the one who drew it to his attention—six or seven weeks before the deadline would have been time enough for him to carry out the policy that would have avoided the desperation, the violence and the disruption that has taken place and threatens to continue in Montreal. We are in this mess because of the complete insensitivity of the Postmaster General to the rights of workers.

I am reminded—if I may interrupt myself for a moment—that even a good person cannot escape his background. No one denies that the Postmaster General is a well-meaning person. But his having been president of the Canadian Stock Exchange and the Montreal Stock Exchange was simply not the kind of training that makes possible a good appreciation of labour relations involving ordinary working people in a situation as critical as the one in Montreal. He ought to have stood aside and allowed someone who displayed some sensitivity to labour relations to take over.

The government, having brought the country and the people of Montreal to this mess, then appointed Mr. Goldenberg as a commissioner. He recommended that the government take over the operation in Montreal. It so happens that I have had the pleasure of knowing Mr. Goldenberg since my undergraduate days at McGill ever so many years ago; I hate to say how many. I think Mr. Goldenberg was wrong. I think the advice he gave the government was wrong. It would have made sense if his advice had been that all people who do similar work across Canada everywhere, in every centre of the country, be public servants and in the public service. If that had been the advice and if the government had applied it throughout the country, that would have been one way of acting. But when you enforce on the drivers in Montreal a decision based upon a report designed to clean up a mess for which the government was responsible, that is another thing. The advice was not well based and the government was not wise in accepting it.

I shall not take much more time. I am grateful to hon. members for allowing me this additional time. I wanted to put these things on record for three reasons. First, this is an example of the attitude of this government towards labour relations, and it frightens the hell out of me. It frightens me beyond words that a relatively uncomplicated situation which ought to have been relatively easy to control should have been permitted to develop the way it has developed, with all the consequences it will have on the lives of about 459 Canadians and their families in Montreal. That frightens me and indicates an attitude toward labour relations by the government that does not bode well for the future of that aspect of Canada's activities.

Second, one can be disturbed also by the way in which this government has dealt with labour relations in the total Public Service. Postal unions are now undergoing a process of conciliation after six months of negotiation. This is the kind of thing that creates bitterness. Third, one hopes that there is still time for the government to change its attitude and to revert to original policy and try to find a responsible contractor or two, three or four contractors in Montreal. I am sure there are such contractors who would take on this job on tenders which would enable them to pay decent wages to the truck drivers, wages similar to those the truck drivers have received until now. In that context the truck drivers ought to be allowed to continue their union membership and their union and collective bargaining rights. There is still time for the government to do this.

I appeal to the two ministers here to take another look at the situation and see whether they cannot do some of the simple things I have suggested, for I fear if the government does not, if the government remains adamant, two things will—not may—happen. One will be a continuing disruption of the postal service in Canada's largest city, accompanied possibly with continued strife and violence. Although I hope there will not be violence, I know enough about the situation to realize that there well may be violence. The second thing that will happen is that several hundred Canadians will be without a job and on the unemployment rolls which this government's policy has increased in size, particularly in Quebec and in Montreal.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has just delivered an impassioned speech based perhaps a little more on what he calls sensitivity and what I call emotion, rather than fact.

Mr. Orlikow: You don't have any emotion.

Mr. Drury: Perhaps I should regard that as a compliment that the approach is one of reason rather than heartfelt ignorance.

Mr. Lewis: The absence of emotion does not necessarily mean reason.

Mr. Drury: The hon. gentleman has said that he does not condone violence. He has just finished a speech in which he condemned the adoption by the government of the report of a distinguished labour expert, Dr. Goldenberg. He has proposed what he states is a simple solution which the government could easily offer and thereby avoid what he predicts, and by his prediction I suggest it is at least a partial invitation to that course of action—

Mr. Lewis: Come on, now!

Mr. Drury: I regret—

Mr. Lewis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I resent the suggestion that any of my words were an invitation—

Mr. Drury: That is no point of order.

Mr. Lewis: I say to the minister—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair can deal with only one point of order at a time. I am prepared to hear the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury)—

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) was first.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: —after I have heard the point of order of the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis).

Mr. Lewis: I resent the suggestion of the minister. It is entirely unwarranted. I remind him, the man without emotion who thinks that means he has reason, but I suggest in this case he is perhaps without either, of the letter he sent to the president of the local union in which he made similar predictions and therefore a similar invitation.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, that is not a point of order but merely an intervention. I regret that when I was engaged in a similar operation earlier I yielded and did not pursue the point. I will now. Whether the hon. member resents it or not, I will persist in stating that such a prophecy, preceded by such a pseudo analysis of the present situation, is in itself an invitation to violence. I condemn this.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): You must be in desperate straits.

Mr. Drury: I have been engaged—

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): You are in the mess. Tell us what you are going to do about it.

Mr. Drury: With respect to the hon. gentleman Mr. Speaker, I think if anybody is in a mess it is the New Democratic Party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Drury: It is now in the very unfortunate position of trying to espouse what is in effect an endeavour at the present moment to reject an eminently reasonable offer by the government to provide security of employment to these individuals. The response to this is encouragement to those people who resort to violence. I condemn this and will continue to condemn it in spite of the heckling by the leader, deputy leader and other members of the NDP.

Mr. Lewis: You can lie and condemn at the same time. That is what you are doing.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I challenge the hon. member for York South to substantiate the statement that I am lying.

Mr. Lewis: I did not invite violence.

Mr. Drury: Either substantiate it or withdraw it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I remind hon. members that is not the sort of statement that can be made in this House. If the hon. member for York South did so, I invite him to withdraw it.

Mr. Lewis: Since Your Honour was good enough to ask me to rise, I say to Your Honour and the minister that I think it is an irresponsible misrepresentation of the words of a member of this House. On several occasions I went out of my way to express my regret at the violence that has occurred and to appeal to the workers concerned, if they are responsible for the violence, to stop it. I merely said that they are so desperate that violence may occur. I used the words "might happen" not "will happen". For the minister to try to make cheap political capital by misrepresenting my words is utterly reprehensible. If I am not permitted to say the minister was telling a lie, I will withdraw that statement and say that he is guilty of total and reprehensible misrepresentation of what I said.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, during the course of his remarks the hon. member mentioned that everyone is the prisoner of his background. I suggest that perhaps the remarks of the hon. gentleman should be looked at in the light of his particular background. I think there is a lot of truth in the statement that if a man is not a prisoner, he is at least conditioned by his background.

Mr. Orlikow: We see it in you. A silver spoon!

Mr. Drury: We should examine the remarks of the hon. member in light of his background. During the course of his remarks the hon. gentleman made mention of the fact—I want to put this on the record—that the President of the Treasury Board was not prepared to sit in the House and listen to these remarks when, in fact, I had to expose myself to them.

Mr. Lewis: I apologize for that.

Mr. Drury: Secondly, the hon. member said I was smiling in the face of a serious matter. I was smiling because of the introductory remarks with respect to the hon. member's view of the Freeedman report. I copied down what the hon. member said. He said, when looking at the Freedman report, "Let us not be governed by the words he used." This is the kind of approach one often hears—"Don't be entrapped by what the man said; I will tell you what he thought". He then proceeded to give his version of what Mr. Justice Freedman either thought or meant to say. I suggest we should look at what Mr. Justice Freedman said on this occasion. It is a doctrine with which I am in full agreement. An employer does not have the right, or should not endeavour to exercise the right to alter substantially the terms and conditions of the lives of his employees without discussing with them means of alleviating the consequences of changes which would be brought about to the employees advantage.

Mr. Lewis: Oh, oh!

Mr. Drury: If I can proceed without further interruption, I point out to the hon. gentleman that in this case this is not what he said. I have told the hon. member, not what Mr. Justice Freedman thought or meant to say but what he did say. Applying the doctrine of Mr. Justice Freedman in this case, the government should have negotiated with a group of their employees and their union representative before taking action in relation to this operation. I point out to the hon. member that the employees in question had a contract or collective agreement with an independent employer. They were not employees of the government. The government did not have a collective agreement with this particular group of employees.

Mr. Orlikow: Who did the contractor work for?

Mr. Drury: Don't you know?

Mr. Orlikow: Obviously you don't know.

Mr. Drury: It is difficult, Mr. Speaker, in the face of such lack of knowledge of the facts to conduct an intelligent debate.

Mr. Orlikow: Can I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Drury: No.

Mr. Orlikow: You are afraid, that's why?

Mr. Drury: I suggest the hon. member should inform himself, I do not have time in my speech to try and correct this state of ignorance on his part. He can read the papers. If the hon. member for York West—

Mr. Lewis: York South. Please get my riding straight.

Mr. Drury: Excuse me. I apologize. If the hon. member would read the papers tabled in the House he would see that the collective agreement with the Lapalme workers was one which could not have been entered into by the government.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. Lewis: I did not say it could.

Mr. Drury: I did not say you did. I said if the hon. member had read it, he would see—

Mr. Lewis: I did read it.

Mr. Drury: In that case, you would see—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I invite the minister to address his remarks to the Chair, when perhaps there would be less of this Committee of the Whole approach.

Mr. Lewis: It makes it more interesting.

Mr. Drury: I accept the admonition, and apologise for my lapse. While it may be said that to proceed otherwise would make a better exercise in participatory democracy, I respect the rules and would like to be governed by them. I regret that in leading up to his concluding remarks, which indicated that the government was entirely to blame for the present situation and inferred that those who felt aggrieved could be excused for taking whatever action commended itself to them, the hon. member should have failed to look at the offer which was made.

Mr. Broadbent: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the minister has once again misconstrued the argument in a basic respect. He said the hon. member for York South—

An hon. Member: You don't like listening, do you?

Mr. Broadbent: —was suggesting the Lapalme workers were justified in taking whatever action they wished. My hon. friend from York South said no such thing.

Mr. Drury: I am not sure whether that is a question of privilege or not, but I will continue. The hon. member for York South did not take the trouble to analyse the offer made by the government or the reasons given for the rejection of that offer. He will find, if he takes the trouble to read the latest information about it, that it does incorporate virtually all the provisions which were sought, and which the government has in its power to grant under the existing law. The workers, in the hon. member's view, were entitled to job security. This has been offered.

Mr. Orlikow: At the end of the negotiations, not at the beginning.

Mr. Drury: If the hon. member who is talking from his seat had followed this discussion closely, he would appreciate the dichotomy which exists in his party. I have been accused of inflexibility, of stubbornness, of being unwilling to make concessions, yet the hon. member is making exactly the opposite charge. It is difficult, I know, to have your cake and eat it but the N.D.P. is in full swing, as usual, trying to do it.

Mr. Lewis: It is not cake, though.

Mr. Drury: The workers have been offered job security, they have been offered a very satisfactory living wage, they have been offered the right to apply, like other citizens of Canada, for the bargaining union of their choice.

Mr. Lewis: What do you mean, "offered"? They have that right already. They do not need your offer.

Mr. Chrétien: One has to tell them they have it.

Mr. Drury: The government is charged with not being generous in its offer, or with claiming generosity in respect of the offer. My submission is that the offer made by the government is a fair one. It rectifies all the alleged omissions listed by the hon. member. But he did not take the trouble to look at it and explain in what way it is unsatisfactory.

According to him, the government is at fault for not offering something better, and the failure of the union to accept it will result in continuing disruption of the postal service in Montreal and a situation which, though he would deplore it, might result in violence in that city. I would deplore it, too.

Mr. Lewis: And in unemployment.

Mr. Drury: It would have been very much more constructive had the hon. member addressed himself to the situation as it is today, to the kind of offer which has been made, the kind of offer which has been rejected—

Mr. Lewis: You would like that, wouldn't you?

Mr. Drury: —instead of threshing old straw.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a question, since his time has not expired? First, would he tell the House, in connection with this offer of which he speaks, whether the length of service with which these men are to be credited is given them as a permanent thing, or whether this seniority position will be in effect for only three months; second, whether the wage rate offered is a definite wage rate or whether it is subject to the result of negotiations by the Council of Postal Unions; third, whether he thinks that the desperate attitude of the drivers in Montreal does not stem from previous failures rather than merely from their present position with regard to his offer.

Mr. Drury: I am a little surprised I shoud be asked a question about seniority and wage matters. That question has already been asked, and I have given full information. Nevertheless, I will repeat that the wage offer, is that their current wage rate should continue until such time as a new contract is signed between the Council of Postal Unions and the government. At that point, employees who have previously been employed with the Lapalme firm will receive wages as fixed under the new agreement.

Second, with regard to seniority, this is a term which covers a great many facets of postal operations. The aspect to which the hon. member refers is the position of preference in relation to assignments, in relation to shifts and the taking of vacations. Seniority has been offered to the Lapalme workers for a period of three months in preference to anybody else. After that, they will not enjoy this exclusive preference in relation to the particular area of work in which they have been operating.

The hon. member asked me, finally, whether I feel the Lapalme workers are justified in feeling resentment. I am not sure whether the connotation is that they were justified in taking the action they have taken.

Mr. Lewis: No.

Mr. Drury: There does exist, quite understandably, some apprehension among these workers as to their future status and this apprehension, this worry, produces disturbance. I do not deny this at all. I am fully sympathetic to this worry on their part. Not unnaturally, they wish to do as well for themselves as they can. I recognize this. But I do not recognize for a moment that this apprehension, this desire to better their situation justifies in any way or at any time acts of violence against other people. I repeat, I object to those who hypocritically or otherwise represent actions of this kind as being in any way justifiable or seek to condone them.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, this has not in the last few minutes been a particularly agreeable or stimulating debate. I found it somewhat reprehensible on the part of the minister to suggest that the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) in forecasting what might happen, was inferring that it ought to happen. I have been convinced for weeks that the government's case was far from strong. The exchanges we have heard this afternoon, on the lines of "you did—I didn't" convince me that its case is indeed abysmally weak.

I am sure no man of the stature of the hon. member for York South would in any way rejoice at violence. Nor would I. But the fact is, things have happened in Montreal in recent weeks and this, together with recent fiascos in the management field, would lead anyone interested in the social scene to fear a recurrence. I am one of those who believe in vigorous protest but never in violent protest. Never at any time have I had conversations with the men involved here, or with the union. I am prepared, however, to accept the charge of being emotional. I am definitely susceptible to emotion on occasions where human suffering is involved. If I say I am profoundly disturbed by the thought of what it may mean to their dependants, let me point out that after many agonizing weeks of uncertainty, of brittleness and expectance of finding themselves removed from their livelihoods they are still uncertain. If that be emotion, make the most of it.

I think, too, that this long and agonizing problem affects more than the unions and more than cabinet members in their relevant positions within cabinet; it affects the public not only in Montreal but in all of Canada. The government, through whichever minister at a given time was its spokesman, has been far less than sufficiently forthcoming in dealing with the problems of these people. Such information we have has been received through press releases or through speculative reports of digging newspapermen. This is not good enough. The people of Canada have a mighty important stake in this matter.

This particular problem is one of the most painful and serious eruptions in the postal service itself. It is an eruption in a service which for a long, long time has been something less than healthy. I am often amazed at the frequent expressions of the daily press that today mail service in Montreal is near normal. Even when it is normal it is terrible. There is a backlog there which is abominable. I have a file of letters 18 inches high testifying to the outrageous service which is being visited upon the people of Montreal and the people whose service is dependent upon transit of mail through Montreal.

I hope in our great concern for this particular and unique problem we do not forget that the deterioration of the Post Office Department has been a problem for the past few months. As a result of this deplorable mess we have found an incapacity to deal with some basic considerations. There is the question of job security which has been in existence for some time. No man need be a leading cabinet member or an expert in labour relations to realize the importance of the question of job security. Commissioner Goldenberg noted this in his report, which strikes me in itself as a clear and definite indictment of the government.

Mr. Goldenberg did not have much time to work on that report, but conceivably it did not take him too long to size up the situation in the eleventh-hour assignment given to him. It strikes me he lays the blame pretty definitely at the door of the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans) and his colleagues. He tells us that the G. Lapalme employees were fearful of the loss of their status and rights as employees under their collective agreement, and that this created a state of fear, insecurity and demoralization. Who would not realize that this would be the kind of reaction of these men, many of whom had been involved in carrying the nation's mail for many years and doing a very good job of it? I notice, as well, that Mr. Goldenberg examined carefully the reasons Lapalme was not able to continue. He goes back to one of the points many of us have been discussing for months and months. He refers to the reduction in postal services from six days to five days. We need not go into that question now, but it will be gone into again and again.

Another interesting thing is that Lapalme advised the union and asked for its co-operation in preparing its tender. Mr. Goldenberg went on to say that considering that tenders would be based on rates of pay below those in effect under the collective agreement, the union refused to negotiate. Accordingly, Lapalme did not tender for any of the five contracts. Much of this problem has stemmed from that will-o-the-wisp search of the Postmaster General for some measure of economy in order that he could somehow, some day in some way prove that, by jove, he would make this department pay. The public will be appalled when the full bill in dollars and cents, to say nothing in terms of human measurements, comes in. This will be one of the most costly fiascos since the costly abandonment of the Prince Edward Island causeway. If the Auditor General is still around next year, I predict he will find an interesting situation here.

I do not know that there is much value in my continuing the denunciation which was so eloquently put forward by the hon. member for York South. We have reached the stage where to condemn is not to be helpful. Surely the government does not need me to dig it deeper into this mess. I would not want to do that at this stage of the game because I think through its ineptitude, at least to the extent of 90 per cent, we are facing a serious situation. I do not know what will be done tomorrow and I do not know where the government will get experienced men. I do not know what is in store for the long-suffering people of Montreal.

I note, to my horror, that in this whole mess there was more concern for the trucks than for the truck drivers, because in one of the contracts with Lapalme there was reference to the fact that the government, if it took over the service, would purchase the trucks. What about the drivers? Perhaps I am being emotional in suggesting that the drivers are more important. We have not been told the story about this cost and I endeavoured yesterday to obtain this information from the minister. He is a little more evasive than the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans) and a little less arrogant, but the combination of the two is not very helpful.

• (4:20 p.m.)

I wonder whether in its last offer—the kind of thing which had it been made weeks ago might have avoided a great deal of trouble—the government might have reached a situation where the whole concept of the illusory notion of economy had been by-passed and might have reached a stage where the minister might reasonably have said that this is not working, that a mistake has been made and that we should go back to an earlier situation and carry on.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A mistake! They would never admit that.

Mr. Macquarrie: This is something, it would strike me, that rational, reasonable men more concerned with saving the situation than with saving face might have done. I was impressed by the latest emanation from the office of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury). I refer to this long, precise and brittle letter to the President of the National Syndicate of Employees dated April 14. We talk about the politics of confrontation: it is all here, not any notion of gentility of emotion. At the end of the letter, in the final paragraph, I come to something that is very interesting. This will be of great concern to many people:

> May we suggest to you that you inform your members that they have until midnight on Wednesday the 15th to accept the government's offer. After that date, we shall fill our positions but the employees who are hired will obviously not be able to claim the special advantages which we have offered to you.

There will be reflection upon that in many places in the future.

> The public has the right to require an efficient postal service and the government has the duty to furnish such a service.

I would say, in the discharge of that duty, there is no room even for self-applause on the part of the President of the Treasury Board. The government has failed abysmally in this matter. I hope in the eleventh hour—

An hon. Member: Five minutes to midnight.

Mr. Macquarrie: —five minutes to midnight, as my friend says—they might be able to discard a little of their brittleness and exercise a little reasonableness, because we do not want any more trouble in the Post Office than we have had in the past many months. No one gains any satisfaction from the fact of the government being embarrassed over the Post Office. This has happened so many times that there is not much novelty to it now. The real novelty we would like to have in this country is good mail service.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I wonder would the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) permit a question?

Mr. Macquarrie: I will attempt it.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I confess that throughout the whole operation I have been looking for advice and seeking views. The hon. member suggested that perhaps we had not proceeded in the best possible way, and I believe he suggested that rather than proceed as we are now we should go back and carry on. I have in mind that he means carry on something done before. Would he indicate to me what we should be carrying on.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Speaker, that is a bit unfair. Without being immodest, I think I could have helped him some time ago, but surely on April 15, just hours before the deadline, he is not going to ask me to solve the problem for him. It is a little too late. I think he knows I was talking about the contract rather than government service. The government, as I understand it, has gone back to pretty much the same cost as the contract would have been. He should have asked me a week ago for real help.

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, there are always a great many speeches made by people in which they say they never condone violence and they always wind up by saying "but we can understand it", whereas in the case of the hon. member who opened this discussion, he can excuse it.

Mr. Orlikow: You precipitated it.

Mr. Kierans: He can place the blame somewhere, and somehow he can rationalize violence although he does not condone it; he can only excuse it.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege or on a point of order, whichever you like, this is the last time I will rise on this point but I hope the minister has something on which he can really defend mismanagement, instead of saying that I excuse the violence which I think is an obvious and not really honest misrepresentation of what I said.

Mr. Kierans: We will wait for Hansard to confirm that.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): We will wait for Hansard.

Mr. Kierans: The point I want to make is that we did not suddenly face the employees of Lapalme or the CNTU with a midnight deadline. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) said that we are now exerting this blackmail or pressure on them. This goes back to at least a year ago January. I am sure the hon. member must know this because we went through 32 days of violence and intimidation in February and March of last year. At that time, on March 3, I publicly announced that as a solution I intended to take over the delivery service in Montreal. The terms were almost as generous as those offered by my colleague during the recent negotiations. But the refusal was for exactly the same reason: the refusal was that there was no legal way in which the government could recognize a union prior to taking in its members.

At that time I said that since the members of this particular union had lost their employer, Rod Service Limited, we were now going to substitute ourselves. I said that the great majority of the drivers employed by Rod Service at that time would be offered employment, and I urged them to report for work as usual on March 14. The following day the postmaster of Montreal sent out a letter. Within 24 hours of the members acting on their own accord we had well over 200 applications. But that particular arrangement was not consummated or completed because the union began to think of itself and its position rather than that of its members. So eventually, since the union had had a collective agreement with an employer, Rod Service, that was to last until March 31, 1970, we in the Post Office decided we would recognize that agreement although it was not our responsibility that they had lost their employer. Their employer, working with them, could no longer provide the services to which the people of Montreal were entitled.

We decided to ask other people and to approach many trucking firms in Montreal to see whether they were interested in taking over the contracts and the members. We were successful in doing so. At that time over a year ago—this is not midnight tonight—we warned the members of the union that this was the last one-year contract. We advised them that whatever might be the solution, whether the government would take over the services or go to tender as it does throughout the country, there would be a different solution to the problem because, as my colleague has said, this insecurity and uncertainty has recurred annually.

It was not good for them, it was not good for the Post Office and it certainly was not good for the people of Montreal because in the three years up to that time there had been five stoppages of work and five threats which have been carried out, of which only one was legal. They were clearly warned. They were also told at the same time that instead of 396 employees, the Post Office felt that the work could be done by a reallocation of the work load, by a scrapping of the old method of dividing services provided into departments and rearranging them geographically into sectors. We believed that this would lead to increasing productivity and would lower the cost to the taxpayers of Canada. In effect, while we agreed to Lapalme taking over 396 employees, we felt that progressively the work could be done by fewer and fewer people and that the appropriate number, including management personnel and supervisory staff, might be something like 330.

They were well aware of this, but during the past year the members acquired control of the union and of the 459 members only three, the two Lapalme brothers who own the operation and their general manager, Mr. Breton, were not members of the union. They progressively increased the cost to the people of Canada. So that the staff did not go down from 396 to 330 but went up from 396 to 459.

I do not wish to recite all of the attendant malpractices both from a union point of view as well as a management point of view that have taken place during the past year, because I do not wish to criticize either union or management here. Suffice it to say that there was every justification for looking for better ways of providing service to the people of Montreal, and the Post Office was bound in its responsibility to the taxpayers of Canada to seek them. This we did.

It is not midnight to night that becomes a sudden threat, as the hon. member for York South seeks to imply. But even leaving aside the dates of January, 1969, and March 1969, it was last September when the contractor and the union were officially notified that we intended to go to tenders. Here I refer to the misrepresentation that the hon. member for York South is seeking to impose on this House that some of us on this side have never read the Freedman report or have no understanding of what the report is all about. We do. Mr. Justice Freedman could not have asked for anything more than we have done, because the people who are talking about midnight tonight were notified in September of 1969, which is beyond the six months that Mr. Justice Freedman suggested.

Mr. Lewis: Of what were they notified?

Mr. Kierans: They were notified that we were going for tenders and that there was therefore a possibility that there would be new employers. So there was a clear indication to everyone concerned. But what happened during the six months was not that they either sought to co-operate with their employer or sought to retain the contracts; in fact, their actions were the complete reverse. So much so—and I come to the famous meeting with the hon. member for York South to which I would not have referred, but he has done it first—that again they lost an employer, and just as Rod Services felt they could no longer continue to operate with the costs, with the lack of productivity, with the lack of loyalty to the service, to the employer and to the people of Montreal, they decided not to submit a tender under the existing contractor's name but to submit a tender under another operation that they control, namely H. Lapalme.

One of the clear advantages of this to the Lapalme brothers was that they felt that in dealing with the Teamsters they would be dealing with a more responsible union that would take account of its contractual obligations. In other words, I am as pro-union as any man in this chamber but I am not one of those who is willing to say that at all times, under all conditions and in all places a union is eternally right. A union, just like a business, large or small, can price itself out of a particular market. This appears to be what the present union is doing.

On February 4 the members of the union went to see the hon. member—it was not in early March—and on February 9 he came to see me. We went over the suggestion that he proposed. I was looking for solutions and I told him that I would consider it. But I also presented to him a number of hard facts; that the cost of delivering mail in Montreal had gone up about 73 per cent in four years, whereas the cost of delivering mail in Toronto, with a more rapidly increasing volume and operating from the same base within a difference of three or four cents, had gone up 33 per cent, and that in all conscience as custodian of the public interest I had had to ask for tenders.

I am not saying whether or not he agreed with any of this. I am simply saying that he proposed that I look into the possibility of asking the new contractors to recognize the CNTU in some global fashion or in some partial shape-up fashion, and to agree to hire all the employees that they needed from the prevailing seniority list. But I am sure the hon. member is aware of one fundamental condition in that possibility, that is that the contractors themselves have to agree or consent.

What made his solution impossible is that the contractors would not consent because at this time there was all the evidence of violence which led them, whatever might have been their original intentions, to pull back progressively from hiring those who were responsible for the violence, those who reduced the number of mailboxes in Montreal from 1,800 to 400 and who today fired two bullets into a car in downtown Montreal, a security car protecting the royal mail. They were unwilling, and so the solution that he proposed at that time fell of its own weight. It also fell for another reason, which accounts for the silence of the hon. member since that time, aside from a few inconsequential questions and his last-minute, midnight interest in this problem.

I informed him that one of the contractors to whom we had given the contract was H. Lapalme Transport Ltee., that this man had a union, and that that union was the Teamsters. It is all very well for the hon. member to hint, suggest and imply that legally it would have been possible for him to set up another phantom company, but the contract was not given to another phantom company; it was given to H. Lapalme Transport Ltee., and precisely for the reasons that, according to him at the time, he had the Teamsters and nobody else. And the hon. member, whose interest in the Teamsters and the CLC are at least as great, I would have thought, as his interest in seeing that justice is done to the CNTU, became very quiet.

Mr. Lewis: Oh, come on!

Mr. Kierans: I am simply telling the hon. member that. I am not the one who raised that conversation. He raised it, not me. He suggests that I committed a heinous offence in not including in my tenders the following three clauses: that whoever gets a tender must subscribe to and guarantee the job security of those who work for the firm that had lost the tender; that those who get a tender must guarantee the salaries, after they employ them, of those who worked for the firm that lost the tender; and that those who get a tender must agree to take in and certify the union of those who had lost the tender, regardless of what unions they may have had, what employees they may have had or what this might have done to their prevailing wage rates. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, why in hell should you ask for tenders if you are going to put in this type of condition; and who is going to submit quotations in response to tenders that contain such conditions?

I am as sensitive as the hon. member to the fact that labour legislation may swing this way some day, and perhaps it should swing this way some day; but I say to him that when it does, and if it does, it should be after a full-scale debate in this House in which all of us decide that that is what we want, and not in reply to bullets through windshields or violence in the streets of Montreal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kierans: Mr. Speaker, there is not very much more I want to say about this matter, except that the government has been patient, it has been tolerant and it has been generous. It has used up several ministers in the process.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Kierans: No, I may say it. When those of us who have been involved in this began to lose a little patience, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—and I applaud him for it—wisely decided that he would bring in my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), whose patience is limitless and had not been used up. I must say that I, as Postmaster General, appreciate all that he has done in the past several weeks to achieve a solution. I applaud him and thank him for what he has done, not only for me personally but also for the 48,000 people who work in the Post Office, for the rest of this government and particularly for the people of Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I intend to take a few minutes to entertain the House on a subject not connected with the Post Office, but which is extremely important for a great number of my fellow citizens, and also for a great number of Canadians from other constituencies.

I should like to illustrate that we must urgently take steps to protect a homegrown industry, namely the textile products industry.

In the past years, this law-abiding industry has behaved as a good citizen. We should therefore give it the consideration it deserves. It played an important part during the war, and thereby not only won the praise of the public, but is also entitled to its gratitude.

The textile industry is going through very difficult times. It is not looking for charity nor is it asking for subsidies, but it does want to know if the present government wants a Canadian textile industry or not. It wants to continue sharing in the development of Canada and providing employment for Canadians. Workers in the textile industry are not seeking favours, they merely want the opportunity to continue working at a trade they have been practicing for a long time in order to be able to provide for their families.

Labour unions are not asking for favours either, they only want to go on working to improve the conditions of workers in this industry and prevent them from becoming unemployed.

All these good citizens want only one thing, and they deserve it: more attention from the government.

Let us examine rapidly the official figures in order to find out what the textile and clothing industry means to Canada.

• (4:50 p.m.)

The textile industry has been established in the province of Quebec since 1845. Indeed, the first textile plant or mill as we used to say was founded in the city of Sherbrooke.

Today, the textile industry has 37 plants and employs 83,000 Canadians. In the province of Quebec, 47,000 people earn their living in primary textile products industries. In Ontario and the Maritimes, many have found a job in the textile industry. In Quebec, the annual production of primary textile products is valued at $850 million. From 1946 to 1967, the cotton industry spent the impressive amount of $350 million on the construction and repairs of buildings alone. From 1960 to 1964, the productivity of textile plants increased almost fivefold.

During the past ten years, it is interesting to note that the price of textile products has remained almost the same. There has been only a slight increase and this in spite of the fact that the industry had to face the problem of salary increases and higher costs for services and transport.

As for the clothing industry, it provides employment to 110,000 workers, 50,000 of them in Montreal, 19,000 in Toronto and 6,000 in Winnipeg.

Let me remind you that in the forties, the Canadian textile industry supplied about 75 per cent of the domestic market. Today, it scarcely supplies 60 per cent of the consumption and if the present economic conditions persist, it is to be expected, Mr. Speaker, that its share of the Canadian market will dwindle even more. What are the reasons for the smaller share of the Canadian market going to the Canadian industry? Imports from countries where labour is cheap are mainly responsible for that.

I would like at this stage to quote a few statistics to better enlighten the House on the conditions existing in this industry.

Imports from Japan, which were 2 million pounds in 1954, have now reached 37 million pounds. In 1954 imports from Asia totalled 4 million pounds, today they amount to 47 million pounds. In 1954, we were importing one million pounds of textile products from eastern Europe, when today 20 million pounds find their way into Canada. From low income countries we were importing half a million pounds in 1954, and today we get 15 million pounds from them.

As far as the United States are concerned, their exports to Canada have increased from 68 million pounds in 1954 to 110 million pounds today.

Our imports from the United Kingdom are still much the same, that is 26 million pounds annually.

These increases in our imports, Mr. Speaker, have resulted in 5,000 fewer jobs since 1966. As for the shirt industry, statistics are shocking.

One can read at page 36 of a publication entitled L'avenir du textile et du vêtement au Québec, the following:

> Our industry makes up 50 per cent of the total market. In 1966, total imports of shirts represented only 25 per cent of the whole market. Imports have doubled in less than three years.

Further on, the following comparison is given:

> In 1965, domestic production amounted to 1,841,000 dozens; imports, to roughly 750,000 dozens.

In 1966, domestic production amounted to 1,674,000 dozens; imports, to 764,000 dozens. In 1967, domestic production was 1,477,000 dozens and imports 1,042,000 dozens. In 1968, domestic production amounted to 1,296,000 dozens and imports to 1,400,000 dozens.

I go back to the quotation:

> In the first three months of 1969, total imports of shirts increased by 70,000 dozens—

Such statistics are surely conducive to some concern on our part. They constitute warnings of which the government should take note even now.

The leaders of the textile and clothing industries, as well as those of labour unions have been expecting the government to come out with a textile policy, but it has yet to come.

A few statements have already been made on the matter.

The April 7 issue of the Globe & Mail gives an account of what was said by Mr. E. Douglas James, President of the Cotton Institute of Canada and of Cosmos Imperial Mills Limited, of Toronto, a company employing 1,500 workers. I quote:

[English]

> If they say they don't want a textile industry we will be ready to close down our mills. If they say they want a viable industry we're prepared to stay.

When Mr. James says "they", he means the government.

[Translation]

In the same article, we can also find what was said by Mr. Gerald Bruck, President of Bruck Mills Limited, of Montreal. Here is what it says, and I quote:

[English]

> The plants are in great shape. They (the manufacturers) are paying a lot for labour and they are pressured by imports.

Mr. B. S. Saunders, managing director of Wabasco in Montreal, says:

> This lack of information is like going to the doctor and getting all the x-rays taken and having him say, "come back in two weeks" and six months later still nothing has happened.

• (5:00 p.m.)

[Translation]

It would be interesting to know what the officials of some industries, one of which is a local one, are thinking. I have here a letter addressed to me by Mr. Midgley, Vice-President and General Manager of Penman's Limited, which reads in part as follows:

[English]

You undoubtedly know that the government is in the process of considering the above-mentioned subject and that an announcement is expected in the near future. For many years, the industry has called upon the government for a statement of policy. The main problem which has just been made public, and with which you are conversant, is that of "imports at low prices".

The need of a policy is proving obvious, because manufacturers want to determine whether their position is viable before making capital available in the future for investments which could create new jobs. Canadian manufacturers supply at the present time only 50 per cent of the domestic textile market. We are the only country with such a fully developed industry to tolerate imports of goods at low prices in such quantities that they become the cause of such harmful pressures.

What we are seeking is a statement of policy concerning the role which our industry will be called upon to play in Canada, in order to prepare adequate plans.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian textile industry wants to know whether or not this government wishes it to continue its operations. For 1967 alone, if the products which came from countries with low production costs had been manufactured in Canada, the Canadian textile industry could have offered 20,000 more jobs than it does now.

Is it the intention of the government to give the death blow to the textile industry? It is time that those interested in this industry know what the situation is, and that as soon as possible.

When we consider the efforts made by management in this industry and its long-time investments in Canada, it seems desirable to limit imports so that the Canadian industry may rely on 70 per cent of the Canadian market. As I say, the Canadian industry does not want subsidies; it only wants to know whether the government really wants it to carry on. It is a very simple and straightforward question. It is time for the government, who has been beating around the bush for months, to stop doing so, in the best interests, not only of the industry but also of the workers and of their families to whom it provides their daily bread.

Is it really to much to ask the government to take the necessary steps in order to preserve one of our oldest industries? I do not think so.

I believe that it could be possible to allow this industry to provide more jobs, since, according to its own information, if it could be assured of a share representing 70 per cent of the Canadian market, it could, from now until 1975, guarantee 16,000 or 18,000 extra jobs.

Since the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) spends millions of dollars to promote new industries, it would probably be only logical to try, at least, to keep those already existing in this country. I believe that I am not asking too much and I wish the responsible minister, that is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), would tell the public, and this, as soon as possible, what the government policy towards the textile industry will be in the years to come.

[English]

Mr. Rud L. Whiting (Halton): Mr. Speaker, although it is a little over a month since the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) presented his budget, I expected to receive more comments than I did as I travelled through my constituency during the Easter recess.

Mr. Dinsdale: The people know it is no use commenting.

Mr. Whiting: It may be that the budget was received by the people as a sort of anticlimax, the minister having received his due share of public attention during the past few months. This is not to say that the budget that he presented did not parallel his previous budget as to the timeliness and appropriate measures which it contained. We are all aware that inflation was the No. 1 problem around which he had to build his budget. I think the government is to be commended for the introduction of credit controls.

I recently raised a question in the House on the indiscriminatory manner in which leading financial institutions and various companies engaged in retailing are distributing credit cards. I am pleased to see that the government is investigating the use of credit cards and the effect these cards are having on inflation. It is my contention that this credit could serve Canada far better if it were granted in order to increase the productivity and efficiency of this country. It is through increased productivity and efficiency that we will break the back of inflation, and not through the indiscriminate distribution of credit cards. I am thinking of the man, for example, who could be given the same credit with which to expand his plant, to buy more efficient machinery, to update his manufacturing methods to lower the cost of his products, thereby helping to beat inflation and also to create more jobs.

In the minister's reference to the economic prospects and fiscal outlook for the coming year he anticipates that the growth rate will be lower by between 1.5 per cent and 2 per cent than last year's rate of 4.8 per cent. While there will be an increase in employment, it will not keep pace with the growth of the labour force, resulting in an increase in unemployment. The latter is evident now. In this respect, in my opinion the record should be set straight. This government is not using unemployment as a tool to fight inflation, as implied by certain opposition members of this House and certain groups outside. No government, Mr. Speaker, could be so callous or cruel. I for one could not be party to such action.

To me, labour leaders today should show the same foresight as leaders in the business community did in co-operating with the Prices and Incomes Commission in trying to control price increases, instead of their present attitude of criticizing the government's attempt to fight inflation. We are all aware that every labour union in this country is an autonomous group. Nevertheless, the men who speak nationally for labour might well have endorsed in principle a policy of wage restraint during this critical period and in so doing displayed leadership to the men and groups they represent. Surely labour should be co-operating with the government and be thinking of the job security of their workers, because indeed, Mr. Speaker, if they do not inflation will continue and unemployment will increase in direct ratio to the rate of inflation.

Another matter I would like to bring to the attention of this House is a recent statement made by the Governor of the Bank of Canada, who stated that 7.75 million man-days were lost as a result of Canadian strikes in 1969. These strikes and the hardships they cause to the membership of the union, the business and the community involved are, in my opinion, another direct effect of inflation. Unless inflation is brought under control we can look for more strikes, more bitterness and more strain. So inflation is not only a dollars and cents proposition; it tears at the very fabric of Canadian life by dividing us in this way. So again I call upon labour to co-operate with the Prices and Incomes Commission in its efforts to control rising prices. This cannot help but improve employment conditions.

It is no secret, Mr. Speaker, that I represent the riding with the highest per capita income in Canada. This means that my constituents are presently carrying a better than average taxation load. So it is no wonder that they are most concerned by the effects the final version of the white paper will have on their lives.

I was pleased when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in his speech at a fund-raising dinner in Toronto, reassured the people of Canada that the white paper contained proposals only and the legislation which will ultimately be brought before this House will contain many of the suggested changes submitted by thoughtful people. I was pleased because this was an assurance to the people of Halton who have taken the time to make many worth-while suggestions that we will end up with a tax structure that will be fair and equitable. Although I have received a few "nut" letters, the majority of the hundreds I have received have been constructive and well thought out.

The great majority of these letters were primarily concerned with the deemed realization of capital gains every five years in equity ownership of widely held Canadian corporations and the elimination of the preferred tax rate on the first $35,000 of corporate earnings which would have its greatest effect on small companies. For example, the Oakville Chamber of Commerce in their letter to me stated that the deemed realization of shares in widely held Canadian corporations is discriminatory and elimination of the preferred tax would be punitive. However, I am happy to see that the Minister of Finance has already stated and has asked the committees studying the white paper to consider some method to offset the adverse effect that an increased tax would have on small companies.

I wish to make a suggestion to the members of the committees. I believe they should call in officials from the Industrial Development Bank when this proposal is being studied. I believe that the Industrial Development Bank could provide the committee with a lot of very useful information in this area, because they are dealing constantly with small businessmen and businessmen in general and they know their problems.

Other suggestions I received were concerned with the proposed capital gains tax on the appreciation in the value of homes and personal possessions. It was felt that it was unrealistic and should be changed. A $1,000 limit in Halton is not feasible because houses have appreciated $2,000 and more per year. I have the figures to prove this. I urge the committee to study this proposal very carefully because I hope it is not the government's intention to collect taxes on the sale of private homes. I hope it is not the intention to tax a man who, say, receives a promotion or wishes to upgrade his living standard and sells his old home at a capital gain in excess of $1,000 per year, plus the cost of repairs, to buy a more expensive home: Surely it is not the intention to penalize this individual. Many other letters dealt with the proposals to increase tax on earning from $10,000 to $20,000 per year.

If the legislation, when enacted, produces the surplus projected, I recommend to this House that this surplus be used to reduce the tax burden, rather than launching into any more universal welfare programs. I must say that most of my constituents are in favour of the principle of capital gains but do not agree that it be set at the same rate as that of income, and further, that should a capital gains tax become law, the estates tax should be substantially reduced or abolished.

I think that I have received a directive from my constituents through these letters and comments, and I believe this is the case with every member of this House. I therefore regard it as my duty as the member for Halton to express the views of my constituents and to represent these views in this House. The people of Halton have been genuine in their desire to play a part in participatory democracy. Many have written me more than once, clarifying and sometimes tempering their suggestions or strengthening the points they had made previously. I have met through their letters people in my riding whom I might never have been in contact with otherwise. It has been a warm experience in most cases, as have been the meetings I have attended. Courtesy by those who disagree has been impressive. I was pleased that my coupon mail showed that almost everyone knew their member's name. It was not because of my constituents that Mr. Brown lost his Ottawa post office.

I would now like to discuss a problem which is of vital concern to me and to many other members of this House. Over the past two years I have been called upon by three municipalities in my riding—Acton, Georgetown and Milton—which have received what might almost be termed ultimatums from our national railways. Canadian National Railways advised the town of Acton that they proposed to remove the agent and all railway business would be transacted from their Guelph master agency. I dealt with this in my maiden speech. Apparently, the CNR did not get the copy of Hansard I sent them because the station agent was subsequently removed.

The town of Georgetown has received word that certain passenger trains which have served the people of Georgetown for many years are to be discontinued. A hearing was held before the Railway Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission. This discontinuance of service will also affect the town of Acton. The town of Milton received word from Canadian Pacific Railway that it intended to curtail passenger train service in that community. Previously, four trains serviced Milton, but now this service has been cut in half. Canadian National Railways has long since discontinued passenger service here also.

It would appear that when either of the railways set upon a course of action there is little that can be done to stop them. It is true that hearings are held, but having attended and participated in the hearing held in Acton I am convinced it is little more than shadow-boxing. The communities have really no facilities at their disposal, while the railways appear with their pseudo experts armed with their slide rules and brief case loaded with data and statistics, but not necessarily relevant facts. It all looks very sincere, honest and impressive, but it always seems there is one thing overlooked—the people. Of course, standing up for the people is like being in favour of motherhood in the eyes of the commissioners. Nevertheless, there is something lost in the community when railroads take these actions. A way of life that has helped to make these communities a desirable place to live is being taken away. And further, these changes create many inconveniences. For example, the discontinuance of the trains in Georgetown will have a far-reaching impact upon the public's convenience and necessity for transportation service, particularly between Georgetown and Toronto. These trains are used by people who wish to travel back and forth between the two communities as well as by regular commuters.

We hear a lot today that we should guard with all our might against impeding the development of small business, but what about the small communities? Should we not have equal regard for them? I think we should. It would seem that in any decisions that are handed down by the Transport Commission, the benefits that would accrue to the railroads are always upheld. Of course, the plea of the railroads at any of these hearings is the need for economy, but are the railroads the only consideration in cases of this kind? I believe that decisions of this nature have broader implications and go far beyond the Canadian Transport Commission.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Our highways, for example, are being plugged with automobiles, and ways and means must be found to alleviate this situation. The cost of building highways is astronomical. Train service is one of the answers: this is proved by the Go train service running east and west out of Toronto. While highways are a matter of provincial jurisdiction, nevertheless this does not prevent the railways from co-operating with the provinces, with federal backing. The railways have played a dominant role in the building of Canada and they are responsible for the location of many of our present day communities. They have contributed to the prosperity of those communities. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker the railways have a new role to play. There is a growing transportation problem in this country and the railways must provide part of the solution. Highways cost money, and if the railways will lessen the need for highways, why should we demand that every branch line and every station has to pay its way? The federal government should have something to say. I believe it is time we had a national transportation policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whiting: Welfare, Mr. Speaker, is a part of any budget. Any way which can be found of reducing these charges means a reduction in taxes for all taxpayers. More than costs are involved. In my opinion, one of the greatest social injustices we have in Canada is that suffered by deserted wives and children. Not only does the husband who deserts throw the support of his family on the shoulders of the taxpayers, but he can run around Canada without responsibilities, having himself a fine old time. If he can be located, then our courts can take the necessary action to make him assume his share of the burden of raising his family and housing his wife. But I was surprised to find out how hard this location problem is for the wives.

Remember, these are women who are suddenly left alone, without means of support other than mothers' allowance paid by the province, of which the federal government pays half, and any welfare assistance they are able to secure. Her state of existence is surely one to wrench at your heartstrings. I recommend that hon. members who are not lawyers should take the time to talk to family court judges in their ridings and listen to them outlining the problems they face in trying to assist these deserted wives. I have had discussions with the provincial family court judge, Judge Kenneth Langdon, in my riding of Halton. I have also discussed this question with lawyers, social workers and police officials. They all agree that this is a pressing and serious problem.

Let me give the House an example of one case which occurred in my own constituency. A mother with four children, two of them of pre-school age, called me requesting some assistance in obtaining a Canada Manpower retraining course. Her husband would not give her any money to buy food for herself and her children; they were two months behind with the rent and other obligations; any day she expected to find the bailiff at her door. In order to put food on the table and clothe herself and the children she did housework, taking the two younger children with her. Her husband had found other interests which took most of his time and most of his money. A clerk-typist course was not the answer.

A court order was issued and the husband was made to pay a portion of his earnings to his wife in order that she might provide for herself and her children. This woman, in my opinion, was one of the more fortunate wives inasmuch as the family court knew where the husband could be found and where he was employed. What would have happened to this family had this man run off, say, somewhere out west? In this case, as in so many others, the wife had no money to enable her to trace her husband. He gets off scot-free except for the tax he pays on his earnings; the taxpayers would have had to support his deserted family.

Now just suppose there were some way to trace these types of men. No one would want to force them to return to their wives, even if the wives would have them. But the courts can and would make them bear their financial responsibilities. The results would be that welfare costs in all parts of Canada would drop. Indeed, they would be dramatically reduced, since the number of deserted families is much higher than is generally realized.

• (5:30 p.m.)

There would also be another advantage, not monetary but of real importance. The deserted family would no longer be on the welfare rolls. The sense of dignity for these women and children would be restored. They would be able to pay their way and hold their heads as high as they are entitled to do. For this reason I do not see this primarily as a taxation problem, although it is an expensive one. It is a "just society" action to find some way to locate these deserters effectively, economically and quickly.

Before I outline a possible solution to this problem of how to trace these husbands I want to emphasize two main points. First, in Ontario when fathers are separated from or leave their children, at the time funds are to be made available from provincial or local welfare agencies to buy food, clothing and to care for them they insist that a charge be laid against the husband under the Deserted Wives and Children Maintenance Act.

Second, where there are children under 16 separated from their fathers for whatever reason, the provincial judge in all cases makes an order ordering the father to support these children. Regardless of why a husband or father is living apart from the children, he is legally obliged to provide support. I should like to add that it is of deep concern to me that the obligation is only valid until the child reaches age 16. I believe that serious consideration should be given to raising this age limit.

In my opinion, when a provincial judge hands down an order that a deserting father or a deserting husband must make payment to his family for their support, and his whereabouts are not known, the judge should be able to request the most up-to-date information as to where the husband or father might be found. Here, Mr. Speaker, is where I believe the federal government could be of substantial assistance to the provinces. When a provincial family court judge would like to know the whereabouts of a husband or a father, he could notify an appropriate provincial department; for example, in Ontario it could be the Department of Social and Family Service. This department in turn could contact the federal government requesting the last known address of this husband and father in question. How much information is now available at the federal level is not known to me. However, I believe a pool of such information could be obtained from the Unemployment Insurance Commission, the Canada Pension Plan and other branches of government which might be used to provide this source of information.

If we put the two things together, the evasion of responsibility by individuals so that others have to pay and the reduction of the number of families on welfare, surely it would be in the interest of all Canadians, except those husbands who want to "live the life of Riley", if we were to examine this problem in depth. This is another area where the federal government could show leadership. I am sure this would receive the co-operation of all the provinces, the provincial family courts, welfare workers and every municipality, because they realize the seriousness of this problem. I would suggest, therefore, that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) include a recommendation to this effect in the white paper on social welfare which he proposes to present to this House in the near future; or perhaps this could be made the subject of separate action on his part.

I believe that some method of tracing these men could be found that would be practical, economical and which would not run counter to our Canadian way of life or our civil liberties. If we can liberalize, as we have done, the laws on abortion for the betterment of women, we must also be able to find a way to make a family court a place where something can be done for those women who so desperately look to the law to right their wrongs, instead of the way it is at present.

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in some of the remarks made by the preceding speaker, the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Whiting). I was particularly interested in what he had to say about the suggestion that has been made from this side of the House that this government is deliberately setting about to create unemployment. I am not sure that I got the hon. member's words correctly, but I believe he said he would not want to be part of a government that would deliberately set about to create unemployment.

Let me remind the hon. member that his leader, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), has said on television that if necessary he and the government which he heads is prepared to drive the unemployment figure to 6 per cent to curb inflation. In light of that statement and the remarks made by the hon. member, I wonder whether he would want to be a part of this government which would drive the unemployment figure to 6 per cent or more. I am sure, after what he has said this afternoon, that he would not want to support the Prime Minister and this government which would set out to achieve this aim, that is, to deliberately create unemployment to the point where it reached a national average of over 6 per cent.

I look at this budget as a Member of Parliament concerned—

Mr. Whiting: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. After listening to the remarks made by my hon. friend, I wonder whether he realizes what the unemployment figure would be if the government did not attack inflation, which is the No. 1 problem in Canada today.

Mr. Fairweather: That is debate, not a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please.

Mr. Whiting: Where would the unemployment figure go?

Mr. Carter: Mr. Speaker, I am more concerned with what has happened in the past year and how the unemployment figure has been driven up because of this government's phony war on inflation. I can understand the hon. member's lack of concern for unemployment because, by his own admission a moment ago, he said he represents a riding that has the highest per capita income in Canada. I am not surprised to know that he is not too concerned with what is happening on the national scene with regard to unemployment.

Nor is the hon. member concerned about the deliberate attempt on the part of the government he supports to drive unemployment to the point where it has become almost unbearable to a large segment of our population, especially those 500,000 Canadians who have been forced to go on the rolls of the unemployed. This is the result of the heartless and cruel policies of the government which he supports, which has deliberately driven the unemployment figure to the point it has now reached.

I look at this budget as a Member of Parliament concerned with Canada as a whole and as a Member of Parliament with particular interest in and a duty to the constituency of St. John's West. From whatever point I view it, it is something like a cat that was dragged in. As I said before, we have a government which has deliberately set out to create unemployment. As if it is not enough that it should set out deliberately to force men out of jobs and onto the unemployment rolls, this government has the brazen gall to brag about it. We have heard the Prime Minister say that if necessary he is prepared to see the unemployment figure go to 6 per cent. We have heard the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) make similar remarks. As I said before, not only is the government taking this stand and adopting this policy with that effect, but it has the gall to brag about it.

It is perfectly obvious to most of us, and indeed to most Canadians, that the economic policies of this government as represented by the Budget at this stage guarantees no assurance of success and no assurance that it can beat inflation without ruinous results. It is also perfectly clear from the Budget address that inflation is not being licked. We have no better evidence of that than the evidence given by the Minister of Finance. He forecast a reduction in the real growth of the gross national product of 3 per cent this year. The major consequence of this lower growth rate is an unemployment level ranging over the year at 6 per cent.

During the past two years much has been made of the fact that this government was elected on the charisma of the Prime Minister who made no promise except to build a just society. It is quite obvious to this House and to the majority of Canadians that the Prime Minister did not keep that promise. In fact, he has done just the opposite; he has built an unjust society. Obviously the government is anxious to keep the Prime Minister's Christmas promise of a 6 per cent unemployment figure. This, of course, means much higher levels in the low-growth areas and in areas which are subject to seasonal employment fluctuations.

In this country and during this decade a federal government budget is of immense importance. By experience and common sense, and because of a desire to do great and noble things, the people of this country have given our government vast fiscal and monetary powers. The government does not have these powers for petty reasons. Generous and talented people have charged the government with the task of leading us in shaping a fulfilled society. Essentially, the policy of Canada is the pursuit of common goals to end uncertainty, to end poverty, to moderate the causes of strife, to help Canada grow, to improve and make things work, and to keep the country and make it ours.

In diverse expression these common goals are being sought by 21 million people. My colleagues and I consider it our right and responsibility to judge the present government's budget in terms of these energetic, national goals. It is from this standpoint that we condemn this budget of the Liberal government. Frankly, we hold the opinion and the suspicion that good government in Canada is somewhere in exile.

In terms of historic experience, the reduced growth of our gross national product and higher unemployment should have a substantial dampening effect on inflationary tendencies, but in Canada today we have a different situation. Prices and wages still continue to increase to what the Minister of Finance calls unacceptable levels. The meaning, of course, is unmistakable. Despite a downturn in the economy and higher unemployment, the inflationary forces at work in the economy are not yielding. The minister admits in his statement that it is particularly hazardous to try to make any forecast of price and income changes in the balance of this year.

This inflation has not disappeared as it should have. The government's restrictive fiscal and monetary policies have not budged it. Prices keep on rising. The interesting question we must ask ourselves—I am sure most Canadians are asking it—is what the situation will be six months from now, with unemployment running at deliberately increased levels in order to produce a slack in demand while inflation is still continuing at or near the present level.

The minister is confronted with a dilemma for which so far he has no answer except to pray that the Prices and Incomes Commission will have an impact on the economy. So far the results do not appear to indicate that is likely to be forthcoming. The Prices and Incomes Commission, as laudable an effort as it may be, has not at all shown that it can achieve price stability in the economy. It has no teeth and no power to force labour to enlist in the anti-inflation fight. In fact, the budget speech notes that there will be difficult wage negotiations this year with perhaps several costly, prolonged strikes. This, again, is an outright admission by the minister that costs, and consequently prices, will continue to escalate in 1970.

[Mr. Carter.]

In a return tabled in this House some time ago it was very interesting to note that the co-chairmen of the Prices and Incomes Commission are being paid $40,000 a year. As the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) would say, they have won their war on poverty. I think the half million people out of work in this country, many of them forced to be jobless by a cruel and heartless government which deliberately creates unemployment, will be heartened to know the men working for them to keep prices down and spike the inflationary psychology are doing very well at $40,000 a year.

It is quite obvious that as a result of the present policies of this government unemployment will continue to be very high. Inflation apparently will continue. Will the answer simply be even more tightening of the screw? How much unemployment is socially or politically acceptable in the name of beating inflation? The Minister of Finance, on CTV's Question Period show, said that higher unemployment may be necessary if we are really to beat inflation. This is a shocking statement. I would refer also to the remarks of the hon. member for Halton who a moment ago expressed the opinion that he would not want to be a part of any government that would deliberately set about to create unemployment.

The record will show that the Minister of Finance on this CTV program did admit that it may be necessary to increase unemployment in order to beat inflation. I think there is in Canada a great deal of sympathy for the Minister of Finance. I believe he has shown some real determination to beat inflation. I am sure he has taken some very serious political risk. So far, however, his policy has not done the job. The minister's speech implies that if it does not work in the next six months, at the moment he does not have any better ideas. It is quite obvious that the minister and his leader, the Prime Minister, and indeed the government as a whole are gambling on a theory that may or may not work. I think this is a very serious matter, because in so doing he is inflicting a lot of suffering, perhaps unnecessary suffering, on the Canadian public, on the taxpayers and on our working force. I feel this is a very serious and dangerous course on which the government has embarked.

For the sake of Canada and our unemployed I hope this policy will work, but like my colleagues and most other Canadians I have very grave doubt whether the government's anti-inflationary policy will prove to be in the best interests of Canada and will indeed work as it has planned. It would appear to be pretty obvious that there will be another budget this fall. The indicators at this point suggest that even sterner measures will be taken. The minister's measures have not worked to date. They are not likely to work any better in the next six months. The minister will be back here in the House with another budget. He will be pouring on more restraints and taxes. I believe the unemployment figure must not be allowed to increase even further in order to help the minister prove his point that the policies he has adopted and those of his colleagues in the cabinet will have the desired effect of beating the inflation which we have in Canada at this time.

I should like to make a few remarks about the consumer credit controls proposed by the minister. How effective will these controls really be? The 20 per cent down payment and the 24 months' period for repayment are not very far from normal practice. Even the minister's own advisers are sceptical of his estimate that the effect will be to reduce consumer spending by about $400 million. The people in the credit business estimate the figure to be only about half that. What is $400 million, anyway? If that figure is accurate, consumer spending in Canada in 1970 will be about $49 billion instead of $49.4 billion.

The potential loopholes in the program envisaged by the minister are innumerable. The minister says he does not expect any buying spree in the next few weeks before the controls are imposed. I am sure we can all visualize dealers in some of the remote parts of Canada who are saddled with large surplus stocks offering in the next few weeks no down payment and seven years to pay if for no reason other than to move their stock.

These controls on credit will hurt the people who contribute least to inflation. The Prime Minister told reporters outside the House last week that this measure would protect the little guy. I say that is hogwash. It will not protect the little guy; it will make things much tougher for him in trying to obtain employment to earn enough to keep body and soul together and to retain his independence.

As I have said, the program appears to be full of loopholes. In fact, the government appears not to have thought about the details of the program at all. There are dozens of ways in which the program could be circumvented, and the government has not really built up much legal justification for the controls, which might prevent a constitutional challenge from the provinces.

So we have a government that has quite obviously embarked on a policy of which they are not too sure. They are not convinced in their own minds that the policy to curb inflation on which they have embarked will work. They are gambling with the lives and the livelihood of the Canadian people, the average working man in Canada. By their own admission they have set about to deliberately create unemployment, hoping that this will have the desired effect of curbing inflation. I am convinced, and I am sure that many Canadians will agree with me, that they are wrong.

Their policy, which has been pretty well adopted right across the board, according to which the "have not" provinces are being forced to take the same medicine as the "have" provinces, where the people in the economically depressed areas of Canada are being forced to take the same medicine as that dished out to the better off provinces, is wrong too.

I should inform the minister that in my province of Newfoundland there is no sign of inflation. Inflation down there is pretty well a foreign word. Unemployment is probably at its highest peak since Confederation. At present it is estimated to be approaching the 22 per cent mark. The national unemployment figure rose to 6.5 per cent, while in the Atlantic region it is 11 per cent or 12 per cent. There are provinces, such as the one which I have the honour to represent where the unemployment figure is reported to approach the 22 per cent level. This has been brought about largely by the government's illogical policy with regard to inflation and its attempts to curb inflation.

I am convinced, and I am sure other members will agree, that while we have inflation in certain areas of Canada, we should not penalize people in the depressed areas, which is what is happening. I think the Premier of Nova Scotia was right when he said that the present government's policy can be likened to a family in which one child is sick but the entire family is being forced to take the same medicine. In Canada there are certain areas where inflation is present, but we should not impose the same restrictions and policies on the "have not" or economically depressed areas where inflation is a foreign word.

This government must accept its responsibilities to all the regions of Canada and must make good its promise to bring an end to regional disparity. In the past couple of years we have heard much talk about the Prime Minister's so-called just society. We have heard much talk about bringing an end to regional disparity. But so far we have seen very little action. I grant that certain measures are being taken by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to help some of the "have not" areas in Canada, including the Atlantic region; but I am not convinced that these measures will be sufficient to bring about an end to disparity and to bring the "have not" areas of Canada up to a level where they can enjoy the status of first-class citizens.

In Canada a large number of people do not enjoy the status of first-class citizens. I can think of a large segment of our population in Newfoundland which does not enjoy the rights and the status of first-class Canadians. Until such time as Canada can give all its people equal rights and equal opportunities, I do not think we can boast of the influence that we have in certain parts of the nation and say that all our citizens are being treated alike and enjoy the status of first-class citizens.

Many measures have been taken by the government in recent months that have had a detrimental effect on the provinces. We have seen the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans) close down a large number of post offices. The argument that he is using is that it is cheaper to initiate the rural delivery system than to maintain the present post offices in various parts of Canada, especially in my riding of St. John's West. I think the Postmaster General's policies are wrong. I think time will prove that the system he is now trying to inaugurate will eventually cost more than it would have cost to retain our present post offices and the system under which a large number of the smaller outports in Newfoundland, and indeed in the west of Canada operate.

I would liken the Postmaster General to someone who is groping in the dark and who is trying to find an answer to some of the problems that are obviously facing his department. I do not think that the elimination of post offices in Canada—and I can speak with some authority for my riding—is the answer, and time will prove that the Postmaster General is wrong.

In the matter of the fishery, which of course is very important in the Atlantic areas of Canada, we have serious problems.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member because it is six o'clock. This house stands adjourned until 2 p.m. tomorrow.

At 6 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

Arctic Pollution Legislation

Following is text of statement to be released by State dept at noon briefing Apr 15. Text begins.

Last week the Cdn govt introduced in the House of Commons two bills dealing with pollution in the arctic, fisheries and the limits of the territorial sea. The enactment and implementation of these measures would affect the exercise by the USA and other countries of the right to freedom of the seas in large areas of the high seas and would adversely affect our efforts to reach innatl agreement on the use of the seas.

The bills seek to establish pollution zones in arctic waters up to 100 miles from every point of cdn coastal territory above the 60th parallel. Within these zones, cda would assert the right to control all shipping, to prescribe standards of vessel construction, navigation and operation, and to prohibit, if CDA deemed it necessary, the free passage of vessels in those waters. Additionally, the legislation seeks to authorize the establishment of exclusive CDN fisheries in areas of the high seas beyond 12 miles, such as the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the Bay of Fundy, and of a 12-mile territorial sea off CDAs coasts.

Innatl law provides no/no basis for these proposed unilateral extensions of jurisdictions on the high seas, and the USA can neither accept nor acquiesce in the assertion of such jurisdiction.

We are concerned that this action by CDA if not/not opposed by us, would be taken as precedent in other parts of the world for other unilateral infringements of the freedom of the seas. If CDA had the right to claim and exercise exclusive pollution and resources jurisdiction on the high seas, other countries could assert the right to exercise jurisdiction for other purposes, some reasonable and some not/not, but all equally invalid according to innatl law, merchant shipping would be severely restr, and naval mobility would be seriously jeopardized. The potential for serious innatl dispute and conflict is obvious.

The USA has long sought innatl solutions rather than natl approaches to problems involving the high seas. We are working for appropriate action within the UN framework looking toward the conclusion of a new innatl treaty dealing with the limit of the territorial sea, freedom of transit through and over innatl straits and defining preferential fishing rights for coastal states on the high seas.

We are also seeking new innatl means for controlling pollution on the high seas. Last fall 47 countries, including the USA and CDA, participated in the preparation of two innatl conventions establishing the right of a coastal state to take certain ltd anti-pollution measures against vessels on the high seas, and also imposing strict liability upon the owners of vessels responsible for pollution. These conventions which the USA has recently signed were concluded under UN auspices at BRU. Other innatl approaches to control of pollution are underway at NATO and the UN. Moreover, the USA is acutely aware of the peculiar ecological nature of the arctic region, and the potential dangers of oil pollution in that area. The arctic is a region important to all nations in its unique environment, its increasing significance as a world trade route and as a source of natural resources. We believe the arctic beyond natl jurisdiction should be subject to innatlly agreed rules protecting its assets, both living and non-living, and have noted with pleasure the CDN Prime Ministers public statement that CDA would be prepared to enter into multilateral efforts to develop agreed rules of environmental protection. To this end, we intend shortly to ask other interested states to join in an innatl conference designed to establish rules for the arctic beyond natl jurisdiction by innatl agreement. We would be pleased if CDA were to join us in organizing such a conference.

We regret that the CDN govt, while not/not excluding these cooperative innatl approaches to our mutual problems involving the oceans, now proposes to take unilateral action to assert its own jurisdiction and establish its own rules pending the conclusion of innatl agreements satisfactory to it. For the reasons indicated earlier the USA cannot/not accept these unilateral jurisdictional assertions and we have urged the CDN govt to defer making them effective while cooperating in efforts promptly to reach innatlly agreed solutions.

If, however, the CDN govt is unwilling to await innatl agreement, we have urged that in the interest of avoiding a continuing dispute and undermining our efforts to achieve innatl agreement, that we submit our differences regarding pollution and exclusive fisheries jurisdiction beyond 12 miles to the innatl court of justice, the forum where disputes of this nature should rightfully be settled. CDAs action last week excluded such disputes from its acceptance of the innatl courts compulsory jurisdiction. However, such action only prevents CDA from being forced into the court. It does not/not preclude CDA voluntarily joining with us in submitting these disputes to the court or an appropriate chamber of the court.

With respect to the 12-mile limit on the territorial sea, we have publicly indicated our willingness to accept such limit, but only as part of an agreed innatl treaty also providing for freedom of passage through and over innatl straits.

The history of US-CDN relations is unique in world affairs for its closeness and co-operation. We are confident that, in this spirit, our two countries will continue to resolve our differences amicably and with mutual understanding. Text ends.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

TABLING OF REPORT ON THIRD MEETING OF CONSTITUTIONAL CONFERENCE

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table copies in English and in French of the report of the third meeting of the constitutional conference held in Ottawa in December last.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT INCREASE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion under Standing Order 43 and I base my reason for requesting unanimous consent on the following facts: during March unemployment in Canada increased from 6.5 per cent to 6.7 per cent of the work force, the culmination of a steady rise during the past several months.

What is particularly alarming is the government's expressed intention to continue to deliberately increase unemployment as a means of combating inflation, despite the fact that it has now become clear that unemployment is the most serious problem facing the economy. High interest rates have slowed down the economic activity which provides employment, and the government has refused to have the Bank of Canada take the lead in gradually lowering interest rates so that economic activity and employment may increase to a satisfactory level.

I therefore move the following motion under Standing Order 43:

That this House, comprising the elected representatives of all of the people of Canada, consider and recommend effective steps to stimulate economic activity, and thereby increase employment to a satisfactory level.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed for consideration by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings. Under the terms of Standing Order 43 unanimous consent of the House is necessary. Is there such agreement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is no unanimity and the hon. member's motion cannot be put.

• (2:10 p.m.)

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT INCREASE

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the unemployment situation in Canada revealed in the Dominion Bureau of Statistics report released this morning showing 542,000 Canadians unemployed and a national unemployment rate of 6.7 per cent, which is the highest unemployment rate since March, 1964. The serious continuing unemployment problem in Canada has now reached a critical level and the House should now adjourn to discuss this vitally important matter.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands has served the required notice of his intention to move the adjournment of the House under the provisions of Standing Order 26. The House is aware, of course, that similar motions have been proposed from time to time in recent months suggesting emergency debates to discuss either rising unemployment or the rising cost of living. The last such motion dealing specifically with unemployment was made by the hon. member for York South and there again it was based on unemployment figures released by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. Even if I have every possible sympathy with the hon. member with respect to the motion he has just proposed, I doubt very much that the ruling of the Chair at this time can differ from the one which was made in connection with the last similar motion.

On that occasion I reviewed the authorities and the precedents on the subject, and did so at length. In particular, reference was made to a series of rulings by Mr. Speaker Mitchener and to subsequent similar rulings. My conclusion was expressed in the following words:

> The Chair recognizes readily that the motion raises a matter which is of importance and urgency. I am sure it is of important concern to all hon. members of the House. However, a careful and objective interpretation of the relevant Standing Order cannot, in my view, justify the acceptance at this time of the hon. member's motion.

I am sure the hon. member will appreciate the difficulty with which the Chair is faced in a situation such as this one. I am sure many arguments could be advanced for such a debate at this time. But the Chair has to make a procedural ruling and, with regret, I have come to the conclusion that the ruling which was made on an earlier situation such as this one must stand and that the motion cannot be accepted for debate at this time.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

LABOUR CONDITIONS

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO COPE WITH INCREASED UNEMPLOYMENT—CONSUMER CREDIT REGULATIONS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of the unemployment figures just released by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics for the period ending March 21. I ask the Prime Minister whether, in light of these figures, his government would now stop the measures it is taking deliberately to slow down the economy and, on the contrary, take some measures to encourage an increase in employment? I ask him to consider this very earnestly because the number now out of work, 542,000, is higher than the annual figure during the last three years of the great pre-war depression.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): What is that again?

Mr. Stanfield: The number of Canadians out of work now, according to this figure, is higher than the number of those out of work during the last three years of the great pre-war depression.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not see much to be gained by making these comparisons with earlier dates because we would only have to compare the figures now with 1961 and 1962 to realize that we are doing twice as well as the opposition, when in government, was doing at that time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: The question remains very serious for the present time, Mr. Speaker, and the only way I can answer is by saying that of course these figures are a very regrettable side effect, which has been discussed before in the House, of the government's fight against inflation. We all remember that a very few months ago the opposition parties were saying that the government was not doing enough about inflation. We indicated that our approach—

An hon. Member: Don't blame us.

Mr. Trudeau: —to the problem was dependent upon the voluntary co-operation of all sectors of the economy and that the faster that came about the less the risk of increasing unemployment. The only comment I can add to show that the effect of our policies has not been as predicted by the opposition is that, if we compare the figures today with those of last fall, there has at least been a falling off in the rate of unemployment in the Atlantic provinces and the province of Quebec, which indicates that the government's anti-inflationary policies are not having the hard side effects which had been predicted for the less favoured provinces.

Mr. Speaker: The Leader of the Opposition, a supplementary question. Order, please. I regret to interrupt the Leader of the Opposition but the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising out of the remarks of the right hon. Prime Minister. Perhaps unintentionally he conveyed to the House information which is not in accordance with the facts when he indicated that the Atlantic provinces have a rate of unemployment which is not higher than that of the fall of 1969 during which period the figure was 8 per cent. The figures released this morning, though they are a dilution of the actual unemployment, indicate that unemployment in Newfoundland is 15.3 per cent, the most serious it has had since it became a Canadian province—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member. I would not think that is a question of privilege. He has made his point in any event and I am sure—

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, he has made his point but I cannot make an answer.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: You must not interrupt the Speaker, Mr. Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Is it the policy of the government that it is necessary to maintain unemployment at these levels in order to conduct an effective fight against inflation? I ask this question, Mr. Speaker, in view of the grave dissatisfaction that the current policies of the federal government are giving to the Liberal leader in Quebec, Mr. Bourassa.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is no. The second part of the question can be answered by saying this is irrelevant.

An hon. Member: Bourassa is irrelevant. You are so right.

Mr. Stanfield: One further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the only apparent reason for the government proceeding with its proposed consumer credit regulations would be to slow down the economy further, is it the intention of the government to proceed with this measure announced by the Minister of Finance in his budget despite these catastrophic levels of unemployment that have been disclosed by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I undertake to convey to the Minister of Finance that the Leader of the Opposition is suggesting he cease to fight against inflation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Don't be so stupid.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, it will be of little comfort to the 542,000 unemployed that conditions were worse ten years ago. In view of the fact that the government's anti-inflation program has not succeeded in stabilizing prices, since the cost of living according to the latest figures increased during the month of March compared with February, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if the government is considering changing its fight against inflation and beginning to do something about the problem of unemployment by proceeding with expansionist policies?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I take it that if the hon. member feels it is irrelevant what the figures were ten years ago he should also see that it is irrelevant what the figures were 25 years ago. This is the point I was answering.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister has not answered my question so I will see if he will answer my question in a previous supplementary. In view of the fact that the unemployment figure is worse in some areas of Canada than in others, particular in the Maritimes where it is 10.8 per cent, in Quebec where it is 9.2 per cent and in British Columbia where it is 7 per cent, is the government planning to adjust its anti-inflation program on a regional basis so as to alleviate the situation in those areas of Canada which are worst affected by unemployment?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, this gives me occasion to disagree with the facts as they were stated earlier by another member. The September, 1969, figure for the Atlantic provinces of seasonally adjusted unemployment was 8.5 per cent; now it has fallen to 6.9 per cent. The Quebec figure was 7.8 per cent and it has fallen now to 6.7 per cent.

Mr. Hees: What are the regular, straight unemployment figures? Let us have a little honesty.

Mr. Trudeau: Honesty would be of no avail if you are not intelligent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will come to the hon. member in a moment. I believe the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands wishes to ask a supplementary question.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in my supplementary I merely wish to ask the Prime Minister whether, instead of playing with the figures of last September or ten years ago, he would answer my question. Since unemployment figures are much worse in some regions of Canada than in others, does the government plan to adjust its anti-inflationary programs on a regional basis so as to alleviate conditions in those areas which are most adversely affected by unemployment?

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, the point I was making about comparing the figures relating to last fall with those of today was to indicate precisely that the thrust of our anti-inflation fight had not hit those provinces that are poorest and in which unemployment is highest. Precisely in those provinces unemployment has fallen over the past several months, which indicates that, difficult though the fight against inflation is, it has hit those less favoured provinces less than the more favoured provinces.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Lundrigan: Yes, Mr. Speaker. If the Prime Minister is allowed to present false information to the House, as he has, then we might as well give up the fight against inflation. Forget about your seasonally adjusted figures. The rate for one province on the east coast is up to 15.3 per cent, the highest in 20 years. The information the Prime Minister is presenting to the House today is not in accordance with the facts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, since the Prime Minister is advancing his arguments in favour of his anti-inflation policy, has his attention been directed to the words of the Liberal leader in Quebec, Mr. Robert Bourassa, who had the blessing of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion? He has said that he strongly condemns the federal government's anti-inflation program and that its fiscal policy is dictated by mandarins operating in a closed circuit—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. gentleman knows that I have to interrupt him on procedural grounds. Perhaps he might ask his question directly.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, I take it that although the Prime Minister never reads the newspapers—

An hon. Member: Let us have the question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —he has read what Mr. Bourassa said.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has Mr. Bourassa brought to the Prime Minister's attention his criticisms and is he justified in stating that if he wins the election these anti-inflation policies will be changed?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. member asked me if my attention has been drawn to this. The answer, of course, is yes. It was drawn to my attention by the Leader of the Opposition, to whom the right hon. member obviously does not listen, in the first question today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I always admire a witticism. Sometimes I believe the Prime Minister does qualify as a wit but I am beginning to think I am only half right—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister, but before I ask my question could I answer a question put by him?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have enough trouble now without the hon. member answering questions. I believe the hon. member has a supplementary.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I couldn't quite hear because there was so much noise. I take it I have the right to point out a couple of facts to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's assumption is incorrect. He can ask a question but not point out facts. If he has a supplementary, he has the floor.

Mr. Hees: It just shows you cannot win them all, Mr. Prime Minister—Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: My supplementary question to the Prime Minister is: In light of the unemployment figures made available today, does he agree that the No. 1 problem facing the economy is unemployment? Will he therefore take the lead in asking the Bank of Canada to lead the way in steadily reducing interest rates so that economic activity can be accelerated and employment provided for our people?

Mr. Trudeau: A few months ago, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asked the same question. The only difference in the question is that the word "unemployment" is now being used instead of "inflation". He asked if inflation was not the No. 1 problem. We followed his lead and took it as the No. 1 problem. He is now changing his mind.

Mr. Hees: The Prime Minister obviously has a static mind. Things change pretty fast in a country like Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: Unemployment is the No. 1 problem and it is up to the Prime Minister to take some action.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Was the Prime Minister aware, when he gave the House the seasonally adjusted figure for September, 1969, that it is not proper to compare a seasonally adjusted figure in September with one in March? Has he, as he ought to have, noticed that the actual figure in the Atlantic provinces in September, 1969, was 4.9 per cent as against an actual figure today of 10.8 per cent of the work force? Was the Prime Minister trying to give the House information in answer to a question or was he trying to confuse the House and the people of Canada as to the unemployment situation?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether the second part of the supplementary is in order. Perhaps the Prime Minister may wish to reply to the first part of the question asked by the hon. member for York South.

Mr. Trudeau: I am glad to join the argument at this time, Mr. Speaker. I think the whole purpose of having seasonally adjusted figures is precisely in order to permit comparison between unemployment in different seasons. Therefore it was perfectly proper and correct to compare the seasonally adjusted figures for September with those for March. As a matter of fact, it is the only way to compare figures for different seasons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I will not follow the argument or exchange that has just been started. People who know anything about economics will know what to think about what the Prime Minister has said. Aside altogether from these comparisons, in view of the fact that there is inevitably a time-lag between the introduction of economic policies, whether expansionist or contractionist, and the effect those policies will eventually have on the unemployment situation, will the Prime Minister undertake to the House and the people of Canada that the government will immediately introduce expansionist policies in the hope that at least six or nine months from now the unemployment situation may be improved?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker.

UNEMPLOYMENT INCREASE—REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION INITIATIVES

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I will not direct my question to the Prime Minister because he appears to be in need of more staff. My question is to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion who is being asked by the government to defy the law of gravity. Has his department been given authority through the policies of the government to exercise new and special initiatives in the slow growth areas of this nation in order to overcome the strangling effect of the tremendous increase in unemployment to the point where one province has 15.3 per cent unemployment, even though this is a dilution of the actual unemployment figure?

Inquiries of the Ministry

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, we are beginning to feel the benefits of the programs of which I am responsible. The agreements with the provinces are about to be signed. Those are the only tools available to me to reduce regional disparities. I have every reason to believe that they will be effective to allow normal development of slow growth areas in order to fight unemployment.

[English]

UNEMPLOYMENT INCREASE—RATIFICATION OF SPECIAL AREAS PROGRAM AGREEMENTS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): In view of the fact that agreements in connection with the special areas program have been signed, and bearing in mind the alarming unemployment figures shown in the latest returns from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, can the minister tell the House why the government of Canada has refused to ratify these agreements to date?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, nobody has refused to ratify agreements. This matter will be settled by competent government agencies. I hope this will be done in the next few days. I cannot think of any means which would be faster at this time to remedy the problem of unemployment in underdeveloped regions than the programs we have prepared, and even if I were to draft a new policy, several months would likely go by before its adoption by the House. Moreover, I have every reason to believe that we have at least a certain influence on this unfortunate situation.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: Yesterday, in the course of the consideration of the estimates of his department, the minister indicated that the agreements with New Brunswick and Newfoundland were being held up by the Treasury Board. Can he not exercise some influence over this branch of the government of which he is a member in order that this program, which is of such importance to the two provinces I have mentioned, may be speedily approved?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I did not say the agreements were held up by Treasury Board. I said they were before Treasury Board.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker—

[Mr. Lundrigan.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I recognize how important this matter is, but perhaps we should given an opportunity to others to ask questions. I shall try to return to the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate in a few moments, but for the time being the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Vancouver East.

POLLUTION

LOANS TO CANADIAN MUNICIPALITIES AND COMPANIES FOR PURCHASE OF ANTI-POLLUTION EQUIPMENT

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister. At approximately noon today members of the House of Commons received in their post office boxes a bulletin from the Export Development Corporation announcing the signing of an agreement between the corporation and the Socialist Republic of Roumania concerning the purchase by that country of pollution control equipment. Eighty per cent of the sale price of this equipment will be guaranteed by Canada. Is it the intention of the government to grant to municipalities, industry and private enterprise generally in Canada the benefits of a similar 80 per cent loan in connection with the purchase of their pollution control equipment?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Those are the facts indeed. The contract referred to was signed yesterday, and we are delighted with it. As to offering similar terms to Canadian industry, let me say there are already some advantages extended to Canadian companies under present taxation regulations in connection with the purchase of anti-pollution equipment.

Mr. Winch: Will the minister inform us whether or not he intends to consider granting similar loans of 80 per cent to industry in Canada, as is being done for other countries purchasing pollution control equipment?

Mr. Pepin: I understand that concessions in this area were announced in the last budget presented by the Minister of Finance, and that the cost of these facilities may be written off over two years.

An hon. Member: It is not in force yet.

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

POLICY FOLLOWING FOURTH REPORT OF COMMISSION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): In the absence of the Secretary of State I will address this question to the Acting Secretary of State or to the Prime Minister. When does the government intend to announce its policy with regard to the recommendations contained in the fourth volume of the report of the Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism tabled yesterday?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Probably after we have announced our policy with regard to volume three.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: I see I had better direct my supplementary question to the Acting Secretary of State. In view of the statements made in volume four about the great contribution to cultural activities in this country made by ethnic groups other than French and English, will the Secretary of State review the present spending policy under which between $60 million and $70 million is provided in connection with bilingualism and biculturalism compared with a paltry few thousand dollars to advance the cultural activities of other ethnic groups?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Acting Secretary of State): That kind of review will be made, Mr. Speaker. I might say, though, that the expenditure to which the hon. member has referred in connection with the promotion of bilingualism applies to all Canadians and is for their benefit equally.

Mr. Baldwin: Would the hon. gentleman read again the estimates which provide for the expenditure of these moneys, amounting to between $60 million and $70 million He will find they refer to the French and English cultures. I am referring to the cultural activities of other ethnic groups.

Mr. Stanbury: Yes. And I was referring to the fact that the advantages of bilingualism, and the assistance extended to Canadians to learn one or both of the official languages are to the benefit of all Canadians.

POLLUTION

ALLOCATION OF FUNDS TO CLEAR UP CANADIAN SIDE OF GREAT LAKES

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It arises out of the commitment by President Nixon yesterday to devote approximately $70 million of federal funds to cleaning up the United States side of the Great Lakes. Does the government of Canada intend to commit federal funds to cleaning up the Canadian side?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The situation on the Canadian side is not identical to that on the United States side where there is a heavier population and more intensified industry which has been operating over a longer period of time. The pollution problem there is probably more grievous. We have meetings arranged for the 24th of this month, I believe, with the Assistant Secretary of the Interior for water to discuss our mutual concern in connection with boundary waters. I believe that through such consultations we can achieve co-ordination of the efforts on both sides.

Mr. Aiken: I take it the answer to my question is no. Would the minister agree that as a result of the introduction of amendments to the Fisheries Act, the introduction of the Northern Inland Waters Act, and the absence of any federal commitment under the Canada Water Act, the Canada Water Act is now obsolete even before it has been passed?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will recognize that his question is argumentative. Perhaps he would like to rephrase the question, if he has a supplementary to ask. For the moment the Chair recognizes the hon. member for Simcoe North.

AIR—ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL SCIENTIFIC CENTRE

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): My question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the serious menace of air pollution, which outstanding authorities estimate is contributing to 50 per cent of all illness, and the fact that there is no centre of scientific knowledge in Canada which could direct any attack on pollution, I should like to ask the minister whether he has any plans to set up such a national centre to combat air pollution?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I do not believe the premise of the hon. member's question to be correct. We have set up in the Department of National Health and Welfare an air pollution division with an expanded staff to undertake the type of program and research to which the hon. member has referred.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Rynard: I want to refer to what Dr. Solandt before the committee—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not want to interrupt the hon. member, but perhaps he would ask a supplementary question rather than refer to what has been said by the gentleman he has just mentioned.

Mr. Rynard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister take into consideration the statement made by Dr. Solandt, an outstanding scientist, that there is no such centre?

Mr. Munro: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

ESTABLISHMENT OF OVER-ALL ENVIRONMENTAL COUNCIL

Mr. Len Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. Will he give consideration to the setting up of an over-all environmental council to co-ordinate the fight against all pollution of our environment?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I thank the hon. member for that very constructive suggestion and I will take it into consideration.

DEATH OR ILLNESS ATTRIBUTABLE TO PRESENCE OF MERCURY IN FISH

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that mercury, to an extent much above the point of human toleration, has been found to be present in fish that have been used for food for several months, and perhaps for several years, has the Department of National Health and Welfare any record of illness or death in Canada being attributed to mercury poisoning?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker, not to my knowledge. We work very closely on this matter with the Department of Fisheries, and if our inspectors find any fish that have any parts per million above permissible tolerances we communicate with fisheries and confiscate the fish in question.

MERCURY—WATER QUALITY STANDARDS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I have a related or a supplementary question that I should like to address to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. My question is supplementary to the one just asked as well as supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka.

In view of the potential danger that mercury threatens to our entire environment and the knowledge of such danger since the Japanese poisonings of 1950, is the government now planning to include mercury on its list of water quality standards?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the question of mercury pollution and its control at the federal level comes very largely under the department of my colleague the Minister of Fisheries. I do not believe that there is in contemplation an amendment to the Canada Water Act to include minerals such as mercury, as I believe these can be controlled effectively under the Fisheries Act. However, my colleague the Minister of Fisheries may want to add to my answer.

HOUSING

ACCELERATION OF HOUSE STARTS TO RELIEVE UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing. In view of the large number of unemployed and the very drastic reduction in unemployment that could be effected by an aggressive housing program, and in view of the sharp drop in housing starts, is the minister giving consideration to accelerating the program of new housing starts?
