Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that there will be an increased program of housing starts emanating from the application of the funds in the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation budget. The effect of these funds on housing starts statistics has not yet been felt, but in light of the rate of approvals now being made I think this will be noticed to be quite significant over the next two or three months. With regard to the flow of mortgage money from the private sector, we are having continuing consultation with my colleague the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Orlikow: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister any plans to accelerate the building of housing in the private sector, since housing starts are down by 50 per cent or more compared with the same period last year?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can comment any further or add to my previous answer.

REVIEW OF CEILING ON LOANS FOR STUDENT ACCOMMODATION

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister without Portfolio responsible for housing. In view of the fact that the reduced CMHC funds available for student housing this year will cover only the shortfall or deficit in student housing requirements last year, is it the intention of the government to review the new ceiling of $45 million which it established for student housing construction for 1970? I ask this question, Mr. Speaker, because the present ceiling on funds is restricting university enrolment plans and is about to force students to compete against those who would normally qualify—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, we did review this matter very carefully and it was with considerable regret that we found we were unable to provide more funds for student housing. Our decision was based on the fact that in comparison to low-income housing in other sectors of the market we had provided quite a sizeable proportion of our funds for student housing and had to make the hard choice of meeting priorities within an increased, but still restricted, budget.

Mr. Mazankowski: A further supplementary question. In view of the minister's answer, is it the intention of the government to develop, in co-operation with the universities, a long-term student housing policy?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, there is a special study going on with regard to student housing and future requirements for student housing. This study is being undertaken in conjunction and in co-operation with some universities.

URBAN AFFAIRS

STUDY OF PROBLEMS—ESTABLISHMENT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing. In view of the fact that housing involves the whole question of urban affairs, can the minister advise whether he has yet received the study on urban problems, with a view to making recommendations with respect to a national policy for our cities?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, that whole matter is under very active consideration by myself and my colleagues.

Mr. Alexander: A further supplementary question. In view of the minister's answer would he consider once the report is in his hands, placing the recommendations that come from the cabinet in a white paper so it can be studied by a standing committee on urban affairs?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, we are considering all kinds of options for making the information available to the House, to our colleagues in other governments and to the country at large.

SOCIAL SECURITY

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF WHITE PAPER

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that action in so many fields, including old age pensions and veterans pensions and allowances, depends upon the appearance of the government's white paper on social security, can the minister say whether the writing of this paper has yet been completed?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister use his good offices to expedite this work so that we can soon have this paper, which was promised last October in the Throne Speech?

Mr. Munro: I can only advise the hon. member that the government's position has not changed. As formerly stated, we expect to have the white paper before Parliament prior to the end of this session.

POST OFFICE

MONTREAL POSTAL DISPUTE—HIRING OF TRUCK DRIVERS—PROTECTION AGAINST VIOLENCE

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the

Inquiries of the Ministry

Minister of Communications. Now that the April 15 deadline has passed, would the minister tell the House whether the post office is taking on truck drivers in accordance with the Goldenberg report, and also whether anything is being done to protect the truckers from violence?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, we have always done the best we could to provide adequate security in this special situation. Today is April 16, and since the union has refused to abide by the recommendations of the Goldenberg report and the government's very generous proposals, we are in fact proceeding to implement the program of reorganization that we have in Montreal.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

IMPLEMENTATION OF WHITE PAPER PROPOSALS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Would he kindly advise the House whether, despite the widespread criticisms of the government's white paper on veterans affairs by the national veterans associations, it is now the decision of the government to proceed essentially with the proposals contained in that white paper?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should state that the white paper was extremely well received by most of the veterans associations. They appeared 19 times before the House of Commons Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs in order to improve some of the aspects of the white paper. I hope that soon this committee will produce its recommendations, and it will then be the task of the government to consider these recommendations.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): A supplementary question. Would the minister kindly tell the House whether the testimony of the deputy minister on April 7 represented the decision of the government?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will recognize that there are procedural difficulties about the question as asked.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Then, Mr. Speaker, I will rephrase it, if I may. Am I right in saying that the government has already arrived at this decision, as expressed by its representatives?

[Mr. Allmand.]

Mr. Dubé: Mr. Speaker, those who were present at the committee this morning had the answer from the minister.

TAXATION

SUGGESTED WITHDRAWAL OF WHITE PAPER ON REFORM

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which is a related one in the sense that it also concerns a white paper. Would the Prime Minister now agree to withdraw the white paper on tax reform in view of the fact that at this time in our industrial development as a nation we have large unemployment and the government's proposals are frightening away that investment and development which would create projects that would provide employment for those out of work?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I thank the hon. member for the suggestion, Mr. Speaker.

WHITE PAPER ON REFORM—ACTION OF SIMPSONS-SEARS IN HAVING EMPLOYEES SIGN FORM LETTERS

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question would be directed to the Minister of Finance if he were here, but perhaps I could direct it to the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister aware that Simpsons-Sears Limited of Toronto is preparing form letters opposing the white paper on taxation and seeking to have their employees sign such letters which the company will then forward to Members of Parliament? If he is aware of this, will he make some statement discouraging such action which is not likely to elicit a fair view from the people concerned?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Is the prolonged holiday in the south, on which the Prime Minister sent the Minister of Labour, the Prime Minister's plan for trying to plaster over the split in the cabinet which occurred due to the postal strike in Montreal, and when will the Postmaster General be allowed—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, just for information I ask the question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Frontenac-Lennox and Addington.

PUBLIC WORKS

BATH-MILLHAVEN PRISON—INDEPENDENT BUILDING INSPECTION REPORT

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works. Has he authorized an inspection and does he now have a report made by an independent expert building inspector pertaining to the Bath-Millhaven maximum security prison contract?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me this is the type of question which could be considered at the time of adjournment. If there is extreme urgency, the minister might like to reply briefly.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, there is a motion for production of papers on this very point in the name of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Alkenbrack: When may we expect the report, Mr. Speaker?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ESTABLISHMENT OF ARCTIC COMMAND POST —FACILITIES AT CHURCHILL

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence but because of his absence I shall direct it to the acting minister. In view of the government's announced intention to establish a military headquarters or base in northern Canada, could the minister assure the House that the very adequate facilities which now exist at Fort Churchill will be fully assessed and fully considered before the final decision is made?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is making a representation which he must assume will be considered.

AGRICULTURE

FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING AGENCIES—DELAY OF LEGISLATION PENDING STUDY OF TASK FORCE REPORT

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Did the minister receive a telegram today from the board of governors of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange urgently requesting that final consideration of Bill C-197 be held in abeyance until the final report of the agricultural task force is released and studied by the Standing Committee on Agriculture and the general public in order to provide and opportunity to relate all mutually relevant proposals? What was the minister's answer to this very important request?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not recall receiving it today. However, I shall inquire of my office. If it has been received I have not answered it. I should like to advise, however, that the report of the task force on agriculture will probably be available long before that bill has passed all stages and particularly the stage where it goes through the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

ARCTIC POLLUTION, TERRITORIAL SEA LIMITS —TABLING OF U.S. NOTE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretry of State for External Affairs if he is now in a position to say whether he will be tabling the note of protest from the United States in connection with Bill C-202 and Bill C-203. I ask this question, of course, in view of my understanding that we will be debating one of these bills this afternoon.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, today we replied to the note from the United States and raised with that government the question of whether it would have any objection to tabling. I have not yet had a reply. In any event I hope we will proceed with our discussion of this legislation not in the light of United States objections but in the light of Canadian interests.

Mr. Hees: What courage is that?

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs a simple, straightforward question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: It is a matter of opinion, but I suggest in all seriousness that if the Prime Minister of this country and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, sir, wish the business of the House to be conducted in an orderly way—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the Leader of the Opposition. I will allow him to ask a supplementary question, but I do not think we should anticipate the debate which will be taking place later this afternoon. This having been said, the Leader of the Opposition has the floor for a supplementary.

Mr. Stanfield: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I will always seek to co-operate with you, but I simply want to say very bluntly that with the kind of answers the Prime Minister has been giving and which the Secretary of State for External Affairs just gave it will be very difficult to proceed with the business of this House in an orderly way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

PUBLIC WORKS

SASKATCHEWAN—REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN PROJECTS TO IMPROVE ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the report by the Department of Manpower which notes that one of the reasons for increasing unemployment and migration of people from Saskatchewan is the decrease in public works spending, would the Prime Minister undertake to request the Minister of Public Works to take steps to increase public works projects in Saskatchewan in view of economic conditions there?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Public Works has already raised this point with me and we are discussing this eventuality.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members will have noticed that the question period expired a few minutes ago. Perhaps we might have two supplementaries, one from the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, in co-operation with you, sir, and due to the fact that the Prime Minister is not well prepared today I will wait until tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day. Order, please. Is the hon. member for York South rising on a point of order?

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I was going to ask Your Honour to permit me to ask a question supplementary to the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition with regard to the tabling of notes. It is a very brief question.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

ARCTIC POLLUTION, TERRITORIAL SEA LIMITS —PRESS RELEASE ON CANADIAN NOTE

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in view of the fact that he is not in a position to table the notes passed between the governments of Canada and the United States, whether he has issued any kind of press release or communiqué about the reply Canada has sent to the United States administration and, if so, could he table a copy of that communiqué?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I said in reply to the Leader of the Opposition, we replied to the United States note this morning and at the same time asked the United States government, in light of the discussion we had here in the House of Commons yesterday, whether they would reconsider the question of publication and they promised an answer within a few hours. I do not think it would be advisable for me to issue any summary of what I said in my reply to the United States note until I ascertain definitely whether the United States government will agree to the publication of both.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day. Order, please. The President of the Privy Council on a point of order.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday during the question period several members of the opposition suggested that the Secretary of State for External Affairs might be permitted to follow immediately after the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in the debate, they being the two ministers responsible, so that the whole government viewpoint could be before the House before opposition speakers respond. If the House would like to follow that procedure my colleagues would be prepared to co-operate in this way. Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether you would determine the view of the House on this point.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of state for External Affairs, without the telegram and the statement from the United States and without his reply, has nothing too much to contribute until that time and we will wait.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

ARCTIC WATERS POLLUTION PREVENTION BILL

PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPOSIT OF WASTE; PLANS AND SPECIFICATIONS OF WORKS, SHIPPING SAFETY CONTROL ZONES, ETC.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that Bill C-202, to prevent pollution of the areas of the arctic waters adjacent to the mainland and islands of the Canadian Arctic be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

He said:

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the Bill which we are considering today, concerning an Act to prevent pollution of the Arctic waters is one of the most important pieces of legislation this government has introduced in the House.

As the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated in the House last October 24, Canada has four primary interests in the Arctic: the security of Canada, the economic development of the North, the preservation of the ecological balance, and the continued high stature of Canada in the international community.

Mr. Speaker, This bill, together with the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones bill, is designed to further these interests for Canada. As such, it is a continuation of past policies of successive Canadian governments to assert Canadian interests north of the 60th parallel —for the native people who live there.

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I realize the minister is speaking on a difficult subject but I wonder if he would read more slowly from this lectern which is being used for the first time in the House.

Mr. Speaker: I must say I have some reservations about the new procedure or innovation, a very good word suggested to me by the hon. member. I am not sure whether we should get ourselves involved in a situation where members who want to make statements will be bringing in lecterns. I have some reservations. I realize that in some circumstances, for example the budget address, it is customary for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) to bring in something which resembles a podium.

Mr. Baldwin: Or something which resembles a budget.

Mr. Speaker: There is nothing in the rules which says that a member cannot use this kind of material assistance to deliver his speech. In fact, many of us have used an accumulation of Hansards as a prop for the speeches which are being made to the House. I have some doubts as to whether we should extend this practice, as is being done now by the minister. It might be better if we did not.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that no member would raise objections to what is being done. The minister has before him a platform, a pulpit as it were. I have seen members who have piled up Hansards by way of support, and I am sure the House would not want to prevent the minister from trying out the method he is adopting.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate very much the remarks made by the right hon. member for Prince Albert, but I will not break tradition today and I will hold my extensive notes in my hand.

Mr. Baldwin: The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) breaks it every day.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Also for the untapped wealth we seek to discover for the benefit of all Canadians, for the natural quality of the land and water which covers over 40 per cent of the territory of our country.

Mr. Speaker, Canadians have reason to be proud of northern Canada. I think it fair to say that for too long we have neglected the North. Today we pay the price for some of that neglect. But since the 1950's, successive Canadian governments have accepted their responsibilities, and have developed our interest in Canada's newest and most promising frontier.

While the North is not without its problems, we can be thankful that men of foresight came before us. Let us hope that in twenty years time men will say that we, in this House, at this time, acted with the same spirit of realism and foresight as did those who came before us.

This is what the government is trying to do with the Arctic Waters Pollution Act—to act with realism and foresight, to seize upon the opportunities new technology is bringing to the North, and to control the use of this new technology so that it brings benefits, not disaster.

This government is deeply concerned with the problem of environmental protection. Steps have already been taken to protect water quality through the Canada Waters Act and the Northern Inland Waters Act, that have been introduced during the current session. Other measures are about to be taken or are being planned in such fields as air pollution, fisheries, and offshore shipping south of the 60th parallel.

I plan soon to recommend to the government legislation for the control and use of northern lands. I am sure hon. members will appreciate the need, in response to the quickening pulse of northern development, to ensure that this very development does not leave behind it a trail of unsightly scars which may spoil the northern landscape for years to come.

The Arctic Waters Pollution bill is a further important expression of this government's concern for environmental quality in the country in general, and in northern Canada in particular. It is further evidence that Canada is prepared to meet its responsibilities in maintaining and developing the Canadian Arctic.

During the past two or three years we have seen throughout the world instances of massive pollution disasters, which have created public awareness of the problem. The Torrey Canyon off the Coast of the United Kingdom; Santa Barbara, California, the tanker Arrow in Chedabucto Bay, have all shown the damage that can be done and have underlined the inadequacies of present law. There is no doubt about the threat. There is no doubt about the damage that can be done.

Now, as the economic pressure of resource development in the North increases in speed and scope, the need for environmental protective measures takes on a new sense of urgency.

Northern Canada is on the brink significant developments in the fields of mining and oil and in the transportation of these resources to world markets. The Government is participating in and encouraging these developments through the Panartic Oils Ltd., and it is stimulating it through important assistance programs in favour of private enterprise.

Canadians have been excited by the break through in transportation made by the S.S. Manhattan and the ice-breaker Sir John A. Macdonald in opening up the Northwest Passage. This new technology of Arctic shipping will provide Canada and other nations with great opportunities. The government welcomes these developments. The government wants Canadian Arctic waters to be opened up to commercial shipping.

The effect of this new legislation would be to make clear that the Northwest Passage is to be opened for the passage of shipping of all nations subject to the necessary conditions required to protect the delicate ecological balance of the Canadian Arctic.

This bill clearly demonstrates to the international community the basis on which Canada, as a coastal state, with its unique responsibilities for protecting the northern environment, will welcome international use of its waters. Investors in Canada's North will now know the rules of the game regarding sea transportation, and I am confident, Mr. Speaker, that this bill will encourage commercial shipping in the North and the development of our last frontier.

[English]

We are moving, by this bill, to prevent pollution of Canada's northern coast, and the government will be dealing with pollution legislation applying to the east and west coasts at an early date.

There are two reasons for separate pieces of legislation. First, the true Arctic is unique. It has a fragile ecology, meaning that the environment can easily be spoiled and that it may never fully recover from any severe violation of nature. Many Eskimo people in the region still are wholly or partially dependent on wildlife on the land, and on the fish of the sea for their existence.

The second reason relates to the fact that measures required to control pollution offshore from the east and west coasts in some respects must be far more complicated since shipping routes, regulations and patterns have developed, and land use and habitation have become established. It is the intent of my colleague, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), to develop appropriate measures as fast as possible to deal with this situation off the east and west coasts of Canada.

Maritime law is evolving, but more slowly than we would wish in Canada. For centuries emphasis has been placed on the right of shipping to the use of the world's sea lanes without any regard to the effect that this might have on adjacent coastal states. While this may have been practical before, now when millions of barrels of oil are afloat in tankers on the high seas on any given day the threat of pollution is real, and the interests of coastal states, as opposed to nations that have large commercial fleets, must be recognized. A state, and particularly those offering flags of convenience, cannot expect in the world community to continue these activities without regard to the interests of other nations.

At the World Shipping Conference in Brussels last year it was obvious that these states continue to expect to have absolute priorities for their particular requirements. It became clear to the government of Canada that unilateral action would have to be taken at this time if Canada was to protect its own urgent interests. That is why Canada is extending its jurisdiction for pollution control purposes 100 miles from its coast line in the case of commercial shipping, and more than that in the case of commercial exploitation of the continental shelf, where our environment may be threatened. It is doing this on the basis of its right and responsibility to protect the Canadian environment, both in its seas and on its shores, from real threats of pollution.

But let it be clear that we stand ready at any time to co-operate with the world community in the development of a regime for the prevention of pollution and the protection of the environment, particularly along the coastlines of the world. Canada, therefore, has decided to lead the way and to show by example what can and should be done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: We will, however, continue to participate in all efforts to bring about effective pollution control regimes acceptable to all nations. I believe that both at home and abroad this bill will be viewed in its proper light as a legitimate and necessary extension of Canada's jurisdiction off-shore in an area which is of direct and unique concern to Canada alone.

I should now like to turn to some of the main aspects of the bill itself. The thrust of the bill is directed towards the prevention of pollution of Canadian Arctic waters. It deals with pollution arising from shipping, from land based installations, and from commercial activities such as oil drilling carried out on the continental shelf.

The bill prohibits, under prescribed penalties, the deposit of waste in Arctic waters, or on the islands or mainland under conditions where it may enter these waters. The definition of waste is comprehensive and covers any substances which would degrade or alter the Arctic waters to an extent detrimental to their use by man, or by any animals, fish or plant that are useful to man. This definition, and the provision in the bill for regulations to prescribe the type and quantity of waste that may be deposited, are similar to those provided in the Canada water bill and the Northern inland waters bill.

The legislation regarding shipping will effectively be brought into force by the prescription of safety control zones by regulation of the Governor in Council. Within a shipping safety control zone ships will be required to comply with technical requirements relating to hull structure, navigational aids, qualifications of personnel, and time and route of passage. Ships not meeting these requirements will not be permitted to enter the safety control zone. At certain times of the year, or when certain ice conditions prevail, ships maybe barred from entering the zone.

Some ships may already meet most of the required standards. The bill provides that where such a ship wishes to enter the safety control zone a certificate may be issued in advance evidencing compliance with the standards prescribed. Ships owned or operated by a sovereign power other than Canada may be exempted from application of the regulations provided the Governor in Council is satisfied that these ships comply with standards substantially equivalent to those prescribed by Canadian regulations and that all reasonable precautions will be taken to reduce the deposit of waste.

Emphasizing again the preventive aspects of this legislation, the bill provides for pollution prevention officers who will be given power to enter any land based operation undergoing construction, alteration or extension, that may result in the deposit of waste in the Arctic waters, to determine whether adequate standards are being complied with. The Governor in Council may issue instructions requiring any necessary modifications to the work, or may prohibit the work entirely.

The pollution prevention officer will perform similar functions with respect to commercial operations carried out on the continental shelf, and will also have the authority both to board a ship within a safety control zone for inspection purposes, or to order a ship in or near the safety control zone to remain outside it if he suspects that the ship does not comply with the standards applicable within the zone.

All of these provisions are designed to prevent the possibility of pollution occurring. We recognize, however, that in spite of all the careful preventive measure that may and will be taken under this legislation, there still remains the danger of serious pollution resulting from accidents or other unforeseen cause. The bill therefore provides for civil liability resulting from the deposit of waste by persons engaged in exploring, developing or exploiting the natural resources on the land adjacent to the Arctic waters or on the continental shelf, or by persons carrying on any undertaking on the mainland or islands of the Canadian Arctic or on Arctic waters, or by owners of ships navigating in Arctic waters, or owners of cargo on any such ships. This liability is absolute and does not depend on proof of fault or negligence. The bill also sets out procedures for recovering in Canadian courts.

The bill provides that the Governor in Council may require evidence of financial responsibility to be provided by these persons and it is intended that this evidence should be adequate to cover the costs of clean-up and damage resulting from any pollution. Recognizing, however, that we are as yet not able to ascertain the full extent of possible damage, the bill makes provision for regulations providing for the limitation of liability of these persons so that commercial activity shall not be unduly inhibited by unrealistic forecasts of possible damage.

In closing, I should like to pay tribute to the members of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, whose report to the House on December 16 last year underlined the importance of this legislation. Mr. Speaker, with this legislation we are pioneers on the frontier of international law. This legislation goes beyond any previous action by the Canadian government for the control of pollution and is in advance of any action by the international community.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

Although we have taken this action unilaterally, we stand ready at all times to enter into international agreement which will provide for control over the dangers of pollution. Until this occurs, however, we must and will act now to protect the ecology of the north. This bill is evidence of our determination in this regard. I would ask that all members of the House give the Arctic waters pollution prevention bill full and firm support.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe the hon. member for Oxford has a question.

Mr. Nesbitt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have a question for the hon. Minister who has concluded his remarks. Would the minister undertake to use his good offices, when this bill goes before a committee, to supply witnesses who can answer questions particularly concerning the ecology of the north so that we can find out exactly what kind of pollution dangers may be envisaged by the minister?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think this is quite a valid question and the government will be ready to make everything available to the committee. For example, there are people within the government who know a lot about it and we will be willing to provide the names of those experts. I know there are a lot of people in Canada who will be interested in making a contribution, in view of the importance of the ecological balance in the north, and who will be very happy to testify. However, as I understand the rules of this House it is up to the committee to decide which people they want to call. We will do everything we can to collaborate to that end.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Comox-Alberni asking a question?

Mr. Barnett: I should like to address a question to the minister before he concludes his remarks, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the minister whether at this stage he could make available to members of the House a map or a chart, something which would define for us visually the verbal description of the area involved. I wonder whether that might be available in a form which could be included in today's Hansard as an appendix so that the people of Canada could have a visual representation of the area involved.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think that these things could be dealt with in committee.

I have no maps with me. The pollution zone will be defined later on by order in council. We cannot now table maps of these zones because we are not ready as yet to do so. This legislation gives the power needed by the government to define these protection zones where there is danger of pollution but they are not embodied in the legislation. The legislation covers the area above the 60th parallel where we will have the power to define the zones.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think it is very important that the Canadian people not be misled by what is proposed in Bills C-202 and C-203 which must be taken together although, of course, I understand that we are discussing Bill C-202 this afternoon. The government has pretended to assert a strong claim to sovereignty and has made a dramatic withdrawal from the jurisdiction of international courts. Canadians should not be misled about what, in fact, is proposed.

These two bills have to be considered together. They are a package. I suggest that, by introducing them, the government does not expand our claim to sovereignty; it reduces it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: These bills together are but a half-measure and indicate the government has abandoned Canada's claim to sovereignty in certain critical parts of the Arctic. I am afraid that the weak and limited nature of the claim to sovereignty of this government will haunt other Canadian governments for years, and probably forever.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: In so far as pollution control is concerned, of course we support the bill and I am sure the people of Canada support it. But let it be clear that there are two separate questions here, pollution control on the one hand and Canadian sovereignty on the other. While we in this party welcome and support any effective action to prevent pollution of our north, even at this late date, we cannot let the government get away with the claim that it is, at the same time, serving Canada's interests in asserting sovereignty.

As the minister has explained, Mr. Speaker, Bill C-202 defines the jurisdiction that the government of Canada proposes to exercise in order to control the pollution of a zone that is defined in the bill. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has emphasized that this is an exercise of extraterritorial jurisdiction rather than a claim to sovereignty.

On the other hand, Bill C-203 which was introduced at the same time, purports to redefine our territorial waters from three miles to 12 miles from a baseline as defined in the bill. In other words, Bill C-203 constitutes an assertion of sovereignty with regard to this redefinition of our territorial waters. But it is very clear from Bill C-203 that the government is not asking the Parliament of Canada to assert sovereignty over any waters beyond the 12-mile limit that is proposed. Indeed, sir, in the circumstances, it is clear in the context not only does Bill C-203 not involve an assertion of any sovereignty beyond the 12-mile limit, but by implication at least involves the abandonment of any claim to sovereignty in waters beyond the 12-mile limit. These are waters that we have claimed. We can all agree very readily that the 12-mile limit will not include all the water between the Arctic Islands or all the water between the Arctic Islands and the mainland and, therefore, if Bill C-203 is passed in its present form, there will be substantial blocks of water over which Canada has, by implication at least, abandoned any claim to sovereignty. These are waters over which this country has been claiming sovereignty.

The Prime Minister raised doubts a year ago about our claims to these waters, or some of these waters. I say in all frankness and bluntness that, although he raised certain claims a year ago, he now is presenting bills through his ministers which amount to an abandonment of these claims. We have asked questions of the Prime Minister before as to what waters Canada was claiming. He has told us in the House that we would have to wait to see the legislation which would define the claims that Canada is making. We have now received this legislation and can see that the waters over which Canada is claiming sovereignty fall far short of the waters over which the people of Canada and their governments were claiming sovereignty and far short of the waters over which the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development has urged the government to assert sovereignty. I suggest that in these circumstances the remark of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) that he hoped we would look after the interests of Canada in this debate were far out of place.

Mr. Sharp: But well justified.

Mr. Stanfield: Bill C-202 is designed to exercise control of pollution in Arctic waters. This, of course, is a very urgent problem. I think we have been lucky. We were lucky with regard to the first voyage of the Manhattan, because the ship entered our Arctic waters subject to no regulations of ours with regard to anti-pollution matters. It suffered damage; yet, fortunately, the north apparently incurred no pollution damage as a result thereof. We were lucky.

If we are to believe many scientific experts, time is running out for the people of this earth. Everything possible must be done to halt the pollution menace facing mankind. For this reason, I cannot quarrel with any anti-pollution measure adopted with regard to the Canadian Arctic, unless it be on the grounds that it is not enough or, for some reason, cannot be enforced. I say now that the government proposal to declare a pollution zone in the Arctic may not have the teeth to effectively ensure pollution control in this delicate environment. Canada has already been exposed to endless danger by the government that has, at the least, been extremely haphazard in its approach to this pollution menace.

Scientists have long been warning us of the danger of pollution—pollution of the land, air and water—and serious doubts are being expressed as to our very future unless we show some respect for nature and the environment in which we have been given the privilege of life. The risk of a Torrey Canyon disaster hangs over us all, and the best insurance policy in the world would not and could not compensate for the damage to our environment if anything of that magnitude were to take place in the north, as the minister indicated to us this afternoon. A disaster of that proportion would upset the delicate balance of nature in the Arctic and might lead to a complete ecological breakdown. It could reach out to every man, woman and child on this earth. So, we feel that not only are we defending Canada's interests when we fight pollution in the north, but that we are serving in a very real sense the interests of the world.

Pollution control is urgent but it is important also to Canada that we maintain our claim to the sovereignty of the waters between the islands and that we do not abandon that claim. The two bills taken together, Mr. Speaker, will have a very profound effect upon Canada's position in the north for all time. We cannot foresee now, in any precise way, the manner in which the north may be developed. I think it is fair to say that even the best informed people can only visualize this now in a rather dim way.

We thought that the waters between the islands, the sovereignty over which this government is abandoning, were our waters, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister has said that there is a lot of sentiment about the north; nevertheless, I suggest that it is not for the Prime Minister or any minister of the government to abandon what Canadians have regarded as theirs simply because the Prime Minister or other ministers cannot see that there is any particularly useful purpose in maintaining the claim of Canadian jurisdiction over these waters. Instead of asserting in a clear fashion the Canadian claim of jurisdiction over the waters between the islands and also the waters around the islands through use of the base line technique, which all Canadians expect their government to do, the government of Canada has introduced these two bills which, taken together, imply the abandonment of our assertion of sovereignty over much of the waters that we regarded as ours.

As to pollution control and the bill specifically before us this afternoon, it is clear of course that we are accepting a large responsibility. I hope that the Secretary of State for External Affairs will perhaps give us a little more information as to why the figure of 100 miles was selected, instead of 125 miles or 150 miles, in connection with pollution control.

An hon. Member: That is a magic number.

Mr. Stanfield: We have accepted this responsibility. The government has decided that it cannot wait, that it cannot take the time to work toward an international agreement, and that we must accept this responsibility by ourselves. I can accept that point of view with regard to pollution control. I said, and I say again, that we are the only ones who are going to accept this responsibility. We are accepting it and we have decided to go it alone. We are exempting ourselves from the jurisdiction of the International Court. That will prevent our being interfered with by that court, but of course it will not in itself help us to enforce our laws with regard to the control of pollution.

Having accepted the responsibility of controlling pollution in this area, and I agree that we should accept the responsibility, we must now make certain that we discharge this responsibility. Having accepted the responsibility, I and the hon. members of this House will expect this government to prepare itself to discharge its responsibilities and, incidentally, to tell us how it intends to enforce these measures it proposes.

An hon. Member: Through flower power.

Another hon. Member: Through Jamieson's navy.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. Stanfield: When discussing the north, the Prime Minister suggested that we might make a claim to sovereignty. I suppose his remarks also applied to the question of jurisdiction. The Prime Minister said recognition could only be denied us in one of two ways, either taking us to the courts or taking us to war. I suppose the choice of weapon would be up to us. The Prime Minister has eliminated the possibility of being taken to court. Does this mean he was serious when he made those remarks? Does he expect we might be taken to war in the course of exercising this jurisdiction? Surely not, Mr. Speaker. Surely, this was a case of over-simplification when the Prime Minister put forward this view of the position of our country. I think we must regard it as one of his less sensible remarks.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs and the government owe this House and the people of Canada an explanation as to how Canada proposes to enforce these regulations which apply to areas beyond our territorial waters. This is what this government is asking Parliament to define. If we accept that responsibility, then we must carry it out. We must not fail, not only because we do not want to look silly but because we have accepted a heavy responsibility.

I believe the Canadian people will support these measures if they are enforced. However, they want to know how the government hopes to enforce them. Without taking any more time of the House this afternoon, while there will be many questions of detail with regard to the bill that can be examined in committee, I say without any reservation that I and my party support Bill C-202 in principle. We very earnestly support it as a measure to control the pollution of the north. However, we would like some information as to why this limit of 100 miles was chosen and we would like to know how the government proposes to enforce these regulations. While this party very heartily endorses the purpose of this bill, we and the people of Canada regret very much that in the process of placing these two bills before the House the government is redefining our territorial waters in such a way as to, in effect, abandon the Canadian claim of sovereignty of waters between the islands as well as some of the waters surrounding the islands. The abandonment of this claim will likely haunt governments for many years to come. It is very likely it will prejudice the permanent position of Canada in the north, a most regrettable situation.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, it is quite apparent that Bills C-202 and C-203 complement each other. Therefore, I think they must be considered together when the basic principles underlying this legislation are under discussion. I want to begin by congratulating this government on introducing this legislation. Any reservations we may have about some aspects of this question should not detract from our wholehearted endorsation of the legislation contained in these two bills. I go further and express the hope that we will have a recorded division on these bills. I think we should let the whole world know that on this question Canadians are united and unanimous in the support of exercising jurisdiction over pollution in the Arctic archipelago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I think this House should seize an early opportunity to make clear to our friends south of the border that we will not tolerate anyone pushing this government around. This is a privilege which we reserve for the opposition!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): It would have been preferable if the government had made a forthright declaration of sovereignty over the Arctic rather than restricting itself to an assertion of jurisdiction to control pollution. I indicated in the House on January 22 on behalf of the NDP our wholehearted support of the statement which was unanimously endorsed by the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development in their report of Tuesday, September 16, 1969. They stated in that report:

> Your committee recommends that the government of Canada indicate to the world, without delay, that vessels, surface and submarine, passing through Canada's Arctic Archipelago are and shall be subject to the sovereign control and regulation of Canada.

Such a declaration by the government of Canada would have been preferable, but I do not consider that confining ourselves to a claim of jurisdiction for the purpose of controlling pollution prevents us in the future from making a forthright declaration of sovereignty. I hope the day will come when the current government will do just that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): We regret that the government found it necessary to opt out from the jurisdiction of the International Court on this particular question. There are other methods which may have been used which I will discuss later in my remarks. These are just minor points. I want to make it abundantly clear that we are in complete accord on the main purposes of Bill C-202 and Bill C-203, because these bills set out two fundamental principles. First, there is a declaration of Canada's jurisdiction over the Arctic archipelago for the purpose of controlling pollution. Second, there is the assertion of Canada's sovereignty over its territorial waters, which are now to be extended to a limit of 12 nautical miles on base lines drawn from headland to headland.

I submit that this legislation is absolutely necessary in a modern technological age. Much is said about the law of the sea, but in many respects the law of the sea does not have the necessary provisions to deal with the problems that have arisen in a modern age. For example, the three-mile limit on territorial waters which was set in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries represented the range which a canon could fire from a sailing vessel. New problems have arisen today that could not possibly have been envisaged in the sixteenth, seventeenth or eighteenth centuries. These new problems include such things as pollution from oil tankers, the possibility of exploiting the resources of the seabed and the discharge of wastes which not only can adversely affect the fishing industry and the coastal state in question, but also contaminate the shoreline.

Here are three new areas which are not dealt within international law as it affects the sea. The first is pollution. This affects Canada even more than it affects most coastal states because of our extended coastline. Hon. members will recall the trouble we had with the Arrow and the pollution it caused in Chedabucto Bay. This underlines the need to exercise authority over tankers and other vessels likely to cause pollution and contaminate our shoreline. Because of climatic conditions, the Arctic is particularly vulnerable to pollution. Anything which upsets the ecological balance in the Arctic will have disastrous consequences for marine life in that region. Moreover, pollution in the Arctic could drift southward, contaminating our eastern and western coastlines. Canada must deal with pollution whether there is provision in international law to take care of it, or not.

The second new situation which has arisen has to do with fishing rights. The three-mile territorial limit has proven inadequate to protect the fishing rights of coastal states. This was tackled by the Norwegians in 1951 when they extended the jurisdiction of their fishing rights by drawing baselines from headland to headland and extending their territorial seas 12 miles beyond. This action was upheld by the International Court in 1968 and finally incorporated in an international convention in the 1958 conference on the law of the sea.

In September, 1945, a proclamation was made by President Truman of the United States in which the United States unilaterally declared its right to regulate and control conservation in certain areas of the high seas where its nationals were fishing and to enter into agreements with others regarding conservation if they were also fishing in the same area. This declaration, which the United States enforced without any reference to international law, was accepted by the Geneva conference on the law of the sea in 1958.

The third area which is not covered by international law, but which is calling for action, has to do with the exploitation of the resources of the sea bed. It is only common sense to recognize that no coastal state can allow nationals from another state to drill for oil or exploit the resources of the sea bed to within three miles of the coastal state's shoreline. The United States itself recognized this fact in the Truman proclamation of September 28, 1945. In that proclamation, the United States unilaterally declared that it would exercise complete control over the resources of the continental shelf, which extends as far as 250 miles off the east coast and 50 miles off the west coast of the United States.

An hon. Member: Will you telephone Mackenzie King?

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The United States also issued a proclamation saying that aircraft flying within 200 miles of the United States coast identify themselves. I am not complaining about this. In an age of aeronautics, a country must protect its citizens. What I am pointing out is that in the interest of preventing pollution, in the interest of protecting the fishing industry, in the interest of protecting resources on the sea bed adjacent to the territory of a coastal state, other nations, and particularly our friends the Americans, have by unilateral action taken the necessary steps to safeguard themselves, their resources and their people, without waiting for international law to catch up.

The fact is, the law of the sea has not kept pace with changing conditions. The release sent out by the United States information service regarding the note which was sent to the Canadian government by the State Department, reads:

> The United States does not recognize any exercise of coastal state jurisdiction over our vessels on the high seas and thus does not recognize the right of any state unilaterally to establish a territorial sea of more than three nautical miles or exercise more limited jurisdiction in any area beyond 12 nautical miles.
> We, therefore, regret the introduction of this legislation by the Canadian government which, in our view, constitutes a unilateral approach to a problem we believe should be resolved by co-operative international action.

No one will disagree with the sentiment that it would be desirable to settle this or any other problem by, to quote the United States note, "co-operative international action". But surely, we as Canadians have a right to know how long we are expected to wait before there are provisions in the law of the sea which will protect our people, our coasts and our fishing industry.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Let me remind the House that there was a conference in 1926 at which time the United States called for an action of prohibition against the discharge of oil into the sea. It was voted down two to one. In 1954 another "conference of the sea" was held. A convention was established which would have set up a 50-mile area from the coast within which the deposit of oil was forbidden. The United States refused to sign this convention. It said the provision should require only voluntary adherence. At the 1958 conference the United States offered a six-mile territorial sea zone to replace the three-mile limit. This proposal was defeated.

The so-called law of the sea as laid down in various international conventions is vague and archaic in many respects. In the main, progress has only been made when nations have issued unilateral declarations as to their jurisdiction and have then succeeded in getting those declarations incorporated in an international convention at a conference on the law of the sea. This was true of the Norwegian fisheries doctrine of 1951, which later was incorporated in the convention of 1958. It is true of the Truman declaration of 1945 regarding jurisdiction over the continental shelf with respect to exploitation of the resources of the seabed, which was later incorporated in the convention of 1958.

I think that we, as Canadians, are on sound ground in saying that where our interests are at stake we are justified in following the example of some of the countries to which I have referred and making a unilateral declaration, then indicating our willingness to sit down and discuss the matter with other coastal states in the hope that we can work out international conventions that will be satisfactory to all concerned.

We have been told that a note was delivered to the Canadian government by the government of the United States, though we have only had snatches of it referred to in the press. One report is to the effect that it is understood the note "criticizes the Trudeau cabinet's decision to reject the authority of the court in these disputes". This morning's Globe and Mail has extensive quotations which allegedly come from the note that the State Department sent to the Canadian government. I always find it difficult to understand why the press seem to be able to get copies of these notes, at least extracts from them, but we in the House of Commons are not able to get that information.

Mr. Baldwin: It comes from Information Canada.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In this news story, there is contained in quotation marks what is alleged to be a statement that appears in the United States notes. It reads as follows:

> If Canada had the right to claim and exercise exclusive pollution and resources jurisdiction on the high seas, other countries could assert the right to exercise jurisdiction for other purposes, some reasonable and some not, but all equally invalid according to international law.

The two statements I have quoted, and which allegedly come from the U.S. note of protest, criticize Canada, firstly, for not referring this matter to the International Court and, secondly, for taking unilateral action which might be a bad example to other countries. I want to point out, first of all, that criticism of this country by the United States with regard to not referring this matter to the International Court comes with poor grace from a country that adopted the Connally amendment in August 1946, the effect of which was to exclude the jurisdiction of the International Court from all matters that are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of the United States, as determined by the United States.

With reference to the criticism that we are acting unilaterally, I have already pointed out that not only the government of Norway but the government of the United States itself, in the proclamations of 1945 and 1946, unilaterally took steps which they deemed fit and proper; first to protect the resources of the seabed on both their coasts, secondly to conserve fishing activities on the high seas, and thirdly to exercise control of air space within 200 miles of their coastlines.

I want to make it clear that we in this party believe that Canada should do everything possible to strengthen the International Court. But we can only do this if other countries are equally committed to accept the court's jurisdiction. At the present time there are only 13 nations that have accepted the court's jurisdiction without reservation; the remainder; Canada and the United States included, have reserved the right to decide in each case whether or not they will allow a matter in dispute to go before the International Court.

My view happens to be that I think it might have been better to have allowed the matter to go before the International Court in order to bring it to a head. There are almost twice as many nations that have more than a three-mile limit than there are nations that adhere to the three-mile limit. I believe the weight of public opinion—

Mr. Sharp: There is no reservation with regard to the 12-mile limit.

Mr. Chrétien: It was the pollution bill that carried that reservation.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Yes, that is right. But I am pointing out that the bulk of the nations that have unilaterally extended their territorial sea over the 3-mile limit would be concerned in this question. I think that the bulk of public opinion, which is also concerned about pollution, would force the calling of a conference of the sea, from which we would hope to produce an international convention that would settle the matter in a manner satisfactory to Canada.

It should be made clear to the United States, in my opinion, that the course which Canada has followed is not unique. Indeed, the course of action which the government is following with respect to both these bills is on all fours with the unilateral declarations that were made by the United States in 1945 and 1946, both with respect to jurisdiction over the resources of the seabed and United States fishing rights on the high seas.

Other nations have taken unilateral action in extending their territorial waters and their jurisdiction for specific purposes. At the present time only 32 nations accept the 3-mile territorial limit, while 60 nations have extended their territorial waters anywhere from four miles, as in the case of Finland, Norway and Sweden, up to 150 to 200 miles, as in the case of Chile, Ecuador and Peru. It is significant that Mexico, a close neighbour of the United States, has had a 9-mile territorial limit for a considerable period of time, and that Panama, in which the United States has a very vital interest stemming from the Panama canal, has a 12-mile territorial limit. As a matter of fact, numerous United States fishing vessels flying the U.S. flag have been seized by Chile, Ecuador, Peru and Mexico. The United States has sent notes of protest, but the countries in question have continued to exercise their jurisdiction and, so far as I know, no case has been taken to the International Court.

To my mind, it is significant that this is the first time that the United States has objected to Canada making any declaration of jurisdiction with respect to the Arctic. As I pointed out in a speech which I made in the House on January 22 last, we made a declaration as far back as 1908 on the basis of the sector doctrine. In 1946 the Right Hon. L. B. Pearson, then Canadian ambassador to Washington, made a declaration on behalf of the Canadian government.

On December 8, 1953 the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, then Prime Minister of Canada, made a declaration with regard to Canada's sovereignty. There is a strong feeling in some quarters, which I share, that the sudden interest of the United States and its now stated objections clearly relate to the discovery of oil in the Arctic and the desire of powerful oil interests to get a piece of the action. We in this party believe we should seek international agreement as speedily as possible with regard to jurisdiction over the Arctic and the extension of our territorial waters. But in the meantime we strongly support the government's position that we should not be expected to wait while pollution continues and while our fishing areas are exploited merely because the law of the sea has not kept pace with changing events. The time has come to assert our basic rights while at the same time indicating our willingness to co-operate in working out international conventions which are viable in the light of modern technology.

May I also say a few words about some of the things we in this party think need to be done. Let no one think the problem of pollution of the seas and territorial waters will be solved by the passage of these two bills. First of all, the legislation in question deals almost solely with the pollution of Arctic waters by ships, with the exception of a very vague provision in clause 10. What about pollution by oil drilling rigs?

Mr. Chrétien: That is mentioned.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): What about the matter of gushers and wildcat wells? What about the construction of oil pipelines? It seems to me, if we are to deal with the problems of pollution on the mainland of the Arctic, the bill will have to be much more specific and have a great deal more teeth than are to be found in clause 10. This is a matter which can be discussed when the bill is before the committee.

I would also point out that the control of ships entering the Arctic waters should, in our opinion, be extended to cover our coastlines on the Atlantic and the Pacific. Our experience with the Arrow and the pollution in Chedabucto Bay ought to be a warning to us. On the Pacific coast, in my constituency, almost every day old tankers come into the ports. Some of these are not seaworthy. Some of them are rusted and some of them dump oil in the harbour. There have been many complaints, and in one or two cases where it was possible legal action was taken against the companies. However, in many instances the ships were gone before any action could be taken. It seems to me prevention of pollution in the Arctic is commendable, but the neglect of our eastern and western coastlines where the bulk of shipping is concentrated would be deplorable. I hope the government is to provide for the same kind of legislation in respect of our two coastlines that is now being provided in the case of the Arctic.

Mr. Chrétien: I mentioned that in my speech.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): But the difficulty is that it is not contained in this legislation. We have some unhappy memories of ministers mentioning things and then nothing happening. I would have liked to have seen legislation to deal with this very immediate problem. If tankers are to enter Canada's territorial waters there is no reason they should not be required to meet certain standards. There is no reason, if they are to go through difficult areas, they should not be required to take on a Canadian pilot and have complete, up-to-date charts so that some of the accidents which have occurred will not be repeated.

The 12-mile limit should be measured by base lines drawn from headland to headland. I should like to remind the minister, Mr. Speaker that after the lapse of several years some of these base lines have not yet been drawn. I think Canadian fishermen are entitled to the protection of a law which was passed by this Parliament and which the government has been inexcusably slow in putting into effect. I hope the government will not only see that the fishing industry is protected by having these base lines drawn but that the extension of the territorial waters to 12 miles will be speeded up by having these base lines clearly indicated.

Mr. Stanfield: You will get it by 1985.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I should like to close by saying the government has taken the first important step in the war against pollution in the Arctic. We will give the government unreserved support in passing this legislation. We remind the government, however, that this bill constitutes merely a declaration of policy. The effectiveness of this legislation will depend upon the extent to which the government administers it and the degree to which it enforces the provisions of this legislation with aggressiveness and tenacity. I would remind the government that our unanimous support for this legislation will turn to bitter condemnation if the government weakens under pressure, from whatever quarter that pressure may come. If the government thinks that incurring the wrath of Washington makes it uncomfortable, I can assure the members of the government that their present discomfort will be nothing compared to the anger and resentment of the Canadian people if this government weakens in its determination to protect the sovereignty and rights of the Canadian people over the waters adjacent to Canada.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the hon. member a question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) on a question.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member would like to comment on the fact that the State Department apparently proposed an international conference to establish anti-pollution measures in the Arctic and, without in any way delaying or weakening the passage of the present legislation and the firm stand he has advocated in his speech, whether he could reasonably agree to that part of the United States proposal in respect of such an international conference.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. The hon. member should ask a question and not ask for a comment because the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) has already made his speech.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I had not sat down, so perhaps I might be permitted to answer the question I asked the hon. member to ask me.

An hon. Member: It just appeared that way.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Of course, Mr. Speaker, I am being a little facetious. I agree completely with the hon. member. I thought I had made clear in my remarks, while making this unilateral declaration with regard to our jurisdiction for pollution control purposes over the Arctic and with regard to our sovereignty over our territorial waters to a 12-mile limit, that we should agree readily to an international conference with the coastal states of the world because while the question of pollution is a serious question for Canada it is equally a serious question for other countries. We perhaps are more vulnerable to pollution and therefore must lead in the discussions, but I would certainly support the government in making a declaration—and I hope the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) will make the declaration in the course of his speech—that Canada will willingly help to organize such a conference, attend such a conference and co-operate in order to have international standards set with reference to pollution control.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Mr. Chrétien: I said the same thing in my speech.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is evident from what has been said in this debate already that there is general agreement on all sides with the two fundamental objectives underlying the Arctic waters pollution prevention bill, the economic development of the Canadian Arctic, and the preservation of a unique environment comprising land and ice and open sea.

The government has given long and careful consideration to the means by which these objectives could best be given effect and translated into legislative terms. We have considered these questions in the light of the duty and responsibility Canada owes not only to itself but to the community of nations, that is to say to mankind as a whole. We have refused to be stampeded by clamour from any quarter, and we have rejected simplistic solutions which could create more problems than they might resolve. Instead, we have evolved, after very wide ranging deliberations, a constructive and functional approach that distinguishes between jurisdiction and sovereignty and between essential national objectives and chauvinism, which reconciles national interest and international responsibility, and which will prevent pollution without discouraging development.

The problem of environmental preservation transcends traditional concepts of sovereignty and requires an imaginative new approach oriented toward future generations of men and the plant and animal life on which their existence and the quality of that existence will depend. The problem of environmental preservation moreover must be resolved on the basis of the objective considerations of today rather than the historical accidents or territorial imperatives of yesterday.

Canada has always regarded the waters between the islands of the Arctic archipelago as being Canadian waters. The present government maintains that position, and I say to my friend, the Leader of the Opposition, (Mr. Stanfield) that there is no abandonment of these claims whatever in the legislation that has been put forward here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sharp: This bill aims at meeting a real and imminent problem and provides for the exercise of a limited form of jurisdiction. This exercise of jurisdiction for the purposes of pollution control can in no way be construed to be inconsistent with a claim of sovereignty over the waters between the islands or otherwise. Similarly, the exercise of sovereignty over an area of the sea extending 12 miles from shore in accordance with the provision embodied in another bill that will shortly be under discussion cannot be said to be inconsistent with a claim to sovereignty beyond 12 miles.

I say to the Leader of the Opposition that in framing our legislation we were very careful to examine this question because I agree with him that if in any way our legislation reflected upon our claims to a larger sovereignty, we would certainly have proceeded otherwise.

There is excellent authority for the propositions that I have put forward on this occasion. In the 1910 North Atlantic coast fisheries case between Britain and the United States the permanent court of arbitration held that a state may, without prejudice to its claim to sovereignty over the whole of a particular area of the sea, exercise only so much of its sovereign powers over such part of that area as may be necessary for immediate purposes. That case is of particular relevance to the Canadian situation since it involved areas of Newfoundland, Labrador, and other parts of Canada's Atlantic coast.

There are those who argue that the problem of marine pollution can only be met by a multilateral rather than unilateral action. Canada has attempted the multilateral approach to this problem most recently at an international legal conference in Brussels in 1969. On that occasion, however, we were unsuccessful in our attempts to persuade the major shipping and cargo owning states to provide adequate recognition and protection for the rights and interests of coastal states which are the innocent victims of pollution incidents of the seas.

State practice, or in other words unilateral action by states, has always been a legitimate means open to states to develop customary international law. As the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Douglas) said in his very interesting speech, there are a number of examples. I shall also cite some of them and give some others that tend to support the same position. This is how the rule of the three-mile territorial sea, and later the 12-mile territorial sea, originated. It was unilateral action by the United States in the 1945 Truman proclamation which led to establishment of the continental shelf doctrine in international law. It was the practice of Norway in connection with the delimitation of its territorial waters which introduced the straight base line system later written into the Geneva convention on the territorial sea. Again, it was by unilateral action that Canada in 1964 and the U.S.A. in 1966 established nine mile contiguous fishing zones.

The action we are proposing for the Arctic waters in no way rules out the possibility of developing international arrangements for the preservation of the marine environment in Arctic regions. The bill we have introduced should be regarded as a stepping stone toward the elaboration of an international legal order which will protect and preserve this planet earth for the better use and greater enjoyment of all mankind. A single ecological system governs the lives of all men, and the Arctic regions are an extremely important part of that system. They determine the livability of the whole of the northern hemisphere. This bill is a beginning. It puts forward a legislative framework within which we will develop controls and safety standards to ensure that this unspoiled and uniquely vulnerable region is preserved from degradation. We will consult with other countries before we promulgate regulations to this end. We hope that these other countries will show a spirit of understanding and co-operation so that together we can construct a system of internationally agreed rules and safety standards which will advance our common interests without interfering unreasonably with particular interests.

Canada has a long tradition of leadership and active participation in multilateral efforts to resolve problems which go beyond purely national concerns. This is especially true in the field of international environmental law. In the famous Trail Smelter case, we went to arbitration with the United States in 1935 and accepted state responsibility for the pollution of United States territory. In later years, we pressed hard for the non-proliferation treaty and we were in the vanguard of attempts to prevent fallout pollution from atomic testing. We have been engaged with the United States since 1909 in a unique experiment in international co-operation on common environmental problems, through the International Joint Commission. However, it is precisely this long experience with multilateral and bilateral approaches which convinces us that immediate action by Canada is required for protection of the Arctic environment.

We know only too well that a situation requiring urgent action cannot be met by the slow and difficult process of negotiating international arrangements. However valuable may be the work of the International Joint Commission, citizens of both Canada and the United States are painfully aware that it has not prevented the pollution and contamination of the Great Lakes to the point where the very life of these vast bodies of water is threatened. The International Joint Commission is undertaking remedial action on the Great Lakes but that action is long overdue and will not easily undo the ravages that have taken place. We cannot be too late everywhere. We cannot wait until the damage has been done in the Arctic if only because such damage in that environment may well be irreversible.

The first attempts to find an international solution to the problem of pollution of the seas by oil were made in the early 1920's but did not achieve even partial success until the late 1950's. In 1926 an international conference held in Washington drew up a relatively modest proposal for the control of deliberate marine discharges of oil or oily mixtures. Even this modest proposal failed to achieve ratification.

By 1954 the oil pollution problem had reached such a state of crisis in some areas that a second major conference was convened. The result was the London Convention for the Prevention of Pollution of the Sea by Oil. This convention, like the 1926 proposal, deals with the prevention of deliberate pollution by tanker cleaning operations, but leaves enforcement to the flag states rather than the coastal states suffering the damage. This convention was adopted despite strong opposition from the United States, which believed that the problem of deliberate discharge would disappear by educational programs and technological advances.

The London Convention was only slowly accepted, and it was not until four years later that sufficient countries had ratified it to bring it into force. Canada's instrument of acceptance was deposited in 1956, and that of the United States in 1961. The Convention was amended by a second conference held in 1962 under the auspices of the Intergovernmental Maritime Consultative Organization.

[Mr. Sharp.]

The 1962 amendments were relatively marginal, but extended from 50 to 100 miles the minimum zones in which the deliberate discharge of oil is prohibited. Canada accepted these amendments in 1963, but they did not achieve sufficient acceptance to come into effect until 1967.

The amended London Convention remains the major international instrument in force in this field. Despite its modest aims, and despite the fact that it leaves enforcement to the flag states and thus preserves their traditional exclusive jurisdiction over their vessels on the high seas, this limited convention did not come into effect until some 30 years after the oil pollution problem first began to attract serious international attention. Its inadequacies as to the scope and enforcement of its provisions are, I believe, disputed by no one.

More recently, however, we believed there was cause to hope that the nations of the world might join together to attack the problem of oil pollution on a broader front and to adopt more effective measures for its prevention and control. The Torrey Canyon incident has awakened states and public opinion to the catastrophic consequences of a spill from a jumbo tanker. Domestically and internationally there had been increasing signs that the quality of the environment was becoming the major issue of our time. Against that background Canada went to Brussels, in November, 1969, to participate in an international legal conference on marine pollution damage. The results of the conference, however, while reflecting a certain degree of progress were seriously disappointing.

Many delegations at Brussels displayed what appeared to us to be an excessive caution and conservatism and a rigid pre-occupation with the traditional concept of unqualified freedom of the high seas. That freedom, in our eyes, seemed to be tantamount to a licence to pollute; it did not in any way strike a proper balance between the interest of the flag state in unfettered rights of navigation and the fundamental interest of the coastal state in the integrity of its shores.

As a result, despite our most vigorous efforts, Canada was only partially successful in achieving recognition of the paramount need for environmental preservation and the principle that the bulk carriage of oil and other pollutants by sea is an ultra-hazardous activity which gives rise to an absolute liability to compensate in full the victims of pollution damage arising from such carriage.

The outcome of the Brussels conference was so little oriented toward environmental preservation and so much oriented towards the interests of ship and cargo owning states that Canada abstained from voting on the public law convention dealing with the right of intervention on the high seas and voted against the private law convention on civil liability for pollution damage.

While the main thrust of the bill under debate is preventive, that of the Brussels conventions is remedial and liability oriented. I do not wish, however, to be excessively severe or negative in judging the achievements of the Brussels conference. The public law convention negotiated there incorporates the very important principle that coastal states may intervene against foreign ships on the high seas to prevent or minimize major pollution damage where a marine accident, threatening or actually causing oil pollution, has already occurred.

I must say in this connection that I find it anomalous that certain countries can accept the right of a coastal state to sink a foreign ship on the high seas when a marine accident threatens pollution, but at the same time assert that coastal states do not have the right to prevent such an accident by turning away such a ship from areas off its coasts, or by imposing certain safety standards or preconditions for entry into these areas.

The coastal state's right of intervention on the high seas, as incorporated in the Brussels convention on international law, may perhaps represent a sufficient basis, for the time being at least, to protect the marine environment and Canada's coastal interests beyond the proposed 12-mile limit to our territorial sea on the Atlantic and Pacific. As I have said, however, the problem of pollution in those areas is also a matter of vital concern and will be given the most energetic attention by this government. With respect to the Arctic, other measures impose themselves.

We hope that the Arctic waters bill will provide a framework for internationally agreed safety standards. The brief review of multilateral efforts which I have just made is sufficient proof, however, that an approach of that kind would not have met the need for early action and would not have provided the stability and certainty required for investment in the development of Arctic resources and Arctic navigation.

There can be no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that Canada has tested the climate for international action against marine pollution, and there can equally be no doubt that the climate has been found seriously wanting—if that is a good simile. We are determined to discharge our own responsibilities for the protection of our territory. We are equally determined to act as pioneers in pushing back the frontiers of international law so that the laissez-faire régime of the high seas will no longer prevent effective action to deal with a pollution threat of such a magnitude that even the vast seas and oceans of the world may not be able to absorb, dissolve or wash away the discharges deliberately or accidentally poured into them.

The Arctic waters bill represents a constructive and functional approach to environmental preservation. It asserts only the limited jurisdiction required to achieve a specific and vital purpose. It separates a limited pollution control jurisdiction from the total bundle of jurisdictions which together constitute sovereignty. In this it resembles in some degree the approach which Canada was among the first to adopt with respect to jurisdiction over the exploitation and conservation of fishery resources.

The results which have been achieved in the latter field encourage us now to lead the way in developing rules to prevent pollution of the sea and of the shores of coastal states. We firmly believe that this is the best way to bring order out of impending chaos in the law of the sea.

The pioneering venture upon which we are embarked is a measure of our serious concern at the failure of international law to keep pace with technology, to adapt itself to special situations, and in particular to recognize the right of a coastal state to protect itself against the dangers of marine pollution.

Existing international law is either inadequate or non-existent in this respect. Such law as does exist, as I have already indicated, is largely based on the principle of freedom of navigation, and is designed to protect the interests of states directly or indirectly involved with the maritime carriage of oil and other hazardous cargoes.

A new "victim-oriented" law must be created to protect the marine environment and those rights and interests of the coastal state which are endangered by the threat to that environment. The Arctic waters bill is intended to advance the development of such new law. It is based on the fundamental principle of self-defence and constitutes state practice, which has always been accepted as one of the ways of developing international law.

Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Bill

Where the law is deficient any action undertaken to remedy its deficiencies cannot properly be judged by the existing standards of that law. Such a proceeding would effectively block any possibility of reform. Canada remains firmly attached to the rule of law in international affairs and has the highest respect for the International Court of Justice and the part it plays in the maintenance of that rule of law. At the same time, however, we are not prepared to litigate with other states on vital issues concerning which the law is either inadequate, non-existent or irrelevant to the kind of situation Canada faces, as is the case in the Arctic. It is no service to the court or to the development of international law to attempt to resolve by adjudication questions on which the law does not provide a firm basis for decision. For these reasons, we have been obliged to submit a limited new reservation to our acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice.

Even with the new reservation, Canada's acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction is much broader than that of many other countries. It does not in any way reflect lack of confidence in the court but takes into account the limitations within which the court must operate and the deficiencies of the law which it must interpret and apply. Moreover, it may be revoked and Canada's acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction may again be broadened at such time as those deficiencies are made good. In the interval, Canada stands prepared to appear before the court where the court is in a position to exercise its proper function and render a decision either for or against us. Such is the case, for instance, with respect to our bill on the 12-mile territorial sea. Our readiness to submit to the international judicial process remains general in scope and is subject only to certain limited and clearly defined exceptions rather than to a general exception which can be defined at will so as to include any particular matter.

Mr. Lewis: Why don't you say you mean the United States?

Mr. Sharp: The hon. member makes a comment with which I will not disagree.

I have already stressed the government's hope that it will be possible to achieve internationally agreed rules for Arctic navigation within the framework of our proposed legislation. We recognize that the interests of other states are inevitably affected in any exercise of jurisdiction over areas of the sea. We have taken these interests into account in drafting our legislation; we have, for instance, provided that naval vessels and other ships owned by foreign governments may be exempted from the application of Canadian antipollution regulations if the ships in question substantially meet our standards.

Mr. Stanfield: Russian tankers.

Mr. Sharp: We will give the interests of other states further consideration by entering into consultations with them before promulgating safety regulations under the Arctic waters bill.

I should point out that the interests of other states in the uses of the sea are not necessarily in conflict with ours. We, too, are concerned to preserve the essential freedoms of the seas. We, too, do not wish to place unnecessary or unreasonable restrictions on maritime commerce. Security factors are vital to us as well as to others. It is because we share the concern to head off developments undesirable for common interests that we ask other states to adopt a flexible attitude which is responsive to new needs and special circumstances, and that we seek the co-operation of other states and offer them ours.

In recognition of common interests and in the spirit of co-operation, Canada has for many years engaged in periodic consultations with the United States on matters concerning the law of the sea. We have not always agreed on those matters but we have always benefitted from obtaining a better understanding of our respective positions and concerns.

I should like now to turn to a point of some importance in considering the international aspects of this legislation, namely the position of the United States government concerning it. The government of the United States has on a number of occasions recently expressed a particular interest in the various aspects of the law of the sea raised by the Prime Minister's statement in the throne speech debate when he announced the government's intention to introduce legislation to protect the ecological balance of the Canadian Arctic, and requested an opportunity to discuss them with us. Two rounds of discussion were held for this purpose. On March 11 the Canadian Ambassador to the United States, Marcel Cadieux, accompanied by two Canadian officials, Mr. Beesley, head of the legal division of the Department of External Affairs, and

Mr. Head, Legislative Assistant to the Prime Minister, called on Mr. Alexis Johnson, United States Under-Secretary of State for Political Affairs, and a group of senior United States officials. These discussions were very frank and friendly but they revealed, as expected, differences of views between our two governments on a number of questions, and it was agreed that a further round would be held after the United States government had had time to consider the matter further. On March 17, President Nixon telephoned the Prime Minister to express his interest in the matter and offered to send a high level team to Ottawa for further discussions. On March 20 a team of senior United States officials led by Under-Secretary of State Johnson and including the Under-Secretary of the Navy and an Assistant Secretary of Transport, as well as senior officials from the State Department, Defence Department, the Coast Guard, and the Department of the Interior, came to Ottawa and met with me, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien), the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald), and senior Canadian officials, including the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, and Canada's Ambassador to Washington, to make known the United States views on the questions under discussion. These discussions lasted all day and were again frank but friendly. Subsequently, there were further discussions in Washington between our Ambassador to the United States and Mr. Johnson, and a telephone conversation between the Prime Minister and Secretary of State Rogers. Unfortunately, it did not prove possible for the two governments to reach agreement on all aspects of these questions, as has since been made known by the United States government. I think this account of these discussions makes quite clear that we have taken very seriously the United States interest in these matters.

These differences can be resolved, and resolved in a manner consistent with our interests as a sovereign nation and our long history of close and mutually co-operative relations with the United States. We cannot abdicate our responsibilities in a matter of special importance to us, and we cannot abandon our right and duty to protect our territory. Given this fundamental and irreversible position on our part, there remains nevertheless a wide range of possibilities for bilateral and multilateral co-operation which could advance the cause of environmental preservation in the Arctic waters in harmony with the interests of all concerned. We are prepared to go forward from this position, but only forward and not back.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka has a question?

Mr. Aiken: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the minister a question so that we can be perfectly clear about his position on the 12-mile limit, particularly under Bill C-203, although we have been discussing the two bills. Regarding the Arctic Islands, will Bill C-203 draw geographic lines of the 12-mile limit around each island or is it intended to draw a line enclosing all the Arctic Islands? In other words, will the territorial sea as defined in Bill C-203, include areas between Arctic Islands of more than 24 miles?

Mr. Sharp: Since obviously we claim these to be Canadian internal waters we would not draw such lines, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): The hon. member for Greenwood has a question.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister a question similar to that asked of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas). One proposal in the United States government note was that Canada should join in organizing an international conference on antipollution measures in the Arctic. Is the Canadian government willing to accept this proposal, at the same time maintaining its clear and unwavering intention to proceed with the legislation and the measures proposed by it unless and until some satisfactory solution is arrived at by international agreement?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, not only did the United States government give notice to us in the note, and the version of it which they published, that they would like to have a conference on Arctic pollution, but we have subsequently received a formal invitation to join with them in sponsoring a conference of this kind dealing with, as we understood it, areas beyond national jurisdiction. We have, of course, in principle, been very happy to consider such a suggestion but I think it is important that before we say we would go to such a conference we have a better understanding of what the discussion would be.

Mr. Aiken: May I ask a further question for clarification, Mr. Speaker? With regard to the Arctic Islands, where will the 12-mile limit begin? Will the line start at the outer limits of all the Arctic Islands, since the minister has said he would not draw lines around the inner limits? Surely, the bill will apply in the Arctic?

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. There is no limitation on where the territorial waters would lie. There may be territorial waters around the Arctic islands and along our coasts. I doubt very much, however, whether the government will fill in all the gaps as yet. The hon. gentleman knows, for example, that we have not drawn in lines within the St. Lawrence and the reason that we have not drawn those lines is that we do not want to compromise our position as to the status of the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on Bill C-202, which is one of the three bills recently introduced relating to the sea and our territorial limits, I cannot help but note the real and necessary concern of the government for the establishment of pollution controls in the waters adjacent to our shores.

In recent years the official opposition has carried on a vigorous campaign in the House of Commons, urging the government to make a clear and unqualified declaration of Canada's sovereignty over the lands and waters of the Canadian Arctic. This campaign increased in intensity when it became clear that the government itself had sown the seeds of doubt in Canada and the international community by hedging, waffling and refusing to take a stand on this issue.

Mr. Perrault: Nonsense.

Mr. Crouse: The hon. member who makes many of his contributions from his seat says this is nonsense.

An hon. Member: He also makes very good speeches.

Mr. Crouse: He may make very good speeches, but he said this was nonsense. I will answer him in a minute. The campaign increased in intensity when it became clear, as I said, that the government was waffling on this issue. The Arctic region, so long regarded as Canadian territory by everyone, was about to be lost through default by this government.

Concern over Canadian rights in the Arctic was expressed at the time of the experimental voyage through the Northwest Passage of the giant Humble Oil tanker Manhattan. This concern came to a head when the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, comprised of Members of Parliament who had made a close study of this issue, recommended that the government claim sovereignty over northern lands and waters which traditionally had been considered as belonging to Canada. What happened? The government resisted every effort to have this committee report brought before the House for discussion until the Progressive Conservative Member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) eventually won the right to debate a motion that the House concurred in the committee's report. Naturally, it was hoped at this time that the government would end the uncertainty by declaring our sovereignty over our northern archipelago, in keeping with the committee's recommendations. And what happened again? The motion was talked into adjournment by government supporters.

I have been asked, Mr. Speaker, why the members of the official opposition take such a strong stand on the question of Canadian sovereignty in the north. I can only reply that it stems from our threefold concern which cannot be brushed aside by the government's indifference. By our declaring sovereignty over our northern lands and waters, Canadian citizens in the north will be protected from exploitation. By our declaring sovereignty over our northern lands and waters, development in the Canadian north will remain in the hands of the Canadian people under the control of the Canadian government. By declaring sovereignty over our northern lands and waters, we will have the right to prevent an ecological disaster that could affect the people of this nation and, indeed, the whole world.

The bill before us refers many times to the Canadian Arctic, but at no time does it specifically define what is meant by the Canadian Arctic. In my opinion the Canadian Arctic should be clearly defined. There are no teeth in this legislation which spells out our sovereign rights to the waters and the islands as listed on the map called "Canada's Arctic Islands" which is published by the Canadian Hydrographic Service through the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. All these individual islands in Canada's archipelago are named; they stretch right up to the Lincoln Sea in the Arctic Ocean and the names are as picturesque as the islands are numerous. They include Queen Elizabeth Island, Ellesmere Island, Borden Island, Mackenzie King Island, Prince Patrick Island, Prince of Wales Island, Borden Peninsula on Baffin Island, Victoria Island, King William Island, and many more too numerous to mention. Obviously, preceding prime ministers and governments had the courage to name these islands. Has not this government the courage to claim them?

Mr. Sharp: We have always claimed the islands. It is only the water that is in dispute.

Mr. Crouse: Is there any question about the water?

Mr. Sharp: Other people question it; we do not. Nobody questions our claims to the islands.

Mr. Crouse: The Secretary of State for External Affairs further confuses the issue by saying that some people dispute our claim to the waters but nobody disputes our claim to the islands.

Mr. Sharp: My statement clarifies it.

Mr. Crouse: The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) does not claim the waters, and that completely refutes the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Sharp: He reiterated my views clearly.

Mr. Crouse: He reiterated the minister's views in a strange way, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister's views are on record and I will include them in my remarks in a few moments.

This bill is cited as the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act. In my opinion, Canada cannot risk its whole policy on Arctic pollution control by refusing to declare our sovereignty in this area. However, when interviewed outside the House by the press following the introduction of this bill, the Prime Minister stated as follows—and I am now quoting from a transcript of his remarks:

> This is the first bit of legislation—
> It is not an assertion of sovereignty; it is an exercise of our desire to keep the Arctic free of pollution and by defining 100 miles as the zone within which we are determined to act, we are indicating that our assertion there is not one aimed towards sovereignty, but aimed towards one of the very important aspects of our action in the Arctic.

That statement, Mr. Speaker, by our Prime Minister completely refutes the statement made a moment ago by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. According to Canada's Prime Minister, this bill is not a declaration of sovereignty over the waters in our northern archipelago. The statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs is refuted. May I call it five o'clock, sir?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas)—Industry—Criteria for payments to automobile companies; the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis)—Pollution—Phosphate detergents—Door-to-door distribution of Arctic Power; the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Stafford)—Administration of Justice—appointment of judges.

It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

METROPOLITAN TORONTO HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS ACT

MEASURE TO EXTEND REPRESENTATION ON COMMISSION

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to make a proposition, namely, that the subject matter of Bill C-195 be referred to a committee. I believe there have been consultations about this matter.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, it is agreed that the motion may be put now.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On the understanding that the motion deals with the subject matter of the bill, we also agree.

Mr. Forest: Mr. Speaker, I move:

> That the Order for the second reading of Bill C-195, An Act respecting the Port of Toronto, be discharged and that the subject matter of the said Bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Federal Sales Tax on Drugs

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by my house leader that our party agrees to the unanimous consent needed for this motion. Since some specific problems may arise, we do so with the understanding, of course, that when the occasion arises for such a motion to be moved on our part, the hon. member and his colleagues will also agree to giving unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Mr. Forest: Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions and I believe the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) is ready to deal with item No. 176 on today's list. After this has been dealt with, then we shall deal with item No. 2, which is also in his name.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR COPIES OF REPORTS; REVIEWS OR STUDIES ON FEDERAL SALES TAX ON DRUGS

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo) moved:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of any reports, reviews or studies of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs regarding the removal of the federal sales tax on pharmaceuticals and drugs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, there is great importance to this motion in the sense that we really need the particular information for which I have asked in order to properly assess how effectively the policies of the department are. At the time that the federal sales tax was removed on pharmaceuticals and drugs, some questions were raised as to whether these savings would be passed on to the consumers. By comparing prices considerable evidence is accumulating which shows that many of these savings are not being passed on to the consumer.

The reason for asking whether the department is prepared to issue copies of these reports, reviews or studies is to ascertain the effectiveness of this program. If the department has these studies, certainly Parliament should be aware of them so that we can do an effective job of lowering drug prices to the consumers. On the other hand, if by asking for these reports and studies the government is placed in a somewhat embarrassing position because they do not have them, the public should be made aware of this shortcoming. Therefore, for any reason Your Honour may wish to examine, it will be seen that we are very much in order in asking that this information be made available.

In a more general way, we have repeatedly asked for information on this and other subjects only to be told that the documents are internal working documents and cannot be released to the public. I see no reason why internal working documents cannot be released. We realize that sometimes there is controversy within a department. There may be different views held within a department as to the way to proceed. If that is the case, I feel this information should be available.

The government often accuses the opposition of being irrelevant or not dealing with a subject as well as we might. In the same breath that they make that accusation, they deny the opposition information which would assist them in debating a subject. Surely, there can be no argument against the opposition having as much factual information as possible in the interests of having a more meaningful discussion in this House.

In concluding these remarks, I urge upon the hon. gentleman who will be speaking on behalf of the government department to indicate in a very clear way why he cannot comply with this request. More hopefully, I trust he will agree with the argument made today and give us an opportunity of having this information, so that our work in this House can be more effective and, as a result, more beneficial to the public.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I have some further information for the hon. member. I hope after the hon. member hears what I have to say that he will withdraw his motion. I am informed that primary responsibility for dealing with representations made in connection with the removal of the sales tax on drugs rested, of course, with the Department of Finance. At that time the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs had not been established and its predecessor was not directly involved in the decision to remove the tax.

The office of the Director of Investigation and Research under the Combines Investigation Act however, did undertake a survey to determine if the savings represented by the repeal of the tax had been passed on to the trade. For a number of reasons this test could only be a rough one, although the broad conclusion reached that on approximately 90 per cent of the items the savings were passed on is believed to be dependable.

The survey was carried out on the basis of price data obtained from roughly 60 drug manufacturers. In total, the prices of approximately 7,500 items were examined. The problem was complicated by the fact that the application of the sales tax on drugs was subject to rulings by the Department of National Revenue which permitted a manufacturer to deduct allowances for transportation and cash discounts from the base to which the sales tax was applied. In addition, the base varied from sale to sale depending upon the type of customer, whether wholesaler or retailer. A further complication was that some price lists showed suggested resale prices, while others showed prices to the trade. It was therefore necessary to calculate many prices in order to make a meaningful comparison.

The documentation arising out of this survey is therefore voluminous, involving several file drawers of price lists for approximately 60 companies, and of worksheets relating to approximately 7,500 drug items. Without the expenditure of an inordinate amount of time this material could not be assembled in any way which would be meaningful, beyond the broad conclusion mentioned. With this information, I hope the hon. member will agree to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Parliamentary Secretary will answer a question, since he recognizes that there is much detailed information available. Was there an accurate evaluation made of this vast amount of material? Is there some kind of a workable presentation? Surely, the department did not collect all these figures, make this investigation and then not reach some kind of conclusion or prepare some kind of breakdown to show what these figures represent. It is not my intention to ask for every scrap of paper in the file. That would be rather pointless. What I want to know is what conclusions the department reached and what studies arose from the collection of this data? Could that be presented to the members of this House so that they can form an opinion as to the effectiveness of the reduction of the sales tax?

Mr. Forest: Mr. Speaker, I cannot readily inform the hon. member whether a resumé of all this information has been prepared by the department and, if so, whether they are prepared to table it. I am not ready at this time to deal with this request.

Mr. Saltsman: May we adjourn the debate at this stage until more information can be supplied, Mr. Speaker? I might perhaps lodge a small grievance at this point. I placed this question on the Order Paper a considerable time ago. If the department felt that the information was not available to them, as a matter of courtesy and as a matter of expediting the work of this House, surely I could have been informed that the question should be directed to the Department of Finance. I would have been quite willing to do that. There are various ways in which this question could have been handled without allowing it to reach this stage. An answer could have been made in a cursory way in the House when the order for motions for papers was called. I still find the government's position is most unsatisfactory, and I would appreciate having the debate adjourned at this point in the hope that a better approach may be taken next time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There is a slight procedural difficulty here. The motion before the House at this time is the hon. member's motion. I do not think it would be proper for him to move the adjournment.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Could I do that? Could I move the adjournment of the debate, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather)?

Mr. Forest: I do not think we could consent to that, Mr. Speaker. The minister has already informed the hon. member that the reports, reviews and studies mentioned in the motion comprise work sheets and memoranda made up for the internal use of the department, that they are privileged documents and cannot be revealed. We have given further information as to the complexity of this question, the amount of time and money which would be involved in furnishing this material. We could not agree to such a motion as the hon. member suggests.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is one further objection. I am informed that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre seconded the original motion. Maybe the simplest thing would be to put the question, if the House is ready.

Mr. Saltsman: If the motion to adjourn is not in order, I should like to continue addressing questions to the government.

Mr. Forest: The hon. member has already spoken on this matter, and I do not see why the question cannot be put now, unless there is someone else who wishes to speak on it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has the right, under the standing order, to conclude the debate. If there are no further contributions I am certainly prepared to recognize him for five minutes pursuant to Standing Order 48, I think it is. I would point out to him that if he speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Saltsman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I still cannot understand the government's position. I cannot understand what there might be in the analysis of the information it has acquired which could be considered as confidential. I am not asking for figures regarding specific costs. I am interested in finding out what has happened to prices of various drugs since the removal of the sales tax. Surely, this information cannot be considered confidential. The public is entitled to know what has happened to the tax money. If a tax amounting to 11 per cent is removed from a drug and the benefit is not passed on, the price must eventually be paid by the general public. There is no point in giving these companies a bonanza. We heard a great deal about the benefits which would follow this move. We were told that if the sales tax was removed, drug prices would go down. However, there is no clear evidence that the removal of sales tax has had any such effect. Indeed, drug prices seem to be rising.

It is regrettable that the government is not prepared to be frank with the House and tell us what has happened. Either the department has collected a great deal of information and made no use of it, in which case the entire exercise has been worthless, or else it has the information and is withholding it from members of this House. In either case, the government is to be strongly criticized for its stand.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question? All those in favour, please say aye.

Some hon. Member: Aye.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Those against, please say, nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my view, the "nays" have it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On division.

Motion (Mr. Saltsman) negatived.

COMBINES

REQUEST FOR COPIES OF STUDY BY ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo) moved:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all reports and studies undertaken for the Economic Council of Canada review of Canada Combines and Anti-Trust legislation.

He said: Again I appeal to the government to make this information available, particularly since there is a strong possibility that the pertinent legislation will be reviewed. It would be very helpful in the course of an examination of the government's proposals if we had the benefit of some of the background information which has been provided. Again, I see no reason why the government should not be more co-operative in this regard.

In looking over the wording of my motion, I see it calls for copies of all reports and studies undertaken by the Economic Council in this field. I realize that the word "all" is unlimited in scope; it was used only in the absence of a suitable alternative. I could not have used the word "some" for instance; it would have been too indefinite. I hope the government will not reject our request simply because the word "all" is used.

I should like to make it clear that I am quite prepared to be accommodating in the sense that if the government says it is willing to make the significant information, or précis, our outlines available to me, I would be happy to accept that kind of response rather than insist that everything which has been done be presented—though I still believe it would be highly desirable that all this information should be disclosed. However, if that is too formidable a task I would be happy to accept an undertaking by the government that sufficient information will be made available to prove satisfactory in meeting the objectives of the motion before us.

Mr. J. E. Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): I am pleased to reciprocate the reasonable attitude taken by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman). On December 17, of last year, when he put this motion, the reply I gave implied no refusal. I said at that time that the Economic Council of Canada intended to publish the research underpinning this report. As of today's date, it has released the first of those studies, an essay on some critical aspects of the activities of international corporations. This was done by J. N. Behrman of the University of North Carolina. The Council has supplied me with a list of additional studies it intends to release as rapidly as they can be prepared for publication. I commend them for their attitude in not just being pressured into releasing this information but for being anxious to supply it to the House as well as to the country at large. They have supplied all the information they have in the best form available. If there is any hold-up it is only because these additional studies that I will now recite are underway and are being prepared as rapidly as possible for publication.

It would be useful information for the House to know that the council intends to release the following studies which are now in the course of preparation: "Industrial Concentration in Canada", by Max Stewart of the University of Alberta; "Economic Criteria for Assessing Restrictive Trade Practices" and "Detrimental Situations that Escape Control by the Combines Investigation Act", by Don Eldon of Trent University; "The Regulation of Restrictive Practices—Recent European Experience", by James Cairns of the Royal Military College; "The Development of Canadian Antitrust Legislation", by Joel Bell, Harvard Law School; "The Economic Theory of Patents, Copyrights, Trademarks and Designs", by Brian Hindley, London School of Economics; "The History and Context of Copyright Law", by Bruce MacDonald, Queen's University; "The Meaning and Potential of the Existing Principles of Fair Dealing", by Grant Sinclair, Queen's University; and "International Copyright", by J. Hucker, Queen's University.

The council is planning on the publication, through other organizations, of the following additional studies prepared for the council under this reference: "Anti-Combines Legislation and Policy in Canada: An Overview", by Milton Moore of University of British Columbia, the publisher yet to be decided; "Some Evidence on Economic Determinants of R & D Activity"—as an aside, I must confess that I am not sure, though the hon. members may be, what R and D activity is—the study to be made by Mr. H. E. English and E. Choudhri of Carleton University, and to be published by the Private Planning Association of Canada. The last is "Survey of Views About the Canadian Patent System and Industrial Research and Development Activities in Canada", by A. W. Wilson of the Science Council of Canada, formerly of the Economic Council, the study to be published by the Science Council of Canada.

I hope the hon. member has received this statement with some satisfaction. Again, may I say that I am pleased by the co-operation that I have had from the council in their desire to make these publications available and as widely distributed as possible at the earliest possible moment. In view of this statement, I wonder whether the hon. member feels that the matter has been adequately dealt with.

Mr. Saltsman: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I think that is a very satisfactory reply. My only regret is that I did not get that answer earlier, in which case we might have avoided the situation today. I was very pleased to hear the comprehensive outline presented by the parliamentary secretary. I am quite happy to accept this explanation, subject to the option of putting the motion on again should I require further information.

Mr. Walker: If the hon. member does not put it on again, then I will.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Do I understand that the hon. member for Waterloo wishes to withdraw his motion?

Mr. Saltsman: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would point out to the House that, according to Standing Order 50, he must have unanimous consent of the House to do so. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Motion withdrawn.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

Mr. Forest: Mr. Speaker, I do not believe there are any other members who are ready to proceed with Notices of Motions for Production of Papers. I suggest that the House agree to call it six o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock I do now leave the Chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

ARCTIC WATERS POLLUTION PREVENTION BILL

PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPOSIT OF WASTE, PLANS AND SPECIFICATIONS OF WORKS, SHIPPING SAFETY CONTROL ZONES, ETC.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-202, to prevent pollution of the areas of the Arctic waters adjacent to the mainland and islands of the Canadian Arctic, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, when I was speaking in this debate at five o'clock this afternoon, among other things I indicated our support in principle of this legislation. However, I pointed out at that time the obvious difference of opinion which exists in respect of this legislation between our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp).

During his speech this afternoon, and in reply to questions following his remarks, the Secretary of State for External Affairs stated that Canada has always considered the northern waters in Canada's archipelago as territorial waters of Canada coming under the sovereignty of Canada. The Prime Minister, however, when interviewed outside the House by the press following the introduction of the bill made the following statement. I shall quote from a transcript of his remarks:

> This is the first bit of legislation. It is not an assertion of sovereignty—it is an exercise of our desire to keep the Arctic free of pollution and by defining 100 miles as the zone within which we are determined to act, we are indicating that our assertion there is not one aimed toward sovereignty but aimed toward one of the very important aspects of our action in the Arctic.

Who are we to believe? Who speaks the truth so that all Canadians will understand—the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs? Surely this important point should be clarified before this bill receives second reading and goes to the committee. Surely the Prime Minister must realize what he is doing. Surely he must realize that any waters beyond our territorial limits are regarded as the high seas. The apprehension of any vessel on the high seas could be construed as a hostile act. Anyone who arrests a vessel on the high seas could be accused of piracy. Because of these facts I contend that Canada must exercise her sovereignty over the whole Canadian northern archipelago and over the whole area of pollution control, if this legislation is to stand up in a court of international law.

The reasons generally accepted as justifying the extension of the sovereignty of a state over its territorial seas have been laid down by practice and by tradition. First, the security of the state demands that it should have exclusive possession of its shores and should be able to protect its approaches. Second, for the purpose of furthering its commercial, fiscal and political interests a state must be able to supervise all ships entering, leaving or anchoring in the sea near its coast. Third, the exclusive enjoyment of the products of the sea close to the shores of a state is necessary for the existence and welfare of the people in that state.

In my opinion, political and economic considerations are the predominant factors which will determine the extent of the territorial sea over which a state would want to assert sovereignty and jurisdiction. The question of the breadth of the territorial sea of a coastal state is therefore inseparably connected with the question of self-preservation or survival. In the light of this basic fact different states have claimed varying extents of territorial seas, and because the circumstances and conditions of states vary there is no absolute uniformity in their respective claims concerning the breadth of the sea adjoining their coasts which comes under their sovereignty and jurisdiction. In some cases this assertion and exercise of sovereignty is based on historic title, in others upon existing treaties, and in still others upon actual occupation.

I submit that Canada has claim to our Arctic islands and waters by historic title and actual occupation. Any proposal that would limit the extent of territorial waters over which Canada should now actually assert and exercise her sovereignty would amount to an impairment of our territorial integrity. The validity of our established rights should not be affected by the mere fact that the limits set on some bodies of water in our northern islands may exceed the maximum width of our territorial sea. These must be regarded by everyone as acquired or vested rights which cannot be claimed by any other country or given away by our government. I believe this is a sound fundamental legal principle that was established at the Law of the Sea Conferences held in Geneva in 1958 and 1960.

I believe, frankly, that there is likely to be more world support for an outright claim for sovereignty in the Arctic than for an oblique claim to sovereignty through pollution control which may well establish a widely applicable principle. It is now evident that this is one of the areas of concern of our friend and neighbour to the south. Although the intent of this bill to control pollution in our northern waters is desirable, I only regret that it has been introduced into this chamber in a cavalier manner without proper discussions and consultation with our friends in the United States.

The headlines in our newspapers emphasizing in unequivocal language the U.S. government's rejection of the Canadian government's position respecting our Arctic waters indicates the total breakdown within our External Affairs Department under its arrogant and incompetent minister. I find it hard to believe that the American people and their government are not as vitally concerned over establishing proper controls for preventing pollution of our waters as we are.

Scientists have been warning us of the dangers of pollution of the land, air and water, and doubts have been raised as to the very future of mankind unless we begin to show some respect for nature and the environment in which we have been given the privilege of life. These scientific facts have been made available to Canadians, to Americans and to all the people of the world, and the control of pollution is not a special Canadian problem but a worldwide problem causing worldwide concern. Machinery has been set up by man to deal with worldwide problems. Here I refer to the United Nations and to the International Court of Justice. What is happening? Canada, under this administration, has now become a lone wolf. We no longer recognize the International Court of Justice. We cannot be bothered to sit down and talk over our international problems with our friends at the United Nations because we obviously have alienated all of them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crouse: In fact, despite all the cultural, traditional and economic ties which we have with the United States, with all that should be going our way, we cannot even sit down and talk over rationally and sensibly with our American friends the need for establishing pollution control methods on Canadian territory.

What is happening in our External Affairs Department? Obviously, when the Prime Minister dictates the course to be followed, his puppets Punch and Judy, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald), jump up and down and do his bidding. Our foreign policy is making this country a loner and is turning the world against Canada. It is having an evident effect internally upon this nation. All you have to do is look at the unemployment problems to realize the effect of some of our loss of external trade.

I would remind the government that a policeman is only a symbol of authority, a symbol which cannot keep law and order when mob violence rules, and by and large it is respect for the law which enables our police forces to retain law and order. It is for this reason that I suggest there should have been consultation with our international friends at the United Nations—if we have any—before we endeavour to put into effect pollution controls over our Arctic waters.

If our case had been properly presented—and evidently it has not been, for no international conference has been called since 1960 and ten years have passed during which this problem has not been debated or discussed with our international friends—hopefully there would be international respect for our laws and our position, making enforcement over this vast area a much simpler matter than may now be the case. After all, let us face facts. Irrespective of any pollution control laws which we may pass in this Parliament, those regulations could not have stopped the Arrow disaster and the resulting pollution which occurred in Chedabucto Bay in Nova Scotia. Neither will these laws prevent the accidental pollution of our northern waters or the waters off our Atlantic or Pacific coasts.

I suggest that if this were a reasonable government, having outlined their objectives they would not find it too late to discuss our proposals at the United Nations in the hope of securing some form of agreement to our claims. This has been the course followed by most countries on international problems ever since World War II: agreement rather than state practice has become the accepted norm.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Crouse: Yes, when I have finished my remarks, Mr. Speaker. When you consider the firmness of the U.S. position, you realize there is a very real possibility of a head-on clash the first time the Canadian Coastguard interferes with U.S. ships in what the United States considers are international waters.

The Arctic ocean has remained a great mystery until recent times, but the last two decades have witnessed considerable progress: the unknown ocean has become one of the most studied in the world and it is gradually revealing its secrets to scientists. The voyages of the submarines Skate and Nautilus have proved that the ice in our northern archipelago is neither uniform nor permanent. These submarines blazed a new, submerged northwest passage and when and if nuclear-powered cargo submarines are built the new route will cut 4,900 miles and 13 days off the route from Japan to Europe. There are, of course, certain problems involved in operating submarines under the ice, but these are gradually being solved.

So we need pollution control authority in our northern waters because obviously they will be used more in the future than they have been in the past. But I believe that in order to be effective we must have some international agreement to our proposals as outlined, if we hope to be credible in world courts. Unfortunately, Canada's official attitude toward the status of our Arctic waters has never been altogether clear. Over the years a number of government ministers, including two prime ministers, have stated that Canada claimed jurisdiction right up to the North Pole. In 1956, however, the Minister of Northern Affairs made it quite plain that Canada's sovereignty in the Arctic was limited to lands and territorial waters and that we have never subscribed to the sector theory in application to ice.

Except for an occasional rather vague statement to the contrary since that time, it appears that the official position expressed in 1956 by the minister responsible still represents the government's view. However, it is somewhat surprising to note that the official maps prepared and issued by the government continue to show the boundary lines of Canada as extending to the North Pole.

I believe it is time to end this anomaly. This can be done by the government issuing a clear statement indicating we have sovereignty over the Arctic archipelago, thus terminating many years of indecision on this important matter. By this action we would have nothing to lose and everything to gain.

We have a responsibility to our native peoples, the Indians and Eskimos who stand the risk of being exploited by commercial operators, before it can be said they have in any way benefited from today's enlightened society. If Canada does not assert its claim to sovereignty over the Arctic, these people will be exposed to exploitation which already disfigures the permafrost of their land and threatens to eliminate the northern wildlife upon which they depend for existence.

In my view, northern development must remain in Canadian hands and Canadian sovereignty over this area will guarantee our claims to these resources. There are many who say that the future of Canada lies in our northern areas, and if there are vast resources of oil, as exploration indicates, it is up to Canada and to Canadians to regulate the growth of this development. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the government will do everything possible to make this Canadian development a reality.

• (8:20 p.m.)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member resumes his seat may I say that I was interested in his remark that since the war the international community had proceeded to establish international law only by way of mutual agreement. Does he recall the Truman doctrine which the United States used in making a unilateral claim over the continental shelf, and which ultimately led to agreement? How does that fit his theory?

Mr. Crouse: I am not sure I have followed the minister's question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The United States asserted a unilateral claim to the continental shelf. How does that fit in with the hon. member's theory that they proceeded only by mutual agreement?

Mr. Crouse: At the present time we are talking about Canadian sovereignty over our own territory, the northern archipelago, a section of this country which Canadians generally have assumed and which I certainly have always assumed, even if the hon. gentleman has not, has always belonged to Canada. I have always felt that the islands in the archipelago and the waters between those islands belonged to Canada.

Mr. Borrie: That isn't what you said.

Mr. Crouse: That is exactly what I said in my speech.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I assume that is what the hon. member meant to say. I will read his speech with interest, and I suggest he should, too.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I hope these points will become clear. I hope that the division which obviously exists between the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs will be resolved, so that there will not be one statement made in this House and another one outside it on television, which is totally misleading to the Canadian people. This is why I am asking for clarification, simplification and a little bit of the truth so that all can understand the situation.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The truth of the matter is that you do not have any answer to my question.

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Coast Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, in the past few days I have been reminded of history under totally different circumstances at the beginning of the First World War.

I refer to the situation in which Britain found herself when she had an agreement with France and the British cabinet was hesitating, after the German invasion of France and Belgium, as to whether it would adhere to that agreement. The French government sent notice after notice to the British government asking whether it would adhere to the agreement.

I think at that time Sir Edward Grey gave a classic answer when he said, "Britain will act in what she conceives to be her national interest." This, Mr. Speaker, is the reality of international politics, and this has been said many times since. I am sure some hon. members have read the book of Mr. Dean Acheson, the respected, long-time Secretary of State of the United States, who put the same thing in another way in saying that the object of foreign policy is the national interest. That is only common sense.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government is acting unilaterally. It is acting in advance of international law. It is acting in what it conceives to be the national interest, and this is what it has a clear right and duty to do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. St. Pierre: Mr. Speaker, I hope that this government and all governments which succeed it will work for international harmony, will work to be on good terms with our neighbours and with all nations, and will work for the rule of law in international affairs.

But in all things, as has been said many times in this House, there are priorities. There is one priority which must apply to every Canadian government and it must override all others; that is, its first duty is to the Canadian national interest. On this legislation we are so proceeding. I welcome it.

I consider this legislation to be bold, to be imaginative, and to be progressive—not regressive but progressive. I predict that it will win the support of the world in the great forum of public opinion, informed public opinion, and in that respect later in these remarks I have a recommendation which I shall make to the government.

What is our reason? Our reason has been very clearly stated. International law in relation to the sea, made largely by shipping nations for shippers, has ignored and overlooked the rights of the third parties, the coastal states, and until international law develops to the required level this country is obliged to act unilaterally. The prime reason is the new and unexpected threat of massive pollution.

Yesterday, in company with a number of other members of this House, I was at Chedabucto Bay where a rotten old tub of Aristotle Onassis' sank and spewed more than half of her 3 million barrels of bunker fuel over some 1,200 square miles of Canadian waters and over approximately 80 miles of beaches.

I think we were all impressed, those of us who travelled the route yesterday, with the ingenuity that is being shown by those who are cleaning up the mess under the direction of Dr. Patrick McTaggart-Cowan. We saw a great deal of ingenuity exercised. We saw some remarkable co-operation among Canadian government departments, the Canadian armed forces and the American navy. In fact there was co-operation from almost everyone except, I understand, the shipping company involved.

Mr. Speaker, what appalled me there yesterday was not the extent of the mess. The mess is bad, but in a few years it will be eliminated. I was impressed by the amount of scientific knowledge we are getting out of this incident, because this is cold water and we are learning lessons in that area which can be applied some day if necessary—I hope it will not be—in the Arctic.

I was impressed by the methods of cleaning up the mess, including one developed by a west coaster, I am proud to say, Mr. Richard Sewell, who has developed a machine called a slick-licker which has become one of the best proven methods of cleaning oil off the surface of water. But when I looked at all these operations, which are being conducted at great expense and with success, I could not see any one of them that could now be applied to a ship sunk in the ice in McLure Strait, or in Prince Gustaf Adolf Sea, or the Beaufort Sea.

Possibly in time they can be adapted to such a situation, but in my opinion—it is admittedly a layman's opinion—there is not one applicable to such action in the Polar pack. Let me remind hon. members that the Polar pack averages 9 feet in depth. It is in almost constant motion, from 1.2 miles to 4 miles per day, and these waters are in darkness for much of the year. Incidentally, the Arrow, Onassis' ship, grounded on a well marked reef, well charted, buoyed, in broad daylight.

Mr. Speaker, who can suggest that in circumstances such as these, when we face the prospect of oil tanker shipments through the Northwest Passage, this country can sit back any longer and wait for international agreement?

How long do we have to wait, and how hard to do we have to try to get it?

We tried in 1958. We tried in 1960. We tried last fall at the IMCO meeting in Brussels. Time and time again we have been faced with the fact that international sea law is primarily made by shipping nations for shippers and that the rights of the third parties, the coastal states, are not sufficiently recognized.

• (8:30 p.m.)

I can give many examples and I should like to draw to the attention of hon. members one which illustrates further that international law has not yet been able to perceive the danger of oil pollution. There are no regulations in international law affecting ships entering port. The regulations which may apply are to ships leaving harbour. Unsafe ships may be forbidden to leave.

In times past this was sensible because the primary interest was the safety of the cargo, the safety of the crew and passengers. Who could perceive, in the sailing ship days or even up to the time of the supertanker, that an incoming ship could pose a threat to a state? Except a ship of war, of course.

So, Mr. Speaker, Canada has moved unilaterally and has done so properly. We are opposed in this stand. We are criticized for it by the United States government—perhaps I should say specifically by the State Department. I should be interested to know what the United States Department of the Interior feels. As for the feelings of some Senators, notably Senator Stephens of Alaska, who could be expected to recognize such threats when he sees them, he is one who has publicly stated that he favours the Canadian action.

A speaker who preceded me suggested that we had obviously alienated all the nations at the United Nations.

An hon. Member: It must have been a Tory.

Mr. St. Pierre: I would draw to the attention of the House a statement made on Sunday night by Dr. Stavropoulos, the Undersecretary General for Legal Affairs at the United Nations. Mr. Speaker this statement was made on a CBC program called "Cross Country Checkup", and this excerpt is a transcription from the tape recording. Dr. Stavropoulos was asked if he thought the Canadian action in reserving our position at the Hague Court was particularly important and he replied:

> No, I don't think it is particularly important, I think it is particularly interesting. It is the first time we have a reservation dealing with pollution.

He was then asked about te Prime Minister's statement that international law at the present time was inadequate or imprecise on sea pollution. When asked if he agreed with this his answer was, "I would say yes." But he went on:

> I wish that this is the first step toward a general acceptance of the law, which can be very good for humanity.

There, Mr. Speaker, are the words of a man who thinks in global terms and recognizes the Canadian government's action for what it is, a progressive step, admittedly taken in our own interest primarily but nevertheless eventually of benefit to all the sea coast nations of the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. St. Pierre: World opinion will support Canada in this matter, Mr. Speaker. Indeed, I would go further and predict that American public opinion will support us and that in a very few years the United States government will recognize the necessity for similar legislation in relation to its coasts off Alaska.

I said earlier that I would have a suggestion for the government. I think that Canada should not hesitate to make her position plain at home and abroad, and specifically in the United States. I am not suggesting at all that the Canadian government carry on some sort of propaganda action in the United States against that government: that would be an intolerable action and they would naturally object to it.

But there could be no objection, Mr. Speaker, to our embassies and other offices proclaiming the justice of the Canadian position with facts—facts on the danger we are facing, facts on the peril of a 300,000-ton spill of oil in the Arctic, facts on the danger to all humanity of damage to the Arctic. These facts should be repeated until our message gets through and until it is recognized that Canada is not just exercising a narrow chauvinism but a legitimate self-interest.

Indeed, this is not only in our own interest but in the interest of all nations and of our good friend and ally, the United States of America, our oldest friend. We have been their faithful ally, their best customer and I hope that the American people will remember this. The statements of the United States government have been rational, reasonable, friendly and frank, but I am afraid that the people might be misled by statements from irresponsible parties in that country in the next few weeks.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I should like to stress again that it is not my aim to speak against the United States. I am not pouring trouble on oily waters.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. St. Pierre: It sometimes happens, Mr. Speaker, that when a Canadian speaks for Canada he finds himself being criticized for speaking against the United States. But I am not speaking against the United States. However, following that I must say that the intransigent attitude expressed by the United States State Department has puzzled me.

Ample precedents for Canada's actions have already been mentioned in this debate; for instance, the United States government itself with its Truman doctrine of ownership of minerals on the seafloor of the continental shelf which later became international law.

Canada and the United States together have a regulation to check on incoming aircraft 200 miles off our coast. If we are to pay this kind of lip service to international law first, last and foremost, what is this? Is it a continuous and continuing violation of international law by Canada and the United States, or is it a legitimate self-interest and self-defence? I claim, Mr. Speaker, that it is the latter, just as this Arctic pollution bill is in the same category for Canada.

Hon. members will recall that the United States government protested in 1964 when Canada extended beyond the traditional three-mile limit an additional nine-mile exclusive fishing zone. But two years later in 1966, Mr. Speaker, the United States government adopted a contiguous zone of nine miles to add to the three-miles of her territorial waters in which she controlled fishing. In this same area there is a Senate bill on pollution which has since gone to a Congressional group of the House of Representatives and the Senate. I am referring to the old bill HR-4148 in which they applied pollution controls and other regulations not only to their territorial waters but to the contiguous zone.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that when our motives are better understood and when the intent of this legislation becomes clear to the world, other nations including the United States will introduce similar legislation for similar good reasons.

I am sure that everyone in this House hopes for an eventual international agreement binding on all nations, at which time the need for our unilateral action will disappear. Until that time, however, let us be clear, let us be positive and act as the government has acted in this case, in accordance with the recommendations made to this House by the parliamentary standing committee. I have mislaid my paper, sir, but the language of it was clear: it said that the Canadian government should immediately make clear to the world the necessity of a declaration of sovereign control to prevent pollution in the Arctic.

I should like also to support very strongly the suggestion of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) who said he hoped there would be a recorded vote on this bill and that it would be passed unanimously. I do not know if there is precedent in this House for a vote to be recorded when all are in agreement.

An hon. Member: Oh, yes.

Mr. St. Pierre: I am happy to hear that there is. I hope we follow this practice at the conclusion of this debate. Both the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) have stated that they are in favour of the legislation—in principle, of course. We can go further than this at this time.

I have read the bill with some care and attention. I would only say there are very few bills coming before the House which cannot be improved by a hardworking parliamentary standing committee, and I have no doubt that improvements can be made to this legislation.

Mr. Nesbitt: The government will not pay attention to them.

Mr. St. Pierre: The bill, I am happy to see, has brought strong support from two of the parties of the opposition; the third party at the moment is still silent. The Leader of the Opposition spoke of legislation association with this bill. He was speaking of the establishment of the 12-mile territorial sea limit. I agree with him, and I also agree with the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands that these two bills really are linked together and that we scarcely discuss one without the other. The Leader of the Opposition said this implies that we are abandoning our assertion to sovereignty over the waters we consider to be ours. In this I totally disagree with him. My opinion is quite the reverse and I should like to take a few minutes of the time of the House to review this matter.

What is the effect of the 12-mile territorial sea legislation which is to come before us later, and how particularly does it apply in the Arctic? Questions which were asked of the Secretary of States for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) related to the drawing of baselines from which the 12-mile territorial limit could be extended. The question is, of course, where are these baselines to be drawn? If they were drawn from headland to headland they would be in accordance with the Norwegian decision in the international court of 1954. Would they be drawn around the perimeter of the Arctic islands? The Norwegian decision is, I suggest, crucial in this matter. It had to do with the surrounding of a smaller archipelago by baselines at the northern part of Norway.

In the subsequent dispute before the world court a dispute which resulted at the conclusion of that hearing in a Norwegian victory, it was established that baselines could be drawn not only from mainland to island but from island to island, including small islands. In the Norwegian decision some of the baselines are as long as 44 miles.

The question is, Mr. Speaker, how much farther might we extend baselines in the Arctic? If we were to enclose the entire outer perimeter we would in one case at least, in the case of such a line stretching from Prince Patrick to Banks Island in the McClure Strait, have to draw a baseline of 120 miles. Could we successfully sustain this in the world court, bearing in mind that it has been announced in this debate that Canada is fully prepared to go to the world court and defend her declaration of a full 12-mile territorial sea limit? I do not know the answer to this, Mr. Speaker, and neither does the world court which is not now seized of it.

I would draw the attention of the House to an associated matter. The purpose of our establishing control in the Northwest Passage is, to my mind, primarily this: we wish to control pollution and bar the passage to tankers which we consider to be dangerous. We have an interest in this. I do not think that any member of the House has suggested seriously that Canada would deny innocent passage to ships on any occasion, provided that passage was truly innocent, and this would apply not only to our territorial waters but also to our internal waters.

May I next draw to the attention of hon. members of the House the four small islands between Prince of Wales and Bathurst Islands; they are Garrett, Lowther, Young and Russell. That sounds like a firm of lawyers. The distance between these islands is less than 24 miles, well below the maximum limit of 44 miles in the Norwegian decision. By any rule current in international practice, the territorial waters of Canada would extend completely across the Northwest Passage in the Barrow Strait. I do not suggest that this is sufficient authority, but I suggest it would back the government in its statement that the waters between the islands are Canadian.

In all common sense, sir, let us face this fact: we are attempting to make new law in our establishment of Arctic pollution control measures contained in this bill. We are extending our authority, although no further than 56 other nations, in this 12-mile territorial sea bill. Let us be sure that we retain in that bill the advantage which geography gives us. Let us extend the territorial waters across a portion of the Northwest Passage. And one gate in that passage, Mr. Speaker, is worth as much as ten gates when ships want to pass through from one side to the other.

As to the requirement that we permit innocent passage, I do not think Canada has anything to fear from adhering to the rule of innocent passage. Innocent passage is not extended to a ship which offers a threat to the peace or good order of the coastal state involved. A supertanker in the Northwest Passage, carrying 25 times the amount of oil we have been cleaning up in Chedabucto Bay as a result of the spill,—25 times, Mr. Speaker,—which is in a dangerous condition would clearly, in any international court, be treated as a threat to the good order of this nation.

Yet the United States' position is that we should not have this. The United States position has been stated quite recently by Hon. John R. Stevenson, who is the legal adviser to the Department of State. I will not read the whole of his remarks; there is not time and my time is running out. In essence he states that the United States position is that through any archipelago there ought to be a high seas passage. In terms of our Arctic archipelago, Mr. Speaker, this simply does not make sense. Can any hon. member of the House conceive of our permitting a high seas passage through the Northwest Passage of a piece of junk like the Arrow which sank in Chedabucto Bay?

I wish to refer to a couple of the statements made by the Leader of the Opposition—one in particular. He asked what the intentions of the government are with respect to enforcement of our Arctic pollution control zone. That is a good question and I wish to deal with it briefly. We may not do anything. We must recognize the possibility that Panarctic may never discover oil in the Arctic, the Baffin iron ore deposits may never be open, or the nickel deposits on the mainland or numerous other deposits. The Arctic may go back to sleep for another 50 years. It slept before and it may sleep again. But I do not believe this will be so. Personally, I believe that the Arctic maiden is finally awake. Our duty is to ensure that she is not raped.

In answer to the question raised by the Leader of the Opposition, I suggest there are three things that can be done immediately. One is research. We are gaining some valuable data from Dr. Cowan's work at Chedabucto. We need research in the Polar pack. We need knowledge as to what the perils are and how they can be overcome. It is the primary duty of this nation to carry this out. In accepting and claiming new responsibilities in the Arctic, the Canadian nation must accept new duties. That is one of them.

Navigational aids are another matter. We should look forward to that, assuming that passage proves economically feasible for either ore carriers or oil carriers. At the very least we should install a Decca system. Five Decca stations can be built at an estimated cost of $10 million—a very modest amount. We must provide these and other services.

I assume that the Arctic is going to continue to grow. I believe it is going to become an extremely important and productive part of this nation. Even though it will involve considerable expense, we must build a modern ice-breaking fleet. At the moment half a million dollars is being spent by the government on the design of one such ship. I do not know what the total cost would be of building ships far above the class of the St. Laurent, ships with at least 80,000 horsepower which would be capable of handling the Polar pack even in the open Beaufort Sea. Possibly a fleet of two or three would cost an estimated $200 million or $300 million. We owe a duty to ourselves and to other nations in the Arctic to be prepared to spend this amount of money. Let us do it cheerfully.

In conclusion, I congratulate the government without reservation on the principles which are expressed in this legislation. I thank hon. members for their attention.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member who has just spoken will permit a question. Just before the hon. member concluded his remarks he said he was going to deal with the question of how the government would enforce the new pollution regulations inasmuch as we have declared ourselves as sort of outlaws, outside the field of international law in this regard. I was listening attentively to what the hon. member had to say, but he dealt with another subject. I wonder whether he forgot to continue his remarks as to how we would deal with a country or a ship that would not obey our regulations.

Mr. St. Pierre: I suggested we provide the services in the case of the Decca system. As the hon. member knows, Canada is not a signatory—is the hon. member listening?

Mr. Nesbitt: I am trying to.

Mr. St. Pierre: As the hon. member undoubtedly knows, Canada is not a signatory to the convention which requires us to provide free Decca service. We can charge ships for providing icebreaker services. Without it, ships may be left stuck, such as was the case with the Manhattan yesterday or the day before. It had to be broken free by the John A. Macdonald.

An hon. Member: The St. Laurent.

Mr. St. Pierre: I am sorry, the St. Laurent. This is a part of the exercise of sovereignty.

Mr. Nesbitt: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. What does the government plan to do if a ship of one of the major powers of the world, such as the Soviet Union or the United States, said it would not pay any attention if one of our pollution officers wished to go aboard? What will we do? Will we shoot at the ship? That is a very practical question, and I should like to know the answer.

Mr. St. Pierre: What would the hon. member suggest we do if American troops marched into Saskatchewan? That question is about as sensible as the hon. member's.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose at this stage of the debate to enter into the area of the question just asked by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt). However, I overheard a suggestion that we have had a little bit of experience in the matter of enforcement of our authority on the sea with respect to our fisheries legislation. If the hypothetical situation which the member is trying to provoke in his line of questioning does develop, undoubtedly this Parliament will be convened. If such a major emergency as the member is trying to conjure up does develop, we will debate the situation when it ceases to be hypothetical.

At times I am rather surprised at members of the official opposition, such as the hon. member for Oxford and the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse). I intended to make reference to him in my remarks. The member for South Shore, for whom I have great admiration and who is a hardworking, diligent member of this House, seems to get cold feet and the jitters at certain stages of important and crucial discussion in the House.

Mr. Nesbitt: We just want to know what they are going to do.

[Mr. St Pierre.]

Mr. Barnett: An example of this was the attitude taken by the hon. member for South Shore during the debate on the territorial sea and fishing zones. I thought at the time that the Canadian government was being far too timid and afraid in exercising its proper jurisdiction in being responsible for the welfare of the Canadian nation in the world in which we live. As the matters stand at the moment, I am much happier with the stance the government has now taken than I was at the time of the debate on the fishing zones and straight baselines in 1964.

There are two aspects of the debate in which we are engaged. I feel this is one of the more significant debates that will be entered upon in the Canadian Parliament for some time. This bill is merely one facet of a debate which will carry into two or three other pieces of legislation that are either on the Order Paper or which have been announced by the government. There is the international debate and the internal debate as to the actual content and substance of the bill we have before us, regarding which we can only touch on a few highlights at this second reading stage.

At the present time, the international debate appears to be confined to exchanges between ourselves and our neighbours to the south: we all regard them as our friendly neighbours. It is important that we examine the bill in the terms of the attitude which the Canadian Parliament, on the one hand, and the government of the United States on the other, are taking toward it. As hon. members know, the subject matter was discussed in advance by the committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The discussion is summarized in the committee's report which is still awaiting disposition; a motion with regard to it is at present on the Order Paper.

I felt that in participating in this debate I should discuss the bill in both its international and its internal aspects in relation to the report which the committee has placed before the House. The motion that the report be placed before the House was made, in its present form, by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Simpson), perhaps a bolder colleague of the hon. member for Oxford, and the hon. member for South Shore.

I should like to draw attention to the contrast between the comments made by the United States and the views expressed by my leader this afternoon. I will use as a foundation a report which appeared in the Globe and Mail of April 16. This follows the text of Wednesday's Hansard reproducing the bulletin put out by the United States Information Service:

> If Canada had the right to claim and exercise exclusive pollution and resources jurisdiction on the high seas, other countries could assert the right to exercise jurisdiction for other purposes, some reasonable and some not, but all equally invalid according to international law.

Some of the submissions which were put on record this afternoon by my leader makes it clear that what is valid and invalid under international law is not so lightly to be summed up as it is assumed in this statement from the United States. The hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre) referred to this during his speech and it is pertinent also to the question asked by the hon. member for Oxford. In the long run, whether or not we can assert the jurisdiction which this bill proposes to assert will depend on whether, in the eyes of the world community, this is a reasonable extension of our authority or not.

I submit it is a reasonable extension of our authority. This is a view already expressed by the standing committee of this House particularly charged with the subject matter which has been brought before us today in the present bill. This is really the area of debate in which we are engaged with the United States at the present time. I maintain the government has leaned backward in seeking not to go beyond the bounds of reasonableness in asserting our jurisdiction. The posture taken is much less positive than that taken by the committee and reflected in the report which was unanimously adopted by its members. I should like to quote from page five of the committee's first report, where it is stated:

> Your committee is unimpressed with arguments that adequate pollution safeguards could be effected by international agreement. Not only has progress towards international accord on maritime pollution control been extremely slow, but serious doubts are now being expressed by reputable scientists that present proposals for such international pollution control are adequate even for the world's temperate waters. As desirable as international maritime pollution control would be, the delicate balance of nature in the Arctic can only be protected by a more stringent set of pollution controls than anything that has been proposed internationally to date.
> Your committee rejects the suggestion that an international waterway exists through the Canadian Arctic archipelago.

In other words, the committee asserted our sovereignty over these waters in advance of the government. Further on, the report reads:

> The waters of the Canadian Arctic achipelago lie over the continental shelf; the Arctic Islands and the continental shelf are a geological extension of the Canadian mainland and the North American land mass.

I submit that the report of the committee and the position taken by the Canadian government are so eminently within the bounds of reasonableness that the United States, even though it may at the moment be adopting an attitude contrary to the one we have chosen, will eventually recognize the logic of the Canadian position and recognize that it is not only in Canada's interests but, in the long run, in the interests of the United States as well.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to spend the rest of the time available to me dealing with what I have called the internal debate, speaking as a member of the committee, as one who was concerned with the drafting of the report and also as one who has spent some time examining—as have many other hon. members—the terms of the bill before us. I should like to refer to the clause which is entitled "The application of the act". Earlier this afternoon I asked the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) whether he would make available to us maps or charts outlining in graphic form the area encompassed by this bill. I should like to quote briefly from the definition in the clause to which I have referred.

> —the area enclosed by the sixtieth parallel of north latitude, the one hundred and forty-first meridian of longitude and a line measured seaward from the nearest Canadian land a distance of one hundred nautical miles; except that in the area between the islands of the Canadian arctic and Greenland—

That is not the part with which I am concerned. It goes on:

> —where the line of equidistance between the islands of the Canadian Arctic and Greenland is less than one hundred nautical miles—

I note that at no point in this definition is any reference made to what might or might not be done about the establishment of baselines. The hon. member for Coast Chilcotin, I think it was, referred to something of this in his remarks and it does raise the question as to what kind of area we are going to enclose. If one measures 100 miles from the nearest Canadian land, just what does that mean when one is thinking of an area on the map where the name "McClure Strait" is printed? This is an important consideration that could fruitfully be clarified, so far as the government's idea is concerned, prior to the second reading of the bill.

I suggest that the thinking of the government on this point could best be served by giving the House a picture of what they have in mind. We all like to look at maps and pictures and I am sure that the minister of Indian affairs could produce a very interesting portrayal, if he would. However, it should be obvious both to the government and to the minister that once this bill goes before the committee this will be one of the first and perhaps most pertinent questions which will be raised. I doubt very much that the committee will be satisfied to report the bill back to the House until there has been a pretty specific clarification of just what is the intent of the bill on this particular point.

Mr. Chrétien: It is 100 miles from the coast; that is quite clear.

Mr. Nesbitt: The hon. member is getting curious too, I see.

Mr. Barnett: I have never attempted to deny that I have an insatiable curiosity which might exceed even that of the hon. member, though our interests might run in different directions at times. However, we will get to this in the committee. I thought I heard the minister say something about 100 miles from the coast. This is the very point. How far does it go when there is no coast? I think the minister understands perfectly the concern that members of the committee, and I think all members of the House, will have in regard to what happens about baselines in the Arctic under this piece of legislation.

There is one other aspect of the internal debate to which I should like to refer, and this has to do with the administration of the act. I refer to the pollution prevention officers and to the clauses that provide that the Governor in Council may make quite a long and complicated series of regulations under the authority of which the pollution prevention officers will operate—their terms of reference. In other words, I think a legitimate concern of the members of this House is just what kind of tools the government are going to give these pollution prevention officers to enable them to do their job.

I suggest that if one is thinking purely in terms of the regulation of shipping and the development of ways and means for vessels to navigate the Northwest Passage, this is the relatively simple part of the job. There is available knowledge of ship engineering and design, of mechanics and the technology of navigational aids for this to be done. I think that we have this kind of basic know-how, though obviously there is some exploratory work to be done in the application of that technology to the particular situation in the Arctic. The experimental voyage of the Manhattan last year, and again this year, is also bringing some additional knowledge to this area.

As the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin said, even though this may be a fairly expensive aspect of the Canadian commitment and responsibility once this bill becomes law, nevertheless I think in many ways it is the least difficult part of the administration of the act. I think a much more complex aspect of the act dealing with pollution prevention officers and the terms of reference under which they will operate relates to the clauses of the bill that refer to the regulation of economic resource exploitation in the Arctic, and the clauses that deal with the matter of control and disposition of waste deposited by ships.

I was rather intrigued by that phrase in the bill, because while seafaring people have spoken affectionately of ships in the feminine gender, giving them a personality, nevertheless a ship is not in my view capable of taking the conscious action of depositing something. I suggest this is done by the people on the ship.

To use the phrase in the bill which refers to the control and disposition of waste that may be deposited by ships, I suggest this will be an aspect of the administration of the act that will be most challenging, one in which the biggest job will have to be done, under the initiative of the Canadian government, if this legislation is to be meaningful and if, as the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin said, Canada is going to live up to the duties and responsibilities that the passage of this legislation will entail.

On this aspect of the matter I would again refer to the report of the committee, because I think it is important to put this particular part of the committee proceedings in the context of the debate on this bill at second reading stage. I should like to indicate to the government the committee's assessment of what the situation is and what is required to be done. At page 8 of the committee report there appears the following paragraph:

> The committee was unimpressed with efforts made to pinpoint the exact location of the Pan Arctic barge sinkings which might have permitted ascertaining any subsequent oil pollution and would have provided useful scientific data on the dissipation rate of substantial quantities of diesel fuel in low temperature water and more important, information on the effect of the oil on the marine life of the waters affected.

Note this passage, Mr. Speaker:

> The interdepartmental committee which was established by the government, to deal with water pollution disasters after the Santa Barbara incident, did not bother to send a representative north to investigate the extent of the oil pollution resulting from the barge sinking. In your committee's view, the attention which the interdepartmental oil pollution emergency committee gave to the barge sinking incident was totally inadequate and unsatisfactory.

I cite this as the view of the committee as to how inadequate is the present activity of the government in this area in relation to the kind of responsibilities that will be imposed upon pollution prevention officers under the terms of this bill. At page 9 of the committee proceedings the report of the committee reads:

> Your committee is of the opinion that there is a serious lack of knowledge, worldwide, as to the destructive effects of hydrocarbons and particularly as to the effect of hydrocarbon pollution in Arctic waters.

The committee goes on to recommend that appropriate agencies of the government move immediately to conduct research in the Arctic to gather information on the whole question of dealing with hydrocarbons in cold waters, on the toxicity of various hydrocarbons to plant and animal life, and on methods for control of oil spills.

It may be true that we are garnering a certain amount of knowledge and information from the emergency situation at Chedabucto Bay, but this certainly was not in the minds of members of the committee as the sort of thing that should be involved in the research they proposed. If we are to move seriously toward enabling ourselves to control pollution from possible spills of waste from ships or as a result of economic resource exploitation either in the petroleum field or, for that matter, in the mining field in the Arctic, I feel the government should heed the recommendations contained in the committee's report.

The committee goes on to say that it recommends continued research by the Department of Fisheries and Forestry to establish the extent of the fisheries potential of Arctic waters. This matter was raised by some members of the Committee on Fisheries and Forestry the other day when we had before us officials of the Fisheries Research Board. The questioning by members of the committee made quite apparent that the Fisheries Research Board of Canada has a mere pittance allocated to it for research work on marine life and the whole potential of the Arctic fisheries resources.

I submit that if this bill is to mean anything, if on its passage it is to result in something that will gain recognition of Canada in the international community, if it is to contribute to the evolvement of international law of the sea, and if Canada is to enhance rather than weaken its position in the international community as a result of pioneering this type of legislation, the government of Canada will have to take seriously the recommendations the committee put forward unanimously in its report and will have to bring before this Parliament suitable proposals for the spending of necessary funds in order to carry out this type of work.

If this is not done, I suggest the passage of this bill will be a mere echo of fine words. If that should be the situation it would be highly desirable that the Arctic go back to sleep for another 50 years, as the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin suggested it might. Unless we are prepared to tackle this job, the Arctic would be much safer asleep than awake, with the kind of activity the industrial age and the industrial attitudes of the inhabitants of the North American continent will impose on it.

I am inclined to share the hope expressed by the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin that the Arctic will not go back to sleep. But unless the government of Canada is prepared to put much more muscle into its activities, in the fields which have been highlighted in the committee's report, than so far it has indicated it is prepared to do, I submit that perhaps we might as well forget about all this talk of pollution control in the Arctic.

Mr. Nesbitt: I am glad to see you finally agree with me.

Mr. Barnett: I conclude, Mr. Speaker, by referring to the remarks of the hon. member for Oxford, who is so interested in my remarks, when he implied that as a solution we simply develop a large Canadian navy and put it around the Arctic islands to make sure no ships go near there. This is not a solution which I am sure even he—

Mr. Nesbitt: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, fun is fun but when the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) gets to the point of distorting my remarks and putting in my mouth words which were not implied, it is a little too much.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It may be too much, but it is not a question of privilege. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett).

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, I have concluded my remarks.

Mr. Ray Perrault (Burnaby-Seymour): Mr. Speaker, if there is a difference of opinion among the opposition members I know one of the government members would like to intervene to settle any difficulty which may exist there. This has been a reasonably amicable day. It is heartening that apart from certain technical criticisms, there exists in the House widespread support for Bill C-202.

I must meet one criticism that was made earlier this evening by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse). He suggested that Canada had lost its position of prestige in international affairs and that we had not been sufficiently co-operative in matters related to protecting the world environment. At least, the implication was there that we had avoided opportunities to co-operate at the international level. I can tell members that no nation has fought more earnestly to undertake useful initiatives to protect the world environment than has Canada. I do not think a statement attacking Canada's reputation abroad is a useful one to introduce in this debate.

Canada, however, I think is somewhat frustrated. The United Nations Economic and Social Council report entitled "Problems of the Human Environment" outlines very well the situation which exists in the world today in respect of pollution of the sea. This is the source of our frustration. I quote as follows from page 15 of this document which was tabled at the last session:

> Pollution of the sea is a continual threat to its future productivity. Although the International Convention for the Prevention of Pollution of the Sea by Oil has been in existence since 1954, oil pollution remains a major concern, and other forms of equally damaging pollution continue with little or no control.

This is the source of Canadian concern and frustration. No nation has been more willing to co-operate at the world level to accelerate the process of developing her national standards. But when the United Nations itself admits failure and an inability to develop these standards, and when the ecology of the Arctic is in serious danger, Canadians cannot remain, as Churchill said, supine and silent while the destructive process goes on. At page 64 of this report we have the great hope held by U Thant. This is what he said:

> The control of pollution in marine environment raises problems of legal nature such as measures which States can take outside their territorial seas in self-protection against pollution—

This is a recognition by all nations that this question has to be dealt with by nations of the world. The report continues:

> —liabilities arising from casualties involving discharge of oil or other pollutants, powers of surveillance by coastal states to implement measures for improving the safety of navigation and controlling maritime pollution.

Then it tells us about the convening of the conference to be held at Brussels from November 10 to 28, 1969, with a view to adopting conventions on both the private and public law aspects of these problems. Canada was one of the most co-operative nations in the world to make the Brussels conference a success. The conference was not a success; it was another in a series of frustrations experienced by Canada and other nations with serious threats to their maritime ecology.

But let no one in any section of this House suggest that Canada has not made an earnest endeavour to inspire international concert to meet this problem of pollution and the protection of the environment. No nation has made a greater contribution at the United Nations to suggest ways in which the resources of the sea can be developed for the benefit of all mankind, and it is to the honour and credit of Canada that this has been done.

The hon. member for South Shore should not have made the statement he did. The need for legislative action to protect the delicate ecological balance in the Arctic has been treated very eloquently this evening by my colleague the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin, who I thought made a splendid contribution to this debate. But some very useful remarks have been made by opposition members as well.

Recent pollution catastrophes have served to emphasize the pressing need for stringent anti-pollution measures on all of Canada's coasts, not merely on the Arctic coast but, perhaps because of its unique ecology, particularly on our Arctic coastline. As the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin stated, yesterday some of us had an opportunity to visit the site of Canada's recent pollution crisis. Certainly one factor emerged—that very little scientific research exists to assist this or any other nation to combat a major oil pollution catastrope, especially should that pollution occur under subzero conditions.

When the Arrow foundered on our east coast, the fact of the matter is that Canadian science had not one single precedent to assist us in meeting that serious pollution crisis. It is to the credit of Canadian scientists from coast to coast, and members of our armed forces, that such a splendid job was done. But let no group of scientists be ever faced with that kind of problem again. The team of scientists and defence personnel who won the victory at Chedabucto Bay would have found it impossible to win a similar victory in Canada's far north had a mammoth supertanker been crushed in the ice, a tanker carrying not three million gallons of bunker-C but 75 million gallons.

I was in New York when the Manhattan came back from her historic visit to the Arctic. All of the New York tugs welcomed her. Not much mention was made of the role of the John A. Macdonald in all of the speeches of welcome that were delivered. But when placed in drydock it was soon determined that had the Manhattan been carrying oil in her tanks instead of test-run water, the result would have been very different. There were two large holes below the waterline in the cargo tanks, and one hole would have accommodated a large truck, and yet the voyage was termed a resounding success.

Had there been oil in the tanks of the Manhattan instead of seawater, there would have been serious ecological damage in our Arctic. Surely our friends in the United States who suggest they are not prepared to recognize our proposed claim of Arctic jurisdiction for the urgent and critical purposes of pollution control must realize that some of our concern at least stems from this incident, as well as from oil pollution caused by their numerous recent drilling accidents on the west, the east and the Gulf coasts.

The Americans have acted to protect themselves from further catastrophes. They have recently adopted a law calling for unlimited liability in cases of wilful negligence, plus fines of $100 per gross ton up to a maximum of $14 million for even accidental spills. We must logically and understandably act in an even more critical area. American losses have been mainly affecting the leisure industry and the shrimp and oyster beds. There are fewer sandy beaches in Santa Barbara, and Louisiana shrimps will not be in as good supply this season.

The Americans are logical people. Apart from official policy pronouncements, undoubtedly they recognize Canada's need to protect the entire Arctic archipelago with its hundreds of thousands of square miles of surrounding sea and ice as a region into which ships should venture only under strict pollution controls.

It should be recalled that there is reason for Canadian concern. A spokesman for Standard Oil stated, as the Manhattan completed her maiden voyage in New York:

> We may well see 25 to 30 supertankers operating across the top of the continent during the 70s, and if Arctic oil can be shipped in quantities through the northwest passage, so can iron, zinc, lead, copper, nickel and asbestos. They are only to be unearthed and delivered. The sleeping Arctic could become a very busy place.

I quote from the Congressional Record what a member of the United States House of Representatives said the other day:

> Imagine a nation with our maritime history... being forced to rely on a foreign-flag icebreaker for the completion of the Manhattan project. We appear to be on the threshold of a dramatic breakthrough for commercial carriage in the Polar regions. Thus it is imperative that we establish and maintain a responsive icebreaking capability.

Congress has now authorized a start by the U.S. coastguard on the construction of the most powerful icebreaker fleet in the world. The first ship will cost $59 million and it will be twice the size of the durable, hardworking John A. Macdonald.

Canadians are concerned about what might happen to a tanker that breaks up in the Arctic. We should be concerned. Not only is more oil being moved by sea each year but the size of oil tankers has also increased. The average tanker used during World War II had a capacity of 16,000 tons. By 1965 that average had risen to 27,000 tons, and a new tankers delivered in 1966 averaged 76,000 tons. A Japanese company has launched a 276,000 ton tanker, and other Japanese yards have orders for tankers as large as 312,000 tons. More than 60 tankers of 150,000 tons or more are on order throughout the world; tankers of 500,000 to 800,000 tons are on the drawing board, and those of more than one million tons are thought to be feasible. On the new 1,010-foot British tanker Esso Mercia two officers have been issued bicycles to help patrol the decks of the 166,890-ton vessel. If they build that million-ton tanker, they will be buying them automobiles!

The size of the tanker fleet itself is growing at a rate that rivals the growth in average size of new tankers. In 1965 it had increased to 3,500, and in 1968 it numbered 4,300 ships. At the present time nearly one ship out of every five in the world merchant fleet is engaged in transporting oil, and almost the entire fleet is powered by oil—yet some people question why Canada is concerned about the movement of ships of this size through our Arctic waters.

Is it really suggested that we should do nothing about pollution while plans are being evolved which would see massive tankers carrying potential pollutants across our northern seas? Indeed, the tanker danger in the Arctic may be so great—and I believe this—that no economic benefits can justify it.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Let us build a pipeline.

Mr. Perrault: Perhaps we should not have tankers travel there at all and we should insist that oil go out by pipeline. The Canadian people—and this is not restricted to one party—are determined to guard the Arctic ecosystem, its people, fauna, flora and the delicate balance among them from the disaster from a calamity such as a supertanker's oil spill.

• (9:40 p.m.)

Our friends in the United States insist that they, too, are concerned about "the dangers to marine environment and the absence of international guarantees to protect against pollution." But surely it is fair to suggest that there have been serious shortcomings in all programs, including the American program, to combat pollution. Significant oil spills have occurred in the United States alone with increasing frequency—180 in 1968, 192 in 1969, and 61 to March 1, 1970.

Surely any government of Canada would be remiss in its responsibilities to the people of this country if it procrastinated with respect to Arctic pollution control, and instead waited for other nations to establish international precedents which might eventually result in a body of international law which might again, at some vague, indeterminate future date, form the basis for a decision by the world court. Surely the Arctic is an area where Canada, of all nations, must develop and create its own precedents. The initiative lies with us. The measure before us would provide some of the world's toughest pollution penalties, and so it should.

While the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Douglas) delivered what I thought was a useful speech today with reference to the subject of international law, it was indeed disheartening to note the nature of the opposition criticism directed toward this government by the deputy leader of that party. He stated on April 8, 1970, as recorded at page 5624 of Hansard:

> —it is obviously extremely regrettable that the government of this country, a government which has a position of some importance in the international family, should find it necessary to reduce the extent to which Canada is ready to submit itself to the rule of international law.

> If every country in the world, every country of the United Nations, were to reduce the sphere in which it would be internationally bound every time it is faced by a matter of national interest, pretty soon the whole concept of the International Court and, indeed, of the United Nations itself, would be dead and buried.

Of course this kind of statement is palpable nonsense. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has stated in the House of Commons that Canada strongly supports the rule of law in international affairs and that Canada is prepared to participate actively in multilateral efforts, as it has already, to develop agreed rules on environmental and fisheries protection; but that Canada is not prepared to engage in litigation with states on vital issues where existing laws are either inadequate or non-existent and thus do not provide a firm basis for judicial decision. As the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin has pointed out, such custom as does exist leans without any question in favour of the world's shipping companies, with little or no reference to pollution and that this, to Canada and its Arctic in 1970, is an intolerable situation.

So we have submitted, and quite properly, a reservation to Canadian acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice relating to those areas of the law of the sea which are underdeveloped or inadequate. I suggest that in spite of these reservations the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) should confer with his leader and be reminded that Canada's acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice remains much broader than that of most other members of the United Nations. It is to be regretted that the hon. member for York South was not in the chamber today to hear his leader's speech. The deputy leader of the New Democratic Party need feel no embarrassment about Canada's position regarding that court, nor should he nor anyone else feel apologetic about the constructive role that we have played and continue to play at the United Nations.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, there is something quixotic about the position of the hon. member for York South. The other day he urged support for what he termed "the rule of law in international affairs." He accused the government of "hypocrisy in international affairs." Yet today his leader expressed opposition to world court intervention and made a compelling case for unilateral action by Canada.

Today, also, in another display of verbal acrobatics the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) expressed general support for Bill C-202 after criticizing the government in his initial statements. In January he accused the government of being dilatory, of lacking resolution, and I recall that he said the government "lacked old-fashioned guts." The challenge was issued to stand up and unilaterally declare our sovereignty over the Arctic. But after the government acted on April 8 to introduce two bills, one relating to pollution and the other to Canadian territorial waters, the hon. gentleman from Halifax who was a militant hawk in January became the dove of April. He criticized the government for failing to submit the matter to the International Court of Justice. There were no emotional appeals for old-fashioned guts. Here are his words:

> We must recognize that it constitutes a serious step, a step hardly in the right direction, for Canada to reduce the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice—

He questioned the wisdom of taking this action—

> —in an arbitrary manner without... giving an opportunity to the members of this House... to express their views on this matter before the adoption by Canada of a position with regard to the jurisdiction of the court.

His words are to be found at page 5624 of Hansard. It is encouraging that today he expressed support for the pollution measures but mentioned only in passing his view that we should act through the world court. Most of his opposition was to Bill C-203 which, he told us, actually serves to limit Canadian sovereignty in the north. The allegation is spurious; indeed it is mischievous. Both measures will advance substantially Canada's claim in the Arctic.

Mr. Aiken: Will the hon. member accept a question?

Mr. Perrault: When I have finished my speech I will be glad to do that. If you will just listen to the burden of my argument, perhaps I can convert you.

Mr. Aiken: It is a burden all right.

Mr. Perrault: We were told today and on other occasions that we should declare our sovereignty immediately and not wait. Opposition leaders have been calling for a "ringing declaration of sovereignty." Those are great words for the hustings. Those who advocate a dramatic unilateral proclamation of Canadian sovereignty urge a policy which is far from simple.

Today, Canada's statements on sovereignty over the years were chronicled very well. Among other statements about our sovereignty was one made by Alvin Hamilton. He made a ringing declaration about Canadian sovereignty in 1958, but now we have the official opposition demanding again that we make another ringing declaration of our sovereignty over the Arctic. This just indicates how effective the Hamilton declaration was. The problem is not how to proclaim Canadian sovereignty, but how to get other nations to admit to our claim. Words are meaningless. Actions which create precedents are meaningful.

Surely those who advocate reference to the world court should be reminded that the notice to the United Nations, known formally in international law as a reservation to Canada's acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction of the international court, had to be sent before the bill was tabled. Unless Canada had given notice to the United Nations in advance of the tabling of the legislation, it would have been tied up by any international court ruling arising from an unexpected American challenge to the bill. This is how unrealistic was the initial suggestion from spokesmen for the opposition parties.

Those who want to place the fate of Canada's Arctic ecology and Arctic sovereignty in the hands of a world court without sufficient precedents to render a sound decision perform a notable disservice. No government need accept the jurisdiction of the world court. An exception lies in the so-called optional clauses by which some states agree to accept the jurisdiction of the court in disputes with other states which have likewise agreed to accept the jurisdiction of the court.

Despite the statements made by the hon. member for York South and by the Leader of the Official Opposition, only one-third of the United Nations members have signed the optional clauses and less than a third of that third have signed without some sort of reservation. Only 45 of the 126 member states of the United Nations have accepted some measure of compulsory jurisdiction by the international court. Only 13, technically, place no limitations on that jurisdiction, yet even among that 13 some limitations exist. Eighty-one nations have not filed declarations of acceptance of compulsory jurisdiction by the international court. Canada was not among the 13 before this week's action—we already had reservations.

The United States, which today disputes our jurisdiction and asks for international co-operation, reserved everything when signing, starting with immigration, including tariffs, trade, the Panama Canal and finally throwing in for good measure "all disputes essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of the United States," empowering itself to decide just what these might be. Yet our friends to the left suggest that Canada was remiss in her responsibility not to bring this entire problem before the world court.

Is it really fair for any nation to criticize Canada for withdrawing in part from the court's domain, especially in the domain of pollution where international law is critically underdeveloped? Understandably, Washington is concerned that our claim to our archipelago ocean may create a precedent which could embarrass it in some parts of the world. But the Beaufort Sea is not the Java Sea. As one writer has stated, Ottawa is not Djakarta. Those who may be frightened or dismayed by the reaction of the United States should be reminded of the Truman proclamation of the continental shelf theory of 1948—a very unilateral action. As far back as 1780 the United States unilaterally established a 62-mile limit for anti-smuggling inspection of vessels.

If the world finds it difficult to act in concert, the fact is that Canada is prepared to tackle the problem of environmental pollution in the Arctic alone and, Mr. Speaker, it is gratifying that this effort commands the support of most members of this House.

At the recent session of the United Nations it was clear that the world is faced with an environmental crisis. Many statements were made. The concept of the ocean as a limitless drainage basin for the world is wrong. The ocean itself has limitations, but we are faced with an environmental crisis and the world does not have laws for its own protection. The United Nations does great work, nations of the world working together and performing magnificently in many areas, but they have not been able to operate successfully in this battle against pollution. The inadequacy of world measures is not the fault of Canada. We continue to be one of the most active nations in the quest for international controls.

Surely it is not for a world without environmental standards and precedents to rule on the special problems of the Canadian Arctic, for Canadians will be the prime victims of any massive kind of pollution whether from oil spill or any other source. We are acting now to forestall the irreparable harm which might be caused while international law is developing to meet the current need. In 1972 there will be in Stockholm a conference on the environment, and Canada is a member of the planning committee. This conference will be vital to the world, but it would be a mistake to assume that Canada should wait until 1972 before acting to protect the ecology of her Arctic.

Those who suggest, almost in hurt tones, that they were surprised this measure was brought in without sufficient discussion or consideration should be reminded of the following paragraph in the Speech from the Throne as reported at page 3 of Hansard for October 23 last:

> While the Atlantic and the Pacific retain their traditional importance for Canada, the Arctic Ocean and its coastal regions may soon enter a period of rapid economic development. Much of this development will undoubtedly occur on the islands of the Canadian Archipelago, or in the adjoining continental shelf whose resources, under international law, we have the exclusive right to explore and exploit. With resource development, and the benefits it entails, may come grave danger to the balance of plant and animal life on land and in the sea, which is particularly precarious in the harsh polar regions. While encouraging such development, we must fulfil our responsibility to preserve these areas, as yet undespoiled and essentially in a state of nature. The government will introduce legislation setting out the measures necessary to prevent pollution in the Arctic Seas. It is also considering other methods of protecting Canada's ocean coasts.
> Through the United Nations and its agencies, Canada is seeking to establish a system to combat the pollution of international waters which threatens so many forms of life on this planet.

There is nothing inconsistent in the action taken by the government. As the Prime Minister said—> —the new Arctic legislation is not an extension of sovereignty, but a weapon against pollution—

But if it serves to strengthen Canada's undoubted sovereignty in the Arctic, would anyone in this House decry that auxiliary accomplishment? Beyond the immediate need for Canada to preserve the ecology of the Arctic it is essential that all Arctic nations agree on methods to protect the Arctic ecology.

Our present concern with Arctic sovereignty should not overshadow the fact that we share the Polar region with the United States and other nations. The Soviet Union already has cities in the Russian Arctic and has reputedly found large oil deposits there. Beyond the measure before us she obviously enjoys a special degree of support. Canada should initiate talks with all her Arctic neighbours, including the Soviet Union, and pool information on ecology for the purpose of setting and extending anti-pollution standards not only throughout the Arctic but to all other areas of the world seas.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard).

Mr. Howard (Skeena): May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: It being ten o'clock, the House will now consider the adjournment motion.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

INDUSTRY—CRITERIA FOR PAYMENTS TO AUTOMOBILE COMPANIES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, on March 23 last I asked a question of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) as recorded at page 5460 of Hansard. It had to do with the comments of the Auditor General as they appear in volume I of his report for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1969, at pages 94, 95 and 96. My question concerned the Auditor General's comments on the $180 million paid out by Order in Council P.C. 1969-172, $173 million of which was paid to a single auto manufacturing company, which I take to be the Ford Motor Company of Canada.

I asked why this money was paid out by Order in Council to this company when other companies such as General Motors and Chrysler were paid under Motor Vehicles Tariff Order No. 1965. The Auditor General gave the reason for this, as presented to him and to the Public Accounts Committee, and stated at page 95:

> From the evidence given, it is obvious that in determining whether or not a vehicle manufacturer has complied with the requirements of the Motor Vehicles Tariff Order 1965, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Department of Finance follow criteria additional to those incorporated in the Tariff Order.

> The officials of these departments, when testifying before the committee, appeared to place greater emphasis on criteria which are not included in the Tariff Order than on certain criteria which are included.

It seems to me that the criticism of the Auditor General is clear and specific. There is a Tariff Order under which rebates are made under the Canada-U.S. Auto Agreement to companies which are signatories to that agreement. The other auto companies have qualified under that Tariff Order. The Ford Motor Company for several years now has not complied with the Tariff Order and is not eligible for the rebates. However, on the basis of criteria which are not included in the Tariff Order the government has seen fit successively, year after year, to rebate to the Ford Motor Company the money to which it was not entitled under the Tariff Order. In this way $173 million has been paid out to the Ford Motor Company by Order in Council without any statutory authority. I say that because the company did not and could not comply with the Tariff Order.

I have read the evidence presented by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) before the Public Accounts Committee in which he points out that certain agreements took place in an exchange of letters between the government and the president of the Ford Motor Company. I point out that those letters are not law and that if there are criteria upon which the Ford Motor Company was to be paid the $173 million, those criteria should be placed in the Tariff Order.

The other day I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) if the government's contention that the Auditor General was invading the field of policy was based on the Auditor General's criticism that the payment of $180 million was on the authority of an Order in Council instead of on the authority of the Tariff Order. The Prime Minister replied that this was the case. I point out, Mr. Speaker, that the Auditor General was not objecting to money being paid out under the Canada-U.S.

Auto Agreement. He was not questioning policy. He was questioning, as I do, the right of the government to pay out $180 million by Order in Council to companies which could not qualify under a Tariff Order and under statutory authority. In this case there has been a payment of public funds without proper legislative and statutory authority.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Shame!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I have asked for an explanation of this matter and I will keep on asking for an explanation. The government has one of two responsibilities: either it must change the Tariff order so as to include any other criteria it may want to add, or it must say that those who do not qualify under the Tariff Order are not entitled to the rebate.

I raise this question because the answer I obtained from the Minister of Finance was both evasive and flippant. When I asked him about the criticisms of the Auditor General his reply was, "I would simply like to say that accountants make poor lawyers." I say that sometimes accountants make poor ministers, and if they continue to make these payments without the proper statutory authority they are not fulfilling their duties as ministers of the Crown.

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the criteria upon which the decision of the government was taken were based on Motor Vehicles Tariff Order 1965, the more comprehensive agreements entered into with the individual motor vehicle companies in Canada and their over-all performance under the automotive program.

Motor Vehicles Tariff Order 1965 is an integral part of the Canada-United States Automotive Products Agreement which provides for the removal of tariffs and other impediments to trade between the two countries in automotive products. It does not anticipate collection of duties by either country, and none have been paid. The Auditor General has not observed that this is an international free trade agreement. However, both Canada and the United States established conditions which are contained in the text of the agreement as a means to control and to serve as a measure of protection to their separate industries.

The condition established by Canada, as set out in the order in question, pertains to the definition of a manufacturer. This condition was established to ensure that in the process of rationalization our industry would not become smaller than in 1964. However, this condition by itself does not give any assurance of expansion by the Canadian industry within the North American market created by the agreement. The government therefore entered into more comprehensive agreements with each of the motor vehicle companies in Canada which placed greater production obligations upon them than provided under the international agreement.

A review at the end of 1967 and again in 1968 revealed that the companies had fully satisfied the production requirements placed upon them by the government. In most instances the companies were producing in Canada at a level in excess of that required under the program. However, it was determined that while certain companies had not fully met all the particular terms of the original definition of manufacturers as set out in the original order, they had in fact met or exceeded the objectives set by the government for total production performance. Therefore, the government exercised the authority given it by Parliament under section 22 of the Financial Administration Act to pass an Order in Council confirming certain moneys were not in fact owing to it for customs duties. Payments have not been made to these companies by the government to refund moneys to them.

Having devoted his time and effort to the legalistic aspect of the question, I hope the hon. member will recognize the fact that this agreement has produced employment for thousands of Canadians.

POLLUTION—PHOSPHATE DETERGENTS—DOOR-TO-DOOR DISTRIBUTION OF ARCTIC POWER

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I drew to the attention of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) the protest of a number of women in Edmonton. They were annoyed because they found unsolicited samples of a household detergent at their doors. Not only that, the detergent in question was Arctic Power, a detergent which a pollution analysis showed to contain 36.5 per cent phosphate—a very high percentage of a pollution.

The women complained on two counts. First, they wanted a stop put to the nuisance of finding unasked for samples of merchandise dumped on their doorsteps and their right to privacy on their property being invaded. Second, they resented the advertising of a product which adds to the pollution of our waterways. One of them, at least, mistakenly believed this product had already been banned by the government. The natural reaction of the women was to collect as many of the unwanted samples as possible and send them to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in the hope that he would do something to stop the nuisance. Evidently they were not aware that this matter falls within the responsibility of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Equally evident, the minister is not yet prepared to take this particular responsibility seriously.

Admittedly my question provoked amusement, dealing as it did with Arctic Power detergent in the midst of heated exchanges about Canada's sovereignty in the Arctic and the United States' reaction to the Canadian declaration. But equally admittedly the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs took advantage of the lighthearted moment to slither away quickly from my question about what he proposed to do to protect consumers from the practice of unsolicited door-to-door dumping of samples. In his reply to my question he said:

> I will examine the situation to see whether it is within the terms of reference of the Arctic pollution bill.

Fair enough. But, fun and games aside, it is the job of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to provide legislation to protect the consumer from a number of advertising and merchandising practices which constitute a constant source of irritation and added expense to the consumer. There is the business of unsolicited samples, some of which are dangerous to children. There is unsolicited advertising—letters, circulars and brochures which fill the garbage cans and wastebaskets of householders everywhere. There is the deceptive and mysterious practice of "cents off" advertising. Someone sent me a bottle of coffee marked "cents off" the other day. Cents off what? There is the two-package "deal" in razor blades which someone sent to my office a few days ago. They had four different prices marked on them, along with the encouraging admonition to "save 39 cents".

These things may seem amusing and scarcely worth the attention of members of this august chamber, but I can assure them that to the housewife who is struggling with 50 kinds of frustration they are unwarranted nuisances. Then there is the advertising of fruit drinks which have never had any fruit near them, and jelly desserts so fresh with fruit that one would swear they had just fallen from the tree. Yet they contain no fruit, even though many a mother congratulates herself on building up her children's health with such concentrated goodness from orchard and garden.

I realize that the minister has made a start on consumer protection in a number of directions. There is the hazardous products legislation, the provisions respecting the sizing of children's clothing and a number of other measures. But there is need of vigorous action along the lines I have mentioned tonight—action to ban house-to-house distribution of unsolicited samples, action to prohibit deceptive and fraudulent advertising and the peddling of products which are not what they seem to be. I would ask the minister to make a real start in this direction and earn the gratitude of all long-suffering consumers.

Mr. R. J. Orange (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. lady has once again taken up the cudgels on behalf of the housewives of Canada. Together with many other people she is attempting to control the use of phosphates in our society. She is a member of the Standing Committee on National Resources which is presently studying the Canada Water Bill, and I must say she is one of our strongest supporters with respect to, hopefully, the abolition of phosphates from detergents throughout Canada.

Listening to the hon. lady I felt, as a male who works in the House of Commons and who has to look after a constituency, a sense of regret that I do not have more opportunities to go shopping and price the coffee and other commodities which we find on the shelves of the stores. I only wish more of us had the relationship with the housewives of Canada the hon. lady has, so that we might learn more about the things which affect consumers. I am not being facetious when I say that. We as parliamentarians face this problem of trying to determine somehow or other what is right for the people who live in this country, not least of whom are the housewives who have to live within the family budget during the course of any given two-week or one-month period.

I think that the Minister of Consumer Affairs, in the job he is trying to do of bringing consumer items closer to the people of Canada so they will understand better what they are purchasing when they go into grocery or other stores, is doing the kind of job Canadians are asking him to do. I know the hon. lady will continue to pressure him in terms of finding those areas where there are problems, but I would assure the House that the minister, through his department, is taking on as many things as he can at any one time.

In conclusion, as far as free samples are concerned I cannot help but wonder whether we should turn off our television sets when advertising appears, because in effect this is the same as a free sample coming through the mails or through door-to-door distribution. But to the hon. lady I again say that I am sure the minister will bear her words in mind and do what he can to straighten out the sort of things that bother us all.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE—APPOINTMENT OF JUDGES

Mr. H. E. Stafford (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I would think that justice and the just society are synonymous. The components of a just society must be economic, political and legal justice. By "legal justice" I mean justice according to the law, which includes legal procedure, jurisdiction of the courts and the appointment of judges. I really want to draw attention to the need to encourage men of character and ability to dedicate themselves to a judicial career.

I do not propose to cast stones at the procedures adopted by the United States, but I submit that the well-springs of justice have become tainted by the odious controversy in the Senate over the confirmation of the men nominated by the President to the Supreme Court of the United States. Here there is a lesson to be learned. In at least one instance the nominee was rejected because the Senate thought his judicial record was open to question on the matter of civil rights. But it is important to notice that there is no suggestion that a person without judicial experience be appointed.

The present nominee is a judge from the northern state of Minnesota. To put the matter simply, the President is not going outside the judiciary for an appointment to the highest court in the land. It is common sense that it is an advantage to be able to examine a man's judical record before appointing him to a higher court.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) is well aware that the three greatest names in American legal history, namely, Holmes, Hughes and Cardoza, all served in lower courts. Lord Denning, who is probably the most widely-respected judge in the common law countries today, also proved his worth in a lower court before ascending to his present position as Master of the Rolls.

[Mr. Orange.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I direct the minister's attention to our Supreme Courts. This principle of elevating men of judicial experience is one that, I submit, ought to be implemented throughout the judical system. I am aware that the Minister of Justice has given partial effect to this principle, particularly in the province of British Columbia. I bear in mind that most of the appointments to the Supreme Court in that province during the past several years have been men who served in the county courts of that province. In the result, the reputation of the Supreme Court of British Columbia is unsurpassed in judical quality in this country.

The point I wish to make is that the principle ought to be applied on every possible occasion. I have in mind appointments from the county court to the Supreme Court trial division and from the Supreme Court trial division to the Supreme Court appellate division. The time has come when the wearing of the judical robe should be regarded as a career. There is a maxim in law that, no matter how illustrious he may have been as a lawyer, you never know what kind of judge you have until he puts on the robe. The Minister of Justice does not have to run that hazard in the higher courts. All that he needs do is turn a critical eye upon the records of the dedicated men who are already serving in the courts and have proved their fitness and their mettle.

If appointments are consistently made to the higher courts from ranks outside the incumbents on the bench, it cannot fail but produce at least two very adverse results. Firstly, it stifles the laudable hopes of men who have shown in the discharge of their duties that they are worthy of elevation. Ambition in a noble cause is a worthy spur; why remove it? Secondly, it will make the minister's task of finding men of ability for the lower courts even more difficult. I believe that it is an open secret that the majority of successful lawyers would hesitate before undertaking the wearisome and confining duties of judical office. In the result, it will eventually denude the trial division and the lower courts of the calibre of men who are sorely needed.

Let me put my argument another way and point out the benefits that will flow from the adherence of elevating proven judges of the lower courts. This method of selection would indicate to a practitioner who is prepared to make the sacrifice necessary to the acceptance of an appointment to the lower court that he may well be considered, in the light of his performance, to a higher tribunal.

It is scarcely necessary to point out that this system has a three-fold benefit. Firstly, it will attract the better lawyer to accept an appointment to the lower court. Secondly, it will provide a reservoir of men of experience and proven work upon which to draw for appointments to higher tribunals. Thirdly, it will add to the prestige of the lower court as it clearly follows that every appointment from the lower court to the higher court is a compliment, not only to the individual concerned but to every member of the lower court. It is scarcely necessary to add that a good judge will be a better judge for having served in the trial division.

Let me support my contention with another point. Every member of the provincial Supreme Court is ex-officio a member of the Appeal Court, and if the words "ex-officio members of the Appellate Court" are to have any real meaning the minister should have no hesitation in appointing men who have already proven their worth as judges of the Supreme Court in the trial division.

Let me give a few illustrations of judges, who have now retired, who began their careers as trial court judges in the Supreme Court and later strengthened the Appellate Court when they were appointed to the higher division. I pick these names at random from my own province for the reason that I am less knowledgeable about circumstances in other provinces, although I have no doubt my argument could be applied with equal force all across the country. These men, by unanimous approval of the profession and aided by their trial court experience brought strength and lustre to the higher court—the Honourable Mr. Justice Wilfred Roach, the Honourable Mr. Justice Keillor MacKay and the Honourable Mr. Justice James McRuer. I could add many more names to the list.

My submission is that it is vital in this changing age that the administration of justice be closer to the people and command the confidence of the people. I can think of no more effective way of promoting that objective than appointing to the higher courts men who have travelled the width and breadth of the province and mediated the differences between the people, face to face.

To overlook these dedicated men serving in the lower courts certainly does not add to the prestige and the morale of the Bench. There may be exceptions, but in my submission these principles should be generally adhered to. Perhaps I can put my argument in no better way than by drawing an analogy. The Minister of Justice and, yes, even the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) once sat in the back benches of this House. It is to the benefit of Parliament that the principle I now espouse for the judiciary was adopted in their case so they can now bring their back-bench experience and their ability to higher office. There is nothing so unique about the administration of justice that the same principle should not apply to judicial appointments.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I certainly agree with my hon. friend, who also is a very competent and well-known lawyer, that extreme care must be taken to appoint as judges of the courts, especially the superior courts, people of the highest calibre, competence and integrity. I must say to him, however, that it has been and is the practice of the minister to consider all qualified persons for judicial appointments. This certainly includes members of the lower courts. I am sure the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) will take note of the hon. member's remarks.

POLLUTION

NAMING OF MEMBERS OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the striking committee has now agreed on the membership of the Special Committee on Environmental Pollution, and if the House would be agreeable perhaps this could be made an order of the House:

That the members of the Special Committee on Environmental Pollution be Messrs. Aiken, Anderson, Comeau, Deakon, Gauthier, Given, Haidasz, Harding, Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand), Lachance, Rock and Sulatycky.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT INCREASE—REQUEST TO TABLE CORRESPONDENCE

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask permission of the House to try to make a move which will convince the right hon. Prime Minister of the seriousness of my observations yesterday. With your permission, sir, and with the permission of the House, if I may have it, I would like to table the recent correspondence I have received from my province on unemployment. Perhaps this might have an overflow effect on the Prime Minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I respectfully suggest to the hon. member that the procedures of the House, the Standing Orders and our practices do not make it possible for members to table correspondence and private papers. In this sense I would not think that we should depart from a rather lengthy practice. I suggest to the hon. member that if he wants to communicate this information to the Chair, to a member of the government or to other members of the House, he can do so in some other way than by tabling these documents.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I was going to ask for unanimous consent but I will take your advice and I will walk across later and present it to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Trudeau: Why don't you answer your letters?

Mr. Baldwin: This is not the Prime Minister's day to read letters.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

CONTINUATION OF BENEFITS TO UNEMPLOYED WHILE RETRAINING

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-205, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to encourage those who are unemployed and in receipt of unemployment insurance to undertake retraining and upgrading for the period of their unemployment and to continue receiving unemployment insurance benefits during that time.

• (11:10 a.m.)

The bill also seeks to change the present interpretation of the Act which disqualifies people from unemployment insurance benefits when temporarily attending school during lay-offs or waiting for a job opening.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

ACCEPTABLE LEVEL OF UNEMPLOYMENT IN COMBATING INFLATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the alarming increase in unemployment shown by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics' figures released yesterday, could the Prime Minister give the House an indication of the extent of unemployment that the government would permit before slowing down on its policies of creating more slack in the economy? In other words, what degree of unemployment does the government regard as the point at which it must begin to reverse its policies and the degree beyond which unemployment would be considered to be at the danger point?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I answered a lot of questions on this subject yesterday and I think the hon. member should refer to Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crouse: That is arrogance for you. How arrogant can you get?

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): The unemployed will appreciate that.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I do not have to refer to Hansard. I was here and heard the questions and I am asking for information from the Prime Minister. I think the House and the country are interested in knowing what the policy of the government is, and I should like the Prime Minister to state the point at which he and his government would consider that its policies designed to slow down the economy should be slackened. We would like to know what that unemployment figure would be.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, our policies to slow down the economy, as the hon. member puts it, will be slackened when the inflationary psychology is broken in this country. If we do not have the support of the opposition and of the general public—

Mr. MacEwan: That old story doesn't go down any more.

Mr. Trudeau: —in the fight against inflation, if they think the government is going to give up the fight against inflation, obviously the inflationary psychology will not be broken and therefore inflation will continue wreaking the havoc that it has on the Canadian economy. For this reason I appeal to the opposition and to public opinion to realize that we do intend to beat inflation and that the sooner they realize it the sooner the inflationary psychology which the opposition is encouraging will cease.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I take it from this that the government considers that the degree of unemployment existing in the country is necessary for an effective fight against inflation. I should like to ask a supplementary question rising from the impression that the Prime Minister attempted to give yesterday that the employment situation in the Atlantic provinces was better than a year ago. In view of the fact that the DBS figures for two months in a row have shown that the actual level of employment in the Atlantic provinces is lower than a year ago, is the Prime Minister not prepared to agree not only that the impression he tried to give yesterday was wrong but that in fact the policies of the government are slowing down the economy in that area and that this must be due either to the policies being pursued by the Minister of Finance or the futility of the efforts of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion?

Mr. Trudeau: Once again, Mr. Speaker, I must refer the hon. member to Hansard. I did not talk about a year ago. I compared the figures of last September and this month.

Mr. Stanfield: I have a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I was talking about a year ago. I was talking about the impression that the Prime Minister tried to give that the policies of the government were not depressing the economy and the rate of development in these areas. I ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the fact that DBS figures show that for two months in a row employment figures were actually lower than a year ago, the policies of his government are not having this disastrous effect?

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, to the Prime Minister. Some months ago the Prime Minister said in a press interview that in order to combat inflation the government was prepared to see an unemployment figure of 6 per cent, that it would not worry the Prime Minister if there was an unemployment figure of 6 per cent. Since as of yesterday we have an unemployment figure of 6.7 per cent, would he tell the country whether he is now prepared to revise that original figure and whether the figure which would not worry him is not 6 per cent but 8 per cent or 10 per cent?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is trying to ask the same kind of question as the Leader of the Opposition asked, and the quotation is not an accurate one. I was asked the same type of question by the press as I have been asked by the Leader of the Opposition as to what percentage of unemployment would force the government to change its anti-inflationary policies. My answer was that the question should not be asked that way, that we were determined to fight inflation, and that the sooner the opposition and the various sectors of the country supported the fight against inflation the sooner the danger of unemployment would recede.

An hon. Member: That is a new theory.

Mr. Orlikow: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since unemployment is rising and inflation is continuing to increase, can the House take it that the Prime Minister has no intention of relaxing the program of restraint regardless of whether unemployment continues to rise at an increasing rate?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I realize that the opposition has some difficulty in making choices, but the government is faced with the choice of either giving up the fight against inflation or continuing it. I want to reassure the House and country that it would be no problem at all for the government to spend many, many more millions of dollars in all parts of the country if it lacked the courage to continue the fight against inflation, as apparently seems to be the case with the opposition.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question for the Prime Minister who has referred to the difficulties of the opposition. Is he not aware that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, before the Standing Committee on Regional Development just the other day, had occasion to say that he was not defending the government's policy?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's East.

Mr. MacInnis: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think any hon. member of the House has reason to raise a question of privilege or point of order when the Prime Minister talks of the difficulty the opposition has in understanding the government's approach to a particular problem when a minister of the government, a minister greatly responsible for this particular matter, has told the committee that he is not defending the government's policy.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's East.

UNEMPLOYMENT INCREASE—RATIFICATION OF SPECIAL AREAS PROGRAM AGREEMENTS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the alarming rate of unemployment in the provinces of Newfoundland and New Brunswick, and in view of both these provinces having ratified the agreements respecting the new special areas program under the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, may I ask the President of the Treasury Board why Treasury Board has held up ratification or approval of these two important programs?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, Treasury Board has not held up ratification or approval.

An hon. Member: Get cracking, then.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, before the Regional Development Committee a few days ago, indicated that the programs were currently awaiting the approval of Treasury Board. These programs were supposed to have been in effect by April 1. I again ask the President of the Treasury Board why Treasury Board has not approved these programs?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is repeating the question he asked. An answer was given. Perhaps he may not be satisfied with the answer, but the question has been asked already.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, may I rephrase my question. It is a very important one to these two provinces. May I ask the President of the Treasury Board why Treasury Board has not approved these two programs?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I should like to correct the misapprehension. These two particular programs have been approved by Treasury Board.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When, today?

UNEMPLOYMENT INCREASE—AMENDMENTS TO UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, which I would have directed to the Minister of Labour had he been here. In his absence I will direct it to the government House Leader. In view of the increasing delays and difficulties in getting unemployment insurance claims, and this is related directly to the increasing unemployment, can the government House Leader inform us if the government is contemplating amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act before this session is completed in June?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I refer the hon. member to the statement I made in the House on January 28 last. The information is that at the moment there will be no additional amendments to that act.

Mr. Nesbitt: A further supplementary. In view of the changed employment situation and also because of the many complaints registered by members in all parts of this House regarding Unemployment Insurance Commission practices, will the government House Leader reconsider the possibility of introducing appropriate amendments to the Act as soon as possible?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I will reconsider the matter in conjunction with the legislative program generally.

QUEBEC—SHORT-TERM PROGRAMS TO ALLEVIATE UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Could he indicate clearly to the House whether the 6.7 per cent unemployment level really worries the government, since this situation is particularly hard on Quebec? Are short-term projects being prepared in order to put an end to this calamity which has hit the province of Quebec?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, conditions would be better in Quebec if the rate of private investment were not the second lowest of all the Canadian provinces.

Of course, if private investors decide to invest elsewhere, it is not the federal government's fault but that of the present government of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Valade: I would like to ask a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

In my opinion, the Prime Minister did not answer my question. Therefore, I ask him what short-term programs the government has prepared in order to check unemployment in Quebec?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will recognize with regard to his supplementary question or to the second part of his first question that he is asking the Prime Minister or a minister to make a statement on general policy. I think such statements should be made on motions.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

[English]

ACCEPTABLE LEVEL OF UNEMPLOYMENT IN COMBATING INFLATION—U.S. POLICY

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): My question is supplementary to that of the Leader of the Opposition. Is the Prime Minister prepared to make a statement on motions indicating the level of unemployment that will be tolerated across the nation in various regions? I ask this in view of the fact that the national statistic of 6.7 per cent misrepresents the statistics for the regions where unemployment is as high as 15.3 per cent. While the Prime Minister is responding, perhaps he might want to react to my question of privilege yesterday which I raised when the Prime Minister referred to the seasonally adjusted statistics of March compared with November, which are non-comparable. Perhaps he could indicate whether the basis of his answer was because of a lack of knowledge or if there was an obvious intention to mislead the House?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will recognize that when he asks a question in these terms it cannot be accepted by the Chair. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is out of order. If the hon. member will ask a question in accordance with the normal practice, I will recognize him and allow him to ask the question. Perhaps he may want to rephrase it.

Mr. Lundrigan: I will rephrase my question. Perhaps the Prime Minister can indicate whether he will make such a statement. Will he also indicate whether the government is planning to follow the lead of the United States authorities who are very aggressive in this field and who are at present relaxing their anti-inflationary policies, at least on a regional basis, in order to stimulate employment in areas which are drastically affected? Is the government planning to follow that lead at least on a regional basis?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not particularly intend taking my lead from the United States in this or in other matters if I can avoid it. I want to remind the House it takes no courage for a government to spend more money in all parts of the country. I repeat that we can very easily boost our spending in all parts of the country. It would be helpful if the opposition would indicate where it thinks we should curtail our spending—

Some hon. Members: Your office.

Mr. Bell: Information Canada.

Mr. Trudeau: —or, alternatively, to suggest what particular taxes they would like to see us raise in order to spend more money.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There have been a number of supplementaries and I think the House would agree we ought now to recognize the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): What happened to the just society?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SPREAD OF WAR IN SOUTHEAST ASIA—RECONVENING OF CONFERENCE OF GENEVA ACCORD POWERS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister arising out of the statement made by Mr. Jacob Malik, the Soviet Ambassador to the United Nations, in which he supported the proposal of the French government earlier this month for the calling of the Geneva conference in an endeavour to prevent the spreading of the war in Viet Nam to the neighbouring countries of Laos and Cambodia. Does the Canadian government intend publicly to endorse the proposal of those two governments in the hope that a conference can be called and some solution found to the problem in Southeast Asia?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am informed that the Department of External Affairs is trying to ascertain whether this proposal or suggestion constitutes, in fact, a concrete proposal by the Soviet Union. If such is the case, we are prepared to support it as we are prepared to support any initiative which would bring peace to the area.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Irrespective of whether or not the ambassador was speaking for the Soviet government—and in all probability he was; I do not think it is likely he would make such a statement otherwise—it remains a fact that the government of France has forthrightly called for this conference. Would the Prime Minister agree that in the light of Canada's membership on the International Control Commission we have a vital stake in this matter and that this country ought to make its views known in the hope that other nations will join with us in asking for such a conference?

Mr. Trudeau: I repeat, we welcome all efforts aimed at negotiations which would bring peace to the area and we would certainly take part in such negotiations if they were to develop.

REPORTED SLAUGHTER OF VIETNAMESE LIVING IN CAMBODIA—INVESTIGATION BY INTERNATIONAL CONTROL COMMISSION

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): In view of reports indicating there has been wholesale slaughter of Vietnamese living in Cambodia, is it the intention of the government to reactivate the International Control Commission and have the commission investigate what may be a very tragic situation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The government has noted this situation. As the hon. member says, it is a tragic one, and we have been in active negotiation with the other members of the commission, the Polish and Indian governments. We are not sure at this stage whether there can be agreement between the three members to reactivate the commission but we are certainly trying to secure agreement between the three governments.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I ask the Prime Minister whether Canada is the member named by Mr. Malik as the country which, as a member of the commission, insisted on withdrawing the International Control Commission from Cambodia?

Mr. Trudeau: I shall have to discuss that with the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—ROLLING BACK OF TINPLATE PRICE INCREASES

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. On Monday of this week I asked a question of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs regarding the roll-back in the price of tinplate. The minister has not been in the House. He was supposed to be here yesterday to answer the question. He indicated that he would have the answer regarding his department's position within a day or so. In view of his interest in combating inflation, I wonder whether the Prime Minister has an answer for the House today?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. Had I been given notice of the question, I might have.

PENITENTIARIES

SASKATCHEWAN—COMPLAINTS CONCERNING FOOD—INCIPIENT UNREST

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I direct my question to the Solicitor General, Mr. Speaker. It has to do with the aftermath of a visit by three Members of Parliament—members of the New Democratic party—to a Saskatchewan penitentiary. Following their visit they offered strong criticism. In view of the fact that the warden and the officials of this penitentiary have an excellent reputation, and since this criticism has been followed by incipient unrest among those who are confined in the institution, would the minister be prepared to tell the House what the situation is and whether there was any foundation for the criticism concerning food and the insufficiency of meat for the inmates?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, when I heard on the radio the day after the two-day visit of three members to the penitentiary the allegation concerning food, I immediately had the matter investigated and found that the allegation was contrary to the fact.

As to the other part of the right hon. gentleman's question, I do not admit, first of all, that there is incipient unrest, but I will look into that situation. In any event I would not want to admit at this stage, certainly on the basis of any information that I have, that if such condition existed it was caused by the visit of the three members.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the minister himself has visited this institution, is he not prepared to say that following his visit in September he gave to that institution a first rate and excellent reputation both as a training unit and as a penal institution?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is true. I have on several occasions since that visit made reference to some of the training facilities in that institution, and in that respect put it forward as the best example in the country of institutions of that kind.

[Mr. Saltsman.]

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, as one who visited the institution, unlike the gentleman who asked the preceding question, could I ask the Solicitor General whether he would not agree that the so-called food strike of last Christmas and the one that preceded it about a month before were not reflective of the condition of the food but of other conditions in the institution, which is usually the case with such strikes?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I had that matter investigated at the time and I found that it reflected the fact that certain persons who had been working as kitchen staff had been removed from that task and given other duties, and the demand arose that they be returned to kitchen duty. That seemed to be very closely related to the cause of any trouble at the time of that so-called strike at Christmas time which related to dining facilities and the unwillingness of the prisoners to take their trays when they were issued in the usual way.

SHIPBUILDING

AWARD OF CONTRACT FOR CONSTRUCTION OF "MARGAREE"

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Could he tell the House why the government has granted the contract for the construction of the Margaree to a company other than the Davie Shipbuilding, of Lauzon, in spite of the fact that it had submitted the lowest bid?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of that particular fact. I will inquire and report to the hon. member.

GRAIN

WHEAT—ACREAGE REDUCTION PROGRAM—PAYMENT OF EXPENSES OF INSPECTORS—ENFORCEMENT OF BULLETIN PROVISIONS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the wheat board. Would the minister inform the House whether his department is prepared to pay the expenses incurred by commissioners of oaths when they travel to inspect fields under cover crop, as required under item 10 of bulletin No. 2 issued by the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister without Portfolio?

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure as to the urgency of the question asked by the hon. member; certainly there is no urgency apparent to the Chair. If it is a matter that should be looked into immediately, the minister might like to reply to the hon. member's question.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the exact regulations in terms of satisfying the Minister of Agriculture with what is required in regard to the plan are now being put into final form. Therefore I think the question may not in fact arise.

Mr. Gleave: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Might I plead that there is some urgency to these matters since the general intent of this policy is a matter with which the farmers will have to contend. Further, I should like to ask the minister whether, in view of the statement in item four of the same bulletin that there will be on-farm inspection, that farmers may be penalized and that inspection will include the measuring of fields, it is the intention of the ministers to pay people with engineers and surveyors qualifications to perform the function of measuring these fields?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York North.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The minister has told the House that the regulations are not ready, yet two bulletins have been sent to the farmers setting forth conditions with which the farmers must comply. The minister has now told us that the farmers may not have to pay attention to these regulations. It seems to me to be of importance from the standpoint of the farmers who have received these bulletins to know whether the bulletins are setting out specific instructions that the farmers must follow or whether they can be totally disregarded.

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that that is not a point of order. The hon. member will recognize that I allowed the first question and it was replied to by the minister. Then there was a supplementary which did not bring a response from the minister. At that point I would think the Chair was justified in passing on to the next questioner.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Then may I put it in the form of a supplementary question to the Minister. Are the provisions and stipulations set forth in bulletin No. 2, particularly No. 10 and No. 4, to be enforced by the government, or will the regulations when tabled make these stipulations and controls no longer applicable?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I do not have the actual bulletins in front of me to refer to the particular numbers. The program in broad form, certainly as it affects farmers, has been made clear to individual permitholders through the bulletins that have gone out. There are, of course, some matters of detail to be finalized, but these will in no way affect the kind of decision that the farmer has to make or the way in which he will benefit under the LIFT program.

Mr. Gleave: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it the intention of the responsible ministers to solve the unemployment problem in Saskatchewan by hiring a flock of inspectors to—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain.

WHEAT—ACREAGE REDUCTION PROGRAM—ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL OFFICE

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister without Portfolio. Is it a fact that a special office has been established in Regina, Saskatchewan, in connection with operation LIFT, and can the minister indicate what are the actual functions the new office will perform and who will be in charge?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the administration of a significant part of the operation LIFT program is being handled out of the regular PFAA offices in Regina. Inspectors will be operating from that office in Regina. However, I should like to emphasize to hon. members that an inspection system is required in any case in order to make the whole permit book system meaningful and to make it correspond more realistically to farming operations than has been true in many cases in the past.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TAXATION

WHITE PAPER ON REFORM—OBJECTION BY PROFESSIONAL HOCKEY CLUB OWNERS

Mr. Barney Danson (York North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister which relates to testimony before a committee of the other place by owners of professional hockey clubs that certain provisions of the tax reform proposals if implemented will inhibit the sales of season tickets, causing undue hardship. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he will give special consideration to this deprived group which will still be consistent with our national league goals?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As the hon. member is referring to testimony given in the other place, I suggest to him he is asking his question in the wrong forum.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry if my question is offside but may I be permitted to ask a supplementary arising out of a previous question which might be more in keeping with the proceedings of the House. It relates to unemployment as a result of anti-inflation measures. I wonder whether the Prime Minister would indicate to the House what the increased rate of inflation might be or, conversely, what the rate of unemployment might be if our existing measures had not been in force for some months?

Mr. Baldwin: Order paper!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is hypothetical, amongst other things.

INDUSTRY

GOLD MINING—POLICY RESPECTING GRANTS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources a question.

About ten days ago, I put it to the Prime Minister who then advised me to address it to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and I am following his good advice.

In view of the federal government's intention to drop the subsidies to gold mines and the statement by the premier of Quebec to the effect that a mine had already folded up, and that a second one would do so shortly, and in view of the fact that only one possibility is left, that of putting off this decision, in order to allow Quebec mining operations to remain in business, would the Minister be willing to discuss the matter with the Quebec government?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that discussions of any question with my provincial colleagues would be useful, but should Quebec give itself a good government and a good minister at the coming election. I will be happy to study the problem with them.

[English]

AUDITOR GENERAL

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in view of the doubts which have been expressed by so many Canadians about the government's position vis-à-vis the Auditor General, I should like to ask the President of the Treasury Board when it is the government's intention to introduce its proposed legislation in this regard?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I think this question is under discussion now in the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. Baldwin: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In introducing the legislation will the minister and the government bear in mind that the people of Canada will not tolerate any attempt by this government to bulldoze its way into elimination of effective parliamentary control?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that the question cannot be replied to as it is out of order when asked in these terms.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ESTABLISHMENT OF PERMANENT HEADQUARTERS AT YELLOWKNIFE

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. I should like to ask him through you, Sir, whether, as he has been kind enough to send to members of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence a press statement announcing the establishment by the Canadian forces of a permanent headquarters at Yellowknife, and in view of the great importance and interest of this subject, he will either consider making a statement on motions to this House or at least tabling the statement in the House?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I expect that the press release that was issued this morning will be in all the newspapers this afternoon, so they more or less scooped the House in this particular instance.

[Later:]

Mr. Brewin: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it government policy to scoop the House by making important announcements in the press rather than the House which is very much interested in them?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, this is just the implementation of the statement I made on September 19, 1969, when I announced the establishment of that headquarters.

RECRUITMENT OF ESKIMOS FOR NORTHERN SERVICE

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Coast Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to the Minister of National Defence. Will the armed services recruit Eskimos in the north particularly in view of the fact that they probably have a great deal more to teach us than we have to teach them about Arctic conditions?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that this question has been asked because I discovered to my great surprise and to my great satisfaction during the trip I made last week in the north that we do employ Eskimo and Indian people as much as we can. As a matter of fact, I have seen a cadet unit at Inuvik, composed of a little more than 50 per cent of Eskimos, and which is coming down at the end of the month to the Calgary tattoo. We are very happy to have the expertise of the local people to draw on. It is the intention, of course, to try to increase their participation in the armed services.

RESEARCH

UNITED STATES ARCTIC PROGRAM—CONSULTATION WITH CANADA—CANADIAN INTENTION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of President Nixon's order that priority be given to recommendations made by the United States council on marine resources and engineering development with regard to the U.S. program concerning Arctic environmental and resource research. Has there been any consultation by the United States authorities with the government of Canada about this program or about the intentions of the United States government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will inquire, Mr. Speaker. There was none that I know of.

Mr. Stanfield: I have a supplementary question. Would the Prime Minister also make inquiries to ascertain whether it is the United States government's intention to carry out this program simply within what is recognized as its sovereign territory, or what its intentions may be with regard to the area in the north where it proposes to conduct this research? Also, would the Prime Minister himself or have an appropriate minister make a statement to the House as to this government's intention regarding the launching of a research program in respect of the development of the north, particularly in respect of the use of Hovercraft and other similar methods of travel for investigation in the north, comparable to the program announced by the President of the United States?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I will make the inquiries the hon. member is suggesting and see whether a statement is necessary.

GRAIN

WHEAT—ACREAGE REDUCTION PROGRAM—ACHIEVEMENT OF GOAL

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. Now that operation LIFT has been well publicized, can the minister inform the House whether the wheat reduction acreage goal of 20 million will be reached and, if not, what is the projected acreage at this time?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): No survey of intention has been made in a recent period to give any firm indication. Of course the farmers themselves are still making final decisions on what they will plant in the next few weeks.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ALLEGED INVOLVEMENT OF ARMED ROBBER WITH PUBLISHING COMPANY AND CERTAIN PROVINCIAL AND FEDERAL MEMBERS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Solicitor General. Has his attention been drawn to the statement yesterday in Victoria by a person sentenced to 12 years for a series of armed robberies of banks and a financial institution to the effect that he was involved with a publishing company, with an M.L.A. for British Columbia, an M.L.A. for Ontario and two federal M.P.s in so far as these criminal activities are concerned and, if so, would the hon. gentleman mind looking into this allegation?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the matter has not been drawn to my attention but I will be very glad to look into it immediately.

HOUSING

ASSISTANCE BY CMHC IN PURCHASE OF MOBILE HOMES

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for housing. In view of the drastic drop in housing starts over the past few months, is he giving consideration to making the facilities of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation legislation available to the increasing number of Canadians who are resorting to the larger type mobile homes to solve their critical housing problems?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): We are examining very diligently the question of mobile homes and, more pertinently, the application of the National Housing Act insuring apparatus for the financing of mobile homes. I hope before very long to be able to advise hon. members of the decision that may be evolved.

FINANCE

IMPLEMENTATION OF CONSUMER CREDIT REGULATIONS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is for the Minister without Portfolio attached to the Minister of Finance. Would he kindly advise the House what progress has been made in determining the nature of the consumer credit regulations? When does he expect to publish them, or has the government decided to postpone them indefinitely or even throw them overboard?

[Mr. Lang.]

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, progress is being made and a further announcement will be made in due course.

POLLUTION

PHOSPHATE DETERGENTS—ACTION TO CONTROL ACCELERATED WATER CONTAMINATION

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of slashing price reductions now being made by supermarkets on high phosphate detergents, is it the intention of the minister to take steps to halt this accelerated dumping of pollution into our waterways pending the legislation to ban phosphate detergents altogether?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I do not think I would have any authority to do that. I think that probably the present conduct of the chain stores indicates they are taking the government's injunction seriously. They realize we mean business, that they will be cut down by August 1 as indicated, and that the government is firm in its purpose.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster.

Mrs. MacInnis: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has a supplementary question. Perhaps she might be allowed to ask it.

Mrs. MacInnis: May I ask the minister whether the government will consider buying up the stocks of high phosphate detergents and destroying them, as they did with DDT?

Mr. Greene: Of course there is a very great difference between DDT and high phosphate content detergents. The detergent is not a poison; it is a nutrient which unfortunately gives too much life to the algae at the bottom of the lake, but the delay of a few more months after the many, many years of use of phosphate will not make a great deal of difference to the total problem.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: This is a dangerous attitude.

BRIDGES

OTTAWA-HULL—INQUIRY AS TO NEW STRUCTURE

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): In the absence of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, the Minister of Public Works, and the Minister of Justice, may I ask the minister who is really the big boss in Ottawa matters, namely, the Solicitor General, whether the federal government has decided to build a new Ottawa-Hull bridge across Victoria Island? If so, was approval received from all levels of government?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): I am afraid I cannot accept the hon. member's recognition of me as the big boss and therefore cannot answer the question.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for St. John's East rises on a point of order.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

NEW BRUNSWICK AND NEWFOUNDLAND—SPECIAL AREA PROGRAMS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, this will give me an opportunity to set the record straight. My point refers to a question I directed to the President of the Treasury Board. It had to do with the approval of two special area programs under regional economic expansion for New Brunswick and Newfoundland. On Wednesday last in the Standing Committee on Regional Development the minister said, in reply to a question, that both of these programs had been approved by the provinces and were being considered by Treasury Board. Yesterday, as recorded at page 5930 of Hansard, I directed a similar question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, and he said in reply to the question regarding these two programs that they were before Treasury Board. The question that I wanted to put to the minister to set the record straight, because of the importance of these two programs, is: When did Treasury Board approve the programs, when was the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion notified, and when were the two provinces notified?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With the consent of the House perhaps the minister might reply to the question, but again we are faced with the situation of the Chair having taken it upon himself to give additional time to hon. members, and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain, the hon. member for Waterloo and the Minister of National Revenue were among those who were anxiously waiting for an opportunity to get the floor. I wonder whether that is a legitimate point of order but at the same time, if there is agreement that the minister should reply to the question, I have no objection. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see that there is a recognition of the importance of meeting the social and economic problems of these two provinces in these programs. This is part of the general government approach to reducing unemployment in these areas. In specific response to the hon. member's question, let me say that these two programs were discussed with the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion yesterday at the Treasury Board and approved.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

ARCTIC WATERS POLLUTION PREVENTION BILL

PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPOSIT OF WASTE, PLANS AND SPECIFICATIONS OF WORKS, SHIPPING SAFETY CONTROL ZONES, ETC.

The House resumed from Thursday, April 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-202, to prevent pollution of the areas of the Arctic waters adjacent to the mainland and islands of the Canadian Arctic be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, as other hon. members have indicated, the bill before us should not be considered in isolation but should be taken in conjunction with Bill C-203, relating to the territorial sea, consideration of which I gather is scheduled to follow the conclusion of this bill if that takes place today. It should also be considered in conjunction with some other measures which have not yet been disclosed to us. The minister indicated yesterday in his statement that soon he will be recommending to the cabinet other measures relating to air and land pollution which are companion to the pollution control concepts which are contained in Bill C-202. He also said that matters of concern about pollution on the east and west coasts of Canada would necessitate the bringing in of legislation by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) relating to the pollution control in those areas.

So, while the provisions of the bill before us are acceptable and endorsable, because of the other companion pieces of legislation to which the minister referred and about which we have not heard anything, we can only hope at this stage—and I use the word "hope" not in an unkind way because I am sure that this will be the case if the bill before us is any indication of government policy right across the board—that they will be as valuable in the control of pollution and in the matter of our national integrity as is the bill before us. It is because this is an extremely valuable piece of legislation, as the minister said probably one of the most important that the government has introduced in the House, that the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), the leader of our party, said yesterday that officially, even though there does not appear to be any opposition to the bill, in order to indicate our position to the world and especially to our neighbour, the United States, we would like this Parliament to take a standing vote on the bill so that every member of the House can indicate the degree of unanimity which exists with respect to this matter.

It is important, therefore, not only for the government to declare its stand but also for the representatives of the people all across the nation to indicate that they endorse this particular measure. I must say as an aside, because we are interested in the unified approach and because we feel very strongly about this matter as Canadians, without considering the philosophical approach of any particular party—otherwise I would not have bothered to pay any attention to it—that I should like to make reference to the comments of the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Perrault) last evening to which I listened with a great deal of interest. Regretfully, I read into his remarks an attempt to misinterpret the remarks made by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), the deputy leader of this party, primarily in order to create confusion and divisiveness in the House where none was there and none was intended in the first place.

I point out that many, many years ago when this party to which I belong was called the CCF, 15 or 20 years ago in general terms, we had embarked upon a vigorous campaign, with our members in this House and throughout the country at elections and other times concerning the necessity of having a 12 mile territorial sea. We have no hesitation in putting that position forward and in saying that that is the identical thing we are concerned about today. Any attempt on the part of anybody to indicate that we have become lax in our position about that matter, lax in our position about Canadian sovereignty, is simply grossly misleading and is grossly misleading himself in understanding what the facts of the situation are.

Apropos of that, Mr. Speaker, I would point out that it was the party to which the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour belongs that steadfastly and regularly, in this House and elsewhere, refused to accept the concept of a 12-mile territorial sea. They maintained that three miles was as far as we could go because the Americans objected to anything more than three miles, and because that distance was established in the days when one could shoot a cannon out no more than three miles. But I go no further with this, Mr. Speaker. I only say it in passing because this debate involves our integrity, our honour, and the pride we should have in ourselves, so that we should not allow ourselves to follow the red herrings tossed out from time to time by those who seem to have spent their political lifetime engaging in that activity.

For many years there has been an erosion of Canada's integrity. There has been an invasion of our national structure, an invasion of our national concern about ourselves. The result of successive governments over the years operating under the guise of co-operative relations with the United States has been that the United States has really placed Canada in a position of subservience. Successive Canadian governments, with their oversensitivity about the matter of co-operation between nations on the North American continent have contributed to our being in that subservient position. This attitude that has been reflected over the years in military matters. It has certainly been reflected in economic matters, where a stronger and stronger control over our economy has been developed by companies outside Canada, most of them in the United States. Our lack of action in connection with our territorial seas since 1964 has been dictated primarily by the attitude that the United States has had on this subject. Here we have an opportunity, the first one in a long time, to make a declaration in a firm way, which will start us on another course.

I have not always been highly appreciative of the things which the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) has announced in this House. I have not always endorsed the programs that he has introduced or the statements he has made. Not always have I applauded the minister on the bills he has introduced or the declarations he has made about different things. But here is an instance, from my point of view really the only one in the minister's tenure of office as head of that department, where we can unreservedly applaud him and indicate our full support for the intentions he has.

On the matter of the territorial sea we have some thoughts to express because even in the Arctic we are involved in declaring a territorial sea, and in declaring straight base lines from which that sea should be measured. We have had such legislation in force in Canada since 1964 but at no time has this, or previous governments, given any indication that it is developing any geographic co-ordinates for the Arctic archipelago, or for the whole Arctic area, or for any part of it, from which straight base lines the territorial sea, and up until now the fishing zones, would be measured.

In fact, the east and west coasts were ignored for many years so far as straight base lines were concerned, and some parts of those coasts are still wide open. We feel, they should be enclosed as inland waters behind a straight base line. If the minister closes this debate in a formal way, I hope he will be able to give us some indication about the intentions of the government with respect to the geographical co-ordinates in the Arctic, but not the type of declaration that Senator Paul Martin used to make when he was Secretary of State for External Affairs. He told us that the base lines would be drawn before the end of 1964. He said there was no doubt about that, and that that was the firm intention of the government.

We would like to know, and I am sure the people in the Arctic would like to know, what progress is being made with respect to developing the geographic co-ordinates and, so far as we are concerned, drawing them in such a way as to enclose the waters between the islands as inland waters. A few of the bodies of water of breadth that I have in mind are, Amundsen Gulf, Lancaster Strait and McLure Strait. Even though they are broad bodies of water, we believe they should be enclosed within straight base lines, so that we would then be declaring sovereignty by establishing straight base lines around the entire Arctic archipelago. We would be declaring that the islands within that circumscribed area were ours, that the waters between the islands in that circumscribed area were inland waters, and that we were exercising our sovereignty over them.

In addition to that, there is the provision in the bill with respect to the 100 nautical mile limit for pollution control. This is something that it is important for the committee to understand, and about which the people of Canada should receive information. They would then be in a position to more fully endorse the position of the government, and the position which I am sure Parliament will exhibit by unanimously supporting the minister's bill.

In the minister's introductory remarks, right at the start, he indicated that there were four primary interests in the Arctic. Presumably, these are the four primary reasons for the introduction of the bill. He mentioned the security of Canada, the economic development of the north, the preservation of the ecological balance, and the continued high stature of Canada in the international community. I think the continued high stature of Canada in the international community is more window dressing than a real reason for doing something. We should be doing something in this field, and I am sure the minister would agree, not because of any attempt to maintain public relations with the rest of the world but because of our concern about matters affecting the Canadian nation.

The security of Canada is a different matter. It is rather an unknown term. It could be given many interpretations or connotations. I would like to think of it in terms of political security, political integrity and economic security. These are the ones we are talking about. Today the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux) issued a press release with respect to placing a national defence unit at Yellowknife. I think this would probably indicate that if need be, and if the tests came right down to it, we intend to preserve the security of the nation by military means, although that really is an extension of the security concept beyond that which we normally accept. We do not want to get involved in military engagements in order to preserve our own unity and integrity but the fact that military personnel are there and that we look north gives some substance to the ideas about security. Sovereignty is something which we have to declare for ourselves. It comes from the establishment of straight baselines and the declaration of everything within them as inland waters, from a declaration that anybody who moves in there does so through our grace and decision. It is not a matter of open right as is the case with respect to international waters. Sovereignty must first be declared and then secured if the need arises.

The matters of ecological balance and the economic development of the north are also two major reasons why we should be proceeding with legislation of this type. The population of the Northwest Territories is only 30,000 to 35,000 people and is widely scattered. The communities are small and most have no economic base whatever, so the economic development of the north will be concentrated in a few areas. In the north, as elsewhere, we find that development often hinges almost exclusively on the production of raw materials and does not take into consideration development that might revolve around processing operations, manufacturing, or secondary industries that might derive from future development of natural resources. The development should not be based only on an extractive industry from which the raw materials have to be transported to the southern regions of Canada or, worse still, to other countries for processing. We must embark upon a program for the fullest possible development of these resources as close to the production site as possible, not just extract ore, reduce it to mineral concentrate to be exported for processing and thus deprive local people of jobs. This is the sort of economic activity we want to see taking place.

I notice that the minister, in his statement about the economic development of the north as one of our primary interests, did not outline any other type of economic development that he had in mind for the area.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. member a question. Is he aware that in the agreement which we signed with Anvil Mining in Yukon we put a lot of pressure on them to have a smelter there and that we will have to reconsider the situation a few years from now? It is a very important part of the agreement that the aim of the government is to have more processing in the area rather than just export the concentrate.

[Mr. Howard (Skeena).]

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am familiar with the program with respect to Anvil Mining Corporation. What I am putting on the record now is in support of the government's position about Arctic sovereignty and the economic development involved in it. But in order to give some cognizance to the integrity of the people there, we must go full scale into the program of further processing.

In passing, Mr. Speaker, I would mention that while the minister referred to the economic development of the north in the second paragraph of his speech, he did not expand beyond that. I think this should be spelled out so that other countries would know of our concern with this problem as well as with the all-important problem of pollution.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform the hon. member that I shall be making a speech on Monday at Portland, Oregon and I shall touch on the point he has mentioned.

An hon. Member: Don't touch on it, really hit it.

Mr. Chrétien: I am a polite man.

An hon. Member: Sock it to them.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): If the hon. Minister would like to give my regards to some friends of mine in Portland and give me the credit line, I would not mind that too much.

There is no question, Mr. Speaker, about our concern with pollution control and many speeches have been made about it in this House. We have dealt with the need for control of our environment, the need for reducing and eliminating pollution. More than at any other time in the history of the world, we are perilously close to the extinction of life as we know it if we continue to pollute air, land and water. This appears to be the opinion of many ecologists and biologists, and some believe that it may happen within two or three generations. They say the devastating effects of pollution are worse than the prospect of nuclear war, yet it goes uncontrolled and ignored by many sections of the economy. There is no necessity to become involved in discussions about the need for pollution control, and this is another reason we endorse what the government has presented in this bill.

We will have other comments to offer on this subject when the territorial seas and fishing zones bill is debated and will be looking forward to the proposals which the minister intends to present to cabinet regarding air and land pollution factors in the north as a whole. We hope that the minister will be able to develop his legislative ideas and be in a position to present them to us in regard to air pollution, fisheries and also shipping matters when the committee considers Bill C-202.

The hon. member for York South pointed out just the other day that this very important move on our part was done in isolation, without regard to the desires of the committee or the interests of any other members of the House. Perhaps this is not the correct procedure to follow in developing such important legislation. For a long time we have not had any exhibition on the part of government of the pride we, for our own self-respect as a nation, should show. Our national honour demands that we speak about matters of sovereignty with a clear and single voice. By precept and example, this Parliament has to show the Canadian people and the rest of the world that we are proud of our integrity, of ourselves and of our inheritance. We must show to future generations that we have their concern at heart as well, and that we consciously and deliberately, as a matter of policy, want to leave a legacy about which our younger people, our children and those who are yet unborn will likewise feel proud.

As human beings and as Canadians, we have no moral or ethical right to destroy our resources, or to accept the short term, fleeting economic benefits and thus sacrifice the economic interests and well-being of those who come after us. For these and other reasons we say to the government, not that we are right behind you on this matter, but that on the question of being pro-Canadian and endorsing the government's position on sovereignty, we are right with you. We hope you do not lag.

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words about the international law aspects of this bill. Before I do so, I should like to congratulate my colleagues, the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson), who is the chairman of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre), who did a fantastic job in working with our caucus and the government in helping to bring forward this bill. I think both hon. members deserve a lot of credit for the work they have done behind the scenes and in this House with respect to this legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Allmand: When this bill and its companion bill, C-203, were given first reading and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced Canada's reservation with respect to the world court, I was a bit dismayed—not with the provisions of the bill, but with the reservation. As a supporter of the rule of law in international disputes, I do not like to see, in ordinary circumstances, reservations brought forward with respect to the jurisdiction of the world court. However, on my second examination of the bills I saw that what we had done actually was a spur to the development of international law in connection with pollution control. I firmly believe that by introducing and passing these bills we shall be developing international law relating to pollution.

As has been stated before, the present international law relating to the high seas is heavily loaded in favour of the shipping interest and provides as much as possible for free access of shipping to all parts of the seas. This orientation, developed over many centuries, probably favoured international trade and commercial shipping. The law of the seas was developed mainly by the ship-owner nations. Consequently, if Canada had agreed to allowing this legislation to be tested in the world court, we should have both gone to a court and submitted to a law heavily weighted against us and against any type of pollution control.

I might also say that in recent years the world court has not been known for its liberal interpretation of international law. If anything, it has been a very conservative court and has interpreted whatever international law there is in a very restrictive manner. This does not mean that the government rejects the international rule of law; far from that. Last fall members of the government attended the international conference in Brussels and tried to obtain some international agreement on pollution control on the high seas and in territorial waters and contiguous zones. However, such agreement could not be obtained, mainly owing to the position taken by ship-owning nations. Yesterday the minister said that Canada is still ready to work towards such a treaty. He repeated this again and other ministers repeated it after him.

There has been some discussion regarding the concept of sovereignty. The Leader of the Opposition said yesterday that by introducing these bills the government is, in fact, abandoning sovereignty over our northern waters. I really think that in stating that he is grasping at straws. I feel that not only are we asserting our sovereignty, but we are laying the groundwork for further legislation respecting the north that may become necessary. When a government, Mr. Speaker, legislates with respect to a given territory, in this case the Arctic waters, it is claiming sovereignty over that territory with respect to the subject matter of the legislation. Sovereignty, like ownership, is not an absolute right. Surely, those who live in Canada should recognize that; after all, we live in a federal system. When we legislate with respect to an area, that legislation is an expression of sovereignty over that area. Other expressions of our sovereignty in our Arctic are to be found in our icebreaking role in these waters, in our weather stations; in our defence stations; in our outposts coming under the Department of Northern Affairs, such as schools and health institutions; in our supply lines coming under the Department of Transport; in our RCMP stations, and so on. All these things are an expression of our sovereignty in the north. This legislation is a further expression of our sovereignty, not only in the northern islands but also in the Arctic waters, because the legislation relates particularly to the Arctic waters.

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that there never has been any question on the part of the Canadian government or any government with respect to our sovereignty over the Arctic islands and the sea bed between the islands which is part of the continental shelf. I know this has been stated before but there is still much confusion in the minds of some Canadians on this matter. Some feel that there is some dispute with respect to our sovereignty to the islands and the continental shelf on which some mineral and oil exploration is taking place.

As the Secretary of State for External Affairs mentioned yesterday, much of the international law of the sea originated as customary law. It was only later put into international conventions and treaties. This customary law was developed because certain states took unilateral initiatives in order to protect their own interests. As they did this, the customary law relating to the high seas developed. This was done with respect to the three-mile limit and also with the 12-mile zone. This same concept was later extended to embrace the continental shelf doctrine. As a matter of fact, if one looks at the history of the development of international law, one will see that it arose from customary law. That customary law developed and finally became international law, largely because of unilateral initiatives taken by certain states. As time went on, these customary laws were put into treaty form.

For many years no one questioned our jurisdiction over the Arctic waters because there was no incentive, nor any means, for any one to use those waters for commercial purposes. Now, there have been great discoveries of oil and other minerals in the Arctic, and accompanying technological developments which have enabled super-tankers to be built. As a result, there is now a tremendous risk of pollution on a massive scale in the Arctic. If the Canadian government does nothing to protect these waters, nobody else will. We are the only nation in a position to do something about pollution control in those waters, and we must do something.

I might say that I would be pleased to see some similar type of legislation introduced for pollution control with respect to the waters off our east and west coasts. I do not know if we should require 100-mile limits there, such as we are proposing in the north, but certainly we must do something to prevent junky tankers run by irresponsible shipping companies from traversing these waters in an irresponsible way and bringing the risk of pollution to our coasts. We have had experience with the Arrow off our east coast. If one looks at the Torrey Canyon and the Santa Barbara disasters, one can appreciate that ships travelling between 50 and 100 miles off our coasts can encounter disaster and be shipwrecked.

The countries that will suffer are those that have coastlines closest to such disasters. Something must be done to protect the coastlines of those states which provide important shipping passages. I suppose Canada will continue to press for international agreement at the international conferences. If we do not get agreement at these conferences, we must take some kind of unilateral action on our east and west coasts to protect against the same sort of thing we are protecting against in the Arctic. There may be risks in upsetting other states by introducing legislation such as this, but in my opinion it is better to take risks by action to protect Canada and Canada's interests then by taking risks of no action.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, it is surprising to me that there have been doubts expressed by this government on the question of Arctic sovereignty. There seems to be conviction on the other side that the government has been consistent in expressing with force and positiveness its claim to Arctic ownership.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) has come as close as any minister in the cabinet to stating in a positive fashion any claim to sovereignty. It is important for the government to speak with one voice. One should expect the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the head of the government, to be forceful and unequivocal about Canada's claim to her Arctic regions. He has not been forceful. He has stated with clarity that the intent of the legislation that we are now discussing is not to assert sovereignty over the north. I am not saying something that is new. My friend and seatmate put it on the record last night. I think in order to put the matter in its proper perspective we should once again refer, particularly the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) who has a vital concern in this and all northern matters, to the statement of the Prime Minister. It should again be put on the record and judged for what it is.

I say that the Prime Minister has yet to make a positive, strong statement claiming Canada's ownership of her Arctic areas. This is what my friend put on the record last night. When discussing these bills with the press, the Prime Minister said:

> This is the first bit of legislation—it is not an assertion of sovereignty,—

Perhaps the member who just resumed his seat might pay attention to the words of the Prime Minister. The hon. member seems to be under the misapprehension that positive statements have been made. At this press conference the Prime Minister said, and I quote:

> —it is not an assertion of sovereignty, it is an exercise of our desire to keep the Arctic free of pollution and by defining 100 miles as the zone within which we are determined to act, we are indicating that our assertion there is not one aimed towards sovereignty—

This is the Prime Minister speaking.

> —that our assertion there is not one aimed towards sovereignty—

That is for the enlightenment of the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand).

> —but aimed towards one of the very important aspects of our action in the Arctic.

To me that means the Prime Minister, by this legislation, is not seeking to assert sovereignty over Canada's Arctic. That is what he said. Why there should be any doubt about the ownership of these lands is beyond me.

I want to deal at some length with the life of one of our more famous French Canadians. In a book entitled, "The True North" by Fairley & Israel, published in 1957, some attempt is made to resurrect the history of this gentleman who has made such a great contribution to the securing for Canada of our Arctic heritage. I quote from page 5:

> It is possible that only one Canadian out of a thousand has heard of Captain Bernier. Perhaps only one in ten thousand knows anything of his life. History plays strange tricks, giving fame to one man, denying it to another. Yet Admiral Richard E. Byrd, himself a famous explorer, has called Bernier "the dean of arctic explorers". And in 1926, the Toronto Star said, "It has to be admitted that Bernier is our great arctic pioneer and years ago he kept arctic questions before Canadian statesmen and the Canadian when our interest was at a low ebb. He, more than any man, kept Canada from tossing away its arctic inheritance."

This book is the story of how Captain Bernier went about doing just that. The work of Captain Bernier really commenced in earnest after the conclusion of World War I. Prior to the war, he was commissioned by the Canadian government to make annual patrols throughout Canada's Arctic archipelago. It outfitted a ship which he called the Arctic. These patrols were made on an annual basis. After the war the nature of the patrols changed because of the increasing interest in geology and other activities in these Arctic areas.

In the summer of 1925, when the matter really came to a head and aroused sufficient interest to be debated with seriousness in this House, a situation arose between Canada and the United States, coincidentally, which could have caused a good deal of unpleasantness between our two countries. As accounted in "The True North", the situation arose in this way:

> Two Americans had decided to attempt an airborne trip to the North Pole. One was Donald B. MacMillan, a Canadian-born explorer who had become an American citizen. The other was Richard E. Byrd, later to be internationally known as a conqueror of both Poles, then a young commander in the U.S. Navy. Long before the two men set out on their attempt, the newspapers were filled with accounts of their preparations.

Indeed, the United States Congress went so far as to give a direction to the expedition that they were to cast about and see what lands up there were still up for grabs, to use the terminology of the Prime Minister. When some Members of Parliament heard of this plan, they raised the question in the House of Commons. I will be referring to the debates of 1925 in a moment. The upshot of that debate was an answer in the affirmative. It stated very positively that all land between the 60th meridian and the 141st meridian straight up to the Pole was Canadian territory. They asked how the Americans could then go through these waters and over these lands, overflying Canadian territories, without some kind of a permit or, as it was put in the debate, without asking permission. This question of asking permission certainly has a very relevant bearing with respect to the voyages of the Manhattan recently. The answer in the Canadian Parliament at that time was that there could be no MacMillan-Byrd expedition unless there was permission granted.

If MacMillan had asked permission, permission would probably have been granted, since the request itself would indicate acknowledgment of Canadian ownership. The Canadian newspapers of the day seized upon this debate and broke out in an angry rash of protests. If it were policy in 1925, incidentally under a Liberal government, that permission had to be obtained for an expedition of the size and importance of the MacMillan-Byrd expedition, why has government policy changed so as not to require the obtaining of permission when the same country sends the same kind of expedition in the shape of the Manhattan? MacMillan did, in fact, obtain permission from the Danish government to base his expedition on Greenland. But he made no attempt to get in touch with the Canadian government. Again, Bernier's work comes sharply into focus in the manner in which he insisted upon Canadian sovereignty in our Arctic.

The MacMillan-Byrd expedition proceeded by vessel, with the intention of over-flying Canadian territory. The ship was anchored in the proximity of one of our Arctic islands in Etah harbour when Bernier came on the scene in the course of one of his patrols. He visited MacMillan on the evening of his arrival. The two men had dinner and a very pleasant conversation. Eventually, they got round to the right of the MacMillan-Byrd expedition to be where it was and carry on as it was doing. Bernier pointed out the danger of over-flying Canadian territory at that time of the year, having regard to weather conditions, and gently suggested that the expedition should turn around and go home. A couple of days later, that is exactly what they did. As a result of this mission, carried out with great friendliness at that time, MacMillan was convinced of Canadian ownership and when he returned to the north in subsequent years he was very careful to take out a licence obtained from the R.C.M.P. for a token payment. I commend this account of Bernier's life to the Prime Minister if he has any doubt about the right of Canada to assert sovereignty over the Arctic, as it appears he has.

I wish, now, to refer briefly to Bernier's own autobiography. Those interested in our claim to Arctic sovereignty will be able to find it in the Parliamentary Library. Entitled "Master Mariner and Arctic Explorer", it is a narrative of 60 years at sea from the logs of Captain Bernier, and it was printed by Le Droit in 1939. An interesting feature of Captain Bernier's life is that he was one of those in the Province of Quebec who bought his wife at an auction sale conducted in that province. I did not know this practice prevailed anywhere in Canada. His wife brought with her a dowry from King Louis of France—Louis XV, I guess it was. Anyway, she brought with her a dowry of $12.50. I was surprised to learn that this practice prevailed in Canada. The patrols which Bernier instituted and carried on were the result of co-operation between Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Sir Robert Borden and the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen. This policy of licencing the users of our Arctic waters was one which both governments of the day endorsed.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the important event which is about to occur at ten minutes to one, an event of international interest, I wonder whether I might call it one o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: Very thoughtful.

At thirteen minutes before one o'clock, the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I just want to correct an error that I made before the adjournment with regard to the bartering of brides in Quebec. It was under the reign of Louis XIV that this policy was established through the colonization plans of the great Colbert. The bachelors were watched with a vigilant eye. They were not given land or allowed to travel or engage in trade. But when they chose a bride many privileges became available. Their brides were dowered by the King. The bride of Jacques Bernier brought him 25 écus two and a half guineas, or $12.50. Certainly, $12.50 was worth a good deal more then than it is today.

• (2:10 p.m.)

Anyway Bernier says at page 323 of his own biography, and the book is shot through with phrases of this nature:

—I took possession of Ellesmere Island and all the islands explored by the Sverdrup expedition and then hastened homeward—

The last Canadian island in the Arctic to be taken for Canada was one taken by Wilhjalmur Stefansson in 1915. This account, in 1908, by Bernier in his log is very interesting, and I am reading from page of 343 of his book "Master Mariner":

Dominion Day was celebrated by all on board; all our flags were flying and the day itself was all that could be desired. At dinner we drank a toast to the Dominion and the Premier of Canada; then all assembled around Parry's Rock to witness the unveiling of a tablet sculptured by J. V. Koenig, our first engineer, and placed on the Rock, commemorating the annexation of the whole of the Arctic archipelago. I briefly referred to the important event in connection with the granting to Canada by the Imperial government on September 1st, 1880, all the British territory in the northern waters of the continent of America and Arctic ocean, from 60 degrees west longitude to 141 degrees west longitude, and as far north as 90 degrees, that is to say to the North Pole. Three cheers were given in honour of the Premier, and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries of Canada, and the men dispersed for the balance of the day to enjoy themselves.

There was no doubt in those days that Canada owned her Arctic. In the debates of 1925 when Mr. Stewart, who had the same responsibilities now discharged by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) but was called the Minister of the Interior, said at page 4083 in answer to a question from Mr. Garland, then the member for Bow River:

If expeditions from foreign countries desire to go into that north country I think the least they can do is to obtain a permit from the government of the Northwest Territories to enter what is clearly our land.

Again, at page 4084 Mr. Stewart answered a question by Mr. McQuarrie. Mr. McQuarrie asked:

How far north does the jurisdiction of Canada extend? Do we take in the North Pole?

Mr. Stewart said:

We claim that we go to it.

Mr. McQuarrie said:

The minister has heard that the United States has laid claim to the North Pole.

Mr. Stewart said:

Canada claims the territory outlined between the degrees of longitude 60 and 141 but I have nothing to say regarding any claim the United States may make. They have Alaska and naturally they will lay claim to land north of their territory there, which would be adjacent to ours.

Mr. McQuarrie then asked:

Will they have the North Pole?

Mr. Stewart replied:

I do not suppose any nation can lay claim to the North Pole.

Mr. McQuarrie then said:

I am serious in the question.

Mr. Stewart said:

In order to protect Canada's interests we have made our position clear. According to international law we can claim any territory lying one hundred miles off our explored coasts. But no one knows definitely what land there is in the unexplored region; to reach it the explorer must go either from the coast of Alaska or through Canadian territory.

Mr. Stewart made it clear in the debates of that year that at that time Canada laid claim to all of the Arctic archipelago between degrees 60 and 141 up to the North Pole. Why then must we hear our Prime Minister say today that the legislation is not an assertion of sovereignty, but rather an exercise in our desire to keep the Arctic free of pollution? We heard the Secretary of State for External Affairs state yesterday during an exchange between the minister and my seat mate that there was no divergence of opinion between himself and the Prime Minister. Then, the hon. member asked him how he explained the statement of the Prime Minister in a press release concerning this legislation in which he said:

This is the first bit of legislation—

It is not an assertion of sovereignty; it is an exercise of our desire to keep the Arctic free of pollution—

And then further on, it is stated:

—we are indicating that our assertion there is not one aimed towards sovereignty, but aimed towards one of the very important aspects of our action in the Arctic.

I should like to hear the Secretary of State for External Affairs speak up in asserting Canadian sovereignty in the North, and I would urge upon him to convince the Prime Minister to do the same thing. After all, the work of one of Canada's finest sons from the province of Quebec was largely responsible for securing a great deal of our Arctic land and waters. Are we now to listen to, much less tolerate, another famous sons of Quebec in the form of a Prime Minister say we are not asserting this valuable work of Joseph Bernier? It would appear so.

We have heard the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) go through a list of the ways in which Canada is asserting her sovereignty in the Arctic. He says it is not necessary to legislate sovereignty. He says we have asserted sovereignty as a result of the establishement of weather stations. I ask him to look at the composition of those weather stations; they are not all Canadian. He says we establish our sovereignty in the Arctic by the establishment of military stations and detachments. I ask him, where are these?

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux) has released an announcement to the press that he intends to take this gigantic step of establishing military bases in the north, and will patrol some 1,750,000 square miles of Canada with 50 soldiers. This action has been taken after they destroyed the military installations at Whitehorse which comprised 250 air force personnel and a similar number of army personnel. I understand there is now a re-awakening of interest in the north and the Minister is putting in 50 soldiers.

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, if I may be allowed to correct the hon. member, there are now 400 men permanently stationed in the north. What we are planning to do is increase this activity. For instance, I am announcing an early exercise by the air arm regiment with a strength of a thousand. You are talking about 35 people but I am talking about the headquarters.

Mr. Nielsen: We are going to have a headquarters staff of 50 people. As far as military exercises are concerned, we have had these over the years—exercise Beaver and goodness knows how many more in the north. What is the minister of defence asking the people of Canada to believe? This is obviously an effort to gain publicity at a time when the Prime Minister has raised grave doubts about the sovereignty of Canada over her northern regions. We are rushing forth with our fists in our pockets and saying we are establishing sovereignty now. We are going to send another 50 soldiers into the north. It is a simple exercise of mathematics, to divide 450 soldiers into 1,750,000 square miles to discover how effective that sort of assertion is going to be in connection with Canada's sovereignty in the north.

Much more has been accomplished since the days of Bernier when he assisted in setting up the first mounted police post on Ellesmere island. He was responsible largely for setting up subsequent mounted police posts. The same situation applies to our establishments in connection with the activities of our geologists, health facilities and our weather facilities in the north. Basically, the people of Canada believe that the sending of 50 soldiers to Yellowknife to set up a headquarters to manage 400 men, which in itself is—

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): You are distorting the facts.

Mr. Nielsen: If I am distorting them, I do not want to.

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): You know that.

Mr. Nielsen: I do not know that I am distorting the facts at all. The minister has said there are 400 soldiers in northern Canada. That is not distorting the facts.

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): No, you said there were only 50.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. Nielsen: Yes, 50 of them are making up the headquarters staff. I am using the minister's own explanation. The setting up of a headquarters in Yellowknife comprising 50 soldiers to manage 400 men is questionable management, but no one can ask the Canadian public to believe that this is somehow reasserting sovereignty over Canada's Arctic regions. The fact remains that our Arctic extends from the 60th degree of longitude to the 141st and up to the North Pole. The fact remains that that was the position adopted by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, by Sir Robert Borden, by Mr. Meighen, by Mackenzie King, and by the former Conservative Prime Minister, Mr. Diefenbaker. Yet, all of a sudden it is negated by this Prime Minister when he says we are not asserting our sovereignty over the Canadian Arctic.

Mr. Sharp: In this legislation.

Mr. Nielsen: All right, I will go along with the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but let the Prime Minister stand up on his two feet and say to all and sundry that Canada owns everything between the 60th Meridian and the 141st Meridian and up to the North Pole. Let him do that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nielsen: I commend the Secretary of State for External Affairs for doing just that yesterday in debate, but surely the Prime Minister should do that also.

Mr. Sharp: He said it too.

Mr. Nielsen: He did not; he said quite the contrary.

Mr. St. Pierre: Would the hon. member permit a question? He said he examined the sector theory as put forward by Senator Poirier in 1903? If he had, he would not be making the statement he has.

Mr. Nielsen: In answer to the hon. member, I would say that I have examined the theory and I still stand by what I said. Before that theory ever became a theory, Canada was asserting her sovereignty over the Arctic.

Mr. Dinsdale: That is only one claim.

Mr. St. Pierre: Would the hon. member permit another question? Is it correct that in the assertion of the sector theory Canada laid claim to all land which might be discovered within that sector, and similar action was taken by Tsarist Russia in 1917?

Mr. Nielsen: Absolutely, and well before that Canada was asserting that very claim made by Bernier which accounts for his log of 1908 and for the policy of the government of the day. My friend will recall the test of that theory that the United States made when they sent a warship into the Russian sector, the progress of which was impeded by the stationing of Russian warships across the passage, following which the U.S. warships turned around and did not proceed farther.

Mr. Hogarth: Would the hon. member permit another question? Would he explain to me, for my information, what was the exact theory put forward by the gentleman referred to in 1903?

Mr. Lundrigan: That's a stupid question.

Mr. Nielsen: I would dearly love to do that if the House would give me unanimous consent to continue for another 30 minutes.

Mr. Lundrigan: The hon. member would not understand it anyway.

Mr. Nielsen: There is another point I would like to make. I heard the leader of the New Democratic Party say that there are three historical precedents for the action that the government is taking now and justifying it on that basis. As one hon. member opposite put it, we in Canada have a right to take the action that we are taking now in this Parliament as a matter of self-defence, on the basis that we had to combat pollution effectively. This brought to mind the U.S. action taken with respect to the missile emergency that occured in Cuba, when Russia was supplying the material and the missiles to establish offensive bases in Cuba. The United States took unilateral action on the high seas to stop those ships, and theoretically if for no other reason, one must conclude that it was to prevent the polluting of Cuba with missiles. The fact is that they acted unilaterally, and if they can do so with respect to a situation like that, I suggest that Canada has a similar right. Whether we have the means to enforce it is quite another matter, because no one in all reason will advance the proposition that we should either be rattling the saber or preventing the intrusion of foreign vessels in our Arctic waters by any offensive unilateral action.

Mr. Aiken: That is all we have left.

Mr. Nielsen: Yes, as the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) said, that is all we have left. What the Canadian government should do—and I advance this as one who lives in the north and sees the many errors of past Canadian governments of all political stripes—is to take up the torch where Bernier laid it down, to his great credit, and where the government of the day took it up and asserted in no uncertain fashion that Canada owns the Arctic land. They went to the extent of requiring anyone sailing the waters between the islands in our Arctic and overflying the land and waters in our Arctic to be licensed. This government has not the courage to even require vessels like the Manhattan to obtain permission. This is wrong. This is pussyfooting so far as sovereignty in the Arctic is concerned, and it is selling our heritage down the river, a heritage which Bernier worked so effectively and ambitiously to secure for Canada.

The policy of the government should be clear. It should be to follow the precedent set by both Liberal and Conservative governments in the past and to insist on the users of all areas in Canada's Arctic between the 60th meridian and the 141st meridian and up to the North Pole obtaining permission to use these areas, or indeed, as was the policy in 1925, to require a licence.

The Prime Minister should take the earliest opportunity to make a strong and positive statement which would clear the air of any doubt as to Canada's claim of sovereignty over the whole of the Arctic archipelago. He is not doing it by the introduction of this kind of legislation which the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) was quite right in describing as only raising further doubts. If, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs said, we have sovereignty over all of these waters which are considered internal Canadian waters, why then must we advance legislation in this House which restricts that sovereignty to 12 miles or 100 miles, whichever way you look at it? We do not need legislation to restrict our sovereignty, as the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) put it so well. We need not say anything about our sovereignty. We own the Arctic Islands and that is all there is to it. We own the whole of the area between the 60th meridian and 141st meridian and up to the North Pole. That was the policy and that should continue to be the policy, and the Prime Minister should say so.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House is an important one. It is only a few weeks ago that I recommended immediate action with regard to international co-operation in pollution control. Little if anything was done, not that I expected it to be done because I spoke, but events of history have proved with dramatic suddenness how urgent the international problem has become. I do not think that we should be bogged down in semantics. I do not think the problem is whether, in fact, we have the necessary armed forces to go up to Canada's Arctic Islands and maintain the old style physical control over all those islands.

• (2:30 p.m.)

I should have thought that by now we were becoming mature in world affairs. I do not refer to Canada alone, but hopefully the whole world is becoming mature in this day of trips to the moon and international co-operation. But here we are again, apparently bogging down in semantics. It seems to me we are not taking a big enough view individually, as political parties, as a nation, and certainly not as international brothers.

With respect to the problem of pollution and the handling of it from a very high level, it is obviously out of Canada's control. The problem may well become nothing but an international political football in a big power game. I have in my hand a letter I received from the U.S. Information Service. I presume it has all the validity of the U.S. State Department behind it. I have no reason to believe it is not an official document. It is datelined Washington, April 15, so is not ancient history. Part of it reads:

Following is the text of a Dept. of State's statement on the government of Canada's bills on limits of the territorial sea, fisheries and pollution.

They lump the two bills together, C-202 and C-203, and it is very hard to discuss one without thinking about the other. I am certainly not anti-American. On the contrary, I look to the United States very strongly and sensibly for assistance, not only in the preservation of our own identity as an independent nation but in continuing to develop what has been loosely called our western way of life. Whether the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux), the government in general, or Parliament itself states that these islands are ours, I am not sure is important. The important thing is to discuss the matter openly and in a friendly manner, not only with the Americans but with the international people the Americans themselves suggest should be consulted.

It is difficult to discuss this matter without taking an historical look at it. I wonder how the State Department's suggestion that all things should be done on an international basis and settled by international agreement—I go along with that at this stage of my argument because I think ideally we should have international agreement—fits in with the Munroe doctrine under which the whole world is supposed to leave the Americas alone? I wonder what the Organization of American States would have to say in reply to a document coming from one of the other power groups of the world, telling any independent nation or so-called independent nation how it should behave?

I am not saying that the Americans should not have issued this release, but it is obvious that they are attacking the matter from a very selfish point of view. The Eskimo people are willing Canadians. I have heard no statement from the Eskimo people that they would like to secede. If you took a proper empirical approach to the matter and you whine about people having a right to earn their living on their own land, and about the self-expression of peoples, which are some of the prime theories behind the formation of the United Nations organization, then I wonder what the Eskimo people would say if all the emphasis were placed on the land masses and it was stated that sovereignty over the waters that lie between the islands was not a meaningful thing?

Up until the recent development of oil resources in the north country, the Eskimo people relied entirely on the marine and animal life which lived on the ice and in the water between the islands. These waters between the islands were of vital importance to the Eskimo way of life. Who cared about these Eskimo people? The Canadian people cared. The Canadian taxpayers sent mounted police up there to occupy each and every one of the major islands under our flag. We gave those people our assistance through law and order, through medical attention, and in every other way in which we could co-operate with them. We gave them the security which they occasionally did not have among themselves. We maintained decent order in the north. Apparently, we gave them that which they appreciate because never, as far as I know, have they indicated that they wanted to leave the Dominion of Canada.

Unless the Americans are willing to sit down with us, as we are willing to sit down with them, and discuss this matter openly, friendly and consistently, in terms of the free determination of the rights of peoples—in this case the Eskimos—I think it would be an exercise in futility. But I am not cynical about it. The Americans have stated their position. They may sound inflexible, but I think we are in a good bargaining position. Because of their power and wealth, the Americans find themselves a very lonely nation. But they are not always lonely because they are wrong. They may be lonely because they are the big brother, because they are powerful, because they are rich, because no doubt sometimes they are greedy, and because they are arrogant. I think loneliness is the worst thing that can be inflicted on any member of the human race.

Collectively and individually Americans want to be understood and admired, instead of being the target of an awful lot of rotten propaganda coming from every corner of the world, with 90 per cent of which I do not agree. Nobody loves them except us. Little Canada is the only real friend they have in international affairs. One of the reasons is that, by and large, we have been treated pretty well by them. By and large, we are happy to have their money here to develop our almost unlimited resources. But I do not think this means that we have to be soft or subservient. On the contrary, I think it is time that our government stated in explicit terms to the Americans just what our hopes are and the area over which we have jurisdiction. I do not think we should get bogged down in semantics. The Canadian archipelago islands of the north are an economic unit. The ice between the islands is essential to the native people who have the greatest interest and right to sovereignty over those islands.

• (2:40 p.m.)

Mr. Nielsen: Judge Morrow decided that.

Mr. Bigg: Yes, the courts decide things but from time to time their decisions are reversed. I am appealing on the principle of humanity. When this note recommends that we go to the international courts I presume the recommendation is based on principle since there is very little international law on the subject. In so far as the power group I mentioned earlier is concerned, we should not let ourselves become a pawn in this big power game.

I find it strange, Mr. Speaker, that the people who shouted the loudest about these principles of peacekeeping, understanding and world co-operation rather than shaking an empty fist in mock fury should be the first ones to delay a plan for consultation. One of the most important things is to go to the bargaining table with a clear idea of your requirements. In order to achieve our ends our best brains should be selected for the negotiations, particularly with the United States, because that country is in a position to help us maintain that sovereignty. At the present time we are militarily incapable of enforcing sovereignty.

We know only too well that the moral support of the world, if we were to rely on that, breaks down in the face of military strength. In this regard I only have to mention the fate of some of the small nations. If Hungary wanted to come from behind the iron curtain, to whom would she appeal? If Cambodia wanted the foreign troops marching through her country to go home, to whom would she appeal? The International Court of Justice would only make a statement that all foreign troops should go home but we know they would not go home until some greater power sent them.

There is only one thing that will bring us any kind of lasting peace in the world, Mr. Speaker. This will be when each nation is willing to give up some of its sovereignty to a well co-ordinated League of Nations, a United Nations, with a peacekeeping force capable of maintaining law and order. International affairs are not so much different from human affairs. A policeman on duty on Saturday night will not be able to maintain law and order if he is not given the authority. An International Court of Justice decision on Canadian sovereign rights in the Arctic would be without force if nations like the United States and the Soviet Union chose to ignore it.

And so, Mr. Speaker, I welcome the text of this note from the United States. I understand that the President of the United States has spoken to our Prime Minister by telephone and I hope they agreed to endeavour to solve this problem in good faith. I hope it will not come to any sort of a show of strength. Sending our troops into the Arctic is not going to achieve a great deal at this stage—indeed it amounts almost to comic opera.

The government should come out with a clear statement that for the last 50 years Canada has laid claim to the whole archipelago of the north, maintaining responsibility for the native population and the ecology of the land and sea. It would not be a sign of weakness if we put our emphasis on the council table, as long as we have a plan for full co-operation in the development of our western way of life as well as the protection from pollution of the whole of the Arctic. We are already respected as world citizens and as we develop we should put emphasis in the right places.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Would the hon. member permit a question, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Bigg: Yes, indeed.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I should like to ask the hon. member, as he has made a number of references to the bargaining table and to negotiations, if he would mind telling us who is going to be on the other side of this bargaining table and what it is we have to negotiate?

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Speaker, I think every nation in the world has an interest in the pollution of the seas. Perhaps there is an argument, as mentioned in this text, in favour of sharing sovereignty so that the international seaways of the world could be open for commerce and for peaceful purposes. I should like to think that people who are asking for that right would be willing to tax themselves and to co-operate with us in every way possible to avoid marine disasters in the north. If they want to share our sovereignty, they should be willing to share the cost.

Incidentally, the Northwest Passage route was pioneered by the same mounted police who maintained law and order in that part of the country and made friends with the people who lived there. If it had not been for the pioneering work of ships like the St. Roche, and Sergeant Larsen of the mounted police, perhaps the Manhattan might not have gone as far as she did. We did that at our own expense. Now, it is patently ridiculous for anyone to say that we have no vested interest in the Arctic. Whether or not our interest is exclusive is a matter for the bargaining table. I think the mere fact that Canada is willing to sit at the bargaining table and seek the advice and co-operation of others, and the fact that we have faith that other nations of the world are willing to do something in this area with us, in itself is an exercise of our sovereignty. On the other hand, the mere shaking of the sword at the present time would probably be ridiculous and not bring us any closer to answering the question of how we are to assert the sovereignty of our country.

Mr. C. Terrence Murphy (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I enter this debate to point out one or two things that I think are most important. From the newspapers and from information we have obtained from the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) we have learned that our good neighbour to the south is taking some exception to the provisions of this bill. I think it is interesting to note, Mr. Speaker, that as long ago as 1954 nations got together in an attempt to arrive at some agreement which would prevent pollution of the high seas. An agreement was reached in 1954 by some 22 nations. That agreement simply set out that the countries that were party to it, the 22 nations, would have the right to impose fines on shipowners of the other signatory nations when the ships involved discharged oil within 50 miles of the shoreline of any participating nation. That was the first step in this area, and it was a very mild one. It is significant to note that Canada was a party to that agreement, as were the governments of the United Kingdom and Japan. The United States government was not. For the United States government now to come forward and say that we, Canada, ought not to take this action without first trying to solve this problem by way of international meetings and agreements I think is a little far fetched.

In 1962 there were further consultations with respect to the accord which was reached in 1954. At that time, the agreement was amended so that the countries involved could assess penalties against shipowners from participating nations whose ships discharged oil or any other such effluent within 100 miles of the coastal areas. Again, none of the nations involved in the pact were given the right to regulate ships belonging to the signatory nations, so that even though ships belonging to participating nations travelled within the restricted area, other participating nations were not able to take steps which would prevent pollution. Nor was there any provision to cover the accidental discharge of oil or other effluent within these limits. I think it can be easily seen, and I think we all agree, that those measures certainly were not effective enough in combatting those problems which today have become so serious.

Then, again, in November of last year the nations of the world met in Brussels and attempted to hammer out some sort of international agreement to meet this problem; unfortunately, no agreement was reached. So, today, we are introducing this legislation at a time when we are very, very vulnerable. As yet we have no law to protect us from these large super-tankers which are sailing the seas just off our coasts. There will be more of them in future and they will range, as I understand it, between 250,000 and 300,000 tons. If we do not act now but wait until a disaster occurs, I think we shall be derelict in our duty as a nation. We must look after the best interests not only of the people of Canada but of the whole continent.

It is true that by taking the action which is now proposed we may enter into a possible confrontation with our good neighbour to the south and other nations of the world. But I think it must be realized that we are a different nation from the nation to the south. We have different purposes and different interests. The people of Canada must be aware of this and prepare themselves for possible confrontations in future involving not only this area but also other areas. These will take place as our country grows and as our neighbour to the south grows and develops. I think, also, that the announcement made yesterday in the United States is very significant. The President of the United States has doubled the amount of money which is ordinarily made available for purposes of naval research. He has doubled the amount of money to be spent on Arctic research. This money is to be used, as I understand it, to develop some sort of skimmer or surface craft, similar to the hovercraft, which is to be used for research in the Arctic. This step was announced only yesterday. We too must move, I submit; we must move now and show no timidity in asserting our rights. Our duty is to protect the people of our country and the people of the continent. Their rights and the rights of all Canadians will be upheld if we support this bill with everything we have.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I will not take much of the time of the House at this particular stage of the discussion on these important matters. I understand that we will be proceeding to consider Bill C-203 immediately upon the conclusion of this debate. It seems to me that this is where the real crunch of the issue will take place. Since all hon. members who have spoken in this debate thus far have indicated they are in favour of the purposes of Bill C-202, which are, as the title says, to prevent pollution of areas of the Arctic waters adjacent to the mainland and islands of the Canadian Arctic, it would be like opposing motherhood if one were to raise a discordant voice with respect to the purposes of this bill. In these days everybody is fighting the pollution battle. In many respects I think we are tilting at windmills.

As I hear hon. members beating their breasts with patriotic fervour and saying that we must resist any intrusion on Canada's fundamental rights in the Arctic—the Minister of National Defence said just a moment ago that we are reinforcing our military defences in the Arctic to the tune of some 50 personnel—I received an impression similar to that which Don Quixote created when he was tilting at windmills. Nobody disputes the necessity for dealing as quickly as possible with the potential problem of pollution of our Canadian Arctic environment. I use the word "Canadian" intentionally, because it is the Canadian Arctic that we are speaking about. Also, the growing problem of pollution affects not only that part of Canada, but it affects the environment of the world as well.

As I listened to the discussion this afternoon it occurred to me that the thinking of Canadians, Members of Parliament, and particularly the members of the Liberal government, has come a long way during the past ten years. Only ten years ago, for example, there was on the part of the Liberal Party no great interest in the economic potential of the Canadian Arctic. They regarded the emphasis of the Conservative government of that day as a misplacement of priorities. The same applies, and I can say this fairly, with respect to the general problem of pollution. I recall when this party moved in 1964 the following motion of non-confidence in the government, in the days when supply motions were permitted in the House:

> This house condemns the neglect of the government in failing to establish a co-ordinated national water policy and in ignoring the imminent national crisis in water resources management, which is evidenced by the critical low water levels of the great lakes and other national waters, the increasing pollution of national waters, and the urgent necessity of conserving water resources for the benefit of national resource development in Canada—

I remember that the bored response to that motion of only six years ago was to the effect that with all the other burning questions of great priority, why was the Conservative opposition wasting its substance on a colourless subject like water? Today we are all aware that there is a major crisis in controlling and preserving our water resources. In 1964 we were perhaps concerned more with political pollution than with environmental pollution.

Mr. Baldwin: Political pollution is much worse now.

Mr. Dinsdale: This is a problem with which the people of Canada will have to deal: unfortunately, it is beyond the capacity of members of the opposition. In due course the people of Canada will have their opportunity because we still have free elections in this country.

We are supposed to be in great confrontation with the Americans over this unilateral declaration on the part of the Canadian government respecting the control of pollution in the Arctic. There would be no confrontation—I do not want to belabour this point because the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) and other spokesmen for this party have demonstrated the case beyond any shadow of doubt—and there would be no jurisdictional dispute if the government would accept the simple responsibility of declaring in no uncertain terms the principle of Canadian Arctic sovereignty. This has been done by all Canadian governments since Confederation. I do not have to enumerate the legal precedents which have been quoted to support this point.

Perhaps politicians have been quoted most frequently during the course of the debate. Each of our Prime Ministers has been quoted with the exception of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). In addition, some officials of the Canadian government have reinforced the statements of the political leaders of the nation. We are living in a day and age when the power of the public administration is a growing and formidable one. Sometimes the viewpoint of the public administrators are of equal force, if not more so, than the public expressions of the political leaders.

I have here a statement which was reported in the Canadian Yearbook of International Law, 1968. In an article entitled "Innocent Passage in the Arctic," by A. Donat Pharand, we find these words:

> Ivan Head of the University of Alberta, writing at a time when he was in the Canadian Department of External Affairs, was much less doubtful about the legal nature of those waters and the Canadian policy relating thereto. He wrote in the following terms: "Canada regards the water between the islands as Canadian territorial waters, and this claim has been recognized by the United States. Prime Minister St. Laurent reported to the House of Commons in 1957 that United States vessels servicing DEW line stations are required to apply to Canada for waivers of the provisions of the Canada Shipping Act before proceeding."

That is the end of the quotation of Professor Ivan Head, as he was in those days. I do not know why there is so much uncertainty in the bosom of the government in respect of this matter. If there is no uncertainty concerning Canada's sovereignty over the Arctic archipelago and the waters in between, there is no problem with respect to exercising our responsibilities in matters of pollution. Why all the beating of the breasts and the feeling that we have to reinforce our position in order to beat off any confrontation by the United States? We have not been able to get the documents from the government of Canada, but we do have a copy of the statement that was delivered in Washington on April 15, 1970. The statement reads, at page 2, paragraph 3:

> Moreover, the United States is acutely aware of the peculiar ecological nature of the Arctic region, and the potential dangers of oil pollution in that area. The Arctic is a region important to all nations in its unique environment, its increasing significance as a world trade route and as a source of natural resources. We believe the Arctic beyond national jurisdiction should be subject to internationally agreed rules protecting its assets, both living and non-living, and have noted with pleasure the Canadian Prime Minister's public statement that Canada would be prepared to enter into multilateral efforts to develop agreed rules of environmental protection.

The sour note in there is the reference to "we believe the Arctic beyond national jurisdiction". Even though Ivan Head stated in the article I quoted that there was no dispute on the part of the American government with respect to Canada's claim for sovereignty over the Arctic, this now seems to be changed if we consider the statement made in Washington the other day. This means it is more important than ever that the government of Canada, the people of Canada and all the responsible leaders of Canada should speak with no uncertain voice concerning the matter of Arctic sovereignty.

Mr. Sharp: Then support us.

Mr. Dinsdale: We have been trying to push the government for several months. We have been trying to push the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Prime Minister. This is where the whole debate began. If the Arctic is ours, we can come to the conclusion, on the basis of the latter part of the American statement which I quoted, that they are only too happy to co-operate with Canada in the matter of protecting the environment. Why all this tilting at windmills in connection with the present legislation?

• (3:10 p.m.)

Oil exploration in the Canadian High Arctic first began in 1961. In 1961, Dome Petroleum brought in a drilling rig via Montreal. It was carried across Canada from Calgary to Montreal and then loaded on a Danish ship, the Thora Dan, and taken through the Northwest Passage to Winter Harbour on Melville Island. In those days there was very little up-to-date information available to this group which was interested in exploration for oil in the north; it was necessary to go back to the archives and look up the charts which had been deposited there after the Peary expedition of the last century. This suggests that if the government intends to implement adequate controls in connection with the legislation now before us, it must move quickly to acquire the facilities and the means of doing so. I do not think very much progress has been made.

In the course of his opening statement in this debate, the Minister of Northern Affairs (Mr. Chrétien) expressed the view that if we really intended to come to grips with environmental control it would have to be done on the basis of international co-operation. The Prime Minister has also enunciated this principle, although he has contradicted himself in many respects. Former Secretary of the Interior Udall was one of the leaders of the war on pollution. He wrote a book, "The Quiet Crisis", which became a classic in the field when it was published in 1962. The book eloquently expresses the nature of the danger with which we are now endeavouring to wrestle. It has crept upon us silently and suddenly, almost overnight.

Unfortunately, we have lost ten years in getting to grips with a situation which was all too obvious when the Resources for Tomorrow Conference was held in 1961. One of the major recommendations of that conference was that there should be a management body with the comprehensive powers necessary to protect and preserve our water resources. In those days the Canadian and United States governments were working closely together to develop policies on environmental control. I would think that once the spokesmen for the government of Canada begin to speak with one voice on this matter it would be possible, instead of confronting the United States in this area, to work together with that country.

After all, our physical and biological environment is no respecter of natural boundaries. This is an international threat, and just as we have depended in the past upon the superior techniques and resources of the United States to deal with so many problems on the North American continent, so it will be necessary to approach this one not from the standpoint of confrontation but from the standpoint of co-operation.

Members of the Liberal Party are experts at raising straw men and knocking them down. I remember that the great issue in 1962 or 1963 was the failure of the Canadian government to co-operate with the United States government in continental defence. Those were the days—it was in the fifties—when the question was whether we should fly the Canadian flag in the Arctic: hon. members got into a great dither when it was discovered that Old Glory was flying there instead of the Red Ensign, as it was in those days. In the 1963 election Liberal spokesmen were beating their breasts again, saying we must stick together with our glorious American ally to ensure that this continent was adequately defended. Now they are reversing their stand and trying to pick a fight with the United States on an issue where there is no quarrel at all. As we move toward Bill C-203 we might hear the trumpets sounded in clear tones by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

An hon. Member: A cracked trumpet.

Mr. Dinsdale: If that is done, there is no need to pursue the debate on Bill C-203 at the present time, though it will be important to ensure in committee that it is adequate to carry out the difficult task with which it professes to be concerned, to ensure that the United States government recognizes Canadian sovereignty and in doing so will work co-operatively with Canada in the task of controlling our polluted natural environment in the North American region.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia): Mr. Speaker, at the outset it was not my intention to participate in this debate.

An hon. Member: A good idea.

Mr. Cullen: I am sorry the front bench of the opposition thinks so little of the backbenchers on this side of the House, but I shall try to improve that situation as we go along.

Mr. Dinsdale: Your own front bench takes the same attitude.

Mr. Cullen: Earlier speakers described the bill as being bold and imaginative, and I assumed this attitude would be universally accepted.

Mr. Dinsdale: It is.

Mr. Cullen: I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) say we had taken no interest in the Arctic until approximately ten years ago. I assume that this period dovetails with the period the Conservative Party was in power. I would point out to the hon. member that the International Nickel Company was in 1950 known as the Canadian Nickel Company and was undertaking mining exploration in the Northwest Territories. The company received the utmost co-operation not only from the Department of Transport, which set up communications and landing facilities, but from the Department of National Defence and our United States allies who at that time were stationed at Churchill, Manitoba. This is only one instance that I am aware of, having worked for the company at that time.

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

I know from personal experience that the Canadian government at that time—a Liberal one, if you will—saw that there was a future in the north and were doing something in a positive way about it. So this is not something brand new or dreamed up only ten years ago.

Mr. Dinsdale: It goes back to 1867.

Mr. Cullen: That was a pretty good year. This piece of legislation is bold and imaginative in that I see it establishing for Canada a kind of green belt around the Arctic, an area where we have some control. We are passing this legislation as an indication that this is our land and that these are our waters, that we intend to see that they are not polluted by ships such as that which sank in Chedabucto Bay.

Mr. Nielsen: Let us see your black belt.

Mr. Cullen: I will introduce some members of the opposition to my black belt leader if they do not quieten down. In this particular area Canada does have jurisdiction. Not only have we the opportunity but we have the obligation to pass the kind of legislation that is before the House today. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux) indicates that Canada will establish a headquarters there and station armed forces personnel in the area. I suggest it is picayune for the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) to argue about numbers. I can think of large areas of the Arctic where one Mountie had sole jurisdiction, and at that time there was no suggestion that Canada did not have sovereignty simply because there was only one Mountie for such a large expanse of territory.

However, I compliment the hon. member for Yukon on the kind of work and research that he has obviously done. I found the comments that he made about history and the declarations that were made on behalf of Canada very interesting. They will be most helpful if it should become necessary to sit down at a table to discuss our rights to this particular part of Canada. I was a little disappointed that the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) indicated that this was a question we should have taken to the world court.

Mr. Lewis: I did not say that. Read what I said.

Mr. Cullen: I do not want to misquote the hon. member, of course.

Mr. Lewis: I regretted that we had to do it.

Mr. Cullen: I am sorry. I suggest that the hon. member gave the impression that we had made an error in this regard, and that the world court was in fact up to date on technical matters. I submit that this is an entirely new area, something with which the world court is not competent to deal. In going to Brussels and attending other meetings of nations, Canada was quite correct in stating that we must do something about old ships that are crossing the oceans, that they should have more steel in their hulls and be equipped with protective devices and additional pumping facilities so that if they are wrecked it will be easy to pump out oil and control pollution. However, shipping nations and shipowners saw fit not to accept this suggestion. We have tried to negotiate but other countries have not listened. Consequently, we have said to them, "If you won't do it, we'll do it, and do it unilaterally".

My main reason for speaking at this time, Mr. Speaker, is to tell the House that this is not a new matter. Canada has had an interest in the Arctic for years. This kind of legislation and the sort of action we are taking as far as our armed forces are concerned is long overdue. I salute the government for having the guts to take this step. To those who have any doubt about how the Prime Minister feels about this question I would recommend the speech he recently made in Toronto. Rather than misquote him or pick out just a few points from his speech, I would recommend that hon. members read the entire speech, one which was so good that the press gave him a standing ovation. That itself speaks loud and clear for the position that has been taken by the leader of this party.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to my hon. friend?

Mr. Cullen: Yes.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): If, as the hon. member says, it is correct that we should reserve and not submit to the international court our position with respect to the 100 nautical miles of pollution control, would he agree that it should be equally valid for us to exclude the 12-mile territorial sea limit from the jurisdiction of the international court, inasmuch as this is more important in terms of sovereignty?

Mr. Cullen: With the greatest respect, Mr. Speaker, I feel that because so many countries have adopted the 12-mile limit, and since this is an area which is within the jurisdiction and competence of the world court, that court should deal with this question. I have little or no fear that they would also find in favour of Canada's position with respect to the 12-mile limit.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order at this time, may I say that pursuant to an arrangement that has been reached I propose to move a motion to adjourn this debate. Before doing so I should like to set out the foundation for the motion. It is understood that this debate will be now adjourned and that the House will move on to Bill C-203. After introduction of that bill by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), that debate will be adjourned and the House will call it four o'clock. These two bills will then come back to the House on Wednesday.

Unless the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald), after meditation and prayer—something I would recommend to this government—has changed his mind, this is the understanding. If that is so, I accordingly move, seconded by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse):

That this debate be now adjourned.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, would the House leader for the official opposition say whether it is also understood that when we come back to Bill C-202 on Wednesday we will proceed straight to a vote—that there is no intention of continuing this debate on Wednesday?

Mr. Baldwin: That had been my understanding, Mr. Speaker. There were a number of volunteers from the other side, and unless the volunteers continue we are perfectly prepared to have a vote on Wednesday; if necessary, a recorded vote.

Mr. Lewis: We agree.

Mr. Forest: Mr. Speaker, I believe that is the agreement, and we will vote on Wednesday next.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In any event, there is a motion before the House, moved by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). In view of the fact that the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) has already spoken, perhaps the hon. member would agree to let the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Gundlock) second the motion.

Mr. Baldwin: I would be delighted, Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to.

TERRITORIAL SEA AND FISHING ZONES ACT

PROVISION OF TWELVE-MILE TERRITORIAL SEA, ELIMINATION OF CONTIGUOUS FISHING ZONES

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved that Bill C-203, to amend the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the proposed amendments to the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act contain two major provisions: the first would establish the territorial sea of Canada at 12 miles in substitution for the present limit of three miles, and as a result would eliminate the present nine-mile fishing zone which would become incorporated within the 12-mile territorial sea; the second would authorize the government, by Order in Council, to create exclusive Canadian fishing zones comprising areas of the sea adjacent to the coasts of Canada.

There are a number of reasons why the government is proposing to extend its territorial sovereignty from three to 12 miles. Basically, the reason is that the limited fisheries jurisdiction which Canada at present exercises over the outer nine-mile zone is no longer sufficient to protect the full range of Canada's vital coastal interests. The 12-mile territorial sea would have the following advantages: (a) it would provide the comprehensive jurisdictional basis which Canada requires to enforce anti-pollution controls outside Arctic waters off Canada's east and west coasts up to 12 miles from the baselines of Canada's territorial sea, rather than merely three miles as at present; (b) it will permit Canada to expedite the conclusion of negotiations with the European countries which have been permitted to continue their fishing activities in Canada's 9-mile fishing zone; (c) it will further protect Canada's security interests by permitting Canada to exercise greater control over the movement of foreign ships.

The legal regime of the territorial seas permits the coastal state to determine whether a particular passage is innocent. This bill extends that right for Canada up to a distance of 12 miles from the territorial sea baseline. All the reasons why a state requires a three-mile territorial sea apply with equal vigour to the 12-mile territorial sea. From the point of view of security, the danger is removed farther offshore and the coastal state can take all measures open to it on its own territory within a wider belt of 12 rather than three miles.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a very brief question? Since yesterday he described all the Arctic waters as internal waters, would that not result in the conclusion that innocent passage would be prevented.

Mr. Sharp: I intend to deal with that question a little later in my address, Mr. Speaker. Then (d) since the inner limit of the continental shelf is measured from the outer limit of the territorial sea, the 12-mile territorial sea will have the effect of pushing the inner limit of Canada's continental shelf seawards a distance of nine miles.

Mr. Speaker, the U.S.A. government has made clear its willingness to accept a 12-mile territorial sea provided this is achieved by multilateral agreement and not by the continuing development of customary law through state practice. The Canadian government sympathized with the U.S. desire for agreed rules of law on these questions. Canada has repeatedly shown its good faith in the multilateral approach to these questions by participating vigorously and constructively in every effort in the last 40 years to achieve agreed rules of law on the breadth of the territorial sea and the nature and extent of contiguous zones.

I do not wish to belabour the point, but I would remind the House and the international community that Canada attempted to get agreement first on a three plus nine basis—three-mile territorial sea and nine-mile contiguous zones—in 1958, and when this did not prove possible we campaigned for the famous "six plus six" formula comprising a six-mile territorial sea and six-mile contiguous zone for certain purposes. We warned that the law was developing toward wider and wider assertions of territorial sovereignty and that the international community must recognize the legitimacy of extension of jurisdiction beyond the territorial sea for limited specific purposes. Unfortunately, we had only limited and belated success in enlisting the support of the U.S.A. for our proposal.

Later, in 1960, we campaigned very actively for the six plus six formula. We made representations in capitals all over the world through our diplomatic representatives there. Might I point out parenthetically that our efforts then and the exercise in which we are now engaged require the existence of a well trained foreign service and the presence of Canadian representatives in capitals all over the world, for many reasons, but particularly when we are seeking the support of the international community, as now, for a Canadian initiative. The hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre) called yesterday in his very able speech on the Arctic waters pollution prevention bill for such representations by Canadian representatives. Mr. Speaker, we are very fortunate in having a foreign service generally accepted as one of the very best in the world, and our representatives are already engaged in making representations of the sort referred to by the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin.

It will be recalled that in 1960 our proposed six plus six formula fell short of success by a fraction of one vote. We did not, however, even then, abandon the multilateral approach. We joined with the United Kingdom in canvassing countries around the world to ask them if, in spite of the failure at Geneva, they would none the less join with us in a multilateral agreement based on the six plus six formula. We pressed the U.S.A. to join with us in these representations, but the U.S.A. declined.

Subsequently, when as a result of our extensive and protracted canvassing efforts we and our British friends found that we had the support of over 40 countries for such a proposal, provided the U.S.A. and other major powers would agree, we approached the U.S.A. again with this evidence. Unfortunately, we were told, after waiting a further period of many months for the U.S.A. reply, that the U.S.A. did not consider it timely or appropriate to join with us in our efforts. Mr. Speaker, I hope it will not be taken as a sign of anti-Americanism but merely as an affirmative sign of Canadianism for me to say that we really are not prepared, in light of these developments, to accept the proposition that it is always desirable to proceed multilaterally instead of unilaterally.

I mentioned yesterday that we decided in 1964 that it was necessary to do it alone, and so we did, we passed the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act laying down the legislative basis for delimiting the territorial sea from straight baselines rather than from the sinuosities of the coast, and established a 9-mile fishing zone contiguous to our 3-mile territorial sea. Subsequently, we established straight baselines over long stretches of our coast. The United States, while expressing its disagreement with our legislation, followed suit in 1966 in establishing its own 9-mile fishery zone. It is, however, a reflection of the close and friendly relations between our two countries that it was agreed from the outset on both sides that the fishermen of either country would be allowed to fish freely in the contiguous zones of the other. This remains the Canadian position with respect to any new Canadian fishing zones.

There are now in process discussions in many capitals concerning the desirability of a third Law of the Sea Conference, the agenda for such a possible conference and many other difficult and delicate questions. The United States has made known, as has the Soviet Union, that it would be willing to support an agreement providing for a 12-mile territorial sea, a high seas corridor through international straits and certain limited rights to coastal states over offshore fisheries. As I have stated previously, we will participate actively in any such conference. We cannot, however, accept the notion that a coastal state's fisheries conservation and protection jurisdiction must cease at 12 miles from shore.

The developments since 1960 have proved that there is no magic in the 12-mile limit. Unlike the deer and bears in national parks, who become aware after a period that they are safe when they enter the sanctuary of the park, the fish do not seem to know that they are safe—except of course from Canadian fishermen—when they enter the 12-mile limit. Massive fishing expeditions by other states covering the surface of the sea with trawlers and mother-ships are rapidly depleting the living resources of the sea. We cannot wait longer for the international community to realize the danger and move to meet it. Once again, Canada, after long and serious deliberations, has decided to go it alone.

I shall now turn to the question in which all parties have expressed great interest, namely, the implications of the establishment of a 12-mile territorial sea for Canada's Arctic sovereignty. I should like to emphasize that there is no difference of views concerning Canada's sovereignty over the islands of the Arctic archipelago nor Canada's sovereign rights to explore and exploit the mineral resources of Canada's northern continental shelf. There is no need even to comment concerning Canada's long established and universally accepted sovereignty over the land. I did hear some comments today from several members which seemed to suggest they have some doubt about this. I did not think anyone had.

With respect to the seabed, Canada is a signatory of the 1958 Geneva Convention on the Continental Shelf which recognizes the "sovereign rights" of coastal states over the continental shelf adjacent to their coasts for the purposes of exploring and exploiting its natural resources. The convention specifies that these rights are exclusive in the sense that if the coastal, state does not explore the continental shelf or exploit its natural resources, no one may do so nor make a claim to the continental shelf without the express consent of the coastal state.

Mr. Lewis: Would the minister restate that sentence, because there seems to be something wrong with it?

Mr. Sharp: I thought so, too.

Mr. Lewis: I said restate it; I did not mean re-read.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. Sharp: The convention says that the rights are exclusive in the sense that even if the coastal state does not exploit them they cannot be exploited by other states without the express consent of the coastal state itself. The convention provides, also, that the rights of coastal states over the continental shelf do not depend upon occupation, effective or notional, or on any express proclamation. The convention defines the continental shelf, and this is a point of some importance, as "the seabed and subsoil of the submarine area adjacent to the coast but outside the area of the territorial sea, to a depth of 200 meters or, beyond that limit, to where the depth of the subjacent waters admit of the exploitation of the natural resources of the said areas." Of particular interest with respect to the Arctic is that in defining the shelf the convention makes clear that it applies also "to the seabed and subsoil or similar submarine areas adjacent to the coasts of islands".

Canada is engaged, in its capacity as a member of a special UN committee on the seabed, in active discussions and negotiations concerning the development of a legal regime for the peaceful use, in the interest of mankind as a whole, of the seabed beyond national jurisdiction. Such discussions may inevitably develop into consideration of a new and more precise definition of the area where the new international regime is to apply and, thus, where national jurisdiction ends. The Canadian government knows of no basis, however, for any doubt concerning Canada's sovereign rights over Canada's northern continental shelf, and I feel no need to elaborate further on this issue.

Turning to the status of the waters, members of the House are aware that the United States government has publicly called into question the Canadian view that the waters of the Arctic archipelago are Canadian. We respect, of course, the right of the United States to their view, but we cannot and shall not abandon the long-standing Canadian position on this question. The government was criticized yesterday concerning the possible effects of the Arctic pollution prevention bill and the bill we are now debating upon Canada's claim that the waters of the Arctic archipelago are Canadian.

I referred yesterday, in reply to that point when it was made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), to the decision of the Permanent Court of Arbitration in 1910 in the North Atlantic coast fisheries case between Britain and the United States. The subject matter of that dispute was the privileges enjoyed by the inhabitants of the United States, in common with British subjects, to the fisheries of Newfoundland, Labrador and other parts of the North Atlantic coast. In particular, the historic bays of Newfoundland, such as Chaleur, Conception and Miramichi were called into question.

The tribunal referred to the argument of the United States that Great Britain during the period preceding the hearing of the case had abandoned its claims that these bays were historical, and therefore the three-mile limit should be applied to them. I propose to quote from the decision of the tribunal on this abandonment argument:

> Neither should relaxations of this claim, as are in evidence, be construed as renunciations of it; nor should omissions to enforce the claim in regard to bays as to which any controversy arose, be so construed.

It is quite clear that whether or not the Canadian government chooses to establish at this time its claim to the whole of the waters of the Arctic archipelago by drawing straight baselines from island to island so as to enclose the waters, the fact that this government does not draw such baselines, and that previous Canadian governments have not done so, does not thereby weaken our sovereignty claim.

Similarly, the establishing of a 12-mile territorial sea and the establishment of pollution control zones in these waters cannot be construed as an abandonment of the Canadian position concerning the status of these waters. I should like to quote again from the decision of the Permanent Court of Arbitration, from which I previously quoted on this issue, as follows:

> Such a construction by this tribunal may not only be intrinsically inequitable, but internationally injurious, in that it would discourage conciliatory diplomatic transactions and encourage the assertion of extreme claims to their fullest extent.

I have made clear, as has the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), that we will not back down one inch from our basic position on sovereignty but there is no interest on the part of the Canadian government in the exercise of chauvinism.

What then is the effect of the 12-mile limit with respect to the Northwest Passage? It is known that the United States regards the waters of the Northwest Passage beyond three miles from shore as high seas. I think I have already demonstrated the weakness of the legal basis for such an assertion. The 12-mile territorial sea is far too widely recognized for it to be ignored by any state. Indeed, a state that refuses to recognize the 12-mile territorial sea of another state is itself unilaterally opting out of a developing rule of law.

Since the 12-mile territorial sea is well established in international law, the effect of this bill on the Northwest Passage is that under any sensible view of the law Barrow Strait, as well as the Prince of Wales Strait, are subject to complete Canadian sovereignty. Whether or not those who disagree with us wish to allege that other waters are not Canadian, they cannot realistically argue any longer concerning these two bodies of water.

The question was asked whether Canada will admit a right of innocent passage through such waters, since the right of innocent passage pertains in the territorial sea but not in internal waters. There is considerable misunderstanding on some of the technical, legal questions involved here. Firstly, it is incorrect to argue that there can be no right of innocent passage in internal waters. The 1958 Geneva Convention on the Territorial Sea and Contiguous Zones makes specific provision for the right of innocent passage through internal waters where such waters have been established as such by means of the straight baseline system. I do not cite that rule as now applicable to these waters but merely so as to point out that the difference between the regime of internal waters, over which a state has complete sovereignty, and the regime of the territorial sea, over which a state's sovereignty is subject to the right of innocent passage, is not as clear-cut as is alleged.

There is a school of thought for example, that the status of the waters of the Arctic archipelago fall somewhere between the regime of internal waters and the regime of the territorial sea. Certainly Canada cannot accept any right of innocent passage if that right is defined as precluding the right of the coastal state to control pollution in such waters. The law may be undeveloped on this question, but if that is the case, we propose to develop it. Mr. Speaker, I hope I have said enough about the implications of this bill for the Arctic to allay any fears, real or imagined, about its effect upon our sovereignty.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, before the minister leaves that subject may I point out that he has not yet said, as he did yesterday with respect to the bill then before the House, that Canada asserts sovereignty over all waters between the 60th degree and the 141st and the North Pole.

Mr. Sharp: What I said is that we regard the waters between the islands as our waters, and we always have.

The fisheries provisions of this bill will provide the government with greater flexibility for completing the delimitation of Canada's exclusive fishing zones in those coastal areas where straight baselines have not so far been drawn from headland to headland. These provisions are enabling only; the creation of the proposed new Canadian fishing zones will require executive action by way of Order in Council.

Under the existing legislation Canada could not exercise exclusive fishing rights within such bodies of water as the Gulf of St. Lawrence, Bay of Fundy, Dixon Entrance, Hecate Strait and Queen Charlotte Sound. With the proposed amendment Canada could now, where appropriate, draw what might be called "fisheries closing lines" across the entrances to these bodies of water and thereby establish them as exclusive Canadian fishing zones. In this way Canada would have the required domestic legal basis for managing the fisheries resources of these areas.

The new fishing zones will be established only where Canada's primary interests relate to fisheries, and in areas where Canada has historic claims. In such areas the bill would, in keeping with the government's approach to the question, enable us to separate fisheries jurisdiction from the complete sovereignty which states exercise in their territorial sea and internal waters. This separation of fisheries jurisdiction from sovereignty already underlies the concept of the contiguous fishing zone which has become an established principle of customary international law, owing in good measure to the pioneering activities of Canada.

In our view the application of the concept of the exclusive fishing zone to some or all of the special bodies of water in question is justified on geographic, economic and historic grounds, as well as by the urgent need to provide for the rational management and conservation of fisheries resources. Although the fishing zone concept is best established with respect to the contiguous fishing zone extending 12 miles from the baselines of the territorial sea, it is our view that the concept is equally applicable to Canada's special bodies of water.

I must emphasize that the fisheries provisions of this bill reflect our belief that there is an urgent need for bold and imaginative approaches to the problems of fisheries management and conservation and harvesting. So long as there was an abundance of fish for everyone, so long as the living resources of the sea seemed inexhaustible, it was necessary for states to exercise only a relatively limited control over the fisheries adjacent to their shores. With growing populations and the technical developments of fishing vessels and gear, which have virtually transformed fishing activities from a harvesting to a mining process, it has become dramatically evident that the resource itself could disappear. The coastal states which depend on this resource have a responsibility to ensure its conservation and to manage it on a rational basis.

Canada was one of the pioneering countries in efforts to bring about international arrangements for the conservation of the living resources of the sea. Since the beginning of this century Canada has become a party to seven international conventions which, within the scope of their limitations, have been relatively successful but which have failed to bring about a truly effective regime for the protection of fisheries resources.

The Canadian government is convinced, on the basis of its lengthy experience in this field, that neither existing customary international law nor contemporary conventional international law are adequate to prevent the continuing and increasingly rapid depletion of the living resources of the sea. It is for this reason that we propose to extend our fisheries jurisdiction in the manner I have described. It is our expectation that other governments will take similar action since it is only too evident that there is no other effective way of preventing the rapid depletion of the living resources of the sea.

It seems anomalous that whereas international law recognizes the right of coastal states to control the exploitation of mineral resources and of the so-called sedentary species of shellfish on the continental shelf adjacent to their shores, it has not yet developed an equally effective system for the management of the "free-swimming" fish in coastal areas. A coastal state may licence foreign entrepreneurs to exploit the mineral resources of its continental shelf, but so far only a few states have taken a similar approach to controlling the exploitation of coastal fisheries resources.

Now that the world is becoming aware that living resources are not infinitely renewable and that they can indeed be exhausted or depleted by overexploitation or wiped out by means of pollution of the sea, it is vitally necessary to apply to the exploitation of these resources some of the techniques which have been developed for offshore mineral resources. The action now being taken by Canada is a step in this direction, a step toward a more logical and systematic approach to the management of living marine resources.

Exclusive rights to harvest may be necessary, but they are not an end in themselves. The end we have in mind is conservation and rational management, and for this purpose we require jurisdiction. That jurisdiction, however, does not rule out the possibility of sharing fisheries exploitation with other countries; it does, however, allow us to set rules for that exploitation, to impose licensing requirements if necessary and thus to share the financial burden of conservation as well as the financial rewards of exploitation.

Following the establishment of Canada's new fishing zones we intend to conclude negotiations for the phasing out of the fishing activities of the countries which have traditionally fished in the areas concerned, namely, Britain, Norway, Denmark, France, Spain and Italy. With respect to the fishing activities of the United States in these areas, it is intended that they should continue on the basis of the ad referendum agreement on reciprocal fishing privileges we have recently negotiated with that country. Apart from traditional fishing practices, the United States and France also have certain treaty rights off Canada's east coast, and these rights will of course be respected.

Before concluding, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might refer to the note which was delivered to our ambassador in Washington on April 14 and the reply which he delivered yesterday on behalf of the Canada government. When the question was raised by opposition members two days ago, I made clear that we had already requested the U.S.A. consent to dispense with the usual diplomatic practice of declining to publish exchanges of notes, but that I would none the less raise the question again. Our ambassador has since stressed to the State Department the importance of publishing the exchange so as to lay at rest, once and for all, the misinformation appearing in Some American newspapers to the effect that the United States note contained threats. I have already assured the House that the note contained no such threats and that the summary of the note published by the State Department accurately summarized its substance.

We have today received the response of Secretary of State Rogers to my proposal that the text of the diplomatic note of April 14 be published. His response is as follows:

> The Secretary of State regrets that he cannot agree to the proposal of the Canadian government that we depart from the usual diplomatic practice of not publishing exchanges of notes between governments in the case of our note of April 14, 1970, relating to the introduction by the Canadian government of legislation on pollution in the Arctic, fisheries and the limits of the territorial sea. Because of the public interest in the matters discussed in the note the United States did include the substance of its note in its press statement of April 15, 1970.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am now tabling—with the suggestion that it be appended to Hansard—a summary of the Canadian note. This is not the note itself but a summary of its contents.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, before the minister resumes his seat I wonder if he would answer a question. I listened very carefully to his statement with regard to the phasing out of the traditional fishing rights which are now inside our 12-mile limit, and I believe he mentioned only seven countries. It is my understanding that eight countries have traditional fishing rights within the area that exists between the three-mile territorial sea and our 12-mile limit. One of the countries he did not mention was Portugal. Would he indicate whether these eight countries' fishing rights will be phased out? Also, since this is the same statement as that made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) when he spoke on this type of legislation in 1964, and since these rights have not yet been phased out, would he indicate if there is a time limit on the phasing out of the traditional fishing rights of these eight fishing nations?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to attempt an answer at this time. I will take notice of this point, and either in the course of the debate, when it is resumed, or in the committee I will see that this question is answered adequately. Since these are delicate negotiations I would not want to say anything that might prejudice them.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister would permit another question? I express thanks to the House for letting us run a bit overtime, but the matter is important. Before I ask the question I would like to welcome the minister for taking a position that we have advocated for many years, and to say we are pleased—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether the hon. member wishes to ask a question because, as he knows, we would now normally call private members' business. If he does have a question to ask, he might do it at this time.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I understood the minister to say that the reciprocal arrangement between the United States and Canada, of fishing in each other's fishing zones, would be continued. But if this bill comes into effect, what is currently the nine-mile fishing zone will become a territorial sea. Does the same provision apply then? Will there be reciprocity so far as the territorial sea is concerned?

Prohibition of Inquiring into Arrests

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. It is my understanding that the agreement that is negotiated permits us to fish in their waters even within the three miles, and therefore we would certainly continue giving reciprocal rights to the United States.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising to ask a question?

Mr. Fairweather: No, sir. I am rising to move the adjournment of the debate, if I may.

Mr. Speaker: We can hardly do this now as we have gone past four o'clock. It is the duty of the Chair to remind hon. members that at this time, according to Standing Orders, we should go on to private members' business. However, the table officers are looking at me and urging me to ask the consent of the House to annex to today's Hansard the document referred to by the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp). Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: For document referred to above, see Appendix.]

Mr. Speaker: It being after four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' NOTICES OF MOTIONS

JUSTICE AND LEGAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSAL TO ESTABLISH ADVISORY COMMISSION ON REFORM OF CRIMINAL LAW AND THE PENAL SYSTEM

Mr. Douglas A. Hogarth (New Westminster): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have on the Order Paper motion No. 26. This motion has been completely incorporated in government legislation which is before the House and I would ask unanimous leave of the House to withdraw the motion.

Motion withdrawn.

PROPOSED PROHIBITION ON INQUIRING WHETHER ANY PERSON HAS BEEN CHARGED OR ARRESTED ONLY

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West) moved that, in the opinion of this House, the government should take all measures within its competence necessary to prohibit any one, in public or private office from making oral or written inquiry of any other person, who applies to him by reason of his holding that office, which inquiry would require that other person to disclose only, directly or indirectly, that a charge or complaint had been initiated, or information laid, or indictment preferred, against such person or that such person had been arrested only, under the criminal law of Canada, a law enacted to enforce any law of a province, or any law of a foreign state.

[Mr. Howard (Skeena).]

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purport of my motion is to draw to the attention of the House that the rights of citizens of this country are often infringed upon, sometimes through inadvertence but at other times through deliberate action in the administrative process. My motion merely states that in so far as the jurisdiction of the federal government is concerned, it will not be possible to insist that a person applying for a position, or for a passport or citizenship certificate, for instance, disclose either orally or in writing that they been charged, and charged only, with an offence; and, further, not only under a federal or provincial statute but the statute of a foreign land.

Mr. Speaker, last June it came to my attention that the Department of the Secretary of State issued form No. CR 302, an application for a certificate of citizenship by a British subject. Question No. 9 on that form had three parts which read as follows:

(A) Have you ever been charged with any offence other than a minor traffic violation?

(B) Have you ever been fined for other than a minor traffic violation or sentenced to a penitentiary, prison, gaol or reformatory?

(C) Have you ever been committed to a hospital for mental diseases in Canada? If so, give full and complete details.

In the month of November it came to my attention that the Canada Manpower Centre when hiring temporary staff for the Post Office for, say, the Christmas rush, included in its application form this question: Have you ever been charged with a criminal offence?

On the basis of the document issued by the Department of the Secretary of State I wrote to the minister on June 17, complaining about the injustice of question 9(A). I pointed out that in a court of law it is not possible to ask a person whether he has been charged, only, with an offence and that it is a fundamental right in common law that the question cannot be asked. I also had difficulty with the interpretation of what is a minor traffic violation.

The Secretary of State replied by letter dated July 24, and indicated as follows:

In the case of question 9(A), bearing in mind that a citizenship court does not really operate as a court of law and that we must endeavour to be satisfied as regards an applicant's character, it does seem to me that technically and legally we are entitled to ask whether a person has been charged with an offence. On the other hand, having the legal right to do so does not necessarily make such a question a proper one. A person is innocent until proven guilty and on that basis I am inclined to agree with you that the wording of the question should be changed. I have therefore instructed my officials to change the word "charged" to "convicted" in question 9(A).

The exception for minor traffic violations is made because it is recognized that many motorists have been convicted of minor traffic violations and that this is an expression that is generally well understood whereas it would be much more difficult for an applicant to determine what is a charge of a serious nature, especially in view of the fact that an applicant would, with few exceptions, no doubt tend to regard any offences of which he has been convicted as not being of a serious nature. The purpose of the question is to elicit information and I can assure you that an offence such as a minor violation of a provincial liquor act——would not, on that ground alone, result in a refusal of citizenship.

This is what I cited in my letter—people caught carrying a hip-flask at a football game.

This was further confirmed in a letter dated August 18 signed by the executive assistant to the minister. This informed me as follows:

Instructions have now been issued to all federal citizenship courts to amend with immediate effect the wording of 9(A) to "Have you ever been convicted of etc." vice the present "Have you ever been charged with etc.".

The letter further indicated that the form would be completely amended at the next reprint. With regard to the Post Office, Mr. Speaker, I have a letter dated November 24, signed by the Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans) and stating:

• (4:10 p.m.)

I thoroughly agree with the contention in your letter of the 13th November regarding the wording of a question appearing on a form for employment.

As a result I have given instructions that immediate action be taken to change this wording from "Have you ever been charged with a criminal offence?" to "Have you ever been convicted of a criminal offence?"

May I assure you that the wrong wording was used not with any intent to abrogate the civil rights of individuals but through inadvertance.

I wish to thank you for bringing this matter to my attention.

I appreciate the prompt action taken by both ministers in dealing with this point. I am particularly concerned about this matter because I recall that back in 1959, I believe, I raised a similar point with the Civil Service Commission. At that time, if my memory serves me right, there was a similar question on the employment form. In that case immediate action was taken to remove the offensive question. I believe in 1960 or 1961 the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation did the same thing. I checked with the CBC this week, and their forms are absolutely unobjectionable. I add that on forms of application for employment in the Public Service Commission of Canada no such questions are asked; in fact, the Public Service Commission does not even ask for any information about convictions.

It is my hope that Bill C-5, which is presently under consideration before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, will have the effect of enabling a person who has been convicted of an offence other than, shall we say, a very minor traffic offence and who makes application to the Solicitor General and obtains a pardon under the provisions laid down under the act to say "No" when answering the question: Have you ever been convicted of an offence?. In other words, the conviction record shall not continue, and the fact of the prior conviction, followed by good conduct as required by law, shall not operate forever to bar a person from employment and shall not raise embarrassing questions on, say, an application for citizenship or some other certificate to which a person of good conduct would be entitled.

I have raised this question in connection with employment application forms and certificates of citizenship, but there is also the question of the committal to mental hospitals to be considered. I hope we can see our way clearly to eliminate that question as well. As I pointed out to the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier), there are many people today who commit themselves. They are not committed by a court; they commit themselves to a mental hospital as voluntary patients for varying periods of time until they recover from alcoholism, from minor nervous breakdowns or other ailments. There is nothing wrong with that. They are not persons of poor character as a result thereof, and I cannot see why a person who has been in a mental hospital as a voluntary patient, considering the state of the treatment of mental patients today—and I hope ultimately that this provision will apply to those committed by a court—should have to answer such a question. I hope that we will become enlightened enough to so consider a person whose conduct has been good. If that person has been convicted of a serious offence in the past and if a pardon has not been obtained, the matter may be germane and the question could be asked.

I do not think I have to belabour the point, Mr. Speaker. I do not think I can find any explicit wording in the Bill of Rights which would protect the individual from such questions, but I think it is within the spirit of the Bill of Rights that one cannot ask a person, under circumstances such as I have outlined, to criminate himself, because there is always a stigma attached. It is involuntary, perhaps, on the part of the person who obtains the information, but there is a sort of inner prejudice which is immediately aroused when a person on an application for employment answers in the affirmative that he has been charged with an offence. The charge may have been withdrawn or the person may have been found not guilty.

I should like to point out a particular case that I have in hand concerning a British subject who, although now in business in Canada, was charged many years ago along with 50 other defendants of an offence under the Securities Exchange Commission Act in the state of New York. The charge was not proceeded with against a number of the persons, and this person never returned to the jurisdiction: he was in Canada. Others pleaded guilty to the offence. I have ascertained that the case is closed, and yet no evidence has been proffered with regard to this British subject here in Canada. He would, according to the particular form being objected to, have had to indicate that he had been charged in the state of New York, where he had no connection whatsoever, with an offence under the law of a foreign state.

Also, we have many people here in Canada who could be charged under some law of a foreign state—they could be charged in absentia—and would have to answer such question on the questionnaire in the affirmative. As we know, many questionnaires also carry the provision that if any material information is suppressed, the person who may have gained the employment will, if it is discovered that he has falsified or suppressed information which was required by the application form, lose his employment. Therefore the basis of my submission, Mr. Speaker, is that this House accept the motion or, in the alternative, if it is not prepared to do so, to refer this whole question to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs for examination, with the matter to be reported back to the House.

I know there are areas in which there may be some argument. I feel that in order to protect the civil rights of all our citizens so far as the federal government is concerned—this motion is very carefully limited to the federal jurisdiction—there must be a requirement that persons not convicted, and so on, shall not have their civil rights infringed upon in any way as a result of being asked for information of the kind I have outlined in my argument before the House. I therefore urge, Mr. Speaker, that the House give favourable consideration to my motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Yes.

Mr. Forest: In his remarks, the hon. member did not indicate to what extent the federal government could, within its jurisdiction, prevent people who hold positions in the private sector from asking oral or written questions to persons applying for a job or something else in order to find out if they have criminal records.

• (4:20 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, in answering the Parliamentary Secretary's question may I say this: I would think there are a number of firms and organizations in the private sector which come under federal jurisdiction and are brought under it by the Canada Labour Code. All those businesses and undertakings which fall in any way under federal jurisdiction, such as airlines, broadcasting companies, grain companies, trucking companies and others could fall within a provision of the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act: the type of prohibition that I have outlined in my motion could be included.

Mr. Douglas A. Hogarth (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) for having brought forward this resolution. I think it is a very interesting one which is not current in the minds of many members of this House.

The resolution as phrased is somewhat complicated in its wording. I appreciate that the complication is necessary to encompass various cases that the hon. member mentioned in his very splendid speech. It seems to provide that the federal government shall prohibit anyone from asking on a job application form whether a person has been charged with or arrested for a criminal offence. That seems to be the substance of the resolution before us.

I appreciate the hon. member's remarks with respect to mental institutions and the fact that this situation occurs in respect of citizenship applications and others which otherwise seem to have been corrected. It is interesting to note that it would also be applicable to a man standing before a magistrate in a court of law and applying for bail when he is accused of an offence. It would seem to prohibit the magistrate asking the person whether he had been charged with an offence in any other court. In that sense I think the resolution goes a little too far. I appreciate that legislation flowing from such a resolution would probably correct that error, but at the same time we have to consider these matters as they stand before the House.

For those of us who have been concerned with criminal jurisprudence, the question "Have you been charged or arrested?" has not come before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. I am not dealing with the incidental aspects. The main problem is whether an employer should be allowed to ask a prospective employee whether he has been convicted of an offence. I appreciate there is a marked difference between that which is in the hon. member's motion and the question as to whether he has been convicted of an offence.

It seems that the question as to whether he has been charged with an offence is relatively superfluous. I doubt very much whether it would be taken into really stringent consideration in many job applications. I agree that this particular phrase should not be there because charges under the Highway Traffic Act for speeding, failing to give the right-of-way, driving without due care and attention, charges under the game acts and charges under federal government regulations and statutes are somewhat trivial in so far as employment is concerned. Heaven knows that this and other Parliaments over the years, and other legislative assemblies, have laid down enough offences. It is very difficult for one to go through life without committing at least one offence under the Highway Traffic Act. I do not suggest this applies to the Criminal Code.

Dealing with the question of whether to ask about serious offences, why would the question "Have you been charged with an offence under the Criminal Code?" appear on an application form? It would hardly indicate, if a man had been charged with theft at one time in his life, that he was a thief—because time after time indictments are stayed. Even if he had been charged at one time with impaired driving, it might well have been dismissed or otherwise disposed of. The mere asking of that question would hardly be cogent on a job application, an application for a licence or anything else.

To that extent I am inclined to agree with the resolution put forward by the hon. member. I am most concerned about the extent of its practical application against private individuals. I have grave doubts whether the Parliament of Canada could prohibit a private individual asking such a question. I suggest, with respect, that would be a matter entirely within the provincial domain and I do not think it could be legislated by the federal government.

I think there are occasions when a person might be asked if he had ever been charged. For example, as the English law now stands, the fact that a man has been charged can often indicate that he committed the offence. There is a provision that he need not necessarily be found guilty, even though under the law applicable in Canada he would be found guilty. It is called a conditional discharge.

In all the circumstances I feel this is perhaps a proper question. I am inclined to agree in general with the resolution. I think in working out the legislation it is quite possible that the areas in which the question may be asked could easily be defined. The major problem is that we have before us from time to time in this Parliament—it is before us currently—the question of whether a person has been convicted. On job application forms, citizenship applications and the other applications which my friend has suggested, the question is asked in order to learn the character of the man. Whether he has been charged really has little to do with the character of the man. Whether he has been convicted has something to do with that aspect of the situation.

The resolution avoids the practical question before the Canadian people today, that is, can he be asked whether he has been convicted? I do not think the hon. member would really object to such a question being included in a questionnaire. I wish to assure the hon. member that there are a great many people in Canada who believe that no one should even be asked if they have been convicted of an indictable offence when completing a job application or any other type of application.

Evidence was recently presented to the Justice Committee when it was considering Bill C-5 which was designed to expand the provisions of the Criminal Code in dealing with pardons. The committee has been giving consideration to the problems which emanate from the resolution before us. The problem posed by penologists, the Solicitor General (Mr. McIlraith) and many others who are gravely concerned is simply this. Many men and women during their lives commit offences. Whether we call them criminal offences or otherwise, they are offences. Some of them are very serious, some are not so serious. Some are called indictable offences, some are called summary offences. Some are provincial offences, and some are federal. As I mentioned previously, there is a great deal which we can break.

This week the Justice Committee was informed that in Canada last year over 100,000 criminal records were opened. This does not mean that 100,000 people were convicted, but 100,000 people were the subject of criminal legislation. The commission of an offence has for years been a cross on the back of the offender. When these people have been dealt with by the courts and suffered the penalties imposed on them, there is always a feeling that they have, as the saying goes, paid their debt to society.

The real problem is that even though they have paid this debt, served their time, paid their fine, or whatever the penalty might have been, they never get a receipt for the payment, as do those who have paid their debts in civil life. I point out to hon. members that I am considering the more serious offences. The mark of a criminal offence is always there. Sometimes it is almost forgotten—the man moves from the community in which he committed the offence to another, and it never catches up with him. Sometimes it fades, depending on the seriousness of the offence and the reputation the man bears in the community. Sometimes, indeed, the mark is borne literally on his back all his life, since this country still tolerates corporal punishment, one of the most vicious forms of punishment ever used in a supposedly civilized society.

The professed object of contemporary penology—it is not the only object—is to rehabilitate the offender, to convince him, not that he is a man who must pay in conscience for what he has done for the rest of his life but that what he has done is not acceptable to the community in which he lives. Some persons take a great deal of convincing, as the committee learned in the course of its visits two weeks ago. In the case of some persons, it appears it can never be done. Yet, I was greatly heartened by the observation of Mr. Alan MacLeod, the Commissioner of Penitentiaries, that he will never accept the proposition that correction will never take place, leaving aside, of course, those who have the misfortune to suffer from mental illness.

Sometimes a small fine is sufficient, even in serious cases, bearing in mind the character of the man concerned and the nature of the situation in which the offence occurred. Sometimes even an appearance in court and the publication of the charge in a newspaper is punishment enough and sufficient deterrence. Sometimes probation in the sense of a suspended sentence is most successful, especially in dealing with young offenders. Unfortunately, it may be necessary to send the offender to prison. This may happen, unfortunately, more often than is really necessary from the viewpoint of rehabilitation.

But if ever the concept of punishment is completely removed and the whole emphasis is placed on rehabilitation and correction, certain consequences will follow. One is apt to forget that the whole system of criminal jurisprudence grew up not only to protect life and property but to place in the hands of the state the basic human and fundamental emotion of revenge which develops so often in the hearts of victims of crimes. What those who approach penology solely from the point of view of rehabilitation often forget is that the offender in some instances has committed a dastardly crime against some other person who is left to suffer for the rest of his life.

In one case with which I was familiar, a man waited until the murderer of his daughter was eventually released on parole from prison. There was a great deal of concern on the part of the authorities as to what this man would do. We must never forget that the aspect of penology is the removal from the community of the individual desire for revenge on the part of victims. Think of the father of a child who has been molested, attacked, and perhaps brutally murdered: this desire for revenge exists, and one aspect of the criminal law is to remove it and place it in the hands of the state.

I sometimes think that if we were adequately to compensate victims of crimes, as I believe is done to some extent in New Zealand, this concept of revenge, which is foreign to the Judaeo-Christian ethic, could be removed from the criminal law and we might be able to concentrate entirely on the rehabilitation of the offender, except that some measure of deterrence would have to be retained in order to discourage others from committing offences. The rehabilitation program would include education, counselling and, what is most badly needed, proper psychiatric care.

Mr. Winch: Psychological, not psychiatric.

Mr. Hogarth: Psychology, I understand, is statistical, and psychiatry is therapeutic. So I will go with "psychiatric" for today. We have not reached this stage at present, though we hope it is coming. There is no doubt that many of those who are subjected to our present prison system become fully rehabilitated. The problem arises when they are released from prison to start out afresh. Some learn a trade. The first thing a man wants when he gets out of jail is a job. If he is a first offender, no real difficulty arises about placing him in employment. People understand. In all probability the man has a job lined up before he is placed on parole. But perhaps he is getting out after serving a second term of imprisonment for a second offence, and perhaps it is one of the more serious offences. When he applies for a job, the big question arises as to whether he should admit where he has been and what he has done, or should he take the risk of saying nothing, hoping for the best? Or he could answer the questionnaire falsely. Alternatively, he could apply only for those jobs for which there is no questionnaire.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Many of these men admit what they have done and put it on the questionnaire. Having been released from the British Columbia penitentiary, St. Vincent de Paul, or whichever one it is, they find that they cannot get the job in question, and they do not know why. If they apply for a job at a big concern, perhaps they just receive a rejection slip. The next time they apply for a job they lie about their past. What happens to them? They stay on the job for a week while inquiries are made, the boss finds out the truth and once again they are out of work. After one or more of these demoralizing experiences they give up; they surrender and drift back to their friends who got them into trouble in the first place.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Does the House agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Come back to the motion.

Mr. Hogarth: In any event, the man in question drifts back and finally ends up once again in the penitentiary for another offence that he has committed, having done his best to find employment. Although, of course, some prisoners released are weak in this respect, the sort of man I have described will eventually say to himself, "This is where I belong. This is all I have in life." Time and time again when he has served his sentence and been released, back he goes to the penitentiary. Sometimes these men become habitual criminals.

The question whether the employer should or should not be allowed to ask the question in the first place is a good one. Should an employer of a man be allowed to ask his prospective employee: Have you ever been convicted of a criminal offence? Or should he ask the more frivolous question: Have you ever been charged with an offence?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): But they do ask it.

Mr. Hogarth: I appreciate that, but it is a good question and is one that is so current in our work on the Justice Committee that I thought I would bring it to the attention of the House today. The question, as I say, is a good one. The question whether or not we can legislate against such an inquiry is a better one. There are many employers in Canada; the government is not the only one. Most employers do not come within the jurisdiction of the federal government. But in any event, an employer is surely entitled to inquire into the character of a person charged with a criminal offence; I do not think there is any doubt about that. He can inquire into his education, into his background.

I do not think he could even be said to be wrong in printing into his ethnic origin or inquiring who the man is. After all, he wants to know whom he is hiring and wants to take every factor into consideration. I do not say that all these factors should make a difference, but an employer is entitled to know who a prospective employee is, particularly if he is to become a responsible employee in a trusted position.

I was surprised to hear of some of the information that the hon. member has been given, because in regard to the question whether the federal government should or should not be allowed to ask this question it was our understanding in the committee that federal government policy is to eliminate this question from the form. It used to be on the form but it is now absent, so that a prospective employee need not indicate whether or not he has been convicted of an offence. Perhaps other employers should follow suit and regard this as a lead taken by the government.

I am concerned as to the application of such a policy. Could it fit all circumstances? For example, the hon. member has a law practice—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I had.

Mr. Hogarth: We look forward to having the hon. member here for many more years instead of going back to his practice. But suppose the hon. member wants to hire a young lawyer from the east and he does not know the young man in question, though he seems presentable. Should he not ask the young man, or those in the east who know the young man, whether he has ever been convicted of theft, perjury or fraud?

Although he would not ask that question specifically in those terms, he could ask it indirectly by asking whether he had ever been in trouble, whether he had ever been disbarred. If you cannot ask such questions of a lawyer you are thinking of hiring, it seems to me that at some time or other you will end up buying a pig in a poke, and I do not think that in the circumstances that is quite fair.

Consider the case of the trust company executive. Could he not ask similar questions about an accountant? Could he not ask such questions of somebody whom he is going to put in a position of trust? Similarly, could not an insurance company executive ask the same question? If not, how could he find out whether a prospective employee had or had not been refused a bond? Could not a bonding company ask such questions as: Have you ever been convicted of theft? Certainly they could: I suggest we must be realistic. I think we must all admit that this is a difficult problem. I thank the House for letting me speak at such length.

May I just add that I think what is required is a far more sophisticated method of dealing with people who have been convicted of offences, have served their time and are looking for jobs. I think that the John Howard Society, the Elizabeth Fry Society, church groups and "Big Brothers" should be given far more assistance to enable them to go to an employer with a prospective employee and help him get the job.

I would have taken longer, Mr. Speaker, but I understand that one of my hon. friends wishes to make a few remarks, and time is running out.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, it is fortunate that I intend to make only very few remarks because I do not want to find myself in the position of talking out this resolution. I very seldom take part in these debates between 4 and 5 p.m., and my reason for not doing so is that there is an air of futility about a discussion that ends by a measure being talked out.

I am very happy to have the opportunity to take part in this discussion because I think the hon. member's resolution is timely, sound, and deserves the fullest possible support. As has been said, the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee is dealing with a related matter, Bill C-5, which has to do with the expungement or pardon of criminal records. I am reminded that the Ouimet Commission has recommended that in the case of conviction of a summary offence the record be automatically wiped out at the end of a two-year period, and I think this recommendation is an excellent one.

This illustrates, as does the resolution that we are discussing, the fact that the House and the community generally are and ought to be concerned about the growing invasion of privacy, the multiplication of impertinent questionnaires and records, all of which oppress individuals in the world today. I think that we in this Parliament have a duty to try to do something to correct the situation.

In this respect I think the hon. member has put his finger on one item which is of great importance, namely, the asking of questions, not about a person's actual record—which may or may not be justified in some circumstances—but about his being charged with an offence, a question which I suggest in no circumstances is justified.

Why is it not justified? We are discussing a subject that has very wide scope. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) gave illustrations of the situation in the public service and I was glad to hear that many people in the public service, when the matter is called to their attention, are ready to withdraw these offensive questionnaires. But in this respect the public service is aping what is the general practice in private business on a large scale, where I believe questions like this are a matter of course.

It not only applies to the matter of employment, the would-be employee who is coerced into having to answer questions that are embarrassing and harmful to him; it might apply to people applying for insurance or for licences of various sorts. There is a whole series of situations in which a person is bound to answer a similar questionnaire. I say they are embarrassing and are very serious because it is not just correct to say it is not harmful to admit that you have been charged with an offence.

I regret to say this, but I think it is only natural and only human that even though a person may have been convicted and the offence may not have been proved according to criminal law, the mere fact of being charged is derogatory. I find it difficult to conceive of an employer who finding that a prospective employee had been twice charged with a serious offence would say, "Well, they may not have been able to convict him. They will not take a chance on a person who has been charged. Why would they ask these questions unless the mentality is such that they would accept a charge as tantamount, at least, to strong suspicion of actual guilt even though there may be no conviction whatever?

I say this is a serious matter and inflicts damage on people without any excuse whatever. We are trying to protect people who have been convicted. We are trying to protect people who have been convicted of minor offences from having to answer questions, and by expunging the record. We are dealing, in the case of this legislation, with people who have merely been charged, and convicted of nothing at all. I hope the whole matter will, as the hon. member who introduced it suggested, be referred to the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee. I think it is properly part and parcel of the subject they are investigating at the present time—the protection of the privacy and rights of the individual against public records, public snooping, wire-tapping and things of that sort.

I notice the resolution is carefully worded to deal with the government only taking measures within its competence. I suggest in this Parliament, in regard to criminal law we have a very wide power to deal with things that are offensive to our sense of propriety. It may be that the scope of legislation that can be introduced will be considerable. I said I did not want to talk this bill out. That is a process which I despise and I want to have no part of it. I think this is a very constructive resolution. I hope it will be sent to the committee, where it belongs, and not just talked out in the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Georges-C. Lachance (Lafontaine): Mr. Speaker, I realize that the member who spoke before me would like the motion now before us to be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and, therefore, the debate to be adjourned immediately.

I know my colleague well enough to believe that he will certainly let other members voice their views on this matter. After discussing an issue for 45 minutes, it would be too easy to say that it must automatically be referred to the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Having heard the comments of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), I think that he has pretty well clarified the terms of his motion. On the other hand, aware of his legal competence, I told myself right away that he seemed to be pushing things a bit too far.

I entirely agree with the main objective of the motion to prevent any investigation regarding any charge, complaint or denunciation against an applicant for a job in the public service or in the private sector.

As recently as yesterday, I attended meetings of the Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration which deals precisely with the matter of employment in the public service. I put questions to the officials of the department who are concerned with manpower regarding the investigations and questionaires in the case of the people mentioned earlier. I was assured that there were no questions about the criminal record of those who apply for a position in the public service or in the private sector.

Mr. Speaker, I wish the views of the hon. member for Edmonton West were shared by all the members of his party, as not later than last week, many of them were asking the government if an inquiry had been made before granting an individual a job in the public service. I wonder whether the general principle of the motion of the hon. member for Edmonton West should not apply in that case, or in other similar cases, so that his motion would be in keeping with what he thinks and says.

I see the hon. member is raising his eyes to heaven. However, he knows very well what I am alluding to when I speak of an insistent request made to the government to see if such and such an individual has been given a national security clearance. I do not pretend that the hon. member for Edmonton West has done it. He knows very well—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business has expired.

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

APPENDIX

SUMMARY OF CANADIAN NOTE HANDED TO THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT ON APRIL 16, 1970

The Canadian Government is unable to accept the views of the USA Government concerning the Arctic waters pollution prevention bill and the amendments to the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act, and regrets that the USA is not prepared to accept or acquiesce in them. The Canadian Government cannot accept in particular the view that international law provides no basis for the proposed measures. For many years, large numbers of states have asserted various forms of limited jurisdiction beyond their territorial sea over marine areas adjacent to their coasts. The position of the USA Government is that the waters beyond a three-mile limit are high seas and that no state has a right to exercise exclusive pollution or resources jurisdiction on the high seas beyond a three-mile territorial sea. The Canadian Government does not accept this view which indeed the USA itself does not adhere to in practice. For example, as early as 1790, at a time when the international norm for the breadth of the territorial sea was without question three miles, the USA claimed jurisdiction up to twelve miles for customs purposes and enacted appropriate enforcement legislation, which is still in force. Since 1935 the USA has claimed the authority to extend customs enforcement activities as far out to sea as 62 miles, in clear contradiction of applicable international law. In 1966, the USA established exclusive fisheries jurisdiction beyond its three-mile territorial sea extending out to twelve miles from shore, and the USA has just passed analogous legislation asserting exclusive pollution control jurisdiction beyond its three-mile territorial sea and up to twelve miles. Canada reserves to itself the same rights as the USA has asserted to determine for itself how best to protect its vital interests, including in particular its national security. It is the further view of the Canadian Government that a danger to the environment of a state constitutes a threat to its security. Thus the proposed Canadian Arctic waters pollution prevention legislation constitutes a lawful extension of a limited form of jurisdiction to meet particular dangers, and is of a different order from unilateral interferences with the freedom of the high seas such as, for example, the atomic tests carried out by USA and other states which, however necessary they may be, have appropriated to their own use vast areas of the high seas and constituted grave perils to those who would wish to utilize such areas during the period of the test blast. The most recent example of such a test by the USA and its consequences for the freedom of the high seas, as was pointed out by some Governments at that time, occurred in October 1969 when the USA warned away shipping within a 50-mile radius of the test it was conducting at Amchitka Island. The proposed anti-pollution legislation, proposed fisheries protection legislation and the proposed 12-mile territorial sea constitute a threat to no state and a peril to no one.

It is a well-established principle of international law that customary international law is developed by state practice. Recent and important instances of such state practice on the law of the sea are, for example, the Truman proclamation of 1945 proclaiming USA jurisdiction over the continental shelf and the unilateral establishment in 1966 by USA of exclusive fishing zones. Overwhelming evidence that international law can be and is developed by state practice lies in the fact that in 1958, at the time of the first of recent failures of the international community to reach agreement on the breadth of the territorial sea, some 14 states claimed a 12-mile territorial sea, whereas by 1970 some 45 states have established a 12-mile territorial sea and 57 states have established a territorial sea of 12 miles or more. Indeed, the three-mile territorial sea, now claimed by only 24 countries, was itself established by state practice.

The USA Government is aware of the major efforts made by Canada at the 1958 and 1960 Geneva Law of the Sea Conferences to bring about an agreed rule of law on the breadth of the territorial sea and on the breadth of contiguous zones for the exercise of various other types of limited jurisdiction. Subsequent to the failure of the 1958 and 1960 Conferences Canada joined with other countries in a further extensive and vigorous multilateral campaign to bring about agreement on these questions, but these efforts failed because the USA ultimately declined to participate in them. In 1964, when Canada passed legislation establishing a nine-mile contiguous fishing zone, the USA objected to it, only to follow suit two years later, thereby confirming its acquiescence in both the substance and the manner of Canada's action. In discussions between Canada and the USA from time to time over the last ten years, Canada has made clear its serious concern over the unresolved questions of the breadth of the territorial sea and the rights of coastal states to assert limited forms of jurisdiction beyond the territorial sea for the purpose of protecting their vital interests. With respect to the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Bill, the Canadian delegation at the November 1969 Brussels IMCO Conference made strenuous efforts to bring about international agreement on effective pollution prevention measures, but the results of that Conference fell short of effective protection for coastal states and the world's marine environment.

It is well known that Canada takes second place to no nation in pressing for multilateral solutions to problems of international law, and that Canada has repeatedly and consistently shown its good faith by its continuous efforts to produce agreed rules of law. The Canadian Government is, however, determined to fulfil its fundamental responsibilities to the Canadian people and to the international community for the protection of Canada's offshore marine environment and its living resources, and the proposed legislation is directed to these ends.

The Canadian Government has long been concerned about the inadequacies of international law in failing to give the necessary protection to the marine environment and to ensure the conservation of fisheries resources. The proposed anti-pollution legislation is based on the overriding right of self-defence of coastal states to protect themselves against grave threats to their environment. Traditional principles of international law concerning pollution of the sea are based in the main on ensuring freedom of navigation to shipping states, which are now engaged in the large scale carriage of oil and other potential pollutants. Such traditional concepts are of little or no relevance anywhere in the world if they can be cited as precluding action by a coastal state to protect this environment. Such concepts are particularly irrelevant, however, to an area having the unique characteristics of the Arctic, where there is an intimate relationship between the sea, the ice and the land, and where the permanent defilement of the environment could occur and result in the destruction of whole species. It is idle, moreover, to talk of freedom of the high seas with respect to an area, large parts of which are covered with ice throughout the year, other parts of which are covered with ice most of each year, and where the local inhabitants use the frozen sea as an extension of the land to travel over it by dogsled and snowmobile far more than they can use it as water. While the Canadian Government is determined to open up the Northwest Passage to safe navigation, it cannot accept the suggestion that the Northwest Passage constitutes high seas.

In these circumstances the Canadian Government is not prepared to await the gradual development of international law, either by other states through their practice nor through the possible development of rules of law through multilateral treaties. The Canadian Government has repeatedly made clear that it is fully prepared to participate actively in multilateral action aimed at producing agreed safety and anti-pollution standards and protection of the living resources of the sea but is not prepared to abdicate in the meantime its own primary responsibilities concerning these questions.

With respect to the bill which would authorize the establishment of a 12-mile territorial sea off Canada's coasts, the large number of coastal states now claiming a territorial sea of 12 miles or more, and the recent efforts of the USA directed towards a rule of law on the territorial sea, rights of passage and fisheries jurisdiction, provide the best evidence of the validity of the Canadian position on this question. The Canadian Goverment is aware of USA interest in ensuring freedom of transit through international straits, but rejects any suggestion that the Northwest Passage is such an international strait. The widespread interest in opening up the Northwest Passage to commercial shipping and the well-known commitment of the Canadian Government to this end are themselves ample proof that it has not heretofore been possible to utilize the Northwest Passage as a route for shipping. The Northwest Passage has not attained the status of an international strait by customary usage nor has it been defined as such by conventional international law. The Canadian Government reiterates its determination to open up the Northwest Passage to safe navigation for the shipping of all nations subject, however, to necessary conditions required to protect the delicate ecological balance of the Canadian Arctic.

Canada's new reservation to its acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court does not in any way reflect lack of confidence in the Court but takes into account the limitations within which the Court must operate and the deficiencies of the law which it must interpret and apply. Canada's readiness to submit to the international judicial process remains general in scope and is subject only to certain limited and clearly defined exceptions rather than to a general exception which can be defined at will so as to include any particular matter.

It is the earnest hope of the Canadian Government that it will be possible to achieve internationally accepted rules for Arctic navigation within the framework of Canada's proposed legislation. It is recognized that the interests of other states are inevitably affected in any exercise of jurisdiction over areas of the sea. These interests have been taken into account in drafting this legislation; Canada has, for instance, provided that naval vessels and other ships owned by foreign governments may be exempted from the application of Canadian anti-pollution regulations if the ships in question substantially meet Canadian standards. Canada will give the interests of other states, including the USA, further consideration in entering into consultations with them before promulgating safety regulations under the Arctic waters bill.

The Canadian Government is pleased to note that the USA confirms that it is acutely aware of the peculiar ecological nature of the Arctic region and the potential dangers of oil pollution in that area. The Canadian Government agrees that the Arctic is a "region important to all nations in its unique environment, its increasing significance as a world trade route and as a source of natural resources". The Canadian Government does not, however, agree that the Arctic as a whole should be subjected to an international regime protecting its assets both living and non-living, if that is what is proposed by the USA. Canada's sovereignty over the islands of the Arctic Archipelago is not of course, in issue, nor are Canada's sovereign rights over its northern continental shelf and the Canadian Government assumes that the USA Government is not suggesting an international regime to cover these environments (nor the land near and adjacent submarine resources of Alaska).

With respect to the waters of the Arctic Archipelago, the position of Canada has always been that these waters are regarded as Canadian. While Canada would be pleased to discuss with other states international standards of navigation safety and environmental protection to be applicable to the waters of the Arctic, the Canadian Government cannot accept any suggestion that Canadian waters should be internationalized. The Canadian Government notes that the USA intends shortly to ask other interested states to join in an international conference designed to establish internationally agreed rules protecting the living and non-living assets of the Arctic beyond national jurisdiction, and notes that the USA Government would be pleased to join the Canadian Government in such a conference. Before the Canadian Government can express a definitive view on this question, further information will be required as to the scope, nature and territorial application of the rules the USA proposes, since the Canadian Government obviously cannot participate in any international conference called for the purpose of discussing questions falling wholly within Canadian domestic jurisdiction. With regard to matters properly of an international character, the Prime Minister took the lead in his statement to Canadian Parliament on October 24 last, in inviting the international community to join Canada in promoting a new concept, an international legal regime to ensure to human beings the right to live in a wholesome natural environment.

With respect to the proposed legislation permitting the establishment of exclusive fishing zones, it is the considered view of the Canadian Government that neither existing customary international law nor contemporary conventional international law are adequate to prevent the continuing and increasingly rapid depletion of the living resources of the sea. The Canadian Government is aware of the proposals of the USA and other states concerning possible solutions to this problem through a multilateral approach, and intends to participate actively and constructively in any conferences to be held to consider such questions. The Government in the meantime proposes to take all measures necessary for the protection and conservation of the living resources of the sea adjacent to Canada's coast. It is Canada's expectation that other states will take similar action since it is becoming increasingly apparent that there is no other effective way of preventing the rapid depletion of the living resources of the marine environment.

The Canadian Government is pledged to the development of the use of Canada's Arctic waters for the encouragement and expansion of Canada's northern economy and has adopted a functional and constructive approach to these questions which does not interfere with and indeed can facilitate the legitimate activities of others. The two bills reflect the determination of the Canadian Government to fulfil its responsibilities to its own people and to the international community to preserve the ecological balance of Canada and to protect and conserve the living resources of its marine environment.

The Canadian Government reaffirms its faith in the spirit of cooperation which Canada and the USA have shown throughout so much of the history of their relations and is confident that it will be possible to resolve their differences amicably and with mutual understanding.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, April 20, 1970

The House met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

AIR SAFETY BILL

MEASURE RESPECTING LOCATION OF CRASHED AIRCRAFT, ASSISTANCE TO OCCUPANTS

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Okanagan Boundary. Is the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond rising for the purpose of moving this bill on behalf of the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary?

Mr. Goode: That is correct, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member can do this only with the unanimous consent of the House. It is the practice that a private bill cannot be moved by another member in the absence of the mover of the bill unless there is unanimous agreement. The assumption is that the hon. member is doing this with the consent of the hon. member in whose name the bill stands on the Order Paper. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Goode (for Mr. Howard, Okanagan Boundary) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-206, respecting air safety.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Goode: Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure to explain the purpose of this bill for my colleague from Okanagan Boundary who this week is immersed at St. Johns, Quebec.

The purpose of this bill is to improve the method of search for and rescue of disabled aircraft. At present it costs the federal government over $7 million each year for search and rescue operations. The bill is intended both to reduce costs and save lives.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

STUDY OF GOVERNMENT INFORMATION SYSTEM

Question No. 771—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Did the Department of Regional Economic Expansion give a contract to study or up-date its Government Information System to Systems Dimensions Ltd.?

2. Was there a competitive tender for this study and, if so, who were the other competitors and what were their respective bids?

3. What were reasons for this decision in view of the freeze on most departments which have proposed to hire new staff or to fill vacancies?

4. How much will Systems Dimensions Ltd. be paid in fulfilment of this contract and what are the qualifications of the company which received this contract?

5. What other contracts with private research companies has the department let in the past three months?

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): 1. No.

2, 3 and 4. Not applicable.

5. None.

INNISFAIL, ALBERTA—TENDERS FOR RCMP DOG TRAINING CENTRE

Question No. 1,044—Mr. Thompson:

1. How many firms tendered on the construction on the RCMP Dog Training Centre at Innisfail, Alberta?

2. What are the amounts of the tenders and the names of the contractors?

3. What sub-contractors were not paid by the general contractor and what are the amounts?

4. Did the successful contracting firm meet the obligations of the contract satisfactorily?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): 1. Two.

2.

Contractor	Amount of Tender
Dynacon Construction, Calgary	$11,695
Buruma Construction Ltd., Red Deer	11,740

3.

Sub-Contractor	Amount
Revelstoke Building Materials	$632.13
Llewellyn Electric	221.62
Otto Roofing	345.00
Prairie Engineering	178.83

Questions

4. Dynacon Construction met their construction obligations under the terms of the contract satisfactorily, but have not yet met all their financial obligations. The Department is withholding payments to Dynacon Construction and making payments direct to creditors.

LAW WITH RESPECT TO "OBSCENITY"

Question No. 1,126—Mr. Robinson:

Is it the federal government's intention to change the law with respect to "obscenity" and, if so, to what extent?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): The Government of Canada has no immediate intention of introducing legislation with respect to obscenity, but this is one of the matters that might be given to the Law Reform Commission for consideration in the event that the Bill now before the House providing for that Commission is passed.

SUPREME COURT OF CANADA—NUMBER OF CASES HEARD

Question No. 1,151—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. How many cases were heard by the Judges of the Supreme Court of Canada in 1966, 1967, 1968 and 1969?

2. How are these cases classified by subject and how many were settled in 1966, 1967, 1968 and 1969?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice):

Appeals	106	151	130	143
Motions for leave, etc.	99	130	139	129
Total	205	281	269	272

2. Cases are not classified by subject and the Registrar is not always informed of settlements by the parties. Section 8 of Bill C-182 is amending section 74 of the Supreme Court Act to provide that a notice of discontinuance shall be filed with the Registrar.

CANADIAN GRAIN SALES

Question No. 1,396—Mr. Skoberg:

1. How many brokerage firms are now handling Canadian grain sales?

2. Where are these firms located?

3. In the event of one brokerage firm handling a grain sale, do any or all of the other firms receive any remuneration as well?

4. How much per bushel do the brokerage firms receive for handling Canadian grain sales?

5. How are the charges determined?

6. At any time, did ships refuse to enter the Vancouver port for grain until they received an additional payment per bushel and, if so (a) how much per bushel did they receive (b) was this cost passed on to the producer?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): It is assumed that the question refers to shipping and exporting firms acting as agents for the Canadian Wheat Board. On this assumption, the answers are as follows: 1 and 2. See list attached.

3, 4 and 5. The Canadian Wheat Board does not pay a remuneration to these firms for negotiating Canadian grain sales. Competition establishes the margin which can be added to the Board's price.

6. The Canadian Wheat Board is not involved in the negotiations between its agents and the vessel owners. If such additional cost were incurred it was not claimed against the Canadian Wheat Board nor passed to the producer.

MANICOUAGAN—CONSTRUCTION OF ACCESS ROADS

Question No. 1,454—Mr. Blouin:

With reference to the federal-provincial plan for the construction of access roads to natural resources (a) what works were undertaken in the constituency of Manicouagan (b) what was the length, in miles, of the roads constructed (c) where were they constructed (d) what was the cost (e) how much was contributed by the federal government (f) are any new agreements with the provinces contemplated?

Mr. R. J. Orange (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources has no record of road construction under a federal-provincial cost-sharing agreement in the federal constituency of Manicouagan.

POSITION HELD BY JEAN OCTEAU—EXPO '70

Question No. 1,507—Mr. Coates:

1. What position does Jean Octeau hold with the Canadian Government insofar as its participation in Expo '70 in Osaka, Japan, is concerned?

2. What accommodations have been provided to Mr. Octeau at government expense during the period of his stay at Osaka and how long will he be involved with Expo '70 in Japan?

3. Are any additional accommodations provided to Mr. Octeau and, if so, for what reason?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. Jean Octeau is Deputy Commissioner General of the Canadian Government Participation in Expo '70.

2. He has been provided apartment accommodation for living purposes with a total area of 540 square feet.

Mr. Octeau arrived in Osaka on March 12, 1970. His term appointment expires September 30, 1970.

3. No additional accommodation is provided Mr. Octeau.

LAST OAK PARK, SASKATCHEWAN

Question No. 1,571—Mr. Burton:

1. Has the Department of Regional Economic Expansion carried out any work or authorized work in planning for the development of Last Oak Park, north of Broadview, Saskatchewan and, if so, by whom was this work carried out?

2. How much has been spent to date in each fiscal year in planning for this Park?

3. How much has been spent in each fiscal year in development of this Park and how much was spent on (a) roads (b) land clearing and development (c) other facilities?

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): 1 and 2. Yes. Under the 1965-70 ARDA Agreement, two projects were authorized to assess the recreational development potential of Indian lands in the Crooked and Round Lakes area of Last Oak Park, at a total cost of approximately $124,000. The consulting firm of C. W. Pool and Associates Limited was retained by the Saskatchewan government to undertake the basic study work.

3. Not applicable.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—AGREEMENTS IN RELATION TO "SPECIAL AREAS"

Question No. 1,580—Mr. Simpson:

1. How many provincial governments have signed or concluded agreements with the federal government in relation to "special areas", as outlined to the House of Commons by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion on March 11, 1970?

2. If any provincial governments have signed such agreements, on what dates were each of the agreements signed?

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): 1. Drafting of agreements with most of the Provinces concerned has been concluded, and formal signing is expected very shortly.

2. Not applicable.

CANADIAN CONSUMER COUNCIL—ESTABLISHMENT COST

Question No. 1,588—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. What was the total "set-up" cost to establish the Canadian Consumer Council?

2. What is the annual salary of the executive secretary and the total annual salaries of staff assistants?

3. What was the total cost of expenses, etc., for Council Members in the calendar year 1969?

4. What was the total cost of administration of the Council for the calendar year?

5. What has been the total cost of setting up and administering the Council since its inception?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): 1. There was no identifiable cost involved in the "setting up" of the Canadian Consumer Council.

2. Executive Director, $23,000; Secretaries, $10,812.

3. $19,489.

4. $28,949.

5. To March 26, 1970, $71,024.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS—PURCHASE OF DRUGS FOR VETERANS

Question No. 1,591—Mr. Comeau:

1. Is it the intention of the Department of Veterans Affairs to provide for the purchase of drugs for veterans through Veterans' Hospitals rather than through the local pharmacies and, if so, on what date will this policy come into effect?

2. Did the Department consider the possible increase in administrative responsibilities resulting from such action?

3 Has the Department studied the effect this decision will have on local pharmacies and, if so, what are the results?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1. No. The Department's practice of filling prescriptions from doctors of choice through local pharmacies will be continued.

2. Yes.

3. Yes. A decision to change would have had an adverse effect on the local pharmacies' volume of business and their ability to provide for the treatment needs of veterans in the community.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—CONSTRUCTION OF BUILDING

Question No. 1,592—Mr. Brewin:

Does the government contemplate (a) making any changes in the design or size of the building to be constructed by the External Affairs Department (b) does it propose to postpone (i) awarding the contract or (ii) the construction of the building until the White Paper(s) on foreign or external policy has been published and approved by Parliament?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): (a) A major redesign of the building, which included a reduction in its size was carried out prior to the calling of tenders in order to meet an established reduction in the budgetary ceiling. (b) (i) No. (ii) No. The building is designed for the long range expansion of the Department of External Affairs. If for any reason there remains a surplus of space beyond that needed for External Affairs when the building is ready for occupancy in approximately three years, that surplus will be used for other compatible needs.

COST OF TOMMY HUNTER SHOW VISIT TO CANADIAN TROOPS IN CYPRUS

Question No. 1,636—Mr. Coates:

1. What was the cost to the federal government of the visit of the Tommy Hunter Show to Canadian troops stationed in Cyprus?

2. How many aircraft were involved in transporting the party and equipment associated with the Tommy Hunter Show?

3. How many individuals were transported to Cyprus by the federal government associated with the Tommy Hunter Show and what were the names of the individuals in question?

Mr. D. W. Groos (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. The approximate cost to DND was $11,000.

2. No special aircraft were used to transport the Tommy Hunter Show to Cyprus. Personnel travelled on Regular Service Flight #307—Trenton to Nicosia, and return flight #308—Nicosia to Trenton. All associated equipment for the show was shipped via regular service flights.

3. Fifty-one. Mr. Y. Baloch; Mr. G. Basso; Mr. M. Beaulieu; Mr. J. A. Budell; Miss D. F. Cartner; Mr. A. P. Chernywech; Mr. R. E. B. Coyle; Mr. K. W. Dalzeil; Mr. J. Dixon; Miss D. S. Dorice; Mr. M. Ferbey; Mrs. Y. C. Forbes; Mr. H. L. French; Mr. G. W. Goldsmith; Mr. E. Hoppe; Mr. T. J. Hunter; Mr. R. B. Hutt; Mr. J. Jensen; Mr. E. D. Kristensen; Miss C. Lamagna; Mr. R. E. Livingston; Mr. P. C. Luxford; Mr. R. A. Mackborn; Miss J. E. Maloney; Mr. G. B. Marsh; Mr. B. Niosi; Mrs. C. D. Nolan; Mr. J. C. Piril; Mr. E. T. W. Reay; Mr. P. J. Riccio; Mr. B. K. Ritchie; Mr. E. M. Robertson; Mrs. M. D. Rodwell; Mr. I. Romanoff; Mrs. L. S. Romanoff; Mrs. J. A. Snider; Mr. T. H. Sora; Mr. R. A. Steiner; Mr. R. C. Steiner; Mr. R. D. Steiner; Mr. W. O. S. Strong; Mr. G. R. Tapp; Mr. D. A. Thomas; Mr. Traugopi; Mr. G. A. Trebek; Mr. R. G. Vezina; Mr. K. Wald; Mr. R. G. White; Mr. P. J. Zaza; Captain K. S. McArthur, Conducting Officer; Sergent J. C. Clement, Power Plant Operator.

PENITENTIARY, PRINCE ALBERT, SASKATCHEWAN—VISITS BY MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Question No. 1,653—Mr. Howard (Skeena):

Since January 1, 1955, what is (a) the name of each Member of Parliament who visited the federal penitentiary at Prince Albert, Saskatchewan (b) the date and duration of each such visit?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Visits by Members of Parliament to Saskatchewan Penitentiary since January 1, 1955, as taken from the records of that Institution, are as follows:

(a)	(b)	(c)
Hon. E. D. Fulton, minister of justice	12 April 1959	one day
Hon. L. T. Pennell, solicitor general	25-26 March 1966	two days
Hon. G. J. McIlraith, Solicitor General	8 September 1969	one day
Mr. F. Howard (Skeena)	3-4 April 1970	two days
Mr. R. J. Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley)	3-4 April 1970	two days
Mr. J. L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw)	3-4 April 1970	two days

Inquiries of the Ministry

• (2:10 p.m.)

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

HOUSING

STEPS TO STIMULATE STARTS AND PROVIDE EMPLOYMENT

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. As the house construction industry is one of the major employers of labour in Canada and as housing starts today are 43 per cent below what they were one year ago, is the government planning to take steps in the immediate future to stimulate our housebuilding industry so that we may have not only the housing we so badly need but the employment which their construction will provide?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as to steps the government has taken, the Minister without Portfolio responsible for housing has mentioned them in the House from time to time; as to the steps the government may still take, he will make that announcement in due course.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, of course that answer tells the country absolutely nothing.

Mr. Trudeau: It was not meant to.

An hon. Member: It was not meant to!

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. I would ask the Prime Minister, since he appears not to give a hoot about unemployment or the unemployed—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot ask a question in those terms. He should ask his question.

Mr. McIlraith: Try again. See if you can grow up.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, since unemployment today is 21 per cent higher than it was last year, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he has considered following the very good example set by his colleague in Quebec, Mr. Bourassa, who has said that if he is elected and cannot reduce unemployment he intends to resign?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

PHASE-OUT OF No. 20 COLLIERY

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion with respect to the activities of the Cape Breton Development Corporation and particularly with respect to No. 20 Colliery which, since the number of miners has been greatly reduced from 1,000 to barely 300, is apparently being phased out. Is it the corporation's intention to phase out this mine or, since it is one of the best mines in operation, is it the intention to go back to full production?

[Mr. McIlraith.]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, we know that Devco was incorporated precisely to phase out gradually the unproductive coal mines and to keep the productive ones in operation.

Now as regards No. 20 Colliery, I can try to get information and obtain a report on the recent events to which the hon. member refers.

[English]

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since this is one of the most productive mines under the jurisdiction of the Cape Breton Development Corporation and since it provides a great deal of employment in Glace Bay, would the minister undertake to use his good offices to see that this operation is not phased out any further but, instead, that it is expanded?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I am willing to table later a report on the situation existing at No. 20 Colliery.

[English]

UNEMPLOYMENT INCREASE—IMPLEMENTATION OF REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION PROGRAMS

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a related question. Inasmuch as Treasury Board has approved new initiatives under the special areas legislation and since we have had indications in the last several days regarding the chronic unemployment situation, can the minister say whether any new activity is under way or whether any new initiatives are being taken to speed up the effect of the regional economic development programs in the various regions of Canada? I ask this question because the present pace of activity is so slow that there is relatively no positive effect on the unemployment situation.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe the question as asked invited a statement on motions. The minister has given an answer. Perhaps it might facilitate the situation if the hon. member were allowed a supplementary.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, the country is going to read with interest the elaborate statement of the minister on the unemployment crisis. I wish to direct my supplementary question to the Prime Minister. I am very concerned about this serious problem. I am sure most members of the House share this concern. Is the Prime Minister going to make a statement on motions, as intimated in reply to a recent question by another hon. member, indicating any new initiatives planned by the government before he goes on his scuba diving expedition in the next few weeks?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I asked the Prime Minister if he was going to make a statement on motions.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member had asked only that I would have allowed the question, but he asked the question in terms that cannot be allowed. The right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may have an opportunity later. For the moment the Chair has recognized the right hon. member.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

UKRAINIAN SOCIALIST REPUBLIC—EXCHANGE OF CONSULAR REPRESENTATIVES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Having regard to the fact that the government has made two recent appointments of consular representatives, is the government considering asking the Ukrainian Socialist Republic to exchange consuls-general so that the Ukrainian people in Canada, many of whom want to visit the old land, and many people living in the Ukraine who want to come to Canada to visit their people, will be in a position where their applications will be processed more expeditiously than they are now?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the right hon. gentleman knows we are trying, I hope with the help of the opposition, to keep government expenditures under control. It is not my purpose at the present time to extend our diplomatic representation in that way.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I know the Ukrainian people across Canada will not be delighted with the minister's answer, but with that very laudable objective in mind, will the minister say why the government entered into an agreement to pay $190,000 at the rate of $200 a day to chartered accountants to answer objections to the white paper on tax reform?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

SHIPPING

SINKING OF "PATRICK MORRIS"—CONDUCTING OF INQUIRY

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I wish to direct my question to the Acting Minister of Transport or the Prime Minister. Is the government in a position to make a statement regarding the tragic sinking in the Gulf of St. Lawrence last night of the Patrick Morris? To this time have all the members of the crew of the Patrick Morris been accounted for?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have a report from the Minister of Transport on this tragic occurrence. I am told that of the people aboard the Patrick Morris there are 47 survivors accounted for at this time. Four of the crew are still missing. We have no further information.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): A supplementary question. In view of the fact that this tragedy has occurred and that there is some lack of clarity as to the causes of the disaster, can the right hon. gentleman indicate whether an inquiry is being conducted into the underlying causes of the tragedy and whether a report will be received?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am informed by the minister that departmental officials are on the way now to make a preliminary investigation.

AUDITOR GENERAL

FUNCTIONS AND JURISDICTION—APPEARANCE OF MINISTERS BEFORE PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he or any of his ministers would be prepared to accept an invitation from the Public Accounts Committee to appear before that committee in relation to the role, the functions and the jurisdiction of the Auditor General, with meetings to commence on May 5?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): If the chairman of that committee, who I understand is not the hon. member for Vancouver East, were to invite the ministers to attend I am sure they would agree.

Mr. Winch: I understood the Prime Minister to say he would agree; I understood he also said that those members of his cabinet who have expressed opinions relative to the functions and work of the Auditor General would appear?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member appears to be repeating the question he asked in the first instance.

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

FOURTH REPORT OF COMMISSION—ASSISTANCE IN INCREASING CULTURAL ACTIVITIES OF OTHER ETHNIC GROUPS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a question for the Secretary of State, Mr. Speaker. If I may be permitted, I would refer to the question I addressed last Thursday to the Minister without Portfolio with regard to involvement of the federal government in the cultural activities of Canadians other than those of French or English origin. It may have been that my question was misunderstood I was thinking of cultural rather than linguistic rights. Would the minister institute a departmental inquiry into this issue and into the pertinent statistics gathered by the B and B Commission in its latest report which refers to the great contribution made by these Canadians, including the native peoples of Canada, with a view to deciding whether there cannot be greater participation by the federal government in increasing such cultural activities of these Canadian people?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the study undertaken by the government on Book IV of the Commission's report will certainly include the subject mentioned by the hon. member. But the study has not yet been completed and I cannot say exactly what policy the government will adopt in this respect.

[English]

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

SASKATCHEWAN—SPEEDING UP OF ALLOCATION OF INCENTIVE GRANTS TO OFFSET MIGRATION OF WORKERS

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. It is related to one asked a few moments ago by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate. In light of the fact that the January-February review of the Department of Manpower and Immigration indicates there is concrete evidence of a substantial migration out of Saskatchewan of some 7,000 of the labour force in January, will the minister press Treasury Board to speed up its allocation of regional development incentive grants in order to offset this serious loss of human resources to the Saskatchewan economy?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, we have just designated the cities of Regina and Saskatoon as "special areas" and we hope this will have good results in Saskatchewan.

[English]

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Would the minister care to comment on whether or not he thinks a change from a Liberal government to an NDP government might help the situation in Saskatchewan?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

SAINT-HYACINTE—ESTABLISHMENT AS DESIGNATED AREA

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Could the minister tell the House whether he has considered the representations that were made regarding the city of Saint-Hyacinthe and the surrounding area?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I met with a large delegation from Saint-Hyacinthe this morning and we studied the problem of this city which is facing considerable difficulties.

[English]

FURTHER INITIATIVES TO SUPPLEMENT DEPARTMENTAL ACTIVITIES

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government intends to announce any new initiatives at the federal level in order to supplement the activities of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and whether he plans to make a statement on motions outlining such initiatives?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As far as the activities of the department are concerned, the minister informs me that the agreement has not yet been signed, and it will have to be signed before the activities bear their fruit. On the general question of unemployment, I do not see that it would be very useful to make a statement on this subject during the next few weeks. I have already explained several times that unemployment would be substantially more serious in Canada if Canada were not waging such a fight against employment—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: —against inflation. But I have ceased to try to convince the opposition of this.

Mr. Lundrigan: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the right hon. gentleman consider relaxing government restrictions that have been placed on the spending of the Department of Public Works in view of the fact that not only is unemployment increasing but there is an increasing lack of activity in an area where a relaxation of restrictions is vital for the east coast fishing industry?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that the question asked by the hon. member was asked last week in precisely the same terms on Thursday or Friday, I believe.

NEWFOUNDLAND AND NEW BRUNSWICK—SIGNING OF SPECIAL AREA AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): A supplementary question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Now that Treasury Board has approved the two special areas programs for Newfoundland and New Brunswick—presumably the ones just referred to by the Prime Minister—would the minister tell the House when the agreements will be signed with the two provinces concerned which are obviously very anxious to get the programs under way?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, there should now be no further delay. It has all been approved, but there must at least be time to draft the final agreements and forward them to the provincial authorities for signature.

[English]

MANITOBA CENTENNIAL

REQUEST THAT JULY 15 BE HOLIDAY FOR WORKERS COMING UNDER FEDERAL JURISDICTION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. May I welcome him back, and I am sure that my question is one that he will welcome. In view of the fact that the government of Manitoba is making arrangements for July 15, which is the 100th anniversary of Manitoba's entry into confederation, to be a holiday with pay for all workers who come under provincial labour jurisdiction, will the federal government consider the provincial government's request that similar arrangements be made for workers in Manitoba who come under federal labour jurisdiction?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the suggestion is a very progressive one and certainly a very fitting way to celebrate Manitoba's entry into confederation. Moreover, I hope private industry will listen as carefully as I was.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (St. Boniface): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I was hoping that the question would apply to all civil servants, not only those in Manitoba. As 1970 is Manitoba's centennial year, this is the type of celebration that we would request the minister to consider.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Inquiries of the Ministry

VETERANS AFFAIRS

RELATION OF PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES TO SOCIAL WELFARE PROGRAMS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Minister of Veterans Affairs has indicated that the government has under review rates of pensions and war veterans allowances as part of its examination of the over-all fabric of social development programs, has the government now decided that war veterans pensions and allowances shall be part of social welfare?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it really depends on how you are discussing the definition of social welfare. We do not feel that they are welfare payments proper, but they are part of that whole area of social policy that the government is now reviewing, and I am sure the minister was alluding to that.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND PROVINCIAL ELECTION—RESIGNATION OF CERTAIN FEDERAL RETURNING OFFICERS

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Would the minister ascertain from the Chief Electoral Officer whether resignations have been received from the returning officers for Egmont and Cardigan constituencies in Prince Edward Island, considering that both these gentlemen have for some time been Liberal candidates in the forthcoming provincial election?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I will gladly obtain the information the hon. member wants and pass it on to him.

[English]

HEALTH AND WELFARE

LEGISLATION TO CONTROL CERTAIN PROMOTIONAL CAMPAIGNS BY CIGARETTE COMPANIES

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It has to do with the very much stepped-up coupon give-away campaigns being conducted across Canada by the cigarette companies in the face of the recommendations made by the health and welfare committee of this House. Can the minister indicate that we may expect cigarette advertising control legislation to be introduced prior to the summer recess?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the department and I have given a lot of consideration to the recommendations of the parliamentary committee and I expect to make recommendations to my colleagues on this matter very shortly.

POLLUTION

COMPENSATION TO LAKE ERIE FISHERMEN FOR MERCURY CONTAMINATION OF FISH

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. In view of the compensation that has now been made available to Lake St. Clair fishermen, and in view of the fact that Lake Erie fishermen have also suffered considerable loss through the freeze on sales and loss of fishing time, what steps is the department considering to compensate the Lake Erie fishermen?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, this matter has been under active consideration with the provincial authorities, particularly the Ontario Department of Lands and Forests, concerning fishermen on Lake Erie as well.

COMPENSATION TO LAKE WINNIPEG FISHERMEN FOR MERCURY CONTAMINATION OF FISH

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Fisheries whether consideration has been given to compensating Manitoba fishermen, particularly those of Lake Winnipeg who have suffered losses because of mercury poisoning found in fish in that lake?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I expect to be meeting next Monday with the hon. Mr. Green in Winnipeg to discuss this matter.

YARMOUTH, N.S.—MEASURES TO PROVIDE EMPLOYMENT FOR DISPLACED TEXTILE PLANT WORKERS

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

I should like to ask him whether or not he is aware of the impact the closing down of the Dunlop company in Toronto will have on the textile industry in Yarmouth and also what steps are to be taken by his department to curb unemployment in Yarmouth which is a designated area.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, as far as the Dunlop company is concerned, it falls under the jurisdiction of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and not under the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

Mr. Comeau: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a supplementary question.

I should like simply to ask the minister, since there will be unemployment in Yarmouth, whether he is studying the problem in order to reduce to a minimum the number of employees who will be laid off.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): It is the constant concern of the officials of my department, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

REFUSAL OF BENEFITS TO MEMBERS OF B.C. BUILDING TRADE UNIONS

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare which arises from a situation in British Columbia where the locked-out members of seven building trade unions have been refused welfare payments, contrary to the terms of the Canada Assistance Plan. In view of the television refusal of welfare minister Gaglardi to comply with the federal minister's request that the terms of the plan be met, can the minister say what action he plans to take to enforce the terms of the legislation?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I indicated the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan to the minister to whom the hon. member has referred, and also that any such obstacle placed in the path of recipients in terms of receiving benefits would be contrary to the plan. All I can say is that if we have specific instances where recipients are denied benefits contrary to the plan we will have no choice but to take appropriate action in terms of reducing the moneys payable to that province under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In view of the fact the provincial government got its own way, which was not in accord with the terms of the plan, in connection with the people involved in the longshoremen's strike, is there any guarantee that things will be different this time?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether the supplementary is in order. I would not think that the question, in the terms it was asked, would be acceptable.

LABOUR RELATIONS

QUEBEC—REPORT ON STRUCTURE AND POWERS OF UNION MOVEMENT

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the Minister of Labour.

Could he say what are the terms of reference of the experts conducting a study and preparing a report on the structure and authority of the union movement in the province of Quebec, particularly on the CNTU?

[English]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would have to take that question as notice and review the terms of reference in order that I may be accurate.

Mr. Ricard: At the same time, would the minister be kind enough when he gives the answer to tell us whether the report dealing especially with the CNTU is to be confidential or made public?

[Translation]

Mr. Mackasey: With pleasure, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

FILM SHOWN ON PROGRAM, "THE NATION'S BUSINESS"

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Was the film shown last night on the CBC program, "The Nation's Business", sponsored and paid for entirely by the Liberal party?

An hon. Member: It was a pretty good one, wasn't it?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is difficult to know the circumstances of the situation to which the hon. member refers. I should think that if the question is in order it should be placed on the Order Paper, and I would have some reservations about that too.

[Later:]

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question related to one asked a few moments ago by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre, and I direct it to the Prime Minister. Were any public funds involved in the production of the film shown on "The Nation's Business" last night and supposedly sponsored by the Liberal party?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has reiterated the question asked by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre. My suggestion was that due to the fact that it related to certain circumstances it might be placed on the Order Paper and if there was urgency it could be considered at the time of adjournment.

Mr. MacInnis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the difference between the questions asked is that I related my question to a program supposedly sponsored by the Liberal party and the use of public funds. I think the Prime Minister should be in a position to answer whether or not this is so.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will recognize it has been suggested that if there is urgency in respect of the hon. member's question or the question of the hon. member for Edmonton Centre the matter might be considered at the time of adjournment.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED RECOGNITION OF COMMUNIST CHINA

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has he any additional information for the House on the negotiations in respect of the recognition by Canada of the Peking government and when are those negotiations likely to be concluded?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing fresh to add to the information I have already given the House. Our negotiations continue. I cannot say when they will be successfully concluded. I hope they will be but, as I have said on many occasions, in dealing with the Chinese one must be very patient.

[Mr. Paprowski.]

Mr. Baldwin: And the same in dealing with the Canadian government; you have to be patient.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO WHITE PAPER

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. Can he inform the House when the proposed white paper on the Unemployment Insurance Commission will be forthcoming?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): I cannot say specifically, Mr. Speaker. It depends on a lot of factors. It depends on the workload of the House, the workload of the government and the workload of the departmental committees. We indicated in the Throne Speech there would be such a paper and I hope it will be forthcoming.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, can the minister inform the House whether it is currently being held up because of objections by the Department of Manpower?

Mr. Mackasey: The answer to that is no.

DENIAL OF BENEFITS TO CERTAIN EMPLOYEES IN B.C. INDUSTRIES INVOLVED IN DISPUTES

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): I have a question for the Minister of Labour which is similar to the question directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. It relates to those people not directly involved in labour disputes in Vancouver such as harbours board employees and building trades and Pacific Press employees specifically who have been denied unemployment insurance on the ground that there is a labour dispute and are not able to get social welfare because they are not regarded as unemployed. What does the minister plan to do now about this particular situation?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the policy of the Unemployment Insurance Commission in respect of strikes has been very clear and consistent throughout the years. Even though a person may not belong to a union, but want to take advantage of a legal strike, he is not entitled to unemployment insurance because he becomes eventual beneficiary of the union's negotiations.

Mr. Rose: I have a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The problem seems to centre around the fact that they are not—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Broadview.

LABOUR RELATIONS

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION AMENDING INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS AND DISPUTES INVESTIGATION ACT

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. In view of the major lay-offs occurring in industry across Canada, when does the minister intend to bring forth legislation in accordance with the Freedman report?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): There is no legislation based exclusively on the Freedman report, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. gentleman is referring to the major overhaul of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, which may include recommendations on the Freedman report, we are still waiting for a few briefs from interested parties, including labour, which should be on my desk in the next few weeks. That is the last major hurdle.

GIVING OF NOTICE BEFORE MASS LAY-OFFS

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, would the minister say whether the government is contemplating legislation dealing with a requirement in respect of federal industries for some period of notice before mass lay-offs take place?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I think this would be highly desirable and in keeping with the twentieth century.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

PROVISION OF PROTECTION FOR PEACEFUL ASSEMBLIES

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister which involves the policy of the government or successive governments toward the right of peaceful assembly. In view of the fact that a widely representative, peaceful and legal assembly on Parliament Hill last Saturday had to organize an army within its own members to assure peace, may those who wish to demonstrate get a permit to assemble with the expectation that they will receive some protection by the RCMP from radical groups?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am afraid I cannot answer this question offhand. The hon. member is asking a very difficult and important policy question. I can say that the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General are now engaged in an attempt to formulate for the government our policy on the whole question of maintaining the law in the country.

PUBLIC WORKS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—ANNOUNCEMENT OF CONSTRUCTION PLANS

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Public Works. As we both come from the same city I know he will understand the purport of my question. Announcements have been made and contracts let relevant to federal public works construction in many provinces, particularly Quebec and Ontario, but not with regard to British Columbia. May I ask the minister when announcements will be made in respect of federal construction plans in British Columbia in general and Vancouver in particular?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is referring to an announcement I made that it was our intention to build a new federal building in the city of Vancouver. A survey is under way now and I would expect a decision to be made concerning the location and an indication of its size in a matter of three or four months.

POLLUTION

DUMPING OF RAW SEWAGE IN RED RIVER BY TOWN OF SELKIRK

Mr. E. B. Osler (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which is supplementary to a statement made earlier by the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. In view of the fact that Manitoba, through the Manitoba Environmental Commission, on March 12 gave the town of Selkirk permission to continue to dump raw sewage into the Red River for several years, would he take up this matter of permission at its source when discussing another matter with the provincial Minister of Mines and Natural Resources?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: It must be assumed that the question will be taken into account by the minister.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ACTION ON WELFARE COUNCIL REPORT ON YOUTH

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. Can he inform the House what action his department is taking in respect of the recent Canadian Welfare Council report on transient youth?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I will take that question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE

INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS RESPECTING FALSE ARREST AND VAGRANCY

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. Is it his intention to bring forward legislation at this session to amend the Criminal Code with respect to such matters as false arrest and vagrancy?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I intend very shortly to bring before the House a bail reform bill relating to bail, arrest and summons.

TAXATION

WHITE PAPER ON REFORM—RETURN OF MINISTER OF FINANCE TO HOUSE

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, this question is for the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister inform the House when the Minister of Finance will be back in his place in the House so that we can start in again on the white paper?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe he is due in the House tomorrow. I will check.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he anticipates a decrease in the $190,000 expenditure when the Minister of Finance returns?

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

SLAVE LAKE DEVELOPMENT PROPOSAL—NEGOTIATIONS WITH PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Could the minister inform the House when his department plans to conclude its negotiations with the provincial government concerning the Slave Lake development proposal?

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure just how urgent this matter is. The hon. member has asked a question and perhaps the minister might be allowed to reply.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I cannot mention a specific date yet, but I hope that it will be in a few weeks.

[English]

SHIPPING

REPORT ON SAFETY AND MANNING CONDITIONS ON WEST COAST TOWBOATS

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour when the Elestrom study—the labour department's study on safety and manning provisions for the west coast towboat industry—will be available to the general public?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Perhaps never, Mr. Speaker. It was not intended that it be made available to the general public. It was intended to reveal to the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Transport and senior civil servants conditions on the waterfront in the tugboat industry in British Columbia. I am considering releasing the report to the unions and to management as well as senior officials on the coast in order that they may work together as a team to clean up what is an unenviable situation.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TRANSFER OF NERVE GAS FROM OKINAWA TO UNITED STATES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Last week I asked him some questions regarding the transfer of nerve gas from Okinawa to the United States via the Strait of Juan de Fuca. At that time the minister said, I believe outside the House, that his department was making representations to the government of the United States concerning the possibility of their finding another route rather than going through the Strait of Juan de Fuca. I should like to ask the minister, first, whether he has received any reply to the representations and what it is and, second, whether he has received any information yet concerning the date when this transfer will take place?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thought I had said in the House that we made oral representations to the United States about the shipment of nerve gas and also written representations. We have not received any written reply. Of course, in response to the representations we made, we have received a good deal of information about the precautions being taken. I have also raised with the United States the question of whether or not they would agree to some of this information being made available to the public in Canada as well as in the United States. We have not received any response to the representation that it might be possible to move the gas by some other route farther distant from Canada or that it should not be moved at all.

GREECE—CRITICISM BY COUNCIL OF EUROPE —CANADIAN ACTION

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On Wednesday last I asked the minister whether the Canadian government planned to join with the Council of Europe in its criticism of the practice of the government of Greece in taking away civil liberties from its citizens. At that time I received the reply that he did not have a copy of the report upon which that decision was made. My question today is, does the government of Canada now have that report and has it decided to act upon it?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think even before I was asked the question in the House I had cabled our representative in Europe to try to obtain a copy of the report. We have not yet received a copy but we will be studying it and may have something to say about it after we have studied its contents.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, does the government intend to follow the example of the Prime Minister of Denmark who has recently suggested to the United States that it cease sending arms to Greece?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, our shipments of arms to Greece are very minimal and would not in any way contribute to the ability of the Greek government to put down any internal insurrection.

Inquiries of the Ministry

URBAN AFFAIRS

INVOLVEMENT OF HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the terms of the brief presented today to the government by the Association of Mayors and Municipalities of Canada, has the government reviewed its policy in respect of involvement of Parliament and the House of Commons and changed its policy of some months ago when the government rejected a proposal by this party that it should be a duty of the House of Commons to look at this issue?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The question was not raised, Mr. Speaker.

FISHERIES

ACTION REGARDING INDISCRIMINATE USE OF HERRING SEINERS

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. It is a very urgent matter. Can the minister say whether his department is planning any action on the basis of complaints of indiscriminate use of herring seiners on the east coast of Canada resulting in the almost total destruction of herring resources, similar to what happened on the west coast of Canada?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): The answer is yes, Mr. Speaker.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

DENIAL OF BENEFITS TO CERTAIN EMPLOYEES IN B.C. INDUSTRIES INVOLVED IN DISPUTE

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour a question supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West. The minister mentioned the regulations under the Unemployment Insurance Act with regard to men on strike. I want to ask the minister about those men who are not on strike but who are out of work because of a strike and the evident injustice to them of being penalized when they are not responsible for the strike and do not necessarily benefit from the strike. Is he prepared to change the regulations to make it abundantly clear that persons of this type are entitled to unemployment insurance?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): I thank the hon. member for the question.

Where it can be proven that a worker is without work as a result of a strike in which he is not participating and from which he will derive no direct benefit, that person is entitled to unemployment insurance. It is only in the case where a person is out of work who may not be a member of the union but will benefit from the collective agreement that is eventually signed that we ask him to share the responsibility of the union members on strike and not draw unemployment insurance. But if he does not benefit from the strike then he does have unemployment insurance benefits.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Then may I ask if the minister would look into the very large number of cases now before the Unemployment Insurance Commission, particularly with respect to those longshoremen on the spare board who are not members of the union and whose benefits are not retroactive to September 1, and who have been denied unemployment insurance benefits and have no assistance whatever?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member knows as well as I do that although they may not be entitled to retroactive pay, their pay per hour is increased as a result of the settlement of the unions.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FISHERIES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING "CLOSE TIME", DEPOSITING OF WASTE, MARINE PLANTS, ETC.

On the order:

Second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry of Bill C-204, an act to amend the Fisheries Act—Mr. Davis.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, before the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) moves second reading of this bill, I wish to raise a point of order. I contend that Bill C-204, an act to amend the Fisheries Act, offends against Standing Order 69 which provides:

No bill may be introduced either in blank or in an imperfect shape.

This bill incorporates, by reference, certain provisions of two statutes which do not exist, namely, the Canada Water Act and the Northern Inland Waters Act. The references to the Canada Water Act are to be found on page 2, lines 4 to 14; page 4, lines 39 to 42, and page 11, lines 4 to 14. The reference to the Northern Inland Waters Act is on page 2, lines 15 to 23.

These references apply to the most substantive provisions of this bill, that is, the provision creating the offence of depositing waste in the sea near our coast and inland waters, set out in clause 3, page 1, and the definition of waste itself which is also set out in clause 3, but on page 4. Neither of these provisions can be understood, nor can the principle embodied in them be considered and debated by this House without knowing the restrictions and qualifications contained in these non-existent statutes.

Presumably these references relate to Bill C-144 and Bill C-187, both of which are now before standing committees of this House for clause by clause consideration. We cannot be asked to assume that these bills will come out of committee unamended or pass through the necessary further proceedings in this House and in the other place unamended. We cannot even assume that the similar provisions in this bill and the other two bills will come out in the same legislative form. They will be dealt with by three different committees; the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works, the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry. Until these other two bills are in perfect shape as statutes, this bill must be considered to be in imperfect shape.

Properly, this bill should be ruled out of order. However, with the consent of the House the better course would be to permit it to remain on the Order Paper until the other bills, incorporated by reference in this bill, are enacted. It should be noted that clause 9 of this bill, page 11, admits the validity of this point of order. That clause acknowledges that this bill, in its present imperfect shape, would not be enforceable, as to the clauses in question, in the courts until the Canada Water Act comes into force.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): On the question of order, Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has pointed out it is not the intention of the government that this bill should become operative until the Canada Water Act has become law. The hon. member is incorrect in saying that this bill is imperfect in any form. It is perfect in itself, that is to say, from the standpoint that he used the phrase. It provides for certain amendments to the Fisheries Act which are consequential upon changes being made in the Canada Water Act.

From the standpoint of the presentation of the various bills dealing with the question of pollution, if of course any amendments are made by the committee, and subsequently concurred in by the House, with respect to the Canada Water Act or indeed with respect to the other bills which have precedence in order of time over this particular bill, then of course the House will be in a position to make any consequential amendments that might be necessary in this particular case.

I would not think an assumption can be made about what the committee might or might not do with regard to any other legislation. Really each bill should stand on its own feet, only subject to the provision in clause 9 in this case, which relates to the day when it comes into force. On that basis, I would suggest that there is no substance to the point of order.

• (3:00 p.m.)

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I find an initial difficulty in following the argument of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald).

Mr. Baldwin: What else is new?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): As my colleague says, that is not anything new. I submit that this House must not be asked to legislate a nullity, in other words, perform a hypothetical exercise. The two bills referred to on page 2 of this bill are somewhere else. There is no guarantee that these bills will ever be passed. Therefore, this whole bill would be inoperative in the event that the other two bills should not be proceeded with or, for some reason or other, should not receive Royal Assent. For that reason, I would find that there is some very grave difficulty in asking the House to pass clause 3, which is the one dealing with the Canada Water Act and the Northern Inland Waters Act. If we pass that, we are passing a meaningless clause. Therefore, if the bill is meaningless, in part, why ask this House to perform this exercise? For that reason, I would say that the bill in its present form is imperfect.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, the arguments have been well and eloquently put forward by my colleagues. I only seek to cap them by saying it is but a very brief step from this to accepting the principle that the government can move second reading of a bill containing provisions which are based on another bill which has not even been introduced into the House. I call to Your Honour's attention our faithful friend and companion for many cold winters over the last seven years, the Canada Development Corporation. It may well be that, in a bill to be presented to this House, the government may provide that the financing of the particular measure will be founded on the successful passage of the Canada Development Corporation bill, which may never see the light of day.

In the present bill there are certain clauses which are related to another bill in such a way that the legality, the effectiveness and the implementation of this bill must rest upon the foundation of the passage of the other bill. If that is the case, we have to take just one more step until we say, "Right, we will pass a bill now, the effectiveness of which is founded upon and related to another bill which is not yet introduced into the House."

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I find the point of order that has been raised a very interesting one. If Your Honour is considering this question of order, I wonder if I might draw Your Honour's attention to page 3 of the bill which has to do with prevention of the pollution of the Arctic waters, Bill C-202, where there is a similar situation, which was not raised at the time of its introduction for second reading. This clause reads in part:

—without limiting the generality of the foregoing—

That is the defining of waste.

—includes anything that, for the purposes of the Canada Water Act, is deemed to be waste.

I would suggest to Your Honour that any consideration of this question brings under review not only the bill before us, but also Bill C-202.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse), with the support of some of his colleagues, has suggested that the bill now before the House is imperfect in its form because its enactment in perfect form is dependent on the adoption of two other bills which are, at one stage or another, currently before the House, to wit, the Canada Water Act and the Northern Inland Waters Act.

The point made by the hon. member for South Shore and other hon. members to the left of the Chair who have taken part in this debate is an interesting one and the argument is not without merit. If it has a fault, it is that it might be premature. In my view, I think I have to assume that if the bill receives second reading and is referred to committee, it would then be considered by a committee of the House along with the other two bills and it would be at the third reading stage that the argument could be presented with much more force and at that point should be considered very seriously.

I have every possible sympathy with the view expressed by the hon. member for South Shore and the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). As the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) has pointed out, the adoption of this kind of procedure might lead us to rather extreme situations. Because of this I would suggest that the argument, if circumstances are such that the bill is still dependent at that stage on the adoption of other bills in statute form, might be brought up again and it would be considered by the Chair.

Generally speaking, my conclusion would be that the interesting point is perhaps premature. I would suggest that the House proceed with the consideration of the bill and if on third reading we are still in the position where we are being asked to adopt a bill which is dependent on the adoption of other bills, the terms of which are still uncertain, then the matter might be considered by the Chair.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry) moved that Bill C-204, to amend the Fisheries Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

He said: Mr. Speaker, today hon. members are being asked to consider several important changes in the Fisheries Act. These changes will strengthen the act. They will clarify it and they will put more teeth in it.

With these amendments, the Fisheries Act will become a better act and a more effective act. It will provide a greater measure of protection for our aquatic environment and it will enable Canadians to generate higher incomes from our commercial fishery, and our sports fishery in this country.

As most hon. members know, the Fisheries Act is a federal act. It is an act which is as old as confederation itself. Our Fisheries Act was passed during Canada's first session of Parliament. It was passed more than 100 years ago. The Fisheries Act has, of course, been revised and updated with the passage of time.

[Mr. Speaker.]

It has changed in some ways but it is still national in character. It is still nationwide in its application. It applies, as our Canadian constitution says, to our "seacoast and inland fisheries". It applies from sea to sea—from the Atlantic to the Pacific. It also applies from our international boundary line in the south to the Arctic ocean in the north.

Perhaps I could put it another way. Fisheries are entirely a federal responsibility. Parliament, alone, makes the laws with regard to fish in salt water and fish in fresh water. The Fisheries Act, therefore, applies to Canadian waters everywhere. The only limitation is whether the water in question now supports fish life or has done so in the past. Parliament, under our constitution, passes all of the laws dealing with fisheries as a resource. Ottawa also writes all of the regulations drawn up under the Fisheries Act. It writes the regulations even when the administration of the act has been delegated to one of the provinces.

Let me give you an example. The administration of our federal Fisheries Act was delegated to Alberta in the 1930's. Alberta, in other words, administers the Fisheries Act in all of the waters of that province. But when Alberta wants to change any of the regulations under the act it must get our approval. It must ask Ottawa to approve every change in the rules in so far as they apply to the fresh water fishery there.

The situation in the four Atlantic provinces, British Columbia, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories is relatively straightforward. There, Ottawa not only makes the law and draws up its own regulations but also administers the fishery as well. We are legislators and administrators in salt water. But, inland, the situation varies from place to place.

Throughout the prairies and in Ontario and Quebec, the administration of the Fisheries Act is delegated to one or more provincial departments. They administer the act in so far as opening and closing dates, catch limits and other conservation measures are concerned. Still, they rely on our Fisheries Department. They rely on us for fisheries research, fisheries development programs, fish inspection and fish marketing services. Obviously our department is active everywhere in Canada. It is active throughout Canada, even though the administration of the Fisheries Act itself may be delegated to some province and not to others.

Both levels of government look on the Fisheries Act as a useful tool. It is useful, primarily, as an act to protect our living resources in water. But it can also be used as a device to protect the fishery and our own Canadian fishermen. It governs our own fishermen wherever they go on the high seas. It follows Canadian fishing vessels. And it is used to protect our aquatic environment, not only in our largest coastal bays but in our smallest mountain streams as well.

Our own administrative arm has lots of muscle. We have fisheries officers located on both our coasts, in the Arctic and along our salmon rivers. Their main responsibility is to protect the fishery there. It is to conserve fish stocks by looking after spawning grounds, preventing the destruction of streams by bad logging practices, keeping an eye open for toxic sprays and checking on the discharge of industrial wastes.

Some hon. members will be surprised to know that we have dozens of prosecutions under the Fisheries Act. They will also be surprised to learn that we have a thousand officers in our conservation and protection service. These men are well trained. Each is a conservationist in his own right. Each is familiar with his own particular area. Each knows its commercial and recreational possibility. Each officer also knows who to contact when things go wrong as well as how to anticipate problems and head them off before they happen.

I would be remiss, Mr. Speaker, if I failed to mention the close working relationship which these officers have with their provincial counterparts. They co-operate closely with the local fish and wildlife people. They also consult with the local foresters and, together, they take a multi-purpose approach to the management of our renewable resources there.

Please notice that I have been using the word "fish" as if fish were the only form of aquatic life. But the term fish, by definition in the Fisheries Act, also includes marine mammals like seals. It includes shellfish like oysters. It includes crustacae like shrimp. It includes minute organisms like zooplankton.

In order to complete the chain, we must also include plant life. We must also include plant life, specifically, under the Fisheries Act. We must include aquatic plants because they are very important in the natural scheme of things. Marine plants are often food for fish. However, in excessive quantitites they can also be harmful to fish. In the right amounts they can be harvested commercially. Millions of dollars worth of marine plants are already cropped annually in this country. This is another reason they should be referred to, specifically, in the Fisheries Act.

Incidentally the inclusion of marine plants will bring the Fisheries Act into line with our Fisheries Research Board Act, our Fisheries Development Act and our Fish Inspection Act. All of these important pieces of legislation recognize the ecological reality—the reality that fish life and marine vegetation are interrelated. They are part of our wider marine ecology and should be treated as such in our legislation.

Again, there is a need to control harvesting of seaweeds in the interests of orderly growth in that industry. Because the jurisdiction over the resources of the sea bottom is federal, federal legislation is needed as a basis for management. In this field of marine plants we, of course, will have to work closely with the provinces. Working closely with certain provincial government departments on both coasts we see a great new seaweed industry ahead. It is an industry which is already generating products ranging from cosmetics to clothing on the one hand, and from chocolate milk to beer on the other.

Before leaving this subject of marine plants, I would like to say a few words about algae. Algae are also marine plants. They are also living organisms. They are forms of vegetation living in waters which can be enriched in various ways. Indeed, enrichment is often the key to the proliferation of algae everywhere.

Our current problem in Lake Erie, for example, is one of over-fertilization or over enrichment. Over-fertilization or over enrichment produces algae in tremendous quantities. Mark you, algae is not always a bad thing. It may be harmful to some kinds of fish and helpful to others. In large quantities, it is generally destructive to high energy fish like trout and helpful to plant eating species like perch and carp. Incidentally, the perch industry has been flourishing in recent years in Lake Erie and the dollar value of the catch has been mounting quite steadily. I might say parenthetically also that a problem in the Far East in respect of carp stems from a lack of fertilization in the water. The lack of enrichment means a lack of algae and a lack of food for the carp. Obviously, much depends on the particular balance that a society wants to create as between algae and vegetation in water and fish life.

All this proves is that the fortunes of our fish and our marine plants, including algae, are interrelated. They are interrelated in the natural scheme of things. This is a very good reason why they should also be related, closely, under our national Fisheries Act.

Hon. members will doubtless be interested in our marine plant research program. Most of this work is carried out by biologists with our Fisheries Research Board. The Board has its main environmental laboratories in Nanaimo on the West Coast; in Winnipeg, Manitoba; Burlington, Ontario and St. Andrews and Dartmouth on the East Coast. There, our scientists are studying the effects of various pollutants on algae both in fresh water and in the sea.

This brings me directly to the subject of pollution. Anything that harms fish or stimulates the growth of algae may be harmful to man himself. Marine life, indeed, is often more sensitive to pollutants than mankind is. It follows that the living resources in water are our first line of defence. Healthy fish mean a healthy environment and a healthy fishery is undoubtedly the best insurance policy we can buy in our battle against pollution in water.

The idea of preventing pollution in fisheries waters is, of course, as old as the Fisheries Act itself. The act has always contained clauses dealing with this subject. Indeed, a clause along those lines actually appeared in the Upper Canada Statute of 1860. Here is how the Fisheries Act has read for decades and still reads in so far as the discharging of waste into fisheries water is concerned. The act reads in part:

> No person shall cause or knowingly permit to pass into, or put or knowingly permit to be put, lime, chemical substances or drugs, poisonous matter, dead or decaying fish, or remnants thereof, mill rubbish or sawdust or any other deleterious substance or thing, whether the same is of a like character to the substances named in this section or not, in any water frequented by fish, or that flows into such water, nor on ice over either such waters.

The present act goes on to say:

> The Governor in Council may by order, deem any substance—

I repeat, any substance.

> —to be a deleterious substance for the purpose of this section (of the Act).

We have these formidable powers now. We have these powers without amending the Fisheries Act. We have them without the bill today. However, they are not specific enough. They are difficult to administer fairly. They don't deal with "wastes" in quantitative terms. By quantitative terms, I mean concentrations. Nor do they relate, directly, to other pieces of federal legislation such as our new Canada Water Act or the Northern Inland Waters bill.

[Mr. Davis.]

The old definition, in other words, is not good enough. It needs to be updated. We need modern wording and we need phraseology which is consistent with that used in other federal acts. Besides, we need to place the emphasis on prevention rather than cure. We should use terms which look ahead, which are designed to prevent pollution before it occurs and which place the emphasis on upgrading our waters rather than simply punishing the offender after the damage is done.

We can achieve these objectives by defining "wastes" in the right way. We are attempting to do this in the present bill by using the same definition of "waste" as appears in the Canada Water Act. "Waste", according to the Canada Water bill definition and according to the Northern Inland Waters bill definition as well as according to the amendments proposed for the Fisheries Act, therefore means this. I quote from the bill:

> —any substance that, if added to any waters, would degrade or alter or form part of a process of degradation or alteration of the quality of those waters to an extent that is detrimental to their use by man or by any animal, fish or plant that is useful to man, and
> —any water that contains a substance in such a quantity or concentration, or that has been so treated, processed or changed, by heat or other means, from a natural state that it would, if added to any waters, degrade or alter or form part of a process of degradation or alteration of the quality of those waters—

This, then, is the definition of waste. It will be the same under the Fisheries Act as it will be under the Canada Water Act. The two pieces of legislation will be on all fours. What is deemed to be waste under the Canada Water Act will be waste under the Fisheries Act and vice versa.

Of course, we will be able to write detailed regulations. We will be able to identify substances and name concentrations which are permissible in water. Any amount of a waste substance which is in excess of those concentrations or which would kill juvenile salmon, for example, is out. It will be deemed to be waste. It will be deemed to be pollution under the Fisheries Act as well as the Canada Water Act.

Of course, if a pollutant is discharged into Canada's fisheries waters the offending party may be prosecuted. If we are dealing with an industry, it may be prosecuted without warning. Up until the present time, the maximum fine has been $1,000 under the Fisheries Act. The passage of this bill will increase the fine to $5,000. It could be $5,000 a day if the pollution continues after a warning has been given to the plant owners by our departmental officials. Hon. members will please note that the nature and amount of the fine will also be the same as under the Canada Water Act. Again, the Fisheries Act and the Canada Water Act are in step. They are in step in respect of the definition of waste and they are identical when it comes to the maximum penalty which can be levied under our new legislation.

The administration of both acts will also be dovetailed. Officials from my department will be serving on the consultative committees and regional management boards set up under the Canada Water Act. They will do their best to make these consultative committees work and these over-all, federal-provincial management boards work. They have every reason to do so. Organized discussions and organized planning of this kind is likely to be much more helpful to our fishery than the catch-as-catch-can processes of the past.

When developments proceeded, willy-nilly, the fisheries were usually ignored. Power dams were built without regard to salmon runs. New industries were brought in without regard to pollution and its effect on our fish. The environment suffered and the ecological balance in our waters was upset. "Hard" industry has flourished. But living organisms have frequently been destroyed. Our scenery has been blemished and our recreational potential has been wiped out.

The Canada Water Act should change all that. In our new water quality management areas, all parties will be brought together. All interests will be consulted. Provincial government departments will be involved and so will federal departments. Provincial water resources people and Federal fisheries people will sit down together. They will work out their differences in an organized way and the end result will be a better over-all scheme of development for all concerned.

Various techniques have been developed for dealing with these multi-faceted situations. One is benefit-cost analysis. Benefit-cost analysis was first developed in the planning of whole river basins. There, power dams and irrigation, navigation and flood control, fisheries and recreation, forestry and aesthetics all had to be reconciled. Also some of them could be reduced to dollar terms and others could only be referred to as "intangibles". The technique is still imperfect. But we know that the "intangibles", like recreation and aesthetics, are being given much more credence than in the past. Sports fishing and tourism have been moving up the scale. They have been given higher priority with the passage of time. They have been weighing more heavily in the balance of things. So it is with our fisheries.

It is for these reasons as well that I favour the establishment of water quality management areas in various parts of the country. Ottawa and the provinces will be brought closer together. We will also tend to avoid head on confrontations between single and individual federal departments administering federal laws in the same waters. It will provide a forum for resolving these differences. It will also give our own fisheries people, and our forestry people, a greater say in the over-all scheme of things. Using the Canada Water Act in this way, we can make sure their voices are heard. They were not always heard in the past—far from it. Often the opinions of our fisheries biologists were ignored to the detriment of our fishery in particular, and our aquatic environment in general. Often the voices of our fishermen were ignored as well.

I might go even further. I might insist that our fisheries scientists and our development engineers must continue to be the pace setters. They must be the pace setters in so far as the protection of the living resources in our aquatic environment is concerned. They must insist on the highest possible standards of water purity. They must insist that the same high standards are put into effect locally, and regionally, in the new water quality management areas which result from Canada Water Act agreements between Ottawa and the provinces. We, in this department, clearly have a vested interest in the success of the Canada Water Act. We want it to work because it can also help us to do our job in Fisheries and Forestry more effectively.

I have been talking as if regulations made under the Canada Water Act will apply immediately and in all areas of Canada. This will not be the case. The setting up of basin wide plans covering major rivers and streams will take time. Large sums of money will also have to be voted as well. In the interim, at the very least, we will therefore have to use the Fisheries Act as we have done in the past. We will have to use it pending the signing of ironclad agreements between the provinces and Ottawa, agreements which will cover all facets of water development and protect our fisheries as well.

There will of course always be rivers and seas in which fishing is the dominant activity. There will also be single industry situations along our coasts and in outlying parts of this country. In those circumstances the Fisheries Act, alone, may be sufficient to do the job. It is here, also, that we expect our people will have a dominant voice in making sure that our aquatic environment is maintained in a healthy state. Perhaps in the fullness of time, the Canada Water Act may apply in these areas as well. But, for the time being, we will have to use the Fisheries Act by itself, to police pollution as best we can. Policing may not be the right word. Co-operative action is preferable. We want to work with industry, not against it. We want to co-operate with companies building new plants and installing new processes. We know that these new firms can benefit from our expertise and we are sure that our fishery will be much healthier if we have their co-operation from the outset.

Our departmental experience on both coasts has been gratifying. Most companies intending to build new pulp mills or chemical plants are now coming to our fisheries experts and asking for advice. They ask what our standards are and how these can best be met. They ask about new treatment facilities and how they have worked out in other locations in Canada.

We have scored some notable successes. Our new pulp mills on the greatest salmon stream on earth, the Fraser River in B.C., are among the cleanest in the world. Several chemical plants built in eastern Canada are also world leaders in this respect. Our insistence on high standards has also paid off in other ways. Several consulting firms, specializing in pollution engineering have now begun to sell their expertise in other countries. I am thinking of the Sandwell and Simons companies in Vancouver. They are now looked to by the Scandinavians and the Russians as having broken new ground by marrying pollution control and economy and by making a number of chemical process industries more compatible with our environment.

Co-operation with industry in this country, in other words, has turned what might otherwise have been a local disadvantage into an international advantage. We have been able to protect our fish and develop new export industries as well. We have insisted on high standards and they have been achieved at minimum cost. Sometimes by-products have been produced, sometimes not. But our rivers are cleaner and our seas are healthier. We have taken the intelligent approach to pollution abatement and we have scored a number of successes without costing the federal treasury large sums of money in the process.

While I can report considerable progress in some instances I must, regretfully, admit continuing failures in others. Some industries have been more co-operative than others. Some provinces have also been more energetic than others in the battle against pollution. It is because of this uneven pattern of development, this permissive approach to industrial development and regional expansion that we feel we must formalize our arrangements. By formalizing, I mean making it necessary for industries which generally give us trouble on the pollution front to file plans for their construction of new facilities and the introduction of new processes.

I might also say another reason for proceeding is to avoid the unhappy development of what I might loosely refer to as pollution havens in one part of the country because legislation is not uniform from coast to coast. I am sure changing our Fisheries Act will help to eliminate these so-called havens.

Hon. members will please note that we propose to change section 33 of the Fisheries Act thereby giving this department the power to:

(1) ask any firm about its plans for expansion;

(2) be informed about the anti-pollution measures to be taken in each case; and

(3) approve, or disapprove, of these plans and with the backing of the Governor in Council, in other words the cabinet, to require any modifications necessary to protect the fisheries waters of Canada.

Sometimes, we in the Department of Fisheries and Forestry will have to take the initiative. We will have to contact the firm in question. Once contacted it will be obliged, by law, to co-operate with our departmental officials in reviewing its plans for pollution control. I have no doubt that all, or nearly all, of these industries will work closely with us. I have no doubt that they will co-operate. They have been co-operative in the past. However, there may be exceptions. There may be exceptions, not only as a result of an honest difference of opinion, but also as a result of attempts to avoid cost which the company thinks it might be able to fob off on to the public in general.

Under these exceptional circumstances we in the department will have to take our responsibilities. We have to take up our responsibilities under the Fisheries Act and intervene in the public interest. We may have to intervene to the extent of holding up construction until the facilities are adequate from a pollution control point of view. We may also have to insist on the use of new processes for treating effluent which the company had not envisaged in the first place.

This is strong medicine. It is a drastic step to take. Before the Minister of Fisheries can actually hold up the plans of a company he will have to get full cabinet backing. He will have to get an Order in Council passed by the government. Of course, this is likely to be forthcoming in the kinds of cases which I have in mind. However, the firm in question has this further protection. All ministers, and not simply the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, will have to be convinced that the company is falling down in its duty to look after our waters in the proper way.

To put it another way, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, require the company in question to make such changes to its plant and/or its processes as are necessary to treat its effluent properly. This power continues over time. It continues in the sense that we will not give a full and final approval in each and every case. Instead, we will reserve the right to make further changes in our specifications. These changes might, for example, become imperative as a result of increased production on the part of the firm, changes in stream flow or, hopefully, a marked improvement in the technology of pollution abatement itself.

Unfortunately, pollution is with us now on a large scale. We can all recall several recent examples. I hope we do not experience a repetition of the so-called "red herring" incident in Newfoundland. I hope we do not run into another mercury problem on the prairies or in Lake St. Clair in Ontario. But if we do, we will have to move, and move quickly. We will have to move in and buy fish, for example, in order to support our fishermen during the period in which the contamination persists.

This action will be taken on behalf of the Crown. It will be taken on behalf of the Crown to remedy the condition or reduce or mitigate damage or destruction to life or property. A further amendment in this bill gives the government this power. It gives the power to recover its costs incurred in looking after the interim arrangements. These costs, of course, will be recoverable from those who are responsible for pollution in the first place.

I could go on, Mr. Speaker, I could detail other changes in the Fisheries Act. I could, for instance, refer to the 12-mile limit for trawlers. Newfoundland, when it came into confederation in 1949, retained its old 3-mile limit. This will now be changed, at Newfoundland's request, and the 12-mile restriction which already applies to trawlers in Atlantic waters will be extended to Newfoundland as well.

There is more. But suffice it to say that the main thrust of this bill is against pollution. It is part of our over-all effort to deal with this modern menace. We will soon have a tougher Fisheries Act—a better Fisheries Act. We will soon have a new Canada Water Act and a new Northern Inland Waters Act. We will have a better Canada Shipping Act. This is an impressive list. It is good legislation and it is sound legislation. We need these laws, these improved laws, these federal laws, to deal with pollution in an effective manner. We need them to keep our rivers fresh and our salt water clean. We need this legislation to make our aquatic environment in Canada fit for fish to live in.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, is a short one. But it is an important bill. I urge hon. members to support it. Improve it if you will, but support it. Unlike the United States, where the power over the fisheries resources is fragmented as between individual states, fragmented because it rests with the individual states, we have a unique opportunity here in Canada; we can pass national legislation dealing with our aquatic environment. I, therefore, ask you as Members of Parliament, acting in the national interest of Canada, to approve this bill and amend our Fisheries Act in these various ways.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-204, an Act to amend the Fisheries Act, reminds me of a well-known soap product—it does everything. It is all-encompassing. I have read the bill carefully and it is something of a catch-all, with part of the bill being introduced as the result of faulty drafting of previous bills. I make this statement on the basis of the wording of clause 9 on page 11 which states that a clause of the bill cannot take effect until the Canada Water Act has received Royal Assent.

The members of the Official Opposition have examined this bill and it is not our intention to oppose it. But there are some clauses with which we are concerned. I listened carefully to the minister, and I concur with much that he has said. The first part of the bill deals strictly with pollution control and no one could, therefore, reasonably quarrel with its intent.

In recent weeks there has been mounting evidence concerning the dreadful pollution of Canadian waters and the threat this pollution presents to our environment. Mercury poisoning has been reported in lakes in Ontario, Saskatchewan and Manitoba and it would be no surprise to find that all rivers and lakes adjacent to certain chemical plants are similarly polluted. Certainly, the situation which we know exists in Lake St. Clair and the St. Clair River now, where commercial and sports fishing have been banned for an indefinite period—since analysis of Lake St. Clair pickerel showed concentrations of mercury far beyond those considered safe for human consumption—cannot be ignored.

The first alarm about the dangers of mercury poisoning was raised in Japan where, in 1953, some 41 people died of nervous disorders which were ultimately traced to mercury poisoning. It was noted that their diet included large quantities of shellfish caught in a bay contaminated by effluent from a plastics plant. In Canada, attention has only recently be drawn to the danger of mercury as a pollutant although, obviously, mercury has been in use for along time. Besides being used in thermometers, mercury is principally used in chlor-alkali plants as an electrolytic catalyst in the manufacture of chlorine and caustic soda. It also plays a major role in the plastics industry, as well as in the pulp and paper industry, and in the making of fungicides. It gets into our rivers and lakes as part of the effluent from industrial plants and, to a lesser degree, from the agricultural run-off.

Since many of our industries have been using mercury for long periods of time, it is now obvious that the management of these plants have been aware of the polluting effect of their operations. But they have not taken any steps to correct the situation. Now, demands not only local but national and international in scope are being made for greater efforts to clean up our polluted waters. If the response is to be effective, much more research will be required by industry as well as by our federal and provincial authorities and, on the Great Lakes, by our American friends who also have a vital concern over improving the quality of water in the area.

[Mr. Crouse.]

All of us have recently been made aware of this government's attitude toward international conferences. But if we are to bring about effective control of the pollution in the Great Lakes, I believe the federal government should immediately request a conference between the provincial authorities concerned and the governors of the eight states bordering the lakes. This conference should take place either in Washingtotn or in Ottawa so that a co-operative effort may be made between Canada and the United States—a joint effort between our two nations—to get this problem under control. It makes little sense for Canada to try to control pollution of the Great Lakes unless our neighbours to the south are implementing similar procedures to deal with pollution by their own industries and the large cities situated on the United States side of the border adjacent to the Lakes.

As I said before, we are in agreement with the intent of this bill. Unfortunately, there are too many loopholes left open in this legislation. This becomes evident if one looks at the exemption clauses. These exemptions are clearly areas in which the government can exercise control, and there is scarcely any need to direct attention to the abuse which this arrangement makes possible. On the very first page of the bill we read in clause 3(1) that Section 33 (2) of the Fisheries Act is repealed and the following substituted:

(2) Subject to subsection (4), no person shall deposit or permit the deposit of waste of any type in any water frequented by fish or in any places under any conditions where such waste or any other waste that results from the deposit of such waste may enter any such water.

Certainly this is desirable, but what are the words of the section in the Fisheries Act that is being deleted? This subsection is printed in the bill and reads as follows:

(2) No person shall cause or knowingly permit to pass into, or put or knowingly permit to be put, lime, chemical substances or drugs, poisonous matter, dead or decaying fish, or remnants thereof, mill rubbish or sawdust or any other deleterious substance or thing, whether the same is of a like character to the substances named in this section or not, in any water frequented by fish, or that flows into such water, nor on ice over either such waters.

Although this subjection is being deleted, the truth of the matter is that it has never been enforced. If it had been enforced, our lakes in Ontario, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, especiallyy Lake St. Clair and the St. Clair River, would not now be seriously polluted.

I raise this point since the words in the bill, though somewhat different from the subsection being deleted, imply the same thing. Obviously, regulations are useless unless they are enforced. I ask the minister whether this law will be on the books but not enforced, as was the previous regulation. I ask him, through you, Mr. Speaker, what steps he has taken to strengthen the inspection and the enforcement section of his department?

A moment ago I mentiond my concern over the exemption clauses of this bill and I read into the record the new prohibition on the deposit of waste. I believe my concern over these exemption clauses is valid since I read on page 2 of the bill that the prohibition clause on waste does not apply—and I emphasize this—in the case of any waters that form part of a water quality management area designated pursuant to the Canada Water Act. It does not apply where there is a water board established which has licensed the deposit of waste as authorized by regulations made by the Governor in Council. Neither does it apply in the case of any water or waters to which the Northern Inland Waters Act applies.

In other words, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) can issue a licence to pollute under controlled conditions in all of Canada, with the exception of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, and he can do this pursuant to the Canada Water Act. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) can do the same thing in the Yukon and Northwest Territories pursuant to the Northern Inland Waters Act. By this fragmentation of authority, this placing of pollution control in Canada not under one, or under two, but under three federal ministers of the crown, I submit that the government has not only confused industry and the Canadian people but has also made enforcement of our pollution control measures next to impossible.

In addition, we have existing provisions in the Canada Shipping Act for pollution control, and the transport minister has indicated in this House that he plans to strengthen them. As a Canadian, I cannot help but wonder why the government follows this course in such a serious matter, one which is of vital importance to our future well being. I submit that this fragmentation of authority on this important matter is brought about by the unrest within the present federal cabinet and it indicates the jockeying over on that side of the House within the cabinet for political authority. We have four captains on the bridge, four captains who are trying to run the ship. I should like to ask which direction they will take.

This government is obviously willing to sacrifice adequate pollution control methods for the nation in order to appease the vanity of the three of four cabinet ministers who believe that they, and they alone, should have the final say on pollution control since it is the new "in-thing" in Canada. Everybody is talking pollution, so say these ministers, and therefore they believe that their departments should have final responsibility for pollution control. It is almost as though these ministers have said: Never mind about the interests of the Canadian public; let us use pollution control to enhance our own political image in the newspapers, on radio and on television.

Just what has been done? We have these other acts set up, namely the Canada Water Act and the Northern Inland Waters Act, and in my view they are nothing more than window dressing which will hamper and delay the implementation of real pollution controls in Canada. I do not believe that the Canada Water Act will work. I believe it is a fraud perpetrated on the Canadian people. It is a mirage. It is something that you see, something that indicates that the government plans to do something, but when the Canadian people reach out to use the Canada Water Act it fades, as do all mirages.

The act cannot work because its provisions have been fragmented; the authority it gives has been divided between the federal and provincial governments. Even the name "water authorities" is misleading since these bodies will not really be authorities with federal funds provided to assist in establishing pollution controls among municipalities. In fact, we now know from the terms of the bill presently before us that these water authorities will be a hindrance rather than a help since they are empowered to issue licences to pollute, which in effect makes pollution control under the Fisheries Act impossible.

I would also question the penalties for depositing or permitting the deposit of wastes in water. In the event, with all this fragmentation of authority, that a charge could be laid, I note that the bill calls for punishment in the form of a fine not exceeding $5,000 for each offence. This could be taken to mean that one day's discharge of waste into a Canadian lake or river could kill all life in that water and that the penalty for the offence would be only $5,000. This penalty is too limited for a large company. After all, is the price of a Canadian lake or river only $5,000?

Mr. Lundrigan: Like Long Harbour.

Mr. Crouse: Yes, as my hon. friend says, like Long Harbour. There was an instance of pollution which has destroyed the ecology of the area. Although efforts have been made to restore the fisheries, those of us who are familiar with the fisheries and have had a long time association with the fisheries know that it will be many years before we have fully recovered from the effects of the pollution of Long Harbour, Newfoundland.

We must be realistic about pollution. Let us be realistic about its effects on our environment. I ask the members of this House to think about the problem. Let us ask ourselves: Who are the main polluters in this nation? The answer, of course, Mr. Speaker, is you and I collectively, under a term called the "municipality". Our municipalities, with their sewage and garbage disposal problems, have been the greatest polluters of our rivers, lakes and streams. Especially is this so when cities and towns are located quite close to any given body of water. How do you propose to force the municipalities to act under this legislation. And if they do not act because of a shortage of funds, who are you going to fine—the mayor, the town clerk, the chief of police or the garbage collector? I suppose it would be the latter, since he is more closely associated with pollution!

But, Mr. Speaker, this is a serious matter, since all municipalities located on water bodies are constantly pouring phosphates into the waters. We are now saying, under a troika of authority, that the polluter must pay. Since the government has intentionally divided our pollution control authority, I believe that the enforcement of the clauses of this bill will be extremely difficult. The answer, of course, lies in a common sense approach to this problem. There is one minister on that side of the House, the Minister of Fisheries, who has a solution for the control of our pollution difficulties, but unfortunately he apparently lacks the required support of his colleagues on this important matter.

I say that the Minister of Fisheries has a solution to our pollution control problems because he expressed certain views in his speech entitled "Pollution and the Fisheries Act" as delivered before the Rotary Club of Hamilton on Thursday, May 22, 1969. In that speech, which indicates considerable research, the minister pointed out the manner in which the federal Fisheries Act could be used to bring pollution under control. He was talking, of course, entirely about pollution in water where fish react to poisonous substances. To use his words, they go belly up before human beings take sick, so strict laws protecting our fisheries should be our first line of defence against pollution and our first line of defence of human health and welfare as well. I endorse the minister's remarks because salmon will refuse to swim in water before we humans refuse to drink it. When we see fish dying in rivers and lakes, the waters of which are being utilized as sources of supplies for cities or towns, it would be wise for the authorities to examine the quality of that water to determine what has happened to it.

After describing our water problem, and after pointing out that it is quality and not quantity which we require for our well being, the minister stated, and I quote now directly from his speech:

> We in Canada are fortunate. We are fortunate in that we have a clear cut avenue for federal participation in the battle against pollution. We are fortunate in that we have an effective tool in the Fisheries Act. The Fisheries Act, as it happens, is nearly as old as Confederation itself.

He repeated some of those words today in his speech. He went on to state:

> It pre-dates most provinces—and it certainly pre-dates provincial legislation with respect to water quality and pollution control.
> Most provincial legislation has been framed with our federal Fisheries Act in mind. Our provincial acts, in other words, surround the federal Fisheries Act, embroidering it so to speak. But provincial laws and provincial regulations must take second place to the Fisheries Act in any case—for fisheries are federal under our constitution.

The minister continued by stating that we are fortunate as compared to the United States, where fishery matters come under the individual states. This makes it more difficult for Washington to co-ordinate activities since their authority is limited to international treaties and the like. He pointed out that in this country, Ottawa has full authority over our sea coast and inland fisheries. Under the British North America Act, Ottawa makes our fishery laws and it approves our fishery regulations. True, Ottawa has delegated some of its authority to the provinces at times, but if these provinces want to make a change in any of their regulations they must first submit it to the federal government for approval.

Having said this, the Minister of Fisheries then got down to the nitty-gritty of our problem when he said, and again I am quoting:

> We must deal with pollution before pollution occurs. We must get into the act before new plants are built; when they are in the design stage so to speak. We must insist on the best manufacturing techniques and the best devices for eliminating poisons and making sure that eutroplication is a thing of the past. Our federal Fisheries Act, in other words must be updated. It must include a few clauses which are essentially anticipatory in nature. It must not only say what kind of chemicals can and which cannot be discharged into Canadian waters but see to it that our municipalities and our industries are aware of these guidelines ahead of time.

> With a new and amended Fisheries Act, we will no longer have to wait until the damage is done to our environment. We will no longer have to discipline maverick companies which themselves have failed to look ahead and to plan for the future. We will no longer have to plead with municipalities to do the right thing for themselves and their citizens.

The minister said he liked this approach, and quite frankly so do I because it is simple and relatively straightforward. In his words, and I am now quoting him:

> We already have a fisheries department and we already have a fisheries staff in the provinces. So, we can use our existing establishment to do a job on pollution—to do it quickly and to do it well.

In summing up, the Minister of Fisheries said:

> In the Fisheries Act we have a one hundred year old piece of federal legislation which with a few simple improvements can be used to reduce pollution in all the waters of Canada. In our Department of Fisheries in Ottawa and out in our regional offices we already have all of the officers we need in order to police pollution in this country.

These statements made by the Minister of Fisheries are not broad generalities; they are blunt, they are definite and they are to the point. According to the Minister of Fisheries, the Fisheries Act, which we are presently amending, is all that is required to reduce, control and police pollution in all the waters of Canada. This is a viewpoint with which I agree so I cannot help but ask, in view of these facts why was the authority to control pollution in Canada intentionally fragmented by this government? Why did this government intentionally go out of its way to set up an expensive bureaucracy for the control of water pollution, when the Fisheries department has all the officers required to police pollution? Why all these new and obviously unnecessary expenditures while the government implies it is practicing thrift and cutting down on expenses? This is nothing but doubletalk. Only last Friday in this House of Commons the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) asked the opposition for suggestions on how to cut down government expenditures. As you will recall, he received some suggestions immediately from the opposition. It was suggested that he cut down his personal staff, and it was suggested that he cut out Information Canada.

It is now obvious from the statements made by the Minister of Fisheries that we do not need the Canada Water Act, and its expensive bureaucratic water authority, or the Northern Inland Waters Act. The immediate withdrawal of these measures would not reduce by one iota our fight against pollution in this country. It would save some of the hard-earned dollars of the tax payers. I hope the government will give this suggestion some thought. I hope the government will give the Minister of Fisheries more power under this Fisheries Act so that our industries and our municipalities will know where they stand on this serious problem of pollution. We need guidelines under one department which are well understood and well administered. We need guidelines which are enforceable, and which are enforced from one end of Canada to the other, if we are to surmount this new difficulty which is troubling Canadians and all mankind. In my view the federal Minister of Fisheries should have complete responsibility for the enforcement of pollution control in Canada, using as a vehicle the federal Fisheries Act.

There are other provisions in the Fisheries Act amendments which relate to the conservation of marine plants. With the development of the science of marine biology, these plants are becoming more and more valuable commercially, and they provide an additional source of livelihood for many Canadians. I believe the changes proposed represent good conservation practice, and we are fully in agreement with these measures.

Finally, the bill deals with fishing operations on the east coast, and it corrects an anomaly which has existed off the coast of Newfoundland ever since that province threw in its lot with the rest of Canada. Here, I refer to the fact that deep sea trawlers operating off the coast of Atlantic Canada, other than Newfoundland, were required to refrain from fishing operations umil they were 12 miles from our shores, while deep sea Newfoundland trawlers could start trawler operations three miles from the coast. In other words, all our east coast fishermen are equal but some are more equal than others.

Under the changes proposed, which I agree bring uniformity to our regulations, all our deep sea fishermen in Atlantic Canada will now be treated alike. I only hope that day will not be too far distant when the 12-mile limit will apply not only to Canadians, who practice it as a conservation measure, but to the eight other countries, namely Spain, Portugal, France, Italy, Norway, Denmark, the United Kingdom and the United States, who historically and traditionally have fished within three miles of our coastline and whose operations, as of today, have not been phased out by the government. All our new regulations, and all our talk about conservation of our fisheries resources, become meaningless unless other nations such as those I have mentioned are willing to co-operate and practice conservation policies similar to those imposed upon our own nationals.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, as the minister said when he moved second reading of this bill, it does propose some very extensive changes to our Fisheries Act. I would think it is probably the most extensive revision of the act which has taken place since 1932 and, perhaps in some ways, the bill proposes the most important change in some of its basic principles since the act was introduced in the first Parliament of Canada, as the minister said. Many of the changes, of course, just repeal some of the archaic sections of the act. So far as I have been able to study the bill, I have no quarrel with what is being done in this regard. There are certain other changes, such as those mentioned by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse), in respect of the application of the Fisheries Act on the Atlantic coast which, so far as I am concerned, are logical changes at this time.

I believe, however, there are two really important changes proposed in this bill, and I intend to confine my discussion at the second reading stage to these two particular aspects. The first, and perhaps least important of the two, has to do with the introduction into the Fisheries Act of specific sections in respect of jurisdiction over marine plants. These are now to be under the purview of the act and the department. Although as I believe the minister pointed out, and I well recognize, to some extent marine plants have been controlled and regulations have been applied by the department. I believe this is certainly a very interesting clause of the bill and one which indicates a recognition of the potential importance of marine plants in the industrial and commercial life of Canada. For this reason, I welcome the proposed sections which will enable proper regulation and control over the volume and method of harvesting of marine plants.

Undoubtedly, without some form of careful management some of these marine plant resources which potentially are of economic benefit to our fishermen would be depleted, and in fact mined instead of harvested. This has happened from time to time in respect of some particular species of our fish. I know that in the area of the Pacific coast with which I am familiar, there is at the present time an effort being made to promote the commercial harvesting of kelp. This is a very interesting form of plant life. I had the opportunity of discussing this particular venture with the people who are endeavouring to pioneer it. Although I do not think it will ever develop into one of British Columbia's major industries, I believe this is a very significant development and my interest is heightened by the fact that the act is being amended in this regard.

I wish to commend the minister for bringing in these proposals in respect of placing marine plants under the jurisdiction of the act. I readily understand this can be important in respect of another aspect. I commend the minister for introducing control over the algae and other marine plants, even though they may not be harvested commercially, because this is important in relation to the ecology of the waters of Canada, both inland and on our coasts.

The other major clauses of the bill to which the minister referred most extensively, as indeed did the hon. member for South Shore, have to do with the changes proposed in respect of the control of pollution. The present section 33 of the act which governs pollution of the waters is very extensively revised under the minister's proposal. I should like to say I welcome certain aspects of the approach the minister has taken, as indicated by the provisions of this bill.

I welcome the fact that the approach being proposed, particularly with regard to the additions to section 33, is one of positive control rather than of negative control. In other words, as the minister has suggested a number of times, the Fisheries Act should not be a weapon to be used against people but should be a mode through which the authority of the department can work positively with industry to ensure that our waters are protected. To that extent, I feel the proposals are a step in the right direction. I feel that these particular additions to section 33 can be welcomed by all members of the House and fully supported.

However, when we consider the proposed changes to the present section 33, I feel we move into an area in which we may find we do not see eye to eye entirely with the minister's proposals. The minister quoted section 33, and I should like to quote it again. I refer to the part having to do with protection of our waters from pollution. It reads:

> No person shall cause or knowingly permit to pass into, or put or knowingly permit to be put, lime, chemical substances or drugs, poisonous matter, dead or decaying fish, or remnants thereof, mill rubbish or sawdust or any other deleterious substance or thing, whether the same is of a like character to the substances named in this section or not, in any water frequented by fish, or that flows into such water, nor on ice over either such waters.

Well, in view of some of the statements the minister has been making across the country, I expected there would be some rephrasing of the rather archaic wording in that particular section of the current Fisheries Act. The proposal which he has brought forward, while it may be couched in more modern words, is a move to weaken the authority and power of the Fisheries Act rather than, as the minister attempted to suggest to us in his introductory speech, a move to strengthen the act.

Perhaps, as the minister suggests, the wording may clarify the act, but I submit that as matters stand before us at the moment in this Parliament what the minister is proposing to us will weaken the jurisdiction of the Fisheries Act, and the power of the minister to take effective measures to prevent the growth of the pollution of the waters of Canada. I would like to outline my reasons for having this feeling after having made this analysis of the minister's bill. In order to do so, I should compare the present section with the proposal in the bill. I am going to quote only part of it at the moment, but I think it is the parallel part;

> —no person shall deposit or permit the deposit of waste of any type in any water frequented by fish or in any place under any conditions where such waste or any other waste that results from the deposit of such waste may enter any such water.

Then, Mr. Speaker, further on in that same clause is a proposed definition of the word "waste":

> "waste" means (i) any substance that, if added to any waters, would degrade or alter or form part of a process of degradation of alteration of the quality of those waters to an extent that is detrimental to their use by man or by any animal, fish or plant that is useful to man, and
> (ii) any water that contains a substance in such a quantity or concentration, or that has been so treated, processed or changed, by heat or other means, from a natural state that it would, if added to any waters, degrade or alter or form part of a process of degradation or alteration of the quality of those waters to an extent that is detrimental to their use by man or by any animal, fish or plant that is useful to man—

If one compares those two wordings, one cannot but agree that the wording proposed in the bill is much more modern, is clearer, and is broader in its context. Certainly, in the light of the kind of industrial society in which we live, this bill contains a much more adequate definition of waste and provisions for the control of its disposal than section 33(2) of the present Fisheries Act. But, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that there is a joker in here, and this is the point that concerns me. When one looks at it, the whole value of the definition as it is set forth is contingent upon what is done in another act, or, I should say, what is now contained in another bill that is before this Parliament. I say this because all of what is in the proposed bill in respect of the Fisheries Act, in the definition of waste and in the powers of the minister to control waste that may be harmful to fish going into waters, is subject to the Canada Water Act.

The initial prohibition of persons putting or depositing waste fo any type into water is subject to subsection (4) of the bill, which in turn makes it clear that it is subject to the provisions of the Canada Water Act and to the conditions:

> —authorized by regulations made by the Governor in Council under paragraph (a) of subsection (2) of section 16 of that Act—

When one considers the question of waste as it is defined in the clause of the bill, after the part which I read defining waste, the following words appear:

—without limiting the generality of the foregoing, includes anything that, for the purposes of the Canada Water Act, is deemed to be waste;—

So, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that if we are to understand the meaning and the purport of the bill that the Minister of Fisheries is presenting we must inevitably have a look at what is said in clause 16 of the Canada water bill. Clause 16(1) of that bill reads:

(1) The Governor in Council may make regulations (a) prescribing

(i) substances and classes of substances,

(ii) quantities or concentrations of substances and classes of substances in water, and

(iii) treatments, processes and changes of water for the purpose of subsection (2) of section 2—

This all sounds very complicated until one refers to clause 2 of the Canada water bill. So, Mr. Speaker, we find ourselves in a bit of a maze. I think it should be pointed out that we now have before this Parliament four bills, if my count is correct, in which the precise wording of the definition of "waste" appears.

We have before this Parliament Bill C-144, the Canada Water Act bill, Bill C-187 the Northern Inland Waters Act bill, Bill C-202 the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act bill, and this bill, C-204, to amend the Fisheries Act. But all of these bills, all of what they mean or what they do not mean, depends upon the acts that may or may not be taken in the future by the Governor in Council under clause 16 of the Canada Water Act bill.

In other words, until we know what the government has in mind in the shape of regulations prescribing substances and classes of substances, and quantities and concentrations, and treatments and processes, we in this House have no way of knowing whether or not we are being asked to throw down the drain the whole impact of the Fisheries Act so far as protection of the quality of our waters, for the well being of our fish, is concerned.

The minister may say, "Tut, tut; you know this government isn't that bad." But, Mr. Speaker, I suggest it is not fair to ask the House to buy a pig in a poke. Some of us who have had some association with the administration of the Department of Fisheries for a period of years have some respect for the approach taken by the conservation and development branch of the department, with the backing of the Fisheries Research Board of Canada. I think it is fair to say that over the years they have been really the only cohesive body in Canada which has been concerned with the quality of Canadian water from coast to coast and off the coasts of Canada.

In his speech, the minister paid considerable tribute to the department which he heads at the present time. I certainly concur with many of his sentiments in that respect. In fact, in some respects I would be prepared to go further than the minister did, because I think, under unfortunate circumstances, the department which the minister currently heads has been doing a magnificent job in trying to protect, develop and conserve the fisheries resources of Canada and, because of that, has been attempting to conserve the quality of the waters of Canada. It has been an uphill fight and they have lost a good many battles, Mr. Speaker, largely through the indifference and neglect of succeeding governments and, I suppose, of succeeding Parliaments of Canada, and in the last analysis, because of the indifference and neglect of most of the Canadian people over a long period of years.

However, there is evidence of greater interest now in the quality of our waters than there has ever been in any previous Parliament, as exemplified by the number of bills before us dealing with the subject. But are we just going through the motions, Mr. Speaker; are we just engaged in a song and dance about the desirability of preserving our waters? This is a question in the minds of many members of the House and many Canadian people. I ask members not to discard the existing power that resides in the Fisheries Act until there is something better to replace it. So far, there has been no tangible evidence of this. Various bills propose to set up elaborate and complex administrative machinery. Most of us will agree that some of it is necessary and this view was expressed in this House in respect of the bill to deal with the pollution of Arctic waters. One of the ideas expressed in the Canada water bill, namely the management of watersheds on a countrywide basis, is a sound idea.

In all of these bills, Mr. Speaker, Parliament is being asked to move forward blindly without the assurance that they really mean anything when it comes to controlling or preventing the pollution of our waters. I, for one, am not prepared to agree to the passage of this bill until I have had some enlightenment on what I consider to be the crux of the matter. Some people believe we have too many bills already but I think we need another bill, which would take precedence over any of these now before us, having to do with the question of water quality, a bill which would enable us to know exactly what we are being asked to pass in this bill. I have a picture in my mind of an act to provide for the establishment of a pollution standards code which would authorize the Governor in Council to enact regulations proscribing classes of substances, and processes, and changes of water. This would be the control bill, as it were, which would give meaning to all these other bills, in particular the proposed amendments to the Fisheries Act.

In this way, we could intelligently discuss and assess the change to section 33 of the Fisheries Act, which the minister has brought before us. We could then also agree with the other clauses of the bill which give him the authority to regulate in advance the submission of plans, and to require alteration of plans etc. In any event, the design of new industrial plants should be analyzed by technically qualified officials of the fisheries research board, not by some other department, as this would reduce the authority of the minister to protect, develop and conserve the fisheries of Canada. We must take care that the proposed amendments are not allowed to downgrade the powers of the Fisheries Act.

The idea of a pollution standards code is not new, Mr. Speaker. In November, 1966, I made a speech in this House reporting on the conference on pollution and our environment held in Montreal earlier that year. At that time, I summarized and quoted from some of the guidelines produced by the conference touching upon three fields, air pollution, water pollution and soil pollution. The guideline suggested for air pollution was that a single federal agency or organization be established to set up a national pollution abatement code and the details of how this might operate were given.

Under the heading of water pollution, the guideline was that a single federal organization or agency should be established to develop a national pollution abatement code. The guideline on soil pollution recommended that a single inter-disciplinary national agency on environmental contamination be established with broad responsibility in the general areas of, among other things, developing national standards.

I felt that these guidelines were most encouraging, Mr. Speaker, and I summarized the situation in my speech reported at page 10021 of Hansard for November 17, 1966, as follows:

> —there was general agreement which certainly confirmed the view I have held for quite some time, that the only way in which this whole problem can be really attacked in a proper manner is if we in this Parliament, through the federal government, exercise real leadership and guidance. Only when we can develop a national code and national standards based upon active and continuing research, so that the standards can be continually upgraded as new science and technology are developed, can we make continuing progress in this field.

Apparently the government has rejected that approach, Mr. Speaker, and now this House is being asked to diminish the authority which currently exists in the Fisheries Act of Canada. I sometimes look at sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act which have to do with the distribution of legislative powers between Parliament and the legislative assemblies of the provinces, and it seems to me, without attempting to pose in any way as a constitutional authority, that when we start talking today about pollution and the control of pollution of our air, water and soil, we are really dealing with an area covered by the preamble to section 91, which reads:

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate and House of Commons to make Laws for the Peace, Order, and good Government of Canada, in relation to all Matters not coming within the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces;—

I think we recognize, and many thoughtful and knowledgeable scientists have been suggesting this to us, that we are engaged in a process of total war against pollution. The question of our managing our environment in such a way as to protect its quality for living creatures on land, in the sea, and I suppose in this day and age one can include creatures in the air, has reached the proportions of total war. It has reached the stage of being important in considerations relating to peace, order and good government, and is as important as the question of whether or not we can prevent a thermo-nuclear holocaust from breaking out. Although some of the statements attributed today to scientists may make us feel that they are being alarmists, nevertheless we in this parliament would be foolish to ignore the kinds of warnings we are being given from time to time. It is in this context, and with this sense of urgency, that I feel the federal government ought to be approaching the question before us now.

I feel that this assertion of the concern of this Parliament could best be expressed not by the piecemeal bits of legislation introduced to control this or that aspect of pollution, but by a general act which would spell out the principles relating to the preservation of our environment which this Parliament feels should be adopted. This general act would give authority to the Governor in Council to set out quality standards as they would apply to any form of development across the country. If we had such an act we could assess, on the basis of its criteria, whether a particular idea for managing all water resources in a certain region of the country was desirable or not. We could assess, if we knew what those regulations were, whether it would be desirable to bring the operation of various acts under particular definitions that would be set out in those regulations.

I quoted from my own speech and may I now briefly refer to one which was made by someone else. I am referring to a release from the Department of Fisheries and Forestry of Canada under the date of January 15, 1970. The first page has a synopsis of the minister's speech at the North Vancouver Chamber of Commerce monthly luncheon of January 5, 1970. The first item of the synopsis indicates that the minister believes a national water quality code is essential. I must say that I agree with the minister. Then, the release tells one to see page 4 of the speech. I always become interested in the fine print when I see headings like that. On page 4, I read that the minister believes we need a national water quality code. He also says that we need regional guidelines drawn to meet regional needs. Well, Mr. Speaker, what we have before us are proposals to develop some regional guidelines to meet regional needs; but we are building a body, as it were, without any head. I agree with the minister when he says that we need a national water quality code.

Yet the minister who believes in the need for a national water quality code and who now has in his hands legislation, which although poorly drafted for present purposes nevertheless gives authority to put forward a national water quality code, is apparently voluntarily asking this House to approve his surrendering the authority to develop a national water quality code. This, to me, is a pretty basic flaw in the proposal the minister is putting before the House and I for one do not find myself inclined to accept. I hope that before we proceed too far with this bill we can get some indication, if not from the minister then at least from the government, as to whether and when it is intended to bring to a head, as it were, this question of establishing national standards, not only in the field of the control of the purity of our water but in the fields relating to the control of the purity of our air and soil. I think the minister will agree that all these things are interrelated directly and indirectly. He knows, for example, that in the design of a pulp and paper mill the two questions of water purity and air purity are very much interrelated. In some cases, of course, it is possible to improve the quality of water discharged from a plant by increasing the quantity of pollution that is going out in the air, and vice versa.

This is the assessment I make of what I think is undoubtedly the key proposal in this bill. I have tried to assess it on its merits as I see them. I think that in many respects, as I have said, it represents an improvement over the present act but it has what I fear, Mr. Speaker, could very well turn out to be a fatal error, one which would downgrade the effectiveness of the kind of work that has been done by our various fisheries scientists over the years. Far from increasing their influence in the councils of the nation, it might very well relegate them to a corner where their efforts would be even less effective than they have been up to the present time. These are the considerations which I submit should certainly be uppermost in the minds of hon. members of the House in discussing the merits of the bill. I hope, perhaps before the bill proceeds much further on its way, that we can obtain some agreement that some arguments I have advanced have validity. Then, either through this bill or some other way, the general approach being taken to the control of water pollution in Canada by the government may be changed and improved.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, having listened to the minister's speech, it now seems evident that we will have to wait until we get this bill before the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry before we can have the amendments proposed in it explained in detail, indeed before we can have some of our fears hopefully put to rest.

My colleague, the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse), referred very eloquently and impressively to the proliferation of pollution legislation either now before Parliament or pending. This fact was also alluded to by the hon. member who just resumed his seat. I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that the buck-passing has to stop somewhere. Someone must have the ultimate responsibility for the control of the pollution and cleaning up the waters of our country that have been polluted as a consequence of neglect.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: In addition to listening to the minister's speech today, I have read some of his speeches in recent weeks, particularly his speech on April 8 to the Executive Council of the Canadian Manufacturers Association. I have formed the impression that the minister is fighting a losing battle within the cabinet. I think the minister fully appreciates the fact that if he is to do the job of Minister of Fisheries, he must have the legislative authority to control water pollution in all aspects. This has been said before. My colleague, the hon. member for South Shore, said it today. I said it during the second reading stage of the Canada water bill. It has also been said by other hon. members. The Canada Water Act is not necessary. It is window dressing. It should be withdrawn. If we need further proof of that, we need only read some of the speeches of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) and, indeed the legislation now before us, the amendment to the Fisheries Act. The minister knows this, but I do not think he has been able to sell the idea to his colleagues.

In addition to the Canada Water Act, we have a still further proliferation of the laws of our country respecting pollution. The Northern Inland Waters Act is now before Parliament. There is proposed legislation dealing with pollution of the high seas which presumably flows from the Brussels Conference on Pollution of the High Seas which took place last year. In the final analysis, the ultimate responsibility must rest with the Minister of Fisheries.

It will be most unfortunate if there is a dilution of government authority because as a consequence of this dilution no minister, including the Minister of Fisheries, will be able to deal effectively with pollution. The government should recognize this and withdraw the Canada Water Act. The government should immediately enter into negotiations or discussions with the United States government aimed at entering into some agreement with that country. Without such an agreement with the United States, no matter what we do, we will not have the ultimate control necessary in this country to keep our own environment clean. That is a simple fact of life. It is a fact of geography.

At the present time there is legislation before the United States Congress, similar in many aspects to the legislation before this House, aimed at dealing with water pollution in that country. I doubt if our government is even aware of the debates that are taking place in that country. There should be a meeting of minds. In my opinion, there should be a continuing committee representing the responsible ministers of both cabinets which would have the responsibility of at least keeping each other informed of our various laws and regulations dealing with pollution. Such a joint cabinet committee could be the forerunner of what has to be the ultimate solution in the continental fight against pollution, a treaty between our two countries.

There are two aspects of pollution that the minister alluded to which are of great concern. I wish to deal with the threat to our fishing resources posed by oil pollution. Oil pollution manifests itself in a number of ways. There is continuous pollution caused by tankers dumping their ballast on the high seas beyond the reach and control of any government. How this is to be controlled is one of the great problems facing the world today, especially when we consider that over half the tonnage of the ocean cargoes of the world is composed of oil. Giant tankers are being added to the tanker fleets of the world every day. If an accident were to occur to one of these fully loaded giant tankers, it would represent nothing short of a world crisis.

The second aspect of the oil pollution problem is the possibility that any day there may be success in the explorations that are taking place and oil will be tapped on the continental shelf. The consequence of an accidental spill from one of these offshore wells could be disastrous. We must consider the resources of our Grand Banks. We saw what happened with the Santa Barbara spill off the coast of California and with the spill that occurred a short time ago off the coast of Louisiana. The time has come for us to make some hard and fast decisions. If I had the responsibility of choosing between the oil industry on our continental shelf or the fishing resources of the Grand Banks, I would opt for the latter.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McGrath: Many people in the world today are coming round to this way of thinking. The world is desperately in need of protein—the type of protein we have in abundance in our Atlantic and Pacific fisheries. There are strong suggestions that because of the necessity of cleaning up the air of our cities, leading to efforts to replace the internal combustion engine, the world demand for oil may decrease. But the population expansion ensures that world demand for protein will continue. So, we have some decisions to make.

I believe the government should adopt a policy now, before it is too late, of refusing to countenance drilling for oil on the continental shelf of this country such as would impose a threat to the fishing resources of the Grand Banks. I believe the time has come for us to make this decision. I believe the world will applaud such a decision.

This is one aspect of the legislation now before the House which gives me some encouragement. At least the minister will in future have legislative authority to take the steps I have indicated to prevent this kind of pollution from taking place, provided he can get his colleagues in the cabinet to agree. We know from experience that if drilling for oil proceeds on the continental shelf off the Atlantic coast there will be accidental spills, and if these spills occur, the only effective method found to date of clearing up the oil is by using straw. In other words, straw is used to soak up the oil after it has floated ashore on our beaches, after it has destroyed untold quantities of plankton and other minute forms of sea life on which our groundfish depend. We know enough about the consequences of oil pollution to be in a position to make this decision. The minister was very quick to reach a decision in connection with the Georgia Straits incident in British Columbia. He had our support when he did so. I do not think the government can any longer refrain from making the inevitable decision with respect to the continental shelf off Newfoundland and Nova Scotia. The great oil companies of the world have been pouring millions of dollars into prospecting for oil for the past several years; they know that eventually they will strike oil. A decision will have to be made.

In addition to the danger of oil spills which would result from drilling for oil on the continental shelf, another hazard faces us in the form of a huge 100,000 barrel refinery which is to be built in Placentia Bay in the little village of Come-By-Chance. This is the bay which suffered so greatly from the effects of the phosphorous pollution, a consequence of the government's inability to prevent such pollution occurring. Anyone who knew anything about the operation of a phosphorous reduction plant in such a location knew that pollution was bound to occur. The area affected is only now getting over this setback; we are only now beginning to restore the damage done to our image in the eyes of the world, especially in the markets of the United States.

I look forward to asking the minister, when we are in committee, what steps he proposes to take with the authority Parliament is giving to him under this measure to ensure that there will be no repetition of what took place at Long Harbour when this 100,000 barrel refinery goes into production. What will happen when the petro-chemical industry which is supposed to follow the building of the refinery begins its operations? Oil refineries and petro-chemical plants are among the most serious polluters of coastal waters.

I am not at all satisfied that the government has taken the necessary precautions in this case. The promoters of this industrial complex have been hard at it for a number of years and have made no secret of the fact that they have every reason to expect their efforts to materialize. The refinery is to be built, we understand, in an extremely sensitive area as far as the fishing resources of the Grand Banks are concerned; there are also, of course, the resources of Placentia Bay itself to be considered.

I see it is five o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of the adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg)—Housing—suspension of C.M.H.C. loans in larger cities; the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie)—Historic Sites—acquisition of residence of Sir Robert Borden.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of the private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, Notices of Motion, Public Bills.

(5:00 p.m.)

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GUARANTEED MINIMUM INCOME

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the possibility of passing a law under which every Canadian citizen, who is without work or other source of income, would receive a guaranteed minimum income as a way of recognizing, in a special fashion, the dignity, the value and the economic rights of the human being, in the context of the economic life of the nation, that the amount required for the payment of the guaranteed minimum income be derived from the national product so as to increase neither the taxes on individuals and companies, nor the cost of living, nor the price of any product or service; that this measure could, with advantage, replace the contributions and payments of all the systems of unemployed insurance, social welfare, family and personal allowances, Canada Pensions and Quebec Pensions, that the economic recognition of the guaranteed minimum income would be to the greatest advantage of all the citizens of Canada, and, at the same time, would be of great benefit to all the principal sectors of the national economy.

He said: Mr. Speaker, about this notice of motion which I put on the order paper on October 28, 1969, I take it as my responsibility to express my views because this concerns the fate of two thirds of the Canadian people without income.

Since first we heard the promises of the government, especially those of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), about the establishment of a just society, we can wonder when will come the measures which were to follow.

We have been told about various bills on tax reform, but we must admit that Parliament has not done anything to help the majority of Canadians.

Royal commissions have been created and they have submitted their reports, pointing out to us structural and regional disparities. Some reports also dealt with periodic fluctuations and even recommended the retraining of some workers. But those recommendations all reflect the influence of a clique.

While computers do the work of accountants and office clerks, and machines replace workers, unfortunately there are still dreamers within the Canadian administration who keep the possibility of a full-employment policy alive.

While financing costs and taxes of all kinds increase the prices of goods and services that are essential to our survival, those who are responsible for those increases are talking about a plan to ensure a reasonable price stabilization. To distract the people from the real conditions, even economists contradict themselves publicly about the causes of poverty in a prosperous society.

If we consider that the Canadian citizens are always caught between a heavy production on the one hand and a low purchasing power on the other, it is obvious that a slight change must be made in the distribution of the purchasing power in the specific areas where it is lacking, that is among the Canadian citizens who do not have a sufficient income.

We feel that the guarantee of a national dividend which would cover the essential needs, food, clothing and housing, is perfectly workable today, due to the present conditions of Canadian production.

Thanks to the advent of automation and cybernetics as well as the application of new production techniques, we consider that the productive labour of mankind is becoming increasingly useless and is replaced by equipment in plants which are increasingly automated.

In an open letter to President Johnson, American economists and sociologists stated that the first condition to be fulfilled in order to prevent economic and social disorder in the present state of production, which eliminates human labor without succeeding in reemploying the worker to good advantage, is simply to ensure to each individual and to each family a minimum guaranteed income as a basic right.

Even though wages and salaries might bring sufficient income to all of the 8,500,000 Canadian citizens actively engaged in production, there remains an unbalance due to the other 13,000,000 Canadians without income. This is the gap which must be filled without however taxing those who get an income from work or from personal wealth. The only thing necessary is therefore to determine a set and guaranteed minimum for the 13,000,000 Canadians who are too young, too old, sick, crippled, blind or unemployed, who are all entitled to it.

In fact, if the father works he receives the salary of a single man. To my mind, society cannot expect him to support five or six people on one salary which is barely sufficient for a single person. That is why a guaranteed minimum must be provided for the mother and each of her children.

The Progressive Conservatives and the Liberals have never taken the family into account in their tax legislation. A table, published at page 1534 of Hansard, on June 14, 1967, makes a comparison between a single person and a man with a wife and three children as dependents, both earning an annual salary of $4,200. After paying his income tax and while taking advantage of his basic exemptions, this father has $515 left to support his family. That is $125 per person per year, $10.50 per month or 30 cents per day. That is what our present tax system leaves to the taxpayer. One can imagine the small amount left to the mother of a large family. Thirty cents per day for the mother, the most important person in our society, when our national production will reach $80 billion in 1970. Those figures show that the situation is abnormal.

In my opinion, the first move was to bring in a notice of motion in order to draw the attention of the House to this situation through proper parliamentary action. Social Credit has always advocated a philosophy and economic reforms promoting the well-being of the individual and the family in the monetary, economic and financial fields, and thus more personal, family and social freedom. With money in his pockets or in the bank, a man can speak the language he wants or go to the school of his choice.

While all the millionaires, the scientists, the chairmen of large banks and companies, the leaders or ministers of the old political parties are defending the interests of high finance, while all the unions are seeking higher salaries for the workers, nobody is doing anything for the unemployed who have a right to live. In fact, Social Credit is the only one to talk about that.

In this country, 5 per cent of the population are made up of people with personal income, 35 per cent earn salaries, 60 per cent are unemployed and depend on a producing citizen or on society in general. Here are the facts; here is the present situation in the Canadian society.

The Canadian government does not produce anything but it administers everything. It is the people who produce everything, even their ministers and members of Parliament. It is up to the people to say to their ministers and representatives how production should be distributed for the good of the whole population and not only for the good of capitalists.

The production of goods and services is excellent but purchasing power is lacking to buy this production. Purchasing power, it is money. Money is very badly distributed. Some have too much, others not enough. Inflation for some, deflation for the others. All the while discussions take place throughout the country about the sharing of taxes between the federal, provincial and perhaps even municipal governments, the poor distribution of money between families is forgotten.

When the government levies taxes, it is to distribute the sum total of this revenue in salaries, interests and administrative costs. Thus, taxes that have been drawn from the people are deemed to return to the people. If the national production is made up of the work of eight million citizens, isolated or associated, I think it should benefit all Canadians, including the thirteen million who are unemployed, but who also have the right to live in our society.

All the Social Credit philosophy based on the needs of the individual in the family, is there and it enables us to claim, even in the present system, a guaranteed minimum income for all.

The purpose of this method is to help families to fulfil themselves and, as the family is the very basis of society, I feel parliament should give serious thought to that problem. If we want the country to prosper, let us start by ensuring the prosperity of every family, every individual. If families are prosperous, all the institutions normally will be, or else they will disappear if they are not useful to people who can afford to pay.

Beautiful plants, stores, huge offices, marvelous schools and public buildings, skyscrapers fifty stories high are being built, but still too many slums are being tolerated.

Mr. Speaker, the concept of a guaranteed income is not new, since on October 22, 1968, I gave the green light, here, to the personal guaranteed income, during the private members' business hour. At that time, I was congratulated on doing so, particularly by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

The Leader of the Opposition said, and I quote:

I wish to congratulate the hon. member for his interest and concern in the grave problem of poverty in Canada and the improvement of assistance and welfare administration... I do want to congratulate him most sincerely upon his interest in the problem and for placing the matter before the House.

For his part, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) said, and I quote:

I welcome the opportunity extended to us to take part in a debate on a guaranteed minimum income for Canadians. I should like to compliment both the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) on their contributions to this debate.

Fortunately, on April 6, 1970, three members of this house spoke again about a guaranteed minimum income, and expressed various views as to the problem and the difficulty of solving it, to start with the quasi-impossibility of isolating the problem and even of defining it, for the needs of the study.

Of course, I am happy to thank the honourable members for Oshawa-Whitby, Lanark and Renfrew and Scarborough West (Messrs. Broadbent, McBride and Weatherhead), for having opened the debate this year, thus allowing me to go straight to the point and to give some details and solutions concerning an individual guaranteed income.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government is always ready to make gifts to some developing countries. Such action, repeated regularly enough, has a two fold purpose: First, to help the recipient country; secondly, to keep our industries going since with those gifts, foreign countries buy more from Canada.

If gifts to foreign countries contribute to the progress of our national economy, all the more would gifts to Canadians have the same results, affording at the same time a little comfort to families.

If new gifts promote the development of foreign countries, let us allow our own people to take advantage of the same methods.

Mr. Speaker, in order to give a new impetus to the national economy, I take the liberty of suggesting the amount of the gifts that will have to be made to all Canadians without income, namely $30 a month to all youngsters, from birth up to 12 years old, $60 a month to all students from 12 to 18 years of age, and $100 a month to all other citizens without any income, including mothers.

All hon. members who understand the meaning of the gifts to foreign countries will recognize that the gift approach is the only method which can so far ensure that a minimum income is paid without resulting in an increase in taxes, prices, or the cost of living, both for individuals and companies.

This method alone under which a purchasing power is guaranteed to the unemployed without any other source of income can replace, in my view, all family and personal allowances programs, as well as the Canada and the Quebec pensions plans, including the welfare allowances which have become as expensive as they are disgraceful.

The people who produce the national wealth have the right to tell the ministers and their elected representatives how to distribute production in the interests of all Canadian citizens, and not only to ensure superabundance to a few, to the prejudice of others who lack the necessities of life.

In short, Mr. Speaker, I dare hope that all hon. members who wish to better the lot of their constituents will give me their support.

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I think that I can give satisfaction to the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin), who hopes that several members will support him. In fact I am one of those who will support him.

I believe that the need for a guaranteed income system was felt in Canada for many years. However, let me tell you that the motion of the hon. member for Portneuf has a serious weakness, since it purports to restrict the guaranteed minimum income allowances to the unemployed Canadian citizens. Therefore, such a system would not apply to the poor workers, no more than the existing welfare programs. It would be almost identical to the present programs based on a means test.

Mr. Speaker, the tremendous economic growth experienced by Canada after the second world war could leave many people under the impression that as our gross national product would increase, the problem of poverty would gradually lose its importance. However, the facts have shown the contrary.

The real per capita revenue has increased noticeably, but a good number of the people have not benefited enough to get rid of poverty. The affluent society is more and more conspicuous for the poor, but the rich, to a great extent, remain unmoved by the predicament of the poor.

Guaranteed Minimum Income

During the past years, we have become more and more aware of the persistence of poverty in Canada. If we are not more sensibilized to the problem, perhaps it is partly due to the fact that we keep believing that poverty means full deprivation. In other words, the threshold of poverty has often been considered as the level of minimum physical sustenance, providing one with just enough to be able to live and work.

Human needs, however, also involve many conventional or social features related to the changes in the way of life of the community. Obviously, these features change with time. For instance, more and more people are now becoming aware of the fact that many people are poor because they are deprived of income, of job opportunities, of the environment and the self-respect, which are considered normal in the community. Poverty should therefore be considered as a fact related to the average standard of living, which is constantly developing. This, however, does not preclude isolated cases of utter destitution.

The tentative evaluation of poverty which appears in the fifth annual Report of the Economic Council of Canada shows that about four million Canadians may be considered as living at or below the poverty level. Preliminary estimates for 1967 involve 840,000 families and 586,000 single persons, adding up to some 3,850,000 people.

The data provided by the Canada Assistance Plan and the Old Age Security Program show that out of this number, almost two million people are now receiving an income supplement based on a means or needs test, or an income supplement to the old age security pensions. In spite of that, their income remains below the poverty level.

We can therefore conclude from the Economic Council figures that most of the remaining two million persons belong to families of small wage-earners who belong to the labour force but whose income is below the poverty level.

We will therefore note that there are now in Canada more than four million men, women and children who live in poverty compared to their fellow citizens. Some, if not all of them, are inadequately housed, fed, undereducated, deprived of leisure and frustrated even in their own sense of dignity. Most of them can be fitted into one of three main categories, the first of which includes the people on welfare.

[Mr. Guilbault.]

Mr. Speaker, the term "welfare" has become a bitter one for more than a million persons who rely on the system. Benefits vary considerably from one province to another, but in practically all cases, they fail to meet the actual needs of the recipients. People in receipt of relief feel stigmatized. They are often fearful and scornful of the local welfare officials because of the great power they wield and because of their often irrevocable decisions. That category is made up mostly of mothers without husbands either as a result of desertion, death or divorce. Disabled persons, a great number of whom are totally unable to fend for themselves, also belong to this category.

Another class belonging to this category are the older people. The economic situation of the aged in Canada is amply evidenced by the fact that 52 per cent, or almost 750,000 of those on welfare, are eligible, either partially or fully, to the guaranteed minimum income.

For a good many of those elderly people the guaranteed income supplement does not provide decent living conditions. And yet most of them cannot get the advantages provided by the Canada Assistance Plan. It should be pointed out that a relatively small number of elderly people who are living in a state of poverty receive some supplementary assistance through the provinces.

Those I call the working poor are another category of needy people. More than two million people fall into this category. A good many of them note bitterly that in spite of all their efforts to succeed in supporting themselves their lot is actually worse than that of their fellow-citizens who are not working and get welfare payments. Those people sometimes earn their low income from marginal industries, from jobs on farms, from work done as woodcutters or as fishermen. It may be also that they live in economically underprivileged areas where they can find part-time or low-paying jobs only. They are also found in big cities with a very high cost of living and where they manage somehow to make both ends meet with an income in the neighborhood of the minimum salary.

But the motion presented by the hon. member for Portneuf does not provide for any benefit for those two million people who live, in spite of the fact that they work, in a state of poverty. I should like to add, in this connection, that this motion is not that much different from existing provincial welfare schemes.

Bachelors and married people with no children are not as a rule eligible to the various programs designed to meet the needs of particular classes of people. Still, it was expected that the unemployment insurance program would apply to all persons actually in need. But we note that, at the provincial level, welfare programs have not generally taken into account the needs of the low wage earners, that is what I call the category of poor workers.

Everyone knows that, generally speaking, poor workers are not entitled to social welfare benefits under present regulations. This situation prevails despite the fact that, under the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan or of the agreements concluded with the provinces pursuant to that Plan, there is absolutely no restrictions concerning the federal share of the costs of assistance to full-time workers.

Some provinces are determinedly against financial assistance as the basis of the general policy for full-time employees; other provinces do not reject it. However, the principle of granting financial assistance is extremely limited in those provinces and benefits are usually available only to the families which experience severe hardships.

The proposal of giving welfare allowances to full-time workers naturally raises the much debate question of determining reasons, more particularly so when it is considered with regard to the application of adequate forms of assistance to people who are unable to work. The objection is often raised that the fact of providing those who are unable to work with a satisfactory allowance can dampen the sense of independence of the recipients who are partly able to work and of those full-time workers who could not earn more than what the assistance brings. That is the basic dilemma.

If the welfare systems provide adequate assistance for the unemployables and give identical help to employable recipients, but without any income exemption, the latter will not be encouraged to work: any income arising out of a job only reduces the amount of benefits and leaves no advantage to someone who works.

If employable individuals are granted partial income exemptions beyond a basic adequate level, not only a huge expenditure of public funds will be necessary to help those whose income is lower than that level, but the systems will then apparently be subsidizing the small wage-earners. If to give an incentive to work to employable individuals, a certain form of guaranteed income lower than an adequate minimum level is applied, the difficulty remains as far as the determination of an adequate income for the unemployables is concerned.

For two years now the federal government has been carrying out a reappraisal of its social security programs and of their objectives in order to decide which method among those that I have just mentioned, or which combination of methods, would be more in harmony with the aims of social security in the future. A close analysis of the costs and consequences of each method is necessary.

In the throne speech last fall, as hon. members will recall, the government announced the preparation of a white paper on social security to be tabled in the House during the current session. That document will make known the results of the reappraisal that has been underway for the past two years. It will give the federal government an opportunity to make known its views and its intentions in this field. It will also allow for a general discussion on the matters in question and for a dialogue with the public on the methods to be used with regard to income security in Canada in the next ten years.

I ask the government of Canada to include in this white paper proposals relating to the establishment of a guaranteed minimum income plan for Canadians.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, although there are one or two aspects of the motion now before us with which I must take exception, I should like as my first word to commend the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin) on bringing before us once again the question of a guaranteed income for the Canadian people. While I am in a mood to extend congratulations, may I also commend the hon. member for Saint-Jacques (Mr. Guilbault) on his insistence that our concern for those living in poverty should not be confined to persons and families on relief, social welfare and so on. He makes the point very well when he emphasizes that many people who are working are on incomes so low that they too are living in poverty. As a matter of fact, I suspect the figure he gave of four million Canadians really existing in poverty is probably a conservative one. I suggest this figure probably is five million or more.

However, Mr. Speaker, although I commend the hon. member for Portneuf for again bringing before us the question of the guaranteed income, even as I commend all hon. members who are interested in the problem of poverty, I must again say that I feel very strongly that we are not really comprehending the problem nor coming up with a solution when we talk about income guarantees that in effect are based on means or income tests. That, indeed, is my one quarrel with the motion placed before us by the hon. member for Portneuf, in that he wants this guaranteed minimum income, as he defines it, to be made available to every Canadian citizen "who is without work or other source of income." It seems to me that if we continue to think in terms of social assistance, social welfare, social security programs or what-have-you as having to be based on what people already have, based on whether or not they are at work, based on whether or not they have enough income, we are in effect keeping people in a category of poverty.

Hon. members are aware of the recent book by Ian Adams, entitled "Wall of Poverty". In it he has a chapter entitled—I think I have this correct although I do not have the book in front of me—"Keeping the poor that way." That is what concerns me about most of our approaches to the problem of poverty. We think of these people as the poor and so we must do something to help them; we do it out of kindness or compassion, or to keep the economy going. But we seem to assume they will still be the poor; they will still be in need of assistance. I submit that some day society will get wise to itself, and I do not see why we cannot start now and make to our people grants that are a form of guaranteed annual income without any reference to work, means tests or what-have-you.

There are in society many things in respect of which we do this already. We provide all our people with education. Oh, there are varying degrees of education that people get, depending upon their incomes, depending upon whether or not they can go up into the higher grades, to university and so on; but we provide it, and we boast of our society as one that provides education for all. We provide police and fire protection for all. We provide roads, highways and national defence. There are many things that are part of a society, and if you live in the society you are entitled to share in them.

I believe the day will come when we will say the same thing about a basic standard of living and about the number of dollars, the income, that is necessary so that everybody achieves that standard of living. We will grant everyone a basic income and let the income tax take it back from the wealthy. We started to move in that directiotn with respect to the old age security pension back in 1950 or 1951 when we provided a pension to everyone of a certain age regardless of his means or other income.

We retreated a bit when we added the guaranteed income supplement and put it on a means test basis. But I submit that it is still true that some of the sting that used to go with old age, when the old age pension was on a means test basis, has been taken out because there is this money available to everyone. That is what I want to see, not just for our senior citizens but for all groups in society.

Indeed, I think that a practical way to do this is to start with one group and move on to another. I would like to see a guaranteed income provided first of all to our senior citizens. I do not mean a guaranteed minimum income based on means; I do not mean a guaranteed income supplement—I mean raising the basic $75 to $150 and giving it to everyone, across the board.

I think our veterans group is another in respect of which we could practice the principle of a guaranteed income for all without regard to means or to other income. Then perhaps the next area is our families. Although people say that family allowances do not play the part that they did when they were brought in in 1945, this is a way of providing certain basic guarantees of income to all our family units regardless of the other income that people may have, regardless of whether they have jobs or not, and therefore family allowances should be increased. Mr. Speaker, that is the point I want to make, that providing a guaranteed income means granting it across the board, without any means or income test.

People ask about the cost of these things. Of course these programs cost money, but my hon. friend from Portneuf—even though he may have put it in words that the rest of us say is Social Credit jargon—is awfully close to the truth when he says we can provide things out of our gross national product. What is it that we want to provide? Do we want lots of filling stations, tall office buildings, great bank buildings and affluence of that kind; affluence for a few at the top—or do we want the purpose of our gross national product first and foremost to be a guaranteed income for all our people? I believe it can be done. I believe it will have to be done.

I do not want to be accused of trying to paraphrase something a great man once said, but I think it is true that society, whether it is ours in Canada or that of the world around us, cannot go on half well-off and half poor, half secure and half insecure. If we are to hold together any kind of unity, any kind of society, certain things will have to be shared and enjoyed equally by all our people. I think the way to get this kind of thing started is to work for a guaranteed income. As I say, I would pick out certain groups as the first ones, such as senior citizens, veterans, and families.

The day of this kind of social security will come, and I do not think we should resist it by saying that it is futuristic or by going along with this gobbledegook about selective programs of social security and social welfare. That is turning the clock back, Mr. Speaker, and we do not want that. We want to move ahead into the kind of society that is possible in the future. Why does the future always have to be so far out in front, especially when you consider that in the meantime, as my hon. friend from Saint-Jacques (Mr. Guilbault) has said, four million or five million people in this great country of Canada, with all the wealth we are producing, are living in poverty today? It is not good enough. A guaranteed income could solve it, and I welcome the fact that the hon. member for Portneuf has asked us to do some thinking about this question again today.

• (5:40 p.m.)

Mr. Aurélien Noël (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to my colleague, the hon. member for Saint-Jacques (Mr. Guilbeault), who pointed out the following flaw in the motion proposed by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin), and I quote:

—every Canadian citizen who is without work or other source of income.

This is too restrictive.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) himself drew our attention to the matter when he said that this yearly income should not only be granted to unemployed Canadian citizens. As my hon. colleague pointed out, there are a lot of employed people whose income is below the subsistence level.

If we further analyse the motion moved by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin), we note the following and I quote:

—that the amount required for the payment of the guaranteed minimum income be derived from the national product so as to increase neither the taxes—

I simply do not understand that proposal. How can we make available to Canadians without income, capital or work the national product? It needs always to be transformed to some extent so that the Canadian citizens can avail himself of it. I do not understand that at all.

Further on the motion says:

—be derived from the national product so as to increase neither the taxes on individuals and companies, nor the cost of living, nor the price of any product or service;

This seems to me quite fantastic. I continue:

—this measure could, with advantage, replace the contributions and payments of all the systems of unemployment insurance, social welfare, family and personal allowances, Canada Pensions and Quebec Pensions.

Thus it is a matter of getting rid of all that has been done for several years to help the poor who have special needs. We are going to demolish everything in order to rebuild. I know some people today who call for destruction, especially in the province of Quebec. Would it be another form of demolition? I do not think that such was the intention of the hon. member who sponsored the motion.

This motion implies that the provinces are all agreed about it. This is an illusion. All the same!

Though I am in favour of the government supplying the Canadian people with guarantees against poverty and also in favour of improving the present system, I cannot, however, endorse the four points specifically and implicitly included in the motion.

Let us examine the first argument. The program would be financed, as proposed, out of the national product, without increasing taxes or the cost of living. The motion suggests that the national product can provide the necessary funds to cover the substantial increase in expenditures without necessarily boosting individual or corporations taxes the cost of living or the price of goods or services. In my opinion, these objectives cannot be achieved in practice; in short, they are unobtainable so to speak.

I just cannot imagine how such a tremendous increase in expenditures could be financed except by an over-all increase in the personal and corporate income tax, the sales tax, by taking over credits allowed to other government programs, by making loans, by depreciating our currency, through some rearrangements of the above mentioned proposals, or, finally, by putting the printing press to work making bank notes.

All these factors could put pressure on costs and prices and bring about a drop in real income. Then, it would be very difficult, if not impossible, to reach the goals mentioned in this motion.

Canada is not as rich a country as some of its citizens seem to think. Supported by a rising tide of all kinds of aspirations, since the Second World War, various groups in our society expect that the community will enable them to realize these aspirations, whatever they are, and they contend that the community has the financial capacity to do so. On the other hand, it is well known that all taxpayers object to the general level of taxes. This has been forcefully demonstrated here by the spontaneous outcry of several individuals when the white paper was submitted. The level of taxes has to be particularly taken into consideration when they are to be increased.

As far as possible, funds which are already paid into the system should be distributed to the poor in the fairest way possible. But those funds are not sufficient.

To respond in a practical and fair way to the challenge of poverty, Canada will have to find additional funds, in addition to those which already support our social security system. The resources already allotted to the system must, as far as possible, be distributed to the poor and new funds must be contributed in order to achieve this main, priority goal.

Mr. Speaker, I said "as far as possible" and this leads me to criticize a second argument of the motion which I cannot accept. It deals with the proposal that the guaranteed minimum income should replace the contributions and payments of all the systems of unemployment insurance, social welfare, family and personal allowances, including Canada Pensions and Quebec Pensions.

Before discussing the replacement of all the present income supplement systems we should again examine their purposes. It is advisable to recall the objectives of the income supplement programs. Some of them are devised so as to provide for an income supplement intended to help out poor people under certain economic circumstances and to prevent impoverishment. Others are designed to protect all citizens against the loss of income incurred from social risks which affect all citizens and not only the poor; some of them are even so designed as to redistribute income to the disadvantaged people of our society.

Canadian social security programs have been set up to fight poverty and to bring in social insurance. As far as poverty is concerned they have been meant to ascertain a strict minimum income to those who have not or hardly the means of supporting themselves, and as far as social insurance is concerned, they are made to protect people against certain social risks.

Unemployment insurance has been established to provide all contributors and members of the labour force with a short-term unemployment income irrespective of their annual income. It fills in for the salary lost momentarily on account of unemployment, without the recipient being required to earn an income lower than the poverty-line level. One of the purposes of the Canada Pension Plan and the old age security program is to provide an income supplement to the old, the disabled and widows regardless of any income they may receive.

Workmen's compensation is designed to provide for income maintenance and health services arising from accidents suffered at work or industrial diseases. The maximum levels of support are more generous than would be the case under a system of guaranteed minimum income. Consequently, the legislation implementing a guaranteed annual income program to replace the existing programs should be carefully considered in order to determine its effect on the social and economic goals achieved by several of the existing programs.

It is necessary to take into account the technical and the political aspects of the results ensuing from the substitution of the guaranteed annual income for the existing programs. For some programs, the substitution would be relatively simple; for others it would be extremely complicated, not to mention the political problems it would create.

From the technical standpoint, it would be relatively easy to replace the family allowance plan but, from the political standpoint, it might give rise to strong objections on the part of those who would stand to lose if the current program were abandoned. Families with an income over a certain level would no longer get these allowances nor would they be entitled to the maintenance income provided under the guaranteed minimum income scheme.

Replacing the unemployment insurance program would create a certain number of problems. Owing to some commitments too costly for their standard of living, unemployed people with an annual income above the prescribed limit on minimum income may have an urgent need for a short-term maintenance income, even though these people are usually above the poverty level.

The abolition of unemployment insurance would suddenly deprive some workers with an average income of a type of protection which they now get and to which they have contributed for a period of years. In order to overcome the difficulty, the unemployment insurance plan should not be replaced but be made part of the entire guaranteed income scheme. The minimum guaranteed income should be available to those who are at or below the basic income level, but those who are in the higher income brackets and who are unemployed should receive a proportional supplement.

The substitution of the annual guaranteed income system for the old age security scheme would cause serious problems to those who have an income higher than the basic level of maintenance income. Most of the people who receive life annuities from a private enterprise made it part of old age security. Many retired persons or some who are on the verge of retirement are convinced that an old age pension will be paid to them as soon as they reached retirement age. It is distressing to think that 40 per cent of older persons might be in such a situation and would not get a pension, because their income exceeded the standards of basic income, more especially since several have been paying a special tax for old age pension since 1952.

One could dwell at length on the implicit contents of the resolution. I cannot agree, because the motion on the whole does not apparently take into account the fact that the central government cannot act alone in determining a guaranteed annual income without consulting the provinces beforehand. It is an important constitutional problem which the motion overlooks. Social assistance, in whatever form it is implemented, is an extremely complex problem which must be studied thoroughly. It is not good enough to promote the idea and then say that everything will turn out well.

The replacement or the integration of the Canada Pension Plan or the Quebec Pension Plan would surely cause difficulties in respect of contractual commitments to contributors in every province. As in the case of unemployment insurance, the purpose of the Canada Pension Plan or the Quebec Pension Plan is to provide additional income to people in all income brackets who would not bother to provide against a rainy day.

It would be very difficult to replace that goal by a formula which would bring a maintenance income only to lower income groups.

The motion also suggests that the present social welfare plan be abolished and that the funds be made available for a federal guaranteed minimum income scheme. On the one hand, this proposal does not mention that 50 per cent of contributions to these plans come from provincial and municipal governments, which could well decide to use these amounts for other purposes if a federal guaranteed income plan were created. On the other hand, it does not take into consideration the likelihood that social assistance programs based on needs of citizens must be maintained, even if a federal guaranteed income plan were to be implemented.

I presume that the federal government would not be able to distinguish between the citizens in urban areas and those in rural areas, where the cost of living is high or not. I also suppose that we would have to guarantee a certain level of income according to the number of members in a family, regardless of the area, the city or the place where these people want to live.

I believe this would be a very costly proposition. As a matter of fact, a great deal of money would be needed to guarantee a minimum income to everybody, to enable them to live in an adequate and dignified manner in metropolitan areas like Montreal or Toronto. This minimum income would have to be fixed in terms of the needs of people of average income.

If this assumption is correct, the income level that we could guarantee to people in Toronto and Montreal would undoubtedly be inadequate to support families. Therefore, some families would need additional assistance which could not be granted to them under a standard system of minimum payments established for all Canadian people.

Some people may need special diets, drugs, apparatus, supervision or services which cannot be provided under the guaranteed minimum income plan. It will then be necessary to establish special social welfare programs in addition to the payment of a guaranteed minimum income to all unfortunate families who live in areas where the cost of living is high and the minimum income inadequate. I cannot believe that all the social programs would simply disappear if a yearly guaranteed income plan was established.

Finally, my colleague from Saint-Jacques pointed out that the motion is too restrictive, that it applies only to unemployed people or to those without capital. I shall, therefore, spare the House the few remarks that I had prepared on that subject.

This is a very complex problem and, as my colleague from Saint-Jacques has just said, the government is giving active consideration to it. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has said, we all want a more equitable distribution of riches, but the question is to find the means of insuring a fair, rational and efficient distribution of all such resources.

[English]

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I see I have 30 seconds left before the supper adjournment. I should simply like to say that I regret very much not having had the opportunity of putting my personal views or those of my party on record during the discussion on this matter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FISHERIES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING "CLOSE TIME", DEPOSITING OF WASTE, MARINE PLANTS, ETC.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Davis that Bill C-204, to amend the Fisheries Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

[Mr. Noël.]

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, at five o'clock I was referring to the concern that I and many other people have about the effects of two very serious forms of pollution—pollution from the possibilities of offshore drilling for oil on the continental shelf on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, and the consequences of a major mishap at sea as a result of the construction of large oil refineries on our coasts.

I was referring to an oil refinery which is to be built at Placentia Bay, Newfoundland. It is to have a production capacity of 100,000 barrels. I repeat that we have arrived at a point where the government must make some decisions. The time has come when we must choose between offshore oil drilling and the conservation of our fishing resources on the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts. I refer especially to the Atlantic coast and the great Grand Banks fisheries which produce so much of the world protein and where at the present time a number of major United States oil companies are conducting experimental drilling operations. Substantial amounts of money are being spent with a view to developing the known oil resources on the continental shelf.

One of the great authorities on the consequences of oil pollution, and one of the few recognized authorities in Canada, is Dr. Richard E. Warner, a professor on the staff of Memorial University of Newfoundland. He has written a very definitive paper on oil pollution, which I commend to the minister. I wish to put on the record Dr. Warner's recommendations which were made as the result of considerable study on the subject:

Recommendation 1: instigation of a biologically and oceanographically oriented research program in the North Atlantic and the coastal regions of eastern Canada with special reference to seabirds and other important marine species.

Recommendation 2: instigation of a research program into the biological effects of marine oil pollution upon the hyponeuston, or the surface and immediate subsurface biotic community which is so critical to the continued productivity of the oceans.

Recommendation 3: instigation of a research program into the biological effects of oils in arctic and subarctic waters.

Recommendation 4: carrying out of a national survey to identify sites of special importance, leading to development of critical area protection programs.

Recommendation 5: instigation of a research program into the biological effects of present and proposed refinery and petrochemical plant operations—

He cites as examples the oil refinery in Holyrood, Newfoundland, and the proposed oil refinery and petrochemical complex to be built at Come-by-Chance in Placentia Bay, Newfoundland.

Recommendation 6: development of a truly effective national system for locating, reporting, and identifying the sources of oil pollution circumstances.

Recommendation 7: development of a national contingency program.

The need for such a contingency program is very dramatically borne out by the Arrow disaster off Nova Scotia and the opening up of the Northwest Passage to supertankers.

Recommendation 8: development of national criteria for environmental protection, to be included in all oil leases, construction contracts and other agreements where the activity presents some probability of risk to the environment.

Presumably one of the important amendments in the legislation now before us will give the minister authority to implement a recommendation such as this. I think it is a very important recommendation.

Recommendation 9: improvement of international co-ordination and communications.

That is a very important recommendation, Mr. Speaker, especially since we share this continent with the great industrial giant to our south, which is responsible for most of the pollution of the environment of our western hemisphere. Indeed, there is an urgent necessity for the government to enter into negotiations and discussions with the United States with a view to having a meaningful treaty on continental pollution. This could cover oil and other forms of pollution.

It is not enough for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) to get up in the House and say that he is going to meet with the U.S. Undersecretary of State. We require a conference of our two governments at the ministerial level at which the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis), who has considerable responsibility in this area, could play a very important role. The Minister of Fisheries probably has more responsibility in prevention of pollution than any other minister of the government, including the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Transport, (Mr. Jamieson), although a special case can be made for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) because of the peculiarities covered by the Northern Inland Waters Act.

The Minister of Transport has assumed certain responsibilities in connection with pollution. He represented Canada at the Brussels conference last year and will presumably be presenting legislation to the House. As far as he and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources are concerned, we feel they should take second place to the Minister of Fisheries. We believe even more strongly that the proposed Canada Water Act now before Parliament should be withdrawn in favour of a Fisheries Act which places responsibility where it belongs, that is to say, in the hands of the Minister of Fisheries. We understand that the minister has been unable to convince his colleagues in the cabinet sufficiently in connection with the seriousness of the responsibilities he bears. We wish him every success and we intend to continue to press for the withdrawal of the Canada water legislation.

With regard to international agreements, reference has already been made by my hon. friend from South Shore (Mr. Crouse) to the conference which is being promoted by the province of Ontario. Eight Great Lakes states of the United States and two or three of our provinces which border on the Great Lakes are to be represented at this conference which presumably will be the first step toward cleaning up the situation. The government of Ontario has in this instance assumed an initiative which should have been shown by the federal government a long time ago.

Now that the conference has been called, I hope the government of Canada will take advantage of this opportunity which has been presented to it by entering into discussions with Washington to make sure that the government of the United States is represented at the conference by a senior member of the United States cabinet. I hope, too, that the Canadian government will be represented by the Minister of Fisheries and that as a consequence of this conference a consensus will be reached on the basis of which a treaty between Canada and the United States will be possible. This, to my mind, is the only logical and effective way in which control measures on this continent can be implemented.

I trust the conference will be furnished with all the knowledge and expertise which the two countries have at their disposal.

There is the Canadian experience in connection with the Arrow disaster, and our experience in Arctic waters generally, then there is the experience of our American friends in connection with the disastrous Santa Barbara spill and the recent spill off the coast of Louisiana. I trust there will be correlation of ideas leading to a meaningful consensus so that we can effectively implement the controls so necessary to free our environment from pollution.

Pollution is becoming a popular subject. In this Parliament we have seen that a number of ministers are anxious to get into the act and follow the lead given by the public. As I said before, we feel strongly that the responsibility for dealing effectively with water pollution should rest with the Minister of Fisheries and that the government, recognizing the inadequacy and redundancy of the Canada Water Act, should withdraw it in favour of a strengthened Fisheries Act which will enable the Minister of Fisheries to deal with pollution not only in our streams and lakes but of our coastal waters both in the east and in the west.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to spend a few minutes this evening discussing one or two points which have been raised by other speakers, among them the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis).

I have gone over the bill with considerable interest. It deals with water pollution generally and the work which the Department of Fisheries will be called upon to do, or should be doing, to prevent water pollution in all its forms. Looking through the bill, we find that in some instances the act has been strengthened. I would certainly support regulations which added a few teeth to some of the enforcement methods at the disposal of the department, because we need them. I am surprised, however, that the minister should try to tell the House that the enforcement capacity of his department has been improved by this legislation. The very opposite is the case. I call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the clause which deals with the Canada Water Act, and to the clause which withdraws the jurisdiction of the Department of Fisheries from waters which are to be quality management areas under the act to which I have referred. Mr. Speaker, this legislation does not make sense as far as enforcement is concerned. It is amazing to me that the minister and his department should ever have agreed to amendments to the legislation which would allow the worst polluted waters in Canada to be removed from their jurisdiction. I shall give the House an example of what could happen. For example, there is a move afoot to make the Lower Fraser River a quality management area. The Fraser River is, possibly the greatest salmon stream in the world. We are facing a situation in which jurisdiction can be taken away from the Department of Fisheries and its expert staff of biologists and placed in the hands of whatever group is elected to manage the water quality area concerned. If my interpretation of the bill is correct, this is exactly what will take place.

What will happen if there are two or three water quality management areas on the Fraser River? I realize there are regulations governing salmon spawning, but what will happen is that there will be little groups controlling the greatest salmon spawning river on the continent. Indeed, this sort of thing will happen all across Canada. The areas of jurisdiction that the Fisheries Department and the minister and his staff should be responsible for have been taken away from them. Instead of putting more teeth into the act in this respect, I suggest we are losing ground. A small group will be set up in a water quality management area with the right to set its own standards, with the right to lower standards in the river if it wants to. It could set its own effluent fees and the Fisheries Department would have precious little to do with it, though it might have somebody on the board to whom it could speak.

The minister told the House this afternoon that the government is trying to do away with pollution havens, and that the act was a step in the right direction. The minister referred to areas where industries could vie with one another by lowering pollution standards, thus attracting other industry. In my opinion, this bill is a move in the opposite direction. Large areas of the river, as I see it, will be removed from the control of the Fisheries Department, according to the act. These areas will be removed from the jurisdiction of the department. I am rather disappointed that the minister and his staff have allowed an amendment like this to come forward in view of the damage I think it may do over the years.

I have a great deal of respect for the minister, who I know is keenly interested in pollution problems. He has the most efficient and best trained staff in the federal field to handle pollution problems. But according to the particular section I am talking about, we will lose the expertise in this particular area. I know of no way around this problem unless it be to move an amendment, as I hope will be the case. I also hope the minister will look at this provision, and if I am wrong I should like the point I have raised to be clarified. As far as Canada is concerned, this is a very serious problem.

Let me talk for a moment about the St. Lawrence Seaway, the Great Lakes and all the streams that pour their waters into the Great Lakes system. Numerous water quality management basins will be established on streams that flow into the Great Lakes system. The minister need not tell this House that there is any wide, broad national standard applied in these areas, because such will not be the case. There will be a wide variation of standards. A few months ago the minister was advocating—and I agree with his theory—that we in Canada need broad national standards from one end of the country to the other. He said we were going to tell industry that it could not move from one province to another or from one area to another with lower pollution standards.

Although we talk about ending pollution havens, we are setting up pollution havens in Canada as a result of the implementation of the Canada Water Act, this legislation and other legislation that goes hand in hand with it. It is time the members of this House, particularly cabinet members, recognized the problem facing Canada and did something about it. Unless changes are made, and made before the legislation is finalized, once more Canada will be presented with a hodge-podge of legislation that will not clean up pollution for the Canadian people.

As I say, I am disappointed to see an amendment of this type to the Fisheries Act which seeks to remove from the jurisdiction of the Fisheries Department those sections of waterway that are mostly badly polluted and need the attention and expertise of the minister's department. I contend that this sort of legislation basically is not good.

Let me put another case to the minister. Take the case of a waterway which is a water quality management area and into which a large number of industrial plants are dumping effluent, including perhaps mercury. According to this legislation the minister's department will be unable to take action. The department will be told to keep away because this is a matter that falls within the jurisdiction of the Canada Water Act. But eventually this effluent will move downstream to the point where the department does become involved. If this is not a piecemeal and foolish approach to Canada's water problems, then I do not know what is. I am amazed that the government has not found a better way to solve the problem.

I realize that you cannot have too many jurisdictions involving themselves with the problem, but I agree in the position taken by the minister over a number of years that the best vehicle for handling water pollution in Canada is the Fisheries Act. A few simple amendments to this legislation would allow the department to stop pollution by industry. It could stop pollution at the factory fence and would perhaps go much further and be far more effective than some of the legislation that is being handed to us as a consequence of the Canada Water Act. It irks me to realize that in an attempt to solve the problem we are probably creating even more hazards than we had before.

Some of the amendments have toughened up the regulations and increased the amount of fines in those areas in which the Fisheries Department still operates. The minister has stated that this is a vehicle that is national in scope, but I suggest it cannot be national in scope when huge chunks of the department's jurisdiction are being cut away. The work of the Fisheries Department is being fragmented as never before. As I say, I am amazed that the minister, his departmental heads and the government have not realized this and put a stop to it.

I shall now say a few words about pollution in general. Other members have touched on this subject. I shall not go over all the points which have been raised by various members. Some members have covered the different clauses and dealt with them in more detail. I believe they have covered these very well. The criticism offered this afternoon and evening in respect of the various clauses of the bill is given in the hope that when the bill returns to the House for third reading some changes will have taken place in respect of its over-all drafting.

Pollution has become a major problem. There is the problem concerning mercury. Again, I shall not go into it in detail. What amazes me in respect of mercury poisoning in Canada is that industries in general pour a large amount of mercury into our rivers and streams. They have been doing this for years, and nothing has been done to stop it. It would seem that no monitoring has been carried out by the various departments. They could not have been doing a proper job. There is no doubt that for years our fishing streams have been polluted. No doubt, also, some of the product used locally and exported has contained substantial amounts of mercury. Then suddenly it is found that mercury is affecting the fish in the Saskatchewan River and a check is commenced. When the checking is completed we will possibly find many more sources of mercury poison than we suspected.

The point is, this situation never would have arisen had we been effectively and efficiently monitoring the effluents which are flowing into our streams and had the officials of all departments, including the Department of Fisheries and Forestry, been on their toes and using the regulations which had been laid down many years ago. In fact, there would not have been a pollution problem in Canada today.

I say frankly that the best department in this regard and the department which has done the most effective job in trying to stop pollution is the Department of Fisheries and Forestry under the present minister. I give the minister all the credit in the world. I would be extremely happy to see him in control of the whole pollution program for Canada, because I think he is interested and has the knowledge and dedication necessary to do the job. I say to the minister, however, that he will not be able to do the job with the type of legislation he has placed before us for second reading today.

I should like to return to one or two other points in connection with this subject. We have spoken of mercury generally. Someone mentioned oil a few moments ago and the tremendous problems we are having in this regard. There is the matter of pesticides and the industrial aspect of this question. This is an extremely serious matter. But again the minister in his effort to clean up the rivers and streams of this nation will be strapped and harassed at every turn because of one or two of what I consider to be foolish amendments contained in the present legislation.

There is one very good amendment in the legislation which extends the jurisdiction of the department in the coastal areas over aquatic plants. This is good. I believe it is a sound move. I can see nothing but good arising out of it. There are other clauses which deal with the 12-mile limit. I shall not discuss these simply because I believe the amendments are sound. I think they are a step in the right direction and again the department is to be congratulated for bringing in such legislation.

I know other members are interested in saying a few words about the legislation we are now debating. Before I sit down I should like to go a step further and mention the fragmentation of the authority which would be the result of the amendment to section 33 of the act. I consider this to be bad. I shall ask the minister and the officials of his department to take another look at it to see whether some of her amendment or some compromise can be made so that the Department of Fisheries and Forestry can remain active in respect of their regulations, expertise and control in these areas, because if this is not done this whole program could be in jeopardy.

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, at the beginning may I say I agree with the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding). We sat together on the committee which dealt with the Canada Water Act. Like him, I feel very strongly about certain things contained in this bill. I believe the Canada Water Act should not have precedence over the Fisheries Act.

This afternoon I listened with interest to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis). I should like to say that I do support this legislation. As I shall point out, I support most of the amendments. However, I have some reservations about the fact that the Fisheries Department would seem to be taking a back seat to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

On May 20, 1969, the minister advocated changes in the Fisheries Act. Personally, I would like to have seen these changes before the Canada Water Act was introduced. In any event, we have them now. As I say, this legislation is strong in parts and I support those parts which are strong. I concur also with the speech given this afternoon by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) and certain objections he had in respect of the bill. There are anomalies in this bill. On the one hand it is very strong in that basically it says we will allow the fish to live. On the other hand it says we will do this only if the Canada Water Act is effective. How many pollution bills have we had this session? Well, we had the Canada Water Act, the Northern Inland Waters Act and the Arctic pollution bill.

We have talked about amendments to the Canada Shipping Act, particularly with respect to pollution and the passage of ships through our waters. Now in this bill we have amendments to the Fisheries Act. In all we have at least ten departments concerned with pollution, and at least 25 other agencies of government having an interest in some aspects of pollution. Who has the ultimate responsibility for dealing with pollution? Again this year we have four or five departments introducing legislation to deal with pollution. Mr. Speaker, who has the ultimate responsibility?

I had hoped that the Department of Fisheries would have the ultimate responsibility for dealing with pollution, and my objection to Bill C-204 is that it does not give that department the ultimate responsibility. This bill does not take precedence over all other pollution legislation, and I believe it should. Why do I say it should take precedence over all other such legislation? It is because I think that the right to live, both of animals and of humans, should take precedence over everything else. We have a right to kill animals and fish only for food or to improve our means of livelihood.

This bill prohibits the depositing of waste in any waters frequented by fish. In that respect it is pretty strong. The early part of the bill is quite simple in that respect, and of course it defines waste in accordance with the terms in the Canada Water Act. To my mind the definition in this bill sets minimum national standards. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) does not believe that we can have the same standards applicable to all Canadian waters. However, this bill sets minimum national standards, which is something I have advocated. Other hon. members have advocated it. We discussed this point on second reading of the Canada Water Act, which is presently before the standing committee.

On January 15, 1970, speaking to the North Vancouver Chamber of Commerce, the Minister of Fisheries said:

> Our national goal is of course to keep Canada clean. But we have different problems in different industries. We have different industrial mixes in different areas and we have different aspirations regionally, provincially and locally across this great nation of ours. There is room for differences in other words, and the same standards and the same solutions may not always be applied in one part of the country as compared to another.
> One thing which we can probably agree upon is a set of minimum standards or goals. A minimum goal for water quality might be that living things can in fact survive. This would protect the essential nature of our Canadian ecosystem. It would protect our particular web of life. At least it should protect the higher orders of living things—people, most animals and lively fish like salmon and trout.

I agree with that, but it contradicts the objective of achieving national standards and goals. Under his legislation the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources will even allow fish to die in certain waters. He will allow pollution to come to such a point that fish will sometimes die, all because there are no minimum national standards, and therefore there will be different standards for different areas of water.

My main objection to Bill C-204 is that it depends too much on the provisions of Bill C-144 covering the Canada Water Act. I contend, as I said at the beginning, that the reverse should be the case. Bill C-144 should depend on Bill C-204 containing the amendments to the Fisheries Act, because all other departments and all other agencies dealing with pollution should act after consultation with the Department of Fisheries.

The Canada Water Act provides for the establishment of water management agencies. When it was introduced it was supposed to be the government's anti-pollution bill. Now the emphasis has been changed. Not the government says its purpose is to manage waters and that controlling pollution is just one part of the bill. But I remember that when the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, because of sickness, was not in full control of his department a Minister without Portfolio who introduced that bill clearly introduced it as an anti-pollution bill.

Bill C-144 is still in committee. We are waiting for the Minister to introduce amendments to it, because now we know it is absolutely too bureaucratic. It will provide for the establishment of the water management agencies that I have mentioned. This will be costly and it will take time. That bill is really irrelevant and useless in terms of Bill C-204. Some have said that so far as pollution is concerned, the government should withdraw Bill C-144. But it does have some good points. Under its provisions long-term goals can be set, but it will take years for it to become fully effective.

To my mind Bill C-204 amending the Fisheries Act should be the government's anti-pollution bill. I do not really believe that the Minister of Fisheries wishes to have his bill depend upon the effect of the Canada Water Act. Mr. Speaker, I want the Department of Fisheries to have the responsibility, not the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. On moving second reading this afternoon the Minister of Fisheries said that the fisheries are entirely a matter of federal responsibility and that the Fisheries Act applies to all Canadian waters. The Fisheries Act is the key to the control of pollution because it does apply to all Canadian waters.

The minister has said that as far as pollution is concerned, living resources may well be our first line of defence. If this is true, it is no justification for the introduction of the Canada Water Act which I believe was only for political reasons introduced because the public was becoming aroused on the subject. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether the government really wants to do something about pollution? To be fair, I feel that it does, but for some odd reason it does not want to tackle the problem as a whole. Already this year five departments have introduced legislation dealing with pollution whilst another ten deal with it in other legislation.

Up to now the debate has been mainly concerned with water pollution, and naturally the Fisheries Act is mainly concerned with this aspect of the problem. But what about air pollution and soil pollution? In the areas of water management and water pollution, the Canada Water Act was supposed to do away with the bureaucratic and jurisdictional maze existing in various departments. As a member of the committee I have listened to many briefs and have repeatedly heard the remark, "It will take years for the Canada Water Act to become effective." This afternoon the minister said that he hoped this bill would be an immediate tool to deal with pollution whilst we are waiting for the Canada Water Act to come into effect. Mr. Speaker, if this bill can deal with our immediate problem, surely it can deal with all our problems.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Comeau: Must we wait for the Canada Water Act before the Fisheries Act amendments can become effective? If so, the Fisheries and Forestry Committee will require explanations. If it does have to wait for the Canada Water Act, then I suggest we have either to amend this legislation, Bill C-204, or the Canada Water Act, Bill C-144. Had the government known that the Canadian public would have become as interested in pollution matters, I believe they would have tackled the problem differently at the start. Now they seem to be caught in some sort of web. They have introduced the Canada Water Act as an anti-pollution bill but now realize it is not sufficient and that we need other amendments to complement it. They realize that there is an overlapping of departments, that a great bureaucracy is being created and that nobody is being really concerned with the over-all problem.

We still have air and we still have soil. Just the other day I listened to a television program referring to the efforts of the United States, stressing the need for a national body dealing with pollution in general. The problems of air and water pollution are inseparable. If we do not allow refuse to go in the water, the alternative is to burn it—and then there is an air pollution problem, so the whole thing is interrelated.

The Progressive Conservative Party has suggested many times that there should be a strong federal abatement policy to co-ordinate, to plan and to have ultimate responsibility in dealing with pollution. We have been advocating a need for co-ordinating action in pollution control and we have repeatedly proposed the establishment of a single federal agency called the Canada pollution abatement commission which would report to Parliament through one minister. This agency would have the single purpose of providing technical and financial assistance in pollution control to existing agencies in the federal, provincial, municipal and industrial fields. The purpose of the agency would be to undertake research programs and to co-ordinate existing programs. It could also provide emergency information and assistance where required. Some people even advocate a department of environmental control. This idea has some merit, though I do not know whether it is really necessary.

Mr. Speaker, will the bill before us deal with situations such as the recent Arrow incident? Will the Department of Transport still have to look after such incidents? Will the Department of Transport be concerned about the fish in Chedabucto Bay? Just last summer a tanker can aground off the coast in my riding. I immediately made representations to the Department of Fisheries to send an inspector in order to make sure there was no oil leakage and that the lobster grounds were not contaminated. The department reassured me on these points. I did not take the matter up with the Department of Transport because I thought the Department of Fisheries should look after it. The bill before us should take the lead, Mr. Speaker, and it should not depend on the Canada Water Act nor the Northern Inland Waters Act. Water pollution should be dealt with by the Department of Fisheries. As the minister has repeatedly stated, we should allow the fish to live.

I repeat that I support the part of the bill that is strong; but I wonder, if we can act immediately on water pollution under this bill, why we cannot act permanently under it. Clause 5 of the bill deals with marine plants, and I commend that section which I have studied with great interest. It is of particular interest to me because in my area there is a great Irish moss harvesting industry. This legislation was probably introduced in consultation with the provincial Minister of Fisheries, Hon. John Buchanan, because he is very concerned about it.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I reiterate that I support those parts of the bill that are strong. I hope the committee will amend it so that it will take precedence over all other bills and the Department of Fisheries will have effective control in dealing with pollution. I believe the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry is sincere and I hope he does not have to wait until Bill C-144 becomes law.

I hope he can go at it himself and take the initiative, as he did in the past couple of years when dealing with a matter that affected the fishery in certain parts of Canada. I agree with the minister that we have the necessary tools to deal with pollution and that we really need these amendments or changes. Of course, we need a great deal of money to put them into effect.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I suppose it is almost totally unnecessary for every member of my particular political bent to take part in the debate going on at the moment. I listened to three of my colleagues and a number of other hon. gentlemen take part in the debate. Having listened with great interest to my colleagues, I can say that I have been more than interested in the totality of their remarks which have covered the situation entirely. Having said that, I suppose I ought to sit down. However, I concur in all those remarks, especially in those of the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) who made one of the best speeches I have heard in the House in a long, long time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lundrigan: He stated very definitely the opinion of the party he represents and exactly the views that I myself hold. It is interesting to examine this piece of legislation before us, Bill C-204. I believe we now have four ministers in the act; we have a front-line of four in the House. I have been trying to figure out how the other members of the cabinet could in some way or other find some constitutional excuse to become involved with legislation in the area of pollution. What will the Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans) do to become involved in this field? What will the Solicitor General (Mr. McIlraith) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) do? There must be some areas these ministers can move into with respect to pollution legislation. It seems it is the "in" thing now for ministers to bring in legislation in this particular area. It is as popular for ministers to move into this area as the yoyo was a few years ago.

I am not going to be critical of the bill; I think it is a good bill. It is a very simple piece of legislation; there is very little new in it. I guess the minister would be quick to point out, if I were to say there is nothing new in it, that it gives the minister a jump on the polluter in the sense that he can now demand that the potential polluter be forced to adopt certain procedures before causing pollution, whereas before this legislation existed—and we assume that it will obtain passage—a polluter could commit the act of pollution, after which he could be brought to task. The minister could point this out.

I have looked at the definitions in the bill and seen what is meant by pollution. I see, for example, that the previous legislation gave the minister authority to move in, prosecute and bring to task the people who were responsible for the tremendous amount of pollution which has taken place in almost every lake, stream and river in the Canadian nation up to the present time. Having looked at the bill, I am not overly impressed with the definition of intent. I will be much more impressed with the department's actions, based on the legislation. I suppose every Canadian over the years would have been more impressed if the government had taken more action to prosecute people who committed offences in this area.

I notice that the hon. member for South Shore this afternoon observed that the upper limit of the fine for anyone guilty of infringing the legislation is to be $5,000. I do not know why the minister built that limit into the bill. Perhaps I am misinformed and not totally aware of all the intentions of the bill, but it seems to me that is a pretty small sum for a large company such as Erco of Canada, or any other large company which has been tried and found guilty of polluting, to pay. Even $5,000 per day is very little for them. On the other hand, it would be a pretty heavy fine for someone who is gutting codfish.

On looking at clause 6 of the bill I notice that there is reference to dragger operations off the Newfoundland coast. I do not think any member of the House will disagree with the need for that clause, because these draggers have been wreaking havoc in Newfoundland. Forcing them to stay outside the three-mile limit is a good thing, and I commend the minister for his thinking. This is in line with the commitment he made to the fishermen of Newfoundland and Atlantic Canada who have been plagued by these inshore dragging operations. I beg your pardon—I see the 12-mile limit is mentioned. This is commendable.

I was absolutely appalled at the statements made by the minister today and in his previous speeches about his department being in a position to police pollution. I believe that is the correct phrase and I believe I am quoting the minister correctly. He said the Department of Fisheries is now in a position to police pollution throughout the nation. If I were to say that this is unadulterated nonsense, I would not wish to be unnecessarily unkind to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis).

There are in Canada two major problems in this area. The first stems from the lack of intention on the part of the government to move decisively into this area. Pollution is becoming a real political issue and everybody, I think, wants to get into the act, including myself. A serious problem results from our not having the personnel who could police pollution.

The minister said this afternoon that there is in the Department of Fisheries an administrative arm that has the personnel and competent people to deal with pollution. He mentioned, I believe, river guardians and various officers who could move in as a team and deal with these problems.

No doubt he wants to leave the impression that we have an army of people ready to move in to catch offenders and bring the guilty to justice. Just to indicate the true state of affairs, may I say that last year there was a drastic reduction in the budget for river guardians and lake police, if you want to call them that. I am referring to officers and guardians who are involved in apprehending offenders. We had a drastic reduction in the budget in this area. I cannot give the exact figures, although I have them in my office. I remember that there were reductions in some parts of Canada of almost 50 per cent in the number of guardians and people competent and capable of enforcing the law in this area.

May I talk about a river system I am familiar with? How would anyone like to see a beautiful river system such as the Gander River system, which includes a lake that is 25 miles long—and very beautiful it is—and a piece of very precious property belonging to the Canadian nation, inadequately policed? Several small rivers feed into that lake, and running out of that lake are 30 miles of beautiful river. This is one of the most prosperous pieces of salmon river, if I may say that, that we have.

Last year we had on occasions two guardians supposedly responsible for guarding the whole of the lake and river system. There ought to be many more than that responsible for this system. To bring this matter down to earth, may I say that I have fished on this river as a salmon fisherman since 1961 and never have I been asked to produce a licence, simply because nobody has been around to ask me to produce it.

Looking around now I see several hon. members in this House who have gone to my province and fished for salmon, and I hope many more will go back in future and fish on that beautiful river system. I doubt whether any of those hon. members have ever shown a licence to anybody on that river. We have two people who are expected to police approximately 400 square miles or more of property. That is totally impossible. I say this to indicate that the minister is not telling the whole story when he says that his department is capable of policing pollution in Canada.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Lundrigan: That is one of the major problems; we do not have sufficient people in this field. Last year $16 million were devoted to research into spawning and hatcheries, yet the budget for the provision of these guardians was reduced. I listened to all the great proclamations of the Minister of Fisheries, the minister—what's his name; the green minister who has been piloting the Canada Water Act through the House—the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene), the minister who has messed up the Indian Affairs Department so beautifully, and to all those ministers who were so actively bragging about these great efforts.

• (9:10 p.m.)

The budget this year is exactly the same as that for last year with respect to research and development aspects of the Canadian fishery. Members of the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry admit that there has been a reduction in the Department of Fisheries. They are becoming very concerned in that department because they cannot do the kind of research and development and provide the protection that is necessary. If I recall correctly, we have had an act in force since 1964. I am not an old politician. If I remember correctly, in 1964 there was a proclamation by the then Prime Minister and the Premier of a province on the east coast stating that we should be the same as Iceland and other countries. It was suggested that we set up a shield or an umbrella around the provinces on the east and west coasts of Canada so that the provisions of the Fisheries Act could be enforced, and thereby keep out foreign vessels. At that time I felt that no foreign vessel would be allowed inside the 12-mile limit; there was to be tremendous protection for our fishery resources. This has been going on for the last six years. My point is that we can spend all day talking about the intent of the government and the intent of the legislation in 1964—the intent of Bill C-204—but it is of no avail unless Canada is willing to enforce the rules and regulations which exist under the legislation.

An hon. Member: It's window-dressing.

Mr. Lundrigan: An hon. member shouted, "It's window-dressing". That could be the result of this piece of legislation. I challenge the minister on the matter of policing anti-pollution regulations. I challenge him to say in this House that there are sufficient personnel to enforce the regulations in this bill. Who is going to police the Canadian coasts? The minister is familiar with the west coast. There is the same situation on the east coast. There are tens of thousands of miles of coastline, bays and inlets where small pleasure craft can go on the west coast and where hardworking fishing craft can go on the east coast.

Who is going to board these craft and control their effluent? Who is going to watch what these craft dump into the sea? In one way this is reminiscent of legislation which says you cannot replace a fuse in a fuse-box. Of course, nobody has fuse-boxes any longer. I ask the minister, who is going to enforce this law? The Canadian people are going to question the observations of the minister about his department's capability to police pollution. The minister should admit to the Canadian people that his department is not capable. More money, research and development is necessary to police pollution in Canada.

I rise to participate in this debate because of some unhappy experiences on the east coast with respect to recent pollution. I am sure all hon. members recall the Long Harbour situation where a whole bay was polluted and the livelihood of 400 fishermen was affected. These fishermen harvested good returns. People who had been making a decent living last year were faced with a whole bay of dead fish. The complete story was never told and I do not intend to exaggerate it because in many ways it is a dead issue.

Last year, when the Long Harbour situation was investigated, it was found to our dismay that the Department of Fisheries had acted in what I consider a totally irresponsible manner in permitting the particular plant to locate and pollute the whole environment without requiring any safeguards. I understand there was an exchange of letters and the company agreed that the effluent would be kept to a particular level of toxicity which would not be dangerous or hazardous to the fishlife. The government agreed to this. After the bay became polluted and the total fish population had been destroyed, this government department realized its mistake. There had been no built-in safeguards. The end result was that the company was forced to build centrifuges, settling-ponds and trailing-ponds to prevent pollution. The government should have assumed some financial responsibility initially and required that company to build in the necessary safeguards. In every location where that kind of industry developed, the results have been tragic so far as pollution of the environment is concerned. Thousands of Canadian citizens, not scientists or researchers, could have made that information available to the minister from experience which they gained not far from Ottawa.

There is also the Arrow incident, which has been the subject of many discussions in this House. A couple of days ago I noticed in the Globe and Mail a picture of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) devouring nice, juicy lobster from that particular area. I suppose the impression to be left is that there is no need to be concerned because the effect on the fisheries is negligible or non-existent.

An hon. Member: Why wasn't the Minister of Fisheries eating lobster?

Mr. Lundrigan: Last year an oil tanker got into trouble off the south coast of Newfoundland. Luckily, it was escorted to port. An oil slick had been left by a different oil company. There has never been any prosecution, athough reports indicate that tens of thousands of seabirds were destroyed off the coast of Newfoundland. No wonder the residents are having a bad year duck hunting: there are fewer birds. I use these examples to express my concern.

I am not an expert with respect to the Manhattan. Some members are following this matter very closely: it seems to be a reason for great concern. There is a very complex issue with regard to Lake St. Clair. I understand the figure will reach many millions of dollars before the issue is finally resolved. This pollution is affecting the fishermen as well as the tourist industry in that area. With the tourist season approaching, these people are becoming very concerned. I understand several prominent lawyers are working on the matter. Also, a situation has developed in Lake Winnipeg. A major problem has arisen in the Great Lakes. The "phosphorus kids" are beginning to make their presence felt. This is not new. I imagine there has been pollution in the Great Lakes for 50 years or longer. If the records of the Department of Fisheries are checked, I am sure evidence will be found to show that there has been a problem for a great number of years.

I have been in every Canadian province. In the last five or six years I have travelled extensively in Canada. I am not familiar with the environment in each province, but I do know that my native province of Newfoundland is one of the most pollution-free provinces in Canada. In order to attract tourists we brag about the fact that we are one of the few unmolested areas in Canada. Our province is one of the few virgin areas with beautiful lakes, rivers, streams and pounds. I wish the minister could have been with me during the Easter recess when I caught 21 eastern brook trout which averaged 12 inches in length.

Mr. Mackasey: Out of season?

Mr. Lundrigan: No, it was not out of season. I caught these 21 brook trout in about an hour. If you become thirsty when fishing there, you can drink the beautiful clear waters. One does not appreciate this situation unless he leaves and then returns. I can appreciate it because I must drive past the Ottawa River every day. I do not envy anyone who has to do that. I appreciated returning to the east coast, standing by a beautiful little lake and catching 12 or 15 eastern lake trout or mud trout. This can be done in many thousands of areas in Newfoundland today. The situation is even better in Labrador. However, things are happening which are causing concern. I doubt if my children will be able to do the things I was able to do in my childhood.

The Exploit river system was one of the most productive salmon systems on the east coast of Canada but today, I understand, it is almost completely dead. I have already asked, in committee, whether the minister or his officials would make available some of the evidence they have on the effect of pollution on the salmon population of that river. As I say, it was a beautiful system but today it is just about dead. I asked the minister whether he will conduct an investigation of the Gander system. I have received correspondence from him, and he agreed with some of my conclusions. He indicated the department did not have the funds available to enable them to conduct a major investigation, but I still believe he will be able to look into the matter up to a point and perhaps pour a few dollars into research to find out what is happening. There is scarcely a pond, stream, bay or inlet in Canada right across the whole nation where pollution will not be found to exist. This is a major issue. I support this legislation, but the minister should be given the necessary funds and authority to do the job properly. If not, let him leave it until the necessary funds are available.

Another problem has been presented by the decision to set up a petrochemical complex in Come-by-Chance. This is the news of the year; it is to be a $130 million complex. To my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, not a single piece of research has been done by the Department of Fisheries on the effect on the environment of a project of this kind. I do not say we have no need for a petrochemical plant; God knows, we need such developments, even developments of a type one would not normally want in one's backyard. But the least the government could do would be to assure the Canadian nation that an establishment of this kind will not destroy the surrounding environment. I ask the minister to assure us that his official will look into this aspect, and that all the necessary pollution control equipment is built into the operation immediately. I am not an expert; I do not know what may be necessary. But there are many people who suspect there will be a need for strict federal control to ensure that an enterprise which might well have a potential for pollution is controlled to the maximum extent.

In the time left to me I wish to comment on the speech made by my hon. friend from South Shore. Perhaps the main point he made concerned the question of responsibility. The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) and the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau) also dealt with this point capably and eloquently, that is, responsibility for pollution control within the federal government. We have heard a good deal this year from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I sometimes have the feeling that this minister is the big boss in the cabinet where pollution control is concerned. After all, he was a candidate for the leadership and I do not doubt there is an overflow effect. His campaign met with a good measure of success and he was likely one of the keys to the election of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Undoubtedly there are many things which go on behind closed doors and about which I can only guess.

Mr. McGrath: Give the Minister of Fisheries a rough time.

Mr. Lundrigan: I am interested in supporting the minister. Mr. Speaker, the "phosphate kid," the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, has been using the phosphate issue as the best political gambit I have seen since I entered politics. He has almost succeeded in convincing the Canadian nation that if we can prevent these phosphates entering our waters we shall have beaten pollution. This is a complete misrepresentation of the facts, but it is a beautiful job.

The hon. lady for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) almost finds herself supporting the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in his present effort. Editorials all over the country are supporting the minister in his fight against phosphate pollution. But the fact of the matter is—and the Minister of Fisheries agrees with me—that phosphate pollution is not even a major problem; it is relatively easy to control. Indeed, phosphates are a form of nutrient which might well benefit certain species of fish. The minister himself has acknowledged this.

Here we have a minister who is responsible for a water act which may never come into effect, and if it does, he may have no control over it. Five Canadian provinces have stated that they do not intend to play any role under the permissive legislation proposed by the "green" Minister of Energy. I understand Ontario is the latest province to indicate it wants no part of this bill; they have more effective control through their own commission than through the toothless, gormless legislation proposed by the Minister of Energy. They recognize there is no money. They recognize there is a lot of political hay being made, that it will not result in the setting up of one, universal, authoritative body; they recognize it will be so diluted as a result of the discretion permitted by the act as to be totally ineffective.

Now we find the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) concerned in this field. Can anyone imagine the Minister of Indian Affairs having legislative authority in regard to pollution? I have been reminded of something by my hon. friend from St. John's East who spoke at the United Nations last year and recommended that control of pollution should be one of the key projects of the United Nations, recognizing in advance the extent of the problem.

My hon. friend from St. John's East reminds me that last year at the International Conference at Brussels our representative was the Minister of Transport. He brought back a report which I have in my hand. It is the statement of the Minister of Transport to the Brussels Conference on Pollution of the Sea by Oil, and is dated November 10, 1969.

When the minister returned to the House, if I am not mistaken he was questioned by hon. members and agreed he was going to bring in some anti-pollution legislation. Indeed, he is already moving in this area in regard to the regulations in connection with the voyage of the Manhattan.

We therefore have involved in pollution control the Minister of Energy, the Minister of Indian Affairs and the Minister of Transport. This piece of legislation, Bill C-204, has been brought in under the name of the Minister of Fisheries. The hon. member for South Shore has reminded us today that we have a problem—a ship called "Pollution" which is being manned by three captains. I disagree with him. I contend the ship is being manned by four captains, with all kinds of other captains in the wings who will be coming forward as the years go by and the ship pulls further out to sea. One hon. member asked this afternoon in which direction the ship would be going, and somebody responded that it would be going down. I would agree with that observation.

I have read Bill C-204 and it has all the ingredients for very good legislation. I do not think there is any major change being made. I firmly believe that the only major change is that it permits the minister to act in advance in order to head off pollution. I think I am right in saying that. The legislation permits the minister to sort of head off pollution; it prevents pollution taking place rather than punishes after the event. The legislation is more preventive than punitive, if I may summarize it in that way.

Other than redefining waste and disposal of waste, I see nothing new in this legislation. In addition, I agree with the intent of the legislation. But I disagree that we are able to police pollution. Neither do I see why we must have three other ministers dragged into the fight against pollution. I have confidence in this minister; I think he is capable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lundrigan: The government has the constitutional authority to make the minister in charge of the Department of Fisheries responsible for pollution control. In that regard I am quoting the minister, and I am fully aware of his position. I am also aware of his interest. He is an expert in his own field. Anybody who knows the Minister of Fisheries knows that. However, I do not want to praise him too much because he is also a very modest man.

The act is a simple one. The question here is one of defining what is going to be done. It is a question of allocating resources so we can do the necessary policing, of getting the personnel to enforce this particular piece of legislation. Again I ask why we need to drag into this field the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who as far as I am concerned has very little knowledge of pollution control outside of the fact that he talks a lot about the Great Lakes. Of course the Great Lakes are polluted; they have been for generations.

[Mr. Lundrigan.]

Pollution has much broader aspects than that. I am concerned about pollution of salt water, the Pacific Ocean and the Atlantic Ocean. The Minister of Fisheries' department is geared to this kind of pollution control. The department has the necessary professional staff and the departmental structure to fight pollution in the broad sense. It is also geared to fighting pollution in the specific sense in which control is now delegated to the Minister of Energy.

I also suggest the Minister of Indian Affairs has no business to poke his nose into this affair, and the Minister of Transport has enough problems of his own. It is against all sound managerial concepts and sound principles of control and authority in the field of business management, in industry—you name it—to make four or five people responsible for tackling a particular problem, one which is relatively simple to define though somewhat more difficult to police, and much more difficult to allocate resources to meet.

I suggest we do not need the Canada Water Act. The act is a nebulous document, one which is totally ineffective. The provinces do not want it and the minister cannot enforce it. The legislation has no teeth. We want pollution control placed where it belongs, under the Department of Fisheries. We want the responsibility for fighting pollution to lie with the Minister of Fisheries. I do not envy him this role because it would be a major one. I think the Fisheries Act can provide the policing, the personnel and the resources effectively to take action against one of the major enemies of modern society in this twentieth century.

I cannot close on a stronger note than to support 100 per cent the observations made by the hon. members for South Shore, St. John's East and South Western Nova in regard to some kind of single authority being vested in one minister, instead of fragmenting and dividing authority to the point where the whole government is made responsible for pollution control. We tried to get away from this sort of thing in the area of regional economic expansion and have been fairly successful. But we are now moving back to it again in the area of pollution control.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, when I heard the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) saying all those nice things about the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) I began to wonder whether he was a Liberal backbencher.

The Minister of Fisheries made a number of statements this winter in regard to the fisheries. I noticed that they were very similar in content to one he made today and which appears in a press release. He said that healthy fish mean a healthy environment, and a healthy fishery is undoubtedly the best insurance policy we can buy in our battle against pollution in water.

I can understand why the minister makes statements of a similar nature because we have had a number of bills this session that are somewhat similar in nature. When I hear the minister speaking about fish, and so on, I cannot help thinking he had wished that Merlin the magician had touched them with his magic wand so that he really understood how the fish themselves felt and thought. From what he says, one would think he had a fair understanding of fish. I think it is reasonable to equate healthy fish with a healthy environment, and the same could be said of other statements made by the minister.

In view of the great variety of legislation dealing with pollution control that the House is dealing with at the moment, I think if I were a fish I would not be sure just which bill presently before the House was polluting me or was not polluting me. Even as a Member of Parliament I am a little confused as to which bill will deal with which part of Canada.

Mr. Dinsdale: It is all window-dressing.

Mr. Thomson: Yes. While we are all in favour of anti-pollution measures, I feel that some of these questions may work themselves out in time. At the moment it seems there is some confusion, particularly over the question of authority, as to how these particular bills are going to operate. For example, the minister suggested that the present bill would be dovetailed into the Canada Water Act. If I were a fish, I would say to him that he would probably water it down. It seems to me that some aspects of pollution control, at least, will not be as effective as would be the case if control was kept within the fisheries legislation we are now discussing. I feel that since the Canada Water Act requires the co-operation of the provinces and regional authorities, pollution control would not be nearly as effective as it would be under one authority.

I should like to mention one thing in respect of section 33A in which it is stated that the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry will have control in respect of plants in certain areas. A plant, for example, situated on the Fraser River, presumably under the authority of the Canada Water Act, could pass its effluent into the river. The effluent would then pass down into the Pacific Ocean, where it would come under the authority of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. It seems to me there is a conflict here. This water would come under the control of the minister after something has happened to it, and it would be his job to clean it up.

I suggest this is a backward move. I believe the reverse should be the situation and that the minister should have authority over the whole region. It would seem that the regional authority would lack the co-operation of many individuals and that the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry would have to clean up the water when it reached Vancouver Harbour or the mouth of the Fraser River. I think there might well be some conflict here. I suggest that the minister look into this particular situation to see whether or not further amendments are called for.

For a moment I should like to speak about drilling for oil off the shores of Canada because I understand this matter will be covered by some portion of this bill. I do not quite go along with members representing the Atlantic coast who say there should be no drilling at all for oil. I think his might be desirable in areas where there is a fault such as was the case in respect of Santa Barbara. I suggest that if sufficient precautions were exercised, such as adequate wellhead procedures and control measures, we could continue to drill for oil. I think that if proper procedures were followed we could drill for oil and look after our pollution problem at the same time. I believe that with the high living in society there will be some pollution risk. I am against pollution as much as anyone, but I believe we should be realistic and realize that oil will continue to be used in buses, aeroplanes and motor cars.

It has been suggested by other speakers that there should be more research in various areas concerning pollution control. It seems to me there may be some conflict in respect of our various pollution control measures. It would seem to me also that a need for arbitration in this regard might arise some time in the future unless something is done about this problem. Just the other day I noticed snow and salt on the ice of a river. Presumably this will go into the water and pollute it. Perhaps it is a little thing, but in any event it is part of the problem.

I should like to compliment the minister on the bill. I believe other people today have pointed out some of the problems in relation to it. We hope the minister will consider these suggestions and come up with amendments, not necessarily at this session—although it might be that some changes are necessary now—but perhaps next year if it should be found that changes are necessary.

There is one good thing about this bill which I should like to mention. As I read it, the control in respect of pollution will remain in the hands of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry until such time as the regional authority comes into effect. I believe this is a very good provision. We do not know how long it will be before these various water management agencies come into effect. If we take the Fraser River again as an example, we notice that the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry has insisted on some adequate pollution controls being set up. I do not really see that the setting up of a local management authority at a later date would weaken this. Obviously, some good things will result from this legislation but I say we should continue to look at it in the long-term sense and not just for today.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief. I believe there is a disposition to complete the debate this evening, although I do not believe there will be time to go on to the other piece of legislation which has been scheduled by the House leader, perhaps not very wisely.

I have been interested in this debate. I heard the compliments paid to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis). I do not think I can go quite as far as some other members did in their excitement. However, I would pay the minister one compliment. I give him credit for going as far as he has in promoting the eating of fish. This is apart from this legislation, but I know the plans he has for Wednesday night in this regard and I know of the other activities in Ottawa. I believe this is a proper step and the minister deserves credit for his efforts.

I believe the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) has stated our case very well. Other members have also done a very good job. The powers given by this legislation are quite extensive. I hope the minister will use these powers wisely. As has been stated, we wish him well. There are two matters, however, which I should like to mention. They have to do with the Saint John River and, in a sense, with pollution.

I am sure all hon. members are familiar with the beautiful Saint John River which is famous for salmon fishing both sportswise and commercially. The first thing I mention actually happened, and the second was alluded to. In both cases there is a lesson to be learned in dealing fairly with pollution. First of all, the minister found it necessary to move in on the salmon season. I refer to the commercial salmon season in Saint John Harbour and the areas in which the federal authority has jurisdiction. Although I believe in some respects this action was necessary, I did object in this House concerning the length of the restrictions. In addition, proper notice had not been given and there was a feeling that the officials of the department were perhaps unaware of the opening and closing dates of the season.

Without going over the whole story, I merely hope that when the department begins to use this act it will give as much advance notice as possible concerning the results it hopes to obtain in changing a season, because this is very important to the commercial fishermen. I hope they will have studies made so that when they move they will know exactly what they are doing. I hope there will be full preparation and information given to the fishermen. I hope that the salmon they hope to release will get upstream, and that the accomplishments achieved will be understood by the fishermen.

The second matter I wish to raise concerns a problem that may have been presented at least in a hypothetical way in statements concerning pollution of the Saint John River in connection with such-and-such industry at its mouth. The minister will recall that I asked a question in this regard. I only mention the matter to express the hope that with the great powers he is given in this bill the minister will deal with the entire river. I hope every industry will be considered wherever it may be on the river. I hope the public will be made fully aware of what is being done by the department. These are two matters of importance to the commercial fishermen and to the employment provided by industries in the Maritimes. With these two warnings, Mr. Speaker, I wish the minister luck in his efforts on behalf of the future of the fishing industry.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must point out to the House that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. McGrath: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the House would be disposed to allowing the minister extra time, if he needs it, beyond ten o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Davis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am somewhat overwhelmed by some of the kind remarks expressed today about the Fisheries Department and the effective way in which it has been carrying out its duties. I hope we can have the support of all parties in the House in getting this legislation through quickly, but in saying that I do not mean that we should put it through precisely in the form in which it has been introduced. I hope we can improve on it in some way, although I am not certain how. But I am sure that some of the questioning in the committee will produce ideas whereby we can strengthen the bill still further.

I think that the Fisheries Act as amended will be a sharp instrument, a specific tool which we can use to deal with spot situations across the country. I also think it creates standards which are essentially nationwide and, as I said earlier, these will prevent the development of pollution havens which tend to exist in the economically weaker areas of the country.

The question was asked as to why the old sections of the Fisheries Act dealing with pollution had not been enforced more rigorously down through the years. The sections in question were all too embracing, all too comprehensive. For instance, anyone who threw sawdust, bark or lime into a stream could be prosecuted. As the years and decades went by and prosecutions were not laid, it became more and more difficult to enforce legislation of this kind. In other words, it withered away; it fell into disuse, and indeed we failed ourselves in not using it more effectively.

What we really need in legislation of this kind is not an absolute prohibition on everything thrown into our waters but more precise measurements of what can be thrown into water and still keep it clear, clean and useful to the fisheries, and being useful to the fisheries healthy for men and women as well. In other words, we need to know what concentrations of a whole range of materials are tolerable, and what concentrations of those materials are not tolerable.

By introducing the word "waste" into the legislation, and by defining in the regulations the concentrations of the various chemicals which can or cannot be tolerated in the fisheries waters of Canada, we will have a more precise and useful tool in legislation which can be enforced throughout the country equitably and effectively. There are various kinds of wastes, not all of which affect fish and not all of which kill fish. The Fisheries Act, as it has been administered, by and large required the evidence of fish that were killed or of fish that were seriously affected by pollutants. Not all chemicals affect fish. Phosphates in some concentrations encourage plant life in the water and may not be too detrimental to fish, but obviously they create unsightly ponds, and so on. Therefore, phosphates have to be dealt with under other legislation.

The Fisheries Act does not solve all the problems. It does not necessarily solve the problem of effluents from municipalities, but it certainly deals with most industrial pollutants. The pulp and paper industry, with some 180 mills across the country, puts the greatest single burden on Canada's rivers and streams. Perhaps 60 per cent of the burden of pollution from industry is placed on Canadian streams by the pulp and paper industry. In fact, a single mill can create as much burden on a river as a city the size of Ottawa does. We can deal in large measure with pollutants from pulp and paper mills through the Fisheries Act. We can deal with the greater part of industrial pollution from chemical plants, from most chemical processing industries, and from many mines. As I say, the Fisheries Act can be used in large measure to deal with pollutant problems which arise from industry but not necessarily from municipalities.

One hon. member mentioned a specific oil refinery to be built at Come-By-Chance in Newfoundland. We are already in touch with the people there, but I would suggest that with the amendments to the Fisheries Act we have the law behind us when we ask for information. If the plans which we discuss with that refinery, or with other refineries, do not meet the standards which our people believe are required to clean up the effluent, then with the agreement of the cabinet by Order in Council we can stop construction until the company in question agrees to instal the type of equipment which has been proven effective elsewhere. This is the sort of thing which is contemplated in the bill.

An oil-drilling rig being set up in any of the fisheries waters of Canada would be like a new plant being built on a major salmon stream in another part of the country. We can similarly ask for their plans and their precautions, for information on the processes which they will follow in order to protect the living resources of the water. If the plans, the location and the over-all situation are such as to give the Department of Fisheries real concern, then possibly we can stop the drilling from going ahead.

Mention was made of water quality management areas. In a number of situations, particularly where there are a number and a variety of industries, where there are one or more municipalities, where there is a wide range of activities and a multiplicity of effluents we need the powers not only of one department of the federal government, namely, the Department of Fisheries, but also the powers of the Canada Shipping Act, the powers under our national health legislation, the powers under all the provincial pieces of legislation and the powers of municipal by-laws. We need the full force of all the legislative powers and administrative abilities of all three levels of government in such situations, and this in good measure is where the Canada Water Act comes in.

Many hon. members have alluded to the possibility that we could in a sense be downgrading our fisheries powers through this bill, especially with reference to the Canada Water Act and its water control management areas and agencies, but certainly as long as I am Minister of Fisheries, and as long as many of the officers of the department hold their present positions I can say that we are not going to back up one single step when we insist on proper fisheries standards. We are going to make sure that the fisheries standards still obtaining generally across the country, obtain in those areas. Some other standards, not necessarily fisheries standards, will apply as well. I would suggest that we will have cleaner water and better conditions for fish in those situations of joint enterprise, joint management and federal, provincial and municipal co-operation in the water quality management areas.

The Northern Inland Waters Act was mentioned. The powers which the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) is asking for under that legislation are similar to those enjoyed by a provincial government, for example, the water right powers. A province could authorize the development of a mine and thus inadvertently authorize something harmful to the local fishery. If a dispute occurs between the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Department of Fisheries and Forestry, there is a clause in the Fisheries Act which allows it to be resolved around the cabinet table, and if this should occur I hope the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry would carry the day in the cabinet chamber.

Mention was made that a $5,000 fine was inadequate, for example in relation to the Electric Reduction Company in Newfoundland. We did not fine the Electric Reduction Company in order to make retribution for the so-called "red herring" incident in Newfoundland. We asked the company to clean up and it met all our standards. It also finally compensated the fishermen and we expect to recover all our loans. In all, I would say the company was out of pocket nearly $2 million. The company could have avoided this with good planning at the outset.

Before I conclude I shall answer the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan). With the present personnel of the Department of Fisheries and Forestry I do not believe we have enough people to police pollution across Canada. We expect to get help from other departments and municipalities but we need some more staff, particularly competent engineers with knowledge about the optimum design of treatment facilities. We also need more people on the mercury program and more of the machines developed in the last 12 to 18 months that enable us to find the parts per million of mercury in fish. Without that equipment we could never have discovered this problem.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, the Fisheries Act is a sharp federal tool and one which we can use effectively to deal with pollution problems, especially those arising in industry. We cannot solve all the problems, but we can co-operate with other departments of the government in tackling pollution on the broadest possible front. I welcome comments, criticisms and suggestions for improvement in the legislation when we meet in committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

HOUSING—SUSPENSION OF CMHC LOANS IN LARGER CITIES

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, on March 13 I asked the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing (Mr. Andras) if he could tell the House whether Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has cut off housing loans in cities of over 10,000 population and, if so, why? I am sure the answer the Minister without Portfolio gave me at that time was, to his way of thinking, adequate to fit the needs at that particular time.

I am also certain the minister realizes that the people in the area I come from have run into a situation where there is no private money available. Contractors have made application to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for money and have been told there is no money under the regulation alluded to. There is no private money available for the type of condominium construction being talked about.

One of the main matters that all of us must be concerned about is that several departments of government, particularly the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, are attempting to look after various aspects concerning the whole country and trying to bring about development in some areas of Canada, whereas at the same time Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is not permitting development in those areas which are under the jurisdiction of regional economic development programs.

I appreciate that the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing has said to the mayor of Moose Jaw that the government is looking at this matter and will examine any proposals that proponents may wish at this time to bring forward. At the same time we realize that it is not good enough when only two areas in Saskatchewan are to be entitled to any consideration under this legislation. Actually the two areas, Regina and Saskatoon, will only obtain assistance under this legislation if a real need is shown.

This is really the reason behind my raising this question tonight. I wish to learn from the Minister without Portfolio whether he really is looking at the situation and whether areas across Canada which need assistance now can expect some in the near future. I say this because there is no way that some areas may obtain assistance from private lenders. It is common knowledge that Central Mortgage and Housing leads the way with lending. It appears that private lenders sort of bend their ear to learn what Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is doing, and under those conditions private lenders will look at any enterprise or any type of construction only if it fits into plans concerned with regional economic development. I hope the Minister without Portfolio will give an assurance that he will look at this matter in a very serious manner and will say, in the short time he has available, whether the government will be looking at legislation which will assist communities across the nation in this regard.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I will do my best to respond to the hon. member. In the allocation of the $854 million that I described on February 2, I believe, in this House I made the point that section 40 loans, which generally speaking are loans at market interest for individual people building or acquiring houses, had been reduced very considerably from previous years and stand this year at $110 million.

The purpose of this was to allocate much more money and give much greater emphasis to social housing programs such as public housing and section 35 and section 16 housing, those being so-called limited dividend, non-profit operations. We then put $570 million into those other programs, $265 million going into public housing, and this is in turn distributed to the various provinces. That, I think, includes an acceptably generous allocation to the province of Saskatchewan which certainly matches the request that the province had made. It, in turn, totally administers this money in terms of selecting priority of location and the submission of projects, and we do not turn them down except for obvious reasons involving concentration density, style, physical form and so on. But it is totally at the discretion of the provincial government to allocate that money to the various communities.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

• (10:10 p.m.)

In addition to that, $105 million was put into section 16 housing. I grant that the initial distribution of that money is going into large urban centres at the present time, but we will be moving beyond that stage a very few weeks from now and going to other areas. On top of that, $200 million is being reserved for what I describe as innovated experimental projects. It will be distributed among the other urban centres, including the one to which I think my hon. friend is referring. There is still much to unfold, but essentially one cannot do both. We cannot look after all the private sector through loans made under section 40 and at the same time have all the social housing programs that we want, even with an increased but still restrained budget. If the hon. member can give me specifics in private communication, I will be delighted to do my best to see if there are any particular problems I might help smooth out.

HISTORIC SITES—ACQUISITION OF RESIDENCE OF SIR ROBERT BORDEN

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I will get a response from the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Andras) in charge of housing or the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry.

When I addressed this question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) on April 15, it was not by any means my first inquiry about this historic house. Last session on October 22 I inquired about the matter from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). His reply was of that flippant kind which is becoming his trade mark of parliamentary response. Earlier this session, on February 18, I asked the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) about it. He, as unofficial minister of culture, might have been expected to show some interest in historic matters. His reply was that the Historic Sites and Monuments Board was the responsibility of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Since I had known this for a good many years, his evasive condescension did little for my edification or for the preservation of the residence of one of our great Canadian figures.

My next step was to write the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and finally to question him last week. I must say in appreciation that he gave me the courtesy of a direct reply, although I regret its content. It is slightly humiliating to have a spokesman of the government of this great and prosperous country declare that the country could not afford to purchase a house, the residence of one of its most illustrious Prime Ministers.

In all our talk of Canadian content, cultural nationalism and distinctive Canadianism we fail miserably if we ignore those historic figures who contributed to the uniqueness of our national heritage. Robert Borden, the only head of a democratic state to preside over a government through the whole course of the Great War, is one of our most neglected public men. His leadership within the British Empire, as it was then called, and his primacy in ushering in the era of the Commonwealth made up of self-governing dominions rather than sub-independent colonies was truly remarkable and is well documented by scholars.

He was certainly our first great internationalist and he played an important part in the peace treaty discussions after bluntly advising the British government that Canada had no intention of sending half a million of its finest men to the front and not be given even a back seat at the peace councils. While he was Prime Minister, and after his vigorous insistence, our right to membership in the League of Nations was recognized and we became a charter member of that body which for a short time was considered the hope of the world. Without disparaging the efforts of others or overpraising his, Borden can properly be called the architect of Canadian independence. Throughout a long career both before and after his prime ministry of 1911 to 1920 he was respected as a man of honour, dignity, probity and courage.

It is deplorable that it is confessed as being beyond our means to acquire for the nation the residence, Glensmere, in which Borden lived from 1907 to the time of his death in 1937. If the government cannot raise the money, it might have taken some initiative in staying the wrecker's hammer and private citizens more interested than the government might have come to the rescue had they been given a chance.

While we have the former homes of Prime Minister Mackenzie King and Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Earnscliffe the residence of Sir John A. Macdonald, our first Prime Minister, is the property of another government. The British would, of course, have co-operated had Canada shown the interest it should have in acquiring the house. At least there is still a chance to reclaim Earnscliffe, but Glensmere will be levelled, apparently with neither a blush nor a sigh on the part of a government which can find millions for contemporary propaganda, causeway approaches that do not approach and other "economic" extravaganzas too numerous to mention. It is not a very edifying spectacle to see this fine house already partially destroyed. It is too much a part of the familiar tale of downgrading the great men of our own past.

At a time when some imagination might have been used, we find unconcern. Instead of acquiring Glensmere and perhaps using it as part of the International Development Research Centre, we let it be destroyed and presumably another high-rise apartment block will take its place. Such structures, while useful, are neither typically Canadian nor historically significant, but the homes of our great men are. We can have plenty of apartment blocks: we will never again have a Glensmere so rich in memories of a great man in a great and formative age of our history.

Perhaps, although I have little confidence in its effect upon a government so insensitive to so many things, I might close with the advice given us by a great Canadian, Joseph Howe, who did have a sense of history:

> A wise nation preserves its records, gathers up its muniments, decorates the tombs of its illustrious dead, repairs its great public structures and fosters national pride and love of country by perpetual reference to the sacrifices and glories of the past.

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): I do not intend to try to answer in the eloquent terms which the hon. member has used, Mr. Speaker. This house was designated by the minister as being of national historic significance upon recommendation of the Historic Sites and Monuments Board of Canada. The board recommended that every effort be made to preserve the building and that it be marked by a plaque. Having studied Sir Robert Borden's life a little, I think he might have been glad that the area where he lived should provide accommodation for so many people in need of homes.

It is my understanding that shortly after the designation of the house by the minister as being of national significance, it was sold by the previous owner, a foreign government, to a developer for use as the site of a high-rise apartment building. This developer has, I believe, now commenced demolition of the house and it is my understanding that the roof is already partially removed and the interior gutted. I am sorry to say, therefore, that it is in fact too late to preserve the house.

It should be mentioned that designation of a house by the minister as being of national significance does not imply any obligation on the part of the minister to ensure that such a building continues to be preserved, although it does imply an effort at preservation. A number of buildings of this kind have been thus designated by the minister in recent years and very often the act of designation has ensured the preservation of the house by local interests. In some instances co-operative agreements have been entered into with local groups whereby costs of preservation have been shared.

In this instance it is, unfortunately, too late to take any appropriate action. Even if action had been feasible it must be pointed out that it would have cost almost half a million dollars to acquire the house and ensure its preservation, and this sum would have been disproportionately high in relation to the total budget of the National Historic Sites Service. I would further mention that the Historic Sites and Monuments Board of Canada is well aware that the department operates on a very limited budget for historic preservation, especially at this time. The budget for contingencies is necessarily a very small one and there were no funds available at the time the emergency arose concerning the demolition of this house.

Mr. Bell: Did you get the plaque back?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Shame!

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.21 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

HOUSING

STATEMENT ON PUBLIC HOUSING PROGRAM

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I have indicated to hon. members on a number of occasions that I would be making a statement on the public housing program after some extension of our own reviews and after I received the opinions of each of the provinces. I am pleased to say that, having completed that review of these submissions, I am now in a position to describe some steps which I propose to take which, I am confident, will improve public housing in quantity and quality.

Hon. members will recall, perhaps, that when I presented the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation budget on February 2 I indicated that our commitments for the low-income housing program, including public housing, in 1969 were for some 27,500 units and that this figure was expected to rise to some 35,000 units in 1970. Taken together, commitments for these two years would amount to approximately 75 per cent of all production undertaken in this field in the last 20 years.

As hon. members are aware, a substantial portion of these starts, to which I have just referred, will come from the $200 million fund temporarily reserved for the building of low-income housing of a kind or in circumstances that are likely to yield information or experience which could lead to innovations in the field. About this program I will have more to say within the next few days.

My own studies in all parts of Canada have given me a deep concern, which I know is shared by many hon. members, not only about numbers of units built or projected but about the form, quality, location and management of public housing, and about equity in the matter of rents. It is with these considerations in mind that we have decided on a number of steps which will have a significant effect, not only on the quality of new low-income housing but on the more effective utilization and management of existing units.

I would like to deal first, since it is a matter of immediate concern to a great number of people, with the matter of rents for public housing. We have proposed to the provinces a revised rent-to-income scale which we feel reflects more closely the realities of the cost of living and the housing market. These proposed revisions are intended to correct deficiencies in the present rent structure. They have, of course, to do with income as it is used in calculating rents; they have to do with security from sudden rent increases; and they have to do with family needs. Just to put these proposals into some kind of prospective, I would like to review briefly the existing situation.

At the present time tenants in public housing who are receiving welfare payments pay an amount of rent that is equal to the shelter payments which they receive from the welfare agency. All other tenants pay a rent based on their income. The present rent range is from 16.7 per cent of the low to 30 per cent of the higher level of income. I might say that this 30 per cent rate was set at a time when families who had reached this level of income could perhaps have reasonably been expected to find accommodation for themselves on the open market. It was expected that at this stage of income they would move into other accommodation.

In the present market, however, many families, particularly those with a large number of children, have a great deal of difficulty in finding other accommodation when they reach the income level at which the 30 per cent rate comes into effect. They are, by necessity, obliged to stay on in public housing even though they are paying what amounts to an exorbitant and uneconomic rent. In two provinces, Ontario and Newfoundland, this situation has resulted in provincial action to freeze the rents of such tenants.

Since the level of assistance is based on the simple criterion of income, it imposes a substantially greater burden on a family with five or six children than on a family with one or two children. Although their incomes are the same, the large family is less able to pay.

Another inequity arises when a wife goes out to work. Her earnings over $250 a year are regarded as family income and the excess is added to the husband's in arriving at a rent. On the other hand, no compensation is allowed for one-parent families who do not have this opportunity for additional earning power by virtue of being engaged in the whole process of a parent looking after children. For all tenants, under the present scheme additional earnings normally result in additional rent charges almost immediately.

These are some of the inequities which the government would like to deal with in proposing revisions in the matter of rents. For public housing we are proposing that:

1. Family size should be taken into account in arriving at rents. Taking a family with two children as the base, we are proposing to make a reduction in the rent for each child over that number—for instance, a reduction of $2 per month for each child after the second.

2. Working wives should be allowed to make substantially more than $250 a year before it is considered as income for the purpose of calculating rent. We are proposing a level of $900 a year.

3. Similarly, incomes of one-parent families, for the purpose of calculating rents, would be reduced by up to $900.

4. The portion of income required as rents from families in the higher income ranges would be reduced from 30 per cent to 25 per cent, to avoid imposing undue hardships on tenants, particularly large families, who cannot find alternative accommodation in the present market.

5. The final revision which we are proposing in the matter of rents is the method of adjusting rents as income changes. At the present time, public housing tenants must notify the housing authority as soon as their income increases and the rent is then raised. We feel all tenants should be entitled to enjoy the security of a fixed rent over a reasonable period of time. For this reason we are prepared to have tenants report their incomes at intervals of two years, at which time any increase in rent would be put into effect as a result of any increase in income. On the other hand, a reduction from the income at which the two-year lease rent was negotiated can be reported at any time and the rent reduced an appropriate amount.

[Mr. Andras.]

Before I leave the subject of rents, Mr. Speaker, I would like to emphasize that any revisions will be undertaken after consultation with the provincial governments and with their co-operation. We recognize the need to build the widest possible latitude into these arrangements so that they will be flexible enough to meet particular local conditions. Some provinces may for various reasons wish to charge rents that are not precisely in accord with the federal scale. In this event it is proposed that the federal subsidy would be either half of the project losses, or half what the losses would have been if the federal scale had been adopted, whichever is less.

We have already held a round of talks with provincial authorities and the initial response indicates a substantial measure of agreement with the objectives we are endeavouring to achieve.

I now wish to deal with some other steps which we are taking which will have a particular effect on new and existing low-income housing.

1. Social and recreation facilities, in both new and existing public housing projects, will be eligible for federal assistance. The precise nature of these facilities will be negotiated with the agencies concerned. By way of illustration, I am talking about such things as community meeting halls, day care nurseries, paramedical physical facilities in homes for the elderly, and the like.

2. Duly constituted public housing tenant associations will be assisted with grants. As these groups develop, it is apparent that for the most part they are reasonable, articulate and informed. We feel that this kind of self-help activity deserves to be encouraged.

3. A more progressive attitude to public housing tenants' rights will be encouraged with the publication of a revised and, I hope, more sensitive manual for housing authorities, which will include a model lease.

4. In co-operation with the provinces we shall undertake formal training programs in public housing management. We are already providing continuing assistance through our research program under part V of the National Housing Act for the further study of public housing performance standards and user requirements.

While it is our firm resolve to increase the quantity of housing for low-income people as expeditiously as possible, no opportunity will be overlooked for improving the physical qualities of new developments to overcome objections to some past projects. Indeed, many of the design proposals for developments undertaken in 1969 were altered to incorporate recommendations of the task force and suggestions presented to me during my own investigation of projects in all parts of the country. Certainly, for example, there has been strong criticism of the practice of providing public housing primarily in the form of high-rise apartment buildings.

Mr. Bell: Order! Come on! What is going on?

Mr. Andras: I am in complete sympathy with this concern. The high-rise apartment is admirably suited to the requirements of many prospective public housing tenants, especially elderly citizens who want very much to remain where the action is in the downtown areas of our cities. But such accommodation in its present form is not always the most suitable for families with a number of small children. To the best of our ability we must strive to meet these diverse requirements.

We are stressing the need for careful consideration of the location of new public housing units in terms of proximity to transportation, schools, hospitals and other community facilities, and in terms of the dispersal, wherever possible, of public housing throughout the community so as to achieve better integration, avoiding the heavy concentrations that result in physical and psychological ghettos.

Mr. Bell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I challenge the minister; he is deliberately trying to cut into an opposition day by giving us a lot of boloney about housing. I think he should learn the rules of this House. If the government wants co-operation from us, this is not the way to get it. These statements are traditionally made on Wednesdays. This is a subterfuge used to cut into an opposition day. We demand our time. We ask that the minister cut short his speech about nothing.

Mr. Speaker: I assume the hon. member is referring to the provisions of Standing Order 15. While the Standing Order requires comments made by members speaking on behalf of parties in opposition to be brief, it is silent as to the length of statements made by ministers. At the same time, it seems to me the spirit of the rule is that since the statements made by way of comment on the part of members of the opposition are to be brief and to the point there is at least a moral obligation on the part of the minister making a statement under the terms of Standing Order 15 to be relatively brief.

I am sure all hon. members appreciate the importance of the statement being made by the minister, but I believe they will all agree with the Chair that the minister should give some thought to shortening what remains of his statement.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. Andras: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Quite frankly, I was not aware of the implications the hon. member has raised. As far as I am concerned I thought there had been contact made with the opposition party housing critics. Certainly I have been requested a number of times during the last several weeks to make this statement, but I apologize if there is an inconvenience to the House. I hope Your Honour will permit me to continue to tell the House about what I have understood to be a very necessary change that is to be made.

We are very conscious of the need for dispersal of public housing units throughout the community for the reasons that I have given.

The provincial governments generally are in agreement, although they have asked that we avoid precise limitations, by regulation, of the number of units to be clustered by community size. I think I am inclined to agree that it is really not practical to be an absolutist in matters like this.

Another factor that has been given consideration is the whole question of tenant organization and involvement in the management of public housing. We are quite prepared to encourage this sort of thing as a matter of social justice, and we think in turn it will encourage a much healthier outlook and climate all round and remove a major cause of some of the difficulties. Along that line, CMHC has funded a series of seminars on tenant participation through the Canadian Welfare Council which will identify the principles and problems involved.

In conclusion, I should like to assure hon. members that we are moving with all possible speed to meet the urgent requirements of Canadian families who lack the means to acquire proper accommodation. I appreciate the suggestions made by hon. members in all corners of the House in regard to this serious problem. At the same time I should like to say that we are now getting some housing on the ground and are proceeding with a continuous process of innovation and evaluation.

Indeed, in the broader sense the greatest weakness of the public housing program is that it is necessary, and at best is an attempt to treat the symptoms rather than the causes of a deep social problem. In this whole process we are deeply involved with our partners at the provincial level. Ideas are being proposed, discussed and modified, and I shall be keeping hon. members informed of the progress of these negotiations as they develop.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I believe that in all fairness I should give some credit to the minister for providing me with this statement at least one hour prior to the time I was to reply to it. I hope his colleagues on the treasury benches will realize that if the minister can do this with a statement of this length they should be able follow suit and do the same thing, rather than make statements to the media outside the House.

For me to comment in great depth or offer severe criticism of the statement of the minister would certainly be like being against motherhood. Keeping that in mind, I believe that some changes have been made which have been long awaited by many people who are concerned about the problem of public housing.

I recall that the housing task force had quite a bit to say about this matter. It indicated that the federal government should initiate a thorough research program into the economic, social and psychological issues of public housing, and went on to recommend that until such a study is completed and assessed, no new large projects should be undertaken.

The psychological area of public housing has given many people concern as to the need for, and perhaps the value of, public housing. I hope the minister is making some in-depth study of this question. I believe that what is needed in public housing is reform. There is no doubt that what the minister has done is some indication that this is happening.

The new rent scale will, of course, affect many people. In particular, the ability of a tenant to remain on a fixed rental for approximately two years will give him some hope that he will be able to move away from public housing and acquire his own home, though with rising interest rates and the lack of mortgage money I do not know how this is going to be possible.

I am particularly pleased to note that there has been some recognition of the value of tenants' associations. I believe this will bring them closer to where the action is. With groups such as this which want some participation in their ultimate destiny increasing in number throughout the country, it is important that the government recognize the effect they can have now and I believe will have in the future. I am also pleased to note that the government has indicated some awareness of the social and recreational needs. This is important in relation to public housing.

Finally, this action is something that we have all awaited. I hope the new policy will give many people who are faced with the very severe problem of housing an opportunity at least to be in a position to acquire housing at reasonable rental scales and perhaps lead in the future to the opportunity to own a home.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to preface my remarks by sincerely thanking the minister in charge of housing for his courtesy and co-operation in sending his statement to the housing critics of the different parties. The statement outlines a rearrangement of and addition to public housing guidelines which will result in some improvement, but it also portrays a fundamental misunderstanding of the problem by the minister, namely, the urgent need for a massive increase in public housing starts. The guidelines do not do anything for the 100,000 families across Canada who are on the long waiting lists for public housing. In Toronto alone there are 18,000 families, representing about 60,000 people, waiting for public housing.

The first and greatest need is more public housing. At the present time public housing represents less than 2 per cent of total housing starts in Canada, whereas in England and in European countries public housing represents between 30 per cent and 40 per cent. Even in our neighbour to the south it represents 5 per cent. Surely our immediate target for public housing should be between 15 per cent and 20 per cent of all housing in Canada.

Public housing has been considered a welfare concept. It should not be considered so. Housing should be a basic human right of all Canadians. They are entitled to clean, warm shelter at a reasonable cost. The minister cannot and should not say, as he did in his statement, that public housing is a regrettable necessity. He has missed the point of what housing should be.

My second major criticism is that the statement does not reflect the need for a proper mix of public housing with private, co-operative and senior citizen housing regardless of income levels. This integrating principle is absolutely necessary if we are to rid ourselves of the social stigma concept of public housing. We cannot continue to build segregation of the poor accommodation and increase the social problems caused by ghetto-like housing developments.

My third criticism concerns the failure to include the right of tenants to purchase public housing units. This would have given a pride of ownership and a stake in the community.

If I may comment briefly on the guidelines set forth, the rent scale revisions are welcome. There is a need for constant review so that the situation outlined by the minister will not occur again. The reduction of the percentage of income for rent from 30 per cent to 25 per cent is a progressive step. The increase in additional income allowable to working wives from $250 to $900 is a little short of $20 a week. The experts claim that the amount should be more like $1,500 which would represent $30 a week income for a working wife.

The two-year lease will give security of tenure and security of fixed rents. The social amenities are a decided improvement. Social and recreational facilities must include day care and counselling centres. The participation of tenants' organizations in management is social justice in action, and I add as a caveat that this participation by tenants must be meaningful rather than mere tokenism.

The minister in charge of housing has been a student of studies. He has always replied in the House when questioned about problems that he and his officials are studying these matters and that they are under consideration. I would hope the minister and his officials would graduate to men of action and that the minister's next statement would include a massive increase in public housing, a proper mix of public housing and other types of housing, and the right of tenants to purchase these public housing units.

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have not had the opportunity, like some of my colleagues in the opposition, of studying the statement made by the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing (Mr. Andras), prior to its delivery in the House, since I have not received a copy of it. A brief inquiry revealed that no member of our party has received a copy of that statement.

In any case, Mr. Speaker, I lent an attentive ear to the long statement of the minister, and I must say that I cannot support wholeheartedly all the proposals. The minister has rather shown the powerlessness and the incompetence of the government to run the country, as well as the setback it suffered in its fight against poverty, since the poor—the ever-present poor—will be compelled to live in so-called low-cost housing projects.

Mr. Speaker, a few months ago, I had the opportunity to visit a house build by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the National Research Council. In this experiment, the most inexpensive material and labour were used. The inside of the house was finished with paper, just plain paper, not real wall-paper, in short with materials such as would not be used for animals. The purpose of the experiment was to bring down the cost of homes in order to house the poor and the disadvantaged.

We now tell these people who have no hope of owning anything in their country, because of the present inefficient administration, that low-cost houses will be built to accommodate them.

It is clear that we must do something. The minister's statement will perhaps help to improve the fate of these people. However, no measure of a permanent nature is announced. In a country so rich in resources, and many unemployed, it is unconceivable that it should be impossible to house the population properly.

CONTRACT TRUCK TRANSPORT OF MAIL IN CITIES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Postmaster General but I suppose in view of its importance to the government of the country the Prime Minister will be in a position to deal with it. When the mail trucking contracts expire in Toronto, Vancouver and other cities, is it the intention of the government to put these contracts out to tender or to have the Post Office take on this responsibility as in Montreal? Could the Prime Minister indicate what the policy of the government is in this regard?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Postmaster General I might indicate there is no fixed pattern of choice between having mail deliveries made by a private contractor or by the Post Office service itself. If there is adequacy of private contractors sufficient to have a realistic form of competition and satisfactory services, this likely would be preferable.

FORMULA TO AVOID LABOUR RELATIONS DIFFICULTIES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): In those instances where it is still the policy of the government to call for tenders, has the minister or the government any formula to be applied in order to deal with problems which may arise such as those which arose in Montreal, particularly regarding job and union security, and also in view of the mounting unemployment in the larger cities? Has the minister a formula to avoid these difficulties or is it the intention to bull ahead and run the risks?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, we are endeavouring to work out a formula which will satisfactorily take account of all the interests involved.

MONTREAL POSTAL DISPUTE—PROSECUTION FOR CRIMINAL ACTS

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the President of the Treasury Board. Is it the intention of the government to lay charges against those people who have slashed tires and caused other damage to government trucks?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as the law provides, charges will be laid for criminal actions where the culprits can be apprehended.

MONTREAL POSTAL DISPUTE—NUMBER OF LAPALME EMPLOYEES HIRED BY GOVERNMENT—RE-OPENING OF NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the President of the Treasury Board.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Could he tell the House how many of the former employees of G. Lapalme Inc. have been hired by the government to ensure mail delivery in Montreal?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I have no information on that.

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board.

Could he tell us whether he intends to resume negotiations with the employees of G. Lapalme Inc. in order to bring about a satisfactory settlement of the postal dispute in Montreal which is of serious concern to the citizens of that city?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, the government has received no such proposals.

Mr. Asselin: I believe the minister has not understood my question, Mr. Speaker.

Does the minister intend to reopen negotiations with Lapalme Inc. employees who have not been integrated into the Public Service and with the labour union in order to find a solution to these employees' problem?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I believe the government has clearly explained its attitude to the labour union and if these explanations are not satisfactory, the union is free to ask for clarification.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supprementary question to the Prime Minister.

Can he tell us whether he intends to maintain in office the present Postmaster General or whether he has decided to make some changes following the difficulties which occurred in the postal service?

UNEMPLOYMENT INCREASE—POLICY RESPECTING RESTRAINTS AGAINST INFLATION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Arising out of the meeting which he and his colleagues had yesterday with the Association of Mayors and Municipalities in which the mayors, including Mayor Sidney Buckwold of Saskatoon, pointed out that major urban projects had ground to a halt and that there is a serious unemployment situation in the cities, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether, in light of these representations, the government is prepared to ease some of its restraints against inflation in those regions of Canada which are most adversely affected by unemployment at the present time?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the government has stated several times that it has policies for the parts of Canada which are more adversely affected by the fight against inflation. These are policies of assistance to them. As I indicated in the House by statistics the other day, these policies are working as satifactorily as we can hope for at the time.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the fact that this improvement has apparently not communicated itself to the mayors of the cities—

Mr. Hees: Nor is it evident in statistics.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): —and in view of the fact that a long list of economists, including Senator Lamontagne and the Economic Council of Canada, have disagreed with the government's policy of combating inflation by increasing unemployment and creating an economic slowdown, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he or the Minister of Finance would be prepared to make a statement on motions justifying the economic proposition upon which the government is operating and indicating what economists of this country, if any, are in support of the government's policy?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would be very pleased to consider the request of the hon. member. We think that the policies we are following are gradually working in Canada.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): But nobody else does.

Mr. Benson: Nobody likes to see high unemployment in the country. I should point out, however, that the March rate of unemployment in 1970 has been equalled or exceeded in 8 of the last 13 years, and the record was set when the Conservative party was in power in March, 1961.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. As a recent national survey of leading economists of the country has shown that 83 per cent of those contacted agreed that combating inflation by increasing unemployment is not the most effective method of attacking this problem, would the government give a sober second thought to its policy of restricting economic activity and give serious consideration to the effectiveness of offering tax incentives to reduce costs and keep price rises within prescribed government guidelines?

Mr. Trudeau: When the hon. member asks us to take a sober second thought I should like to tell him that our first thoughts are sober.

An hon. Member: What is that snide remark?

Mr. Trudeau: The economists to whom the hon. member referred are not in any agreement on the kind of policy they would like to see the government implement. There is total disagreement amongst them as to the remedies which should be followed in order to combat unemployment, but I think all of them understand that the choice is not between more or less unemployment but between inflation and unemployment and combating inflation and greater unemployment. We are doing the latter. We are fighting inflation in order to prevent greater unemployment.

Mr. Hees: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As the one thing on which almost all of the economists agree is that increasing unemployment is not the most effective method of combating inflation, I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether he would consider another suggestion which has received no denial from anyone in the country at present—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me the hon. member is reiterating the question he asked a moment ago.

Mr. Hees: I will carry on with the new question. I simply ask the Prime Minister, since he has refused to give any consideration to reducing unemployment, how much longer must bullheaded stupidity direct government policy in this very important matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: You are an expert in that field, George.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I would like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he will not consult the statistics and, in view of the amount of unemployment in the Atlantic provinces according to the last two DBS reports, will he not try to persuade the Prime Minister that in fact the slowdown policies have had a detrimental effect on these areas? Would he also not agree that the government of which he is a member is the first government in the last 13 years at least, and perhaps in Canadian history, to deliberately try to increase an already high rate of unemployment?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the observation of the Prime Minister that the government had given a sober thought before beginning its policy. In view of the strong criticism of Mr. Robert Bourassa, an economist in part, that this government's policy is all wrong and that he is going to do everything he can to change it, would the Prime Minister say whether or not Mr. Bourassa has voiced his objections to the Prime Minister directly and what suggestions he has made in order to arouse a sense of responsibility by this government?

Mr. Trudeau: He has not voiced his criticisms to me directly, and in this particular case I prefer to look to the authority of the Conservative financial critic.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You prefer him to Bourassa?

Mr. Trudeau: He testified before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs last November and supported the government's fight against inflation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Bourassa is not your man, then?

Mr. Speaker: I would prefer to see the provincial election carried on in another forum.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): You renounce him.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, instead of these lightweight answers that the Prime Minister has given—in fact, I could call them flyweight—would the Prime Minister now say whether he agrees or disagrees with the strong and bitter denunciation by Mr. Bourassa of the policies of the federal government which he says are entirely wrong and are creating unemployment?

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for York South.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister—

Mr. Speaker: Is the right hon. gentleman rising on a point of order?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister does not require assistance. He was getting ready to answer the question but Your Honour would not allow it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for York South.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I wish to ask the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance a supplementary question on this subject. The other day the Prime Minister suggested he was anxious to reach the point at which the inflationary psychology will have passed. I should like to ask either of these two gentlemen to tell the House and the people of Canada exactly what criteria they are using, at what point they think they will have licked the inflationary psychology, at what level of unemployment they think that will happen, whether they are awaiting a reversal of the price trend, or at what point Parliament and the people of Canada can expect the government to reverse its policy?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will allow the right hon. Prime Minister to reply to the question briefly. It seems to me that the hon. member is now asking for a general statement of policy. I doubt whether this kind of statement can be invited at this time. However, the Chair will allow the Prime Minister to reply to the hon. member's question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And when he is at it I wish he would reply to mine too.

Mr. Trudeau: I agree with you, sir, that this would require a reiteration of the policy statement which might be quite lengthy, but if I can sum up in capsule form an answer to the hon. member it would be to the effect that inflation will cease in Canada and the government will cease having to combat it when Canadians generally realize that prices and incomes should not rise any faster than productivity. In other words, they cannot take more out of the economy than they put into it, and obviously that point has not yet been reached.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the Prime Minister a further supplementary question. Can he inform the House what agency is studying and measuring productivity at any given time and the other factors to which the Prime Minister referred so that he will be able to judge the point at which these policies should be changed?

Mr. Speaker: This information might be included in the statement which will perhaps be made in reply to the hon. member's first question.

Mr. Lewis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I have not asked the Prime Minister to make a statement. I asked him what agencies he has to measure the points he has referred to. It seems to me it is a very simple question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question, of course, is limited in scope. What I suggest to the hon. member is that I have to revert to my first comment in connection with his original question, that he was inviting a general statement, and perhaps the kind of information he is seeking in the supplementary might be included in a statement made in reply to the first question.

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct to the Prime Minister another supplementary question about his views concerning inflation and unemployment.

Could he tell us whether the 100,000 jobs promised by Mr. Bourassa in Quebec would be liable to encourage inflation?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate on a supplementary.

UNEMPLOYMENT INCREASE—REPLY TO REPRESENTATIONS BY FEDERATION OF MAYORS AND MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether, in view of the representations made by the Federation of Mayors and Municipalities, he could give the House the position taken as a result of the representations and state whether any encouragement was given to the federation as to easing of the money supply or easing of funds for capital projects across the nation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the definition he just gave of an absence of inflation, the goal toward which he is heading, has been met in this country in any year since the war?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would not think that question is in order. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate on a supplementary.

An hon. Member: Which war?

Mr. Lundrigan: In view of the fact that the Prime Minister has indicated that he gave no encouragement to yesterday's representations by the Federation of Mayors and Municipalities could the Minister of Finance indicate whether in fact any major policy change in regard to finance is to be announced? In view of the fact that the government's anti-inflationary measures to help people on fixed and low incomes are having the effect of rendering these people unemployed and consequently having the reverse effect of the aim and intention of the government, can he indicate whether there is to be any major policy change in view of the effect of the anti-inflationary program?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Without agreeing with the conclusion reached by the hon. member, I should like to indicate that when there is to be a change in the monetary and fiscal policy of the government it will be announced in the House or by the Governor of the bank in the usual manner.

UNEMPLOYMENT INCREASE—ACTION TO SPEED UP PROCESSING OF INSURANCE BENEFITS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister which is related to a question I asked in the House last Friday. Would the Prime Minister request the Minister of Labour, at the first opportunity when he returns to the House, to make a statement on motions as to his intentions with regard to cleaning up the mess in the Unemployment Insurance Commission? This is necessary so that all those who are unemployed can receive their benefits on time without having to wait five or six weeks or, in some cases, two months.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Inquiries of the Ministry

SHIPPING

SINKING OF "PATRICK MORRIS"—STATIONING OF SEARCH AND RESCUE VESSEL IN SYDNEY HARBOUR

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Is he in a position today to report on the tragic marine disaster off the Cape Breton coast involving the Patrick Morris and the Enterprise and the terrible loss of life?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all members of the House share the very deep regret that we feel over the loss of these lives. I can advise the House and the hon. member that as of two o'clock this afternoon I have been informed that the vessel which rescued the crew members from the Patrick Morris had almost reached the point in Quebec which apparently was the only one to which it could go. The crew will then be flown to Sydney and at that point the interrogation will begin as to the cause of this unfortunate accident.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Having just returned from North Sydney and being familiar to some extent with the tragedy involving the Patrick Morris and the Enterprise which resulted in the loss of 12 lives, I ask if the minister is willing to reverse his most recent decision and recommend that a proper and qualified search and rescue vessel be stationed in Sydney harbour?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, an issue like this always raises questions of this sort. I have explained to the hon. member that I am concerned about this but I must say in all seriousness that on the preliminary reports I have it does not seem that it would have made any significant difference in this case.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): That is a matter of opinion, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that I and a large number of organizations in the area concerned, as the minister knows, have been for a number of years pressing transport ministers Pickersgill, Hellyer and the present incumbent to have a search and rescue vessel stationed in Sydney harbour, would the minister not agree that this continued loss of life must stop and, further, that the $10 million loss in the sinking of the Patrick Morris would have provided several search and rescue vessels and also might have prevented the loss of these lives which cannot be replaced?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I do not quarrel with the hon. member's contention; as I have said we are looking into this matter. It is exceedingly difficult to know where search and rescue vessels should be located in view of the vast amount of coastline that we have. However, I think there is some validity in the general proposition advanced by the hon. member.

SINKING OF "PATRICK MORRIS"—REPLACEMENT OF VESSEL

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have a question for the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker. As a consequence of the loss of the Patrick Morris, what contingency plans does his department have to replace this vessel and also to survey the whole situation of traffic crossing Cabot Strait, especially in the peak months of July and August, and the provision of additional vessels to carry this traffic?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, a search is under way at the moment on a worldwide basis to see if a replacement vessel can be obtained quickly. Some inquiries have also been made to determine how long it would take to build a replacement. I am told that a sister ship of the Patrick Morris may be available in a Scandinavian country. We are exploring all possibilities to get a replacement as quickly as possible.

SAFETY AND MANNING CONDITIONS ON WEST COAST TOWBOATS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a related question arising out of the matter of safety. The minister has referred to the terrible tragedy off the coast of Nova Scotia. What about the dangers of unsafe towboats in British Columbia to which his attention has been drawn? The workers claim that their safety is unprotected. I should like to ask the minister if he has something to say in this connection, having recently been in Vancouver, and whether the government is prepared to produce the report setting out how these American-owned vessels are refusing to follow Canadian marine safety precautions and are forcing men to work under circumstances which are unsafe and unjust?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I visited Vancouver on the weekend and held lengthy meetings with the representatives of the Canadian Merchant Seamen's Guild and the towboat owners association. I made the proposal to them that the head of the Canadian steamship inspection service would be sent to Vancouver to head a joint committee, made up of both union representatives and towboat owners, to make representations as to appropriate safety standards. I undertook to make available to them the report to which the right hon. member refers. Subsequently the Minister of Labour has concurred, and this is being done beginning tomorrow.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, it is only fair to thank the minister. I brought this matter to his attention last week and the promptness with which he acted should be a model for some of his colleagues.

USE OF 2-4-5T HERBICIDE

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Minister of Agriculture. In light of reports that the chemical weed killer 2-4-5T has been proven to cause gross birth malformations and even death to mice and rats in recent independent Canadian and United States experiments and in view of the fact that the United States has banned the use of this chemical, will the minister review the reported position taken recently by his department and ban the use of this herbicide in Canada?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe it would be useful to comment upon the press report on the registration status of the herbicide 2-4-5T. I have had a report from an interdepartmental committee on pesticides which includes, among others, a representative of the Food and Drug Directorate. The report I received on February 5 is to the effect that, in light of available scientific evidence, no change in the status of 2-4-5T as a herbicide is anticipated. I am also informed that the status of this herbicide, along with other agricultural chemicals, continues to be reviewed in light of this new information.

Mr. Gleave: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In light of the minister's statement and since in Viet Nam the use of this herbicide has been discontinued by the United States army, which is not noted for its humanitarian activities, what investigation or research has the department currently under way in order to find acceptable alternative chemicals for the purposes for which 2-4-5T is presently used?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, 2-4-5T is used in very limited areas in Canada for some very specialized purposes, and the information we have is that there is no residue from the use of it in the food being produced in those areas. In other words, there is a nil residue. I have to rely on the evidence given to me by the people who are experts in studying these things on a continuing basis.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

INDUSTRY

CONSIDERATION OF FOREIGN OWNERSHIP IN MAKING INCENTIVE GRANTS

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the returns provided to me by the government showing that fewer than 43 per cent of industrial financial grants have been awarded to Canadian owned or controlled firms, can the minister indicate whether the government is reviewing these programs with regard to making foreign ownership one criterion in the allocation of government financial incentives or grants?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker, but the hon. member must bear in mind that these statistics must be studied in relation to non-resident ownership of Canadian industry. In the industrial areas where these grants are made it is estimated that non-resident ownership is at 63 per cent level at this moment.

TRANSPORT

USE OF LACHINE CANAL AS PLEASURE CRAFT MARINA

Mr. Raymond Rock (Lachine): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport in reference to a Superior Court decision that the Seaway Authority keep the 145-year old Lachine Canal open. It is claimed that the Seaway Authority has not received the canal from Parliament or from the Governor General in Council. Would the minister have his department take over the operation of this canal from the Seaway Authority and then study the possibility of using it as a large pleasure craft marina for the greater Montreal area?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet seen the judgment of the court with regard to the order in question and I prefer to refrain from answering until I have done so.

PROVISION OF EMPLOYMENT FOR LAID-OFF ELECTRONICS INDUSTRY WORKERS

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the learned, and laconic Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It is on a matter about which I warned him some time ago, namely, the serious decline in the nation's electronics industry resulting from government policies. In view of the fact that Canadian General Electric has announced the closing out of its tube section in Toronto and the laying off of over 160 employees, is the minister now prepared to do something to arrest this enforced unemployment?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I gave a very lengthy answer to the hon. member a few weeks ago on that very subject. I will send the hon. member a copy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I doubt whether the loquacity of the minister will be of much help to the unemployed. As Minister of Industry will he now try to do something in order to find alternative employment for those people who are unemployed because of government policy?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I answered that very aspect of the matter. I said at the time that, contrary to the views of the opposition, it was not possible to freeze Canadian industry, that industries will have to change, as circumstances were altering; that, in this case, employment had been developed in other areas but for other people. I covered that aspect very well, I thought.

POLLUTION

OIL—ACTION RESPECTING SITUATION IN TORONTO HARBOUR

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has he identified the source, which although not overly serious could be potentially so, of the oil pollution problem evident in Toronto harbour this morning. If so, what action has been taken and what steps are at present being taken to clean this up before it has an opportunity to spread?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I must confess that this particular spill has not been brought to my personal attention.

An hon. Member: What?

Mr. Jamieson: I can be quite certain, however, that the inspection teams we normally have on the Great Lakes and on the St. Lawrence Seaway are using the normal routines.

Mr. Bell: Where are the Toronto members?

An hon. Member: Where is Phil Givens?

FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING AGENCIES—DELAY OF LEGISLATION PENDING STUDY OF TASK FORCE REPORT

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. It is a follow-up of the question I directed to him last Thursday relative to a telegram directed to him by the Winnipeg Grain Exchange which urgently requested that further action on Bill C-197, the bill dealing with farm products marketing agencies, be held in abeyance until the report of the agricultural task force is tabled and studied. Has the minister now received this telegram, and what was his reply to this reasonable and logical request?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have received the telegram. I am not sure of the precise reply but it will be to the effect or along lines that I answered the other day, that there will be an opportunity for a great deal of study of this bill when it goes to the Standing Committee on Agriculture, which I hope will be very soon.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

U.S. B-52 FLIGHTS OVER SASKATCHEWAN AND ALBERTA—COMPLAINTS BY FLYING CLUBS

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Has the Department of National Defence requested or put into effect a change in the route or direction of Strategic Air Command B-52 flights over Saskatchewan and Alberta as a result of many protests, particularly those by flying clubs in Saskatchewan and Alberta?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the answer to that question is no, but I understand that the United States authorities have agreed to suspend weekend activities in order to accommodate the flying clubs.

Mr. Burton: May I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker. Has the Department of Transport given consideration to the representations made by flying clubs in Saskatchewan on this matter?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, but the matter comes under the direct responsibility of the Minister of National Defence.

HOUSING

SUBSIDIZING OF MORTGAGE INTEREST AND RENT PAYMENTS OUTSIDE OF PUBLIC HOUSING

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing arises from his earlier announcement, but it deals with other categories in the low income groups. Would the minister indicate whether Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will be permitted to move into two fields of subsidization, first, the subsidization of mortgage interest and, second, the subsidization of payment of rent outside of public housing?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the first part of the question, we are still examining that matter. With regard to the second part, we have offered and reiterated the offer last June that provincial governments go out and acquire existing housing, either on a lease or purchase basis. The federal subsidy would then apply. That is in the public housing program but it makes available accommodation under these circumstances without our having to wait for new buildings to be developed.

MEETING WITH PROVINCIAL AND MUNICIPAL REPRESENTATIVES TO INCREASE HOUSING STARTS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing. Would the minister meet with his counterparts at the provincial level and with representatives of the Association of Mayors and Municipalities in order to formulate some speedy plan which could be invoked whereby housing starts could be increased and more money placed within this sector? Perhaps employment could be increased at the same time. Would the minister take that into consideration?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, as always I will take everything the hon. member says into consideration.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

COMMEMORATION OF 25TH ANNIVERSARY OF VE DAY

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I wonder if the minister would disclose, for the benefit of the House and veterans across Canada, what plans are being made to commemorate the twenty-fifth anniversary of VE Day both in Canada and in Europe?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I made a statement before the appropriate committee on Thursday in which I explained the very impressive and colourful ceremonies which we are planning for May 8 here in Ottawa. I repeat that a delegation of about 20 Canadians will join with the citizens of Holland in the first week of May to commemorate the liberation of Holland, which liberation was greatly assisted by the Canadian forces 25 years ago.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): A supplementary question. Will the Members of Parliament in that delegation include the hon. member for Humber-St. George's St. Barbe?

Mr. Dubé: Mr. Speaker, there will be two Members of Parliament, both from the other side. One is the opposition house leader and the other is a member of the loyal rump.

Inquiries of the Ministry

AIR TRANSPORT

NORTHWESTERN ONTARIO—EXPLOITATION OF NATURAL RESOURCES BY U.S. OPERATORS

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. What steps, if any, are being taken by the Minister of Transport or his department to prevent American fly-in operators from exploiting the natural resources of northwestern Ontario, leaving behind nothing more than their empty beer cans? They are robbing our own Canadian air carrier entrepreneurs of much needed business.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I suppose I could insist that they at least buy Canadian beer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: I want to assure the hon. member there have been many representations from his area. I have made some inquiries and have asked officials to make recommendations that hopefully will solve the problem or at least make it a little less difficult than at present.

Mr. Penner: A supplementary question. Will the minister agree to suspend the 9-4 licences now in effect until a thorough investigation has been carried out to stop this exploitation?

Mr. Jamieson: I do not think it is within my competence to do that. I repeat that I will do everything I can.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Does the minister realize that he was unmasked in absentia yesterday during second reading of the fisheries amendment bill? Many of us do not like what we see, namely the minister being established as the czar of water quality in Canada. On reflection, will the minister agree that if we are going to have such a czar it should be the Minister of Fisheries?

POLLUTION

CONVERSION OF GOVERNMENT CARS TO NATURAL GAS FUEL

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): I wish to update a question which I asked on January 28, 1970 as recorded at page 2937 of Hansard. My question was addressed to the Minister of Supply and Services and I quote:

> In view of the report by the general services administrator of the United States, does the Canadian government plan a conversion of government cars to natural gas fuel which trials have shown to be successful in eliminating pollution?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): There is no plan to make such a conversion in Canada, Mr. Speaker.

FISHERIES

LAKE ERIE—REQUIREMENT THAT PERCH FILLETS BE FROZEN AND HELD BEFORE SALE

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): My question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. In view of the fact that the ban on sales of fresh perch has been lifted, why is it still necessary that fresh perch fillets be frozen and held before they can be sold, depriving the fishermen of this lucrative market?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): I do not know about the freezing aspect. We are continuing to check all shipments of fish from Lake Erie to make certain before they reach the market that there is no question of mercury contamination.

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the problem with Lake Erie, is it possible for the department to speed up the testing program as it is delaying the sales of fish by these fishermen? Is there some way it could be speeded up from the two to two and a half week delay which is now being experienced by some fishermen?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is now making a statement or representation which he must assume will be taken into account by the minister. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The time for questions has expired. In view of the fact the Chair has recognized the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, perhaps he might be allowed a question.

BANK OF CANADA

EXTENSION OF SUPPLEMENTARY RETIREMENT BENEFITS TO FORMER EMPLOYEES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. On March 24 the minister responded favourably when I asked him if he would discuss with the officials of the Bank of Canada the possibility of supplementary pensions for retired employees of the bank. Is the minister yet in a position to report on his discussions with those officials?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I did raise the matter with the Governor of the Bank of Canada. I have not received his comments to this point.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I trust it is being pursued.

Mr. Benson: Of course, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order before Orders of the Day are called. If it meets with the approval of the House, I suggest that speeches today be limited to 15 minutes each with the exception of the initial spokesmen representing each of the four parties who would be permitted the time provided in the rules.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That is quite agreeable on this side, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—CRITICISM OF AUDITOR GENERAL BY GOVERNMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition) moved:

That this House condemns the government for criticizing the Auditor General of Canada for carrying out his duties according to law; and reasserts its support of the principle of unfettered parliamentary scrutiny of government expenditures including the right of the Auditor General to comment on the failure of the government to make expenditure in strict compliance with parliamentary appropriations and to report on these and any other cases he feels should be brought to the attention of Parliament.

He said: Mr. Speaker, one purpose of these opposition days is to let Parliament protest flagrant failures or abuses of the government. As Your Honour can appreciate, it is difficult to know where to start.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The government has deliberately brought insecurity and fear into the homes of hundreds of thousands of Canadians with its determination to deliberately create unemployment. I was shocked to learn from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) this afternoon that he intends to continue with this course until the country achieves complete and absolute price stability. I mention this only as an indication of how completely unrealistic that goal is.

Mr. Stanfield: It is clear, Mr. Speaker, that the government will not stop this policy with regard to unemployment despite the views of Senator Lamontagne, Robert Bourassa and the unanimous opposition of this House as well as the unemployed outside the House. We devote this day to an area where we may have a better chance to stop the government, where we can try to stop the clear attempt to throttle the power of the Auditor General. Statements by ministers and answers to questions by the Prime Minister make it clear that the government intends to restrain the Auditor General if, indeed, the government is not out to get him. His crime is that, as Auditor General, he is doing his job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The government will discover that it is all alone in wanting to pull the teeth of the Auditor General. Most Canadians believe the Auditor General is not only doing a good job, but a necessary job. I serve notice now that we will do everything in our power to protect and maintain the powers of the Auditor General as a watchdog—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: —until there is a guarantee that he will not lose a single power to scrutinize Government spending and to blow the whistle when that money is badly spent.

The recent statements are not, of course, the first attempt of this government to harrass the Auditor General and make it difficult for him to carry out his responsibilities. The government has frequently ignored his recommendations. It has reduced the salary classifications of some, at least, of his staff so that it has not been possible for him to hire people with the qualifications he considers necessary. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) says there are vacancies on the Auditor General's staff.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I never said that.

Mr. Stanfield: It was the President of Treasury Board (Mr. Drury). I do not want to be unfair to the President of the Privy Council.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Thank you.

Mr. Stanfield: There are bound to be vacancies when the salaries authorized do not permit the hiring of people with the necessary qualifications. This, of course, has impeded the ability of the Auditor General to carry out his responsibilities to the extent he would wish. So, his office has been abused and his powers are under attack by this hypersensitive government. Indeed, he has been attacked so vigorously that today most Canadians are sure that Maxwell Henderson must be right.

For the record, let us review the latest assault on the Auditor General. On March 25, speaking on the C.B.C. national news, the President of the Privy Council said, and I quote:

> We do not regard it as his responsibility to criticize the underlying policy involved in certain decisions. That is Parliament's responsibility, and the government's, as approved by Parliament, after deciding on policy. We don't think it is the Auditor General's prerogative to comment on that.

Then, on April 11, the President of Treasury Board, speaking about the Auditor General on the C.B.C. television program "Encounter", said—and I quote him as reported.

> He has expressed his view as to the appropriateness of some government policy. In this sense he is pitting his judgment as to sound business practice and sound government policy against the government's and, not unnaturally, you would not expect the government to agree with his judgment in every instance. I wonder, myself, whether the Auditor General should cast himself in this role, or whether we should look for, really, another kind of person to be Auditor General.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Stanfield: I hope somebody on the government side will tell us specifically what the Auditor General has done wrong. On Monday of last week, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) admitted under questioning that the government intended to bring in new legislation concerning the Auditor General. I had reminded the Prime Minister that the Auditor General had been pressing the government to introduce legislation to strengthen his office and to define his duties in a more satisfactory way. I asked the Prime Minister why, instead of proceeding with this legislation, he and his ministers preferred to pick at the Auditor General and undermine his prestige and authority. The Prime Minister answered, and I quote:

> It is not a question of either/or, Mr. Speaker. We believe we shall be able to do both.

There is the Freudian slip. I asked why he did not proceed with the legislation rather than pick on the Auditor General and undermine his authority, and the Prime Minister answered he thought they would be able to do both. Judging from the Prime Minister's answer he intends to make it easier to harass, or escape from, the Auditor General; he intends to give his present attack on the Auditor General the force of law. This would represent a typical manœuvre on the part of the present government. The Auditor General has been asking for a long time for a review of the legislation governing his office. He has drafted his own proposals for consideration. There is a grave danger that the government will use this request as cover for legislation which will strip him of the power necessary for his office. Then, I suppose, Information Canada will be set in motion to explain that this is what the Auditor General had wanted.

This is not the occasion on which to discuss the contents of legislation. But let the Prime Minister and the President of the Treasury Board understand that if they try a trick like that, not even Information Canada will be able to help them. What members opposite are saying, in effect, is that since the government cannot stand the heat, Mr. Henderson should get out of the kitchen. I presume they want to lock him up in the cellar where no one can see him or hear him.

There are proper and above-board ways in which the government could deal with an Auditor General if it believes he is wrong. If it believes he is incompetent, it has the right to introduce in both Houses a motion for his dismissal. If it believes he is wrong in his criticisms of the government, it has a right, of course, to answer those criticisms in detail before the Public Accounts Committee. It is unforgivable that the government should begin an attack on the Auditor General under the table to undermine and harass an officer of this House whose functions are of the most basic importance to this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: Clearly, the government has under-estimated Mr. Henderson, just as they have under-estimated the strength of support his office commands in the country at large.

This appears to be another case where the strategy was planned by the President of the Privy Council. I expect that in the debate today we shall get another round of double-talk from the government in defence of the indefensible. But one thing is clear as this debate begins—it is so clear that no amount of double-talk can obscure it: the real reason the government wants to muzzle Mr. Henderson is that it cannot take criticism. The government would rather waste $40 million than have somebody point out the waste so that they could stop it. They have the mentality of a man who, when accused of a crime, tries to fire the policeman.

Consider some of the double-talk which has already come from the government side. The President of the Treasury Board defended his attack on the Auditor General in terms of a switch in government emphasis to "effectiveness rather than efficiency". I find that hard to understand. It sounds very much like something from Alice in Wonderland. This questioning of the work of the Auditor General is based, according to the President of the Treasury Board, upon the emphasis the government is placing on effectiveness rather than upon efficiency. Perhaps somebody else could explain that. This statement by the minister is taken, as a direct quotation, from the "Encounter" transcript. Whatever it means, I do not think Parliament can ignore such a statement. It would be bad enough for a government to renounce a claim to efficiency; it is the only claim the government had. Now, it is gone, like the just society.

I suspect that in fact there is meaning of some sort hiding behind the minister's words, which are effective, perhaps, in persuading the people that the government is doing its job when it is not doing its job. After all, efficiency implies you are doing a job. It is the difference between image and action. The minister's statement, whatever else it means, clears away any doubt that might remain about the central role of Information Canada and image politics in the program of this government. The minister's statement is quite a principle! It is very flexible.

Another example of double talk is the distinction being made between matters of policy and what I suppose must be called matters of non-policy. As I understand it, that is the distinction that the Prime Minister and the President of the Privy Council would make, and I suppose there is no one better qualified on questions of non-policy. What does this distinction mean? The Prime Minister suggested the other day he thought it was wrong that the Auditor General should criticize the payment made by order in council of some $180 million to automobile companies. He said it was wrong to have this kind of criticism from the Auditor General, presumably on the ground that this was a deliberate decision to let the $180 million go.

In other words, when waste is deliberate, the watchdog should be quiet. When waste is deliberate the Auditor General has no right to comment on it, because it then becomes a matter of waste by government policy. That is quite a principle! It will not be long now before the government will argue that the decision to refit the Bonaventure at high cost was a deliberate decision, and therefore should not be investigated. I suppose that if horses were put on the payroll as a matter of deliberate policy, this too would be beyond the comment of the Auditor General.

The government knows that if it is going to close the door on the Auditor General with regard to questions involving policy decisions, it is virtually closing the door completely. After all, this distinction between policy and non-policy from this point of view is not really a distinction at all; it is a dodge that is designed to strip the Auditor General of power without appearing to have removed his power.

As Professor Norman Ward pointed out in his special correspondence in the Ottawa Journal last night, other governments have tried a dodge like that before. This government is original in very few respects. Professor Ward is the author of the standard text on government spending in Canada, called "The Public Purse", and he makes it clear that there is ample precedent for an Auditor General to be concerned with auditing questions involving policy decisions. That has been the practice of the Auditor General whenever and wherever that office has been effective.

This concept goes to the very heart of the power of the Auditor General. Without that power he is just another accountant. With the power to report to the public, through this House, the cost of decisions by the goverment on policy matters, he is a public servant that the government cannot ignore and one of the very best friends that the taxpayer has in Ottawa.

Criticism is, of course, a function of the opposition and one which is more necessary today than ever before. But I do not hesitate to admit that an effective opposition needs the help of an independent and fearless Auditor General, backed up by an adequate staff. Even with the staff the Auditor General has today we can see what he is reporting, and we can suspect without being too suspicious that we are only seeing, and that he is only finding, the tip of the iceberg.

I suppose someone will say something about all the help the government is giving the opposition in the matter of research staff. I hope that nobody is going to suggest that this is an effective substitute for an efficient and fully powered Auditor General. In any event, I hope nobody on that side of the House will keep repeating this sort of thing in view of the fact that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) is spending more money during the course of a few months on answering letters that he has received in connection with the white paper than is available to all opposition parties for research in a full year.

Under this government there is a tendency to secrecy, the use of task forces and confidential studies by consultants which, generally speaking, are not made public. Usually, we do not get the background papers that lie behind government decisions. I say that this policy of secrecy and confidentiality certainly must not be extended. For example, the government has never made public the estimates upon which its decision to abandon the Prince Edward Island causeway was based. That was a high-handed and arrogant attitude shown toward a little province. Perhaps the government will get away with it, I do not know; but we are at any rate grateful that at least the Auditor General can tell the people the cost that has already been incurred as a result of the decision the government made, though the government does not seem to be very happy at having these figures disclosed.

Attacks by ministers on the Auditor General should be seen as part of a larger strategy, a strategy that is designed to control information. It might be thought strange that a government that has proposed and has established Information Canada should at the same point in time attack and try to restrict the operations of the Auditor General. This simply sheds light upon the role of Information Canada as seen by the ministers of this government, and sheds further light upon the government's refusal to agree to the establishment of some kind of ombudsman to watch over Information Canada. Indeed, what makes this attack on the Auditor General so alarming is that it does not stand alone: it is part of a pattern of deliberate actions by this government to build up its own power and to break down the power of its critics.

The attack on Parliament came first. Here, the government showed so much contempt for this institution that it used closure to impose a rule that was so badly drafted it would not work. That attitude is clear in the establishment of a propaganda agency. It follows an ill-conceived move by the President of the Privy Council to bring about a change in the chairmanship of the public accounts committee, presumably because that chairman was being too independent.

Following this the Auditor General came under attack. The government is not only adding to its own power; it has set a deliberate course to silence or at least to weaken the critics whose powers had previously been established precisely to check the abuse of the power of government. The Canadian public and the members of this House require hard information, particularly about financial matters rather than the kind of pap that may be provided by Information Canada. What is required is the hard kind of information that is provided by the Auditor General of this country, whether the government likes it or not.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: This attempt to muzzle the Auditor General does not make sense in any other context than as part of a plan to stop criticism and limit debate. Certainly, it cannot be defended in terms of efficiency. A government should welcome criticism if it wants to be efficient, or even if it wants to be effective, whatever the difference is in real terms and not image terms. In the first place, that is surely what democracy is all about? Any government which in one session sets up Information Canada in order to mold opinion, and at the same session tries to cut down the Auditor General is fashioning a democracy that is not participatory but perverse.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: Sir, it is my experience that criticism from an officer like the Auditor General ought to be helpful to a government. When I became the premier of Nova Scotia there was no Auditor General. There was a sort of a balance sheet audit, and apparently the government is seeking to return to it. We established an Auditor General. From time to time, certain reports of the Auditor General are annoying, but there is no question about it, they make for better government. An Auditor General can point up mistakes when they are small enough to stop. He will often be far more searching in his examination and more frank in his comment than members of a cabinet would be. By virtue of his access to the public service he can often find mistakes more quickly than a parliamentary opposition can. He can help the government spot mistakes and stop mistakes before they get too far out of control.

Certainly, this attack on the Auditor General is not designed to improve the efficiency of government operations. Sometimes, of course, the criticisms of an Auditor General will combine with public opinion to force a government to change its course. This, of course, is one of the risks of a democracy. The point of government is not always to get its own way and to bulldoze its programs through. The point is to implement a program which meets public needs and will stand public criticism. In any event, the importance of an effective Auditor General increases and will continue to increase as the role of government increases. The role of government is increasing rapidly and it seems likely it will continue to grow both in size and complexity. The cost of government is going up, as is the amount of money it has to spend or to waste. That will be particularly so if the government succeeds in smuggling through massive tax increases under the guise of tax reform.

I suggest what should be done with the Auditor General is to increase his power, not reduce it. I would think this would be the obvious course to be supported by any true friend of democracy in Canada. With a government increasing in size and complexity, the Auditor General's powers ought to be increased. Certainly, it is wrong to harass and undermine this important official. It is important to this House at this time to assert its support for this watchdog, and assert the support of this House for the role of the Auditor General against an arrogant and over-riding government. Therefore, I do ask the House and call upon its members to support the motion I have the honour to present to it this afternoon.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the members of this party wholeheartedly support the motion which is now before the House because we believe that an independent and courageous Auditor General is absolutely essential to honest and democratic government. We look upon the Auditor General not as someone responsible to the government, but as an officer of Parliament who reports to Parliament and the Canadian people regarding any irregularity which he may have found in the expenditure of public funds.

His powers are quite extensive. Section 70 of the Financial Administration Act of 1969 outlines his powers. It reads:

> The Auditor General shall report annually to the House of Commons the results of his examinations and shall call attention to every case in which he has observed that
> (a) any officer or employee has willfully or negligently omitted to collect or receive any money belonging to Canada,
> (b) any public money was not duly accounted for and paid into the Consolidated Revenue Fund,
> (c) any appropriation was exceeded or was applied to a purpose or in a manner not authorized by Parliament,
> (d) an expenditure was not authorized or was not properly vouched or certified,
> (e) there has been a deficiency or loss through the fraud, default or mistake of any person, or
> (f) a special warrant authorized the payment of any money, and to any other case that the Auditor General considers should be brought to the notice of the House of Commons.

I draw particular attention to that last very wide term of reference, namely "to any other case that the Auditor General considers should be brought to the notice of the House of Commons".

In a parliamentary system, an unfettered and independent Auditor General is the greatest guarantee the Canadian people have and that Parliament has that the government is following the expenditures and the manner of expenditures set forth by parliamentary appropriation. Any person who appreciates the role of the Auditor General in our parliamentary system could not but regard the attempts by ministers of this government as attempts to denigrate and to harass the present Auditor General, to weaken his effectiveness as a protector of the public purse. As a matter of fact, the government has the most to gain from having a fearless Auditor General. No Prime Minister could hope to supervise completely all his ministers. No minister could hope effectively to watch every branch of his department. The best guarantee they have that someone is keeping a watchful eye on the government's financial transactions is to have an independent and fearless Auditor General.

Instead of appreciating the role of the Auditor General, this government has attacked him. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) went so far as to say on a public broadcast that perhaps we should look for some other kind of person to be the Auditor General. I ask the question, "What kind of an Auditor General does the President of the Treasury Board want? Does he want a timid, docile one who will know how to put his blind eye to the telescope? Does he want one who will do whatever the government tells him to do?" Is that what the government wants? Are we to take it that this government which is spending $7½ million to set up Information Canada to tell the Canadian people what it wants them to know has now set its concept of a just society to be one in which the government hires the propagandists and fires the critics?

The government's attitude towards the Auditor General is like the attitude of a player who has committed a foul and then complains about the referee. What is the criticism of the Auditor General? The minister complains that he has been making comments on policy and that this does not come within his jurisdiction. What comments on policy has he made? The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has agreed on at least one area that is in dispute. On Monday April 13, as recorded at page 5773 of Hansard, I asked the Prime Minister the following question:

> Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Is the government's contention that the Auditor General has invaded the field of government policy based on the Auditor General's Criticism of the government for paying out over $180 million to the automobile companies by Order in Council because these companies could not comply with motor vehicle tariff order No. 1965? Is this the basis of the government's criticism? Does the government consider this to be an invasion of government policy?

The Prime Minister replied:

> Mr. Speaker, I think that this is an area of government policy. It may be that government policy is not right or is not effective or appropriate, in which case we hope that we will be criticized roundly by the opposition. But it seems to me that this is an example where there is a criticism of policy and not of honesty or procedure.

The Auditor General must also satisfy himself that the government is complying with the parliamentary control of expenditures. He has a right to know whether expenditures made by the government were authorized by this Parliament and whether those expenditures have any legislative or statutory basis. Let us look at the particular instance of which the Prime Minister complained, namely the Auditor General's criticism of the government's concessions of $180 million to certain automobile companies. The comments of the Auditor General are to be found at pages 94, 95 and 96 of his report for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1969. At page 94, the report reads:

> It was further determined that the company was qualified for remission under Order in Council P.C. 1969-172 with the result that estimated remissions to all companies under this Order in Council now exceed $180 million. Of this amount, an estimated $173 million is applicable to this one vehicle manufacturer.

I take it, Mr. Speaker, that this is a reference to the Ford Motor Company of Canada. At page 95, the Auditor General goes on to say:

> From the evidence given, it is obvious that in determining whether or not a vehicle manufacturer has complied with the requirements of the Motor Vehicles Tariff Order 1965, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Department of Finance follow criteria additional to those incorporated in the Tariff Order. The officials of these Departments, when testifying before the Committee, appeared to place greater emphasis on criteria which are not included in the Tariff Order than on certain criteria which are included.

As recorded at page 96, the Auditor General says:

> The absence from the Tariff Order of many of the criteria established by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Department of Finance for determining liability for duty has also led at least one vehicle manufacturer to believe that he was not required to meet the conditions of the Tariff Order to earn entitlement to duty-free treatment. It is therefore essential that the Motor Vehicles Tariff Order 1965 be amended to spell out all the criteria to be followed in determining liability for payment of duty.

In the next paragraph, he says:

> ... we believe that all duties and taxes should be collected at the time of importation and that benefits or incentives provided should be made available to the vehicle manufacturers only when evidence is produced that the required conditions have been met.

The situation as set out by the Auditor General is very clear. Under the Canada-U.S. auto agreement manufacturers are entitled to certain rebates and the criteria for these rebates are set out in Motor Vehicles Tariff Order No. 1965. Most of the companies have complied with the Tariff Order and there has been no problem, but the Ford Motor Company and a few smaller parts manufacturers did not comply. The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Department of Finance insisted that there were other agreements, not part of the U.S.-Canada auto agreement or the Tariff Order but rather agreements which never to my knowledge were submitted to Parliament, under which the Ford Motor Company was entitled to $173 million and some of the small parts manufacturers to some $7 million.

This was fully confirmed the other evening when I raised this matter on an adjournment debate. On Thursday, April 16 I raised the matter as recorded at page 5977 of Hansard. The reply of the parliamentary secretary to the Solicitor General is to be found at page 5978. He confirms the fact that there are two sets of criteria. He says:

> The government therefore entered into more comprehensive agreements with each of the motor vehicle companies in Canada . . .

He goes on to say:

> However, it was determined that while certain companies had not fully met all the particular terms of the original definition of manufacturers as set out in the original order, they had in fact met or exceeded the objectives set by the government for total production performance. Therefore, the government exercised the authority given it by Parliament under section 22 of the Financial Administration Act to pass an Order in Council confirming certain moneys were not in fact owing to it for customs duties.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Here we have a double standard. We have a standard in a Tariff Order with which certain auto companies were able to comply, so they were entitled to these financial concessions. Other companies could not and did not comply, but under some other mysterious, unknown and confidential arrangement, about which apparently only the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Department of Finance knew, over $180 million was forgiven to these companies, and $173 million of it to the Ford Motor Company. It is interesting that the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Caccia) should say these payments were made under authority of section 22 of the Financial Administration Act. But the Financial Administration Act says that the Governor in Council on the recommendation of the Treasury Board, whenever he considers it in the public interest, may remit any tax, fee or penalty. How do you remit money that has never been paid?

The parliamentary secretary himself said, as recorded at page 5978 of Hansard, that no money was ever paid. So what the government did was not to remit, but to use the Financial Administration Act to forgive over $180 million that was due to the treasury of Canada. We are not dealing here with policy. The government cannot seem to get that out of its mind. The parliamentary secretary the other day in replying to me said:

> Having devoted his time and effort to the legalistic aspect of the question, I hope the hon. member will recognize the fact that this agreement has produced employment for thousands of Canadians.

This is not the point at issue at all. The point at issue is that over $180 million of money owing the treasury of Canada was forgiven on the basis of criteria that are not set down in any act. They are not set down in any regulations and they are not contained in the Motor Vehicles Tariff Order. This is a double standard. Why is the Ford Motor Company treated differently from General Motors or from Chrysler Motors? Are there to be two criteria with, some companies paying under the tariff order and some paying under some secret, negotiated agreement to which the parliamentary secretary made reference? What is this agreement? Where is it? Why is it not put in some legislative form? What the Auditor General is complaining about is not whether the Canada automobile agreement is a good or a bad thing. What I am complaining about is not whether it produces more or less jobs. The question that is before the House is whether or not any government has the authority to forgive certain corporations over $180 million without any legislative or statutory authority.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): If this Parliament loses control of the purse strings, then Parliament might as well go home. It is not a matter of honesty of procedure, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said. If the government can hand out $180 million by order in council, it could be, since we do not know what is in the comprehensive agreements with the automobile companies, that the government has embarked upon the most gigantic give away since Manhattan was sold by the Indians for $24 and a bottle of whiskey.

Mr. Cafik: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I only have limited time. When I am finished, the hon. member can ask it.

It could be, on the other hand, that the companies in question do comply with an agreement and are entitled to this money. However, this agreement should be in legislative form. The money should be paid according to stipulations laid down and approved by this Parliament, not on the decision of the government.

That is why I want to move this amendment:

That the motion be amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a comma, and by adding immediately thereafter the following words: "and this House further declares that the Auditor General has served the interests of Canada by drawing Parliament's attention to the improper concessions of over $180 million made to motor vehicle manufacturers by order in council."

It seems to me that the question which the House has to determine in this amendment is whether the Auditor General was justified in bringing this matter to the attention of Parliament and the Canadian people. The Prime Minister said he was not justified. Judging by the comments of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), he thinks he was not justified. I am asking this House to state that he was justified and that there was no justification whatsoever for a government forgiving over $180 million to the automobile manufacturers in question without any proper authorization or any statutory basis whatsoever. I believe that Parliament and the country have a right to know on what basis this $180 million was forgiven. I think we have a right to know if the government intends to continue making these payments to the Ford Motor Company and to other companies which cannot come within the ambit of the Tariff Order of 1965.

I want to say in closing that we believe government expenditures must be kept under close parliamentary scrutiny, and that if we are going to do that then we must support the Auditor General. I believe the Auditor General has done a good job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I believe that drawing attention to the fact that some $40 million—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, particularly in view of the fact that he is just closing, but I am afraid I have to draw the attention of the House to the fact that his time has expired. Is the House agreed that he should continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I shall only trespass upon the good nature of the House for a few minutes more. I wanted to conclude by saying that in our opinion, if parliamentary democracy is to survive in this country, we must maintain parliamentary control over expenditures. I believe that the Auditor General is an important cog in the parliamentary process. I think he has done a good job in drawing attention to the fact that in the fiscal year which he reviewed in his last report there was some $40 million of waste. Instead of the government taking umbrage at those criticisms, the government should learn from them and correct the situation. Nobody expects a government to be infallible. It can be taken for granted that any government will have some people within its employ who will make mistakes, and the government should be glad to have these matters drawn to their attention. Instead of that, this government has become petulant, critical and abusive.

I think that if the Auditor General is going to do his job properly, he must have more staff. Some years ago I remember visiting Westminster at the time that the Labour party was in opposition. Mr. Harold Wilson was then the chairman of the public accounts committee. He had a very large staff and adequate facilities. Members were paid their expenses to remain during the recess, and they carried out a minute examination and a careful scrutiny of government expenditures. Every possible assistance was given to them by the government in office to make absolutely sure that they could report back to the house in all honesty that they had found everything to be in good order. We do not give our Public Accounts Committee the kind of staff or assistance that they need. But at least we ought to give it to the Auditor General. He ought to be able to do his job with a high degree of efficiency.

I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that the Financial Administration Act, section 65, clause 4 states that the Auditor General is entitled to "such offices and employees as are necessary to enable the Auditor General to perform his duties." Who is to determine what is necessary? Surely only the Auditor General can decide how much and what classification of staff he needs. Surely, he ought to be allowed to make that decision. The government would do well to see that the Auditor General is given a free hand so that he can carry on his investigations unfettered and untrammeled and can report to Parliament and the Canadian people that he has found the financial expenditures of this country to have been conducted according to the laws.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say to the government that they should be warned that any attempt to bring legislation into this House to clip the wings of the Auditor General, to reduce his field of jurisdiction or to limit his areas of investigation, will be resented by the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I think I would be safe in saying that all members in the opposition, irrespective of party, would be prepared to fight such a move. I warn the government that if they have needed closure and rule 75C in the past, they are certainly goinp to need them in the future, should they try to put a muzzle on the Auditor General of Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand the hon. member for Ontario is rising to ask a question.

Mr. Cafik: Yes, Mr. Speaker, if I may ask a question of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I am quite interested in the point the hon. member made that the government did not have the authority to remit this tax for the automobile manufacturers. I draw his attention to, and I should like his comments in respect of section 22 of the Financial Administration Act, which reads:

> —whenever he considers it in the public interest, may remit any tax, fee or penalty.

Then, going on to subsection (b), we find this:

> (b) before or after any payment thereof has been made or enforced by process or execution, and
> (c) in the case of a tax or fee, in any particular case or class of case and before the liability therefor arises.

This would indicate to me, Mr. Speaker, that the position taken by the hon. member that the money must be paid before it can be remitted, does not conform to any section of the act.

An hon. Member: What is your question?

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should point out first that the section which the hon. member has quoted deals with remissions and, as the government itself has admitted, these moneys have never been paid and therefore cannot be remitted.

Mr. MacEwan: That is right.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Second, I point out that any such forgiveness ought to comply with the law and there ought not to be two criteria, one under which certain auto manufacturing companies are paid and an order in council under which other companies are paid.

As the Auditor General has properly pointed out, if the government wants to pay the Ford Motor Company and other companies who cannot comply with the tariff order as it now stands, they have the very simple alternative of altering the tariff order so that it will contain the criteria which the government is using to pay the Ford Motor Company and the other companies who have received this $180 million.

Mr. Danforth: That would be above board.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask if the hon. member realizes that the term "remission" applies before or after payments were made? The act seems to be quite clear on this.

Mr. MacEwan: Make your own speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Roberval.

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to express my opinion on this motion of the Progressive Conservative party and to say that the Ralliement Créditiste supports it without any restrictions. The motion reads as follows:

> That this House condemns the government for criticising the Auditor General of Canada for carrying out his duties according to law; and reasserts its supports of the principle of unfettered parliamentary scrutiny of government expenditures including the right of the Auditor General to comment on the failure of the government to make expenditure in strict compliance with parliamentary appropriations and to report on these and any other cases he feels should be brought to the attention of Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, I was so startled the other day when I heard from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) what seemed like threats against the Auditor General.

I have sat in the House for eight years and I have always considered that the Auditor General is above all political considerations or all governments. He has always seemed to me like the compass guiding the federal vessel, regardless of who is the captain. I would be the first one to oppose the slightest limitation of the powers of the Auditor General of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, however strong the government is—and I believe it is one of the good points of the present government, one which it wanted—we must be careful that it does not have the negative aspect of its qualities. I think the government has been repeating this mistake month after month and day after day.

• (4:20 p.m.)

We are under the impression that, as soon as something is prejudicial to the government, it does away with it. This deplorable method will certainly be its undoing.

We have noticed this attitude on many occasions when judgments were delivered, now by committees, now by associations or by social groups. Indeed, we have even noted that if a committee report submitted to the House is not in agreement with the views of the government, it will simply refuse it and put it off indefinitely. It will not take any account of it.

I do not want to keep on detailing all the government has done because of its very great power. However, it must not forget that power is only temporary. It is precisely the reason why the Fathers of Confederation were well advised to create the office of the Auditor General. Man being what it is, they foresaw that it would be Parliament's responsibility to prevent excesses by any government.

What are the exact duties of the Auditor General? We can find the answer in his report. We see that he must scrutinize practically all the work done during the fiscal year. At page 13 of the Auditor General's report, where it deals with expenditure and revenue, one can read the following:

> The Statement of Expenditure and Revenue for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1969, prepared by the Receiver General for inclusion in the Public Accounts and certified by the Auditor General as required by section 64 of the Financial Administration Act, is reproduced in this Report. The Statement shows expenditure of $10,767 million, revenue of $10,191 million—

Therefore, it is a matter of a deficit of $795 million.

The civil servants and the various governments may juggle with figures and they sometimes do it so well that deficits or surpluses arise. In my opinion, the Auditor General sets the record straight when statistics have been distorted a bit. He gives the facts. Moreover, he reviews each item under expenditures and revenue to make sure that each expenditure has been authorized by Parliament. Should it happen, as it did during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1969, that unauthorized expenditures have been made, he will point them out. By the way, I am in favour of the amendment put forward by the New Democratic party which tends to prove to Parliament that outlays of $180 million have been authorized by a mere order in council.

As private members, we need something like that to produce figures that were camouflaged during the year. Then, the people in general and we can pass judgment on what the government has done.

Mr. Speaker, the government does not appreciate some of the conclusions arrived at by the Auditor General. But it is not the first time this has happened. I remember how in years past some governments were bitterly criticized by the Auditor General, and I am convinced that they accepted his criticism resolving not to sin again. But the present government, the Liberal government, does seem to be willing to do so. In fact, far from resolving to do better, they will not even accept criticism and go so far as to make threats. They warn the Auditor General that should he not submit a report to their liking, they will introduce an amendment to the act.

What is to be assumed in that case, Mr. Speaker, when one knows the person concerned? We are thus allowed to assume that he will simply make the Auditor General come to heel: I think we are striking here at the very foundation of the Canadian Parliament and that is the reason why I urge all members, not only the opposition members but the government members also, who can reason calmly, to check this violent torrent, this colossus ready to overthrow everything that stands in his way.

Such is my interpretation of the statements of the Prime Minister and I do not hesitate to say that those statements frightened me. When it comes to secondary matters, this has little bearing, but when the very foundation of the Canadian Parliament is threatened, that becomes a little more disturbing. That is why, in my opinion, it is time to warn the population and hon. members, and to try to convince the Prime Minister not to resort to a procedure which would contribute to reduce the power, the independence and the freedom of the institution which still prevents the Canadian government, after 100 years, to be tossed about at the mercy of politics.

I will be the first one to object to any amendment, for most of the criticisms and comments made by the Auditor General to this government are perhaps more severe still than some others that I have heard in the past, because this time, the government went a little deeper into illegality.

At page 25 of the report of the Auditor General, under the heading "Comments on Expenditure and Revenue Transactions", one can read the following:

> Reference has already been made to the statutory responsibility of the Auditor General, under section 70 of the Financial Administration Act, to call attention to specific classes of transactions observed during his examinations and to any other case that he considers should be brought to the notice of the House of Commons.
> Pursuant to this direction, the following matters relating to the expenditure and revenue transactions examined during the year are brought to the attention of the House in this Report. Several matters of a similar nature relative to Crown corporations are also included. A number involve non-productive payments——to wit, a famous wharf which was never built and yet has cost $8 million—

I now resume the quotation:

> A number involve non-productive payments, the details of which are given at the request of the Public Accounts Committee. Some of these had their origin in prior years although in most cases payments were made in 1968-69.

When it comes to revenue, what about the revenue respecting health insurance? When we passed the Medicare Act, it was understood, since the provinces could not arrange to benefit the first year, they would be allowed a refund. Today, the government does not care rap about it and claims that there was never such an understanding. They pocket the $200 million paid by Quebec and that is all, the money belongs to them.

Well, I believe that if the office of the Auditor General scrutinized the tacts as prescribed by the legislation, it would discover, not only under expenditure, but also under revenue, some rather unorthodox dealings.

I should like to conclude simply by saying that we instead of trying to discredit the work done by the Auditor General and to deprive him of his freedom of action, we should, as members of Parliament, increase his powers to allow him to conduct a closer examination of the public accounts, so that the Canadian people might be protected, at least for four years, against some governments that would lead them to bankruptcy.

• (4:30 p.m.)

[English]

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the main motion to which we are addressing ourselves is very ingeniously constructed. The only problem is that it is based on a false premise. Let me read the second half of it:

> That this House ... reasserts its support of the principle of unfettered parliamentary scrutiny of government expenditures including the right of the Auditor General to comment on the failure of the government to make expenditure in strict compliance with parliamentary appropriations and to report on these and any other cases he feels should be brought to the attention of Parliament.

This statement puts forward principles which are unexceptionable. Everyone in this House can agree with this affirmation. Indeed, it comes close to paraphrasing the provisions of the Financial Administration Act, a law of this Parliament. The first part of the motion alleges that the government has criticized the Auditor General of Canada "for carrying out his duties according to law". This simply is not the case.

The whole of the motion, as I have said, is based on a false premise. It is utterly fundamental that in the parliamentary system there be an officer of Parliament above politics, above policy differences and above partisan debates who ensures for Parliament and the public that the government and its civil servants are acting with legality and probity in the discharge of their duties. I hold this view. The government holds this view. It is for this very reason that I, and some of my colleagues, have admitted to some concern when the Auditor General has been cast in the role of policy critic, in the role of adversary in contests over public policy.

The Auditor General has submitted to the Public Accounts Committee a draft bill with respect to his office. The government had intended to express there its views as to the duties of the Auditor General, the independence which befits his office and other issues which the Auditor General himself has raised. We are now in the position of being obliged, unfortunately, in the context of a highly partisan debate to make known our general approach to the bill which has been submitted.

There are four general issues which emerge from recent reports of the Auditor General: the independence of the Auditor General from the government and from the Acts of Parliament which govern the public service; the role and responsibilities of the Auditor General; the responsibility of the government to respond to the criticisms he advances in his reports and the status of the Auditor General and his office. I will speak to each of these in turn.

The Auditor General has made certain proposals which would assure his independence from the normal rules which govern the civil service, thus by inference further affirming his independence of the government. The government has been prepared to accept the Auditor General's propositions, and indeed to go even further than he has proposed.

The Auditor General has suggested that he be freed of any limitation by government on the number of employees he engages, and of any restraints on the salaries which he may pay them. By implication he would be free, too, himself to bargain with the employees' union. To these proposals, the government takes no exception.

We have been inclined to look to the Public Accounts Committee for its view on the Auditor General's proposals. We see three or four questions to which the committee might usefully address itself. First, we assume that the committee and the Auditor General alike would want to find a mechanism which would avoid the situation in which any office has unlimited access to public funds. Secondly, the committee might suggest some method, other than the Treasury Board, for determining the classification and pay of the staff in the Auditor General's office. And thirdly, we would draw to the attention of the committee, with respect to personnel appointments, that this House has already designated the Public Service Commission as the protector of the merit system: we would observe that to transfer the power of appointment from this body to the Auditor General would be to transfer responsibility from one office reporting to Parliament to another. The committee might wish to hear from both the Public Service Commission and the Auditor General on this question.

One approach which might be used to free the Auditor General from the restraints which apply on the civil service would be to provide that he should report to the House of Commons through the Speaker, as does the Commissioner of Official Languages. This would give the Auditor General even greater freedom from the rules which apply to the civil service than he has proposed, and would substitute only those provisions which this House itself applies in respect of the Speaker's staff.

The government has been considering this alternative, as well as the one put forward by the Auditor General himself, and would commend them to the Public Accounts Committee for consideration.

I will now deal with the duties of the Auditor General. The second issue which has arisen from the Auditor General's report is the duties which Parliament has assigned to him. I should like to make it abundantly clear, Mr. Speaker, that the government has at no time taken exception to the legislative outline of these duties. For our part, we support the wording of section 67 of the Financial Administration Act and the duties which flow from it in succeeding sections. Let me quote section 67:

> The Auditor General shall examine in such manner as he may deem necessary the accounts relating to the Consolidated Revenue Fund and to public property and shall ascertain whether in his opinion
> (a) the accounts have been faithfully and properly kept,
> (b) all public money has been fully accounted for, and the rules and procedures applied are sufficient to secure an effective check on the assessment, collection and proper allocation of the revenue,
> (c) money has been expended for the purposes for which it was appropriated by Parliament, and the expenditures have been made as authorized, and,

• (4:40 p.m.)

> (d) essential records are maintained and the rules and procedures applied are sufficient to safeguard and control public property.

What does this mean, in non-legal terms? It means that the government believes the Auditor General has the right and the responsibility to comment both on the soundness of the financial controls being exercised by the government, and on the probity and legality with which ministers and civil servants are discharging their duties. Let me repeat; the Auditor General has a duty to comment on the probity of the government of this land—by which I mean simply that he has a duty to protect the taxpayers' dollars. And his right and his ability to do this must be protected.

These words cast a very wide net: I know it, and approve it. After all, hon. members should remember that the President of the Treasury Board and the Auditor General have common concerns. The government looks to the Treasury Board to establish the internal procedures and audits which will ensure probity and legality in the civil service, just as this House looks to the Auditor General to ensure that we have indeed succeeded in achieving this goal. The success of the Treasury Board depends in no small measure, then, upon the existence of the Auditor General and his legislative post-audit. It depends, too, upon the independence and impartiality of his office.

It is for this very reason that I have, when questioned about the Auditor General's role, expressed concern that it not be looked upon as an adversary role; that his office not be envisioned as a source of criticism of government policy or of statutes of Parliament. Probity and legality, yes; government policy and parliamentary decisions, no.

The reasons for this position are not hard to find, Mr. Speaker. Policy questions clearly are matters of judgment, matters about which political parties differ and ought to be expected to differ. They engage us in debate in this House; they engage us in political or party differences which ultimately must be resolved by the electorate. Questions of probity on the other hand are above politics: no one disputes that the highest ethical standards ought and must obtain in the government of this country.

Herein lies the distinction which I have observed should apply. If the Auditor General comments on, or is expected to comment on, policy questions, sooner or later he will, by inference, become engaged in partisan differences. He will appear sooner or later to be taking sides in matters which are the subject of political debate. If the Auditor General is cast in this role by the duties Parliament imposes upon him, his independence and his effectiveness will have been endangered.

We should remember, I think, that the Public Service of Canada enjoys, not only in Canada but elsewhere in the world, an enviable and deserved reputation for probity—and absence of corruption and dishonesty. This is a priceless asset. It is a reputation which depends in no small measure on the certificate of the Auditor General, a certificate which proclaims the probity and legality with which government—any government—is performing its duties. The credibility of this certificate, whatever it says, must not be called into question. But if the Auditor General is cast in an adversary role, if he appears by reason of the duties we impose upon him to be an officer of the opposition—which I think it will be agreed is sometimes a partisan body—then, the credibility of the certificate will be open to question.

Let me hasten to add, Mr. Speaker, that criticism of policy there must be. That goes without saying. But it must come from elected representatives. It is up to the opposition to interrogate, to query, to debate, to criticize the policies of the government. But they should not seek to enlist the Auditor General as their ally. If they do they will destroy his office. A staff to assist the opposition, yes; the government recently acted to enlarge this staff. But the conversion of the Auditor General's office into a partisan role, no.

The third issue which has arisen from the reports of the Auditor General is whether the government is responding adequately, completely enough, to the Auditor General's criticisms. The government believes that there is room for improvement here. We will be proposing that the government ought to be obliged to report to Parliament, to the Public Accounts Committee, on the totality of the Auditor General's report, on all the criticisms he has made of the government and the public service. To this end, it is suggested that the Public Accounts Committee ought to arrange its schedule so as to enable its members to examine, side by side, the Auditor General's Report and the government's explanations as to what actions seem to be appropriate to remedy, or prevent in the future, the situations to which the Auditor General has properly drawn Parliament's attention. This proposal, Mr. Speaker, goes further than the Auditor General has suggested in his report, but it is a requirement which we believe this House has a right to impose on the government.

Finally, may I say a word about the status of the Auditor General? We believe, as I have said, that the Auditor General ought to be fully independent and ought to be seen as such. The government accepts all his proposals to this end, except we think that his salary should be tied to that of a judge rather than to that of a deputy minister, as he has suggested. We have in mind a judge of the proposed federal court.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, I have made clear the government's position on the issue which the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) has put to the House. To us, the Auditor General is the watchdog of honesty and incorruptibility, of probity and legality in government. This is a profoundly important role in our parliamentary system. It must not be corrupted. Any suggestion, therefore, that the Auditor General ought to be instructed to enter into the arena of political debate by serving as policy critic, or any action which might infer this, is to be resisted. For to give way to this temptation would be to weaken the office of Auditor General, and to reduce his value as the nation's objective and impartial overseer of integrity and honesty in government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I ask the minister a question? In his television interview he expressed the opinion that the Auditor General was invading the field of policy. Yet in his speech today, he spoke only in very vague terms about the danger that the Auditor General might invade the policy field. In no case did he give us an instance of the auditor general actually invading this field. Would the minister care to deal with that before he completes his speech?

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, neither in my television speech nor in my remarks just now have I talked about the Auditor General invading the policy field. What I was saying, and what I was endeavouring to suggest the other day, was that there was a danger that Parliament, directly or through one of its committees, should instruct the Auditor General to undertake the role in which he would be cast, either by the public or by others, as critic of government policy, and consequently the government, in defending its particular policy, would by inference be criticising him.

I can cite, though I do not think it would be useful to hear, a number of instances where the Auditor General has been instructed by the committee to make observations regarding the appropriateness or otherwise of policies laid down by Parliament under the rubric, if I recollect the term correctly, of "unproductive expenditures". It is under this heading, acting on instructions from the public accounts committee, that reference is made to what he describes as or implies are not very useful expenditures in relation to the Northumberland causeway.

If he is called upon to do this kind of thing, to furnish his opinion in respect of matters which, in the case of the Northumberland causeway, have been thoroughly debated in the House, he runs the risk of being drawn into such a debate in a partisan way. I suggest this would place him in the dangerous position of losing the reputation for that objectivity which I think is essential to this high office.

Mr. Bigg: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There are two hon. members with questions. The hon. member for Pembina has inquired whether the minister would answer a question. I would point out that the minister is free to answer or not answer a question. I am having difficulty in determining what he wants to do. The hon. member for Pembina.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Speaker, I am a member of the public accounts committee. From time to time we, in the committee, need expert opinion. Sometimes it is impossible for us to come to a conclusion unless we have that expert opinion. Perhaps in the interests of economy alone we have thought that in matters of accounting for instance, no man could give us a better expert opinion.

I am wondering whether this duty has been abused or appears to have been abused and whether, speaking on behalf of the treasury board, the minister could give the House an assurance that we can get the same type and quality of opinion, as near as that is possible, from other sources. This is a problem we are constantly meeting in the committee.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I would try to prescribe for the committee its sources of professional opinion. Certainly, I would not make the suggestion that the opinions expressed by the Auditor General in relation to accounting were anything other than expert or professional. There was an instance with regard to professional opinion where I know the committee felt that it would be useful to go rather more widely afield, and indeed it sought professional advice in respect of the act the committee had been looking at from the Institute of Chartered Accountants. The committee should be free to do this. In my view it should be free to seek expert or professional opinion from wherever in the view of the committee it best lies.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Vancouver East.

Mr. Winch: With regard to the answer the minister gave a moment ago in reply to a previous question, if my understanding is correct the minister said that his major criticism is not directed to the Auditor General but to the all-party public accounts committee which, by unanimous decision, asked the Auditor General to obtain certain information or to express his views. Am I correct that basically the minister said his criticism was directed to the public accounts committee?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, the suggestion here that there is criticism is contained in the first few phrases of the motion the House is discussing. If the hon. gentleman had been here, he would have heard me say that this motion—

Mr. Winch: I was here. I heard the minister's entire speech and his answers to the questions.

Mr. Drury: The hon. gentleman would have heard me say, then, that this motion, which talks about criticism, is based on a false premise: there is none. What I have been trying to do today is to urge the House and the committee not to thrust on the Auditor General duties and responsibilities that are perhaps liable to put him in the position of appearing to be partisan, thus destroying the reputation for objectivity which this high office has held and must continue to hold.

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I feel it is my duty to speak to this non-confidence motion. I have been a member of the public accounts committee for about the same length of time as the present Auditor General has acted in this capacity. I have always had a great admiration for the efficient and businesslike manner in which he has presented his reports. We are all aware of the fact that government business involves spending more money than any other business in Canada spends. This gives us an indication of the vast responsibilities that are undertaken by the Auditor General and his staff.

At the outset, I should like to put on the record the statute that sets up the office of Auditor General so that the people across this nation may fully understand the position of the Auditor General. I know this point has been commented upon by several speakers before me, but only in part, and I think that the full picture should be given to the House. Therefore, I should like to quote section 65 of the Financial Administration Act, 1967, which provides as follows:

(1) The Governor in Council shall by commission under the Great Seal of Canada appoint an officer called the Auditor General of Canada to hold office during good behaviour until he attains the age of sixty-five years, but he is removable by the Governor General on address of the Senate and House of Commons.

(2) The Auditor General shall out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund be paid a salary of thirty thousand dollars per annum.

(3) The provisions of the Public Service Superannuation Act, except those relating to tenure of office, apply to the Auditor General.

(4) Such officers and employees as are necessary to enable the Auditor General to perform his duties shall be appointed in accordance with the provisions of the Public Service Employment Act.

(5) The Governor in Council may appoint a person temporarily to perform the duties of the Auditor General during a vacancy in the office of Auditor General.

Section 66 provides:

(1) Notwithstanding any act, the Auditor General is entitled to free access at all convenient times to all files, documents and other records relating to the accounts of every department, and he is also entitled to require and receive from members of the public service such information, reports and explanations as he may deem necessary for the proper performance of his duties.

(2) The Auditor General may station in any department any person employed in his office to enable him more effectively to carry out his duties, and the department shall provide the necessary office accommodation for any such officer so stationed.

• (5:00 p.m.)

(3) The Auditor General shall require every person employed in his office who is to examine the accounts of a department pursuant to this Act to comply with any security requirements applicable to, and to take any oath of secrecy required to be taken by persons employed in that department.

(4) The Auditor General may suspend from the performance of his duty any person employed in his office.

67. The Auditor General shall examine in such manner as he may deem necessary the accounts relating to the Consolidated Revenue Fund and to public property and shall ascertain whether in his opinion

(a) the accounts have been faithfully and properly kept,

(b) all public money has been fully accounted for, and the rules and procedures applied are sufficient to secure an effective check on the assessment, collection and proper allocation of the revenue,

(c) money has been expended for the purposes for which it was approved by Parliament, and the expenditures have been made as authorized, and

(d) essential records are maintained and the rules and procedures applied are sufficient to safeguard and control public property.

Criticism of Auditor General

68. The Auditor General shall

(a) make such examination of the accounts and records of each registrar as he deems necessary, and such other examinations of a registrar's transactions as the Minister may require, and

(b) when and to the extent required by the Minister, participate in the destruction of any redeemed or cancelled securities or unissued reserves of securities, authorized to be destroyed under this Act, and may, by arrangement with the registrar, maintain custody and control, jointly with the registrar, maintain custody and control, jointly with the registrar, of cancelled and unissued securities.

69. The Auditor General shall examine and certify in accordance with the outcome of his examinations the several statements required by section 64 to be included in the Public Accounts, and any other statement that the Minister may present for audit certificate.

70. (1) The Auditor General shall report annually to the House of Commons the results of his examinations and shall call attention to every case in which he has observed that

(a) any officer or employee has wilfully or negligently omitted to collect or receive any money belonging to Canada,

(b) any public money was not duly accounted for and paid into the Consolidated Revenue Fund,

(c) any appropriation was exceeded or was applied to a purpose or in a manner not authorized by Parliament,

(d) an expenditure was not authorized or was not properly vouched or certified

(e) there has been a deficiency or loss through the fraud, default or mistake of any person, or

(f) a special warrant authorized the payment of any money, and to any other case that the Auditor General considers should be brought to the notice of the House of Commons.

(2) The report of the Auditor General shall be laid before the House of Commons by the Minister on or before the 31st day of December, or, if Parliament is not then in session, within fifteen days after the commencement of the next ensuing session and if the Minister does not, within the time prescribed by this section, present the report to the House of Commons, the Auditor General shall transmit the report to the Speaker for tabling in the House of Commons.

71. The Auditor General shall, whenever the Governor in Council, the Treasury Board or the Minister directs, inquire into and report on any matter relating to the financial affairs of Canada or to public property and on any person or organization that has received financial aid from the Government of Canada or in respect of which financial aid from the Government of Canada is sought.

72. Any report of the Auditor General to the Governor in Council or the Treasury Board shall be made through the Minister.

73. Whenever it appears to the Auditor General that any public money has been improperly retained by any person, he shall forthwith report the circumstances of such cases to the Minister.

74. The Auditor General may examine any person on oath on any matter pertaining to any account subject to audit by him and for the purposes of any such examination the Auditor General may exercise all the powers of a commissioner under Part I of the Inquiries Act.

75. An officer of the public service nominated by the Treasury Board shall examine and certify to the House of Commons in accordance with the outcome of his examinations the receipts and disbursements of the office of the Auditor General.

[Mr. Noble.]

Government ministers who make accusations against the Auditor General are familiar with the act, but rather than act like men and make charges in the House of Commons they have used methods that are not acceptable to this House and not in keeping with the high offices they are privileged to hold. Public opinion indicates there is much resentment of this unjustifiable criticism of a good, honest public servant.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, this is not the first attempt to demoralize the public accounts committee and its administrators. It was only a few weeks ago that a subtle and despicable move was made to remove the chairman of the committee. That particular government strategy failed miserably because the committee unanimously gave the chairman a vote of confidence on their first opportunity following the intended leak to the press by the conspirators. The government has been embarrassed by their own careless and frivolous handling of the public purse, and to try and save face they resort to pulling a red herring across the trail. What they have done could only be termed childish and immature.

The Auditor General has a reputation above reproach. He is highly respected in his profession, not only in Canada but by the fraternity of the United Nations which embraces over 100 countries. He has had the enviable distinction of being chosen by them to be their external auditor. In view of the confidence the United Nations has placed in him, does it not seem a little ridiculous for this government to whimper about something of very little significance? This government has not paid enough attention to the information that has been revealed by the Auditor General and which, if heeded, could have saved the country millions of dollars. Rather, they go on their merry way spending like drunken sailors and at the same time telling all segments of our economy that they must tighten their belts.

I need only mention a few of their recent extravagant orgies to demonstrate their insincerity in respect of fightiing inflation. It was recently made known to this House that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) needs over $820,000 to maintain his office and staff, as compared to $50,000 to do the same job when the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was Prime Minister. Only two years ago, the Prime Minister of that day operated his office on $75,000.

Then, we have the new agency, Information Canada, which, from all indications, will be infringing on the responsibilities of Members of Parliament, confusing and frustrating them and costing the country millions of dollars. Another expenditure we could well get along without is the $50 million or more that will be spent by the Bilingual and Biculturalism Commission which can only be termed a superfluous expenditure. I presume the Auditor General and the Public Accounts Committee will not have the opportunity of scrutinizing many such items.

The people of the country were astounded when, through the Auditor General and the Public Accounts Committee, the facts in respect of the refit of the Bonaventure were made known. The colossal blundering by government representatives in their estimating, in their supervision and their judgment, was almost unbelievable. The people of Canada were led down the garden path to the extent of many millions of dollars by the extraordinary handling of government responsibilities. I could go on and enumerate many more transactions brought to the attention of the Public Accounts Committee by the Auditor General, but since the details of the Bonaventure case are so well known, I think it illustrates the valuable and efficient work the Auditor General has been doing over the years.

The Public Accounts Committee has been aware for quite some time of the fact that the Auditor General has only been doing a spot check on expenditures. He has brought to the attention of the committee that his staff is insufficient to do a thorough job. The Public Accounts Committee, in its reports to the government, has made several appeals to have the Auditor General given the authority to take on the necessary staff to do a complete and thorough audit of all government transactions. To my knowledge, the government has turned a deaf ear to this request—in fact, his staff has been reduced. This made it obvious that they would take the first opportunity to clip the Auditor General's wings.

The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) recently availed himself of a good chance when he appeared on television. His first remark was that the Auditor General should stick to assessing the government's accounting procedure. In replying to that statement, I would say that the Auditor General has done an excellent job, to the embarrassment of the government. As to the Minister's second statement, he had his foot in his mouth when he wondered whether the Auditor General should cast himself in this role or whether we should look for really another kind of person to be Auditor General. This statement means only one of two things: he is threatening to get rid of the Auditor General, or he is blackmailing him.

The Prime Minister, (Mr. Trudeau) when questioned in the House by the Leader of the Opposition as to whether or not this statement was government policy, made a flimsy reply in an attempt to cover up for the arrogance of the President of the Treasury Board when he said, as recorded at page 5771 of Hansard:

> —I cannot say that this is government policy. I would assume that if that was said it might be interpreted to mean we want another type of function fulfilled by the person who is fulfilling the job now, not some other person.

No one but the Prime Minister could make such a futile explanation. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, the whole exercise is another example of government blundering. I have no hesitation in saying that the people across the country, if given the opportunity, would endorse the work of the Auditor General and give him an overwhelming vote of confidence.

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I cannot support the motion put forward by the Leader of the Opposition. I cannot do so primarily because of the way in which it is worded. It says that this House condemns the government for criticizing the Auditor General of Canada for carrying out his duties according to law. If I felt the government of Canada was really trying to prevent the Auditor General from performing his duties I would certainly support the motion. But I do not see any evidence at all that the government has made any such statement or has any such intention. Remarks that have been made by individual members of the cabinet are not necessarily the views of the government—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cafik: —and I think the statement made today by the President of the Treasury Board certainly does not reflect any intention on the part of the government to do anything to curtail the Auditor General, but rather strengthen and further the position he holds in the public interest.

The second part of the motion regarding the principle of the Auditor General having an unfettered right to view government expenditures, of course, is something which anyone would support. I think everyone in this House would support that section, but unfortunately it is based on a premise that is just not true. For that reason, I cannot support it. The second point concerns the amendment moved by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas). It reads as follows:

and this House further declares that the Auditor General has served the interests of Canada by drawing Parliament's attention to the improper concessions of over $180 million made to motor vehicle manufacturers by order in council.

First of all, the Auditor General did not draw to the attention of the Public Accounts Committee, Parliament or the people of Canada, any such improper concessions. I should like to quote from page 96 of the report of the Auditor General where he deals with this item in section 135. He indicates that the government has the right, where it considers the public interest is at stake, to remit or change any duties that may be payable or any penalties. He also gives his reason for mentioning this item in the Auditor General's report itself. He quotes the following statement from the Financial Administration Act:

A statement of each remission of one thousand dollars or more granted under this section shall be reported to the House of Commons in the Public Accounts.

So, the reference in the report is not an indication to my knowledge that he has ever contended there has been any improper concession, but rather that he has some kind of an obligation—a statutory one I presume—to draw attention in the Public Accounts to any remissions when these exceed $1,000. So, he has fulfilled his obligation. The interesting point made by the Leader of the New Democratic Party in his comments today is that he did not care about the employment this created.

Mr. Lewis: That is not what he said.

Mr. Cafik: That is my interpretation of what he said.

Mr. Lewis: That is a misinterpretation.

Mr. Cafik: If you would withhold your remarks until I have finished I would be delighted to answer.

[Mr. Cafik.]

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I can wait with any question I wish to ask the hon. member until he has finished, but he has no right to misrepresent any member of this House. What the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands said was that it was not relevant to this discussion whether there was more or less employment, not that he didn't care.

Mr. Cafik: I meant what I said, and I certainly agree with what you said. But he did indicate that in this particular context he did not care.

I should like to point out that the public interest is the operative part, because if the Governor in Council believes the public interest is at stake in making this Order in Council he is free to do it. I believe it is important at this point to mention that the public interest was at stake because since 1964, in terms of employment alone in Canada, as a result of that agreement employment has increased by 32 per cent in the automobile industry. It has gone from 68,400 in 1964 to 90,300. Our gross national product has risen by $1 billion annually as a result of this agreement. In addition, our percentage of the consuming market in Canada has increased dramatically since the signing of that agreement. In 1964, for instance, we produced in Canada 4 per cent of the cars and consumed 7½ per cent of the cars produced in North America. Today, that situation has changed dramatically. Today we produce 6 per cent of the cars manufactured in North America and consume 8½ per cent. This is a considerable improvement.

So I therefore contend—and I do not believe anyone could contend otherwise—that the automobile agreement and the maintenance of it in force is certainly in the best interest of Canada. In terms of the argument of the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party that the Financial Administration Act did not give the Governor in Council this right, I contend he is grossly wrong. He has, in fact, misled many people in this House because the act states very clearly that the Governor General in Council can remit these duties whether they have been paid or not, in advance of the payment or following the payment. His contention was that no remission could be made unless the money was first received. This does not coincide with the facts as I read them in the Financial Administration Act.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question.

Mr. Cafik: Later; as you allowed me the privilege, I will allow you the same.

If I may continue, I should like to say that so far as I am concerned the motion is in fact a disservice to the Public Accounts Committee. Last week the members of the Public Accounts Committee decided they would like to take up this issue and make recommendations to the government in respect of the Auditor General and his role. I think we all seem to bear allegiance to the principle of strong committees. If this is our belief it would have been wise to leave this matter with the committee rather than bring it up here today. As of the 5th of next month we will be discussing the matter with the Auditor General, with the Institute of Chartered Accountants, with members of the Civil Service and with members of the government as well as others who have views to express.

Mr. Bigg: Will we dare do this?

Mr. Cafik: This is what we agreed to do. I do not think it behooves anyone to suggest that I would not do so before the Public Accounts Committee because I do not believe anyone who has been on that committee would suggest I would attempt to do other than what I believe is in the best interests of that committee and of this country.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The President of the Treasury Board does not agree with you.

Mr. Cafik: I do not mind. He can agree with whoever he likes and so can I.

I am speaking on this point at this time and will do so until my time is up. I have a few suggestions I should like to make in this regard which I think would be useful, not only in strengthening the role of the Auditor General but also the role of the Public Accounts Committee which I believe leaves a little to be desired in some respects.

• (5:20 p.m.)

The first recommendations that I would make is one that stems from the Institute of Chartered Accountants which recommended certain changes to the Auditor General's proposal for an auditor general's act. I will quote from their document which suggested the following change to section 13(3):

> Notwithstanding subsections (1) and (2) the Auditor General need not report on any matter which is, in all circumstances, of relative insignificance.

I think that at the moment the Auditor General appears to be obliged to report any incident, and I believe that many of the incidents that he brings to our attention—and I can give you examples—are of minor significance. That is for him to judge, but I believe it is very important that at least he be given the right in the act to eliminate such matters so that the committee does not waste its time on insignificant thing. This would eliminate some items and allow us to concentrate on those things that were of serious import.

The second recommendation I would make is that the Auditor General give all relevant information in respect of an item in his report. I would like to refer for a moment to a case that came up in the Public Accounts Committee meeting this morning which I think illustrates this point. I hope the Auditor General will agree with me. At page 169, paragraph 246, item 2 of the 1968 report the Auditor General makes the following comment:

> A shortage of $1,140,000 with respect to cobalt stolen several years ago is revealed by the balance sheet of the Revolving Fund. Amounts totalling $49,000 had been recovered to March 31, 1968 and further recoveries are expected. However, it appears inevitable that there will be an ultimate loss of not less than $600,000.

As a result of questioning, I found out that out of the total estimated loss of $600,000, $526,000 was lost because of a decline in the market value of cobalt during that period and not to theft or to any other factor. In addition, $74,000 of the $600,000 was lost as a result of negotiations between the Crown and the company that was responsible for the shortage of the cobalt. Mention was made of receiving 85 per cent of the market value of those goods rather than going to court to get the whole amount. If we are in the Public Accounts Committee are going to do an effective job, it would be most helpful if the Auditor General—and I suggested this in the committee—would bring forward all such relevant factors.

I asked the Auditor General's assistant today if he knew whether $526,000 of that amount was lost as a result of a decline in the market value, and he said yes. But I cannot understand why he did not tell us that in this report. We would have avoided wasting a great deal of our time and a great deal of our questioning to get these facts had he brought them to our attention in the first instance. I hope he will do that in the future.

The next point I would like to make about the Auditor General's report is that he pay more attention to details in the report itself.

Let me give the House an example. Earlier somebody mentioned the Bonaventure and said that the Auditor General should be thanked for bringing to our attention the details regarding over-expenditure. I want to submit humbly that it was not the Auditor General who did so and to suggest that I played a pretty big part in so doing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cafik: I would like to suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that if you read the Auditor General's report you will not find any indication of the sloppy workmanship which we thought we discovered. He referred to the over-all appropriation and said it was higher than it should have been. However, he did not bring forward the factors that I brought out in the committee as a result of the digging and darn hard work. I think that perhaps that is an indication of his need of a larger staff so that he can do some of that detailed, important and valuable work prior to coming to us with the report.

There is one other point that I would like to make regarding the Auditor General's report, namely that it would be extremely useful to the Public Accounts Committee if the Auditor General were to print, following his paragraph regarding any particular department, some kind of statement of the government's position. I believe it is far better for any objective committee such as we have, to have a look at both sides of the story before getting into any kind of investigation. It would expedite our work and we would do a far better job in the public interest, and so would the Auditor General. So, I suggest that following the Auditor General's statement there appear a statement by the department so that we will know both sides of the story. In my experience in the committee that would be extremely useful. I can illustrate many points that were brought out by the Auditor General regarding which, after we listened to departmental witnesses, we concluded the situation was either not so bad after all or in some cases it was even worse. In any case, however, I would like to see the total story printed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Cafik: May I have the consent of the House to conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Does the House give such consent?

[Mr. Cafik.]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Cafik: In conclusion may I say, Mr. Speaker, that I intend to oppose the non-confidence motion moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) because I cannot condemn the government for what it has not done.

In my view, it is imperative that an independent person such as the Auditor General have access to information on all public expenditures and is able to report upon his findings to the House of Commons and consequently to the people of Canada. My role in the Public Accounts Committee is ample proof of my concern for the efficient and proper use of public funds. My suggestions to the House today are based upon a genuine concern for improving the effectiveness of both the Auditor General and the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in support of the motion that has been moved today by the Leader of the Opposition. I speak with some concern for the motion presently before the House. I do so with a sense of responsibility as a member of the House of Commons for some 13 years, a considerable number of these years spent as a member of the Public Accounts Committee. Once a year a slim, innocuous looking grey book makes its appearance in Ottawa, a book which has jokingly been referred to as "Henderson's financial follies". This book does not contain a script for a follies show at the National Arts Centre, although some of the short stories it contains would make a suitable script for light comedy if some of the facts were not so tragic to our Canadian taxpayers.

When the Auditor General's report is tabled in the Commons all hell breaks loose for within its covers are set forth the sins, errors and omissions of government departments, public agencies and Crown corporations for the past 12 months. Careers have been made and broken through information in this book's pages. Policies have been examined, changed or even abandoned under the battering of an accounting which every year sees opposition members gleefully searching for rocks to throw at the treasury benches while government supporters scramble for cover. Behind this parliamentary tornado is a neat, grey, cleanshaven public servant named Maxwell Henderson. To a deadly serious job, he brings the saving graces of quick humour and an easy charm more suited to politics than to accounting. His reports are stiff, rigid and righteous, but in talking to him we find that he is friendly and co-operative. He brings to his position a sense of duty and a sense of humour, both of which are needed on Parliament Hill.

• (5:30 p.m.)

When Mr. Watson Sellars retired in 1960, Mr. Henderson was appointed by the then Minister of Finance, Hon. Donald Fleming. In my opinion and in the opinion of most Canadians he has fulfilled his duties capably and well since that time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crouse: Like a judge, the Auditor General is a servant of Parliament, not a servant of the cabinet. He can be fired only by a joint resolution of the House of Commons and the Senate, a step which has never even been threatened in Canada until the present time. In my opinion the Auditor General is the watchdog of the public purse and he is in need of the independence guaranteed him by the Financial Administration Act under which he operates. I say this because his main function is to see that every cent of public moneys is properly accounted for. This makes him one of the most feared and possibly one of the most disliked public servants in the nation. Obviously, Mr. Speaker, he is not popular with the present government, but to the best of my knowledge he has always carried out his duties without fear or favour.

When the Conservative administration which appointed Mr. Henderson decided to scrap the Avro Arrow in 1959, a replacement had to be found but noisy complaints were heard in the House of Commons about the $400 million write-off on the Arrow and any additional expenditures would only add fuel to the fire. The Department of National Defence hit on the solution of making a swap with the United States. In return for 66 F-10 Voodoo interceptors, Canada undertook to operate a number of Pinetree Line radar stations for the Americans so our defence requirements would be met without the need of a heavy cash outlay.

The whole deal seemed to be smooth and acceptable until the Auditor General caught up with it. In his 1960 report he rebuked the defence chiefs for not showing the Voodoos as an expense. Whether they were paid for in cash or work, he pointed out, they cost money. He went on to estimate the outlay at $170 million and this provided a ripe tomato for opposition spokesmen, who were Liberal in that day, to toss across the Commons at the government which was Conservative and had just appointed Mr. Henderson.

Within a year he was involved in another head-on clash with the Conservative administration. The Revenue Department had held up wages to three men on the public payroll for non-payment of income tax. Mr. Henderson's investigators became intrigued and asked for the tax files of the three delinquents. The Hon. George Nowlan was then Minister of National Revenue and he refused the request. Mr. Henderson made note of this refusal in his next report to Parliament.

The minister was vigorously grilled at that time by the Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse, as our leader in the House used to call them in those days. He was grilled in the House of Commons almost immediately, where he let slip that the three men involved were MP's, two Conservatives and one Liberal. The fight was carried before the Public Accounts Committee where the minister stood his ground on a provision of the Income Tax Act, which guarantees secrecy in income tax matters. However, Mr. Henderson pointed to the Financial Administration Act which entitles him to access to "all files, documents, or other reports, notwithstanding any other legislation." The Auditor General won his point and the files were produced.

It is my contention that in both these cases Mr. Henderson's concern was not to embarrass the government—although that happened—but rather it was to ensure the proper accounting of funds to the taxpayer. If the Commons votes to spend $10 million on fish, that is of no concern to the Auditor General, but if the money appropriated for fish is spent on chips, then the Auditor General is very much involved. I should point out, Mr. Speaker, that at no time during these investigations was there any suggestion by the then Progressive Conservative government that the criticisms of the Auditor General were invalid or that any action should be taken against him.

What has caused this issue to be raised today, Mr. Speaker? All of us throughout the length and breadth of this nation were disturbed when the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) recently told a television audience that the Auditor General is pitting his judgment against the government and that he should stick to assessing the government's accounting procedures. The minister went on to wonder whether Mr. Henderson should pit his judgment against the government or whether the government should really look for another kind of person to be Auditor General. Why are we, as Canadians, concerned over statements which have been made on this matter by the President of the Treasury Board and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)? Why are we concerned when our Prime Minister indicates he plans to introduce legislation into this House defining the authority and scope of the activities of the Auditor General?

We are concerned about the erosion and destruction of the power of Parliament. That is why this motion has been raised today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crouse: Some years ago Lord Chesterfield said:

> Let us consider that arbitrary power has seldom or never been introduced into any country at once. It must be introduced by slow degrees and as it were, step by step, lest the people should see it approach.

We are now viewing the acquisition of arbitrary power which is the planned and plotted objective of the Trudeau government. This government wants power that is above restraint and beyond criticism. This government wants arbitrary power that is introduced by slow degrees, step by step, sometimes stealthily, sometimes openly with sly hypocrisy, sometimes with snare and sometimes by trap, sometimes with soothing syrup or a slogan. Whatever the moves, they are always directed and ever advancing toward one objective, namely, absolute arbitrary power.

It is the tragedy of political liberty that men, once they have attained it, assume the battle won not only for themselves but also for future generations. The historians paint these long gone battles, fought by men against their oppressive rulers, on a grand and dramatic scale. They hang them in a frame of large events. Here I refer to King John signing the Magna Carta and Cromwell dismissing a corrupt Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, all this happened in the long gone past. We as Canadians do not expect, and believe there is no need for, such a dramatic confrontation today. We sometimes forget these symbolic pictures of the past only represent the ultimate recovery of our political liberties. We do not ask, over what long period, in what undramatic ways, were these liberties first lost or gained. We forget we lost them, fought for them and recovered them in Nova Scotia, in Quebec, in Ontario and in the west. We forget that our cousins to the south fought for them, and only won them in a bloody revolution. We are not mindful in our history of the little things, Our editorials, which are the daily history of our times, contain nothing like this leader from the London Times of August, 1846:

> The greatest tyranny has the smallest beginnings. From precedents overlooked, from remonstrations despised, from grievances treated with ridicule, from powerless men oppressed with impunity, and overbearing men tolerated with complacence, springs the tyrannical usage which generations of wise and good men may hereafter perceive and lament and resist in vain.
> At present, common minds no more see a crushing tyranny in a trivial unfairness, or a ludicrous indignity, than the eye, uninformed by reason, can discern the oak in the acorn, or the utter desolution of winter in the first autumnal fall. Hence the necessity of denouncing with unwearied and even troublesome perseverance, a single act of oppression. Let it alone and it stands on record. The country has allowed it and when it is at last provoked to a late indignation, it finds itself gagged with the record of its own ill compulsion.

This government, Mr. Speaker, has progressed some distance along the way to arbitrary power. The criticism of the Auditor General of Canada is only a prelude to their plans and is but one of the most recent and most dramatic in a series of steps along the path. We have every reason to be concerned when a government is bold enough to attack a publicly paid critic of the government who is himself by reason of his criticisms so much in the public eye.

This type of criticism is inexcusable. This government was elected to office on a platform of two slogans, one being that the government would establish in Canada the just society and the other that Canadians would enjoy participatory democracy. Journalists have attributed the slogan, "The just society" to Palto's democratic philosophy of government. But, Mr. Speaker, we do not need political philosophies in this country to tell us what to do. In ten words, let us have—government of the people, by the people, for the people.

We have seen the symptoms in this House, Mr. Speaker, which should concern all Canadians: the step-by-step whittling away of our procedural rights; the two efforts to change the rules to impose the guillotine upon debate and criticism; the attempt to change the non-partisan chairman of the Public Accounts Committee; the interference with committees and the presentation of committee reports; the establishment of the ministerial roster system; the establishment of corporations and agencies which remove whole areas of public affairs from the investigation and scrutiny of members; the delegation of vast law-making powers to the cabinet; the appointment of officials at Her Majesty's pleasure and not during good behaviour; the unpublicized introduction of a bill to seize vast economic and financial power by the socialization of private investment, which was aborted in the other place; the bill now before the House to take over control of the entire farm products industry from farmer to consumer; the large increase of officials at the decision advisory level, and bills which provide for public hearings that are not public hearings. I could go on, Mr. Speaker, but time does not permit. These are the steps this government has taken or is taking along the path to arbitrary power. They are known to members of this House and have been fought against by members of all opposition parties. Unfortunately, they are not known generally to the public.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is there unanimous agreement for the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I thank the House for its indulgence. I shall be only about a minute more. The government now dares to act publicly against an official of this House who in the course of his duties has criticized the government. If we, as members of this House, do not now make a stand against this show of arbitrary power, this attempt to muzzle the Auditor General, then we are indeed nothings, as we have been labelled by the Prime Minister.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I begin my remarks in this debate by making a passing reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan). The last time I spoke in the House the hon. member alluded to my habit of criticizing the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) in his absence from the House. During the course of my remarks this evening I shall be criticizing the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) for moving the motion.

It is a pity that the hon. member for Annapolis Valley, the Leader of the Opposition and the right hon. member for Prince Albert are not here at this time. I do not quite understand what sort of duty was envisaged by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley when he suggested that in our debates we should not criticize an hon. member opposite when he is not in the House. I do not think it is our obligation to ask those who have participated in the debate to stay around for its duration. Those of us on this side of the House will stay here for the afternoon and evening, and that ought to be the clear obligation of hon. members opposite who have participated, particularly since one of them introduced this motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jerome: The opposition has chosen this subject for special attention on an allotted day because it has thus been enabled to introduce a motion of want of confidence in the government. The role or function of the Auditor General would not have been brought into special focus except for two circumstances that I presume gave rise to the motion before us. One of those was certain recent comments by two members of the cabinet who have been referred to, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) and the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald). Those remarks have been referred to. The other circumstance is the legislation to come before this House, to be known as the Auditor General of Canada Act.

Dealing with each of these sources of complaint separately, I note that the remarks attributed to the President of the Privy Council have been noted several times already today. In the remarks complained of, which were uttered on television a short time ago, it was said that any disagreement with the Auditor General did not stem from his criticizing accounting procedures, the basic practices involved, the method of expenditure, and so on, but rather from his criticisms of underlying government policy. That statement stands on the record. The transcript of the television interview has been referred to and has now been noted as a source of complaint by the opposition.

I note as well that the remarks of the President of the Treasury Board, who has already spoken in this debate, were referred to by the Leader of the Opposition when he led off this afternoon's debate. I am always a little suspicious, Mr. Speaker, when a very short quotation is lifted from a long transcript and referred to in this kind of debate. Having heard the short quotation referred to by the Leader of the Opposition, I took the liberty of looking at the original transcript of the television program that was referred to.

I note on page 10 of that transcript, almost two pages before the paragraph that has been referred to by the Leader of the Opposition, that the subject was expanded somewhat. It might be interesting to read those remarks, as the Leader of the Opposition should have done out of a sense of fairness, and include the remarks already referred to and attributed to the President of the Treasury Board. The Leader of the Opposition at least might have had the decency to read all of that passage to the House so that we might be fully informed.

This interview was being conducted by Mr. Collister and Mr. Lynch, of great notoriety in this chamber. Mr. Lynch asked this question, as recorded at the bottom of page 10 of the transcript:

> If you're so hot on efficiency and the things you've just been talking about, why is the Auditor General, Mr. Maxwell Henderson, so unimpressed with the way public business is conducted, and why is he so critical of the Treasury Board for cutting down on the staff that he has to make sure that efficiency and productivity are maintained? You and he seem to be butting heads against one another.

The President of the Treasury Board answered:

> Well to use a phrase you applied a little earlier, one would expect him to have a vested interest in discovering things which are subject to criticism. That's his job.

Mr. Lynch then said:

> Right. He says you're throttling him. You're not giving him enough staff and enough money.

The President of the Treasury Board answered:

> The fact of the matter, is, as has been pointed out on a number of occasions, he has not, to the best of my knowledge, ever filled out the establishment that he has had authorized. And I mentioned earlier that the civil service has now had, as a whole, cut back from its authorizations for numbers of people far in excess of what they ever had or seemed to be likely to get. The same kind of operation was applied to the Auditor General, and indeed the authorization for very large numbers which he had never reached, was reduced to something quite modestly in excess of his existing staff. So he still has room to increase his staff.

Reporting the full text of that interview, it seems to me, places in an entirely different perspective the remarks of the President of the Treasury Board; and to be fair, if those remarks are the source of the opposition's criticism, opposition members should have had the decency to read into the record the whole transcript. In other words, the remarks made by both hon. gentlemen simply refer to the fact that it is clearly understood that the function of the Auditor General, a function he has carried out so well, is to criticize the manner in which the government spends funds and say whether that spending is wasteful, spendthrift or even inefficient.

The policy underlying the decision to authorize the expenditure of those dollars is the prerogative of Parliament. It is not an area for the Auditor General to exercise his criticism. Having accepted as policy of this House that certain dollars are to be expended, it is the job of the Auditor General to examine very carefully and criticize fully and completely if those dollars are not properly spent or if the expenditure of the moneys or the accounting for them is not properly done.

Even in my short experience in this House I have found that the report of the Auditor General for 1968-69 is a very complete document, detailing some very large and wasteful expenditures on the part of the government. To suggest that the Auditor General is being restricted in his job of criticizing this government is ludicrous. The reports of the Auditor General are detailed to a degree I would not have imagined possible. I submit they are very clear. It is for this reason I and other members oppose the motion and support the remarks that have been made with respect to the function of the Auditor General. The Auditor General should criticize in the way that he has done in his report. However, it is not his job to criticize policy decisions of this Parliament. That is the prerogative of this Parliament, the news media and others who wish to criticize, but it is not the job of the Auditor General.

The source of complaint is the remarks I have referred to, or the forthcoming legislation setting up a special act of Parliament with regard to the Auditor General. Let us examine the position of the government and its attitude in respect of this legislation. I submit it is significant to note that this bill was not drafted by the government. It was not prepared by a government draftsman who was subject to any control, political pressure or authority of this government. It is extremely significant to note that the proposed Auditor General's act was prepared, at the request of Parliament, by the Auditor General.

Mr. Bigg: At our request.

Mr. Jerome: It was at the request of the Public Accounts Committee. It was made an appendix to the current report handed to the Public Accounts Committee by the Auditor General. It contains authority which is extraordinary in the process of legislation. It was drafted in the initial stages by the Auditor General.

One of the first steps, a very wise one, taken by the committee was to refer the proposed legislation to the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants which made a very detailed analysis of it. It was returned to the Public Accounts Committee with some very thorough and comprehensive recommendations about the legislation—and the manner in which it deals with all the functions of the Auditor General. Surely no one can—suggest from the behaviour of the government with respect to this process that there are restrictions or unfair limitations on the scope and function of the Auditor General. He himself drafted the proposed legislation. It was not presented directly to this House by the government; it was presented to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts which as we know is headed by an opposition member.

The remarks made on television by the two members criticized the Auditor General for pitting his judgment, on matters of government policy, against that of the government. That is not his job and we should make that clear. We fully support the statements of our members in that respect. I fail to see how anyone can be critical of the proposed legislation. If anyone on the opposite side has any criticism of the way in which the Auditor General's act was drafted, I would like to hear it. I do not understand how there could be criticism because the Auditor General prepared the legislation, which is supposed to be restrictive in its scope. The truth of the matter is in the motion which reads as follows:

> That this House condemns the government for criticizing the Auditor General of Canada for carrying out his duties according to law—

That is patently absurd.

> —and reasserts its supports of the principle of unfettered parliamentary scrutiny of government expenditures—

There is no question about that.

> —including the right of the Auditor General to comment on the failure of the government to make expenditure in strict compliance with parliamentary appropriation—

There is no question about that. The following I think is the catchphrase:

> —and to report on these and any other cases he feels should be brought to the attention of Parliament.

That is the area of this motion which I find unacceptable because it seems to delegate to the Auditor General the wide and sweeping right to criticize this Parliament in any way he wishes. It is not his function to criticize government policy, decisions, proposals, legislation and programs of every sort. That, Mr. Speaker, is an accurate and complete description of the role of the official opposition. In conclusion, I think we can very well understand why this motion has been put. The simple and plain reason why the opposition want the Auditor General to be able to carry out that function is because they now recognize their own dismal failure to do the job of the official opposition.

Mr. Lewis: Since it is six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair to resume the same at eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I suppose it is too much to hope that we would reach a point in some debate in this House at which a minister would be ready to admit, frankly and forthrightly, that he had said something which on sober, or drunken reflection—I do not care which—he had found to be wrong.

I would say in the presence of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), as I say it now in his absence, that his speech this afternoon was either a concoction deliberately designed to confuse everybody or else it was a rejection or retraction of the criticism he had made of the Auditor General in his broadcast.

An hon. Member: Both.

Mr. Lewis: I hope it was the latter. Or it may have been both, as was suggested. I hope it was a retraction of that criticism. I would have respected the hon. gentleman a great deal more if he had possessed whatever was required—I am not going to find a word for it—to say frankly to this House and to the country that he had made a mistake. Then, at least, we would be discussing the issue of the Auditor General without all the exchanges which are now involved.

Backbenchers who participated in this debate would have given those of us who are in the opposition, and people who are outside, a great deal more confidence in their integrity and objectivity if they had said they would vote against the motion—I would not expect them to vote in favour of a motion of non-confidence against their own government—but that in their view the President of the Treasury Board had been wrong in what he said on television. It might be that those words came out of his mouth without sufficient thought having been given to them. I say this because of the kind of speech he made and the way in which this issue arose. It is disturbing, and it will continue to be disturbing as long as the hon. gentleman does not say in a forthright manner, "What I said on April 11 was wrong." So long as the President of the Treasury Board does not say this, we continue to be disturbed.

The issue arose out of what he said during that broadcast. Never mind the statement by the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome) that it is necessary to put the minister's remarks in their context. Here is the context in itself. On April 11 he said that the Auditor General had "expressed his view as to the appropriateness of some government policies". I ask hon. member to note the following words:

> In this sense he is pitting his judgment as to sound business practice and sound government policy against the government's and, not unnaturally, you would not expect the government to agree with his judgment in every instance. I wonder, myself, whether the Auditor General should cast himself in this role, or whether we should look for, really, another kind of person to be Auditor General.

This is what gave rise to the fear in this House and in the country as to what the government intended to do with the position of Auditor General. If this is not what the President of the Treasury Board meant—and his speech today did not suggest this kind of thing—then he should have said so when he addressed the House. Many of us say things off the cuff in reply to questions on television and elsewhere which we might later regret. But in a matter of such importance as this, a minister, a member of the government—I see the hon. gentleman is now in the House, so I can use the word I did not use before—a minister should have the courage to say, "I made a mistake in using the words I did; this is what I meant—" thereby removing the fear which is justifiable as long as those words remain on the record.

[Mr. Lewis.]

Two parts of the minister's statement are of particular importance. The first constitutes an objection to the Auditor General using his judgment as to what is sound business practice. Mr. Speaker, it is a basic duty of the Auditor General to analyse and, if necessary, to criticize the business practices of the government or any of its departments. For a minister to object to the Auditor General doing this is most disturbing. It is an illustration of the arrogance to which we have drawn attention so many times and it is part of the picture to which I shall refer later.

Then the President of the Treasury Board went on to say: "I wonder ... whether we should look for, really, another kind of person to be Auditor General." If, in plain English, this does not mean that he—and presumably he speaks for the government—was contemplating kicking Mr. Henderson out of his job, I should like to know what those words do mean. This was a disturbing thing.

Then today the President of the Treasury Board, both in his speech and I think in reply to some questions, said that this motion which the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) has moved is based on a wrong premise. At one point he said that it suggests there was criticism of the Auditor General. There is none, said the minister. Either he was telling the truth today or he was telling the truth on April 11. If he was telling the truth today, he should have said that what he said on April 11 was wrong. Then we would have had some kind of understanding of the basis on which this discussion is carried on. But so long as he leaves that statement on the record we have a right to be disturbed about the intentions of the government and of the President of the Treasury Board, despite the speech that he made this afternoon. If his speech was intended as a repudiation of what he said on April 11, I ask him to say so or to get somebody else to say so. If it is the case that he does repudiate it, then indeed he has the right to say that the motion is based on a wrong premise.

The fact is that much of the speech of the President of the Treasury Board today contained material with which all hon. members of the House agree. Many of the suggestions that he made for improving the relationship between the Auditor General and the government would, I am sure, be accepted by the members of the Public Accounts Committee and most of the members of the House. I see nothing wrong in his suggestion that he or members of the government should be able to explain an action which is being criticized by the Auditor General. But the Auditor General has to retain his right to criticize. What did he say with regard to the concessions made to the automobile manufacturers? I should like to put on the record the sort of thing that he said.

What we on this side of the House are standing for, as I understood the Leader of the Opposition and my leader, what we are asking the government to accept is the right of the Auditor General to say these things. If there is an explanation to be given, then the minister should appear before the Public Accounts Committee to give it. He should satisfy the members of the Public Accounts Committee that what was done was the right thing; that the procedures that were followed were the right procedures; that the business practice that was employed was the right business practice.

If I may summarize what the Auditor General said, to save time, instead of reading his words, he said that the Tariff Order did not contain all of the criteria which the government applied in paying out over $180 million; that the fact was that one of the companies, the company that received $173 million, did not meet the criteria established in the Tariff Order, and that the government paid out money by Order in Council which, as I read the Auditor General, remitted or forgave payment and was not justified by the criteria in the only instrument which could justify it, namely, the Tariff Order. He said it is therefore essential that the Motor Vehicle Tariff Order, 1965, be amended to spell out all of the criteria to be followed in determining liability for payment of duty.

That, in summary, is what the Auditor General said and is what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the President of the Treasury Board objected to. It is because they objected to the Auditor General saying what it is his duty to say that we in the opposition believe the government ought to be castigated and that the members who have the courage to do so ought to vote for the motion and tell the government they must stop that sort of thing.

This is part of a picture that we have seen ever since this government took office. I cite the treatment by members of the government, particularly by the Prime Minister, of questions during question period and the attempt time and time again to make both Parliament and Members of Parliament look silly. Perhaps in some cases it may not be very hard to do that, including my own case. But that is not the job of the government. Let them leave it to us; we will do that on our own.

The general attitude toward Parliament by the government is characterized by an arrogance that apparently has no limit. Even the Auditor General is fair play for the Prime Minister and the President of the Treasury Board whenever they feel like it. As pointed out by the two leaders who spoke this afternoon, the Auditor General is an essential part of the democratic process in this country, indeed in any democratic society.

It is important for Parliament and for the people of Canada to recognize that there are two kinds of policy matters. There is the policy matter that is concerned with the actual program that the government is given legislative authority to introduce and to implement. Then there is the policy that sets out the way in which the government's program and expenditures are in fact implemented.

The policy respecting the way in which expenditures are in fact implemented is precisely within the sphere of the Auditor General to study, to analyse and if necessary to criticize in order to improve the policy by which expenditures are carried through. The procedures that are used and whether or not there is legislative sanction for the way in which this is done are both part of the function of the Auditor General, as clearly described in section 67 and following sections of the Financial Administration Act.

With only 15 minutes in which to speak and with mine almost up, it is difficult to cover everything. But it is the readiness with which the President of the Treasury Board, more directly than the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald), says that the Auditor General is stepping over the mark, and therefore that the government has to look for somebody else, that has disturbed the members of the opposition and is a condemnation of a government which wants to curtail the freedom and opportunity for work that the Auditor General in fact must have, and does have, under the legislation.

Finally, may I say that if the President of the Privy Council speaks this evening he will perhaps fill the gap which has been left. Even in his speech this afternoon the President of the Treasury Board said that the Auditor General must not enter into policy matters. He said he must not lend himself to becoming part of the "adversary situation in Parliament", with which everyone agrees. But by saying that he is suggesting that the Auditor General has in fact lent himself to being part of the adversary situation in Parliament, and that is a pretty serious charge.

If I were the Auditor General, I would by implication consider that that was a pretty serious charge. I am not saying that the minister said that in so many words. Perhaps I would have respected it more had he done so. But by saying that the Auditor General must not permit himself to become part of the adversary game in Parliament, the President of the Treasury Board is implying that the Auditor General has in fact done so.

As I say, if I were Mr. Henderson I would consider that a pretty serious charge. I would say, as I say now to the President of the Treasury Board, that he had no right to make that statement unless he was willing to document the truth of it. This he did not do. Even in his speech this afternoon there was not a single word about the policies with which the Auditor General is supposed to have interfered. There was not a single word about the way in which he is supposed to have helped whatever it is that the President of the Treasury Board meant by the "adversary situation" in this Parliament. That is mere innuendo.

Mr. Drury: Oh, come on!

Mr. Lewis: Yes, it was innuendo. It was a charge against the Auditor General which, in effect, condemned him by implication without a single word of evidence to support that accusation and charge. One asks oneself why an intelligent person who knows what he is saying—the President of the Treasury Board is an intelligent man who knows the words he uses—makes charges by implication, knowing they are charges by implication, without documenting them, unless it is that he is deliberately setting out to undermine both the person and the office of the Auditor General. That is precisely what the President of the Treasury Board has done, and that is precisely why the motion moved today ought to be supported, as well as the amendment.

• (8:20 p.m.)

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, it is rather difficult to follow the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis). I often prepare remarks and intend to state them, but after listening to him I have the tendency to deal with his remarks and not concentrate on those I have prepared.

Mr. Woolliams: You are on the defensive now.

Mr. Allmand: If you want to make a speech, get up and make one.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: The hon. member for York South and some other members over there like to talk about the rights of Parliament during speeches in this House, but when it comes to protecting those rights they are a little two-faced about it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: You are getting touchy.

Mr. Allmand: I have heard the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) make many great speeches in the House about the rights of Parliament, but I would say he is one of the worst offenders in the House in respect of the rights of Parliament. I have heard him interrupt many speakers in this House when they were trying to put forward their views.

The hon. member for York South in his speech talked about innuendoes and arrogance. Of all the speakers in this House to talk about arrogance, the last one that should do it is the hon. member for York South. I think I have heard more arrogant speeches by that hon. member than by all the hon. members of this House put together. If innuendoes were not directed at the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) today by the hon. member for York South, I do not know what innuendo is.

Mr. Lewis: You certainly do not.

Mr. Allmand: All during his speech he was—

Mr. Lewis: It was a very forthright statement.

Mr. Allmand: During his speech today there was more innuendo than in all the speeches made by the President of the Treasury Board. This motion is divided into two parts. The second part reads that this House—

—reasserts its support of the principle of unfettered parliamentary scrutiny of government expenditures including the right of the Auditor General to comment on the failure of the government to make expenditure in strict compliance with parliamentary appropriations and to report on these and any other cases he feels should be brought to the attention of Parliament.

I think we all agree 100 per cent with that part of the motion. As the President of the Treasury Board said this afternoon, that is taken almost word for word from the statute itself, and as the law of Parliament we fully support it. I fully support it and would not suggest it should ever be changed in any way. However, the first part of the motion states:

That this House condemns the government for criticizing the Auditor General of Canada for carrying out his duties according to law—

I cannot and will not support that part because surely it is not true. This afternoon the President of the Treasury Board stated he had never made any such criticism and neither had the government. I saw the television program in question on which the statement of the President of the Treasury Board was supposed to have been made. This was one of those television programs on which a minister sits before a panel of journalists and is grilled by them over a period of time. It was one of those programs during which they deal with many subjects.

Mr. Lewis: The minister could defend himself better.

Mr. Allmand: Maybe he could. That is another of those arrogant remarks the hon. member for York South interjects in speeches. I know very well that the President of the Treasury Board is capable of defending himself, but I feel that if this is a worthwhile motion I should give my point of view.

As I said, I watched that program. The questions put to the minister related to many subjects. For the most part they dealt with the situation in respect of the Post Office. The interviewers bombarded the minister with questions, and he handled himself in a very cool way: I thought he handled himself very well. When we come to the particular statement when he was talking about the Auditor General, he said—I do not have the exact words but the hon. member for York South had the transcript and read them into the record—something to the effect that we should look for another kind of person, or another person for this role.

I must admit that I had doubt as to what he meant. I did not know what the President of the Treasury Board meant when he said that. The questioner who heard his remark must also have had some doubt in his mind because within very few minutes he put a question directly to the President of the Treasury Board, asking if this meant that the government was trying to get rid of the Auditor General or to restrict his role. The President of the Treasury Board replied directly and categorically that they were not. I would think that if members of the opposition really had the courage to be honest, they would admit that this reply clarified the issue. The hon. member for York South was talking about courage this evening. As far as I am concerned, that reply settled the issue for me and I think it settled it for the people who were questioning the minister that day.

The next morning I saw a large headline in the Montreal Gazette to the effect that the President of the Treasury Board wanted to tamper in some way or another with the role of Auditor General. Of course, this is the type of headline we very often see in our papers: it is the result of a journalist looking for innuendoes and for division, for scandal or any type of weakness in words in order to make some kind of complaint against ministers or Members of Parliament whether they be on the government or the opposition side.

I saw that program, and the original doubt I had in my mind about the statement was completely cleared up by the very categorical statement made by the minister later in the program. On the following Monday and Tuesday questions were put not only to the President of the Treasury Board but to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). They were asked whether there was any intention on the part of the government to restrict the role of the Auditor General or to replace him. On every occasion they said no, and it was very clear that they said no.

This afternoon the President of the Treasury Board repeated this denial. Not only did he say the government did not want to tamper in any way with the role of the Auditor General, but he said it was the government's intention to make the role of the Auditor General more independent and to give him greater control over his office. He said it was the intention to take his salary out of the statute and tie it to that of a judge of the new federal court.

As a matter of fact, the recommendation this afternoon of the minister went much beyond the requests in the report of the Auditor General in which he asked for certain improvements in his office and in his role. I feel that this type of motion put before us by the opposition is an attempt to create an issue. There are not enough real issues to deal with, so the opposition is trying to create one by putting forward a motion like this.

In his speech this afternoon the President of the Treasury Board said there were four general issues which emerged from the recent report of the Auditor General. The first relates to the independence of his office, the second to his role and responsibility, the third to the responsibility of the government to respond to the criticisms which he advances, and the fourth to the status of the Auditor General and his office. As I pointed out, the minister stated that all these recommendations had the support of the government and the government was willing to move on them and even go beyond those made by the Auditor General.

The minister also admitted that the government had perhaps not been as effective as it might have been in responding to some of the criticisms of the Auditor General. He stated the government was willing to take steps to improve this situation. He also stated he would recommend that the government be obliged to give a report each year in which it would answer to the House of Commons in respect of recommendations put forward by the Auditor General, and that this report would be considered by the Public Accounts Committee at the same time as the report of the Auditor General.

In conclusion I wish to make very clear tha I fully support the role of the Auditor General and the present Auditor General in his job. I think we must protect him in that position and I believe he has every right to put forward his criticism in respect of waste, misappropriation and, as the minister stated this afternoon, probity. I do not think, however, that he should be in any way implicated in any type of policy discussion or pushed into any type of partisan role. Perhaps when the government brings forward its bill this matter will be clarified. The minister stated that on the whole the government would be dealing with the requests of the Auditor General himself in respect of this bill. I felt I should speak in the debate because there has been some doubt about this question and I wished to make clear my position on the matter and state that I intend to vote against both the amendment and the motion.

Hon. Hugh John Flemming (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, my reason for speaking to the motion is that I wish to leave no doubt in the mind of anyone within the sound of my voice this evening how I intend to vote. I intend to support the motion and I should like to give some of the reasons for my position. The previous speaker mentioned that he could not support the first part of the motion, which I believe is the part which should be supported. I belong to the school of people who believe that when members of a government make public utterances they are advancing the general policy of the government. So when the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) and the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) make public utterances I believe it is appropriate that the public in general, in this case the people of Canada, should consider they speak for the government. On that basis the motion does condemn the government, but I submit the government deserves to be condemned for this particular reason.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Flemming: The motion condemns the government criticizing the Auditor General of Canada for carrying out his duties according to law. Some members who have spoken this afternoon take exception to this language. Personally I do not take exception to it for the reasons I have just given the House. When two members of the government make public utterances concerning a dedicated public official and a man who occupies a position of great public trust, or when they make critical speeches concerning him, this becomes the policy of the government and deserves the condemnation of every member of this House.

I submit that this motion is also a motion of confidence in the Auditor General. I have the honour to sit on the Public Accounts Committee. It is a privilege to sit on that committee. I find that the attitude of the Auditor General toward public questions and toward the various inquiries which he makes by reason of his official position is an extremely fair one. I have never seen any indication of anything which I thought savoured of anything more than a reference to the actual facts which he could substantiate.

I have had some experience with auditors general in another capacity and I submit that in my opinion the government, or any government generally speaking should appreciate having an official of the importance of the Auditor General giving it honest-to-goodness opinions concerning policy as well as facts. I have never been interested in hiring people in my business who were just yes, yes people. I prefer to have someone who will disagree with me and say, "Mr. Flemming, you are wrong about so and so and should change your mind about such and such". To me that is the proper type of person to be giving advice to a government, an individual or people interested in the public welfare. Therefore, I submit that it is not in the best interests of the country for any member of the government to advance the idea that the Auditor General must not under any condition or circumstance say anything which could be construed as being a reflection on public policies. It is important that the Auditor General should feel free to do this, and it is better for the government because the government should benefit from his advice.

I have spoken about the office of the Auditor General and my conception of what the Auditor General should do in his public capacity. Now for a moment I wish to refer to the general reputation the present incumbent of this office has in the hearts and minds of the Canadian people. He has been referred to as the guardian of the public purse. That is a good description. He has been referred to as the protector of the taxpayer. I say, with great respect, God knows that is needed. He has been referred to as the watchdog of the treasury. According to what we hear, this government needs a watchdog. But why would anyone hire a watchdog and then try to prevent it from barking? That, apparently, is what this government wants to do. I submit that all these descriptions indicate a great degree of confidence and public trust in the Auditor General. This motion not only condemns the government but expresses confidence in the Auditor General. This is another reason to vote for it. This confidence is well-deserved.

Generally speaking, all members who have spoken today on this subject have indicated their complete confidence in the Auditor General, but recent events lead us to believe the government does not share this opinion. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the previous speaker have referred to legislation that will be brought down in this House and we as members will be asked to consider and vote on it in the public interest. As the Prime Minister said the other day, this legislation will define the duties of the Auditor General. I submit the inference to be taken by the House is that the legislation will restrain the Auditor General from fulfilling his functions to a certain degree, because when you define duties and go to the trouble of putting them down on paper it means you are not satisfied that the person holding the office is not overstepping the bounds of his authority.

Let us look at the Auditor General's authority. From where does he derive it? The Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Douglas) gave the answer to that question this afternoon. My friend, the hon. member for Grey Simcoe (Mr. Noble) read from the document this afternoon. The hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome) who spoke just before the supper break complained that the Auditor General had no business bringing these matters before Parliament and that he was exceeding his authority.

All the hon. member needs to do is examine page 1 of the Auditor General's report for 1968. Reference has been made to this passage today, but I will read it again. It says that the Auditor General shall call attention to every case in which he has observed certain situations, and then it goes on to say:

> and to any other case that the Auditor General considers should be brought to the notice of the House of Commons.

That is his statutory authority. I submit it is pretty broad authority, and I think properly so. The government should welcome it because it has the effect of giving advance notice to all, in connection with the spending of public funds, that an accounting will be demanded, that the record shall be kept very carefully, and that discrepancies of any nature will be included in the report of the Auditor General and brought before Parliament which, after all, consists of the representatvies of the people. That is as it should be.

Mr. Speaker, I support the motion, first because it condemns the government, which should be condemned, and second because it is an expression of confidence in the Auditor General. Those are two very good reasons for supporting the motion. There are other reasons.

I think that when notice is served on us that legislation will be changed, we have to be careful. Only a few days ago I had the privilege of speaking in this House on the hate literature bill. I said that legislation such as this had not been thought of for almost half a century, and I asked why we had it before us. I ask now, why do we have to redefine the duties and responsibilities of the Auditor General, if it is not for the purpose of clipping his wings? In my opinion that is the reason for the government bringing in the legislation. They are most unwise in doing so. It will probably carry by virtue of the government's majority, but so far as I am concerned it is most unwise.

As I said, we have had some experience with auditors general. I have found them to be highly dedicated men: I have never found one who was otherwise. Certainly the present incumbent is no exception—quite the opposite. I think we must of necessity consider what has been stated by the President of the Treasury Board in connection with the Auditor General. Mr. Henderson has uncovered case after case of government waste, extravagance, and bureaucratic bungling which have cost the taxpayers millions of dollars.

It is obvious that his persistent criticism of the government's slipshod methods, mishandling of public funds, its irregular administrative practice are irritating and outraging the present cabinet. So when the President of the Treasury Board was questioned as to whether the Auditor General should cast himself in the role in which he pits his judgment against that of the government, he said, "Perhaps we should look for, really, another kind of person to be Auditor General".

I agree with the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) when he asked that the President of the Treasury Board clarify that statement. He should tell this House what he is looking for in an Auditor General. If he thinks we should have another kind of person, he should tell us what he is looking for. I submit that the Auditor General's function is to point out these irregularities to Parliament. I have no doubt that he is aware of what he is doing and I do not consider that he has made any attempt to pass judgment on government policies.

The House will remember that not very long ago various items of this nature were before the Public Accounts Committee. I think that the government chooses the wrong time—income tax time—to criticize the Auditor General. Canadians who will be paying their taxes within the next two weeks are bound to support the Auditor General who has shown where the government wasted $39½ million last year. The taxpayer looking at a T-4 slip and wondering how he will pay his bills with the little bit of money left after the government gets through extracting money from the pay cheque—this applies pretty much to all of us—is bound to support the Auditor General. He will find it difficult to agree that the Auditor General should have his wings clipped. Mr. Henderson pointed out that the government had built an $8,800,000 port in the lower St. Lawrence region despite studies which showed there was no ship traffic there at all.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Apparently there is a disposition to allow the hon. member to continue. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Flemming: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members for this consideration. I will try not to infringe upon it any more than I require to finish this part of my remarks.

The President of the Treasury Board said, I believe, that the Auditor General should be preoccupied with accounting procedure. I submit that accounting procedure would not have said anything about the nearly $9 million that was wasted on that particular project. The Canadian taxpayer looking for a rebate to help pay some of his family's bills will be interested to hear about the $180 million being forgiven one of the large automobile companies, contrary to law.

Mr. Drury: Oh, oh!

Mr. Flemming: The President of the Treasury Board disagrees with that statement, evidently, but the fact is that the Auditor General did not criticize anything except that it was done without statutory authority. However, I shall not try to prove that point tonight. If somebody wants to argue the point, he can. But the fact remains that $180 million, in the aggregate, was remitted. There was talk this afternoon of whether it was remitted before or after but, Mr. Speaker, how can you remit something which you have not paid? I submit that is an appropriate question.

• (8:50 p.m.)

Since the House has been good enough to give me extra time I do not want to take advantage of that kindness and good nature, but I repeat that this is a most important motion. It is a motion that indicates condemnation for something that is wrong. It indicates confidence in someone who is right.

There is a principle established here in the interest of all Canadians, and I hope that everyone will vote for it.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House is a very serious one and I regret the necessity for it. Even after all these years there seems to be some misconception in the highest quarters as to what the Auditor General's job is and what our duties are with regard to it. He has been castigated in absentia, which is a cowardly act, and if we do not defend him with this motion I do not know where he will be defended. The foolish part of it is that his action and service are of such an outstanding nature as to need no defence, and I am almost ashamed to find myself in the position of advocate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bigg: As so often happens, Mr. Speaker, it becomes a matter of one side of the chamber calling down the other for its mistake, but of course I stand to be corrected. If the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) did not mean what he said, he did not dispel my doubts when he spoke this afternoon. If the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) did not mean what he said, he has yet to make any statement which would dispel my doubts.

As a public servant, the Auditor General has no opportunity to defend himself and I would be delinquent indeed if as a member of the Public Accounts Committee I did not do my best to defend him. His crime, according to the President of the Treasury Board, is that he has usurped the prerogative and power of the cabinet and has taken upon himself legislative authority. But, Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board was trying to do by the back door what he did not have the courage to do by the front door.

Referring to a series of recommendations concerning the office of the Auditor General made by the Public Accounts Committee in 1966-67, the Auditor General in 1969 reported as follows:

> The committee is of the opinion that all of the characteristics, duties and functions of the office of the Auditor General should be set out in a separate act of Parliament governing this office instead of being a part of the Financial Administration Act.
> The committee is requesting the Auditor General to consult his legal advisers and to co-operate with them in drafting such an act for submission to the committee and to the government.

If there is a crime—I use that word advisedly, Mr. Speaker—then it is ours. If the Auditor General has been remiss in his duties, as far as I can see it is only in carrying out the wishes of a committee which is the link between Parliament and his very important and efficient office. I think that argument disposes of any suggestion that he has exceeded his duties. Indeed, had he not carried out our wishes I would be quite prepared to move, in the Public Accounts Committee, that he be asked to explain why, after being given two years to work upon it, he had not come forward with a suitable act.

I might go further and say that perhaps our committee had been delinquent in not taking more immediate action on this matter, had it not been for the fact that it is powerless to act until given the opportunity to meet under the authority of this House. We have often complained that we do not sit long enough or often enough to go into detail on very important matters.

Another misdemeanour of which the Auditor General was accused is the language used in his report. I do not know what kind of language he was supposed to use to explain, in dollars and cents, the negligent spending of our money. He is obliged to outline non-productive expenditures, but these have been interpreted as having some deep, dark meaning.

In 1961 the Public Accounts Committee, chaired by one of the most beloved members of the House, the previous Speaker and now a member of the other place, put forward the suggestion that each and every year the Auditor General should "list in the minutest detail all non-productive items which come to his attention."

If the Auditor General has erred, in my opinion and in the opinion of many within the sound of my voice he has only erred in performing his duties too well. He has in fact listed in his report, to the best of his knowledge and to the best of the ability of his staff, all the non-productive items coming to his attention. We could split hairs by arguing whether the adjectives used were correct, whether the spending of this money was negligent, criminally negligent or extravagant. I do not think the adjectives mean anything at the recommendation stage. If our feelings are that tender it might be suggested that the report be kept secret until the Public Accounts Committee, the body to which this report belongs, has approved it and that until then it should remain a privileged document.

Criticism of Auditor General

The Auditor General's duty, as I see it, is plain. He must act entirely in an advisory capacity to our committee. No matter what his opinions might be, so long as they are honest we, representing a cross section of the Canadian people, will look at them as carefully as we can and in as detailed a manner as possible in the time at our disposal. Only after we have made our recommendations is the government obliged to take any further steps. It can take steps without our advice, as it has on many occasions, and it can ignore our advice, as it has on a great many occasions.

Since our recommendations have been ignored over and over again during the past years, it is not surprising that our chief adviser—I am talking about the adviser to the Public Accounts Committee—should become a little impatient. The Auditor General would be a poor adviser indeed if he did not point out these leaks in the treasury.

Mr. Woolliams: And the extravagances.

Mr. Bigg: They appear to be extravagances, certainly; they run into tens of millions, and in some cases hundreds of millions of dollars. We are not just dreaming in this regard. I am impressed by the very restrained language which our Auditor General uses. He does not use inflammatory language; he uses language showing that he is alarmed as a good accountant, as perhaps the best accountant in Canada who has the confidence of the Canadian people and of the United Nations. He runs his office so efficiently that accounting departments of the great universities in Canada today recognize training in the Auditor General's department as being equivalent to apprenticeship in any firm of auditors of which the universities have cognizance.

It is not strange that the Auditor General, whose job is to discover horses on the payroll, the sale of railways between senior members of the armed forces and other matters that ought to come to the public's attention, should use adjectives which are not complimentary. It would be passing strange if he always used weak and subdued language in a great, dynamic young democracy like Canada. The people would not compliment the Auditor General nor our committee if this type of sloppiness and criminal negligence—those adjectives are of my choosing—were allowed to run unchecked.

I am shocked that any member of the government, let alone a cabinet member, should pour his venom on a man who is not in a position to defend himself. Something even more sinister may be behind this. The Auditor General was relatively secure so long as he did not tread on the really big, sacred cows. Unless I am mistaken, his criticism of the automotive pact really brought onto his head the fire from high places.

[Mr. Bigg.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to express my view on the motion before the House and, particularly, on the work being done by our Auditor General, Mr. Henderson. I am a member of the Public Accounts Committee. During the previous year and this year I took a great deal of interest in the Auditor General's report and in the material which he brought to the attention of the Public Accounts Committee for investigation.

It seems to me that the recent attack launched against the Auditor General by two prominent ministers is extremely regrettable. It does something, I believe, to this institution and to the position of the Auditor General which all the words in the world cannot undo. It is regrettable particularly that those in the seats of power should see fit to criticize someone who, in my humble opinion, is doing the very job this House has told him to do. He is doing it ably and I believe he is doing it honestly. Of course, other members have said this.

The Auditor General is the watchdog over government spending and I believe it is absolutely essential that this House should in no way restrict his freedom to investigate, analyse and report his findings on every aspect of government spending. Any move by the present government to restrict a full and thorough review of spending by federal government departments will be a negation of democracy.

We boast about the rights of the citizens of Canada to full information on all and every government expenditure. I am certain that Canadians would not tolerate any move by the federal government or any government which would prevent this type of financial information being made public. The criticism in public of the Auditor General by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) in my opinion is a disgraceful and unwarranted attack on an individual who is carrying out the duties assigned to him by this House.

Those two ministers in my opinion are doing a disservice to the House, to the Canadian public and to their party when using their cabinet rank they try to silence a public official whose integrity and honesty is beyond question and who is carrying out the duties which, as I said earlier, Parliament laid down for him.

I understand other members have covered the responsibilities and functions of the Auditor General of Canada, which were laid down by this House. In part VII of the Financial Administration Act, Revised Statutes, chapter 116, it very clearly indicates that everything the Auditor General has done to date has been within the confines of the regulations laid down by this House of Commons. I am not going to go over them all again, but the act lists them and at the very bottom it adds that the Auditor General is entitled to look into any other things that he considers should be brought to the attention of the House of Commons. This is all the Auditor General and his assistants need to look into government expenditures and find out where foolish and faulty expenditures have been made. These are included in his report and it is then up to the committee to find out why these expenditures were made and what has been done year after year by the departments to correct stupid governmental spending. I think the Auditor General's Department is being handled in the way it should.

Any hon. member of this House who tries to put a muzzle on an individual who is pointing out fields of foolish public expenditure does not deserve to sit in this House, because this is the very essence of democracy. We are here as elected members from every part of Canada. We are spending the taxpayers' money. Not only do we spend the taxpayers' money as elected Members of Parliament but we are here to make sure we get good value for every dollar spent. What do we find? We find two responsible cabinet members on television and over the air telling the people of Canada that this is not the type of searchlight we want on the expenditures of this nation.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Harding: I say this is wrong. We should be proud that we have men like Mr. Henderson and his assistants to check and delve into a small percentage of government expenditures. They do not have the staff to do the thorough job they should be doing. Every time a discrepancy is found by the Auditor General, the taxpayers of Canada save money. If we as Members of Parliament were doing the job we should be doing, we would make absolutely certain there was not a repetition of the stupid spending of public money which year after year we find in some departments of government. I am not saying that the departmental heads are dishonest. I am not saying that at all. However, many of these departments are so wide-flung that the man in charge loses control over the expenditures.

It is the job of the Auditor General to delve and find out where the errors are being made and to bring this to the attention of the House. It is up to us to do the rest. What would happen if we took the advice of the government and had the Auditor General doing strictly the job of accounting, making certain that the money is not being misappropriated in any way? If that were the case, hardly anyone in this House would have the slightest knowledge of what was going on behind the scenes.

It is the job of the Auditor General and his staff to dig in and find out where department heads and far-flung department areas are getting into financial trouble, and report back to us. Some of the cabinet members still have the audacity to stand and say that this man must be removed because he is embarrassing the government.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): When did I say that?

Some hon. Members: Who said it?

Mr. Harding: This government is embarrassed. Every government has been embarrassed by the Auditor General's report.

Mr. Mahoney: The Auditor General will be embarrassed by your speech.

Mr. Harding: If the Auditor General embarrasses the government by pointing out foolish expenditures within a department, this is the way we learn. Departmental heads should accept the criticism which has been included in his report. It is his job to tell the Canadian people what is going on. It is amazing that in 1970 any cabinet member would stand in this chamber and tell the people of Canada that we are not to have a searchlight shining on public expenditures. If this government proceeds with the plan it has been advocating to muzzle the Auditor General and his staff, they will pay for it in the next election because the Canadian people will not stand for this type of treatment by any government.

Some hon. Members: Resign!

Mr. Harding: Last year I was a member of the Public Accounts Committee. The committee checked the expenditures in connection with the Bonaventure.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Harding: This was embarrassing for the government. I was a member of the committee which visited the Bonaventure in Halifax. The committee found that silly expenditures had been made. The public of Canada was entitled to know about these. Members of all parties in this House were on that committee. They were unanimous that this type of investigation was necessary.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harding: Not only do we have to check into these expenditures, Mr. Speaker, but we must stop them. The committee reached unanimous agreement. Every member of the committee, Liberal, Conservative, NDP and Creditiste agreed that the check we made would do good as far as having a searchlight on expenditures was concerned. There was nothing wrong with that. That is not telling the government what to do; it is telling the government that in certain departments or in certain aspects of departmental control there is laxity. If something has gone wrong, it must be checked. That is exactly what the Auditor General and his assistants do. They give us the lead and we are supposed to ferret out the rest of the information. The members are trying to do that honestly and openly.

As I said earlier, I regret the moves by responsible cabinet members. Even the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had indicated that this man has stepped outside the terms of reference given to him by the House. Anyone who reads them and says that the Auditor General has done something which he should not have done under the terms of reference is wrong. The terms of reference are wide enough to give him leeway to check into these expenditures. We expect him to check into them.

Recently, representatives of the CBC were before the committee. It was embarrassing to the heads of the CBC when certain expenditures in connection with Expo were brought to light. But I tell you this, Mr. Speaker: it was one of the best exposures made, and as a result the heads of the CBC have made up their minds that expenditures of this type will not be incurred again. What we need are not fewer people like the Auditor General, but more.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harding: An economist, Mr. E. P. Neufeld, a professor of the University of Toronto, appeared before a Senate committee which was dealing with the financial affairs of the federal government. He advocated that instead of restricting our activities in this field, we should expand—that we should appoint other people knowledgeable in the sphere of economic development to check the type of programs upon which the government is embarking.

Last year the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) told the House that since 1963 we had spent $1 billion on programs throughout the length and breadth of Canada, more than half of which had been wasted because the right hand did not know what the left hand was doing. This is why I say we should endorse 100 per cent the work done by the Auditor General, and that we should not hesitate to accept the criticism which he levels at us in his reports.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the opportunity of responding at this time to the fabrications and falsehoods of the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding) who has just resumed his seat. I think the best place to start would be with the words quoted by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) this afternoon—the words I used with regard to this particular question. I said I did not regard it as a responsibility of the Auditor General to criticize the policy underlying decisions taken by the government.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Nobody should.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That is an interesting statement by the leader of the New Democratic Party. It indicates the totalitarian mentality of those gentlemen over there. The fact of the matter is this: at no time did I say the Auditor General should resign, as the hon. member said I did. The Leader of the Opposition was somewhat more careful in referring to what I said. I emphasized that it was not the responsibility of the Auditor General to criticize the policy underlying particular decisions.

This assertion was questioned by the Leader of the Opposition and by the leader of the New Democratic Party. I think we should look at these allegations and draw our own conclusions from the argument. It seems to me, as my colleague the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) said this afternoon, that efforts like those made by the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the New Democratic Party to draw the Auditor General into arguments concerning policy are conduct of a kind which is the quickest possible way to destroy his role.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): You did it on March 25 on television.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I wish the hon. member would be more careful with the truth. He was rather more careful this afternoon than he has been speaking from his seat. At no time did I suggest that the Auditor General should resign, as the hon. member for Kootenay West stated. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) indirectly criticized the position taken by his own leader when he stated, agreeing with me, that basic policy was a matter for debate in this House between elected members; it was not the responsibility of the Auditor General.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Will the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) answer a question?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. member may ask me a question at the end of my remarks, just as he let other hon. members wait until he had finished.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): May we have order? The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) has the floor.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the fact that the President of the Privy Council is closing the debate does not mean he can make inaccurate statements. I am asking him to quote from the Auditor General's report a single instance in which the Auditor General has interfered with policy—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McIlraith: That is a specious point of order.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I see I have touched the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) to the quick. He is sensitive about the position he took this afternoon. He does not like it being demonstrated that the argument he put forward would, if accepted, lead to an important servant of the House being placed in an untenable position. It is not an argument which flatters him, nor does it flatter the opposition generally.

An hon. Member: Come off it!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): If the best they can do in this debate is to try to shout me down, Mr. Speaker, that, too, says something about the pedigree of the hon. member's argument.

An hon. Member: Do not use that word "pedigree".

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the NDP leave themselves open to a suggestion that they do not want the Auditor General to be a faithful servant of the House but that they want him to be a faithful servant of the opposition.

Mr. Monteith: Nuts.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Despite all the pious talk we have heard this afternoon, hon. members opposite will have to go a long way to dispel the idea that through their actions they are trying to place the Auditor General in the position to which I have drawn attention.

Let us turn to the details of the motion. There is the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. In my view, this can be dismissed at once. My hon. friend from Ontario (Mr. Cafik) punctured the hon. gentleman's case by pointing out that his twisting of the wording of the Financial Administration Act voided his own argument. I do not think the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands needs to be seriously considered by the House.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The Auditor General thought it was important.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I suggest that the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands is not important.

Mr. Stanfield: That is not something for you to decide.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The hon. member made a speech earlier today. If he is repenting of it now, if he has finally had a thought or two, we shall welcome the novelty and be glad to hear from him. The opposition motion and amendment ask the House to condemn the government for criticizing the Auditor General for carrying out his duties according to law. No speaker today from either the official opposition or the NDP has shown in any way that anyone on this side has criticized the Auditor General for carrying out his duties according to law.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): No member in any opposition party has established that the criticism was for failure to carry out his duties under the terms of the Financial Administration Act. My colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, pointed out clearly that it is the responsibility of the Auditor General, under the terms of that act, to examine carefully the books of account, the system of maintaining accounts, the system for checking and the manner in which public funds are expended. But nowhere at any time in this debate was there any substance for the allegation that is the key to this motion, namely, that the government had criticized the Auditor General for carrying out his duties according to law.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Let me now deal with the second part of the motion moved by the Leader of the Opposition. I think it reveals a rather interesting mentality on the part of the Leader of the Opposition, a rather interesting approach on his part to his and the opposition's role in this House. In his motion he talks about the House reasserting its support of the principle of unfettered parliamentary scrutiny of government expenditures. Whoever said that this support needed reasserting at this time? It was particularly ludicrous for the Leader of the Opposition to raise this point in view of the fact that during the course of supply debates, during the course of the provisions which under the rules of the House provide, to use his own terms, for the parliamentary scrutiny of government expenditures, opportunity for this sort of unfettered scrutiny arises.

The Leader of the Opposition raised the question whether this parliamentary scrutiny exists. The fact of the matter is that it does exist most effectively. The opportunity for scrutiny exists in debates such as this, if they are made effective use of; in the extensive provisions that are available to hon. members in relation to the examination of spending estimates; in the course of the discussions on main estimates and supplementary estimates; and, in due course, in the look backward which takes place when the public accounts are published and the Auditor General brings down his report.

Mr. Basford: But they do not do their job over there.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That is true. The hon. member for Kootenay West was candid enough to admit that if the opposition really did its job it would look into policy considerations underlying government decisions. The fact of the matter is that this is really an admission of weakness on the part of this opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It is an admission that there has been some diminution of effective parliamentary scrutiny over government expenditure.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, my point of privilege is this. I and the members of my party are members of the opposition. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) is attacking us personally as Members of Parliament and as members of the opposition. I should like to ask him, through you, Mr. Speaker, this question. I asked the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) the other day whether he received advice from the legal officers that the government was acting in accordance with the law, but the Minister of Justice would not answer my question. Neither would the President of the Privy Council answer. The hon. gentleman is now attacking us personally, yet the government will not give us the facts, in law or otherwise.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): You will recognize, Mr. Speaker, that is no point of privilege. If the hon. member, of course, wants to participate in the debate I will give him a few minutes to do so. If he has anything constructive to say at this point, I would be glad to hear from him.

An hon. Member: You are not the Speaker. Do not make rules for the Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): May I have order, please.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): A member of the Progressive Conservative Party said sit down.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, this pretends to be a democratic party. This is its approach to Parliament.

Mr. Ricard: Do you remember when you shot down the Prime Minister?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Hon. members opposite seem to be a little nervous. Perhaps I could be allowed to be heard, though if they have something to say perhaps they will be given a few minutes to say it.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, there is no question here of requiring a reassertion of parliamentary scrutiny of public expenditures. This scrutiny has never been in doubt. For that reason, I suggest that that part of the motion put forward by the Leader of the Opposition is ridiculous. May I repeat what I said before, that there has never been on the part of any member of the government criticism of the Auditor General for, to use the words of the motion, carrying out his duties according to law. We respect the role that the Auditor General has been given according to law. We deny—and the hon. member for York South agrees with this denial—that the Auditor General's role is a political one. The political role should be exercised by Members of Parliament, not by the Auditor General.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I might add, Mr. Speaker, that if any member of the opposition denies that that is the exact statement of the case, then this reveals a very strange mentality, firstly about the role of Parliament and the elected representatives and secondly about the office of the Auditor General. Therefore, on this basis I ask for the support of the House in rejecting the amendment moved by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, an amendment which was effectively rejected in the first few seconds of its life by the question asked by the hon. member for Ontario. And I ask for the support of the House in rejecting the motion moved by the Leader of the Opposition. I ask the House to express its confidence in this government.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I have just heard from the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) what is simply the condemnation by the government of all those who dare oppose its policy. Those people who have been in power since 1968 seem to think that their opponents should be removed from the map.

Mr. Drury: They are wrong.

Mr. Asselin: That is also the attitude of the government towards the Auditor General. In fact, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) and the President of the Privy Council have taken the liberty of publicly criticizing the Auditor General.

The President of the Treasury Board said on television that the Auditor General should be replaced because he had taken it upon himself to discuss government policy.

Mr. Speaker, the law clearly defines the duties and responsibilities of the Auditor General who must examine and carefully revise public expenses. Moreover, I must remind the President of the Privy Council and the President of the Treasury Board that the Auditor General is not responsible to the government but to the Parliament of Canada. Indeed, far from being the servant of the government, it rests with him to point out to Parliament extravagant expenditures made by the government from time to time—

• (9:40 p.m.)

An hon. Member: Often!

Mr. Asselin: The Auditor General is there to defend and protect the people, he is the ombudsman of the Canadian Parliament. If the Auditor General did not exist or could not have access to the books of the government, the opposition would not obtain the information—

An hon. Member: It is true!

Mr. Asselin: —which enable it sometimes to criticize the extravagance of the present government. Any administration which refuses to be criticized by the opposition or by an official authority created by Parliament, to wit the Auditor General, is doomed, because it repudiates the basic principles of true democracy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, we know that for some months the government has been after the Auditor General's head. First the government was suspicious when he noticed the extravagant and scandalous expenditures for the building of the Bonaventure. The government's ire was stirred and today it wants to table a bill for the purpose of redefining the auditor general's role. It is a way of forcing him to tender his resignation, which would please the government greatly, because then he could be replaced by an obliging and docile character who would follow the dictates of the President of the Treasury Board and the President of the Privy Council.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Asselin: But we in the opposition do not agree with this view of the government. Moreover, it would appear that there is no unanimity within the cabinet. The President of the Treasury Board said on television that the Auditor General had to be replaced. However the President of the Privy Council declared that a bill must be introduced to redefine the responsibilities of the Auditor General.

The other day, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) seemed to be taking side with the Auditor General when he said that there was no difference between the views of the Auditor General and those of the government.

Mr. Speaker, as long as the government does not acknowledge the relevance of the Auditor General's duties, the role of this important official in the administration of the country will simply be reduced to nothing because this government, since it came to power, has seemed to want to govern without taking into account the views of hon. members or those of the nation. As the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) said this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, we shall fight valiantly so that the Auditor General might keep his responsibilities, that Parliament might, with him, discuss and study thoroughly the expenditures which the government would like to hide from the people.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It being 9.45 o'clock p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to section 9 of Standing Order 58, to interrupt these proceedings and forthwith put every question necessary to dispose of the motion now before the House.

The question is on the amendment. All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Douglas, Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands) which was negatived on the following division:

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ITEMS FOR BALANCE OF WEEK

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I wish to remind the House about the business for the remainder of this week. As announced, tomorrow will be the sixth and final day of the budget debate. On Friday we will call for debate the following items: First, government order 13, report stage of Bill C-10 with regard to the Canada Shipping Act; second, government order 76, report stage of Bill S-14, the radiation emitting devices bill; third, government order 15, consideration of Senate amendments to Bill C-12, the International Development Research Centre bill.

I confirm that tomorrow at the usual time I will make an announcement of the business for next week.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ANNOUNCEMENT OF SIGNING OF AGREEMENTS WITH NEW BRUNSWICK AND NEWFOUNDLAND GOVERNMENTS

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to report that the formal signing of economic development agreements with the governments of New Brunswick and Newfoundland was completed yesterday.

These are agreements of a new kind. They provide for 100 per cent federal financing of a wide range of infrastructure projects which are necessary to economic growth and social progress but which the provinces and municipalities could not afford to carry out.

In the special areas designated in the two provinces, the infrastructure projects include water and sewer systems, industrial parks, servicing of residential land, schools and roads. The agreements also provide federal grants for the construction of important sections of provincial highways.

In the case of Newfoundland, the federal funds committed for the current fiscal year are $41.2 million, of which $31 million is in grants and $10.2 million in loans. The projects covered by the agreements are all to be started this year, but much of the work will be continuing next year. The ceiling for total federal expenditures on the projects is $82 million.

In the case of New Brunswick, the funds committed for the present fiscal year total $32.5 million, of which $22.7 million is in grants and $9.8 million in loans. The ceiling for federal expenditures to complete the projects is $62 million.

I should point out that these are not my department's only expenditures in the two provinces. In both provinces there is the ARDA program, and in Newfoundland there is also our assistance to the resettlement program. Our industrial incentives are available in both provinces but are at present more heavily utilized in New Brunswick than in Newfoundland. Also, we have in New Brunswick the two FRED plans. Thus the totals of my department's expenditures in the two provinces in the fiscal year will be very similar.

It should be said that these agreements are very different from, say, ARDA or FRED agreements. They are not concerned just with the principles of programs, leaving projects to be worked out later. The agreements themselves list the projects in some detail, so that work can be undertaken promptly.

One consequence, however, is that the agreements are rather large documents, and I regret that it will therefore be some days before they are printed in sufficient quantity for distribution. That will, of course, be done as soon as practicable. Meantime, I would add that in addition to providing in detail for projects to be started this year, the agreements commit us to federal-provincial cooperation in longer-term development plans.

On the basis of this first year alone, however, it can be said that never before has federal development assistance been provided on such a scale. I believe it will make an important contribution to the improvement of employment and earnings opportunities and to the lessening of regional inequalities in Canada.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, having listened to the minister's statement I think it is only fair to say there is really nothing new in what he told us. We have been expecting this program for the past two months.

The question naturally comes to mind: why the delay? Why has it taken so long to get these two agreements signed? Both provinces had been informed that the agreements would be ready for signature by April 1. In the case of Newfoundland it was expected that the agreement would have been signed and, indeed, implemented by now. The minister indicated in the House in reply to questions directed to him by members of the opposition that this would, in fact, be the case. It would appear, however, that he ran into some rough weather when he placed these agreements before Treasury Board.

I notice that the agreements call for a total expenditure of $41.2 million in the case of Newfoundland and $32.5 million in the case of New Brunswick. What I find interesting is that in the case of Newfoundland the total amount is broken down into $31 million in grants and $10.2 million in loans and, in the case of New Brunswick, $22.7 million in grants and $9.8 million in loans. So far as the province of Newfoundland is concerned, I doubt very much whether the economy of the province can assume the burden of this additional debt. The province is already approaching the $1 billion mark in provincial debt and the amount is now reaching serious proportions. I doubt very much whether Newfoundland can assume this additional burden. I suggest that if the facts were known the same would apply in the case of New Brunswick, which now finds itself having to assume an additional burden of some $9.8 million of provincial debt.

I also understand that these one-year programs are to be followed by longer five-year programs which are to be signed later this year. The government of Newfoundland has indicated that it expects to have its five-year program with the government ready for signature by July, though this does not coincide with the minister's timetable.

[Mr. Marchand (Langelier).]

These programs certainly cannot be the answer to all of the problems that are facing these two hard-pressed provinces. The great danger, as I see it, is that in the case of my own province, and perhaps less so in the case of New Brunswick, this particular program has been presented as the panacea for all our troubles. I think this is a great mistake because it places too much emphasis and promise on these programs, as I think the minister will be the first to agree.

It is fair to say in this regard that as far as Newfoundland is concerned the program, in my view, has been grossly misrepresented. There is no question that both provinces, Newfoundland and New Brunswick, are in very serious financial difficulties, largely as the result of many years of regional and economic disparity but also due to the consequences of the mismanagement of both provincial economies.

Unemployment in both provinces is at a rate which would not be tolerated in any other province in Canada. The per capita income of both provinces equally would not be tolerated in other areas of Canada. The per capita income of the people of the province of Newfoundland is such that it places many Newfoundlanders well below what has been defined by the Economic Council of Canada as being the poverty line.

I note that the minister's estimates are now before the Standing Committee on Regional Economic Expansion and I hope the minister will explain the programs when he appears before the committee later this afternoon. I see him shaking his head in the negative, but I hope that when he does appear before the committee he will be able to explain these programs in much greater detail.

Naturally we hope that these programs will be successful because the problems that are facing these two provinces are very severe. However, we have grave doubts about the success of these programs if the government persists in its present policy of curbing inflation without recognizing economic disparity as the number one problem in Canada.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, all of us in the New Democratic Party are happy to learn that agreements have been signed by the federal government with the provinces of New Brunswick and Newfoundland. May I thank the minister for his courtesy in making available to us a copy of his statement prior to his announcement in the House.

We certainly hope that further agreements will be forthcoming shortly with the other provinces. I suggest there is urgency in this matter if in fact these programs are going to be of any benefit during the current year in relieving very difficult economic situations.

I want to draw attention to and welcome the comprehensive features of the plan as they were referred to in the minister's statement, particularly the emphasis that is being placed on infrastructure projects. Certainly we hope that this principle and approach will be applied in the agreements with other provinces as well, because we feel it is important to develop an adequate infrastructure across Canada, very often involving projects beyond the financial and fiscal capacity of the provinces, if we are to establish an equality of standards throughout the country.

It is difficult to make adequate comment on the over-all program announced by the minister since, as he mentioned, the agreements are not available yet, but I think some note should be taken of the implications of the minister's announcement in terms of an adequate degree of economic planning and the development of economic plans in all the provinces concerned. Certainly adequacy of economic planning is essential to the success of these programs. I note with regret that an adequate degree of planning has been absent from many aspects of the department's programs. These agreements I feel possibly show a continuance of this approach of ad hocery. We have had the ARDA program, then the FRED program, the industrial incentives program, and now we have these agreements. It seems to me that this involves an ad hoc approach. I believe that the department and the minister should review their programs in order to develop a comprehensive integrated plan of action. It is very important as well that adequate funds are committed to these programs if they are to be successful.

Attention should also be drawn to the fact that various regions of Canada which the minister is attempting to help with these programs are being seriously hurt by the government's present national economic policies. This includes New Brunswick and Newfoundland with which agreements have now been signed. The minister should make every effort to relate his programs to over-all economic policies in Canada. I hope he can persuade his colleagues and seatmate, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), to abandon the present sterile and ineffective policies which are doing great harm to regions of Canada such as those involved in this announcement today, and which can negate much or all of the beneficial aspects of regional development programs.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, the statement the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) has just made to the House refers to projects in which the provinces of Newfoundland and New Brunswick will surely be interested. I toured those provinces last summer and I saw that all kinds of public works were called for in order to provide the population with greatly needed services.

However, since the minister says in his statement that the projects are possible through an agreement with provincial governments, I wonder if the public works will come under the jurisdiction of both provinces and municipalities or only that of the provincial government once the required agreement is signed.

I also consider this to be an effective way of creating jobs in those poor areas which really need assistance to reach the same development level as the other regions in Canada.

However, if it is possible to conclude agreements with Newfoundland and New Brunswick, I would point out to the minister that there are also special zones and designated areas in the province of Quebec and more especially in the Bellechasse constituency. There is especially in Montmagny an urgent problem to solve in connection with the dredging of the basin, in order to enable ships to reach the wharf there. That project would create some employment and give to the people the purchasing power they lack at the present time. I understand that in the carrying out of those works, most of the money would be affected to the purchase of materials of all kinds and that the labourers would receive the smallest share.

It is true that the project would surely help to improve the lot of the people, but there remains a step to be taken. I suppose that to finance these projects it will be necessary under the present system to run again into debt, to increase the burden of the taxpayer who will have even less than before. That is why I am taking the liberty of asking the minister and the government if it would not be advisable for once to use the services of the Bank of Canada to finance these public works and thus relieve the taxpayer. When we give him something with one hand and take it back with the other, little is accomplished. It is nevertheless the practice under the present system. This is why I am offering this suggestion as I believe it would be the ideal opportunity for trying the experiment.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I refer to my question No. 1403. It is very simple and straightforward. I therefore find it very difficult to believe the government is so incompetent that it cannot answer my simple question.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

RAILWAY LCL TRAFFIC, ATLANTIC REGION

Question No. 324—Mr. Coates:

What is the total amount in tons of less-than-carload-lot traffic that has entered the Atlantic Region from the remainder of Canada during the last fiscal year of the railways concerned and what has been the gross revenue to the railways for the transportation of these goods?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: The Company does not maintain records that would readily disclose the volume and revenue associated with less-than-carload-lot traffic moving from one part of the system to another as such information has no managerial significance. To develop the data to answer the question would require considerable expenditure of time and money.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—LIMITATION OF SPEED OF SHIPS

Question No. 1,123—Mr. Godin:

Does the Canadian Government intend to implement the recommendation of a Canada-U.S. committee to the effect that the speed of ships using the St. Lawrence Seaway be limited to 15 mph?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority advises as follows: Yes.

CNR—NUMBER OF PERSONNEL EMPLOYED IN VARIOUS CATEGORIES

Question No. 1,180—Mr. Reid:

For the years 1950, 1960, 1965 and 1968, how many persons were employed in the following categories by CNR (a) non-operators (i) clerical (ii) mechanical trade (iii) others (b) train operating trades (c) management (i) senior management staff (ii) middle management staff (iii) supervising staff?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: That, with the exception of the year 1950 where internal reports have been used, the figures are derived from Part VI (Employees Statistics) of "Railway Transport" published annually by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. Accordingly, management personnel have been grouped as reported to the D.B.S., i.e. managerial and supervisory, professional and technical and other. The latter category includes chief clerks, assistant chief clerks, office supervisors and supervisory and assistant supervisory agents.

SUBSIDY PAID TO FISHERMEN—1960-1969

Question No. 1,346—Mr. Robinson:

What was the total subsidy paid to fishermen during each of the years 1960 to 1969 inclusive?

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): 1960-61, $468,589.30; 1961-62, $347,347.90; 1962-63, $402,497.52; 1963-64, $382,336.10; 1964-65,

*INFORMATION CANADA—USE OF TELEVISION TO ADVERTISE PROPOSALS OF POLITICAL PARTIES

Question No. 1,447—Mr. Beaudoin:

Will Information Canada use the television medium as a vehicle to advertise government policies and, if so, can this agency also make known the opinions and attitudes of opposition parties concerning such policies?

[Translation]

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): It is not intended that Information Canada will advertise on any medium the proposals of any political party. It will be guided by the ethics applicable to any branch of government which must distinguish between governmental and partisan activities. I am sure I can count on the hon. member and other colleagues in the House to bring any lapse of such ethics to my attention, but I will do my best to see that this is not necessary.

ATHABASCA CONSTITUENCY—HOUSING UNITS FOR INDIANS

Question No. 1,453—Mr. Yewchuk:

1. How many Indian housing units have been constructed on reserves and off reserves in the constituency of Athabasca in the past fiscal year?

2. How many houses are being planned for construction during the present fiscal year and on which reserves?

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. During the past fiscal year (1968-69) a total of 37 Indian housing units were constructed in the constituency of Athabasca, 19 units on reserves and 18 off reserves.

2. During the present fiscal year (1969-70) a total of 42 Indian housing units have been constructed in the constituency of Athabasca, 29 units on reserves and 13 off reserves, as follows: On Reserves: Cold Lake, 12; Frog Lake, 4; Kehewin, 3; Goodfish Lake, 6; Beaver Lake, 2; Gregoire Lake, 2; Total 29.

Off Reserves: Fort Chipewyan, 7; Imperial Mills, 6; Total 13.

AIRLINES—NEAR COLLISIONS

Question No. 1,467—Mr. Mazankowski:

How many near-misses were reported between light aircraft and commercial airliners during the years 1967, 1968 and 1969?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The number of near-misses which have been reported to the Minister of Transport are as follows: 1967, 38; 1968, 23; 1969, 19.

REGULATIONS COVERING LIGHT PLANES OPERATING NEAR COMMERCIAL AIRPORTS

Question No. 1,471—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. What regulations cover light planes operating in the vicinity of airports servicing commercial aircraft and what equipment is necessary in such aircraft?

2. Are they considered adequate in light of the many reported near-misses between commercial airliners and light aircraft in Canada and, if not, is the government considering such changes within the near future?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Positive Control Zones have been established at 35 airports across the country and in June, 1970 additional zones will be established at 24 other airports for a total of 59. Aircraft wishing to fly within these zones must have a two-way radio capable of communicating with the ATC units concerned and must receive a clearance to operate within these zones. Ab initio Flight Training has been banned at Vancouver, Winnipeg, Toronto and Montreal International Airports.

2. These are considered adequate at this time; however, in the interests of further improving flight safety, Extended Terminal Control Service was implemented at Toronto International Airport on 1 January, 1968 and will be instituted progressively at other major airports.

AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS—SAFETY AND TRAINING

Question No. 1,472—Mr. Mazankowski:

What safety measures and training have been instituted by the government for air traffic controllers since last year's labour trouble?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Provision has been made for increasing the amount of refresher training for air traffic controllers, as well as continuing our program of accelerated recruiting and training. As indicated in the reply to Question No. 1,471, Positive Control Zones have been established at 35 airports across the country and in June, 1970 additional zones will be established at 24 other airports for a total of 59. Aircraft wishing to fly within these zones must have a two-way radio capable of communicating with the ATC units concerned and must receive a clearance to operate within these zones. Ab initio Flight Training has been banned at Vancouver, Winnipeg, Toronto and Montreal International Airports.

AIR TRAFFIC CONTROL—DEVELOPMENT OF THREE-DIMENSIONAL VIBRATING MIRROR

Question No. 1,473—Mr. Mazankowski:

What steps are being taken for the development of a three-dimensional vibrating mirror to enable air traffic controllers to visualize the actual position of aircraft?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): This is a recent development which will be studied and evaluated to determine its practicability for operational use in Air Traffic Control.

CNR UNION AND NON-UNION EMPLOYEES—SALARIES AND EXPENSE ACCOUNTS

Question No. 1,484—Mr. Godin:

1. How many employees of CNR are union members?

2. What is the total amount of salaries received by these workers?

3. How many employees are non-union members?

4. What is the total amount of salaries received by these employees?

5. What is the total amount of all expense accounts submitted by these employees?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: 1, 2, 3 and 4.

	1969
	Employees	Compensation
Union	60,412	$432,722,573
Non-Union	12,695	$112,736,066

The above statistics cover employees on Canadian lines excluding hotels, steamships, Yarmouth-Bar Harbour ferry service, and Go Commuter Service.

5. It is company policy to reimburse all legitimate out-of-pocket expenses incurred by any employee in connection with the business of the company. The control of these expenses is maintained through the company's budgetary and other internal controls. To extract the information from the records in order to answer the question in the manner asked would require considerable time and expense as the expenses involved are allocated to the specific phase of the business of the company where the expenditure was incurred.

[Mr. Loiselle.]

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR—SURVEY UNDERTAKEN BY CANADIAN FACTS COMPANY LIMITED

Question No. 1,520—Mr. Skoberg:

Will the Minister without Portfolio responsible for Information Canada make available to the House the Public Opinion survey undertaken for the Department of Labour in the fiscal year 1968-69 by Canadian Facts Company Limited?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): While Information Canada will publish reports on any public opinion surveys which it commissions, it has no authority over publication of reports commissioned for internal purpose by other departments.

AUSTIN AIRWAYS PLANE CRASH, TIMMINS, ONT.

Question No. 1,542—Mr. Forrestall:

1. What was the altimeter setting given by the Aeradio Station operators in Timmins, Ontario, to the pilots of the DC-3 aircraft before it crashed on November 10 last, killing its crew of two?

2. Did the Aeradio Station operator at Timmins, Ontario, receive confirmation from the crew of the DC-3 that the altimeter setting information was received?

3. When was the barometric pressure recording instrument that was used by the Aeradio Station operators at Timmins to ascertain the current altimeter setting last checked or calibrated to prove its accuracy?

4. Was the DC-3 aircraft carrying a Radar Altimeter and, if so, was it functioning at the time of the crash?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The accident of the DC-3 aircraft at Timmins, Ontario, is under investigation and it is normal practice not to release any part of the investigation until the complete report is available.

2. See 1 above.

3. See 1 above.

4. See 1 above.

CHURCHILL FALLS CORPORATION PLANE CRASH, WABUSH, NFLD.

Question No. 1,543—Mr. Forrestall:

1. What was the altimeter setting given by ground personnel at Wabush, Newfoundland, to the pilots of the DH-125 jet prior to its crash on November 11 past?

2. When was it relayed to the crew?

3. What party or what authority gave the altimeter setting to the crew?

4. When was the barometric pressure recording instrument that was used by personnel on ground to ascertain the current altimeter setting at Wabush last checked or calibrated to prove its accuracy?

5. Was the jet aircraft concerned carrying a Radar Altimeter and, if so, was it functioning at the time of the crash?

6. What weather reporting information as to ceiling and visibility was relayed to the crew just prior to its crash?

7. What are the qualifications or what experience did the observer have who informed the crew of the jet as to weather conditions that existed at the time the aircraft made its approach?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The accident of the DH-125 at Wabush, Newfoundland, is under investigation and it is normal practice not to release any part of the investigation until the complete report is available.

2, 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7. See 1 above.

STOCKS OF DIET FOOD CONTAINING CYCLAMATE

Question No. 1,594—Mr. Rose:

1. What is the value of current stocks of diet food and drinks held by Canadian food processors due to the "cyclamate" ban in Canada?

2. Is the government considering any form of compensation for processors who have suffered financially as a result of this ban even though they have been observing Food and Drug Regulations at the time the stock was packed?

3. What steps is the government considering taking to protect law-abiding processors in future should some other food additive be declared hazardous?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Not available.

2. No. It is true that the dietetic foods and drinks were in compliance with the Food and Drugs Act and Regulations at the time they were packed. However, the processors were not required to use cyclamates in their dietetic products and did so on their own initiative.

3. The government is always cognizant of the economic impact of decisions such as the removal of cyclamates from food products. However, the government also considers that the health of the Canadian public must take precedence over economic considerations.

PILOT LICENSING

Question No. 1,598—Mr. Nesbitt:

1. How many commercial pilot licences, valid for a period of ninety days, have been issued to non-immigrant aliens during each year, 1965, 1966, 1967, 1968 and 1969?

2. How many qualified Canadian commercial pilots have been unemployed during each of the above-mentioned years?

3. Is it the intention of the government to continue licensing non-immigrant aliens as long as there are qualified Canadian pilots available?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. None. However, the Department has in the past and under exceptional circumstances when considered to be in the Canadian public interest and qualified Canadian Pilots are not available, validated a foreign licence for a specific purpose such as bud-worm spraying, Dew Line operation, etc. In some cases, the period of validation may have been 90 days.

2. Employment records are not maintained by the Department of Transport.

3. It is not our intention to issue commercial pilot licences to non-immigrant aliens for a period of ninety days or to validate a foreign licence when qualified Canadian pilots are available.

TRAFFIC SAFETY—REAR VISION

Question No. 1,624—Mr. Mather:

Is consideration being given to regulating the "fast-back" type of automobile rear window design with a view to improving traffic safety through better rear vision?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Two aspects of the rear vision problem are being considered. Initially, improvements may be effected by regulating the size and location of the rear window in order to make better use of existing mirror technique. In the longer term more comprehensive analysis of rear vision requirements may result in a fundamentally different rear vision system, such as one employing the principles of the periscope.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PUBLIC SERVICE—DEPARTMENTAL LAY-OFFS OF PERSONNEL

Question No. 31—Mr. Howard (Skeena):

1. What departments will be laying off personnel as a result of the guidelines announced by the Prime Minister in August?

2. For each department and Crown corporation, what is the planned reduction by category of employee?

3. What steps is the government taking to aid those people affected by the new policy?

Return tabled.

POLYMER CORPORATION—SALARY INCREASES

Question No. 350—Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West):

1. What was the date of the last general salary and wage increase granted to all major separate categories of Polymer Corporation employees prior to April 1, 1963, its effective date, and what was the percentage increase?

2. From April 1, 1963 to date, what have been the dates (both of publication and coming into force) of any general salary and wage increase for all major separate categories of Polymer Corporation employees and what was the average percentage increase for each such increase?

3. What cumulative average percentage increase does the salary and wage level of Polymer Corporation employees as at present date reflect when compared to the relative salary and wage level of April 1, 1963?

Return tabled.

ESTABLISHMENT OF MERCHANT MARINE

Question No. 425—Mr. Fortin:

1. What is the statutes of studies undertaken by Hedlin Menzies and Associates Ltd. with respect to the establishment of a merchant marine?

2. What are the terms of reference of the firm?

3. On what date were these terms of reference made known to the firm?

4. What fees have been paid to the firm?

5. Will the Company's report be tabled in the House of Commons and, if not, for what reason?

Return tabled.

FERTILIZER SUPPLIED TO INDIA

Question No. 990—Mr. Schumacher:

1. During the fiscal year 1968-69, and/or during the period from the beginning of the 1969-70 fiscal year to date, has any fertilizer been given, by way of an outright gift, and/or by way of a sales subsidy by the Canadian Government to India and, if so (a) how much was given (b) what was the dollar value (c) what company supplied such fertilizer?

2. Were competitive bids called for the supply of such fertilizer?

3. What companies submitted bids and what were the amounts in each case?

Return tabled.

NUMBER OF SHIPS IN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT FLEET

Question No. 1,192—Mr. Robinson:

1. How many ships does the federal government have in its fleet and what is the role of each?

2. Does the federal government have a policy of replacement of ships and, if so, what is the policy?

[Mr. Howard (Skeena).]

3. Does the federal government contemplate any increase in the number of ships for (a) navy (b) coast guard (c) transportation (d) ice-breaking (e) dockyard service (f) other?

Return tabled.

AGRICULTURAL RESEARCH EXPENDITURES

Question No. 1,432—Mr. Orlikow:

1. How much money was spent for agricultural research by the Government of Canada in each of the past three years in (a) Department of Agriculture facilities (b) the National Research Council (c) University Faculties of Agriculture?

2. How much money is it proposed to spend in the coming year for agricultural research through each of the above three categories?

Return tabled.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE—RESEARCH STUDIES

Question No. 1,536—Mr. Robinson:

1. What research studies have been carried out by, or on behalf of, the Department of National Revenue during each year 1960 to 1969 inclusive?

2. What research studies are now being carried on and/or are contemplated during the next five years?

3. What was the cost of each of the research studies completed in each year 1960-1969 inclusive?

4. What is the estimated cost of each of the studies now in being or contemplated during the next five years?

Return tabled.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, notice of motion (papers) No. 409 is acceptable to the government.

[English]

LIST OF CHLOR-ALKALI PLANTS USING MERCURY

Motion No. 409—Mr. Harding:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the list of all chlor-alkali plants which use mercury, as stated by the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry and reported in Hansard of March 25, 1970 at page 5463.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

Mr. Forest: Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call notices of motions Nos. 26, 27, 327 and 393.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining notices of motions be allowed to stand.

[English]

URBAN RENEWAL—FREEZE ON PLANS

Motion No. 26—Mr. Gilbert:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all correspondence between the Government of Canada and provincial and municipal government regarding a freeze on all urban renewal plans.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the Hon. Robert Andras, Minister without Portfolio responsible for housing, that notice of motion for the production of papers No. 26 is acceptable, subject to the authorization of the government authority concerned and with the proviso that the correspondence cover the period from August 14 to October 23, 1969.

Mr. Speaker: Is the motion carried subject to the reservations and conditions expressed by the Parliamentary Secretary?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

URBAN RENEWAL—FREEZE ON PROJECTS

Motion No. 27—Mr. Gilbert:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all correspondence between the Government of Canada and provincial and municipal governments regarding the federal government's decision to put an immediate freeze on all urban renewal projects in Canada assisted by the federal government.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the hon. Robert Andras, Minister without Portfolio responsible for housing, I wish to inform the hon. member that a freeze was not placed on all urban renewal projects assisted by the federal government. I therefore ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Gilbert: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

MEDICAL AID IN VIET NAM—REPORT BY DR. A. VENNEMA

Motion No. 327—Mrs. MacInnis:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the Interim Report made in March, 1968, by Dr. A. Vennema, Director of Canadian Medical Aid in Vietnam in 1967-68 and for copies of any subsequent correspondence between him and the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I move this motion on behalf of the hon. member.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Reports to the Canadian International Development Agency by experts serving abroad under Canadian aid programs are treated as confidential. Making such reports public would breach this confidence and inhibit CIDA experts from expressing their views frankly in future. Therefore I hope the hon. member will agree with this argument and agree to drop the motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

BATH-MILLHAVEN PRISON PROJECT

Motion No. 393—Mr. Alkenbrack:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the report made by an independent expert building inspector to the Minister of Public Works on the Bath-Millhaven Prison project at Kingston, Ontario.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): No such report exists, Mr. Speaker, and in view of this perhaps the hon. member might wish to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Alkenbrack: I am very surprised at this information from the minister and I request that the motion be transferred for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might take this opportunity to rise in respect of notice of motion No. 375 in which the Secretary of State for External Affairs would be interested. It relates to a draft agreement on reciprocal fishing rights between Canada and the United States. Because of the imminence of the territorial seas and fishing zones bill to which this draft agreement would have application, possibly the minister could comment, if he has knowledge of the present situation, on whether or not the agreement might be made public.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Sharp: It is the intention of the government of Canada to sign this agreement with the United States later this week and I intend to table the agreement itself, and not the draft agreement, after it has been signed.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister—

An hon. Member: The question period has not started yet.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, have we reached the oral question period?

Mr. Speaker: Almost.

[English]

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, my notice of motion for the production of papers No. 32 has been on the Order Paper since October 23. I believe the House is entitled to know the functions and responsibilities of the department. This is the least we should be able to know. I would like to know when I can expect this motion to be dealt with.

Mr. Forest: As soon as possible, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining notices of motions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

FINANCE

USE OF TAX INCENTIVES TO ENCOURAGE INCREASE IN PRODUCTIVITY

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. As the Prime Minister advised the House yesterday that the rate of increase of productivity must equal the rate of increase of prices and incomes before the government can consider that inflation has been licked, and as the rate of increase of productivity has been steadily declining for the past four years, is the government planning to introduce in the very near future tax incentives to encourage producers to increase their productivity to a satisfactory level so that the government may once again start expanding the economy and providing the jobs our people so badly need?

[Mr. Howard (Skeena).]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): First of all I would like to say that the economy has been expanding greatly and, as my hon. friend knows, tax policy will be introduced to the House in the usual manner.

Mr. Hees: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As that is precisely the same answer that the minister and his predecessor have been giving me for four years, during which time inflation has been steadily increasing and productivity decreasing—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should not make a speech; he should ask a supplementary question.

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Speaker; I was merely trying to assist the minister with the facts. In view of these things, would the minister advise the House whether he suffers severely from headaches these days from keeping his head in the sand so much of the time?

Mr. Benson: I have no headache.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: Do you get dizzy spells, Ben? This upside down treatment upsets you.

An hon. Member: Back to your cage, gentlemen.

INCENTIVES TO SMALL BUSINESSES— PUBLICATION OF STUDY

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): If the hon. gentlemen will discontinue their dialogue I will ask my question which is directed to the Minister of Finance. Can the minister say, with regard to the question just raised and in view of the high unemployment situation, when small businesses in Canada can receive some encouragement and when the study of the department now under way on small business incentives to offset the effects of the white paper will be completed and whether it will be made public?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): First of all, small businesses in Canada do receive a great deal of assistance, as was pointed out in the white paper, through the industrial development program, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Small Businesses Loans Act, and so on. However, the white paper proposals are not law yet. The study which I have asked my department to carry out will be completed in due course and I will provide the information to the parliamentary committee examining the white paper.

Mr. Lundrigan: There was a little encouragement in the last part of the minister's remarks. Does he intend to make the contents of the study public in view of the fact that the original intention was that it would be only for cabinet consideration? In view of the fact that this matter is of interest to the whole nation and quite obviously needs public reaction, would the minister undertake now to make the contents of this study public?

Mr. Benson: The study is being carried out within my department, and I suspect that before the white paper is completely considered by the committee I will be appearing before the committee and will certainly make known to its members the results of the study.

TAXATION

SUGGESTED WITHDRAWAL OF WHITE PAPER ON REFORM

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a question. In view of the fact that the white paper on tax reform is discouraging investment and development, thus causing unemployment, and in view of the fact that the Prime Minister said he would give consideration to withdrawing it, has the Minister of Finance given that kind of consideration to the white paper on taxation?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): I do not think the Prime Minister said he would give consideration to withdrawing it, and it is not discouraging investment in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Benson: As a matter of fact, one of the problems to be faced is the inflow of foreign exchange.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I should like to draw to the attention of the House—

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I rise—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member can rise in a moment but I would like to have an opportunity to complete my sentence. I was going to suggest that we are going over ground which has been covered on numerous occasions. If the hon. member has a supplementary question, perhaps he might present it in such terms as to make it possible for the Chair to accept it.

Mr. Woolliams: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: If the Minister of Finance will check Hansard he will find that the Prime Minister said he would give consideration to withdrawing the white paper on taxation. It is in Hansard.

Mr. Trudeau: Where?

Mr. Benson: At what page?

Mr. Woolliams: I will read it to you in a few moments.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I suggest to the hon. member for Calgary North that whether the right hon. Prime Minister did make this statement or not, this cannot be raised as a question of privilege. Whether a statement was made or not made by an hon. member cannot be discussed by way of a question of privilege.

SOCIAL SECURITY

TABLING OF WHITE PAPER IN PRESENT FORM —INTERIM INCREASE IN OLD AGE PENSIONS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question either to the Prime Minister or to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of reported disagreements in the cabinet over certain proposals in the government's white paper on social security, will the government consider doing two things? First, will it table the white paper in its present form so that the public will know what is being considered? Second, will it bring in an interim increase in old age security pensions so that our senior citizens will not have to wait any longer for an increase they sorely need?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The premise of the question being false, Mr. Speaker, I do not feel I have to answer it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Then may I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare to answer the question regardless of the premise. Will the government consider tabling now the white paper on social security so that the country can know what is in it, and will it consider bringing in an interim increase in old age security pensions?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it would be impossible to table the white paper at this time. It is not completed, nor has consideration been given to it in its entirety by the government. So far as the latter part of the question is concerned, I do not believe it would be possible to bring in an interim increase in old age security pensions prior to the publication of the white paper.

[Later:]

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the recent pension plan increases for Members of Parliament, which I voted against, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nystrom: —will the government now move immediately to increase pensions for our senior citizens?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will recognize that the terms of the question make is procedurally unacceptable.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE INCREASES

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the same minister. Would he inform the House, with respect to the order to trim some $500 million from the welfare proposals in his white paper, what was the extent of the recommended increases for war veterans allowances and whether these increases will be affected?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that that question be directed to my colleague, the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Marshall: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, we have understood for the past few months that war veterans allowances now come under social security legislation.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

IMPROVEMENT OF RELATIONS WITH CARIBBEAN COUNTRIES—SUBSTITUTION OF AGRICULTURAL DEVELOPMENT FUND FOR SUGAR AGREEMENT

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the increasing resentment against, if not actual hostility to, Canada apparently developing in the Caribbean countries, what action, if any, has the government taken to improve this situation? In particular, has Canada entered into discussions with the Commonwealth Caribbean countries for a new sugar agreement with them?

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as to the first part of the question, the troubles that are taking place in Trinidad are not related specifically to Canada. There is no evidence of this whatsoever. As to the second part of the question, we are having officials come from the islands to Canada to discuss the sugar question.

Mr. Harkness: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has Canada actually abrogated the agreement that it made in 1966 for an 85 cent tariff rebate on West Indian sugar and, if so, is that going to be reinstituted?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I issued a statement on April 17, to which I would draw the hon. member's attention but which I would hesitate to read now. What we have done is to terminate this temporary arrangement that was made and to substitute therefor a much larger fund to be used for agricultural development in the Caribbean.

Mr. Harkness: Is the minister not aware that the Caribbean countries concerned are not at all satisfied with the $5 million, which is to be provided really for external aid purposes, in lieu of the sugar agreement and other trade concessions?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the objections that the Commonwealth countries in the Caribbean have taken to the termination of the 29 cent per one hundred pounds rebate. It has been our judgment that what we are offering is more valuable in light of the needs for development in that area, but of course these are matters of differences between governments. I can understand the Caribbean governments disliking the termination because this money went directly to the governments, whereas the other money will go for development projects.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Was the decision taken unilaterally to terminate the sugar agreement, or was there consultation with the governments concerned?

Mr. Sharp: It had always been understood that these payments were temporary. There was no agreement to continue them indefinitely. They were related in part to the successful negotiation of an international sugar agreement, which took place, and it was in light of these circumstances, and what we felt were the needs of the Caribbean countries for extra funds for agricultural development, that we made this decision.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, this is most informative, but could the minister answer my question? Was the decision taken after consultation or was it taken unilaterally?

Mr. Sharp: It was unilaterally.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the minister's desire to help the Caribbean countries, I would like to ask him if he would not reconsider his policy and give them some voice in determining what is good for themselves?

Mr. Sharp: All the projects that would be coming forward for assistance in agricultural developments would be sponsored by the governments themselves. We do not make decisions unilaterally as to what is good for other countries.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the great discontent which Canada's action has created in the Caribbean countries, does the government not consider that perhaps the Caribbean countries are in a position to know what they would like from Canada rather than our telling them what they would like?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's supplementary question is a repetition of one asked previously.

DAIRYING—SUGGESTED AMENDMENT OF POLICY

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Since the industrial milk producers are protesting strongly and demonstrations have been and will be organized, and also since newspapers have reported that he had received telegrams from the President of the Catholic Farmers' Union on this subject, would the Prime Minister be in a position to tell the House whether he will recommend to the cabinet to amend the dairy policy announced on March 23 last, in order to make it more advantageous for industrial milk producers?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I did not hear the beginning of the question, but perhaps I might answer it by saying that through my recent exchange of correspondence with the Premier of Quebec, I have had the opportunity to show him that the payments made by the federal government to milk producers total more than $100 million a year, about half of that amount going to the province of Quebec.

INFORMATION

DISTRIBUTION OF FILM CLIPS OF MINISTERS' STATEMENTS TO TELEVISION STATIONS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of Information Canada. Would he be good enough to advise the House whether the government or Information Canada is now sending out sound film clips of statements about to be made by ministers to various television stations across the country, and are these films delivered by Brinks trucks, with the strict embargo that they must not be used until the statements are made? Is this a part or parcel of the economy drive? If this is taking place it must cost a lot of money.

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, if there were any such statements I am sure their value would warrant their being carried by Brinks trucks—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanbury: —but Information Canada has no plans, no activities in that field.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, Mr. Speaker, I am glad to hear the minister express the modest view that any view of any minister of this government should be carried around by Brinks trucks.

Mr. Nesbitt: Garbage trucks would be better.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask the minister specifically whether such a clip in connection with certain evidence that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was to give yesterday before the Natural Resources Committee was considered so valuable, so intrinsically worth while, and as containing information desirable enough to be protected, that it was sent to various television stations across the country in the manner which I have indicated, and does he still feel it was so worth while that it needed the protection of a Brinks truck?

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, as the right hon. gentleman no doubt knows from statements I and the Prime Minister have made, Information Canada is not a centralized information department and has no authority over information services coming under other departments.

Mr. Woolliams: It is nothing but a propaganda agency.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REPORTED SALMONELLA CONTAMINATION OF LIPTON SOUP MIX

Mr. Ray Perrault (Burnaby-Seymour): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of today's report from Washington D.C. that 14 million packages of Lipton soup mix are to be recalled by food and drug authorities of that country because of suspected salmonella contamination, is similar action contemplated in Canada?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker. There is no relation between Lipton products in the United States and Canada. Those products are not imported into this country. The Food and Drugs Directorate is looking into the matter as far as Canada is concerned and assures me there is no danger.

DRUGS

INCREASE IN USE OF ADDICTIVE DRUGS IN UNITED STATES—CANADIAN SITUATION

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of reports of an alarming increase in the use of heroin and other addictive drugs in the United States, particularly in New York, is there evidence of a spillover of this problem to a similar degree in Canada? If so, what plans have been initiated to deal with the situation?

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think the government will want to make a full statement on the whole question of drugs when we receive the report from the LeDain Commission.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REVISION OF AGREEMENT WITH PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. What action is he taking to revise the agreement signed by the federal government and the government of Prince Edward Island some time ago in order to bring the federal government's share of the capital cost of roads and so forth somewhere near the percentage that has been agreed to in the agreements announced today with the provinces of New Brunswick and Newfoundland?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I do not think any cost was mentioned in the statement that was made this afternoon.

Mr. MacLean: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I do not have a copy of the minister's statement in front of me but I understood him to say that the federal government would pay a fairly high percentage of the total cost, 100 per cent in some cases, under the agreements mentioned. I ask the government whether it will consider making a more generous agreement with the province of Prince Edward Island? Will it modify the present agreement so that all the Atlantic provinces will be treated similarly?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, the agreements are to be printed very shortly. At that time I think the hon. member will be able to make comparisons and at that stage I will be in a position to answer.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wish to ask the minister a very simple question in order to clarify a matter of great concern. Is federal assistance for the enormous petrochemical plant on the east coast of Canada part of the assistance under the $32 million announced earlier today?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Is the hon. member referring to the eastern part of Newfoundland?

An hon. Member: Come-By-Chance.

Mr. Lundrigan: Yes.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): No, it is not.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INCREASE IN AUTOMOBILE INSURANCE RATES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In January, on February 9 and on March 23 I drew the minister's attention to the fact that the insurance companies had announced increased rates for automobile insurance. These rates have now come into effect as of April 1 and the increases vary all the way from 10 per cent to 35 per cent, depending on category. Has the minister made any representations to the insurance companies asking them to defer the implementation of these increases? Has he received a favourable reply? Also, what action does he propose to take with respect to these very substantial increases in auto insurance rates?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my previous answer on this question stands. The matter is being studied by the various departments which have an interest in it and particularly by my department and the insurance branch of the Department of Finance.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. That is not the information I sought in my question. I asked the minister if he had made any representations to the automobile insurance companies since this matter was raised last January. What was the nature of their replies and what action has he proposed to take in the light of those replies?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could answer that question. First of all, we made representations with regard to the proposed increases in insurance rates. Not only did we do this but I had the Superintendent of Insurance examine the positions of individual companies to determine whether or not the increases were justified on a loss-ratio basis. I have that report; I believe it is in my office somewhere and I would be pleased to look it up and answer the hon. gentleman's question in more detail on a subsequent day. I believe, as I recall the report, that the Superintendent of Insurance examined some cases and the increases were justified on the basis of expenditures that were incurred.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I take it from the minister's statement that his department has examined the books of the insurance companies and that the government is now satisfied that these increases were warranted. If so, is the minister prepared to supply that data? Would he also tell the House whether or not the Prices and Incomes Commission was aware of that study?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, as I recall, the Prices and Incomes Commission was not involved. It was done by the Superintendent of Insurance who examines the books of insurance companies on a continuous basis. I should like to look at the report before giving a definitive answer.

INCREASE IN COST OF FISHING LICENCES BY MANITOBA GOVERNMENT

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the wide concern over the increases in rates and prices, can the minister say what action the federal government may intend to take against the government of the province of Manitoba which has just recently imposed a very drastic 33⅓ per cent increase in the cost of provincial fishing licences?

An hon. Member: Shame!

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that surely is a matter within the purview of the legislature of Ontario—of Manitoba.

An hon. Member: The minister is really confused.

Mr. Basford: The Prices and Incomes Commission and the federal government have urged the provincial governments to limit their increases in user fees and other charges, and generally the commission has received co-operation from the government of the province of Manitoba.

NATIONAL REVENUE

REPORTED CHANGE IN FORT ERIE EMPLOYEES WORK SCHEDULES CONTRARY TO AGREEMENT

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, last week the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) asked me to inquire about changes in work schedules which might affect the Fort Erie crossing employees.

Inquiries of the Ministry

[English]

I have investigated, Mr. Speaker, and I was assured that work schedules posted at the port of Fort Erie have not been changed to have days of rest coincide with the May holiday.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

AVAILABILITY OF LITHIUM CARBONATE FOR TREATMENT OF MENTAL DISEASES

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the approval of lithium carbonate by the United States Food and Drug Directorate for the treatment of mental diseases, and especially for the treatment of people suffering from the acute manic phase of manic depressive psychosis, and as there are some 10,000 mental patients in this country who qualify for the use of this drug, may I ask the minister when it will be released for use in Canada?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I must advise the hon. member that this drug is available to some investigators for experimental purposes. The director is looking into the matter and has been encouraging manufacturers to file a new drug submission for the particular drug, but none has done so yet.

SHIPPING

SINKING OF "PATRICK MORRIS"

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is he in a position today to give any further information to the House regarding the sinking of the Patrick Morris?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, two formal inquiries are under way, one by the Department of Transport and one by Canadian National. The report I have is purely interim, based on interviews with crew members last night as they arrived back in Sydney. It appears that the Patrick Morris slowed to pick up the body of one of the unfortunate victims of the fishing vessel accident and at that exact moment an enormous sea stove in the back doors of the ferry vessel. The seas at the time were running between 50 and 60 feet, according to these estimates. This appears to have been the cause. I have to emphasize to the House and the hon. member that this is only a verbatim report from crew members. A formal inquiry will be completed as quickly as possible.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I thank the minister for the information. From what he has said, it would appear that the doors were not opened by the captain or by any of his crew?

Mr. Jamieson: That is correct. The preliminary investigation and report indicate that the doors were not opened. It was simply the weight or power of these enormous seas that smashed them.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Can the minister indicate whether the inquiry will reveal whether the construction of the ship was adequate? The explanation by the minister does not sound too reassuring.

Mr. Jamieson: One of the matters which the inquiry will examine will be precisely that.

NATIONAL PARKS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF NEW PARK IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, which I hope he will welcome. Can we now take it as assured that there will be an addition to the national parks system of Canada on the Pacific Coast?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I was in Victoria yesterday and I had the pleasure to sign the final agreement for the development of a national park on the west coast of Vancouver island. All the details have been settled during the conversations I had with the Minister of Tourism, Mr. Kiernan.

[English]

Mr. Barnett: On a question of privilege, might I be allowed to offer my congratulations and also to—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member can only ask questions at this point.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SUGGESTED SALARY INCREASE FOR FEDERALLY APPOINTED JUDGES

Mr. H. E. Stafford (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. I am sure the minister is aware that, by reason of the recent increases announced by the Minister of Justice for Ontario, some provincial court judges are making within $500 of the amount the federal government is paying the provincial Supreme Court justices and up to $4,500 more than the federal government is paying County Court judges. Is the minister giving consideration to an increase in salary for the federally appointed judges?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I am aware of the arithmetic, Mr. Speaker.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

PROPOSED ALBERTA EDUCATIONAL CENTRE

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Labour but I see that unfortunately he has temporarily left the chamber. I will direct my question to him tomorrow. With Your Honour's permission, I will now direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Has the government as yet made a decision on the proposed Indian education centre in Alberta? I am sure the minister, in addition to most hon. members, has seen the model of this most imaginative project to help the Indian people to help themselves.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we have not reached any conclusion at the moment since this proposal has been made to several departments at the same time. We are now co-ordinating the views of the various groups involved and we shall advise the Alberta Indian Association of our decision when it has been made.

[English]

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

USE OF DRIFT STATIONS IN ARCTIC RESEARCH

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I wish to answer a question asked by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre a few days ago about research in the Arctic.

The nearest parallel in Canada to the use of drift stations is the polar continental shelf project. This long-term project was initiated by the Canadian government in 1958 to carry out a detailed scientific investigation of that part of the Arctic Ocean adjacent to the Canadian Arctic Archipelago. By using bases on the islands and seasonal stations on the ocean, scientific work is being carried out over the continental shelf and beyond, into the polar basin, without the need for year-round drift stations. Last summer some 150 scientists and support staff, mainly involved in geophysical investigation, were working from these bases. This does not include research programs within the Arctic Archipelago or in the northern parts of the mainland of Canada.

TRANSPORT

REMOVAL OF "ARROW" HULK—RESPONSIBILITY FOR COST

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): My question is for the Minister of Transport. Has the government or the Department of Transport decided what is to be done with the derelict portion of the Arrow? Also, who is to assume the cost of removing the remaining hulk?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): The second part of the question, Mr. Speaker, is simple to answer. Any costs involved in removal would be for the account of the ship owner. As to whether it should be moved, a decision is now being made to determine whether it is better to move it or leave it where it is in view of the relative hazard in both sets of circumstances.

EFFECT OF REDUCTION IN CLERICAL SERVICES BY CPR

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Has the minister's attention been drawn to a decision of the CPR to reduce expenditures for clerical services by 10 per cent? If so, will the minister discuss with the CPR the effect of this policy on the services provided by the company, on the communities affected and on the large number of employees who will be dismissed?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have not been officially advised by the CPR of any such move. I have received indirect information to that effect. Of course, the CPR is not in effect obliged to tell me anything, but I will be glad to talk to them about the effects which the hon. member has outlined.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRANSFER OF TRENT CANAL SYSTEM TO DEPARTMENT OF INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): My question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of statements made by the minister recently concerning the transfer of the Trent Canal system to his department from the Department of Transport, will the minister tell the House the total area involved in the transfer, and whether the lakes that feed the system will come under the jurisdiction of the national parks service?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that the type of information he is seeking should normally be obtained by way of a question on the Order Paper.

POLLUTION

COMPENSATION TO LAKE WINNIPEG FISHERMEN FOR MERCURY CONTAMINATION OF FISH

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. It is in connection with the Red River which is an international river. Because of mercury poisoning, Lake Winnipeg has been placed under fishing taboo. Will the government compensate the fishermen who normally fish the Red River and Lake Winnipeg to the same extent as fishermen in other areas are being compensated? I ask this question because of the doubt that is being expressed in Winnipeg and the area surrounding Winnipeg.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I have to agree that what is good for the fishermen of Lake St. Clair should be good for the fishermen of western Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I agree that it "should be good", but will the minister be as definite as he usually is and say whether the farmers—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: —the fishermen—most of them are farmers too—along the Red River and on Lake Winnipeg will receive the same compensation? I ask the minister to be more definite and not merely say that what is good for one is good for the other, what is good for the goose is good for the gander. I want to know whether these payments are going to be made.

[Mr. Jamieson.]

Mr. Davis: I will be discussing this method of compensation with the Hon. Mr. Green of the Manitoba government on Monday, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You don't know yet. Is it not going to be done?

INDIAN AFFAIRS

AVAILABILITY OF COQUALEETZA HOSPITAL LAUNDRY FACILITIES TO INDIANS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the minister in a position to make an announcement regarding the laundry facilities at Coqualeetza Hospital near Chilliwack being made available to the native Indian people in that area?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not. I know that this matter is being looked into, but there has been no final decision made with respect to it.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): A supplementary question. Has the minister received a telegram from Wilbur Campbell on behalf of the North American Indian Brotherhood complaining that the response from the minister in this regard was to the effect that it would take many months to work out an agreement with the native Indian people on this matter?

Mr. Munro: To my knowledge I have not received such a telegram. Any negotiations we have had with Mr. Campbell have been with respect to a feasibility study that my department funded him to carry out. I understand that no decision will be made until the feasibility study is received. It is expected it will not be received until the end of May.

SOCIAL SECURITY

METHOD OF PREPARATION OF WHITE PAPER—TABLING

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to questions asked earlier regarding the white paper on social security. Could the Prime Minister tell the House which department of government is preparing this white paper and how soon the government expects it will be tabled?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is a multi-departmental project, but it is essentially under the direction of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

[Later:]

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. With respect, the Prime Minister answered the first part of my question, but I also asked to be informed when the government expects to be able to table the white paper.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member may have a supplementary but he will be recognized in a moment.

[Later:]

Mr. McKinley: A further supplementary question. The Prime Minister does not appear to want to answer my second question. I ask him whether he can inform the House why the preparation of the white paper was taken out of the hands of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

POLLUTION

OIL—ACTION RESPECTING SITUATION IN TORONTO HARBOUR

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Would the minister advise the House whether or not members from Toronto have been after him about the oil spill in Toronto harbour?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Danson: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member opposite suggested that the members from Toronto were negligent in their duty.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danson: I would suggest that matters that are regarded as national disasters in other areas are looked after by the city council in Toronto.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD

RESIGNATION OF CHAIRMAN—NEW APPOINTMENT

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the resignation of Mr. Howard Mann, who I am sure everyone agrees performed valuable service as chairman of the National Harbours Board, can the minister say whether a new appointment will be made, and when?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the assessment made by the hon. member of Mr. Howard Mann. Incidentally, if the House so desires I will be pleased to table the letter of resignation and the reply.

With regard to the second part of the question, I am examining the possibilities, within the framework of the revision of ports policy, as to whether or not we should restore the National Harbours Board to full complement now or perhaps wait until such time as the new arrangement is put into effect.

HARBOURS

MONTREAL—MEASURES TO DEAL WITH REDUCTION IN ACTIVITY

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

Considering that there has been quite a heavy decline in traffic at the port of Montreal, I would like to ask the Minister of Transport whether he is considering taking strong action in the near future in order to remedy this situation which is disastrous for the city of Montreal—if he feels concerned by that situation—or whether he intends to do nothing about it as in the case of unemployment in Quebec?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

Mr. Valade: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Sainte-Marie on a point of order.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, my point of order. The first part of my question is acceptable, even though the second part is not and the minister—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Inquiries of the Ministry

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—ROLLING BACK OF TINPLATE PRICE INCREASES

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. On April 13 I asked him a question with regard to rolling back the price of tinplate to comply with some of the criticism made by the Prices and Incomes Commission. At that time the minister indicated that the department was looking at the question and that he would be able to report to the House in a day or so on what action he intends to take. I wonder whether the minister is able to give a report today.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. The Prices and Incomes Commission found that the price increases were within their guidelines but disapproved of the price increase made by one company. The matter is still being considered with regard to whether any action should be taken, but I would point out that the commission recommended that no action be taken in this particular case.

Mr. Saltsman: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is no time for supplementary questions. The hon. member for Edmonton Centre.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

EFFECT OF RESULT OF QUEBEC ELECTION

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Thank you for your recognition, Mr. Speaker. I wish to direct my question to the Prime Minister. In view of the upcoming result of the election in Quebec, what steps has the Prime Minister taken to deal with the separation of the province of Quebec?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Paproski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will recognize that I allowed him to ask the original question, even though the time had expired, because I could not help but notice he had risen on a number of occasions during the question period, so I thought he should be given an opportunity to ask his question. I doubt whether it would be in order to grant him a supplementary when one has just been refused the hon. member for Waterloo. Perhaps his supplementary might be asked tomorrow, and I will see whether the hon. member can ask it earlier. Orders of the day.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I did not do so earlier because I did not want to interrupt the question period which I knew was coming to a close. My question of privilege relates to two replies that were given by the Minister of National Health and Welfare concerning the feasibility study by either Mr. Campbell or by people in the North American Indian Brotherhood of B.C. with respect to the Coqualeetza hospital.

According to a copy of a telegram that the office of my leader, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands received yesterday, we are advised that Mr. Campbell sent the minister a telegram on April 20 in which he said:

> We received your telegram informing us that it would take you months to enter into an interim agreement with us regarding the use of the Coqualeetza laundry facilities. Your telegram reached us more than three weeks after we supplied you with a feasibility study concerning the Coqualeetza laundry.

I took the reply of the minister to be that he had not received any such feasibility study; yet the telegram stated it was sent three weeks ago. The minister also replied that he had no knowledge of any such telegram; yet the indication is that it was sent two days ago, and as I say a copy was received by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands yesterday.

Mr. Speaker: Order. A dispute as to an answer given by a minister is substantially a dispute over the facts of the situation. Such a matter cannot be raised as a question of privilege. Tomorrow the hon. member might ask the question again during the question period, and perhaps this will give the minister the opportunity to reply to the hon. member. Orders of the day.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

TERRITORIAL SEA AND FISHING ZONES ACT

PROVISION OF TWELVE-MILE TERRITORIAL SEA, ELIMINATION OF CONTIGUOUS FISHING ZONES

The House resumed from Friday, April 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Sharp that Bill C-203, to amend the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak on Bill C-203 to amend the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act. This legislation represents another milestone in a process which has been going on for many years in an effort to secure exclusive rights for Canadians over the widest possible area of water adjacent to our shores. I have studied this bill and I am in agreement with the intent of this legislation. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), in his opening remarks, stated that the proposed amendment to the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act contains two major changes.

The first change would establish the territorial sea of Canada at 12 miles in substitution for the present limit of three miles and, as a result, would eliminate the present nine-mile fishing zone which would become incorporated within the 12-mile territorial sea. The second change would authorize the government by Order in Council to create exclusive Canadian fishing zones comprising areas of the sea adjacent to the coast of Canada. The intent of this legislation is something I have advocated and supported for a considerable time. The minister and I may differ on the proper procedure to be followed, but we share similar views on the objective to be gained. As a matter of fact, the 12-mile limit legislation has been a hot political issue as far back as 1957 when I first entered Parliament.

At that time we recognized the need to take proper concrete action to conserve our fisheries resources, and Canada's position was put forward forcefully and clearly at the United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea at Geneva in 1958 when we attempted to get agreement on a three-mile territorial sea and a nine-mile contiguous zone. When this effort met with some objections we put forth our proposals at the second conference on the Law of the Sea held in Geneva in the spring of 1960 in which we called for a six-mile territorial sea and a six-mile contiguous zone. Unfortunately, when this formula was put to a vote it failed to receive the required support by only a fraction of one vote. This conference on the law of the sea was the last one held in the past 10 years. In this period our actual fisheries resources have further declined and the problems associated with our fishing industry in Atlantic Canada have multiplied.

I listened with considerable interest to the statement made on Friday, April 17, by the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he introduced this legislation to Parliament. If one reads the words at the beginning of his speech, especially where he deals with the two international conferences to which I referred and also the discussions this government has held with the United States and other countries concerning base lines and conservation methods, one somehow gets the impression that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is confused, tired and frustrated; that he has thrown up his hands in despair.

Mr. Sharp: It is the opposition which causes the despair.

Mr. Crouse: The minister says it is the opposition that is causing the despair. I submit it may be the nature of his problems which burden him down. Let us look at his words as recorded at page 6013 of Hansard of April 17:

> Subsequently, when as a result of our extensive and protracted canvassing efforts we and our British friends found that we had the support of over 40 countries for such a proposal—

I presume that here he is referring to the "six and six" proposal.

> —provided the U.S.A. and other major powers would agree, we approached the U.S.A. again with this evidence. Unfortunately, we were told, after waiting a further period of many months for the U.S.A. reply, that the U.S.A. did not consider it timely or appropriate to join with us in our efforts. Mr. Speaker, I hope it will not be taken as a sign of anti-Americanism but merely as an affirmative sign of Canadianism for me to say that we really are not prepared, in light of these developments, to accept the proposition that it is always desirable to proceed multilaterally instead of unilaterally.

What nonsense is this! The minister is implying there is no longer any value in international meetings and discussions, but this implied situation is not in accordance with the facts. For example, the meetings held at Geneva were far from being failures. The five conventions approved at the end of the 1958 conference contain 113 articles which in their scope and importance offer conclusive testimony to the measure of success which was then attained. Established law was defined and codified. New laws were written. Rules affecting such subjects as the continental shelf, the conservation of the food resources in the oceans of the world, the measurement of coastal base lines and a wide variety of other new as well as old legal questions were settled. In the opinion of those attending the conference it was an outstanding demonstration of conciliation, of mutual goodwill and the progressive development of international law which in itself is the very spirit of the United Nations.

As a matter of fact, there were only two questions remaining to be settled after the 1958 conference and these two questions were still not settled following the 1960 conference. These questions dealt with, first, the breadth of the territorial sea and, second, the size or area of the fishing zone. I agree that these are thorny problems, but if international agreement could be reached on these matters, a better international climate would be created in which the solution of our fisheries problems and many other outstanding problems could be resolved very much easier than now appears possible.

I believe that if we are to solve our problems as nations we must co-operate one with the other in the hope of reaching mutual understanding and agreement on the course to be followed for the betterment of all mankind.

Mr. Sharp: Hear, hear.

Mr. Crouse: Unilateral action or damn-the-torpedoes-full-speed-ahead action may be all right in wartime, but there is still a lesson to be learned by comparing the fruits of consultation with the effects of independent action.

Obviously, in other fields, consultation with the parties concerned is still considered the desirable course to be followed. Here, I refer to the negotiations going on in another but nevertheless related field at Geneva where the 25 nation disarmament committee has been working for eight years on a treaty to ban the installation of nuclear weapons on the world's ocean floors. The final draft of a treaty has been approved by the United States negotiators and it is now under examination by the Soviet Union where approval is anticipated. The new document will join the 1963 treaty banning atmospheric testing of nuclear devices, the 1967 treaty banning nuclear weapons in outer space, and the 1968 nuclear non-proliferation treaty on the list of achievement since the disarmament committee began its work in March of 1962. Surely, if we can agree internationally not to blow the people off the face of the earth with nuclear weapons we should be able to agree internationally on the proper methods of conserving our fisheries resources in order to provide food for the people of the world.

I cannot help but wonder what is happening between our Department of External Affairs and the state department in Washington. On the surface there would appear to be little or no consultation on matters of importance between our two countries. Consultation seems limited to the sending of notes back and forth, similar to the one published in Hansard by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) on Friday, April 17.

Mr. Sharp: What about the meetings in Ottawa and Washington?

Mr. Crouse: The minister made his speech. I did not interrupt him at that time but listened attentively to him. I hope he will give me an opportunity now to put my views on the record with regard to international negotiations which should have been undertaken, but which obviously were not.

In our opinion, the Department of External Affairs is falling down on the job. The finger points to the minister in charge of this department who obviously lacks the ability to cope with our international problems. I say this because we now know that only five days ago, five days before the state department rejected Canada's proposed extension of jurisdiction beyond the three-mile territorial sea to prevent pollution, President Nixon signed a bill giving the United States jurisdiction beyond its three-mile limit for pollution control. Two other bills are now before the U.S. senate which would give the United States government jurisdiction beyond three miles for anti-pollution purposes. The U.S. federal water pollution control act of 1970 authorizes U.S. officials to board ships as far as 12 miles off the coast to enforce anti-pollution regulations to be formed under the bill, and to make arrests. Shipowners and operators are liable for damages up to $14 million if they pollute the sea within 12 miles offshore.

Further, the act sets anti-pollution jurisdiction far beyond the 12-mile limit over offshore drilling operations on the seabed. I claim that nothing would indicate more clearly the complete breakdown of negotiations between our two countries than the fact that at no time in his speech did the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicate that similar legislation for pollution control was being set up by the United States. I submit that he did not say this because he did not know anything about it.

Mr. Sharp: It is quite different.

Mr. Crouse: In view of all the discussions of our territorial sea, I believe it is desirable to review the actions of the Liberal government on this matter since it came into office in 1963. In 1964 the Parliament of Canada passed the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act. The purpose of the act was twofold. First, the act established the fishing zones of Canada at 12 miles from the coastline. Second, the act applied the straight baseline system to the Canadian coastline. The adoption of this method by Canada for delimiting its territorial waters was of great significance. Indeed, the fixing of a baseline is important because it determines how far seaward a coastal state may exercise jurisdiction within a certain breadth of territorial waters beyond the baseline. It also affects the extent of contiguous zones for purposes of customs, fiscal, immigration and sanitary regulations. Now that Bill C-202 has been introduced to the House, the control of water pollution should be added to the list. The baseline of territorial waters has become significant also for the implementation of the contiguous fishing zones.

The 1964 act comprised six sections. One is very general and provides that the act applies to any federal legislation. One establishes the territorial sea at three miles from the baseline. One establishes the fishing zone at nine miles from the outer limits of the territorial sea, that is 12 miles from the baseline. One vests the Governor in Council with the power to make regulations for the drawing of the straight baselines, and one requires the minister of mines and technical surveys to establish charts showing the territorial sea limits and the fishing zones of Canada.

This act was promulgated on July 23, 1964, and it is interesting to read some of the remarks of the then secretary of state for external affairs, the Hon. Paul Martin, as reported at page 5208 of Hansard of July 8, 1964 when he spoke on this legislation. This is what he had to say, among other things, and I am not going to quote all his speech:

> In the committee I indicated that it was the intention of the government, when this bill was passed by parliament, to establish without delay the fishing zones of Canada, and I indicated that this might be done by bringing into effect those portions of the bill relating to fishing, while deferring until a later date proclamation of the rest of the bill. After this testimony my colleagues and I considered the matter further, and subsequently the Minister of Fisheries stated on my behalf in the committee that the government did not expect any undue or substantial delay in bringing the entire bill into force. Therefore the situation is that there will be no delay in proclaiming the bill in its entirety after it has passed through the house and received royal assent.
> I should like to take this opportunity to emphasize one or two points which my colleague and I mentioned in the standing committee. When the bill is proclaimed the immediate effect will be that the fishing zones of Canada will be established from existing base lines. These base lines will follow mainly the sinuosities of our coast line, pending the drawing of straight base lines by the governor in council under clause 5 of the bill.
>
> Those countries with which we are not having negotiations will therefore be immediately excluded from the fishing zones—

Listen to the wording.

> —and their vessels will be subject to penalties under the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act if they operate in those areas. This will be of great importance to Canada in view of the rapid development by certain countries of large, modern fishing fleets capable of operating very far from their home ports.

• (4:00 p.m.)

It is unfortunate that the government did not follow through with its intentions as stated by the minister on that date instead of waffling, procrastinating and dilly-dallying to the extent that we now see our fisheries resources seriously depleted. Many of the fisheries problems faced by our fishermen on the east coast of Canada today are directly related to the indecision and inaction of the federal Liberal government in implementing the terms of this legislation as it was passed by this House in 1964. I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that the eight nations to which the minister refers in his speech of 1964, which are to be excluded from our fishing zones, are still fishing, as I stand here today, in the same waters as they were fishing then. If I am in error let any minister in the House stand up and dispute that statement. I emphasize that the eight fishing nations referred to in that speech in 1964 are still fishing in the same waters today as they fished at that time. Is it any wonder that our fishermen are crying out, "Oh Lord, how long do we have to wait for some action by this government"?

Even under this new legislation, Mr. Speaker, we were informed in committee yesterday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that the Canadian government is powerless to restrict in any way the fishing operations of the French fleet, due to their historic and treaty rights on our coasts. We will still have this anomaly where Canadian deep-sea fishermen can only conduct their operations 12 miles off our coasts while the trawlers of France can fish up to our shoreline in many areas, especially in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Under these conditions, how can we adopt any meaningful conservation practices to protect our fisheries resources?

Under the 1964 legislation the implementation of the Act depended essentially on the regulations to be made by the Governor in Council, as he had to provide for the geographical co-ordinates of points from which baselines would be determined. In November 1967, more than three years after the Act was promulgated, the Governor in Council adopted regulations providing for the geographical co-ordinates of points to be applied along the Labrador Coast in the southwest and east of Newfoundland, but skipping entirely the area of Newfoundland adjacent to St. Pierre and Miquelon.

In May, 1969, five years after the Act was promulgated, regulations were adopted to provide for geographical co-ordinates of points for southeast and south of Nova Scotia, for southwest Vancouver Island and the west coast of the Queen Charlotte Islands. But to this day, Mr. Speaker, regulations providing for the information on which the baseline should be drawn have not been adopted for all the Canadian sea coasts. Is it any wonder that our fishermen are concerned about this matter?

It is worthy of note that there is no provision so far providing for the baseline of the north coast of Canada, and here I mean our Arctic coast. The same situation applies to the maps to be established by the minister of mines and technical surveys. At present there is no map showing the Canadian territorial sea on the north coast of Canada, which is the nub of the problem to which I referred when speaking on Bill C-202.

On April 8, 1970, a bill was introduced in this House, Bill C-203, which we are now discussing, which amends the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act of 1964. The purpose of this amendment is to extend the territorial sea from three to 12 miles from the baseline. The method of establishing the baseline remains unchanged, but a principle of international law is stated. New section (5) in the bill provides for the use of low water lines of low tide elevations as baselines for measuring the breadth of the territorial sea. Another important purpose of the amendment is the elimination of the contiguous fishing zones as they were provided by the 1964 act. Under the amending bill the Governor in Council is vested with the authority to prescribe as fishing zones of Canada any areas of the sea adjacent to the coasts of Canada.

In my opinion, the Territorial Sea Act, and the bill seeking to amend it, pose a number of problems. I hold the view that each state must decide how and when it will effect the delimitation of its territorial waters, but I believe this delimitation should be made in accordance with international law. To be precise, the act of delimitation is governed by domestic law, but its international validity is governed by international law. This fact was fully recognized in the case of the Fisheries Act, and the relevant passage of the judgment, (1) 1951, International Court of Justice, page 116 reads:

> The delimitation of the sea areas has always an international aspect; it cannot be dependent merely upon the will of the coastal state as expressed in its municipal law. Although it is true that the act of delimitation is necessarily a unilateral act, because only the coastal state is competent to undertake it, the validity of the delimitation with regard to other states depends upon international law.

Therefore, it follows that any unilateral legislation may be met by unilateral protestation which, according to international law, will have the effect of rendering such legislation inoperative. In addition, the legal situation may well be aggravated by repressive economic measures in many fields other than fisheries, but which also have a marked effect upon our economy.

I also contend that the position of the Canadian government on this matter is inconsistent. In the explanatory notes included with the bill opposite page 2, we are told that the baselines for measuring the breadth of the territorial sea will be measured in keeping with state practice and international law as reflected in the Geneva Convention on the Territorial Sea and Contiguous Zone.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has also recently stated in this House, on April 8, 1970, as recorded at page 5623 of Hansard:

> Canada strongly supports the rule of law in international affairs.

A similar statement was made in this House by the right hon. Prime Minister in 1969 when he declared on May 15 of that year, as recorded at page 8720 of Hansard:

> The law of the sea is a complex subject which, as can be understood, may give rise to differences of opinion. Such difference, of course, would have to be settled not on an arbitrary basis but with due regard for established principles of international law.

What are the established principles of international law? As far as I can determine, the main sources of legal principles are the 1958 Geneva Law of the Sea Convention, and the fisheries case decided in 1951 by the International Court of Justice, to which I referred a moment ago. But so far Canada has not ratified the above convention, and only last week the government denied the authority of the International Court over the protection of the environment and the conservation of the living resources of the sea. To justify that position the government declared:

> Canada is not prepared however to engage in litigation with other states concerning vital issues where the law is either inadequate or non-existent and thus does not provide a firm basis for judicial decision.

In the same statement, the Prime Minister continued:

> There is an urgent need for the development of international law establishing that coastal states are entitled, on the basis of fundamental principle of self-defence, to protect their marine environment and the living resources of the sea adjacent to their coasts.

But, Mr. Speaker, who participates in the elaboration of the international law if not the International Court of Justice? The position taken by Canada could lead to the assumption that Canada is anxious to see the development of international law in the matter of pollution but that she does not trust the World Court and prefers to legislate unilaterally. I contend that the action of the government will not establish a rule of international law but only a national statute.

Strangely enough these are not my views alone. On this particular issue my views are strongly endorsed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, as reported in an exclusive article in the Globe and Mail of Thursday, September 18, 1969, which I have here, and which allegedly was written by Mitchell Sharp. The entire article is factual. I will not read all of it but here are the minister's views on the interplay of systems, and they buttress my views entirely. There can be no argument between the two of us after I read this article. This is what he wrote:

• (4:10 p.m.)

> Domestic law and international law are interrelated and interdependent. The domestic laws of Canada and other states can influence international law. On the other hand, it cannot be said that domestic action can be taken in isolation of international law. The interplay and interpenetration of the two systems of law is most apparent perhaps in the field of the law of the sea. Action taken internally must therefore be either compatible with the current state of international law or, at least, be defensible in a court of law.

Those are the words of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I continue:

> Otherwise, there is no chance of a domestic position being recognized by the international community.
>
> Any action by any state touching on its jurisdiction or sovereignty has implications for other states. Assertion of one's sovereignty by domestic legislation or otherwise is not of itself sufficient to gain its acceptance by other states. If it were, there would, of course, be international anarchy.

The minister was even stronger in his statements than I have been. He continued:

> Even the most powerful states must take into account the need for international acquiescence.

Mr. Sharp: That is what we hope we will have.

Mr. Crouse: The minister says, "That is what we hope we will have." In one place he makes one statement, and in another, another statement. Yet, according to his words of September 18, 1969, he endorses my viewpoint unequivocally.

It is our contention that it is almost impossible to implement this legislation fully. The delimitation of territorial waters requires the prior establishment of a proper baseline, but the fixing of that baseline is not an easy task. This is evident from the fact that although Canada applied for the first time the straight baseline principle in 1964, all the geographic co-ordinates have not as yet been defined. The problem is more complicated than it first appears when one reads the Canadian Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act. The Act gives the Governor in Council power to make regulations for the establishment of straight baselines but it does not state that the regulations should conform to international law principles. In this respect the present amendment may be considered as an improvement, although it only mentions the use of the low water line and low tide elevations. Moreover, it should be noted that the necessity for Canada respecting the principles of the Geneva convention on the territorial seas is only included in the explanatory note of the bill.

International law has established several rules to be followed in the drawing of straight baselines, and it makes a distinction between rules applying to coastal archipelagoes and outlying archipelagoes. Therefore, the first problem to be determined is whether the Arctic islands form a coastal archipelago or an outlying archipelago. Professor Donat Pharand, author of "The Waters of the Canadian Arctic Islands" appearing in the spring 1969 edition of the Ottawa Law Review at page 414, says between pages 418 and 420 that the Canadian Arctic archipelago under review presents considerable difficulty in categorization. Legally, however, the question arises as to whether these islands may be considered as constituting a single unit justifying a uniform regime for the various bodies of water between them. This is a question which Canada should resolve before proceeding with a delimitation of its territorial waters in the Arctic.

In my opinion, this section of the legislation which deals with our Arctic region is premature owing to the many areas of uncertainty in the region. When Dean Maxwell Cohen appeared before the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development in 1969, he enumerated these problems. He stressed how difficult it would be to establish sovereignty over an island system. He also mentioned the problem raised by the ice pack in the Beaufort Sea. For some, the ice pack is only frozen water; others, however, consider that it should be compared to land. He questioned also in what system the Beaufort Sea, where there is no Canadian island, should be included.

It seems to me, in view of these problems, that the first step taken by this government should have been directed towards establishing Canadian sovereignty in our Arctic region, not only over the islands in that region, but also over the waters separating those islands. We must never forget that we are neighbours of the two most powerful states in the world, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the United States of America. We are the three principal nations sharing the Arctic basin. In view of the resources in the American north, the resources in the Canadian north and the unknown resources in the Russian north, I believe it would be opportune for Canada to consider sponsoring a major conference on the common problems of the Arctic, a conference which could also be shared in by Denmark and any other countries concerned about the benefits that would ensue from this type of conference. Such conference would certainly not do any harm to our legal position in this area and it may well be of immeasurable value to us and to mankind generally.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I believe this act delegates too much authority to the government. It seems almost needless to repeat that under our modern form of government Parliament is increasingly delegating its powers to the executive. Although this action is justified for many reasons, this delegation of authority should not result in a complete abdication of power by Parliament.

In the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act, Parliament has given the Governor in Council full authority to define the geographical co-ordinates necessary for the drawing of baselines. While this is a technical operation, the establishment of territorial water limits previously mentioned raised many problems with which Parliament did not attempt to deal in the Act itself. It could be argued that Parliament has purely and simply left it to the government to deal with such serious questions as those mentioned in paragraph 4 of this bill.

This legislation is a step, a very small step forward for mankind—to paraphrase another man—in his efforts to control and improve his environment. It can only be regretted that unanimity was not secured among other nations so that we could achieve our objectives and thereby have a better opportunity of preserving our fisheries resources.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, this bill, and the one which just passed second reading by the unanimous vote of this House, are rightly regarded I think as being two very important measures and, in many ways, complementary measures. Just to emphasize the fact that the party to which I belong is giving its support to both these measures, may I briefly refer to what the leader of our party had to say on Bill C-202 when it was introduced. I quote from page

5943 of Hansard for April 16. The hon. member said in part:

> ...it is quite apparent that Bills C-202 and C-203 complement each other. Therefore, I think they must be considered together when the basic principles underlying this legislation are under discussion. I want to begin by congratulating this government on introducing this legislation. Any reservations we may have about some aspects of this question should not detract from our wholehearted endorsation of the legislation contained in these two bills.

Although these two bills have been introduced by different ministers, and although following second reading they will go before different committees of this House, I hope we will not lose sight of the fact they are interrelated. Indeed, if I may just interpolate here, I hope that those in charge of arrangements for committee meetings will see to it that the committee meetings relating to these two bills will be scheduled in such a way that interested members from either of the committees involved will be able to attend the committee consideration of both bills. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the questioning that will be involved, and the evidence to be given by some expert witnesses, will be of such a nature that this will be a most desirable procedural arrangement for us to follow.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), when speaking to the second reading of this bill, mentioned four specific reasons the government had in mind in introducing the legislation. A little later on in his remarks the minister added what I consider to be a fifth, and in some respect perhaps the most important, consideration involved in this bill.

• (4:20 p.m.)

I do not intend to enter into any extensive discussion of it, but it should be noted the minister did make reference to the impact of the proposal to extend our territorial waters to a 12-mile limit upon the Northwest Passage across the northern part of Canada. I wish to refer at the outset to what the minister said. I quote from page 6015 of Hansard:

> Since the 12-mile territorial sea is well established in international law—

I find that a very interesting assertion by the minister. I hope at the committee stage additional information will be put on the record to support that statement. Certainly, it is one with which I will not quarrel.

> —the effect of this bill on the Northwest Passage is that under sensible view of the law Barrow Strait, as well as the Prince of Wales Strait, are subject to complete Canadian sovereignty. Whether or not those who disagree with us wish to allege that other waters are not Canadian, they cannot realistically argue any longer concerning these two bodies of water.

That statement raises many interesting questions to be explored at the committee stage. If I understand it correctly, territorial waters are not really under the complete sovereignty of a nation. The minister should give some further explanation of what he had in mind when he said that this bill, and the territorial law of the sea, would give Canada complete sovereignty over these two particular passages. He should relate that statement to some of the assertions made in the debate on Bill C-202 concerning Arctic pollution control and the general Canadian position of sovereignty in the Arctic. I am intrigued by the remarks the minister made prior to the portion of his speech I have quoted.

If I understand him correctly, the declaration or assumption of a partial sovereignty by a state has been construed in international law not to lessen its claims to a wider extension of sovereignty. This has been upheld in a judgment of the international court. This matter was dealt with briefly the other morning when the minister appeared before the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry. Because of the imminence of today's debate, some questions in this general area were raised. I hope in the committee stage this whole area will be further explained and amplified. One or two of my colleagues may have something further to say about this whole question from the standpoint of international law before this particular stage of the debate is concluded. I welcome the information from the minister that the impact of this bill will strengthen Canada's control over any actual attempts at navigation through the Northwest Passage. We in this party fully agree with the intention of the government in this regard.

Another important question raised in the minister's speech is the impact of this bill on the matter of pollution control. The minister indicated it will provide adequate control over pollution on our east and west coasts. In that sense, it is a companion approach, although not identical, to the measure for pollution control in the Arctic. I feel that any real understanding of some of the aspects of the minister's assertion that this bill will protect the full range of Canada's vital interest in our coasts and provide the comprehensive jurisdictional base which Canada requires to enforce anti-pollution controls outside the Arctic waters will occur only after we see the legislation that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) intends to introduce in the form of amendments to the Canada Shipping Act.

I am sure the Secretary of State for External Affairs will not quarrel with my suggestion that the kind of control we are prepared to exercise over shipping and the discharge of oil into our coastal waters, either directly or as a result of an accident, is a very vital matter. Some aspects of this important question lie within the general area that is covered by the Canada Shipping Act and come under the purview of the Minister of Transport.

I recall when the House considered an amendment to the Canada Shipping Act in 1956. At that time Canada ratified the international convention for the prevention of the pollution of the seas by oil. Additional legislation, as set out in part VII(a) of the Canada Shipping Act, was enacted for this purpose, as well as providing that the regulations required for the control of shipping in respect to the discharge of oil would also apply within Canada's own waters, both internal and territorial. It was felt that this amendment to the Canada Shipping Act, and the terms of the 1954 international convention for the prevention of pollution of the sea by oil, which was considered by the former railways, canals and telegraph lines committee, made significant progress in solving the matter of pollution of our waters by oil.

The passage of time has made it very evident that the proposals of the international convention and the domestic legislation adopted by Canada at that time were certainly no longer adequate in providing protection from oil pollution. For quite some time further action has been required, both in the international field by way of new treaty arrangements and in changes to our approach to domestic legislation. It was in my mind at that time that we should consider more closely this question of the pollution of the sea by oil. I pointed out that the coast of North America was not set out in the annex to the treaty, which provides what are referred to as prohibited areas in which the dumping of oil is forbidden. It was suggested to me that the density of traffic and the incidence of the discharge of oil into the sea around this continent were not sufficient to cause any special concern. I mention all this to illustrate the extent to which knowledge of the danger resulting from discharging oil into the sea has advanced since 1956 when this proposal was being considered by the House of Commons.

I am not at all convinced that the bill as it stands will provide comprehensive protection, despite the minister's assertion. Its success will depend a good deal on the kind of legislation which the Minister of Transport will be placing before us. I hope this legislation will at least be introduced and read the first time before we proceed very far in the committee with our study of the bill now before us, so that we may be familiar with the terms of both these measures. Nor am I convinced that protection is adequate because of the government's intentions with regard to the declaration of fishing zones. The proposed amendment to the Fisheries Act, which is also to some extent a companion piece of legislation, will provide authority for some control over the extent to which waste matter goes into the water within our fishing zones. These fishing zones are considered to be coastal waters. In my view the present bill is not adequate to control pollution in terms of what could be done under the proposed amended Fisheries Act. However, it will enable the government to exercise more jurisdiction over an area extending a further nine miles seaward, enable us to control more effectively navigation close to our shores, and will allow us to exercise more stringent controls over what may be put into those waters by sources other than vessels. So, the minister is quite correct in saying that these proposals will make possible some measure of control over the pollution of our coastal waters on the Atlantic and the Pacific.

I do not intend to try to analyse what further effects the bill may have, other than in relation to increased control over navigation, ship movements and so on. I do not know whether the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux) intends to enter the debate at any point. One inference from the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs is that these proposals will make for increased national security. I would interpret this as meaning the defence of Canada, though it seems to me that in this day and age, with the kind of hardware modern nations possess, this aspect must be a relatively minor one. Perhaps when the minister closes the debate he will have some comments to make on the importance of this element in relation to the full range of Canada's vital interests, to use the hon. gentleman's phrase. Possibly other hon. members who are more knowledgeable than I am on these matters will be commenting on this subject before the second reading stage is completed.

The aspect of this measure with which I find myself most directly concerned is its impact on the future of our fishing industry, aside from, of course, the whole question of the quality of our waters. I might recall that the bill establishing the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act was considered so closely related to fisheries matters that it was studied after second reading by the fisheries committee rather than by the external affairs committee. It is therefore important to analyse the effect of the measure from the point of view of its effect on our fisheries and our fishing resources, as did the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse). I feel that the change from a three-mile limit to a 12-mile limit will really have little practical effect as far as an impact on our fisheries is concerned. When the act we are now amending was first presented to the House, my hon. friend from Skeena and I argued diligently that then was the time we should proclaim our 12-mile territorial sea. We felt this would give us control over those waters for all purposes and that we could then have begun to think of our fishing zones measured from straight baselines. This would have given us a complete area subject to our regulation, an area including some of our most important fishing grounds. Unfortunately, as the hon. member for South Shore mentioned, one of the most important aspects of that bill originally, the establishment of fishing zones, never, in fact, came into effect because our baseline system left wide open certain important parts of what many of us feel should properly be regarded as internal Canadian waters—I refer, for example, to the Gulf of St. Lawrence and to the waters between Queen Charlotte Islands and the mainland of Canada.

I realize that the present bill is not designed to declare such waters to be internal waters, though I wish it had been. It will, however, close in part, at least, the gap which was left because the baselines contemplated in the original act were never drawn.

Before leaving this question of the territorial sea and its width, let me say I was interested to find in my files a draft of a suggested committee report—it was not presented to the House because it was not approved by the whole committee. It was drafted by my hon. friend from Skeena and myself in June, 1964 when Bill S-12 was before us for consideration. We suggested that the committee recommend as follows: first, that the principle of a 12-mile territorial sea measured from straight baselines between given points be affirmed by the Parliament of Canada; and second, that the bill should be divided into two parts, the first of which would deal with the territorial sea and a separate bill would deal with the question of baselines, co-ordinates, and their effect upon our fishing areas.

It is rather interesting to look back to a document of this kind, which one helped to draft as long ago as that, and to realize that over that period of time these matters have moved to the point where the government itself is now prepared to put forward as being well established international law—to use the words of the Secretary of State for External Affairs—the proposals that the hon. member for Skeena and I were urging upon the government in 1964. I suppose one can take the pace of the events in this connection as an indicator that some of the suggestions that we advance at this time may in another 6, 8 or 10 years be put forward as proposals by the government of Canada, though I hope sooner than that.

The Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act was brought forward in 1964, but I think it was not until June 1969 that action was finally taken on the matter of proclaiming straight baselines. We moved away from the territorial sea and fishing zones concept of following the traditional sinuosities of the coastline.

One of the suggestions that I want to put forward at this time, suggestions that I would be very happy to have the Secretary of State for External Affairs take up because I believe the law would provide for this if the bill as drafted were passed, is that this proposed bill be used not merely for the purpose of closing certain gaps in our existing baseline system in order to encompass certain areas like the Gulf of St. Lawrence and areas on the west coast as fishing waters, but that it also be used to establish our fishing zones on a basis which would be much more realistic as far as providing some real protection to our fisheries and fisheries management is concerned.

The proposed amendment in clause 2 of the bill suggests that the fishing zones of Canada comprise such areas of the sea adjacent to the coast of Canada as may be prescribed by the Governor in Council. I remember the battle we had to try to convince the House that the baseline co-ordinates should be established by Parliament rather than by regulations passed by the Governor in Council; but I am prepared to suggest that the terms of this legislation would be appropriate if the government were prepared to act upon it to the fullest extent that the meaning of the words make possible.

What I am suggesting is that, while we are in effect abolishing our fishing zones as they currently exist, the present government should, since it intends to cover areas like the Gulf of St. Lawrence, Hecate Strait, Queen Charlotte Sound and Dixon Entrance—something which I feel should have been done in 1964—go a step further and consider this proposed amendment to mean that the areas of the sea adjacent to the coasts of Canada for fishing zone purposes be defined as the areas of our adjacent waters extending to the edge of the continental shelf. I touched upon this matter the other morning when the Secretary of State for External Affairs appeared before the fisheries committee and asked for some clarification of the meaning of this bill on that particular point. The minister indicated a restricted approach, that is to say, merely the closing of these areas that I have contended should be inland waters within the fishing zone boundaries.

May I make the plea to him at this time that he give further consideration to what I think he himself is prepared to admit would be a desirable step as far as the realistic management of our fisheries is concerned. Indeed, the Minister of Fisheries has given indication from time to time that he recognizes the necessity for this sort of action. This need for action has certainly become apparent to the commercial fishermen on the west coast of British Columbia as a result of the incursions made by large foreign fishing fleets with their mother ships, supply vessels and so on. If one looks at what other fishing nations have been doing, and if one takes the view that the minister has expressed with regard to the 12-mile limit being well established by international law, then it seems to me that we are well on the way toward being able to uphold internationally the validity of the concept that international law provides for control of fishing areas adjacent to coasts, namely the areas lying above and within the outer boundary of the continental shelf.

This is one of the principal regrets that the members of this party have about the proposed application of this legislation. Indeed, it is one of the reservations that was in the mind of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) when he spoke on behalf of this party during the introductory stage of Bill C-202 and expressed the view, which I have put on the record, that in many respects these are companion pieces of legislation. I hope that before the bill passes and after we have explored the whole question in committee of how important it is to take steps at this time to protect the resources of our seas above the continental shelf, we will be given some declaration by the government of their intention to adopt the principle of fishing zones extending to the outer extremity of the continental shelf. I would be interested to hear the views and comments of the Minister of Fisheries on this aspect of the matter.

He has referred publicly on more than one occasion to the idea of extending our management, particularly over our groundfish stocks, in some such manner as this. As he knows, one of the members of this House who represents a Vancouver Island constituency has put forward a proposal of this nature in a bill. I feel there is growing concern that this Parliament should take this kind of action in order to protect the resources of our Canadian fishermen. It is all very well for the minister to talk about the management of these resources, but I do not think we can take any steps towards the proper management of these resources unless we are prepared to say they lie within our fishing zones. By that I am not necessarily saying we would not continue to recognize existing rights that fishermen from foreign nations may have in some of these areas. We do not take this stand with any desire of altering what may be going on in respect of negotiations for withdrawal of other nations from the Atlantic coast areas that are to be enclosed within the original concept of the fishing zones, but rather to assert our desire that the resources of the seas be properly managed and conserved for the benefit of this and future generations of the human race.

Since up till now we have not been able to get full international understanding in these matters, we feel it is vital that we indicate our desire to accept the responsibility of ensuring that these resources are allowed to survive and thrive, and that they should be harvested only in a manner that is in accordance with proper conservation, primarily for the benefit of our fishermen in Canada, while not refusing to recognize that the fisheries of the world are important to all nations of the world. We are prepared to co-operate with other nations in ensuring that those who need these resources must have proper access to them either through purchase or engaging in fishing activities in some of the areas that might be within the limits we could claim through adopting this principle.

I should like to conclude by saying I am glad to know the government has moved as far as it has in these two bills we have before us. I hope that the unanimous vote given to Bill C-202 would be repeated in respect of this one if one were to be called. Unless there is some indication to the contrary, it would hardly be necessary for us to call another formal, recorded unanimous vote on this bill as we did on the other one. We could perhaps take the two of them as being read together to ensure that Canada's interest in the general safety of the world is, in our view, enhanced by the kind of legislation that has been put before us by the government.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words today about Bill C-203. This legislation will amend Canada's Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act. It will push our territorial sea out from three miles to 12 miles. It will also enable the government to draw a number of important fisheries closing lines.

The extension of our territorial sea by an additional nine miles is important in so far as Canada's fishing interest is concerned, but more important particularly to our commercial fishermen and to Canadians generally is the completion of our fishing zones. As a result of this all important legislation, we will be able to complete a fisheries map of Canada. We will be able to draw fisheries closing lines across the mouth of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, across the Bay of Fundy and across Queen Charlotte Sound on the west coast.

Those of you who followed my announcement last year about the drawing of baselines on both our coasts will recall that we drew a series of straight baselines from headland to headland. We published maps of Canada's existing sea within these lines to down along the east coast of Nova Scotia, for example, and down the west coast of Vancouver Island. They enclosed literally hundreds of bays and inlets. They declared those bays and inlets not only to be exclusive fishing zones of Canada but also, because of the nature of our legislation of 1964, Canadian territory as well.

Now, we are introducing another concept. It is the concept of fisheries closing lines. These closing lines will finally enclose large additional bodies of water such as the Bay of Fundy, the Gulf of St. Lawrence and Queen Charlotte Sound on the west coast.

The idea of fisheries closing lines is a new one. It is new to our fisheries in Canada and it is new to the international fishery. It is a new idea which we Canadians have invented to suit our own fisheries situation, yet I know it is also one which, like the 12-mile fishing limit which Canada pioneered in the 1950's, will recommend itself to other countries, particularly to other fishing countries of the world.

I would draw hon. members attention more specifically to subsection (1) of Section 4 of our present Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act. This is to be repealed and the following substituted in its place:

> —the fishing zones of Canada comprise such areas of the sea adjacent to the coast of Canada as may be prescribed by the Governor in Council.

In other words, the cabinet can approve and by Order in Council set certain co-ordinates on the map of Canada and then draw fisheries lines between these co-ordinates, thereby describing as exclusively Canadian, or for the exclusive Canadian management, large bodies of water in this country. Where we have already drawn straight baselines we will continue to claim an additional 12 miles as being part of our fishing waters in Canada. But there are still important gaps. These gaps on the east coast, such as the gap across Cabot Strait and the Strait of Belle Isle, can be closed by fisheries closing lines.

There is an important distinction here between baselines, as the terms used in the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act of 1964, and the additional or supplementary concept of fisheries closing lines. Baselines in our legislation apply to two things; they apply to territorial sea as well as to the fishing zones of Canada. The fisheries closing line concept, on the other hand, applies exclusively to fishing. It does not necessarily apply to territory. It applies to the protection of the living resources in the fishing waters of Canada. It does not apply to transportation, it does not apply to shipping as such, it does not apply to aircraft flying over the zone in question and it does not apply indeed to submarines passing under the surface of the water.

Perhaps I should put it another way. We are putting the finishing touches with this fisheries closing line concept to the fishing map of Canada. Under this legislation we will be able to close all the remaining gaps around our shores. We will be able to manage all of those fishing waters and all of those resources within our fishing zones, both from the point of view of conservation and from the point of view of protecting our living resources in the water from pollution.

I mentioned last week when we were introducing the amendments to the Fisheries Act that we would be putting more teeth in that legislation with regard to pollution. That legislation extends to the limits of our Canadian fishing zones. These fisheries closing lines will provide one further way in which we can properly define these fishing zones of Canada. In other words, they also define the limits of our jurisdiction in respect of the anti-pollution provisions of the Fisheries Act.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has stated in the House of Commons that Canada strongly supports the rule of law in international affairs and that Canada is prepared to participate actively in multilateral efforts to develop agreed rules on environmental and fisheries matters. He has also said that Canada is not prepared to engage in litigation with regard to vital issues where existing law is either inadequate or non-existent. We are not prepared, in other words, to argue our case in a court of law when there is no firm basis for a judicial decision.

The Canadian government has, therefore, submitted a reservation to Canada's acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice. This reservation relates to those areas of the law of the sea which are undeveloped or inadequate. One of these areas, as hon. members know, relates to the bill we passed unanimously this afternoon dealing with the prevention of pollution in our Arctic seas. The other has to do with the present Bill C-203 which will establish the right of the government by Order in Council to proclaim fisheries closing lines. In other words, we have declared we will not go to the International Court of Justice in relation to both these matters and specifically in the case of this bill in respect of the new concept of fisheries closing lines.

Hon. members who have an intimate knowledge of Canada's fishery will realize that the mere drawing of lines will not in itself stop foreign fishermen from fishing off our shores. Some countries have long standing treaties with Canada in respect of fishing outside and inside our fishing waters. A larger number traditionally have fished in these areas and have used traditional methods of fishing for particular species in what we regard as the fishing zones of Canada. These practices will have to be phased out. We do not intend unilaterally or overnight, so to speak, to rule these countries out of our fishing zones.

We will have to enter into negotiations with these countries and arrange for the phasing out of those privileges within what will now be clearly defined in maps published in the first instance in the Canada Gazette, as our fishing zones. We have already had talks with the countries. These talks commenced in 1964 right after the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act was first passed. These talks were not finalized because at that time we were unable to specifically define what we regard as the geography, if I may use that term, of our own fishing zones. Until we were in a position to table maps and be specific about the co-ordinates involved we were not in a position to conclude any agreements or understandings with other countries. Now, with the completion of the fisheries map of Canada, hopefully this summer we will be in a position to complete this phasing-out process.

There are several treaties. We have a treaty with the United States in respect of fishing in Canadian waters and reciprocal rights of Canadians to fish in United States fishing waters. We also have a long-standing treaty with France. I understand it dates back to 1713 when the Treaty of Utrecht was signed between Great Britain and France. This was modified to some extent by a further convention in 1904 between Great Britain and France. It had relation to Newfoundland, which at that time was a colony of the United Kingdom. This treaty of 1904 is referred to as the French treaty or as the treaty relating to the French shore, essentially the western coast of Newfoundland. Under that treaty, which still obtains at the present time, the fishing vessels of France can come and go as they please and when they please. They can fish right up to our shores. They are not bound by our Canadian fisheries legislation. Our own fishermen must observe this legislation and large Canadian trawlers in the main must stay 12 miles off-shore.

Because we as Canadians are prevented from doing certain things which fishermen from France can do under this treaty, this is a source of irritation. We will have to re-examine this treaty after this legislation is passed with a view to creating a set of circumstances which are tolerable from our Canadian fishing industry's point of view, and which I would think would be better from a public relations point of view so far as France is concerned. Later this week reference may be made again to the treaty we have with the United States. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) said a few minutes ago in the House that we will be signing a reciprocal fishing agreement with Washington. We have arrangements with the United States which essentially are reciprocal. Our fishermen in most cases enjoy the same rights in their waters as we provide to United States fishermen in our waters. These reciprocal arrangements with amendments have gone on year after year.

Essentially, we are out-fishing the United States fishermen. We certainly are doing so on the east coast. It is to our advantage to have this reciprocal agreement and make it as broad as possible. They can enter our exclusive fishing zones and we can enter theirs. On the west coast this reciprocal agreement is of particular interest to Canada because a large percentage, more than half, of our west coast halibut fishery depends on access to the exclusive 12-mile fishing zone of the United States, along the coast of Alaska and in the Bering Sea. As I am referring to Alaska as well, their coast is roughly four times the length of the British Columbia coast and therefore this reciprocal arrangement on the west coast in respect of the shoreline is very much to our advantage. What I would envisage with the completion of our fisheries map of Canada, with the drawing of the remaining fisheries boundaries and the fisheries closing lines is that we will still want to have, and indeed enjoy, a good relationship with the United States and welcome any type of reciprocal fishing arrangement which in the main liberalizes reciprocity in fishing between Canada and the United States.

There are a number of other countries whose fishermen during the years have fished in Canadian waters. The United Kingdom, France, Norway, Denmark, Portugal, Spain and Italy have had a long record of performance. They have traditional fishing practices in some of our east coast areas. Their fishermen and fishing vessels will, therefore, have to be phased out over a period of time. They, however, are in a different category. Their continuance there is not based on a treaty but merely on the fact that they have come and gone over a period of many years. I am not one of those who believes in shutting out foreign fishing fleets entirely. I know there are certain species of fish off our shores, and some of them within our exclusive fishing zones, which will be of interest to people of other countries and which may not be of any immediate commercial value to Canadians. I would hope we would always encourage their development by visitors to our shores up to at least a sustained yield level of production. I could conceivably see a species like the west coast dogfish in this category, and there may be others that we may continue to want to see exploited off our east coast as well.

[Mr. Davis.]

Having said that I am concerned, as I know many hon. members are, about the management in the sense of a sound conservation practice in respect of a limited resource. The fishery of the world is indeed a limited resource. It is in a position which cannot withstand the tremendous pressure from modern fishing gear and the latest fishing techniques. Our capability to catch fish already exceeds the supply. It certainly exceeds the ability of the resource to withstand this great attack by man. We need, therefore, to limit our efforts in many areas and scale them to the resource to make sure the resource is cropped on a sustained yield basis.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Within our own fishing zones we have begun a system of licence limitation by which we are cutting back on the numbers of vessels active in our own Canadian waters. We are reducing the fishing capacity in some cases to one-quarter or one-third. A quarter or a third fewer vessels can catch all the fish that could possibly be caught and still leave enough fish for future years which will provide a reasonable level of income for the fishermen. If we are to scale down our efforts in this way, and in a sense, to withdraw the fishing capacity from our waters, we need to have these waters managed and under control. They cannot be subject to the capricious attack of fishermen of other countries who come when it suits them, then leave and not come again for years after the resource itself has been depleted.

On the west coast beginning in 1965 the Russian, and to some extent, the Japanese fishing fleets moved in. They moved into Queen Charlotte Sound. Over a period of two years they reduced the catch per unit of effort, the quantity of groundfish that could be caught per day at sea, by approximately 60 per cent. They have not come back to Queen Charlotte Sound. Now, with the drawing of our fisheries closing lines, they will be unable to come back. But it is this indiscriminate fishing on a very large scale in areas which cannot sustain that level of activity, which must be discouraged. It is within our power, and certainly will be within the power of the Canadian government with this legislation, to protect our fishing waters from efforts of this kind.

On the east coast last spring as many as 60 vessels owned by foreign nationals arrived to explore a brand new fishery here—the new herring fishery. It was developing here because we had exhausted our herring fishery on the west coast. The westerners came east and began to exploit the resource in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Their success was news overseas. It was news in the North Sea where the herring fishery is all but depleted. So last spring 60 vessels arrived. We intercepted those vessels and let them know that they were not welcome in this new fishery. Many of them turned back to fish elsewhere. However, there has been a limited attack on our new herring fishery as a result of this intervention on our part. We did not really have the law of Canada behind us. We could merely ask them to turn back. Now, with the fisheries closing lines we will indeed have the sanction of Parliament behind us and we will be able to prosecute foreign vessels which might cross our fisheries closing lines.

I mentioned the drop in our catch on the west coast due to the large foreign trawlers operating there, the large Russian and Japanese fishing fleets. On the east coast, the fleets of more nations have also been active. Our Canadian trawler fleets have also been active. Of course they have been kept out 12 miles by our regulations, but the impact on the inshore fisheries has been substantial to this extent. The catch in quantity of our inshore fishermen in Newfoundland, for example, has dropped roughly by half over the last 10 to 15 years. The average catch of the average small inshore fisherman in Newfoundland is down to about 50 per cent of what it was in the mid 1950s. These are the situations which we are encountering. They are particularly difficult for small people with low incomes struggling to make a livelihood for themselves in many remote locations. By drawing baselines, by drawing fisheries closing lines, by pushing out our fishery limits 12 miles beyond the baselines, we have at least reserved for these people many bays and inlets which formerly were open to foreign fishermen as well. We are at least fencing off some significant areas for better management, for conservation and for the protection of the livelihood of small people in many outlying areas in this country.

I hope that, like the Arctic seas pollution prevention bill this afternoon, this legislation will also commend itself to members in all corners of the House. I hope that it will be passed unanimously as well. It is legislation which, as some hon. members have said, is long overdue. It is long overdue in one sense, but let hon. members remember that again we are creating a precedent. We are creating an international precedent here in the form of fisheries closing lines. We will be criticized for it, but I believe that our defence is primarily one of conservation and good management and also pollution prevention in the sense that all of the provisions of our Fisheries Act, for example, will extend out to these fisheries closing lines, out to our fisheries limits, to protect us from pollution of all kinds and from damage which can occur to our fishery resource.

This is a good bill and I think it warrants the support of all parties. I know it will be discussed in the Committee on External Affairs, but I hope its period there will be brief, that it will be back shortly and that we will soon be able to publish the list of coordinates and maps completing the fishing zones of Canada for all time.

Mr. Barnett: I wonder if the minister would permit me to ask him one question. Earlier in his remarks, he referred to the fact that this legislation was putting the finishing touches—I think that was the expression he used—to our approach to conservation of our fisheries. Did he mean that in a completely literal sense, that this was the final step that the government has in mind? Would he mind explaining whether or not we are to take those words literally?

Mr. Davis: This legislation does not in any way refer to waters beyond what I might refer to as the exclusive fishing zones of Canada. These lines will indicate the limit where Canada has sole authority in respect of its fishery. In time I hope Canada will also have a very substantial voice in the management of fishery resources over all of its continental shelf. It is the largest continental shelf in the world, including the Grand Banks. We must take initiative there, initiative which should be taken by the coastal states. We should make sure that our resources over the shelf, 400 miles out of Newfoundland over the Grand Banks, are properly managed. We must take the initiative there. But I do not regard those waters as exclusively Canadian from the point of view of exploitation. However, they are of vital concern to us and we must do everything we can to make sure that they are cropped intelligently and that our share in that cropping increases as time goes by.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): As the minister indicated, this legislation will certainly commend itself to the House. As my colleague, the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) has said already, it is our intention to give it our support and to expedite its passage in order to get it before the committee. In this particular case, however, I regret very much that the bill will be going before the external affairs committee and not the fisheries committee, because I think the type of study that this legislation requires can only be conducted in the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry where there is a fund of knowledge on this subject. The suggestion has been made that it might be a good idea, for the purpose of examining this bill, to combine the two committees. Certainly, I am strongly of the view that only the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry can give this bill the scrutiny it warrants.

• (5:20 p.m.)

The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis), who just took his seat, said that this bill completes the fisheries map of Canada. I would like to think that it does but, unfortunately, as the minister said in his subsequent remarks, it falls short of achieving that goal. So far as completing our fisheries map is concerned, in my view the bill represents nothing but a pious hope. I do not blame the Minister of Fisheries for this, because it is something which concerns areas outside his responsibility. Nevertheless, the bill merely expresses a pious hope that it can do what it says it will do, the same pious hope that was outlined in the legislation when the fishing zones Act was passed in July, 1964.

At that time, the then Secretary of State for External Affairs, the former hon. member for Essex East, said as reported at page 5209 of Hansard.

> This bill wil lestablish a 12-mile fising zone in Canada. It will enable the government to establish the straight baseline system. The straight baselines are not spelled out, for the reasons we gave in the committee, because this would interfere with the negotiations that are under way.

[Mr. Davis.]

That was six years ago, Mr. Speaker, when the negotiations were under way.

> This is following the practice established by other countries who have initiated new fishing zones based on the straight baseline system, countries such as Norway and Iceland, and other countries I mentioned in the committee.

I repeat that it is six years since that Act first came before Parliament. I think it is fair to say that measure was supposed to be the fulfilment of a rash political promise made during the 1963 election campaign when the Liberal party promised that if it formed the government it would unilaterally impose a 12-mile limit. They said they would declare the 12-mile limit first, and negotiate afterwards. History has proven the folly of this course. Six years later the promise is still unfortunately unfulfilled.

The minister, who has a great deal of sympathy for the plight of the inshore fishermen of my province and of the Atlantic Coast generally, referred to the fact that the inshore fishery yield has dropped to half of what it used to be. In my view, Sir, this drop in the yield from the inshore fishery is a consequence of our inability to enforce our own laws, our inability to protect our own coastline from infringement by the fishing vessels of foreign nations. The legislation which we impose, which has to be adhered to by our own nationals, is ignored by the fishermen of other countries who fish off the Atlantic coast. You have the paradox of Canadian deep-sea trawlers not being permitted by law to fish within the 12-mile limit whereas foreign trawlers such as French, Spanish, Portugese and Russian do so with impunity. Indeed, as the minister himself just said, the French fleet does so with the full protection of law.

The French fleet fishes within the 12-mile limit with the full protection of ancient treaty which was referred to by the minister, the Treaty of Utrecht, signed by Britain and France in 1713 and amended and renegotiated in 1904. That treaty today has as much force of law as it had when it was renegotiated and signed in 1904. What the minister forgot to mention was that, in addition to the fishing rights which this treaty gave France in 1713 and 1904, it also gave France the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon. It is because of these islands that we will never be able to successfully conclude negotiations with France to have this ancient, out-moded, out-dated treaty, which we inherited from Great Britain, repealed.

I think the minister knows that, and I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs

(Mr. Sharp) knows it. I think it is unfortunate for us because the consequences are serious. The minister is aware of what is taking place today on the French islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, which lie within ten miles of the coastline of Newfoundland. Substantial funds are being expended by the government of France, as a program under the Common Market, to develop additional harbour facilities at St. Pierre and to provide substantial cold storage facilities for the storage of fish. This makes it possible for foreign trawlers, many of them from Common Market countries, which fish within the 12 mile limit as a consequence of either traditional or treaty rights, to land their fish within sight of our shores on the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon. In my view this is the great weakness, the great anomaly, the great shortcoming of this legislation.

We have treaty and traditional rights with Britain, Portugal, Norway, Denmark, France, Spain and Italy, and until we renegotiate these treaty and traditional rights in the light of present-day circumstances, all of the legislation that we pass in this House, including the amendments now before us, will be useless. They are in fact redundant. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, they are nothing short of deception to the fishermen of the Atlantic coast who have to obey this law knowing full well that their competitors can disobey it with impunity. You have the double hazard of these trawlers fishing within our 12-mile limit and then having the privilege of landing their fish for cold storage and trans-shipment right on the Grand Banks themselves, on the French islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon.

As a consequence of questions directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs on a number of occasions, we were told in this House that the government was still negotiating with the government of France with a view to obtaining an agreement to establish a baseline on the south coast of Newfoundland. We are still negotiating. That is diplomatic language, Mr. Speaker, probably indicating that the negotiations have reached a stalemate. That is probably the diplomatic way of saying we have come up against a stone wall and the French government will not yield an inch. As the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) pointed out in committee the other day, if we were unilaterally to establish our baseline on the south coast of Newfoundland it would go right through the French Islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon. In fact, such a line would literally go right through Miquelon if the baseline were to be extended from Cape Race to Cape Ray, or from the tip of the Burin Peninsula to Cape Ray.

There is the problem, Mr. Speaker, and it is a double-barreled one. I know that the Minister of Fisheries feels very strongly about this matter, notwithstanding the fact that he had to leave the chamber a few moments ago, but obviously he has not been able to convince his colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, on it. To me our course is an obvious one. Why should we be bound by the terms of an ancient treaty contracted between the government of France and the government of the United Kingdom in 1713?

• (5:30 p.m.)

Mr. Sharp: A piece of paper; that's all.

Mr. McGrath: A piece of paper, the Secretary of State for External Affairs says?

Mr. Sharp: That is what the hon. member suggested it was.

Mr. McGrath: Perhaps the minister would give me a chance to conclude what I am about to say. Why should we be circumscribed by the terms of this treaty?

Mr. Sharp: Because it is a treaty.

Mr. McGrath: It is a treaty made between Britain and France before Newfoundland was part of Canada, indeed before Canada was a nation. Surely, in the light of present day circumstances our government, if it has any backbone at all, should be able to go to the government of France and demand a renegotiation of this treaty in the interests of conservation, of protecting our own fishermen and fishery resources as well as enforcing our own pollution laws. All these things would give the Secretary of State for External Affairs a strong case for asking the government of France to reopen this treaty so that it may be renegotiated in the light of present day circumstances. If the government of France refuses to renegotiate, as it probably will refuse, then I suggest we ought to appeal to the International Court of Justice and ask to have the treaty repealed. If that fails, then I suggest that we, as a sovereign state, could tell the world that the provisions of this treaty are not in our interest. We did not negotiate the treaty in the first instance; it was negotiated before we were a country, and we no longer accept its provisions. However, at the same time we would respect, as we must, the sovereignty of France over the islands of St. Pierre et Miquelon.

An hon. Member: Why respect that sovereignty?

Mr. McGrath: Obviously, we must respect the sovereignty of France over these French islands. But why should we respect the right of fishermen of that country, in the light of the knowledge we have, to fish where they do? Why should we extend to fishermen of that country the right to fish within the three-mile limit while we, in fact, do not permit our own nationals to do so.

Mr. Bell: It is amazing.

Mr. McGrath: This legislation makes a mockery of justice. It is sheer window dressing. All it will do is impose a handicap on our Canadian fishermen and give to the fishermen of France an extreme advantage.

An hon. Member: Why will you vote for the bill, then?

Mr. McGrath: I intend to vote on it because it represents half a loaf, and half a loaf is better than no loaf.

Mr. Thompson: There, you have your answer.

Mr. McGrath: There is another aspect of the legislation to which I want to refer. I find it difficult to understand why your rights on the continental shelf, which were spelled out by the 1958 Geneva convention, are not incorporated in this bill. When the Secretary of State was out of the House the Minister of Fisheries remarked on this point and strongly suggested or implied—I do not want to put words in his mouth—that that provision ought to have been included within the ambit of the legislation. These rights are acknowledged by the Geneva agreement and are for the purposes of exploring and exploiting the natural resources of the continental shelf. I repeat, why cannot they be incorporated in this bill? It is just as important for us to spell out in a piece of legislation our rights to the continental shelf as it is for us to spell out, in a half hearted and practically meaningless way, our rights to extend our territorial seas from three miles to 12 miles offshore.

I think we ought to finally define what traditional rights of the countries we are talking about are. I am sick and tired of hearing about the traditional fishing rights of those countries; they compete with Canada in the markets of the world for fisheries products. I wish the government would define what those traditional rights are. Why does someone not sit down with the governments of Portugal, France and Spain and say, "Let's talk about these traditional rights because we have pollution laws to enforce and conservation laws to enforce. We must protect our own nationals and our own fishing industry." Last and by no means least, I say that if this legislation is to mean anything, the treaty made by Great Britain in 1713 and amended in 1904 ought to be renegotiated or, in my view, repealed.

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Coast Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, I understand there is a disposition in the House to wind up this debate fairly early. I will be very brief in my intervention. I rise, of course, to support the legislation. It has been very heartening for me to see, both in this debate and in the debate on the previous bill dealing with Arctic pollution, the interest that has been generated in southern Canada in the great north country. True, we have seen that interest rising and falling throughout the history of Britain and of our own country. Perhaps this time the interest aroused will remain.

I will not urge the ripping up of treaties, as the previous speaker did. I certainly welcome the support Conservative party members have expressed for this bill, qualified though their support is. I find their reasons for supporting the bill a trifle confusing. The first two or three spokesmen for that party berated the government for taking unilateral action and establishing an Arctic pollution control zone in the absence of international law in this field. The hon. member who just spoke wanted to rip up a treaty that we have had with France since 1713 and renewed in this century.

Mr. McGrath: It was not renewed by us.

Mr. St. Pierre: Well, if the hon. member suggests that Canada should rip up every treaty which preceded our assertion of full sovereignty following the first world war, I am afraid he will have difficulty in explaining his actions to other nations of the world.

I want to deal very briefly with only one aspect of this legislation. In the debate on the bill preceding this one, and of course the provisions of Bills C-202 and C-203 are interrelated and inextricably linked together, several members of the opposition parties said that increasing our territorial sea limit from three to 12 miles means in some way that we are abandoning our claims in the Arctic to larger expanses of water. This, as I said previously, I dispute. However, some hon. members went farther. The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), according to page 6004 of Hansard, goes so far as to say, as I understand his words, that we should claim great tracts under some sector theory. He said, as is reported about the middle of the page, in the left hand column:

> We own the whole of the area between the 60th meridian and 141st meridian and up to the North Pole.

This, Mr. Speaker, is a claim to regions far beyond the waters of the archipelago. It is a claim to waters, therefore, that go beyond even, in some cases, the 100-mile limited jurisdiction which we are seeking in the Arctic pollution control zone legislation. Unless and until I can be corrected, I can find no substantiation in my reading for this claim of ownership of the ice of the Beaufort Sea, to name one region.

• (5:40 p.m.)

The drawing of sector lines on maps of the north orginated with Senator Poirier. I gave the wrong date to the House the other day when quoting the senator. I said it was 1903, but it should have been 1908. He suggested, and the government later adopted in its cartography, that we should draw these sector lines to the pole to include lands so far undiscovered or unclaimed within these lines. The Russians at various times, including April 15, 1926, did the same. They claimed the lands which might be discovered within their sector lines.

I wish to deal briefly with the Russian position today, as I understand it. There seems to be no doubt that the government of the U.S.S.R. has greatly blurred its claim under the sector theory. It certainly claims the islands of the north. It claims extensive territorial seas, as we are claiming, but I draw to the attention of the House that the American coastguard ship Northwind sailed north of the Russian Island of Severnaya Zemlya without protest from the Russians. The Northwind went north in 1967 and, as I understand it, crossed what could be called the Russian sector line, without protest. However, when this ship sought to pass through the Vilitsky Strait lying between the mainland and island, the Russians did consider this their territorial waters and forbade passage. As it happened, the Northwind became stuck in eight feet of ice and was broken free by our own icebreaker, the Sir John A. Macdonald.

I do not raise this point in order to urge the Canadian government to cease drawing sector lines on the map. We should continue to draw them. However, I draw to the attention of the House that it is not in the interest of this nation to make unreasonable claims. It is not in our interest to make claims more extensive than those of one of the two great superpowers on earth, namely Russia. Our claims should be those which meet our interests and those which we can sensibly enforce. At present, this is the extension of the three-mile limit to the 12-mile territorial limit which, as I pointed out in a previous speech, if all else fails, creates a gate of territorial waters across the Northwest Passage. I maintain that one gate is the equivalent of many gates.

The country remains faced with a test on this matter in which we find the two superpowers, the United States and, according to my understanding the U.S.S.R., in agreement. It is the position of the United States that the waters of archipelagos lying between oceans should be subject to a high seas passage. It is my understanding that Russia, which has some concern about the right of Turkey to close its canals to military traffic in times of war, is supporting the American government in this position. Needless to say, this must be vigorously resisted by the Canadian government. We cannot accept a high seas passage through the Arctic archipelago.

Because my time has almost expired, I am not going to deal with the various questions of international law which I, as layman, understand to support the perfectly justifiable Canadian claim that the Arctic archipelago is not comparable with oceanic archipelagoes such as Indonesia in the West Indies. The Arctic archipelago has never been an international waterway. I am convinced we can prevent it from becoming a high seas waterway. I do not urge the Canadian government to bar innocent passage to safe shipping. In fact, we all look forward to the establishment of considerable commercial traffic through the Northwest Passage, provided it is safe and provided we are the judges as to whether it is safe.

With my eye on the clock, Mr. Speaker, I thank the House for its courteous attention.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): I too will try to be brief, Mr. Speaker. This bill and Bill C-202 are additions to an awareness of the laws of the north. I think it is right to put things into context as the last speaker did, and I will follow his example, on what was somewhat disparagingly called the northern vision. I participated in an election campaign where the talk was that the government, led by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), was moving from igloo to igloo. I do not think many people today are quite as disparaging about this foresight. The right hon. member was not the only one. There have been many Canadians throughout the past 100 years who have foreseen the laws of our north.

I do not believe the unanimous vote today in this House was, in any sense, an exhibition of Chauvinism or what might be called hysterical xenophobia in this country. I think we are taking positive action. I know I am not supposed to refer to a vote, but it is very difficult not to do so since these bills came before us in tandum, so to speak. I hope our discussions on this bill and other legislation will be free of anti-Americanism and will present a positive and sensitive view of our country and our needs, both in the north and in our seas. I think the two can be differentiated very easily. I do not see why the government of the United States should have been surprised by this and other legislation.

On February 19, 1970, a distinguished senator, Gaylord Nelson, delivered an important address in the United States Senate when introducing legislation entitled, "The Marine Environment and Pollution Control Act of 1970". I will not bore hon. members or spend time giving the details of this legislation, but the senator could well have taken part in a debate the other day on the bill having to do with pollution in the Arctic.

There is also the matter of the Amchitka Island tests. I am trying to be fair about this. The United States government was also insensitive toward the understandable misgivings of this country about moving nerve gases from Okinawa to the State of Washington. These are really forerunners and part of the total picture of Canadian concern. There is another hon. member who wants to speak about the reservation concerning the international court. I am sure this is so. It is certainly the point of view of members of this party that these reservations are but preludes to international agreements. If there is no international jurisprudence on this aspect and on the pollution aspect, so be it. However, it does not in any way inhibit governments from reaching agreements, as they tried to do in Brussels and I assume will be doing in Stockholm in 1972, to avoid pollution of the oceans.

I cannot resist a rather amusing quote by the former Secretary of State for External Affairs whose views on international matters used to grip the House, for part of my time here, in any event. Speaking of the rule of law in world affairs, he said that international law, while not his mistress, was assuredly his constant companion. Well, the government leader in the Senate is now without a mistress and, apparently, in the light of these reservations, he has no companion.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Mr. Sharp: Oh, oh.

Mr. Barnett: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the well-known interest of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Anderson) in this subject matter, I wonder if there might be a disposition on the part of hon. members not to see the clock until, say, ten minutes after six, should the hon. member require extra time in which to give us the benefit of his thoughts.

Mr. McGrath: That would depend on how the hon. member proceeds in the few minutes we have left.

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): I can assure the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) that should I still be talking at six o'clock he throw a book in my direction and I will take the hint that I have spoken long enough and promptly sit down. Seriously, I thank him for his suggestion, and I am grateful to the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) for cutting his remarks short so that I might be able to speak at this time.

I intend to speak first of all on the subject of the territorial sea, the feature which at present most concerns the Canadian public. This new legislation makes it possible for the Canadian government to consider Barrow Strait, and all of Prince of Wales Strait to be entirely Canadian territorial waters, rather than waters in a more questionable position, at least as far as the opinions of some other governments are concerned. We have made it clear by the provisions of this legislation that we regard these as entirely our territorial waters, regardless of the opinions of other nations.

I believe it is becoming a generally accepted idea among all nations that the concept of innocent passage is a term which includes freedom from the risk of pollution. The passage of a ship is not innocent if it results in pollution of the shores on either side of such straits as those I have mentioned. We have no intention of being dogs in the manger on this issue; I agree with previous speakers that we should not become anti-American on this issue. Nevertheless, a coastal state has a special interest in preventing marine pollution, and innocent passage does not include passage through these straits by vessels which do not adequately meet safety or anti-pollution standards which this country has every right to insist upon. I therefore welcome and support the clause of this bill which would repeal section 3 of the present legislation. I feel this is necessary at the present time to make the government's position on the north perfectly clear.

The other point on which I should like to comment is the concept of fisheries closing lines. This is a new concept. It does not go quite as far as I would wish. Some times ago I presented a private member's bill to the House, Bill C-91, which would have made all waters over the continental shelf exclusive Canadian fishing zones. This would be better, in my opinion, than the present bill, but I am willing to admit I may be wrong on this. However, the present proposal is a step in that direction; it is a step based on more traditional concepts than was my bill, and I think it is well worth while.

The fact that we have at present foreign vessels fishing in Queen Charlotte Sound on the west coast, and similar bodies of water on the east coast, is most unfortunate. This new concept of fisheries closing lines will, I hope, tidy up the untidy situation which was left in the original territorial sea and fishing zone legislation of 1964. I would point out that it is not, of course, the final step that should be taken. I commend the hon. member for Comox-Alberni for questioning the minister on this point a few minutes ago. It is clear that the minister views this as perhaps a step only in what should be done with regard to the Canadian exclusive fishing zone, and not conservation on the continental shelf affecting many species, and conservation on the high seas affecting such species as salmon. Perhaps this matter might be further clarified at the committee stage of this bill.

We have heard a great deal today about how slow the government has been in bringing forward this amendment—from 1964 to the present day. Some members have stated that we have shown too much concern for the opinions of other nations. May I at least point out that in the five-year period before the original bill the Conservative party was in power, and saw fit to do nothing at all about this subject.

Some hon. Members: That is not true.

Mr. Crouse: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. We have kept this discussion on a non-partisan basis so far and I hope the tenor of the debate will continue as it started out. I put on the record the fact that in 1958 and 1960 Canada made worth-while contributions to improving the law of the sea. We were within half a vote of getting agreement.

Mr. Anderson: It is true efforts were made at the Law of the Sea Conferences. But I am talking in terms of legislation, of unilateral action such as has been commended to the House by the hon. member from Newfoundland who spoke earlier this afternoon—I am sorry, I am not very good at remembering names of constituencies.

Mr. McGrath: St. John's—the oldest city in Canada.

Mr. Anderson: St. John's. It is important to point out that the original legislation was brought in in 1964 and that it is now being made more effective. I thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for allowing me to continue until now.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, April 23, 1970

The House met at 2 p.m.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REPORTED REDUCTION OF AUTOMOBILE SAFETY FEATURES BY MANUFACTURER

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who is, of course, the watchdog for the protection of the consumers of the country. Is he able to assure the House that the reported reduction by an automobile company in certain safety features does not constitute a hazard to the Canadian consumer in his capacity as a user of automobiles?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the question should properly be directed to the Minister of Transport who is the minister responsible for the legislation on car safety to which the House gave approval only a few weeks ago.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I explain to the minister that I put the question to him because I do not believe that the Minister of Transport has any regulations in effect yet under that act, and I was wondering whether the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, as protector of the consumer, had ordered any investigation into this reported reduction in safety features on automobiles. Has the minister ordered any such investigation, is he prepared to order such an investigation, or is he just going to sit back and say that it is somebody else's job?

Mr. Hees: As usual.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I will consult with my colleague the Minister of Transport, who is responsible for the administration of the automobile safety program in Canada, so as to assure that there is no weakening of consumer protection.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question. Would the minister himself also make an inquiry or have somebody else make an inquiry into the report that this cutback in safety features was ordered by the United States head office of the company in question?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to check that out.

PRICES AND INCOMES COMMISSION

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON STATEMENTS IN BROCHURE, "FIGHT INFLATION"

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Has the minister seen the brochure entitled "Fight Inflation" issued by the Prices and Incomes Commission, and has the commission consulted him, or to his knowledge any other department, as to the contents of the propaganda in the brochure?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. The brochure was prepared by the commission and issued by it.

Mr. Lewis: Then in that case, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that there are contained in this brochure statements of policy about what should happen in the country, for example, that "pensions, wages and other money payments should not rise automatically in step with the cost of living because this would make inflation much more explosive"—I notice that the minister has a copy of the brochure in his hand—may I ask whether he and the government support this statement of policy by the commission?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, these are observations that are made by the commission. The commission is authorized to make such observations under its terms of reference. The particular observation to which the hon. member has referred should, I think, more properly be dealt with by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Lewis: A further supplementary question. The Prices and Incomes Commission is answerable to this Parliament through the minister, not through the Minister of Finance. Therefore may I ask the minister, in view of the activities of the commission which have resulted in no benefit as far as the reduction of prices is concerned, and since the commission has now been turned into purely a public relations body that is turning out misleading stuff of this kind, whether it is not now time to consider either abolishing the commission or firing its chairman?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's supplementary is purely argumentative.

GRAIN

WHEAT—ACREAGE REDUCTION PROGRAM—FUTURE PLANS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt, the Minister without Portfolio. A number of the letters I have received in connection with the so-called LIFT program, sometimes called the WARP program, indicate that the major weakness is that it is not tied to a long-term program. Farmers are asking what plans the minister or the government has if the farmers proceed to reduce their acreage as requested. What plans in general, not in particular, does the government have for the year 1971-72? The farmers need that information in order to determine the course they will follow in 1970.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. gentleman is asking for a rather general statement of policy. Perhaps the minister might reply in a brief way.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the only way I can reply briefly is by saying that the approach to this question has been made clear by the Minister of Agriculture and myself on previous occasions. It would require a statement on motions to repeat it at this time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have read the statement and I, in common with the farmers in general, cannot understand what the government stands for. That is the reason I asked. If the minister does not know I will not press him.

WHEAT—ACREAGE REDUCTION PROGRAM—REFERENDUM OF PERMITHOLDERS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister without Portfolio. In view of reports that many farmers on the prairies do not find the government's proposals under operation LIFT acceptable, and in view of the fact that the National Farmers' Union has called for the government to rescind this program, will the minister give consideration to holding a referendum of the 190,000 permitholders on whether or not they are in favour of the wheat acreage reduction program?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, among the 190,000 permitholders there are, of course, many who could find a change which would be suitable to themselves. It would scarcely be possible to hold a meaningful referendum in connection with a program of this nature.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the United States government holds referendums in respect of its wheat programs, can the minister inform the House whether any opinion polls have been taken to test the farmers' reactions to the program and whether it is acceptable and, if he has done so, will he report the results to the House?

Mr. Lang: To the greatest degree, Mr. Speaker, the testing of the opinions of producers has come about by contact with farm organizations and farmers themselves. I may say that when it is understood by the producers that this plan is part of a total examination of where the agricultural industry stands and what must be done to put it into its proper state, there is general support and agreement for this approach.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

WHEAT—ACREAGE REDUCTION PROGRAM—INCREASE IN ACREAGE PAYMENT

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of reports from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and other agencies as to the intention of farmers to reduce their wheat acreage to 18 million and then to 15 million after operation LIFT was announced, and if the government insists on proceeding with the program and wants it to succeed, will the Minister without Portfolio say whether the government is considering increasing the amount of the acreage payment?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): No, Mr. Speaker. I must say I have not seen any very accurate analysis of what is likely to happen in regard to planting intentions. It really will be impossible to know exactly how much farmers have changed their plans until in fact seeding is completed.

WHEAT—ACREAGE REDUCTION PROGRAM—REPLACEMENT OF QUOTA PROVISIONS

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that all of the major farm organizations have declined to give their support to operation LIFT, is the minister considering any major revisions to the plan as originally announced and, in particular, is he considering dropping the quota provisions as he originally announced them in favour of some other more acceptable type of plan?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): The original allegation by the hon. member, as usual, is completely without foundation. Indeed, most farm organizations consulted supported the plan and its purposes. There seems to be some exception in respect of the National Farmers' Union whose initial support was not followed up with any consistency later.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We seem to be getting into the area of debate. The hon. member for Battle River will be allowed a supplementary and then the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Edmonton West.

WHEAT—ACREAGE REDUCTION PROGRAM—INCREASE IN PRICE OF GRASS AND FORAGE SEED

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister in charge of the Wheat Board whether he or the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has looked into the fact that the price of grass and forage seed has doubled since the initiation of the LIFT program?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, we have not taken a specific look at the exact nature of what has happened to prices. I presume the hon. member is not suggesting that the $10 per acre offered in respect of conversion of land into forage was rather too high and thus has encouraged a move in the price of grass seed.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are a number of members who are seeking an opportunity to ask supplementary questions on this subject. The Chair will attempt to return to the hon. member for Battle River and the hon. member for Regina East in a moment. For the time being the hon. member for Edmonton West has the floor.

Inquiries of the Ministry

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

IMPROVEMENT OF RELATIONS WITH CARIBBEAN COUNTRIES—SUBSTITUTION OF AGRICULTURAL DEVELOPMENT FUND FOR SUGAR AGREEMENT

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs either in his ministerial capacity or as Acting Prime Minister. In light of the replies given by the minister yesterday to my colleagues from Calgary Centre and Fundy-Royal concerning the unilateral abrogation by Canada of the 29 cent rebate on sugar and in view of the conditions which exist today in Trinidad and other Caribbean islands, would the minister undertake to make a full statement in the House outlining the position of the government, what it has done and what it proposes to do?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make clear, as I did yesterday, that there is no connection whatever between the troubles in Trinidad and any action by the Canadian government. Second, since there seems to be some misunderstanding, not as a result of what I said yesterday but as a result of a statement in the press, I should like to say that there was no agreement between Canada and the islands of the Caribbean concerning the rebate of the sugar duty. It was a unilateral action on our part to pay the rebate and it was a unilateral action by which it was withdrawn.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): In light of the reaction of the countries concerned, which is reported to be negative, and in view of the fact that Canada has a vital stake in promoting trade and relations in this area, surely the minister must understand that there should be a clarifying statement so that we can all get our views on the record in respect of this vital subject.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is advancing an argument for the consideration of the minister. I do not think it can be considered to be in the form of a question.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Does the minister consider it appropriate for Canada in conducting an aid program not to consult the country or countries being assisted when it proposes to make a change in the form of the assistance?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think the Leader of the Opposition is also confused about the nature of the action. This was not part of any aid program. It was a unilateral action taken by Canada in anticipation of the signing of an international sugar agreement. Canada helped to get that agreement concluded. The price of sugar went up and we believe it is now more suitable to increase our aid program than continue this temporary rebate.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, would the minister not agree that in terms of the effectiveness of the assistance, as well as having a bearing on the relations between our country and the countries affected, it would be appropriate for Canada to consult the other countries concerned before making a unilateral decision about a policy, admittedly with a unilateral base in the first place?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I understand the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce would like to participate in the debate.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, if the Leader of the Opposition is interested in the facts it might be useful to say that West Indies exporters of sugar did not use the rebate fully and are not at present using fully the allocation under the international sugar agreement.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I asked for a statement.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The point made by the hon. member for Edmonton West is well taken. It was not my understanding that the question was asked of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I suggest that we should not enter the field of debate. The hon. member for Fundy-Royal has a supplementary question, I gather.

RESOLUTION PASSED BY CARIBBEAN GOVERNMENTS RESPECTING TRADE WITH CANADA

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): What information can the minister give us about a meeting of heads of governments of the Caribbean countries which I am informed passed a resolution calling for an inventory of Canadian assets in the various Caribbean countries?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, such a meeting was held. They did not call for an inventory of Canadian assets. I have seen the resolution; I thought I had it with me, but I can get it. What it did call for was a review of trade and other relations between Canada and the islands, but it did not refer specifically to an inventory of assets.

SAFETY OF CANADIANS IN TRINIDAD—EVACUATION ARRANGEMENTS

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a related question. Has the minister had any information on whether there has been any molestation of Canadians in Trinidad or injury to them or to their property?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I understand that yesterday or the day before some windows were broken. There have been, however, no injuries as far as we know to any Canadians, and certainly no violence has been directed particularly against Canadian property.

Mr. Harkness: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. What arrangements, if any, has the minister now made for the evacuation of Canadian personnel, tourists or otherwise, from Trinidad?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to give the details because I would not want to create an impression that we are expecting that evacuation will be necessary. I believe that conditions have now improved somewhat and it is important that we do not create unnecessary concern. We have contingency plans for the evacuation of Canadians.

WOMEN

REPORTED STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF LABOUR—ROYAL COMMISSION REPORT

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Is the attitude the minister took to the over-eager feminists in Montreal on Wednesday, April 22, prompted by what Judy LaMarsh said about the minister in her much publicized book?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Labour and is related to the last question.

Mr. Hees: You are blushing, Bryce; you are blushing.

Mr. Brewin: Was the minister stating government policy when he is reported to have said in Montreal yesterday that the object of the feminist movement should be not to produce a race of women who will at any given moment turn their saucepans into swords?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that a question like that can only be directed to the Prime Minister or Acting Prime Minister.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether there is a supplementary which could be in order on this subject.

Mr. Brewin: May I try, Mr. Speaker, and then you can rule on whether it is in order. May I ask the Acting Prime Minister how soon it is anticipated that the Royal Commission on the Status of Women will be making its report?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not informed. I will make inquiries.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—CO-OPERATION OF ORGANIZED LABOUR IN ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Over a week ago I asked the minister if he would take the first opportunity on motions to report to the House what success the Prices and Incomes Commission is having in persuading the leaders of organized labour to give that co-operation without which no anti-inflation program can be successful. He said he would speak to the chairman and would see about giving a report as soon as possible. Is he now in a position to ask for unanimous consent to revert to motions in order that he may give that report?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I discussed the matter with the chairman, as I said I would, and the commission has a number of initiatives under way. But it was the view of the chairman that nothing very useful could be said on motions at this particular time.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it not true that the leaders of organized labour have told the government to go fly a kite, and that the Prices and Incomes Commission has fallen flat on its face once again?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member to suggest that his question is not asked correctly from a procedural standpoint.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION

ACTION TO SPEED UP PROCESSING OF PAYMENTS TO UNEMPLOYED

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour which I have asked previously on other days and I hope it has been brought to his attention. Would he be in a position within the next day or so to make a statement on motions concerning the proposals that the Unemployment Insurance Commission may have to clear up the endless delays and complications experienced by the unemployed in receiving their unemployment insurance cheques?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I might do better than that. I will arrange to bring the estimates of the Unemployment Insurance Commission before the appropriate committee within the next two weeks in order to give the hon. member and other hon. members an opportunity to question the representatives of the commission on its efficiency or inefficiency.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

SURVEY OF COST AND QUALITY OF CAR REPAIRS

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs somewhat related to those asked earlier by the Leader of the Opposition. Is his department conducting a survey of the cost and the quality of car repairs in Canada and, if so, when can we expect a report?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, it is not.

Inquiries of the Ministry

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INTEGRATION OF VETERANS CHARTER WITH SOCIAL WELFARE PROGRAMS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. It arises from a reply given by the Prime Minister the other day which indicated that veterans benefits are being included in general social welfare policy. Is it now the policy of the government to integrate the veterans charter, which gives veterans special rights arising from the special services they rendered to the country, with general welfare programs?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question was asked in similar terms on at least one occasion. I am not sure whether there is any point in having the minister give the reply which he has already given to the House.

Mr. Dinsdale: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the reason I am asking this question is that there was ambiguity in the answer and I have now phrased the question in such a way as to avoid that ambiguity. I am asking specifically whether the veterans charter is being integrated with the general social welfare programs?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, it is not. There is quite a distinction between social legislation and social welfare. What the Prime Minister has said and what I have said is that veterans benefits are part of social legislation, not social welfare.

Mr. Dinsdale: I have a supplementary question arising from that answer, Mr. Speaker. In view of the minister's further reply, is it his intention to review the benefits under the veterans charter and increase them in light of the rising cost of living, prior to the general review of social welfare programs?

Mr. Dubé: Some of the benefits provided for veterans are now being reviewed under the white paper and are before the Veterans Affairs Committee at the present time.

MANPOWER

SUMMER EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM FOR STUDENTS

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct this question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Would the minister indicate to the House to what extent his department, in co-operation with the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, has succeeded in the objective of placing the half a million unemployed students in summer jobs?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair has no objection to the minister replying to this very important question, but the minister might consider whether it might not be advisable to make a general statement on motions. However, I am sure hon. members would be agreeable to hearing a short statement from the minister at this time.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, my statement will be very short. It is impossible at the moment to determine the success of our program. We will be able to do that at the end of the summer, but in the meantime I will be happy to give the hon. member a statement on the steps that are being taken with respect to the summer program.

HOURS OF WORK OF STUDENTS EMPLOYED BY FEDERAL DEPARTMENTS

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the minister. In view of the fact that some students worked in excess of 80 hours per week for federal departments last year, will this still be the policy of federal departments this year?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would like to check into the extent of this practice if it does exist.

[Later:]

Mr. Scott: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would be very glad to give the minister any information in this connection that he desires.

"HIRE A STUDENT" CAMPAIGN—SPECIAL PROGRAMS IN ECONOMICALLY DEPRESSED REGIONS

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister whether his department will continue to support the "Hire a Student" campaign which it conducted last year?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are continuing it. We are working this year with the Canadian Chamber of Commerce which has launched a special summer hiring program as a way of encouraging employers to hire a certain percentage of summer students. We look forward to this as an important part of our total program.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the minister. Is his department considering any special programs to help students to find summer employment in economically depressed regions?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we had reasonable success in our program last year. We are attempting to maintain the program and improve it where possible. We do not anticipate a special program along the lines mentioned by the hon. member.

LABOUR RELATIONS

ALLEGED VIOLATION BY CPR OF AGREEMENT WITH CLERKS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of complaints made by Mr. McGregor, vice-president of the Brotherhood of Railway and Airline Clerks, in telegrams to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour, to the effect that Canadian Pacific has violated its agreement with the brotherhood in ordering a reduction of 10 per cent of its work, will the minister look into this matter and make an early statement on it?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the telegram although I am sure it has been received in my office, but normally if the CPR were to violate their collective agreement there should be some condition in the collective agreement which would protect the union against this type of unilateral action.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

SAFE PACKAGING OF HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It has to do with his legislation on hazardous products and the symbols that have been published. In view of the fact that thousands of those who have been the victims of hazardous products could not read, is his department or the government planning any legislation with regard to the safe packaging of these products?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, under the Hazardous Products Act the whole purpose of the symbols designed for the labelling of hazardous products is to assist those people in our society who through illiteracy or otherwise cannot read, and also to assist young children who would learn the symbols rather than the words. We are examining ways, and have power under the act, to deal with safety in packaging, which is part of a safety program including education, labelling and packaging. For example, with respect to a matter in which I know the hon. member is keenly interested, we are endeavouring to develop a safe standard for safety lids that would be waterproof so that many of these hazardous chemical substances could be properly contained.

BANK OF CANADA

INQUIRY AS TO OPENING OF BRANCH IN QUEBEC

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, I would like to address a question to the Acting Prime Minister.

Does the government intend opening a branch of the Bank of Canada in the province of Quebec in the near future?

An hon. Member: After the 29th?

Mr. Speaker: The question could be placed on the order paper.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

RENT INCREASES FOR PERMANENT MARRIED QUARTERS ON DEFENCE BASES

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pose a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In his role of restraining increases in prices, what action is the minister taking with the Treasury Board to have them roll back their recent increases in rental costs of permanent married quarters on defence bases, which they authorized for April 1 of this year and which in some cases are as much as $15 per month?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, some time ago the government announced the roll-back of a number of user fees that had been intended for imposition this year. I will take up the rental increases the hon. member mentioned with the President of the Treasury Board, but it may be that they are offset by the reduction in rents that the Minister without Portfolio responsible for housing announced the other day.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the minister. As these increases are completely unjustifiable, will the minister recommend to his colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, that there be a roll-back, with no nonsense about it?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member, of course, is asking a question in the form of a representation, and he has to assume that it will be taken into due consideration.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask whether the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs would take steps to have this increase in rent referred to the Prices and Incomes Commission to see whether that independent commission would find that the increase was justified within the policy of the commission?

Mr. Basford: Well, Mr. Speaker, I shall be delighted to discuss it, as I always do, with the President of the Treasury Board, but I think the fact that we in Canada, according to the latest available figures, have been having a better price performance than the United States, Japan or the United Kingdom is some indication that our present policies are working more successfully than theirs.

POLLUTION

PRESENCE OF MERCURY IN HOWE SOUND

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Acting Prime Minister as the Minister of Fisheries and his assistant and also the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources are absent from the House. In view of the announced closing of the Howe Sound to sport fishing because of mercury pollution, can the minister inform the House as to the source of the pollution, its extent and the measures being taken to control it?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I feel this is a question that could be directed to the minister tomorrow as well as today.

PUBLICATION OF LIST OF RECOMMENDED CHEMICALS

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture concerning the government action in banning the use of certain chemicals which are no longer available for purchase by the industry for control purposes and the desire of Canadian agriculture and horticulture to reduce risks to a minimum. Is it the intention of the government to publicize before the growing season a list of recommended agricultural chemicals for substitute use both in fields and gardens?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure about the publication of a pamphlet or other type of publication but certainly when the restrictions on the number of purposes for which DDT, for example, would be licensed were determined the department was very careful to ensure that there were other products available for the purposes for which licensing was withdrawn.

UNITED NATIONS

CANADIAN ASSISTANCE TO RELIEVE UNRRA FINANCIAL CRISIS

Mr. Ralph Stewart (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the financial crisis which has arisen in UNRRA, the United Nations body which looks after the refugees in the Middle East, involving an amount of $4 million, would the government consider taking up a part of that crisis, even though Canada already contributes substantially to UNRRA?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, certainly I would be prepared to look into this question but as the hon. member knows I think we already carry more than our just share. Even so, I will look at the possibility of doing more.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EFFECT OF ACTIVITIES OF DANISH FISHERMEN ON SURVIVAL OF ATLANTIC SALMON

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. What initiatives is the government taking with respect to the threat to the survival of the Atlantic salmon posed by Denmark's fishing activities off Greenland, especially in view of the strong stand taken by the Prime Minister of Great Britain on this subject?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I shall take notice of this question. The Minister of Fisheries and I consult regularly about these matters. I shall consult with him about it and see what would be the most effective action we could take.

Mr. McGrath: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. This problem has been around for some time and in view of the fact that the government of Canada has not been able to obtain agreement on this matter in the International Commission on the North Atlantic Fisheries, has the minister consulted or called in the ambassador for Denmark to discuss it?

Mr. Sharp: Not yet, Mr. Speaker.

INFORMATION CANADA

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF ASSISTANT DIRECTORS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister without Portfolio in charge of Information Canada. As a preface to the question may I suggest that perhaps the Minister without Portfolio from day to day, when the Prime Minister is not in the House, could tell us where the Prime Minister is and what he is doing on a daily basis when he does not appear here.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: My basic question, Mr. Speaker, is whether the minister has appointed five unit directors or subdirectors of Information Canada and, if so, what their function is and were they appointed by Public Service competition?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first question is no, but I would be glad to exchange information such as I have with the hon. member if he will keep me informed of the movements of his leader, who does not appear here as often as the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I had some doubts about the preamble to the hon. member's question and I have some doubts about the preamble to the minister's answer. Perhaps he would like to limit his contribution to the second part of the hon. member's question.

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, one good preamble deserves another, but I did say, although the hon. member may not have heard, that the answer to the second question is no.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is not a preamble. I do not quarrel too much with preambles; it is the content I quarrel with. The supplementary question—if we are going to talk about leadership we can talk about some basic things right now and why the Prime Minister is not in the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are four minutes left before the end of the question period and I ask for the co-operation of the hon. member.

Mr. Nowlan: I certainly will co-operate, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister ensure that in future all executive appointments to Information Canada will be made on the basis of Public Service competition?

Mr. Stanbury: Yes, Mr. Speaker. That has always been clear and it remains so.

[Later:]

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary to the original question. Was the usual procedure followed in giving security clearance to the head of Information Canada?

Mr. Stanbury: The Prime Minister has answered that question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MacInnis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I realize that a minister is not bound to answer a question, but if he does so he is certainly required to give a truthful answer. The fact is that the Prime Minister has not satisfactorily answered the question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Skeena.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND PROVINCIAL ELECTION—RESIGNATION OF CERTAIN FEDERAL RETURNING OFFICERS

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, may I answer a question raised by the hon. member for Hillsborough on April 20 about resignations of two returning officers in Prince Edward Island. I have been informed by the Chief Electoral Officer that he has received and accepted the resignations of the returning officers for Egmont and Cardigan. I would appreciate, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member could convey that information to the hon. member for Hillsborough, who is not in his seat today.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I would be very pleased to convey this information to my colleague, the hon. member for Hillsborough. I might add that I shall be able to do it within an hour in this place. I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it the intention of the government to fill the vacancies which have been created?

Mr. Stanbury: I am sure replacements will be appointed in due course, Mr. Speaker.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

AVAILABILITY OF COQUALEETZA HOSPITAL LAUNDRY FACILITIES TO INDIANS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I directed a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare about the use of the laundry facilities at the Coqualeetza Hospital near Chilliwack. I had some conversation with the minister following the question period and I wonder—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The lighthearted exchanges on my right make it difficult for the Chair to hear the hon. member's interesting question.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): With respect, Mr. Speaker, I think the designation should have been lightheaded. I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether he can provide an answer to my question regarding the use of the laundry facilities at the Coqualeetza Hospital, following the conversation that he and I had after the question period yesterday?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we did receive a telegram from Mr. Wilbur Campbell on this matter. We did indicate that we could not make a decision on the feasibility of the laundry in question until we had received the feasibility study on the entire site which we expected by the end of May; I understand now that it will not be available until June so we are talking about another six weeks. Then we will be in a position to relate the circumstances regarding the laundry to the over-all recommendations for this site.

[Mr. Stanbury.]

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether we might not pursue the matter raised by the hon. member for Skeena tomorrow or Monday. The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East.

POLLUTION

CHEDABUCTO BAY—PAYMENT OF COMPENSATION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. To date, has the government been able to work out the procedures that those people should follow who are requesting compensation because of the oil disaster in Chedabucto Bay?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): No. The subject is under review by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Minister of Transport and myself.

UNITED NATIONS

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO BIRTH CONTROL FUND

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I would like to find out whether the conflict within the cabinet has yet been resolved and whether Canada has a policy with regard to contributing to the United Nations fund for—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some doubts as to the form of the question. The hon. member for Joliette.

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I understand the hon. member wants to rephrase the question.

Mrs. MacInnis: Yes. Mr. Speaker, I do. I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he will make an early statement on Canada's policy regarding a contribution to the United Nations fund for family planning and birth control for those nations that wish it?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I hope consideration of this matter will be concluded soon so that I will be able to make such a statement.

INFORMATION CANADA

QUEBEC—DISSEMINATION OF INFORMATION ON FEDERALISM

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister without Portfolio responsible for Information Canada.

In view of the statement by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) yesterday that the way to sell federalism to Quebecers would be through Information Canada, can the Minister without Portfolio inform the House whether Information Canada will have the task of enlightening the Canadian people on the federal system and of expounding its advantages?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): I hope so, Mr. Speaker. In our estimation this is not propaganda with a view to promoting federalism.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacLean: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Will the President of the Privy Council in his capacity as House Leader give his usual statement as to the business which the government plans to place before the House for the next week?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I thank the hon. member for the question. As the House knows, today will be the final day of the budget debate. Tomorrow the following bills will be called in this order: government order 13, Bill C-10 with regard to the Canada Shipping Act, government order 76, Bill S-14, with regard to radiation emitting devices, government order 15, the Senate amendments to Bill C-12, with regard to the International Development Research Centre.

On Monday we will call government order 84, Bill C-197, with regard to the National Farm Products Marketing Council. Tuesday will be an opposition day. On Wednesday we will call government order 53, with regard to the Joint Parliamentary Committee on Price Stability. I hope the subject for Thursday can be a matter for discussion among the House Leaders.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Wednesday, April 15, consideration of the motion of Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

[Translation]

Mr. Rosaire Gendron (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, at paragraph 155 of the Auditor General's report to the House, one can read, and I quote:

> 155. Partial development of port which lacks prospective users, Gros Cacouna, Que.

This is all that was needed to prompt all information media to give this news front-page treatment and to have people cry shame. Never did the Gros-Cacouna project have so much adverse publicity.

Studies of the E.Q.P.B. show that in the pilot area, made up of the ten counties of the Lower St. Lawrence, about $150 million are spent yearly in subsidies of all kinds to maintain some 300,000 people in economic stagnation, but this causes no indignation. However, any attempt made with the utmost difficulty to equip the area for economic development creates a scandal simply on the strength of the opinion expressed in the report of the Auditor General.

Naturally, it is the government that foots the bill anyway whether it be that of recession, much heavier to bear and non-productive, or that of progress which often represents the tenth part of what it should be, in giving those underdeveloped areas adequate transportation means to help them in their efforts towards industrialization.

Mr. Speaker, in giving the other side of the story, I do not expect the same audience or the same publicity the report of the Auditor General received. I am handicapped from the start, because in such matters, all the facts cannot be publicly disclosed. Everyone knows that in that field there is strong competition among the harbour cities as well as among areas and provinces. Everyone knows also that when we refer to prospective users, we mean private concerns and due to the competition among the latter, their future plans are confidential. As for concerns already established which are liable to take advantage of that means of transport since to export their products they do business with existing transport companies, they do not want to be in an unfavourable position before the construction of the port is completed and they can take full advantage of it.

We must not forget that there is at the present time at Gros-Cacouna two piers and an inner basin and that we are more or less in a vicious circle, because if there is no wharf, there can be no traffic and if there is no traffic no wharf will be built. It is like a dog trying to catch its tail.

In short, people wonder if this is a pet project of the member of Parliament for the constituency who would like to delude the Canadian government, or if the maritime traffic really justifies the construction of this wharf.

Now, the project's history and evidence given by men in public life who are aware of the needs of this place, hence who know the prospective users, and who had no interests other than those of their region to serve, prove without any doubt the real need in that area.

This vital need and evidence from experts will no doubt indicate that it is a first class site, open to navigation the year around, and market analysis will establish an enormous traffic potential. Thus, any person of good faith must conclude that never were public funds spent so wisely. What are we waiting for, then, to complete the project?

We might retell its history in the manner of old time tales: "Once upon a time...". As early as 1897, the Chamber of Commerce of Rivière-du-Loup made representations to Ottawa about the harbour. In the spring of the same year, a delegation was sent to Ottawa and they were assured that their request would be given consideration. In October of that year, Sir Wilfrid Laurier promised, at Rivière-du-Loup, to promote himself the project. Year after year, promises and studies followed one another.

In 1959, an interregional committee on waterways made up of representatives from Temiscouata, Kamouraska, Rivière-du-Loup, Edmundston, New Brunswick, the northern part of New Brunswick, Haut-Madawaska, made representations to the hon. Howard Green, then Minister of Public Works. In reply to a question put to him in the House by the hon. Lionel Chevrier, the minister said, and I quote Hansard for June 5:

> We all realized that the seaway would bring tremendous changes to this part of Canada, in fact, to a very large part of Canada, but I do not think any of us realized just how extensive thoses changes would be. The department has done a great deal in the way of making plans for new harbours, various other projects in the Lower St. Lawrence, but I have reached the conclusion that a great deal more will have to be done.

On September 7, 1959, which was Labour Day, the committee organized a big parade from Madawaska (Maine) to Rivière-du-Loup, gathering all the people concerned with this project and made representations concerning the establishment of port facilities at Rivière-du-Loup. Among those present were the Hon. Pierre Sévigny, the Hon. Paul Comtois, Raymond O'Hurley, Edgar Fournier, former Minister of Water Resources for New Brunswick, now a senator, Clynton Clauson, of Augusta, the new governor of Maine, senator Edouard Cyr, of Maine, and senator Jean-François Pouliot, from Rivière-du-Loup. Then, important reports were presented stating our views and the ministers, impressed by this presentation, said:

> You have convinced us of the need for a sea port in the Rivière-du-Loup area and we shall put your case in Ottawa along with your federal member.

On September 15, 1959, the hon. Raymond O'Hurley, in a speech he made in Quebec city to the delegation at the convention of the Union des Conseils de Comtés de la province de Québec, stated that the federal government was interested in the building of port facilities accessible the year round at Gros-Cacouna, near Rivière-du-Loup. Following that statement, L'Événement-Journal of September 16 published the following:

> The Minister of Defence Production has given to understand that the federal cabinet was highly interested in the building of a deep-sea harbour at Cacouna, near Rivière-du-Loup, that would be open the year round and that would promote the exchange of goods between the Lower St. Lawrence, New England and the State of Maine, and the central areas of North America, through the St. Lawrence seaway up to the Great Lakes...He suggested that such a project would certainly change the picture of every region in the vicinity of Rivière-du-Loup and the new harbour.

On March 29, 1960, a regional delegation made the trip to Ottawa to ask for the building of harbour facilities at Gros-Cacouna. Hon. David Walker then asked for the cost of that project to be estimated. Then, the Piette, Audy and Lepinay firm conducted a thorough technical study on Gros-Cacouna island on behalf of the federal Department of Public Works.

On March 30, 1960, a delegation from that area appeared before and submitted briefs to the Royal McPherson Commission on Transportation, in Ottawa.

In April 1961 the Department of Public Works authorized the construction of a model in the laboratory of the National Research Council in Ottawa in order to study the movement of ice due to currents and prevailing winds, and also its possible effects on the harbour facilities at Gros-Cacouna.

On February 26, 1962 the hon. Léon Balcer, federal Minister of Transport, said that expenditures amounting to $50,000 had been approved by the Treasury Board for the construction, for study purposes, of a small-scale model of the future port facilities at Gros-Cacouna.

Governor Clauson, of the State of Maine, who was surely interested, as well as his successor, in protecting the port of Portland in Maine, stated at the 60th annual convention of insurance agents held in Rockland, Maine: As governor of the State of Maine, it is my duty, in order to safeguard the interests of the northern part of the State, to approve the building of this sea port in Gros-Cacouna. He added that the making of Rivière-du-Loup into a deep-sea port would give the people of northern Maine new opportunities for industrial development and activity.

In March 1960, his successor, governor John H. Reed, wrote to the right hon. John Diefenbaker, and I quote:

> I am most happy to approve the project of a sea port at Rivière-du-Loup because, we, in the State of Maine, have long wanted to have access to the Saint-Lawrence river, in order to take maximum advantage of the St. Lawrence seaway.
>
> The development of such a sea port will give the State an economic boost and will, I am sure, also benefit the Rivière-du-Loup region. I am very happy to support the plan and I would appreciate any consideration your government may give it.

Senator Cyr, from Maine, in his submission to the Royal Commission on Transportation, added:

> If we are to benefit from the St. Lawrence seaway, it can be done effectively and economically only through Rivière-du-Loup.

Here is another statement made to the McPherson Commission by Mr. Alphée Lévesque, of Edmundston (N.B.), then Vice-president of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. I quote:

> As far as I know, this is the first time the people of such a large district, extending beyond south-eastern Quebec through more than one eighth of the province of New Brunswick, and the county of Aroostook in the state of Maine, have pooled their efforts to solve a number of problems common to the three regions, one of which is the problem of transportation; and, gentlemen, when I say the people of those regions, I do not mean part of the population or a group of businessmen, I mean to say that the Commission has conducted thorough studies at all levels and spoken with people from all walks of life, and I wish to make you aware that the whole population of the regions which we are representing supports this request and feels that the building of a deep water sea port at Gros-Cacouna is the only solution to our common transportation problem.

On April 19, 1962, following these representations, the right hon. Lester B. Pearson wrote to the mayor of Rivière-du-Loup—yours truly—the following letter:

>
> Being aware of your great interest in the improvement of the transportation network in your region, I wish to remind you that Mr. Lionel Chevrier on behalf of the Liberal opposition raised the question time and again during the last parliamentary session. I would also like to define for you the position of the federal Liberal party on this question.
>
> The whole area served by Rivière-du-Loup is in urgent need of new deep water harbour facilities in order to facilitate communications with the North Shore of the St. Lawrence, the interior of the country and the United States via the Great Lakes, and the European continent.
>
> The Liberal party of Canada acknowledges this urgent need and will undertake not only to continue these studies but also to build these new harbour facilities within the framework of its regional development plan and to provide year-round ferry services between the shores of the St. Lawrence.
>
> I am convinced that carrying out these projects will contribute to the growth of your area about which you are so concerned.
>
> Sincerely yours,
> L. B. Pearson

And I could continue this list, which would be rather lengthy, because all those who know the area and who have examined these problems have reached the same conclusions. Some will say that these are so many ad hominem arguments. Let us see what justifies their attitude.

The port of Gros Cacouna could have four main uses, in general:

1. Through traffic or transfer point for goods.
2. Winter harbour.
3. Regional service.
4. Year-round ferry service.

• (3:10 p.m.)

I am coming to my first point, the one dealing with through traffic. Where does that use come from? Let us consider first of all the privileged situation of that sea port.

The Gros-Cacouna port is five miles east of Rivière-du-Loup, on the south shore of the St. Lawrence river, 101 miles east of Quebec, 80 miles from the Maine and New Brunswick borders across from the mouth of the Saguenay river and Tadoussac. The average depth of the water there is 100 feet and the port is ice free the year round. As we will see further, specialized studies have shown that Gros-Cacouna benefits from an exceptional geographic situation, being at the crossroads of the international shipping lines, of the railway lines connecting the Gaspé peninsula and the Maritimes as well as the Trans Canada and the Trans Gaspé highways.

It is also to be noted that it is quite free of access and that the depth of the river up to Gros-Cacouna allows the movement of ships of any tonnage. Towards the hinterland, whether it be Quebec or Montreal, the channel gets narrower, which makes navigation more difficult, specially in winter, since in some parts it is only 27 feet deep.

More and more, ships drawing 40, 50 or 60 feet of water are being built and such ships will never be able to anchor anywhere in the river with the exception of Sept-Îles, Port-Cartier and Gros-Cacouna. On the other hand, we must remember that according to the 1965 edition of Ports of the World, there are only about ten sea ports in the world where ships drawing more than 30 feet of water can drop anchor.

In 1964, 6.4 million tons out of the 10.1 million tons of freight shipped abroad, have been shipped to countries where ports are more than 39 feet deep. It would be possible to establish a regular service between Gros-Cacouna and these harbours. Here is what can be read at page 115 of the Sorès report:

The rapid increase in the number of huge ships and the trends in the composition of the world ore ship fleet show a noticeable increase in this category (fig. 19, page 114).

In eastern Canada, presently, three ports only can receive tankers (page 55, fig. 5).

And I refer again to the Sorès report:

—They are Halifax, Havre Saint-Pierre and Port-Cartier.

In other words, 54 per cent of the ships presently in operation cannot enter the harbours of eastern Canada. With a depth of 40 feet 60,000 ton vessels can be accommodated. With 50 feet of water, a harbour can handle almost any type of ships under 100,000 tons.

Equipped with a mooring station, Gros-Cacouna harbour could accommodate the largest tankers now in use (around 200,000 tons).

The construction of ships is becoming more and more specialized. For instance, lakers are being built which are able to sail through locks and are designed to navigate on inland seas. Moreover, 200,000 ton ocean liners are also being built but they cannot sail through canals and inland seas and their access to sea ports is limited to about ten in the world, and this enables such ports, mainly in the case of bulk merchandise such as grain, oil, chemical fertilizers, ore to meet certain specific needs.

Subsection 9.4.6, at page 233 of the Sorès report, reads as follows, and I quote:

Possibility for Gros-Cacouna of becoming a container terminal.

This study indicates that potential container traffic is quite promising for that port; on the other hand, the setting up of such a terminal on the St. Lawrence, east of Montreal, is quite likely in a few years; the choice of the Gros-Cacouna port at first sight seems therefore quite possible. Indeed, there is plenty of space—which is quite important for such a use—the port is easily accessible all year round and finally the existing communication network—railways and roads—puts this port scarcely a few hours away from Montreal.

For example, we could quite well see a laker loaded with grain discharge its shipment in the grain elevators at Gros-Cacouna and return to its point of departure with an ore shipment. We could also see an oceanic with an oil shipment go back loaded with grain. We could give a hundred examples, but it is important to remember that this transit operation would immediately entail considerable development and would create some employment and enable the setting up of oil refineries, grain elevators, plants for smelting and other similar operations as well as plants for the production of chemical fertilizers, liquid ground wood pulp, potato-flour, and all kinds of warehouses.

Gros-Cacouna can therefore be considered as one of the best developed ports for the shipping trade, provided, of course, it is equipped with the most modern devices, provided with barges and with all the facilities required to meet international competition. Either Quebec will develop that seaport which has an international part to play or it will forever miss the boat.

It is up to Quebec, through which runs the stately St. Lawrence River, to realize the importance of this project and to promote it, just as Nova Scotia is promoting the port of Halifax and New Brunswick, St. John harbour.

I come now to the importance of Gros-Cacouna as a winter port which is due to its first rate location as a transit point. Gros-Cacouna can handle all types of ships in winter. Being the furthermost inland port, it is thus the most competitive and the most capable of serving Canadian shippers who, from Moose Jaw in Saskatchewan, have as much interest in selecting both eastern and western ports for the shipping of their products.

Is it unwarranted to claim the role of winter port for Gros-Cacouna? Let us hear the unquestionable evidence of experts on that subject.

The ice conditions around Gros-Cacouna Island have been examined for a long time. Studies made by Mr. W. A. Black, of the Geographical Branch, by Mr. B. Robitaille entitled "Rapport préliminaire sur les glaces fluviales à l'Île de Cacouna", greographical study No. 10, and the study No. 24, by Mr. Michel Brochu, all reach the same conclusion. I will quote from page 68 of the study No. 24 by Mr. Michael Brochu:

> As was suggested by Mr. Benoit Robitaille in 1956, in a paper on the development of a winter port in that area, the most appropriate location for an adequate summer and winter port would be the south-western point of the Gros-Cacouna peninsula, 10 miles east of Rivière-du-Loup. An islet to the north-east of Gros-Cacouna would also provide an excellent location for a deep-water wharf that could accommodate ocean-going ships as well as coasting vessels.
> That islet, like the south-western point of the peninsula, has a very edgy shore, without strand and free most of the time of heavy ice concentrations, perhaps due to the powerful currents there; as was pointed out by Mr. Benoit Robitaille (1956), this is an exceptional asset for the south shore of the St. Lawrence.

It must be noted that on the south shore of the St. Lawrence, from Montreal to Gaspé, Gros-Cacouna is the only place which deserves to be selected as the best location for the establishment of a winter port.

The geographical location is unequalled and its easy access all year round is unique. Now, is traffic available.

In studies conducted in 1967 and entitled "Traffic potential of the port of Gros-Cacouna"—which studies, by the way, cost $40,000 to the taxpayers—Sorès Inc. showed clearly what goods might be shipped from that seaport and concluded that, being a winter port, 1,700,000 tons of goods could be handled, provided the required facilities were provided. First of all, a wharf, railroads and other services had to be built.

Whereas the promoters of the development of this port are aware of its tremendous possibilities for transit and winter operations, they are also conscious of its regional importance.

The people in that area need that port for their survival, for the major obstacle to the setting up of industries in our area, is its remoteness from the market and the necessity to reduce transportation costs.

As yet, the best way to reduce transportation costs is still water transportation.

Mr. Pierre Camu, now president of the St. Lawrence Seaway, and formerly director of the Laval University research department, said on page 25 of a brief on transport in the Lower St. Lawrence, and I quote:

> Retaining only 50 per cent of the pulp and lumber shipments because of the competition of the other means of transportation and port facilities, we reach a total of 585,000 tons for that area and a total potential tonnage of 1,227,000 tons.

• (3:20 p.m.)

> Minimum traffic which justifies more adequate harbour facilities. If complementary in-going or out-going traffic were added for each of these regions, the volume would easily reach 2 million tons.
> Rivière-du-Loup has a natural hinterland which has never been properly joined to this town on the St. Lawrence; if an adequate harbour were built in that hinterland, it would contribute to the economic growth of the adjacent region.

In his study, Sorès has reached the same conclusions. We know of the eloquent evidence given by all the leaders in this region which includes northern Maine, northern New Brunswick and the counties of Quebec, particularly the Témiscouata valley, which need this outlet towards the sea.

Perhaps it would be beside the point to list all the agricultural, commercial and industrial advantages but, in any case, there is no time.

But one example would prove the point. With this service, a pulp and paper company such as F. F. Soucy Inc. would save $7 a ton—at the rate of 100 tons a day, it would be $700—which would make the difference for a company between being a marginal industry or an economic operation.

Finally, there is a great volume of goods shipped from our region. This has been shown, not only by people of the area who submitted briefs, but also by experts whose knowledge, integrity and ojectivity cannot be doubted.

Either the necessary effort to complete the most modern harbour facilities is made or the whole present substructure, railways, roads, airports, will slowly disintegrate and the area will become forever unproductive, although it has often shown its willingness to live and do its part for the prosperity of the country.

And I now come to the fourth use to which this port can be put, that of providing ferry service the year round.

We do not claim to be the only ones responsible for establishing communications between the two shores of the St. Lawrence. In my own district, the ferry between Trois-Pistoles and Les Escoumins provides very good service and fulfills a very real need.

Nevertheless, in this field, we have a very positive part to play, which is complementary to that of others, and, for that reason, we are in an ideal position to establish year round communications between Gros-Cacouna and Tadousac. First, the distance would be shortened, because we would overcome the two natural obstacles that are the Saguenay and the St. Lawrence rivers. Because of the shorter distance, rates would be reduced, the number of trips would be increased and traffic would increase on the four-lane Trans-Canada highway, which is to be extended to Rivière-du-Loup in 1972.

Anyone having a quick look at the map can see the deep penetration of Maine into our country and the entrance into Canada from the United States which is very close to Gros-Cacouana.

These means of communication will help to promote tourism considerably in this immense country so different from any other, the beautiful country of Maria Chapdelaine, the Chicoutimi area, where the natural beauty of the St. Lawrence and the Saguenay are blended, the picturesque lakes and still virgin lands of the North shore, the incomparable attractions of the St. Lawrence valley and of the Gaspé peninsula.

It is a sea bridge essential to the balanced development of these two regions economically complementary, one with agricultural surpluses, the other highly industrialized and with no agricultural calling.

If one is not shocked upon realizing that people living 15 miles apart must, during the winter months, make a detour of 300 miles through Quebec city to meet one another, it is because one has lost all sense of responsibility, not to mention plain common sense.

Gros-Cacouna is a unique site, open all year round to navigation, with enough depth to accommodate the biggest ships in the world. We have seen that this was the unanimous desire of a wide area, of all its leaders, and that this project has been supported by top-ranking people in Canada and even outside the country, and that, according to the experts, heavy traffic is possible there.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. I regret to have to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired, unless he has the consent of the House to continue.

[English]

Is it the pleasure of the House to give unanimous consent to the hon. member to carry on with his remarks?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Cinq minutes.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Gendron: Mr. Speaker, I thank the house for its indulgence, and I shall try not to take an unfair advantage.

If short-term returns are to be the sole criteria, then we must reluctantly give forever more to developed regions and give nothing at all to under-developed areas; it seems like a high price to pay for just keeping a whole area in its impoverished state.

All the great achievements in Canada, the transcontinental railways, the St. Lawrence Seaway, did not always seem justified at first blush, and so gave rise to much criticism; still, they were carried through because some had faith in the future of Canada, and the future proved them right.

As for us, we are quite willing to have that kind of faith which can move mountains but we would like to know that this responsibility is to be shared by those whose task it is to build up this country and to provide for its orderly development. They must understand the problems facing us: the problem of involving those who will be the first to profit by it; the problem born from regional rivalries, or from the inability of the Establishment to realize the fantastic job opportunities involved in this program. We must however be ready to pay the price for it instead of jeopardizing it through all sorts of manoeuvres.

The first project concerning the grain elevators cost the company about $1 million, out of which $375,000 went towards additional dredging, engineering and the hiring and travelling expenses of four contractors. On top of that, they started picketing the site until the company finally decided to drop the project following a struggle between unions. All the workers belonged to some union and had nothing else to gain except the possibility of choosing one union or the other.

Of course they need wharves, up to date equipment and public services which are the responsibility of the three government levels. That is why I solemnly urge everyone concerned to encourage them to help each other, so as to provide our many unemployed with jobs, for their plight is no longer acceptable in a highly industrialized country such as ours. There are many projects, but the time for consideration is now over. It is high time we should take some action and I will quote Churchill: "Give us the tools, we will finish the job".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer briefly to some of the basic principles behind the budget we have before us. I shall refer to the economic prospects ahead of us and shall direct the attention of the House, and I hope the minister, to one or two aspects of the budget which I believe to be of vital importance to every Canadian citizen. First of all, I should like to extend my congratulations to the minister for having brought in a balanced budget. For years, we have been asking that government expenditures might be held in line with the government's income. The tremendous increase in the governmental debt during recent years, combined with the tremendous increase in interest rates, has resulted in a very heavy tax load for the Canadian taxpayer which is neither productive nor service rendering.

Having said that, however, what disturbs me about the budget is that it gives the impression the government has cut back its expenditures, is holding down on pressures that are exerted upon it, and has thus balanced its budget when in reality the government has had, and still has, sources of income which have placed an additional tax burden on the Canadian people for purposes other than just general revenue. I am referring to the continuation of the surtax on income, which is projected forward for yet another year. This tax hits at those taxpayers least able to bear it, those earning low wages. They are burdened unduly by this particular tax. I also refer to the social development tax which was to have been related to the cost of medicare. This tax is being collected from Canadians in some provinces where medicare has not yet been established. One of the issues in the present Quebec election campaign relates to the collection of this tax. This income intended to defray half the costs of aspects of medicare in that province as well as in other provinces has gone into the general coffers of the government.

• (3:30 p.m.)

It seems to me that collecting taxes on this basis, and for purposes which have not been implemented tends to alter the financial picture of this government. When the premier of Quebec talks about the federal government's responsibility to return $200 million to Quebec, he has some justification for his stand. The same remarks apply to the province of Ontario the residents of which paid their tax for a good part of the year before the province established its participation in medicare. The same applies to several other provinces. The government can boast about balancing its budget because, really, it has been able to literally hold up the taxpayers in certain areas of the country.

Mr. MacLean: It has indulged in larceny.

Mr. Thompson: Yes. That could even be described as larceny. Another omission of the budget and of the white paper on taxation is the necessity of co-ordinated taxing policies to cover all levels of governmental expenditure. Although the white paper was supposed to deal with tax reform, it does not even refer to this area. If the white paper had dealt with that aspect new policies would have been suggested rather than various new schemes intended just to increase the tax revenue. The white paper ought to have dealt with the over-all problem of taxation as it affects all our people and all levels of government. Unfortunately, neither this budget nor the white paper considers the over-all financial problems facing the provinces, the municipalities and cities at the present time. They are completely ignored. The government may not have realized this before, but it ought to realize it now as a result of the brief presented by the Federation of Mayors and Municipalities several days ago.

The municipalities, cities and provinces face a very serious situation. The white paper and the budget by merely adopting a stand pat attitude to these problems, I submit is stark evidence that the government is avoiding its responsibilities. The effects of all this are cumulative, because it can be proven that the general economic and financial situation of the country is really much worse than we have been led to believe. I wish to point out that no matter whether the money collected is to be spent by the municipalities, the provinces or the federal government, it all comes out of the same taxpayer's pocket. While I commended the government for balancing the budget, but I submit that it is tragic to see that budget being balanced under false pretences particularly when vital areas of governmental activity are completely ignored. These considerations certainly alter the over-all financial picture the government seeks to present.

So, Mr. Speaker, we are in much greater difficulties than the minister's statements relating to the budget would have us believe. The government has deliberately spoken of a policy of cutting back, of holding the line with respect to expenditures. A great deal has been made about cutting back the civil service; yet, if one examines the estimates for the coming year it can be seen that instead of the civil service being decreased, there is to be a sizeable increase in its strength. The over-all picture certainly does not indicate any cut-back, and does not support the government's claims. Besides this, the increase in government expenditures has gone forward at a rate which is much greater than the rate of productivity in this country. How can the government expect the private sector, private businesses, industry and labour to hold down prices and wages as requested by the Prices and Incomes Commission when the government itself does not do what it requests of others.

Last year's increase in government expenditures over the figures relating to 1968 was 11 per cent. For this year the rate of increase has been decreased but the government will spend about 9.5 per cent more than last year; but this rate of increase is still considerably above the rate the government has asked labour and business to observe in suggested guidelines. If the government were really serious about coping with the problem of inflation, which the Minister of Finance has said is the most important problem facing us and which the Prime Minister tells us almost every week is the basic problem he faces at the present time, it would limit its increase in expenditures to 5 per cent or less over those of last year rather than 9 per cent plus. I submit that the real culprit in inflation is not increased profits, is not increased wages or salaries, although certain wage increases have been much higher than our productivity would warrant, but is instead government expenditure.

While exhorting other sectors of the economy to keep expenditures down, the government has increased its spending at a rate nearly double that which is deemed desirable for other sectors. On top of that the white paper, which is supposed to be a statement of government policy related to tax reform, offers no encouragement. Government policies, as evident from the budget, show that nothing is being done to correct the inequities in our taxation system. I submit that adjustments must be brought about which will affect not only the revenues of the federal government but those of other levels of government as well.

For instance, it is clear that nothing has been done to alleviate the condition of the poor. In these days when the cost of living is increasing ever more rapidly, those at the low end of the income scale who are the hardest hit ought to have been helped first. But the budget does nothing for those people. Instead, it loads burdens on to the middle income people. They are already carrying a heavy tax burden. If the tax load on private business is to be increased as the white paper suggests, private business may not be able to survive. Even this year many private businesses have had to or will close their doors.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Not only is this true so far as the people on the middle level of the income scale are concerned, but it also destroys the incentives necessary to explore and develop our own resources, which are our great wealth and future potential. Consequently, instead of productivity growth increasing in order to make the pie bigger so that all have a bigger share, as a result of government expenditures following the old pattern, the pie is still being cut up in different ways in order to make it seem bigger while in reality it is not. This is where we stand now, with a very dismal prospect for the fall and winter months, combined with serious unemployment which will inevitably become more difficult as the months pass.

Just the other day the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) again said that the government's basic problem is inflation. A healthy and viable economy is a prerequisite for any sound and equitable social order, or just society. The continued growth of general trade, of productivity, of good labour relations and of the general prosperity of the country are all dependent on the effective control of inflation. Thus, it is the government's foremost responsibility to deal with inflation not just by doctoring the symptoms, but by coming to grips with the causes of the symptoms. The government does not seem to have any answer for that.

We come back to the old cycle that has faced us for years. We seem to believe the cost of living can be controlled by cutting back spending, all the time forgetting that as spending is cut back production decreases and when production is decreased unemployment goes up. Then, as unemployment goes up earning power goes down and the over-all economy falters.

The problem is not one of production nor is it one of consumption. Today ours is a problem of distribution. The white paper on tax reform being directly related to this budget is based on the false assumption that inflation can be controlled by holding back expenditures. But all that is being done is forcing us into a situation which, with less earnings and less employment, is reminiscent of conditions in the thirties.

At this time, the unemployment statistics show more than 542,000 of our work force out of work. This is a greater unemployment figure than we had in 1939, 1938 and 1937, and is approximately equal to the unemployment figure in 1936. It is certainly much more than the unemployment figure in 1930 and 1931, when we considered the unemployment situation to be the worst we ever had. It can be said that our population has increased a great deal since then. That is true, but nevertheless the prospect of 7 per cent unemployment, and much higher than that in many areas of the country, leaves us facing a grim prospect for the fall and winter months. Again, I say that the real culprit has been governmental spending.

So far as the taxpayer is concerned, the tax load in Canada has increased from $6 billion to $26 billion over a period of 18 years. With $13.5 billion as the estimated expenditure for 1970, which is approximately equal to the combined expenditures of the provinces and municipalities, we find that the tax load has gone up nearly fivefold in the last 18 years, much greater than the rate of inflation so far as the cost of living is concerned and certainly much greater than the rise in the productivity of the economy.

Last year when we discussed the budget, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) disregarded certain figures as being unimportant. We do not have the figures for the fiscal year just ended, 1969, but we do know that with the current rate of government spending at one level or another takes more than 45 cents out of every dollar earned by Canadians. It is my contention that this trend cannot continue.

The net national income of the Canadian people as it relates to the gross national product is something much less because the gross national product does not have a direct relationship to the actual earnings of the Canadian people, whether in dividends, commissions, salaries or from the sale of produce. Thus, while the tax load is about 35 per cent of the GNP, it is much more when compared to the national income.

In his budget speech, the Minister of Finance said that the government intended to introduce certain controls on consumer spending as a method of bringing about a more effective control over inflation. If the minister really feels that consumer credit controls, of a type similar to those used in 1950 to 1952, are necessary, why has he delayed the implementation of them? Now, we hear reports to the effect that these controls may be introduced about July 1, but we are not sure.

If the government is of the opinion that inflation is our basic problem, why does it not do something about it through its fiscal and financial policies? To stand still is not good enough. Looking at the over-all picture affecting the taxpayer, and referring just briefly to the cities of western Canada, the cost-price squeeze which faces not only the farmer but businessmen up and down all the streets of our towns and cities, and in particular those on fixed incomes, those on pensions, we see that the government has a responsibility to introduce policies to correct the situation. If the situation is not corrected it will push us into a recession just as dangerous as any that we had in the 1930's. By ignoring the situation the government is ignoring its responsibility.

There is just one more thought I would leave with the House. It relates to our development assistance program to the rest of the world. We would like to think that we have a foreign aid program which is a model that can be held up to other nations of the world. We would give the impression now that the new International Development Centre about to be established in Canada really is going to do something about our overseas responsibilities. But the unavoidable impression one receives from our present policies with regard to development assistance is that we are backing away from our responsibilities.

As the World Bank report, under the authorship of a former prime minister, Mr. Pearson, points out, unless we understand partnership in development as far as the world economy is concerned, we are in for trouble. If we do not share in that development program so urgently required today, markets are not going to be available for what we produce. Our share of the world wheat markets has dropped from 48 per cent or 49 per cent to something like 17 per cent or 18 per cent in the last five years. In the underdeveloped areas of the world that do not have the opportunity of forging ahead, we are going to have an even smaller market for export trade in all categories.

Though we are the third richest country in the world, last year we gave in aid only .49 per cent, less than one half per cent of our GNP, standing 16th out of 16 countries studied by the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development. This, Mr. Speaker, is not adequate. How can this situation be related to the fact that we are asking for controlled inflation and at the same time a more equitable tax structure as it relates to the taxpayer. The fact is unless we are able to assure our economy of a continuing export market for our products, we are going to find ourselves in a worse situation than ever before.

It comes down to one last point, and that is the absolute necessity for monetary reform at the international level. We have supported and still take a leading part in the committee of nations set up to study this problem. Herein lies the basic problem that restricts our trading patterns and makes it difficult for the developing countries of the world to face up to the challenge of a world economy. I think that the Minister of Finance in his budget or in his white paper statement should have referred to this very important fact. It is time that the Canadian government took a lead in trying to bring about some over-all international monetary reform. To continue patching up the monetary system as we did preceding the last election campaign in 1968—the truth about that action is just now becoming public knowledge—is to bring reflection upon the growth and viability of our economy, especially as it relates to the development of our natural resources which are of vital concern to our future economy. Thus, Mr. Speaker, I hope that the government will do something better than was outlined in the budget or the white paper. The situation facing us cannot continue and it grows more serious day by day.

Mr. H. E. Stafford (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, April 5, 1970, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) was interviewed on the CBC program "Under Attack". During the program he was questioned by a concerned student regarding Canada's health manpower status, our reliance on foreign medical manpower to expand our health delivery personnel and our failure to build adequate medical educational facilities.

In reply to a question on educational facilities and their expansion, the minister stated the government policy was to put "a limit on the degree of expansion". His reasoning is difficult to accept in view of the facts at our disposal. He stated "I am one of those who have not really bought this story that we are that short of health personnel in this country. I think our doctor-patient ratio is somewhere between one to 950 people. It is probably one of the highest in the world; in fact, it is one of the highest in the world".

It is unfortunate that the minister takes this myopic view of medical manpower, when there are hundreds of communities in this country without physicians and others are grossly undermanned. The problem is obviously of such a nature and such proportion that the Toronto Daily Star of Saturday, April 11, 1970 was moved to devote over two pages and a covering editorial to decry the short supply and need for increased physician coverage. The Daily Star quoted situation after situation in detailing the problems in many communities.

The minister, in his telecast, quoted Canada's physician-population ratio as one in 950, whereas it is actually somewhat lower, namely one in 750. In terms of physicians per 100,000 population it is 130 physicians per 100,000 population for easier comparison with other countries. He stated this was one of the highest in the world. It is not. This ratio is a middle ratio range compared to other nations. Russia and Israel have the best ratios, each having over 250 physicians per 100,000 population compared to Canada's 130 physicians per 100,000 population. Both these countries have twice as many available physicians per capita as Canada.

Furthermore, the Russians have a highly developed program for assistant doctors, what they call a "Feldshers" program, which provides a primary level of health care in factories and outlying areas. They have thousands of people engaged as Feldshers, besides having twice the density of physicians as Canada. It is unreasonable for the minister to suggest that Canada is in the same medical manpower league at all. Moreover, the Russians feel the desirable physician per population ratio to deliver ideal health care is 360 physicians per 100,000 population and is aiming for this by 1985. This will give them three times the available doctors per capita as Canada.

Both Dutch and English authorities have estimated the desirable physician ratio as being about 200 physicians per 100,000 population. If we accept this figure, which is much less than the Russian figure, Canada is still far from adequately populated with physicians, having only 130 physicians per 100,000 population. The whole of eastern Europe had a disastrously depleted medical population at the end of World War II and a very poor comparative rating with respect to Canada's medical manpower. Now, the situation is completely altered because they have had the foresight to see that their health care delivery system is geared to the number of available physicians and they have wisely anticipated and supplied the necessary manpower. Even these eastern European nations, which we have considered to be less developed than us, have surpassed us in medical manpower. I refer to Bulgaria, Hungary, Poland, Czechoslovakia, the U.S.S.R. as well as Italy and Greece. Even the similarly developed countries such as the United States, the United Kingdom, West Germany and France, have far better ratios being 186, 147, 193 and 154 respectively per 100,000 population as compared to Canada's physician-population ratio of 130 per 100,000. There are countries with worse ratios such as India with 22 physicians per 100,000 population and Indonesia with 1.4 per 100,000. In view of these 1969 statistics from the World Medical Association, can the minister really be "one of those who have not bought this story that we are short of health personnel in this country"?

During the same television interview another important question was raised. The minister volunteered that "more doctors than we graduate each year, immigrate to Canada". The student then asked if the health manpower in Canada was not being expanded at the expense of other developing countries. The minister admitted openly that it was, and stated this was "one of the areas where we have a brain drain in our favour". I would like to examine more closely this question which the student raised of "expanding, or maintaining, our health manpower at the expense of other developing countries".

According to the Health Manpower Inventory booklet produced by the Department of National Health and Welfare in 1969, the number of Canadian graduates from our own medical schools has increased very slightly from about 850 to 1,000 per annum over the past ten years, an increase of only 150 graduates per year. At the same time, the number of immigrant physicians, which was stable in the late 50's and early 60's at about 450 per annum, has dramatically risen, especially in the past five years, to around 1,400 new immigrant medical doctors at the present time. This represents an increase per annum of 1,000 immigrant physicians over the past ten years, while our own national output has marginally increased by 150 new medical graduates. Significantly, of these 1,400 immigrant physicians, approximately half are from developing countries. These statistics, which are taken from the Department of Health and Welfare, show unequivocally that we are the beneficiaries of the brain drain as it affects the poorer nations. Moreover, information from United Nations sources indicates Canada is one of the major international bandits of trained foreign personnel.

As well as this health and welfare document I have mentioned, I have here the most recently published and comprehensive study done by the United Nations on this very problem of the "brain drain". The title of this report of the Secretary General is "Outflow of Trained Personnel from Developing Countries". In this United Nations report, Canada's very large and increasing role as a benefactor of the brain drain is made all too clear. Furthermore, I have in front of me a copy of United Nations Resolution No. 2417, which resulted from the Secretary General's report and which was adopted by the 1745th plenary meeting at the United Nations on December 17, 1968. Canada agreed to the adoption of this resolution.

This UN resolution deals with "Outflow of trained professional and technical personnel at all levels from the developing to the developed countries; its causes, its consequences and practical remedies for the problems resulting from it". This resolution "notes with concern" the continuing and accelerating emigration from many developing countries to a certain few developed countries, among whom Canada and the U.S.A. are the major gainers, as is also the UK and perhaps France and Germany.

This resolution further suggests there is a "need to take appropriate interim action at both the national and international levels" and it specifically recommends "that developed countries should co-operate now in taking appropriate measures, with a view to reducing the adverse effects of the outflow of trained personnel from the developing countries". From the health and welfare statistics that I have already quoted on immigrant physicians coming to Canada and the large percentage of these who are from underdeveloped countries—approximately half of the 1,400 per year—it is obvious that we are contributing actively to the brain drain as it affects the poorer nations' medical manpower. In fact, the UN report states, and I emphasize:

> In proportion to its population, Canada's intake of professionals appears to be among the largest in the world; the trend towards an increasing reliance on the skilled from developing countries is strong.

Not only is Canada the primary goal of many medical doctors from developing countries, it is also the halfway house or, as the Secretary-General's report states, "the intermediate country" in "a staged migration" to the U.S.A. from the developing nations. This fact bears up in reviewing the 450 physicians leaving Canada to immigrate to the U.S.A. in 1967—which is the last reported year—300 of these, or two-thirds, were landed immigrants to Canada and not Canadian born.

The Secretary General's report points out with approval, the United States exchange-visitor visa program which was set up by the United States government to ensure a return of training professionals to their countries of origin. These exchange visitors or "J-Visa" holders are allowed entry into the U.S.A. for a period of five years for specialized training, at the conclusion of which they are required to return to their country of origin. However, the UN report points out this program was working extremely well up to 1967, with one exception, Canada. Canada's role in this aspect of the brain drain is also looked on with disfavour in the UN report. No Canadian policy has been initiated to complement or parallel the American exchange visitor program which the UN report has commended as being a desirable developed nation program to staunch the flow from developing countries.

That there will always be a certain amount of international exchange of trained personnel is obvious and very desirable, but that it should become a river of the best educated people from the developing countries to the already developed countries of the western world is most undesirable. This flow of trained people in an accelerating migration pattern over the past 20 years is not only due to conditions in the country of origin, but directly relates to the preference provisions now contained in the new Canadian immigration laws which came into force in October, 1967; to the new American laws which became operative in 1962 and 1965; as well as those of the UK in 1962 and 1967 and those of Australia in 1965. These new immigration laws have had the desirable effect on one hand of removing "racially restrictive legal barriers" and on the other hand have extended "an implicit invitation to the professionals of the developing world by certain developed countries".

That there is more than an implicit invitation to potential underdeveloped countries' trained professionals is underlined by the report's quotation of the Canadian white paper on immigration, October, 1966, which states "Other countries are in competition with us for trained immigrants". The American Secretary of State confirmed the aggressive American policy in connection with this international banditry for educated peoples, when he said in July, 1964 "We are in the international market for brains".

• (4:10 p.m.)

May I take this opportunity to quote a few of the examples cited by the UN report as they affected only the medical manpower situation.

1. A World Health Organization Study shows 100 Cameroonian physicians practising in France, while only 47 were left in practice in the African state of Cameroons.

2. Three thousand Turkish doctors were working abroad in 1969 for whom the cost of education of each physician was $100,000 as estimated by Dr. Payzin, Dean of Medical School, Ankara, Turkey.

3. Ten per cent of India's physicians have left for the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada mainly, while over half the government clinics in the Punjab are vacant, the physician-population ratio in the rural areas of India are as high as one in 25,000 in some areas, which is one of the world's worst ratios of physicians to population. I would hate to think what the medical services in my home town of St. Thomas would be with only one physician for the whole population of 25,000. This is exactly the situation in rural India today.

4. Fifty-one per cent of Bolivia's physician output in 1965 applied to immigrate to the United States.

5. The Dominican Republic is losing half of its medical graduates to emigration every year.

6. From the Philippines 1,158 physicians emigrated to the United States and this number represented 5.3 per cent of their national medical manpower and half of these went to the United States in 1967.

7. The United Nations report estimates that the total value in terms of cost of education alone for the professional people immigrating to the United States in the 20 years after the second world war was in excess of four billion U.S. dollars. This figure does not include anything of the estimated productivity of these trained personnel in a normal expected working span of 25 years. This value of productivity must be added to the benefit of the developed country, in excess of their zero expenditure for the education of these people.

I have cited but a few examples to illustrate the overall brainpower drain from developing countries. I have further cited statistics from our own Department of National Health and Welfare to indicate the extent to which we are dependent on a continuing inflow of trained personnel from these poorer countries to meet our annual requirement of physicians.

In the final recommendations of the Secretary General's report the following statement is made:

> Developed nations which at the present time rely on developing nations for numbers of their trained personnel should expand their training facilities and improve their internal career ladders so as to avoid heavy reliance on the human resources of developing nations. This would apply, in particular, to the medical field.

Given this specific recommendation in the Secretary General's report and realizing as we must the magnitude and inequity of this brain drain problem and bearing in mind the report's numerous references to Canada's very pregnant part in the problem, what is the national policy? I believe we see the policy taken by our government in the medical manpower field illustrated in a report prepared by the Department of National Health and Welfare. In this special report and study of the Projected Supply of Active Civilian Physicians in Canada from 1968 to 1981, we find it stated in the preamble that foreign medical graduates "now provide the majority of new physicians in Canada". Furthermore, this study draws attention to the degree of dependency which Canada at large, and each province in particular, places on the foreign medical graduate.

The study shows that unless an average excess of 588 new physicians enters this country every year during the next ten years, that is to say, in excess of our own Canadian graduates, we will not be able to maintain our present physician-population ratio of one in 740. Furthermore, by 1981, with no immigration of physicians into this country and the marginal increase in medical school graduates each year—and this increase barely keeps pace with expected population increases—the physician-population ratio will worsen to the extent of one physician per 933 population.

Because of the heavy inflow of immigrant physicians we have failed to make educational adjustments to match our medical manpower output with job demand in Canada. Thus we have exclude thousands of our own promising, deserving and qualified students from entering our medical schools because of lack of space. Statistics compiled by the Association of Canadian Medical Colleges indicate a snowballing increase in the number of applicants to Canadian medical schools in the past few years. The number of acceptable applicants now exceeds the number of available position by some 200 students. As well, the group of students labelled as marginally acceptable in the last reported year numbers 288. Together, there is a reservoir of almost 500 of our own Canadian sons and daughters who are being denied admission to medical school. To have to deny our own students access to the medical profession with its attendant social prestige, respect, satisfaction and financial security is a most unpalatable situation.

Our own nationals are being denied the right to an education in their chosen profession of medicine, for which there is an ever-increasing need, merely because the government directly or indirectly has become reliant upon foreign personnel to fill our medical manpower needs and has not increased and is not planning to increase our medical school output except to a small, marginal extent. We are directly and covertly contravening the spirit and the word of the UN report as it pertains to the brain drain of manpower, and the backlash effect in our own country is that our young college graduates are being, and will continue to be, denied a professional education in the field of medicine.

There is another aspect to this question of the medical brain drain which has not received adequate attention. This was brought to the attention of the World Medical Association by an American physician who pointed out that it is utterly inconceivable that the poor nations will continue to subsidize medically the richest nations, and that it is only a matter of time before strong efforts will be made to dam these rivers of technical skill flowing toward the developed western world. India, Turkey and Iran have already taken some positive steps in this direction and other countries will undoubtedly follow suit, as indeed they should. Because we have now become dependent on a continuing outside supply of physicians, the medical manpower shortage in Canada will assume potentially disastrous proportions should this source of medical manpower be withdrawn. The shortcomings of our medical education program will become painfully apparent.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I can only say it is indeed unfortunate that we have become so dependent on foreign medical graduates to meet our annual manpower need in medicine and that this gain of ours is made at the very serious expense of the developing nations who have limited medical manpower to begin with. I have drawn attention to the United Nations report, its comments and recommendations with respect to this problem. I must also add that this dependency on foreign medical graduates has denied many of our own students their right to an education in medicine because we have not increased our medical school facilities so that we can be at least self-sufficient.

Finally, I have drawn attention to the potentially disastrous position in which we may find ourselves if the present supply of foreign medical graduates is no longer available. I feel this whole area of medical manpower should be reconsidered by the minister and his provincial counterparts in light of the recommendations contained in the United Nations report No. 2417 and also because of the deleterious effect that our reliance on foreign medical graduates has had on our own medical school aspirants.

It is a matter of concern to me that the university in my area, namely the University of Western Ontario, is able to accept 85 applicants only this year out of the 700 applications which were received. It is a matter of equal concern that approximately 60 per cent of new physicians entering the Canadian medical scene last year were foreign medical graduates, and that this 60 per cent is the means by which the government has planned to fill our medical manpower needs rather than educating our own citizens.

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this opportunity of congratulating the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Stafford) for his timely comments on a very important and current problem facing the nation in connection with staffing our medical and professional services. The other night I watched a United States program that pinpointed the fact the United States was having the same problem with regard to the scarcity of medical assistants. In Canada, we realize that if it were not for the brain drain from some of the underdeveloped countries we would have no medical help at all.

I should like to say a few words primarily about the budget, which to me is a very mediocre document. I have been here for a number of years, and usually on budget night the galleries of the House are filled and the business and economic community wait for the budget with bated breath. But the budget of 1970 caused hardly a ripple, and this at a time when there was a necessity for some government action to be taken to deal with conditions in our country which have brought about the highest taxes we have ever had, the highest interest rates, the highest unemployment level for many years, the highest wheat surplus in western Canada and the highest cost of living.

During the last election campaign we were often told that the government program was one of "no promises". This has now changed to "no action". The only redeeming factor in the budget, I feel, was the one referred to by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson), who mentioned that the government was able to balance the budget this year. Indeed, the government was budgeting for a surplus, the first surplus in 13 years. I remember the last budget surplus. In those days, we indicated that the government seemed to think that by creating a surplus they were taking money away from the people of Canada because they did not know how to look after it themselves. One of the sops used at that time was the $6 addition to the old age security pension. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) is now being given a $30 tag.

For this budget to be effective, some action should have been taken to reduce taxation. After all, taxation is an integral part of our economic structure. As the hon. member for Red Deer mentioned, the 2 per cent surcharge should have been removed. This would have increased the take-home pay of those people who are living so close to the poverty line these days. If they had an increase in their take-home pay the government would make them a little happier, but this does not seem to be in the government's program.

The budget also gave no consideration at this time to tariff adjustments. This is an area where some assistance could have been given to secondary manufacturing industry. Lots of problems are being created in the nation by low cost goods that are imported from countries with a lower cost of living and lower labour costs than Canada. If tariffs and quotas had been adjusted I suggest assistance would have been provided, economically and financially, to secondary industry. Some ministers have said that it is very important to provide cheap merchandise for consumers by importing cheap manufactured goods from other countries. How can the Canadian people buy any of this merchandise if they cannot get jobs?

The main part of my remarks this afternoon is going to deal with a problem that I think is important to all members of the House, one that was pinpointed in a press release issued on November 5. Outside of a few references to it in the newpapers, I do not think too many people in the House or across the nation paid much attention. The release has to do with applications made by the Canadian National Railways to withdraw from passenger service in 31 areas, and by Canadian Pacific Railway to withdraw from passenger service all across the nation. I sincerely hope other members of the House will take note of this action by the railways. It was brought very noticeably to my attention during the Easter recess when a hearing was held in Owen Sound.

However, before I go into the matter I should like to make reference to a piece of legislation that went into force in 1967. I believe it is the umbrella under which the railroads are applying to abandon passenger service in so many areas of Canada. I heard one member of the House refer to the law being an ass, and that somebody should get on it and ride that donkey out of this House. Looking at this particular piece of legislation, and realizing that I was both a member of the committee and of the House when the legislation was passed, I must admit that I must have been a little derelict in my duty not to have looked a little closer at the bill, because it is a bad piece of legislation.

Why, Mr. Speaker, do I say it is bad? I should like to read one paragraph from the MacPherson Commission report on which this legislation was modelled. Again, I admit that the party of which I was a member initiated the MacPherson report, but I think that this first report should have been put up on one of those dusty shelves where a lot of reports end up.

I should like to quote from page 43 of the report, the following paragraph:

> One of these effects, perhaps the most important one, is the railways' continuing need of revenues to cover deficits incurred because of the apparent inability of railway management to slough off the historical, traditional and institutional obligation to provide passenger services.

The thing that provokes me the most about this report is that it refers to the railroads of Canada doing away with the historical, traditional and contractual obligations to provide passenger services. Believe you me, Mr. Speaker, if they are allowed to do that I think it would be a very retrograde step in the history of this nation.

One of the first hearings that was held in connection with the applications made by the railways was in the County Courthouse at Owen Sound, Ontario, commencing on Tuesday, March 31, 1970, at 9.30 in the morning. That particular hearing lasted three days. This is an indication of the amount of interest there was in this hearing. Representations from municipal councils, county wardens, chambers of commerce and old age pensioners were heard. Of particular interest to me was the fact that the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario were also represented. In other words, this is an issue which concerns not only the small towns and municipalities; it has implications which will affect provincial governments, municipal governments and a great many people throughout this nation. So, I feel it is of the utmost importance that further consideration be given to this matter.

That was not the first such hearing to take place. The first one took place last year in Newfoundland. I should like to congratulate the members sitting in this House who represent the people of Newfoundland for the tremendous opposition they put forward in connection with the application of the Canadian National Railways to take away from them a railroad that had become traditional in their history. The fact, however, is that they were not successful.

At this second hearing, I indicated to the members of the commission who were present that the decisions they would make concerning the reduction or removal of passenger service in what we call the Bruce Peninsula area may become the yardstick to be used all across this nation. Another thing about that hearing that was frustrating to me, and to everyone who participated, was that it became evident this particular piece of legislation did not allow anybody at a hearing of that type to question the Canadian National Railways about their expenditures or their method of arriving at a decision that a certain line had created a deficit. I do not think that is fair or just. I think at such a hearing this information should be made available to everybody. That, however, is not the situation.

We were told that this question had been looked into by the Canadian Transport Commission. What information was given to us? The cost was divided into four categories. The first was headed, superintendence expense. What could be put under such a heading? How can anyone understand what is meant by superintendence expense in respect of the cost of running a railroad? The second item was traffic expense, with very little information concerning the cost of operating the line and keeping it open. This did not include information concerning the cost of operating the freight trains that were there all the time and how much additional the cost would be to keep the passenger trains on the rails. The third item was general expense. No details were given except that the category was broken down into various figures such as $37,000, $47,000 and $10,000. There were no details concerning how those figures were arrived at. This is what this piece of legislation has done.

The people who appeared at that hearing had hoped to find out how the railways lost the $480,000 they said they had lost, but no adequate information was produced. Therefore, one can understand the frustration on the part of the people who attended that hearing. We felt that it was an exercise in frustration. This is the reason I bring this matter up in the House. After all, this is the place where such matters should be aired, where opinions should be expressed and where there should be some hope that a decision would be made.

Both the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway made presentations at this hearing. The CPR wished to abandon a line between Owen Sound and Toronto and the CNR wished to abandon a line between Owen Sound and Guelph. Both presentations contained the following sentence:

> The service provided by CP Rail and the competing bus operators should have no difficulty in absorbing CN's passenger traffic.

Then again, this sentence appears in both presentations:

> The passenger handlings on these trains are light and the growth potential of the travel market in this area appears limited.

The representatives of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway who were at that hearing indicated on questioning that they had never taken a survey of the potential of that area. Here we have an area which contains the Douglas Point project. This project to develop heavy water will bring in 3,000 workers with a potential of an extra 10,000 people.

Representatives of the Mid-Western Development Association attended the hearing. This association knows what is going on in the area. These representatives said that representatives of neither railway had come to them to discuss the potential in that area and the necessity to continue the railway service. So, while the railways were represented at a hearing which costs this nation a good deal of money, they did not produce sufficient figures to present their case properly. I have had many run-ins over the years with the railways relating to rail service, mail service and so on. What is frustrating is that they seem to think they can come to a community, attend a hearing and obtain a decision which is favourable to them. I say that in a situation such as this which has nation-wide ramifications a lot more consideration should be given to it.

The MacPherson report mentioned the historic and traditional obligation in respect of the provision of passenger services in certain areas. As reported in the Palmerston Observer, a local councillor stated that the Canadian National Railways owes $100 million worth of services to the people in that area. The background to this statement is that in 1879, when this railroad was put into these areas, the people in the different communities provided a total of $400,000 to assist the railways in building through the area. In addition, the railway received assistance in the form of property grants and taxation reduction. This situation continued for years. They had the benefit of this money over a long period. When one thinks of the value of $400,000 away back in 1879, it would seem that this councillor was quite right when he computed that over a period of 90 years at 6 per cent the amount of money involved would be $100 million. So, as I say, I believe there is a traditional obligation. The people in many areas of Canada are concerned about these railway lines.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Oh, yes, Mr. Speaker; sometimes they say, "Why worry about the passenger service? Who uses it anyway?" But I say that in a great many areas the passenger service has been downgraded to the extent that nobody wants to use it. Certainly, a few years ago the Canadian Pacific Railway introduced its dome cars and made a great noise about its service across Canada. It attracted passengers to its service. The Canadian National, by introducing its red, white and blue fares, did a tremendous amount to attract passengers, and it gave service. I think that the traditional attitude of the railways can best be summed up if I read an article that appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of November 12, just three days after the original notice I hold in my hand, which came out on November 9. The Ottawa Citizen article is entitled, "Rail Service? The Best Way is To Go By Bus." I quote from the article as follows:

> So the CPR and CNR would like to cut their pasenger service.
> Have they not been doing that for the past 10 years?
>
> Take the Ottawa-Montreal local trains. CN used to run a Friday evening train at 5 p.m. to Montreal; also Sunday evening from Montreal, arriving in Ottawa at 9.30.
>
> Great service—trains crowded, standing room only.
> CN policy—move the train time to 4 p.m. Friday, workers cannot make it.
>
> Sunday evening have train arrive in Ottawa at 11.30 p.m. Bus service poor after 12 midnight, so more and more turn to car pools. Score for CNR.
> This was only the beginning. Since then local service between these two points has deteriorated so much as to be almost nil. Score again for the CNR.

So, Mr. Speaker, when the railways say they are losing more and more money year after year, whose fault is it? It is not the fault of the Canadian people, but the fault of the railways themselves.

One question I asked of both representatives there was how much research the railways had done in connection with a passenger train service that would be suitable on branch lines in areas such as I live, western Ontario, where a great proliferation of branch lines remain unused most of the time. I asked whether they had looked into the possibility of providing buses to operate on the rails, and trucks which would run on rails. Thus trucks would be taken off our highways, and highway traffic would be reduced. The buses would reduce the number of passenger cars going into our urban areas, and the result would be a reduction in pollution.

The Canadian National representative said, "Oh well, we tried that a few years ago; we had some operation like that in Quebec but it didn't amount to much." So, when I came back to Ottawa I thought I would get in touch with some of the people who are interested in building buses. I called the appropriate General Motors division in London and learned they had been doing considerable research in this field. In fact, they had come up with a unit that could travel both on the road and rails. They called it a Hy-Rail bus, or heavy duty, high-rail equipment. This system is being studied in the United States, and to prove my point I have in my possession many editorials and discussions on the subject. For instance, the Wall Street Journal of Monday, October 2, 1967 carries this headline, "Hy-Rail Buses Studied by Philadelphia Concern". The St. Paul Dispatch of Wednesday, December 6, 1967 carries this headline, "Rail-Bus Test Successful Here". Another headline says, "New Dade Bus Whistles, Clicks and Beeps". Still another says, "Rapid Transit For Us?"

There is a whole series of headlines proclaiming this type of bus, and yet Canadian National officials, when asked if there had been any research in this country said, "Oh, we did a little bit a few years ago in Quebec, and it didn't amount to anything". I submit the editorial in the Ottawa Citizen of November 12 laid the case on the line. The "Canadian Railwayman" has this caption under a picture, "Riding on Air: Train of the Future?" Underneath appeared these words, "Will this be a rail car of the future?" This train will use the air cushion principle and will be a high speed link between major cities. Yet we have done no research into the possibilities of using vehicles like these on the branch lines of this nation. We could take some of the trucks off our highways and we could use rail buses to carry people from one place to another, thereby reducing the number of people on the highway, reducing pollution and reducing accident rates.

During the hearing of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications this past week, one of the bits of information that came to us was that one 47-passenger bus, if filled, will take 22 cars off our highways. This is interesting information, especially as municipal and provincial governments are trying to find ways of moving people from one place to another as economically as possible. Yet here we have an organization coming under federal jurisdiction which is considering reducing rail passenger service, a service which will carry bulk loads of people from one place to another, and is in fact considering a complete abandonment of such service.

May I say something about cost? It is rather interesting to note that the counties of the area from which I come contain roughly 344,-254 people, so if the loss attributed to the area was $480,000, that would only amount to about $1.39 per capita. But when we look at the Canadian National report for 1968 we find that freight and express services brought the railway a revenue of pretty nearly $800 million. Considering that there were about 21 million people in Canada in 1968, this means that every individual in Canada contributed in one way or another almost $40 to the profits of Canadian National. At the same time, if you consider that the Canadian National Railways deficit in 1968 was $29 million, again, on the basis of there being 21 million people in Canada, we can see that this deficit cost the individual in this country only about $1.39. Of course, we realize that if Canadian National did not have to pay about $70 million in interest on bonds we have been carrying since Canadian National was instituted, the railway would have shown a surplus. In the very same year, Canadian Pacific Railway had a $42 million surplus. So, I cannot understand all this big cry for reducing passenger service. I hope these figures will be taken into consideration before any definite action is taken.

In the recent statement by the minister on the changes to be made in the role and structure of the federal transport portfolio there is a paragraph on page 5 which I wish to quote. It reads:

> Canadian National Railways, Air Canada and Northern Transportation Company Limited, being outside the Public Service, will continue to exercise freedom in their personnel policies, but policy issues or public interest matters will require continuing close consultation with the Minister in the light of the government's general policies.

• (4:50 p.m.)

> Administrations and authorities, largely made up of public servants, will be exposed to the normal forces of the commercial environment and will need a capability to be responsive and adaptive to changing conditions. A high degree of authority will therefore be delegated to the heads of administrations and authorities allowing them to make managerial decisions on many day to day matters but—

And this is the important thing, Mr. Speaker.

> —subject to ministerial direction on all policy issues.

So, Mr. Speaker, I feel that since this issue is vital to all of Canada, and in view of the number of hearings that have yet to take place, this particular piece of legislation that permits the reduction of rail passenger service in this nation should be amended. I feel that the minister himself must take a second look at this particular operation to ensure that railway management will not be allowed to slough off its historical, traditional and contractual obligations to provide passenger service for the nation.

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, the concern which has just been expressed by the hon. member for Wellington-Grey (Mr. Howe) about cancellation of rail passenger service is an issue that finds a great deal of sympathy in my part of the Province of Ontario, a vast region which still relies heavily on this vital link. So, I congratulate the hon. member for expressing these concerns and upon the degree of research that went into his speech.

In my contribution to this budget debate, I wish to present a few thoughts on the large and important topic of environmental control. In his budget speech the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) referred to certain government policies designed to prevent or reduce the pollution of Canadian waters and air. There is a new brand of politics taking shape within our nation, and it is also evident outside our country as well. This new brand of politics has sometimes been described as the politics of ecology, and it is being given urgency by a growing public alarm over all varieties of pollution and environmental spoilage.

War protest is yielding to demonstrations against the rape of the environment. Many young people are turning away from political and economic theorists and instead are flocking to ecologists. The message is ecocide—the environment being murdered by mankind. Yesterday was designated as "E" day, "Earth Day"—history's first mass observance of the world's environmental problems. The attention and energy of millions of North Americans were focussed on fear for the well being of our planet.

One of the most significant features of the past decade in this country has been the increasing public debate about the management and use of Canada's water resources. The awakening of public concern about water problems in Canada is partly due to the increasing number and complexity of conflicts in water use. As population has grown, as industry has expanded, and as urbanization has proceeded, competition for the use of particular water supplies has intensified and has sometimes resulted in severe conflicts of interest among water users. A well known example concerns the water resources in the United States. There, Stuart Udall has pointed out that there is really no shortage of water; the problem is one of improper use, creating an apparent shortage.

Another reason for public concern about water is rooted in the increasing demand for a higher quality environment. Canadians are no longer satisfied with merely increasing their incomes; they also wish to improve the environment in which they live, work, and enjoy recreation. Increasing affluence has led to an increase in leisure time, and this in turn has given rise to growing demands for outdoor recreation. More and more pressure is being placed on governments to deal with pollution problems and to increase opportunities for outdoor recreation.

Donald Waterfield, in a recent book entitled "Continental Water Boy: The Columbia River Controversy", makes an articulate plea for balanced development of the entire culture of a river basin. This point of view will appeal to the growing number of ecologists who are warning an increasingly worried world that its very survival may depend on just such an approach. Ecological awareness on such a wide scale is a very recent development. Ten years ago the most effective criticism of such a treaty as, for example, the Columbia River Treaty was based mainly on economic and political aspects, such as the value of power and water and who would control these resources. The intangible effects on wildlife, recreation, ecology and the people directly affected were largely ignored. In today's climate, such an approach is unacceptable. Now, power authorities must go to unprecedented expense to develop integrated plans for a whole area, rather than just build a dam.

The social and ecological impact of water developments are almost impossible to predict with available current knowledge. A great deal of intensive research is required, and Canada is giving considerable leadership in this regard. Concern for the preservation of social values and natural ecological conditions has resulted in the cancellation of several major reservoir programs in the United States. Naturalists and farmers with a love for some particular valley are understandably concerned with the effects of a reservoir on vegetation, wildlife, the way of life of local residents, and the aesthetic values of their valley. The people of northwestern Ontario, surrounded by an abundance of fresh water, share these concerns, and hence we ask hard questions when engineers and hydrologists do their studies in our region. We want the assurance that other studies, sociological and ecological, are also being undertaken. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) recently gave the assurance in this House that the current Northern Ontario Water Survey would be expanded to include these vital considerations.

The growing public concern about cleaning up the "human nest" is to be welcomed and encouraged. What is most needed today are new realizations about man's place in the universe, a new sense of life, a new pride in the importance of being human, and a new determination to keep this planet from becoming uninhabitable. It has been said that man, for all his brilliance, has thrown himself all the way back to his primitive condition in which his dominant problem on earth was coping with his environment. The difference between the situation today and his tribal beginnings is that the environmental threats today are of his own making. "We have met the enemy and he is us." Pogo, the comic strip hero, originally uttered those words, but they were recently used by a spokesman in the White House Council on Environmental Quality.

Thoughtful observers have suggested that the fully sovereign nation is incapable of dealing with the poisoning of the environment. In fact, when sovereign states engage in open hostility they contribute significantly to global spoilage and destruction. Humanity needs a world order. The effective management of the planet, therefore, whether we are talking about the need to prevent war, or the need to prevent pollution, undoubtedly requires a world government. Unfortunately, we will probably exhaust ourselves in speculation over the difficulty of achieving such a government.

The first law of ecology is that everything is connected to everything else. To conclude my brief remarks, Mr. Speaker, I will refer to a fable written by Dr. Paul Barclay-Estrup, Assistant Professor of Biology at Lakehead University in the city of Thunder Bay. Dr. Barclay-Estrup writes of three lovely islands owned by a man with three sons, each of whom inherited one island. The first son had scientific training with a great respect for proven facts and logical concepts. He was known as Ecologist John. The second son, known as Businessman Bert, was a practical fellow, successful in finance and industry. He was unshakeably conservative, distrusting new theories and holding to the firm belief that More and Bigger, must always be Better. The third son, James, was a missionary, highly moral with a profound respect for life. He believed that man should interfere as little as possible with the workings of nature. To make the story more interesting, the three sons shared a genuine affection for goats.

After 35 years tending their respective islands, these were the results: Ecologist John's island retained the fresh beauty of its flowers, beaches, meadows, trees and clear lakes. The herd of goats, incidentally, was strictly limited to 500. On Businessman Bert's island, there were over 50,000 goats, all living in complete conformity in an enormous sky scraper. They were happy and healthy as long as they were given their daily supply of "happy pills". On the third island, belonging to Missionary James, the passing of 35 years had left a herd of only 200 goats, all stunted and diseased. They lived in an environment of eroded slopes and mud-filled valleys. They suffered always from malnutrition and starvation, while the original beauty of the island was destroyed forever.

Each son had done what he thought best and right. Today's narrow approach to natural science ecology, and to the economics of use of our natural resources, cannot begin to meet the need for intelligent recognition of consequences and consideration of alternatives. There is the utmost urgency to establish a national environmental awareness and a sound sociological attitude toward the total environment. We need a new cultural orientation to man's interdependence with his environment, a positive program to develop an attitude of responsibility.

It was said recently in Ottawa by the president of a prominent corporation:

> We can never tamper with the environment without triggering off consequences. Even with the most highly developed social conscience, even with the most careful exploration and testing, it will never be possible to predict or anticipate all of the possible consequences of introducing a change into our environment. We have yet to learn to be realistic about this. Our society must stop wasting its energy on recrimination and the search for scapegoats and bend all of its efforts in constructive directions.

Industry can act responsibly in its tampering with the environment—no one doubts that—but the task of government is to enact that kind of legislation which will help to ensure that good corporate citizenship is the rule rather than the exception.

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in this debate at a time when our country is faced with such a high rate of unemployment, the highest taxes in our history, I am sure it would be of small consolation to the thousands of unemployed for me to point out that the first indication that such a high rate of unemployment may have been in the offing was and has been strenuously objected to by the official opposition. I am referring, of course, to a period when the then minister of finance and the present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) said that this government was prepared to put some slack into the economy to fight inflation.

This practice appears to have become a way of life with this government, Mr. Speaker. At the present time they are even telling the farmers not to grow wheat. I can assure them that this policy, coupled with the reduction in wheat sales, has certainly brought the western economy to a standstill. I am sure all of us are wondering if the government is still looking for a little more slack to put into the farm economy.

Another aspect of the economic picture of Canada is the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) endeavouring to convince Canadians that there is no increase in the rate of tax projected for the next fiscal year. Mr. Speaker, this is utter nonsense in the light of the fact that for the next fiscal year he has forecast an unpredictable increase in the cost of living. With the inflation we are experiencing incomes will increase, so it means that many Canadians will not only be paying higher taxes but will be paying a higher rate of tax, having gotten into a high tax bracket, notwithstanding the fact that in real terms their incomes may even have declined. I do not intend to speak about the tax proposals in the government's white paper except to say "amen" if these proposals are ever implemented as presently outlined. In relation to putting slack into the economy by means of cutbacks, the inconsistency of the government's proposals is quite evident for anyone to see.

The government is talking of austerity programs across the nation. Business, labour and industry are being asked to hold the line, yet we see in the government's own little preserve an unlimited increase in expenditures. There are many things at which we can look. I have made many criticisms in this respect. I am sure that Canadians are wondering just how long this type of policy can continue. How long are Canadians going to be prepared to co-operate in holding the line when the government is spending in such a manner?

There is the matter of the expenses of the regional desks across the country. I do not have these figures on hand, but I am sure if they were examined it would be seen that a great deal of the taxpayers' money is being spent on these regional desks. We have yet to find out what value they have. In the opinion of most members of the opposition, Information Canada, which was set up recently by the government, is nothing but a propaganda institution. It will involve considerable expenditure.

With regard to ministerial staff assistants, one need only look at the increases which have occurred in the staffs of most of the ministers to realize the tremendous expenditure involved as far as this new policy of the government is concerned. Getting closer to home as far as the government is concerned, there is the outlandish increase in the staff of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). This has been mentioned in the House before. Many questions have been asked, and some have been answered. Just recently Canadians learned that the staff of the Prime Minister consists of 75 members with a total salary in the neighbourhood of $821,000 a year.

All session the opposition have been questioning the increasing size and cost of the establishment. From time to time different opposition members have asked for precise figures. Because the Prime Minister specifically exempted his staff from the cutbacks imposed on other sections of the government by the austerity program, the figures each time have differed, routinely increasing. In 1960 the cost of the staff of former Prime Minister John Diefenbaker was approximately $50,000. The cost was the same when he assumed this office in 1957. One of the first things he did was to ask for the staff establishment of former Prime Minister Louis St. Laurent. The cost of Mr. St. Laurent's staff was $50,000. The cost of Mr. Pearson's staff ran in the neighbourhood of $75,000 until near the end of his regime when there were some sharp increases. However, this is a far cry from the $821,000 annually which is now being spent by the Prime Minister to staff his office.

I wonder how long Canadians will be prepared to accept the request of the government to keep expenditures under control in an endeavour to fight inflation? I have mentioned just a few places where I feel the government is unnecessarily spending money, while at the same time asking Canadians in general to hold the line. This type of money is available. Apparently there is some good news in the announcements being made with regard to incentive grants and special area grants. I wish to make a few suggestions to the government as to where some very much needed expenditures could be made, expenditures which I am sure would greatly assist the economy in some of the underdeveloped areas.

I understand, Mr. Speaker, that many communities in northern Alberta, in northern parts of other provinces and in the Northwest Territories, are currently submitting briefs to the government through the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development in relation to plans for opening up that part of the country. The town of Fort Smith has submitted a brief bringing to the attention of the committee the desirability of developing and constructing roads into many areas in the northern part of Alberta and the Northwest Territories. This particular brief points out that within 20 years the town of Fort McMurray will be a city of some 30,000 people or more and that it will be the logical service centre of the eastern Arctic. The report mentions that this town is approximately 850 miles from Baker Lake, an inland harbour on Hudson Bay, and 750 miles from Bathurst Inlet a reportedly excellent harbour on the Arctic Ocean. They put forth a very strong case. I congratulate them on their efforts and wish them the best of success. However, these facts immediately suggest to me the necessity for the provision of transportation facilities, either by highway or railway or both. Huge sums of money would be required to provide what is felt to be a very desirable outlet to the sea. One cannot deny the desirability and necessity of such measures.

I wish to point out that neither of the two proposed harbours have been developed and that development would entail huge expenditures. I suggest to the government and this House that Canada already has a northern outlet to the sea from Western Canada in a developed port at Churchill where many millions of dollars have already been spent on providing wharfage, loading and unloading equipment and a Canadian National Railways connection. These moneys were spent over a period extending from 1929 to seven years ago. The port of Churchill is the logical gateway to the Arctic.

Although the port of Churchill is serviced by a railway, it has as yet no highway linking it with the rest of North America. A highway is of vital importance to the future development of port facilities which are presently available. When I speak of a highway to Churchill, I am not speaking in terms of 750 or 800 miles, but something in the neighbourhood of 250 miles. I, therefore, appeal to the government that before any extensive planning is done with respect to opening other harbour facilities immediate action be taken to further develop and utilize the facilities at Churchill which have proven to provide savings to those who have used them.

The extension of the highway from Thompson, Manitoba to Churchill, would not only pay for itself in a few years but it would open up a unique tourist attraction in North America. Canadians, particularly residents of Manitoba, are worried because residents of Churchill are so frustrated at this time that they are requesting the relocation of the provincial boundaries so as to allow their area to be included in the Northwest Territories. As I have said to the townspeople on many occasions, it would be in very bad taste for me, as one who is not a resident of Churchill, to suggest what they should do in this respect. But it is very easy for me to understand their frustration, as it would be easy for anyone who is familiar with the situation there to do so. It is easy to understand that they should be inclined to take measures of this nature and withdraw from Manitoba. As a Manitoban, I would regret this move very much and I hope that steps can be taken in the near future through co-operation with the federal and provincial governments to make a greater use of this port. Highway construction would enable this to take place.

I have criticized the government strongly for not including Churchill as a special area under the new legislation. Everyone who visits this location realizes that if there is an area in Canada which deserves consideration under this new program it is the townsite of Churchill. Among the things which have been asked for in recent years are the following: increased wheat exports from the port; a longer shipping season; increased port development; an extension of the period covered by marine and cargo insurance; increased icebreaker assistance and additional grain galleries. All these things have been requested many times by representatives of the area and by interested groups in Saskatchewan and Alberta, as well as by officials and executives of the Hudson Bay Route Association. Most of the items I have mentioned are definitely a federal responsibility. Although the townsite is within the province of Manitoba, federal responsibility for its development has been recognized in the past as being in the neighbourhood of 75 per cent. In the last seven or eight years, however, very little, if anything, has been done. I should like to commend the government, however, on the measure which was undertaken last year to provide money for a partial sewer and water system for the townsite.

Several years ago, during an election campaign the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Laing) was reported as saying on many occasions in Churchill that this was only a beginning, and that there would be much greater development in Churchill. Nothing has happened since then and there is no indication that anything is likely to happen. I have consistently asked the Minister of Public Works whether he had any news with regard to further developments. The answer he gave was either "no comment" or the statement that it would depend entirely on the amount of co-operation the federal government received from the government of Manitoba. It is no wonder that the people of Churchill are asking to be included in the Northwest Territories.

I believe that a key factor in achieving larger wheat exports from Churchill would be for the Wheat Board to advertise that more grain was available out of that port. The Board has always argued that exports out of Churchill have remained steady for many years because the wheat moved from the port was mainly intended for the European market, and for the British market, and that the shipping season coincided with a period in which some of those countries were in the middle of their own harvest. For these reasons, they argued, sales were of necessity limited to some 23 million bushels. It is strange, however, that each year the Board should advertise that there are some 23 million bushels of wheat to be exported from Churchill and that each year this amount is snapped up quickly by interested purchasers. I challenge the Wheat Board to advertise during the balance of this year and early next year that 30 million bushels will be available out of Churchill. If they make this well known to the grain trade I am sure the amount exported from Churchill can be increased to that figure.

I realize we are in a period of inflation and I may be asked why I would suggest that money be spent at such a time in any part of Canada. Nevertheless, I should like to draw attention to some of the mistakes which have been made in relation to the program which the government is presently operating. One of these is the special areas program. I am not criticizing this program, though the time is long overdue when the government should have initiated a program of this nature. However, when the minister announced the program on March 11, I believe it was, he mentioned the areas in Canada that would be included within the program. As far as Manitoba was concerned, he said the program related to an area around The Pas. I can assure the House that the residents of that area are gratified to know that some $2.2 million is going to be spent at The Pas. Of this $2.2 million, I understand some $1.7 million is in the form of grants and $505,000 is in the form of loans.

Most of the money is going to be spent in the centre of The Pas itself. However, I am glad to see that $500,000 will be spent in the area of The Pas reserve. I do not know, and I have been unable to find out, who determines where money is to be spent under this special areas program.

Mr. Bell: That is a good question.

Mr. Simpson: I asked the minister the question on several occasions. The first answers I got were that the government cannot determine this until the agreements have been signed by the provinces. The minister kept announcing different aspects of the program, and when I asked him which provinces had signed agreements he continued to say that no agreements had been signed as yet. I now understand that agreements have been approved. Whether or not the province of Manitoba has signed, I am not sure. But I have yet to find out who decides just where this money is going to be spent. I understand that The Pas town council, and I suppose many of the residents, are quite satisfied with the way the money has been distributed among the different projects within The Pas and the Indian reserve.

However, there are three other settlements adjacent to The Pas which apparently are being left out in the cold. These are Métis settlements. Not too long ago the government of Canada announced that it was going to embark upon a program of Métis housing in co-operation with the various provinces, again something that has been long overdue and which I congratulate the government for starting. If there is any group of people in Canada that is in dire need of housing, it is many of the Métis people who are living in small settlements.

We see at The Pas, the only area in Manitoba that has been considered under the special areas program, a situation where the town and the Indian reserve will receive grants, but three Métis settlements, the furthest one being only four miles out of town, are left out in the cold. These three settlements are Young's Point, Umpherville and Big Eddy. The odd thing is that at Young's Point five houses out of a total of 50 houses built for the Métis people in Manitoba were constructed last year to fill a long overdue need, but no sewer and water facilities have been provided. Yet four miles away we have $2 million being spent under the federal government special projects program. It is hoped that additional houses will be built next year, though these too will not be serviced by sewers and water.

I think this situation is ridiculous. Five houses were built at the Métis settlement of Big Eddy, and again there will be no sewers or water. When representatives of these people met with the town authorities at The Pas, with the Premier of the province and others, they came away from the meeting with the answer that no provision was made for them in the special area grants. I think this sort of thing is false economy. The federal government is giving this money to the provinces. If the provinces are deciding how the money shall be spent, then I think the federal government should take a second look to make sure that their contribution is being spent economically and wisely.

This may not seem important to the House, but these three small Métis communities adjacent to The Pas are faced with a situation whereby they will have to go to the province next year and in future years to request that they be considered for the new program of Métis housing. They may be provided with a few houses in due course, but I feel money should now be made available for them under the special areas program. When new houses are built sewers and water should be supplied to enable these people to enjoy the amenities of life along with other Canadians. It is bad enough having people living in slum conditions in these areas, without having new houses built at a slow pace with no sewer and water facilities.

I have other criticisms of this special areas program, but before I refer to them I should like to congratulate the provinces of Newfoundland and New Brunswick on the agreements that have been signed with the federal government in relation to this particular project. I have mentioned that only one area of Manitoba benefits to the tune of $2.2 million. The latest information, released today, is that an agreement has been signed between the federal government and the government of New Brunswick under the special areas program covering the amount of $62 million. Again wonder whether this is further evidence of the neglect of western Canada.

I notice that the federal funds committed for the present fiscal year to March 31, 1971, comprise $22.7 million in grants and $9.8 million in loans, and the remainder of the $62 million covering work to be completed by June, 1972, consists of a ceiling for additional federal payments of $18.1 million in grants and $11.5 million in loans. The agreement covers projects in the special areas of Saint John and Moncton, together with highway construction in a number of other areas of the province.

I am sure that the people of New Brunswick will be very happy with this expenditure. As far as the $2.2 million to be spent in Manitoba is concerned, there is no stipulation to my knowledge that any of it will be spent on highway construction, which the federal government has always told me was the responsibility of the provincial government.

• (5:40 p.m.)

As I have said, for many years we have been pressing for a road to Churchill. This is a very desirable project. This could be an extension of the road from Thompson, Manitoba. I mentioned this matter during the past two sessions of Parliament. Every time I approached the federal authorities on this subject I was told that provincial roads are the responsibility of the particular province. As members know, at one time we had a very desirable program called the roads to resources program. Under this program the federal government co-operated with the provinces and provided financing in respect of roads that were necessary for the development of an area. The predecessor of this government, however, saw fit to discontinue that program. Since that time the western provinces particularly, and I suppose all provinces, have found it very difficult to even consider building the very necessary roads into their more remote northern areas.

If we are ever to develop the northern parts of our country—I am not referring only to the Northwest Territories and the Arctic area—we must have more co-operation and assistance on the part of the federal government. In respect of the special areas program I should also like to mention that an agreement has been reached between the federal government and the government of the province of Newfoundland wherein $82 million will be made available to that province under this program.

The moneys are to be spent in much the same way as they were spent in respect of the other program I mentioned. There is to be $31 million in grants and $10.2 million in loans up to March 31, 1971. The remainder of the work is to be completed by June 30, 1972, with provision for additional federal payments of $31 million in grants and $9.4 million in loans. If the province of Manitoba could become involved in an agreement such as this, I am sure many of the requests of the communities in the northern part of the province could be met quite easily and quickly.

I am wondering whether the arguments with New Brunswick and Newfoundland are handouts to provincial Liberal governments or a carrot to Quebec voters. This government, however, for some reason or another seems bound and determined to believe there is a line somewhere in Canada running from north to south. I do not know where that line is, but anything west of it receives very little attention.

Although there are a number of other matters I wished to bring to the attention of the House at this time, suffice it to say that the program of designated areas as opposed to the program of special areas has also not worked out in respect of the northern parts of the province. The designated areas program does not extend too far into the northern part of Manitoba. Again we have a situation in which it is very difficult to induce industry to come into a northern area. Industry seems to feel that such an area is too far away from the markets. This possibly is the reason the government has not extended these designated areas too far north within the province.

I wonder whether the government's economists have worked out the figures in order to determine just how much false economy would be involved in not extending these designated areas. The government is providing incentives for industry to locate in what are now rapidly growing urban areas. Immediately there is the problem of urban redevelopment and huge expenditures in order to provide the necessary services for these rapidly growing urban centres. Yet the government feels that the more isolated areas should not qualify as designated areas because industry may not be too anxious to go there because it might consider it to be too far from markets. I believe consideration should be given to a restructuring of the designated areas program so that industry would not only be given an incentive to build in these more isolated areas but would also be given an incentive in the form of an offset against the higher transportation costs involved in getting their goods to market.

We have all heard of a program which is being eagerly and interestingly watched by Canadians. I refer to the mid-Canada corridor program which was a brainchild of Mr. Richard Rohmer. I believe the federal government should co-operate in this program to the fullest extent. I do not know what, if any, representations Mr. Rohmer or the officials of the mid-Canada corridor project have made to the federal government for assistance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Simpson: I have just one more sentence, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Does the House give unanimous consent to the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Simpson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I believe the federal government has a wonderful opportunity to approach the people who are involved in the mid-Canada corridor program because I think this is a program which will go ahead on a continuing basis. I believe the federal government should approach these people on the basis that it is prepared to co-operate financially in an effort to see that some of the Indian, Eskimo and Métis people who have the capabilities are brought into the program on a consultative basis. I say the federal government should take this initiative because I doubt whether the budget in respect of the mid-Canada corridor program at the present time would allow for the hiring of such people. If the federal government were to take on the job of hiring such people to work on this program, I think it would be a good move because then I believe the native people in the area would feel they were a part of Canada's desire to open up and develop northern Canada.

• (5:50 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Romuald Rodrigue (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) on the way he fulfilled his duty of delivering his budget speech.

In his speech, he expressed his concern about the problems facing our country, more especially ever rising prices. He seemed most concerned about inflation which is getting worse and worse. As many economists and businessmen had done before him, he then urged Canadians, especially those in the low-income brackets, to spend their money wisely. He also asked provincial and municipal governments, as well as school boards, to postpone some of their projects.

Therefore, we are not the only ones who realize that the Canadian economy is having a hard time. Others had already predicted those troubles. However, when it comes to remedies, they do not dare accept them and claim, for all kinds of reasons, that they will not work out. Instead of calling upon the public on this occasion, the minister should have called upon those who control the country's economy and the officials whose responsibility it is to see that it functions properly.

In fact, who caused these problems which are now plaguing the population, that is increased prices, inflation, or what else? Would it not be more proper to call a spade a spade and just call that lack of purchasing power, lack of cash? Is it not the Canadian government which in the first place caused our present situation, that is to say the progressive rise of prices resulting to a great extent from the constant increase of interest rates and taxes over the past few years? The 11 per cent tax on building materials has contributed to, an abnormal increase of construction costs, which have indirectly eliminated any hope people in the lower-income bracket might have to eventually own their homes, a legitimate hope of all Canadian citizens.

On March 22, 1967, when the Parliament of Canada passed Bill C-222 abolishing the ceiling on interest rates, it contributed to speeding up the growth of inflation which has now been with us for several years. To justify the abolition of the ceiling on interest rates, it was claimed that leaving individuals or organizations to set their own rates would attract into Canada more capital for construction and industrial development. It was also claimed that this decision would draw more foreign capital for the development of our natural resources. Money is scarce, everyone agrees. However, there are still people asking where to look for funds and how to go about getting them.

Not more than 40 years ago, it was said that we had to have gold reserves to guarantee the currency, otherwise none would be available. Since then, we have not heard that old tune because it has been a long time since gold played any part in the domestic monetary system. It is still being used, but less and less so, to settle the operations of international trade. There again the need for changes was realized, because some thought has even been given to establishment of an accounting system to deal with international trade. New terms were found to make an impression on the people. Now we hear about gold-paper and special drawing rights.

[Mr. Rodrigue.]

There are still some people who pretend not to understand, who are offended when we ask the government to review social security allowances or to adjust them according to the cost of living index.

Moreover, the trade policy of the government has been very weak in the last few years. We accumulate surplusses in some economic sectors. Our grain and dairy products exports are decreasing and, as a result, farmers find themselves in an unfortunate financial situation.

In order to keep its foreign markets, the government must subsidize the sale of grain with public funds.

As for dairy products, the conditions are worse, because the Canadian Dairy Commission collects $1.25 per hundredweight on all non quota surplus production, which I feel is nonsense. The government policy concerning subsidies should be the same for all farm products.

Another field in which the government is delaying its decision, is that of the textile industry. In June 1969, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) promised the labour-management associations that he would publish a white paper on that industry. Briefs have been submitted by the Canadian Textile Institute and by the CNTU but it seems that nothing happens.

In the meantime, there are more layoffs in the textile factories in Beauce, especially at Saint-Georges. Other towns in Quebec, such as Saint-Jean, Saint-Hyacinthe, Drummondville, Magog, Valleyfield, Granby, Sherbrooke and even Cornwall, Ontario, have to face greater unemployment because of the lack of understanding of the government and of its delay in establishing a realistic policy for the textile and footwear industries.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is it the wish of the House that we call it six o'clock?

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair, to resume the same at eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

[Translation]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Rodrigue: Mr. Speaker, the textile and shoe industries are not the only ones which face problems in my riding. Ready-to-wear factories are experiencing a slack partly due to the flooding of our domestic markets with goods from countries where labour is cheap.

Work stoppages, as well as rising prices and tax increases have aggravated the feeling of insecurity and distress of the textile and shoe workers.

With its programs designed to create new employment, the government falls short of compensating for lost jobs in the farm, textile and shoe sectors.

In the last few years, through publicity, the people were led to believe that industry and trade could by themselves solve the problem created by the consumers' lack of purchasing power, while the true function of industry and commerce is to provide products and services.

When products and services are available, it is up to the government to see that the people have the necessary purchasing power to buy them. Therefore, money is not performing its true function, since in order to do this, it must circulate unencumbered and according to the country's capacity to produce goods and services, the need for which can be determined scientifically. I agree on that point, but I am certainly not in favour of making it scarce so that it may be considered miraculous. I suggest that must be taken into account, first of all by the government itself.

As a matter of fact who in recent years has made capital and money scarce if not the government through its numerous borrowings? In 1968 the federal government borrowed $5,264 million as compared to $3,284 million in 1967, which is an increase of $2 billion.

Since the beginning of the 28th Parliament, the government, with its majority, has passed bills to increase interest rates on loans to farmers, fishermen, veterans and students. Are such measures going to end the problems of these people? Are they such as to restrain inflation? No. These increased interest rates will be added to the cost of products, thus pushing prices up.

When advocating something, one must at least be logical. Why deny to low income people an increase in their welfare allowances when, not so long ago, the government approved wage increases to high ranking civil servants. In this connection, I would quote a press release from the prime minister's office to the effect that the recommendations made by the advisory group will come into force as early as January 1969. The new salaries, for the three levels of deputy minister, will range from $37,000 to $40,000 for deputy ministers in the third category, from $28,000 to $33,000 for deputy ministers in the first category. The maximum salaries for these three categories of civil servants stood at $31,000, $28,750, and $26,500, respectively.

It is true that capital is scarce and that the government itself is responsible for this situation. It is not enough to realize this, we must also find solutions. There is one national institution which could play that role—the Bank of Canada. Why should it not play the part for which it was established? If the government does not want to use it, there is only one other solution, and that is to cut down government expenditures. In my opinion, the first thing to do would be to reduce the budget for national defence. It is important that the government stops playing with the public funds by launching expensive experiments and manufacturing ever deadlier weapons which will likely be obsolete before they are used and which, for all practical purposes, are nothing but scrap metal for millionaires.

[English]

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, first the debate on the budget gives us an opportunity to look at the types of programs the government of Canada is offering the people of this country, and second it gives us an opportunity as individual Members of Parliament to offer alternatives to these programs that we think will be improvements on them. I see that the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Anderson) agrees with me thus far.

The budget outlines the government's priorities for its different policies and programs. It gives an idea of the basic direction in which the government is moving, and it gives a good outline of the types of ideas that the government thinks are best in order to solve the problems with which we are faced.

The Budget—Mr. Nystrom

The budget debate and the Speech from the Throne give members of Parliament an opportunity to ask important questions about the direction in which Canada is going. They give us a chance to look at our place in society, assess our values and decide our role in the world community as well as the closer question of the role of Parliament itself.

I came across many answers to these important questions whilst travelling throughout Saskatchewan during the last few weeks. People are frustrated with the way things are going in Canada, particularly on the problems of unemployment and poverty, and farmers who are being asked to take wheatland out of production are incensed.

Looking around the world we see that humanity has the potential to destroy itself through nuclear weapons, through pollution or even through overpopulation. We live in a world guided by international anarchy. More and more people are being alienated from the institution of Parliament. They are dissatisfied with its performance and are looking for alternatives.

I should like to deal with a number of things which I mentioned at the outset, Mr. Speaker. Firstly, people from all regions of this country should have a greater opportunity to derive the benefits of citizenship. Instead of waging war on poverty, the government is waging war on the poor. In their fight against inflation they have created unemployment, raised interest rates and have generally made things more difficult for the poor people and many average citizens of this country. Unemployment is now higher than it has been for a number of years. The figures for March show that 6.7 per cent of the Canadian work force is unemployed, representing 542,000 men and women. Many of these people have families to support, making this a very serious problem. I should like to compare the year 1967 with 1970. In March, 1967, 5.3 per cent of the work force was unemployed whilst today the figure is 6.7 per cent, a substantial increase.

The regional unemployment picture shows that in the Maritimes in 1967 unemployment was 10.6 per cent, and today the figure is 10.8 per cent. The 1967 figure for the province of Quebec was 7.2 per cent, and today it is 9.2 per cent. These figures may indicate one of the reasons why many people in Quebec are frustrated with the federal system and the type of programs offered to them. Even in industrialized Ontario the 1967 unemployment figure was 3.9 per cent, and today it is 4.6 per cent. In the Prairie provinces the figures show the region to be severely affected. In 1967 only 2.7 per cent of the work force was unemployed, but today the figure is 5.2 per cent.

Just the other day in this House the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was telling us that unemployment was not too severe. He used some seasonally adjusted figures to show that unemployment had decreased in some areas. But in March, 1967, the seasonally adjusted unemployment figure was 3.9 per cent of the work force of Canada, and last month, March, it was 5.1 per cent. This is a serious increase.

Considered in terms of the actual number of people out of work, the situation becomes rather startling. In the province of Quebec in October, 1969, 135,000 people were unemployed. In December the figure increased to 152,000 people and on March 21, 1970, the total was 206,000 people unemployed. When we break down the unemployment figure to see who is being affected, we find that unemployment is higher among people between the ages of 14 and 24 years of age. Out of a total of 540,000 unemployed, 216,000 people are between the ages of 14 and 24.

This clearly points out that the retraining facilities, the schools and the programs offered to people in this age group are not adequate. We must remember, too, that many in this group will drop out and not be seeking employment after a year or so, having gravitated to one of the subcultures prevalent in city life and thus not calculated in the statistics. Another factor is that in the month of April tens of thousands of university students and some graduate students will be seeking summer employment. They will face difficulties, particularly in the Maritime provinces, rural Quebec, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, because of the agricultural recession, unless they are willing to go outside their own province.

Another grave factor that we must face up to soon is the whole question of poverty in the country. This has been pointed out clearly and vividly by the Economic Council of Canada, which stated that 20 per cent of the population is living in poverty and another 20 per cent is living on the edge of poverty or at a subsistence level. What does this mean to the country, Mr. Speaker? First of all, it means lack of opportunity for better education and a better life. Poverty has many social and psychological effects and society is deprived of the contribution that could be made by these people if they were in better circumstances.

The cost to the country could be hundreds of millions of dollars each year because we are not doing as much as we should about poverty.

• (8:20 p.m.)

The poor people in this country are not only those who are unemployed or who because of some misfortune are on welfare. There are many workers in the cities and many farmers living on a subsistence or poverty wage. These people are living in this condition because they do not have the types of opportunities they should have. Yet three or four months ago the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) said these Canadians can live on $30 a week. It so happens, Mr. Speaker, that thousands of Canadians are living on less than $30 a week. The minister is not, nor are any other people in the government. However, many old age pensioners are living in conditions that are a disgrace.

Many of the people who laid the foundations and built this country are now being forced to live on incomes that are not equal to a subsistence wage or worse. This must be changed as quickly as possible. These people are being penalized by the government. The government is waging a war against the poor people of this country by putting a freeze on increases in pensions, by creating unemployment and higher interest rates as well as encouraging a wage freeze for the working people. These are just a few of the matters that are contributing to what I call a war against the poor.

The Prime Minister has told the old age pensioners that they cannot have an increase in their pensions because if they did they would not be joining the rest of the country in fighting inflation; they would be contributing to inflation in this country. This is what the Prime Minister said the day before he acquired a few extra people for his staff and before he went scuba-diving in the Caribbean. The people of the country are not going to accept this situation. There are basic contradictions in this policy which we must change as rapidly as possible because Canadians will not tolerate the government having values of this sort.

We have to grapple with many issues, one of which is the whole question of inflation. Inflation is bad in this country, but the cure for inflation that this government is proposing is even worse than the disease. It is widening the gap between the rich and the poor and widening regional and economic disparities in Canada. When the noted American economist John Kenneth Galbraith visited Ottawa last year, someone asked him what he thought of using the voluntary restraint method to fight inflation. He said, "You are not going to successfully fight inflation in this way. If you think you can, you are only fooling yourself; it is only nonsense." The Quebec Liberal leader, Robert Bourassa, is saying the same thing about the Liberal Party's policy to fight inflation.

To try to control inflation by voluntary restraint will not work. One reason is that there will be only limited co-operation from the Canadian public and corporations. Many small businessmen, farmers and other people in this country cannot afford to borrow money at high interest rates in order to expand their operations. These people are penalized because of this type of fight against inflation. The poor people will sink even further into poverty. Meanwhile the huge corporations, most of which are to blame in large part for the inflationary crisis, will be able to expand even faster than before. High interest rates do not affect them. They just reinvest their profits and go further and further ahead, faster than before. I am referring to companies such as General Motors, and Weston's and Safeways.

If we look at the profit figures of these corporations for the last year we see that they increased; in fact, they increased at a much faster rate than the average wage or pension of the old age citizens of this country. This type of approach only widens the economic gap: all the economic evidence points to this. Most economic experts, except some on the government side, are saying this as well. We have to change this approach because obviously it is not working.

If we are to control inflation, we have to get tougher. We have to instigate certain controls. We hate to go as far as instigating wage, profit and price controls in a centralized way. This must be coupled with economic planning which will benefit all Canadians, not just the privileged few. The important point to note is that most of the inflation in Canada is a direct result of the inflation in the United States. This has been said by the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister has said that the effect in fighting inflation will be very minute because most of our inflation problems in Canada are a result of what is happening in the United States. A large portion of the inflation in the United States is as a result of the war in Viet Nam. This war must end, for many reasons. If we are to have control over our economy and the type of priorities we want to set, it is obvious that we must repatriate our economy; we must control our own economy and our country.

I now wish to deal with the question of foreign ownership, which is a problem that this government has not yet faced. I realize the government is now going through the process of preparing a study or white paper on the question of foreign ownership. I hope this will be done as expeditiously as possible. We must face this important question immediately, otherwise it will be beyond our control. Canada is one of the few countries in the western world, if not the only country, that opens her doors to any country without limits and without any set of rules.

Today approximately two-thirds of our Canadian economy is foreign owned, mostly by corporations with headquarters in the United States. Of our manufacturing industry, 50 per cent is owned and controlled by the United States or by US corporations. Nearly 100 per cent of our automobile industry is owned or controlled by U.S. corporations. In the fields of mining, petroleum, natural gas and things of that sort American ownership is as high as 60 to 80 per cent. This is having many effects on Canada. It is eroding our political sovereignty and our ability to make decisions that affect the policies of Canada. It also has an effect on Canada's foreign policy. We have less and less influence and power abroad. We must start changing this situation immediately. There must be some kind of control or regulation on foreign investment in Canada. This is the only country in the western world that allows foreign ownership to come into our house and completely take over. It is something like the old tribal tradition in Africa years ago: when you met a friend you had not seen for a while, you invited him to dinner in your home and then let him spend the night with your wife. That is what is happening in Canada to-day with regard to foreign capital.

We are not doing all that we must in order to change Canadian society economically and socially. We must also reform our monetary and fiscal policies. There must be more social and economic planning. I also suggest in order to have more people on an equal basis we must not be afraid to have more public participation, involvement in and public ownership of the Canadian economy. These are only some of the things we must be doing in the area of foreign ownership if we are to take control of Canada's economy. We must tackle the very important issues which concern us each and every day.

There are a number of other matters with which I want to deal. Coming from the province of Saskatchewan, I must deal with the question of agriculture. Anyone who has travelled in western Canada or has spent some time on the Prairies knows that wheat farmers are facing a real problem. I do not have the figures immediately available, but I believe farm income fell by some 40 per cent in 1969 as compared with 1968, and that the income in 1968 was less than it had been a year previously. This situation affects not only farmers but the small businessman, the machine implement dealers and suppliers in every small town.

It also affects the working people. The average weekly wage has declined in the last few years; people have been getting out of the province. Unemployment rates are higher than they have been for many years and large numbers of working people have left for British Columbia or Ontario. Between April and October of last year some 1,800 people were moving out of Saskatchewan every month. This gives a clear picture of the economic circumstances which the province is facing. Saskatchewan does need help. The agricultural industry needs help. It needs an immediate injection of cash if some of the smaller farms and, indeed, some of the bigger farms are to be saved. If many farmers are to be saved from bankruptcy, $250 million is immediately needed.

The government should impose a moratorium on debts such as those of the Farm Credit Corporation. Many farmers will not be able to repay the debts they have accumulated over the past few years because failure to sell grain has left them without money. We must begin a new program designed to sell wheat, a new program of trade. These are a few of the things we should be doing in order to give the people of the Prairies a fair break.

In the election campaign of 1968 the Prime Minister campaigned on two main issues. One was the whole question of national unity and the other was the lessening of regional economic disparity. He campaigned on these issues and won the election largely because of his stand with regard to them. What has happened is ironic. It seems to me, looking across the country, that no Prime Minister has done more—

Mr. Cafik: You are right.

Mr. Nystrom: —to contribute to disunity in two years than has this Prime Minister.

An hon. Member: Right again.

Mr. Nystrom: The work of the B and B Commission is important. I am one of those who are going through the process of attempting to learn the French language. I wish more MP's would do so. But we are only fooling ourselves if we think that bilingualism and biculturalism alone will keep Canada together. They will not. They will not keep Quebec in Confederation; they will not keep the people of western Canada happy.

To keep Canada together as a nation we need social and economic reform—measures which will bring equal opportunity to everyone in this nation. A person living in the maritimes or in rural Quebec should have as good an opportunity as one living in Vancouver, Montreal or Toronto. All regions will have to be equal partners in Confederation if this country is to continue as one union until its 200th birthday. To find out whether or not the government's regional economic policies are working, all one has to do is travel about the country. They are not. This is one cause of the rising tide of separatism in Quebec. People are upset because unemployment has risen to 10 per cent and is still increasing. The federal government is showing no leadership.

Quebec is not the only province which is unhappy and alienated. Go out on the Prairies from farm to farm, from small town to small town. You will find widespread discontent. People are asking: Why has Ottawa forgotten about us? Why is the man who proclaimed national unity, a new approach in politics and a new deal bringing about unemployment on a scale we have not known in this country for so long? This is the threat to national unity. When people are desperate they will seek alternatives, any alternatives. They are ready to try almost anything because, they argue, nothing could be worse than the conditions they are facing.

This is where Parliament ought to come into the picture. I believe we ought to be more relevant to the issues confronting the people of Canada. We must chart a new course, get out where the people are and concern ourselves with the things the people are talking about and doing. If we fail, they will seek alternative arrangements and alternative means of solving their problems. Right here is the challenge confronting each and every one of us.

As a Parliament and as a nation we must examine our role in the international community. Canada is respected as a middle power and could probably be doing much more to lead the world toward a more stable international community. We ought to be reviewing our foreign policy, and moving as rapidly as possible toward such things as the recognition of communist China, supporting its claim to representation at the United Nations. We should strengthen the United Nations and work to make it a more meaningful international body, one with some measure of sovereignty and capacity to act.

We must do all these things quickly, because people today will not wait. They know we have the resources, that we have a rich country with an advanced technology. They are asking why, in these circumstances, 20 per cent of our people should be living in poverty. Why does unemployment have to be at such a high level? People are asking these questions, and we must move faster to find the answers if we want to keep this country together. I hope the government remembers this, no matter what happens in the Quebec election next Wednesday.

Mr. Judd Buchanan (London West): Mr. Speaker, my comments are somewhat in the nature of a pot-pourri, as there are several subjects on which I should like to make brief remarks. The first relates directly to the contents of the budget which we are discussing. I was most disappointed that some additional provision was not made for our needy senior citizens. In my remarks on the budget in the fall of 1968 I urged that the government give serious consideration to discontinuing the payment of the family allowances on the first and only child in each family and, instead, use the funds saved by this change to double the guaranteed income supplement which we pay to needy senior citizens.

This would ensure that all Canadians over the age of 65 would receive a minimum income of approximately $150 per month if single, or $300 per month if married. I would suggest that this is the minimum income needed for survival in today's society at any decent level. I believe strongly that we have a very great obligation to these senior citizens who worked and built this country throughout the depression years and the war years which followed, when pension plans were virtually unknown.

We are not rewarding our senior citizens properly for the services they have performed for Canada. I realize that we are all anticipating some changes in this area after the introduction of the government's white paper on social policy, but it might well be a year or more before we see any substantive legislation flowing from that document. Someone remarked the other day that inflation is a tax, and one which bears most heavily on those who can least afford it, our senior citizens. I feel strongly that we should be doing something to assist these people now, not a year and a half or two years from now.

Like many of my colleagues, I am looking forward to seeing the government's white paper on social policy. Like many, I share a feeling of malaise in that although we are spending billions of dollars to provide for the health and welfare of Canadians we are not, in all too many cases, really giving adequate assistance to those most in need of it. Because of the universal nature of so many of our programs, too much provision is made for those who really do not genuinely need it, and those who are in need are inadequately provided for.

I recently finished reading Ian Adam's "The Poverty Wall", and any concerned Canadian cannot help being depressed by the deprivation and grinding poverty in which five to six million Canadians live while the rest of us enjoy relative affluence. I would recommend this book to all members of this chamber to assist us in gaining a better perspective of the society in which we live. The stereotype of the welfare recipient is a healthy male, sprawled in an easy chair before a flickering television set and fondling a bottle of beer bought with his welfare money.

Mr. Benjamin: Like some of your constituents.

Mr. Buchanan: Maybe they are yours. It is this sort of stereotype, Mr. Speaker, which I believe has given too many Canadians a distorted view of the society in which we live.

The May-June issue of Canadian Welfare carried a study which had been carried out by Professor Steven Peitchinis at the University of Calgary. Even in the prosperous province of Alberta there were approximately 94,000 persons receiving some form of social assistance at the time of the study. In the area of Calgary, where the study concentrated, there were just under 19,000. Professor Peitchinis' profile of that group is revealing and it confirms what many social workers have been saying all along.

Why were these people dependent on welfare? Almost half, 45 per cent, were ill, incapacitated or unable to work because of age. Sole parents with children dependent on their care comprised 40 per cent of the sample. In the first draft of this study "sole" parents was spelled "soul"! However, it was corrected in the later version. The employed whose earnings were inadequate took up 10 per cent. Finally, those able to work but temporarily out of work for any reason numbered 10 per cent. This latter category includes those willing to work, at least temporarily, but unable to find a job. These findings would certainly seem to contradict the traditional image of those in receipt of social assistance.

Another area upon which I would like to comment concerns student loans. Loans are now provided for full-time students. Part-time students are denied these loans. Often part-time college students live in more genuine need than do full-time students. Frequently they are older than most of their colleagues, and they are almost never supported by wealthy families; indeed, that is why they are securing their degrees the hard way. Although they work to maintain themselves in school, many part-time students make only enough money to pay taxes and to support a wife and family but not enough to pay for tuition and books. They are classic examples of people reaching for betterment through higher education yet they are, if anything, discouraged from continuing studies that often take a decade to complete.

These are among the more enterprising members of our society. The government replies to their industry by ruling them ineligible for student awards. Frequently if sufficient funds were available the average, part-time student would accelerate his or her program to a full-time status. I would urge, Mr. Speaker, that the government look at this legislation and endeavour to make loan facilities available for the part-time student who is struggling to improve his condition as well as for the full-time student.

Almost one month ago the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) presented his proposed sports policy for Canadians in this House. That paper has my fullest support. This program may well reach millions of Canadians in more tangible ways than most government concepts do. Clearly the key to success of the sports policy will be money. The policy paper points out on page 44 that "we have a number of new projects to finance, and our budget level is the same as it has been for several years now." It was my suggestion in this House in November, 1968, that contributions to amateur sport be brought within the definition of charitable donation and made tax deductible. I urged that the appropriate section of the Income Tax Act be altered as quickly as possible. Much to my amazement, it was not done.

I am, however, gratified to learn that the proposed sports policy attaches a priority to this proposal, and that the federal departments involved are being consulted about "the formulation of an additional charitable tax deduction clause for donations towards a furtherance of sport and recreation in Canada." I believe that granting tax relief on donations to sport will spur contributions to individual sports groups and will enable sports in Canada to focus its limited resources more effectively. I would urge that the charitable deductibility clauses not be as restrictive as is suggested in the white paper on tax reform, which proposes that national amateur athletic associations only be added to the list of eligible charitable organizations. I believe that many local organizations are deserving of the same treatment and support.

A perceptive individual remarked that man is a peculiarly constructed animal who cannot read the handwriting on the wall until he has his back to it. That is precisely the position in which man finds himself today with the world population explosion. We live on a smallish planet with a strictly limited supply of everything, including air, water and places in which to dump sewage. There is no conceivable way in which it can be made bigger. Yet we are adding 180,000 people to the globe's humanity each and every day. We are now at more than three billion, and within 30 years it is estimated that we will have over seven billion people on the face of this earth. The figures into the twenty-first century are staggering. However, they are academic since this gross overcrowding will not come about; it will be solved by mass starvation, war or family planning. Hopefully, thoughtful, concerned humans will opt for the third alternative.

I realize this is a difficult area for many people from the point of view of conscience, but I would like to urge a couple of minimal steps. The first involves research only. Canada could perform unique service to international research in population control and family planning, a field which has not been thoroughly explored. This should be a top priority item on the agenda of our new International Development Research Centre.

The second method in which Canada could assist is by providing money for the existing multilateral funds—the International Planned Parenthood Federation and the United Nations Fund for Population Activities. These are not organizations which try and foist family planning on anyone or any nation. They are responsive in nature; they meet requests from countries which seek their assistance—developing countries which are becoming more and more alarmed as they see minimal economic progress vanishing under the impact of burgeoning populations. I would strongly urge on our government action in these two areas. I am afraid that if we do not, by default we will have to share the responsibility for uncontrolled population growth which will impair individual rights, jeopardize national goals throughout the world and threaten international stability.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would urge that our government take immediate steps to increase the guaranteed income supplement for senior Canadians and, if required, make adjustments in the present family allowance payments to compensate for this outlay. I believe that the act and regulations providing loans to university students should be amended to permit needy part-time students to receive assistance as well. We should allow donations to organizations sponsoring amateur sport to be tax deductible. I am convinced that they have as legitimate a claim to tax deductibility as some of the organizations and groups which currently enjoy this status.

In addition, it is my understanding that recent studies have indicated young people who are actively involved in sports are far less likely to become involved with drugs and drug addiction. By encouraging the financing of amateur sports we would not only be improving the health of Canadians but would be helping to solve another major problem facing our country. Finally—and this is significant for the long-run survival of mankind—I would urge that the government take immediately the minimal steps I discussed earlier to assist the International Development Research Centre and the UN organizations involved with population research and planning.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, after a period of two years in which this government has been in office it would seem it is time we looked at ourselves in Canada to decide where we are going and where we are at, as some people say. It seems to me that society in Canada can no longer be accurately called the just society, but rather the controlled society. While I have heard some people refer to the present government as being comparable with the government of Louis XIV of France, I could not possibly agree with this because, authoritarian as that government might have been, at least it did accomplish something for the European continent. I would much rather compare the government with that of Louis XV, because the antics of some of the members of this government much more resemble the age of Louis XV in which very little was accomplished other than a great deal of travel and pleasure.

It is very evident that the government seems to have some sort of scheme or plan, as is sometimes said, about what is to be done with our society and our country, while very little attention seems to be paid to the increasing cost of living with its consequent hardship on those with fixed incomes and while very little is done to deal with our financial and other problems except an attempt to cause panic and confusion by the so-called proposals in the white paper and the consequent drawing in of the horns of all business oraganizations.

Nevertheless, the government found plenty of time to present legislation in the last two years, some of which unfortunately has been passed by this House, which had little to do with the urgent critical problems but which had something to do with some more distant and perhaps not so distant schemes. I refer to the attempt by this government to put the lid on all criticism of the government whether in this House or outside it. After all, it is an attempt to perpetuate itself in office.

I have often heard the party which forms this government characterized as the three "p's"—power, patronage and perpetuity. It is the last of these three adjectives with which I wish to deal this evening. I should like to refer to the debate held in this House last Tuesday in which we dealt with the attempt by two senior ministers of the government to muzzle the Auditor General. This, of course, is a culmination of the government's efforts to muzzle Parliament and suppress criticism outside Parliament.

[Mr. Buchanan.]

The first and most effective step in this regard when the present government came into office was to remove from this House control over government spending. After all, this was the original object of Parliament from the time of King John. In those days Parliament was designed to check the king's power to raise money and to have some say concerning how he spent it. This power was removed from this House over a year ago. Normally in this House we had the right to speak on the spending estimates of the government. These estimates have now all been removed to the committees on the pretext that they will receive more detailed study there.

We know what has happened. With so many committees meeting, the press—which of course is the opposition's only weapon—is unable to distribute itself around sufficiently to cover the discussion of the estimates. The approach of this government was to say that we can discuss the spending proposals and policies as much as we like, but that we must be finished by late May and if we have not finished by then we have no power to do anything about it. In the days prior to the introduction of these rules the opposition, in an emergency, had some control over the government through the discussion of the estimates and supplementary estimates because the procedure of closure for all practical purposes was unworkable. Therefore, the opposition had some control. That, however, no longer is the case.

As the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said at that time, they baited the trap and the opposition fell for it. I must admit that the Prime Minister was very right, because, a smokescreen having been raised in respect of the so-called rule 75C, the real danger was slipped through the House in the form of the removal of the control over government spending. That was the first stop. A number of things have happened since then. We had the hate bill. No one will quarrel with the first part of this bill in respect of genocide, and we need not discuss the second part. The third section resembles the procedure of the Torquemada in the days of the Spanish Inquisition. I refer, of course, to the fact that if someone should think you might have some political propaganda at election time, they could go to a judge and present a statutory declaration in respect of hate propaganda, a warrant to seize the literature would be issued and then seven days later you would have a right to defend yourself. If this does not resemble sixteenth century Spain, I do not know what does.

Then we have Information Canada. This is the next step. It is a new step. It is said that this is being done in order to save money by avoiding the duplication involved in various departments putting out information concerning what the government is doing. It all sounds lovely, sort of Pollyanna. Then what do we find? We find that Jean-Louis Gagnon, who according to "Who's Who" is a former head of the Liberal propaganda agency in the province of Quebec, is in charge. One can hardly blame people for being a little suspicious of this agency under the circumstances.

Then we have the new CRTC regulations concerning Canadian content. It is like being against motherhood, or something, to be against this. It sounds lovely. But it is only necessary to look at it a little to see what happens.

Mr. Cafik: What do you know about motherhood?

Mr. Nesbitt: Suppose a small radio station should be on the borderline in respect of Canadian content. Then the Gestapo, if we want to put it that way, or the CRTC could go to this station and say, "You are coming up for a new licence in a few months. You are pretty close to the line, but we have a number of clips or tapes from Information Canada, and if you want to get in good with the board you can play these government information clips; that is how you can get along". This is the situation.

Any one of these things by themselves might be fairly bad, but one could probably live with them. However, when they are put together it is not difficult to imagine what the result can be. The scheme of government control over information does not end there. We have Bill C-197 which will be up for discussion again. This is an agricultural bill. It is a nice thing. It sounds lovely on the surface. It would appear that the farmers are to control marketing as has been done so successfully in the provinces. Many people think that is what this is all about. But what is the situation? Here we are to have boards, not composed of people elected by the producers but of people appointed by the cabinet. That is the situation. The cabinet will decide everything that happens from the day the seed is planted until it is grown. The agricultural producers have no say whatsoever. It sounds something similar to what Khrushchev did in the Ukraine back in the 1920's. That is how it is.

There are other things one could refer to, to show what has been flagrantly done to control or interfere with the politics of the provinces. We have two faltering governments in two provinces governed by provincial Liberal governments; one is Newfoundland under the leadership of Mr. Smallwood, and the other New Brunswick; and today we heard the announcement that $62 million would go to New Brunswick, to help out, and $82 million to Newfoundland. Of course, that is very helpful to those governments which are in some trouble, as I understand they are, but it is hardly fair to the people of western Canada who are in pretty desperate straits these days. The government just seems to hold out no hope to western Canadians.

An hon. Member: How about the heavy water plant?

Mr. Nesbitt: I do not know why this should cause anybody much surprise, Mr. Speaker, because the present Prime Minister arranged the blueprint of this long ago, as anyone can see who takes the trouble to read it. Back in 1961 the past president of the NDP, Professor Michael Oliver, published a book called "Social Purpose for Canada". I will not deal with details; anyone can get it out of the library and read it. Anyone reading it will see that circumstances at present are unfolding just as set out in Mr. Trudeau's essay in that book. Someone reading it might call it "Mein Kampf." I would not call it that; the Prime Minister has a much more literary style than the author of that book. I suggest that you could compare the author to a sixteenth century Renaissance author of a book on political science called "The Prince". This one might be called "The Canadian Prince." Everything is laid out in it. There is another little matter I should like to deal with which relates to what I have just said.

An hon. Member: Go ahead; you have our permission.

Mr. Nesbitt: Recent trends in the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation particularly in news and public affairs programs, certainly give me some cause for concern and create some cause for alarm. I listen constantly to the CBC and many of the programs of that organization are very good—outside of the public affairs programs. I have been listening to comments on the provincial elections at present being held in Prince Edward Island and Quebec. Nobody by the greatest stretch of the imagination could call these programs that come on at eight o'clock in the morning under the heading of news and "Preview Commentary", and deal with so-called free interpretation of the news, anything but outright propaganda. These trends in the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation are particularly ominous, Mr. Speaker, because the CBC has a long and odious record of expertise in propaganda, distortion and outright lying in the so-called news and public affairs programs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Don't be so kind.

Mr. Nesbitt: I am just listening to my friends on my left. They used to have a proprietary right in that organization, almost.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nesbitt: As they say, Mr. Speaker, those were the days. But things are changing.

An hon. Member: At least we were intelligent.

Mr. Nesbitt: My hon. friend from Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) is making some remarks behind me. We used to hear the "independent" views of Michael Oliver, a professor of political science at McGill. Finally, even after he was made president of the NDP, it turned out that he was still being described as a nice little professor of political science. I wonder what would have been said from that quarter if the president of the Liberal Association or the Conservative Association had appeared in a similar capacity.

In any event, may I briefly now refer to a speech by a very eminent man who was a member of this House and a former parliametary secretary to a Prime Minister of Canada. I am speaking of the former hon. member for Leeds, Mr. John Matheson, who now is an eminent judge. Mr. Matheson made a speech to the Canadian Club at Winnipeg on Thursday, December 8, 1966. He spoke about the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. May I quote one or two excerpts from that speech. He was talking about CBC program and had this to say:

> A series of programs seemingly calculated to rake the French-English issue, included six interviews on the subject with four separatists and two English speaking Quebeckers, reacting with emotion. In addition some 12 French Canadians were hot-seated, pilloried, mocked or their comments distorted.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

These, of course, were the days probably when Mr. René Lévesque, that great advocate of Canadian unity, was one of the leading spokesmen on the French network of the CBC. Despite complaints, he kept appearing just the same as a purveyor of the idea of national unity. On page 6 of Mr. Matheson's speech the subject of drugs is dealt with. Incidentally, because of the position he occupied Mr. Matheson had plenty of opportunity to have his remarks well documented and researched. I find them very helpful. This is what he said about the question of drugs:

> Two major programs stressed the delights of drug taking, glue sniffing and LSD, without adequately portraying the serious dangers.
> Some 80 items touched on American subjects or on the U.S.A. itself. 62 were either overtly anti-American or played on U.S. problem and ills. 16 items dealt with the Viet Nam war.

And so on. Lower down on the same page Mr. Matheson had this to say about programs on communism:

> On 14 programs communism was given sympathetic treatment. Not once in two years was there any substantial criticism of a communist country or of communist philosophy.

An hon. Member: What about the communist conspiracy?

Mr. Nesbitt: That's right. Just wait; I have a few more comments to make. I cannot help hearing the remarks of my friends on my left. I ask any of them to provide me with one bit of information by which they can show me that the foreign policy of the CCF or NDP at any time has varied one iota from that of the Kremlin.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nesbitt: Another matter raised on page 7 of Mr. Matheson's speech is the following:

> An estimated 69 items dealt with government institutions, parties or personalities—10 only from a favourable viewpoint. 48 were critical, undercutting institutions of government and/or satirically critical of members of the Liberal, Conservative, Social Credit and Creditiste parties.

An hon. Member: Hooray!

Mr. Nesbitt: Having read these remarks, may I now refer to another little item—I must watch my time, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: We're watching you.

Mr. Nesbitt: May I now deal with a little matter that relates to the credentials of spokesmen of the CBC, because I submit that on occasion over the year they have been outright falsified. I have a little notation in my hand dated February 7, 1961, dealing with Mr. Arnold Beichman.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nesbitt: I guess they know who he is; I am referring to my friends to the left over there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nesbitt: The notation is to the following effect. In October, 1960, the CBC's Toronto office decided to do a television broadcast concerning the Canadian delegation and Canada's role at the United Nations. May I point out that there was an excellent CBC correspondent at the United Nations, namely Mr. Stanley Burke. But he was in no way consulted. A producer in Toronto by the name of Clifford Solway went to New York from Toronto and hired Mr. Arnold Beichman to do the telecast. Mr. Beichman was introduced as a "special correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor". I did not see the telecast since I was in New York, but I heard a great deal about it and the content was apparently highly inaccurate and very derogatory with respect to the role of Canada and the Canadian delegation at the United Nations. Since the impression was given that Mr. Beichman was the United Nations correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor, naturally a great many people took Mr. Beichman's remarks very seriously indeed.

• (9:10 p.m.)

The Globe and Mail published a prominent editorial concerning Mr. Beichman's remarks on October 27 last. As a matter of fact, the editorial noted that Mr. Beichman's remarks should be carefully considered because of the very important newspaper that he represented. The fact is that Mr. Beichman did not represent the Christian Science Monitor at the United Nations or anywhere else. He was accredited to the United Nations as correspondent for the AF of L-CIO News, and as far as I could discover he was unknown to the United Nations' press gallery.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman) on a question of privilege.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker, in case the hon. member's pronunciation is leading to any delusion in the House, I just want to say I am not with the Christian Science Monitor or the AF of L, or any of those things. I am just the Member of Parliament for Vancouver Quadra.

Mr. Nesbitt: I have no intention of referring to the hon. member as otherwise. Now, Mr. Speaker, this matter was drawn to the attention of the CBC. But a couple of weeks later they had an advertisement in the Globe and Mail for a discussion on anti-American feeling in Canada, in which would take part Mr. Arnold Beichman of the Christian Science Monitor. Of course, there could be no mistake then. In 1968 I got a telephone call from the CBC at my office in Woodstock. They wanted me to take part in a panel discussion on Canada-U.S. relations at the Couchiching conference. I inquired who would be taking part and there were several people mentioned, including Mr. Pearson, the former Prime Minister. Then they said, "We have a wonderful man, Mr. Arnold Beichman, United Nations correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor." I will not say here what I said over the telephone, but I should have been smarter, Mr. Speaker. I should have said, "Oh, yes," gone there, and done the unveiling on television, but I missed out.

Why is this man being chosen all the time for television appearances? Either he has friends in the CBC, which is quite likely, or he sets out a viewpoint which is sympathetic to the viewpoint of those in charge of CBC public affairs programs. I could mention many more. I have already mentioned Mr. Levesque. To indicate how good the CBC is with propaganda, there are these relentless attacks on the United States of America. Nobody objects to their countries being criticized, including friendly countries, but no other country is the subject of these attacks day in and day out except the United States of America.

I mentioned this in the House previously and I got a nasty letter from Mr. Fraser, the vice-president of the CBC at the time. I told him that if he could show me one program that was even neutral to the United States I would be glad to withdraw my remarks, but I heard nothing more about that. I have heard programs broadcast by Radio Moscow about the United States which were moderate compared with CBC programs.

One good example recently of such a CBC program was a telecast showing the horrors of the Viet Nam war and the terrible things the Americans were doing. All of us know that wars are pretty tough things, and some of us have served in wartime. We know that if people want to take pictures of bad things they can take plenty of them. This show had a particularly atrocious picture of a small child, burned black, on the steps of a public building. However, Mr. Speaker, I have a pretty good memory. That picture was on the cover of Life magazine in 1940, showing the bombing of Chunking.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nystrom: Does that justify the war?

Mr. Nesbitt: There is that junior Pollyanna from the west back there again. The only possible conclusion that any reasonable person could draw from the activities of the CBC is that those in charge of public affairs broadcasts in the CBC are, to say the least, sympathetic to the policies of the Soviet Union and China. This was virtually admitted by the president of the CBC when not long ago Mr. Michael McClear was in North Viet Nam for an exclusive assignment there, the first person from the western side allowed into North Viet Nam to do such a show, and Mr. Davidson said he was sent there because he had friends and associates in the North Vietnamese government. No one objects to communist propaganda on the CBC or anywhere else provided that occasionally there is some other kind of propaganda presented, but when you get only one side of the picture day in and day out it becomes too much.

I do not see why a handful of dedicated propagandists in the CBC should be permitted to use public facilities to promote their economic, social and political policies to the exclusion of all other policies. That is all that goes on, and we are paying for it. Not long ago the president of the CBC at a policy conference at Niagara Falls, where the presidents of the various media were invited to speak, was asked about the presentation of these views. I was surprised that the president of the CBC, for whom ordinarily I have a great regard, replied with the fatuous remark, "We don't look into the background of people we hire to do our public affairs broadcasts." Nobody expects that he should, but when he finds only one side of a controversy being presented day in and day out, we expect him to check into it and say that the public want to hear more than one side of the controversy.

Many people employed in the CBC are rather distinctive in their social attitudes and the like. That is their business. It concerns nobody else and they are entitled to their private views, but when they bring these to work with them and try to mould everybody in Canada to the same image, that is a different kettle of fish. This attitude of the president of the CBC becomes somewhat alarming because of recent trends in the CBC. I have mentioned the question of the recent provincial elections. It was brought to my attention that one of the directors of the public affairs programs has a pretty close association with the government party. He arrived in the CBC not too long ago. He had been president of the Young Liberals at university. He ran the election campaign for one of the Liberal candidates in 1965. I am informed he was at Liberal headquarters for some time afterwards. Suddenly he becomes public affairs director of the CBC. I do not propose dealing with names—that is not fair—but if anybody would like to know the name privately afterwards, I would be glad to tell him.

This fits in with all the things I mentioned earlier, with this attempt at thought control. My time is running short, Mr. Speaker, so I have to curtail my remarks, but I say that the government's theory of communication is another disturbing thing. As applied to the Post Office, the government holds that it must pay its own way and never mind service to the public. That is one form of communication. But what is sauce for the goose, the Post Office, is not necessarily sauce for the gander, the CBC. This is because you cannot do much propaganda via the Post Office, or promote thought control, but you sure as heck can through the CBC. So the taxpayers have to put up $165 million a year to pay for that.

It was brought out, only today, by the president of the CTV that CBC advertising rates are so low that private broadcasters cannot compete with them. So, we are now using taxpayers' money to put private organizations out of business, and there is to be only one method of public information, or thought control, left in the country. All this makes a person pretty worried about the CBC, and there is certainly no question of the government attempting to save money on the CBC. We are told that everybody has to cut down and pare away expenses, and that every department has to lay off civil servants, and the like. But there is no thought of cutting down the expenses of the Prime Minister's office. Obviously most of the people there are taken on for public relations purposes. Nor is there any thought of cutting down CBC expenses; they are throwing money around just like it was going out of style. All sorts of testimony has been presented before various committees of this House, and also outside, of the extravagance of that organization but nothing has ever been done about it.

• (9:20 p.m.)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is there unanimous consent that the hon. member continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nesbitt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the courtesy of the House, but I know there are other members who wish to speak. I have virtually completed my remarks, in any event.

Mr. Allen B. Sulatycky (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to take very long but I should like to go back to the earlier stages of this long drawn-out budget debate. Several weeks ago when the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) presented his budget, he came in for a great deal of criticism. The budget was criticized because it made no provision for the old age pensioners, and it is with this aspect that I wish to deal.

It seems that in the last few days of the budget debate speakers have strayed from the direction in which the debate started. As you will recall, Mr. Speaker, a couple of amendments centered on the absence of measures for the relief of people on fixed incomes and, in particular, the senior citizens of this country. Some members from the opposite side of the House said they deplored this failure, and others spoke of their disappointment in it. I am sure there are not very many who deplore it or are disappointed, because most members realize the financial limitations under which governments must work.

We all agree, I am sure, that we are in favour of dramatically increased pensions for senior citizens, and in the next few minutes I hope to deal with how we may achieve this. Just after the Minister of Finance made his budget speech I visited the Old Timers' Club at Turner Valley, Alberta. Naturally, the people there were concerned about the level of the old age pension and the fact that so many of them find it more difficult to get by today than when they first retired, even though their pensions are now somewhat higher. A number of them asked me how the government is ever going to be able to pay back those people who bought government bonds. I was pleased to be able to tell them that as a result of this budget and the government's efforts in the last year there have been two successive surpluses. This means that money will be available for the payment of the debt which governments have been incurring for the last 13 or 15 years through deficit budgets.

I, like most hon. members, am aware of and concerned about the plight of many individuals and families who rely in whole or in large measure on the old age pension and the guaranteed income supplement for their source of income. It is amazing how so many people are able to exist on such an inadequate sum. All of us who are members of this House receive letters from these fine citizens outlining the various situations in which they find themselves. I recently received one such letter from a gentleman in Bellevue, Alberta. He stated in part:

> It is not so difficult when two people are both receiving old age benefits, but like myself it is quite difficult. My spouse, who is much younger than myself, does not receive the old age pension. I also have a daughter attending high school. We are all supporting ourselves on this. Hard to believe? We pay our gas bills amounting to $10 per month, light bills amounting to $5, medicine which is from $5 to $10 a month, constant home repair expenses, and many others. In the end, we do not have much left for the high standard cost of living, as you can well see.
> —We old age pensioners, who have built the Canadian economy should have a right to a little free care, but as you can see we are at the bottom of the pile.

People such as this deserve to be admired. But while we admire them we should not be content with leaving them at the bottom of the pile. The fact that they do get by is not reason enough for not increasing assistance to them. They manage to maintain themselves only by making sacrifices which the rest of us would not be prepared to make. Of all the groups in our society, one of the most researched is the aged, as we classify the group to which those over 65 years of age belong. Many studies and many papers have been written about the problems of this group, not only in this country but in the United States and other nations of the world. Almost without fail, the studies conclude that the single, most serious problem facing individuals over 65 is the financial one. A large proportion of our pensioners simply do not have enough money to provide them with an adequate and decent standard of living. Indeed, as a group our aged would have to be classified as poor. The poverty of the aged is as well-rooted as that of any other single group. The Special Committee of the Senate on Aging which conducted its studies relating to the aged in Canada during the year 1966 found as follows:

> Without question the most serious problem encountered by the Senate committee in the course of its investigation was the degree and extent of poverty which exists among older people.

Even though, since the Senate committee made its report, many old age pensioners have received additional benefits of up to 40 per cent of their pension under the provisions of the guaranteed income supplement, a great many of them still do not have the income necessary to support themselves and, in many cases, their families. This is a situation which we as concerned Canadians, which we as representatives of the people should not tolerate. I am sure all hon. members agree that further aid must be given to the aged in those cases where it is required. The question then becomes, what can we do and how can we do it?

When examining the possibilities of increasing aid to the aged we must, of course, look at the financial implications to the economy as a whole. In the last year for which we have complete records we spent approximately $1,300 million on the combined old age pension and guaranteed income supplement. Of that total, approximately $250 million, or one-quarter of a billion dollars, was the amount paid out under the guaranteed income supplement. It is interesting to note that the total paid out under the old age pension and the guaranteed income supplement amounts to 10 per cent of the total expenditures of the federal government. Having these figures before us enables us to see precisely what the possibilities may be and the limitations within which we can honestly advocate an increase in payments to the senior citizens of this land.

It is obvious, for example, that we cannot apply a simple formula such as a 100 per cent across the board increase. We simply cannot say that we will double the pension and double the guaranteed income supplement, because the federal government budget just cannot spend another $1\frac{1}{2}$ billion. There is just not enough money in the federal treasury, nor are there sufficient sources of revenue for the government to be able to apply such a simple formula. It is obvious that something less will have to be done. If the increase should be 10 per cent in the pension and in the guaranteed income supplement, it is obvious that will not solve the problem which I submit has to be solved. What has happened is that we are using a lot of our resources which have been set aside for social purposes in a way that does not benefit the people who should be receiving benefit.

This afternoon in one of our committee meetings we heard evidence that I am sure was shocking to all members present. According to the witness—and we have no reason to doubt him—in a community of 1,500 people in northern Alberta, 80 per cent are on welfare. It costs an average of $30,000 per year to maintain each family on welfare in that community. That is a substantial amount of money. This amount includes not only the funds spent on the family but also the administrative costs. I think an example such as this is all that is required to point out that our system of social security must undergo a complete revamping. When we pay $30,000 to support a family which probably should be able to get by on $7,000 or $8,000, we are not making the best use of our resources.

I am heartened by the fact that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) is making a complete study of the social security system of this country. Within a very short time the minister will be presenting a white paper outlining how we can rationalize this system which we have created through what can perhaps be termed an ad hoc approach to problems. This is what we have done over the years in dealing with people who require assistance because they are not able to look after themselves—the senior citizens of this country. We have built a system which is no longer making the best use of our funds.

I am convinced that by taking a rational approach and trying to co-ordinate the various loose ends of the social security picture we can save money and at the same time increase the benefits to groups such as the old age pensioners. It is obvious that if the Minister of National Health and Welfare is able to obtain only $500 million from his colleagues on the Treasury Board, as some people fear he may, this amount will enable him, without affecting a saving anywhere else in the social structure, to triple the guaranteed income supplement. By doing this, every person who qualifies for the guaranteed income supplement would be assured of an increase in excess of $150 per annum. Most people who have studied this problem, not only in Canada but in the United States, agree that if the government can provide a guaranteed income supplement of approximately $150 per annum for old age pensioners this would enable them to live in decency. I repeat that I look forward to the approach which the Minister of National Health and Welfare is taking. I am sure it will result in a substantial increase in the pensions of our senior citizens. I am sure that hon. members from all parties will support this measure.

One other matter in relation to old age pensioners which I feel should be discussed relates to property taxes and rents which senior citizens must bear. As hon. members know, a very large portion of property tax is made up of the amount of taxation required to support education. The senior citizens who have lived in this country for many years have to a great extent been responsible for the building of this country. They paid for the education that most of us in this House and which most adults in the country have received. Yet these people are still being required to pay for the greatly increased educational costs which we are undertaking today.

It is my belief that the government should consider easing the property tax burden and rental burden on old age pensioners through some form of allowable deduction for income tax purposes. Perhaps the entire amount of property tax which the old age pensioner pays on his residence, or a portion of the rent could qualify as a deduction from income tax. There are other possibilities. Perhaps this amount could be related; however, it is unlikely that the federal government could do this directly. It may be necessary for the federal government to provide some incentive to provincial governments to ensure that they institute programs to ease the property tax burden and the rent burden on our senior citizens. I commend this suggestion for the minister's consideration.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I look forward to the introduction of the white paper on social security. I hope it will provide very substantial increases in the pensions of our senior citizens.

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I had intended in this debate to focus and zero in on three specific issues, but in view of the fact there are only five minutes left, I shall confine myself to one. That is need for federal and provincial legislation to ensure a greater degree of Canadian ownership of Canada's natural resources.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cafik: The basic development of Canada's resources in the past has largely depended upon the extent of foreign investment that has been brought into this country. This has largely taken the form of equity investment. If steps are taken to dissuade or dry up this foreign investment, corresponding steps must be taken to encourage Canadian individuals and institutions to replace this missing capital with their own risk dollars.

I believe that legislation is required to make it possible for many of our institutions to take the necessary steps to assist us in achieving self-ownership. Insurance companies have millions and millions of dollars in reserve, but are prohibited by law from investing in a way that will help us achieve that objective. They are limited to the investment of 15 per cent of their reserves in equity stock, and only then under very stringent rules. For instance, they can only invest in a firm with a five-year history of earnings. This is but one of the many restricting limitations. A change has to be made in this regard. A portion of such funds must be made available for equity investment in risk ventures.

Then there is the money tied up in federal and provincial funds, a great deal of it—as one example the Canadian Pension Plan investment fund. In this particular case, $1,280,788,000 was given to the provinces for investment in 1968. Their investment transactions do not include investment in equity stocks. I believe laws should be passed which would allow this to happen. The money is being used at present to support provincial and municipal bond issues and investments of that type. I believe it should be required that a significant proportion of these funds be used for investments in areas of development which would maximize Canadian participation in our own future.

In my view it is better for levels of government to borrow foreign capital from banks than it is to admit the same amount of capital into Canada by way of investment on an equity basis in our primary resource industries. The Canadian Development Corporation will be of help in this regard, but it is not a cure-all—it is no magic formula. Other steps need to be taken.

Wealth is the consequence of three things—first, the God-given base resource or material; second, the application of capital and, third, the application of labour—thus transforming God's gifts into something more valuable or desirable. Labour and capital have the right to their reward, but our natural resources are, in my view, the common heritage of all mankind; in a special way they are the common heritage of those who live in the nation where those resources are found. If we do not recognize this now through legislative steps, something more drastic will have to be done at a later date to rectify the situation.

In short, I believe we must take action to assure the future of Canada for all Canadians. I believe legislation is required to accomplish this.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. It being 9.45 o'clock p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to section 8 of Standing Order 60, to interrupt these proceedings and forthwith put every question necessary to dispose of the motion now before the House.

[English]

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Shall I call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At 9.45 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, April 24, 1970

The House met at 11 a.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

TABLING OF SPECIAL AREA AGREEMENTS WITH NEW BRUNSWICK AND NEWFOUNDLAND GOVERNMENTS

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion I should like to table copies of the special area agreements between the government of Canada and the provinces of New Brunswick and Newfoundland.

• (11:10 a.m.)

LABOUR RELATIONS

PROSPECTIVE LAY-OFF OF CPR CLERKS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave of the House to present a motion under Standing Order 43. The pressing and urgent necessity for such a motion as mentioned in the Standing Order is that there is a serious situation developing because of the announcement by the Canadian Pacific Railway that it intends to reduce by 10 per cent its expenditures on clerical services, which will result in the laying off of several hundred workers. In view of the seriousness of the situation and the dispute that is arising, it seems to me the House will agree that this matter ought to be considered by an appropriate committee. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg):

That the action of the Canadian Pacific Railway in announcing a 10 per cent reduction in its clerical services, and the lay-off of several hundred workers that will result therefrom, be referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration for consideration and report.

Mr. Speaker: As hon. members know, a motion under Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such unanimous agreement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous agreement. The motion posed by the hon. member cannot be put at this time.

RAILWAY ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING NOTICE AND FULL DISCLOSURE OF ACCIDENTS

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-207, to amend the Railway Act (Notice of Accidents).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, in introducing this bill, an act to amend the Railway Act, notice of railway accidents, I wish to explain its purpose very briefly. The purpose is to make it mandatory that all accidents to equipment or roadbed where the damage exceeds $1,500 must be made public. All accidents reported to the Canadian Transport Commission and which are investigated by that commission will be made public. Nothing will be confidential. Up to this time the commission has not been obligated by law to make public those accidents it has investigated. I suggest that at this time an amendment of this type to the Railway Act is quite appropriate.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member can only explain the purpose of the bill. He cannot argue his case.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TAXATION

WHITE PAPER ON REFORM—INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION—FURTHER PROPOSALS RESPECTING SMALL BUSINESSES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Finance whether it is still his target to have the government's proposed tax legislation effective for the year 1970. I ask this question particularly in view of the increasing number of difficulties and complications that are being raised in connection with the white paper proposals.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am sure my hon. friend is speaking about 1971. I have said it is an objective. It is not necessarily binding. Whether we will be able to meet this objective will depend on the speed with which the white paper is handled by the committees of the House and the Senate.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question. Can the minister advise the House whether the drafting of this legislation has already commenced or can he assure the House that the drafting of the bill will not be commenced until the parliamentary committee has reported?

Mr. Benson: To my knowledge the drafting of the bill is not under way.

Mr. Stanfield: Can the minister give the House the assurance that the drafting of the bill will not commence until after the committee has reported?

Mr. Benson: Until the committees have reported it will be impossible to draft the precise bill because we are going to look at the recommendations of the committees and I suspect, take action of course, on some of those recommendations.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister when we may expect his proposals to overcome the difficulties which he has admitted his white paper proposals will create for small businesses, although when he recognized these difficulties he said he did not have any proposals but hoped somebody else would have. Has he discovered that somebody else has come up with proposals?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, a great many submissions have been received from individuals and organizations and these are presently being studied. As I indicated publicly, I have also asked my department to look into the financial problems of small businesses.

SOCIAL SECURITY

GOVERNMENT POLICY ON GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME—PUBLICATION OF WHITE PAPER

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. When Dr. Willard, the Deputy Minister of Welfare, made his statement a day or so ago to the Canadian Pension Conference to the effect that the guaranteed annual income was the best solution to our social problems, was he expressing government policy and, if so, may we expect action on a guaranteed annual income at this session of Parliament?

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that the question cannot be asked in this form. My understanding of the rule is that it is possible to ask the Prime Minister whether a minister in making a statement outside the House was expressing government policy, but I wonder whether this extends to statements made by civil servants. I think the question might be asked directly and responded to in those terms.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether a guaranteed annual income is now government policy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that all these questions, so far as the government is concerned, seem to hinge on the forthcoming white paper on social policy, will the Prime Minister do his best to expedite the publication of this white paper?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

FINANCE

REALLOCATION OF RESOURCES—REPRESENTATIONS BY MUNICIPAL AUTHORITIES TO COMMITTEE ON THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Prime Minister. In light of the expression of opinion that federal observers could have participated in the present Ontario provincial-municipal conference on the allocation of financial and tax resources, is it the intention of the government of Canada to actively encourage the municipalities of Canada, with the co-operation of the provincial governments, to send official representatives to testify before the special committee on the constitution as to the needs of the municipalities in respect of a reallocation of tax and financial resources commensurate with their responsibilities in the years to come?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure I understand all the implications of the question, but if it is a suggestion that we intervene in municipal affairs I understand this is not the desire at least of the Prime Minister of Ontario. It seems to me the hon. member and the Leader of the Opposition are following a policy of confrontation on this matter.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the Prime Minister misunderstood the whole question. My question is: Will there be active encouragement of the municipalities, through their representatives and with the consent of the provinces, to appear before the special committee of Parliament on the constitution in order to discuss the question of reallocation of tax and financial resources to the municipalities?

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the parliamentary committee on the constitution will be discussing the question of tax resources, at least not at the outset, and the desirability thereof. However, if the provincial governments wished to authorize their municipal people to appear before the parliamentary committee and if the parliamentary committee wanted them to appear, the government certainly would have no objection.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I have a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would it be the intention of the government, with the consent of the provinces, to invite the municipalities of Canada to send official representatives to further federal-provincial conferences on fiscal relations and the constitution?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I have stated before, Mr. Speaker, that at federal-provincial conferences the provinces compose their delegations in the way they want. If they want to include in their delegations municipal representatives they are perfectly able to do so and the federal government, of course, can do nothing else but accept the delegation as composed by the provincial government.

REPORTED STATEMENT ON CAPITAL GAINS TAX ON HOMES

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. Has the minister told the Liberal caucus that there will never be a capital gains tax on homes?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that the question as asked is not in order.

Mr. Stewart (Marquette): May I rephrase my question? Was the hon. member for Provencher announcing government policy when he made this statement publicly in Manitoba?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again the ruling made by the Chair a moment ago applies to the question asked by the hon. member. It is not in order in those terms.

POLLUTION

REQUEST FOR DECLARATION OF PROPOSED ENVIRONMENTAL DAY AS NATIONAL HOLIDAY

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): My question is directed to the righ hon. Prime Minister. In view of the number one priority the government of Canada has placed on the environmental problem, paticularly as it pertains to pollution control, and in view of the announcement that Environmental Day will be held in Canada probably some time in October, would the Prime Minister announce this day as a national holiday so that all the people of Canada can join in this wonderful demonstration?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I might tell the House that if I were to announce a national holiday for every important day which is brought to my attention by respected groups across the country we would not work on any day of the year.

Mr. Lewis: What's wrong with that?

Mr. Skoberg: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the right hon. Prime Minister recognize the importance of this day and recommend to this House that it be a national holiday?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker, but what about Mothers' Day and Fathers' Day and all these other days?

An hon. Member: They fall on a Sunday.

BANFF AND JASPER—PROVISION OF SEWAGE TREATMENT FACILITIES

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. When does the government plan to practice what it preaches in respect of pollution by providing Banff and Jasper with sewage treatment and disposal facilities?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that I have answered that question on several occasions and that works have been undertaken at those two places, in order to correct that condition.

[English]

ORDER OF REFERENCE FOR SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): My question is a related one and it is directed to the House Leader. Does the government intend to give some order of reference to the new pollution committee? Will a meeting of that committee be called, or is its establishment simply a political gesture?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

MONTREAL HARBOUR—THREAT CAUSED BY CYANIDE BARRELS IN WATER

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have a supplementary question for the Acting Minister of Fisheries, or for the Prime Minister who has some interest in this matter. How serious is the threat of cyanide pollution in Montreal harbour as a consequence of the accident yesterday when several barrels of cyanide fell into the water?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The Minister of Fisheries and Forestry is today visiting certain areas in respect of mercury pollution. If he is in the area of Montreal I will ask him to look into the other matter.

Mr. Bell: But it is dangerous for Montreal.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): In view of the fact that the Minister of Fisheries is now in Vancouver on a speaking engagement, could someone else be designated to perform that chore?

Mr. Trudeau: I will try to put a Jetstar at his disposal.

[Mr. Noble.]

FINANCE

FEDERAL TAXES AND PAYMENTS TO PROVINCES—FAILURE TO ANSWER QUESTION—RELEASE OF INFORMATION RESPECTING QUEBEC

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): I should like to direct this question to the President of the Privy Council, the House Leader. For six weeks my question No. 1,403 on page 102 has been on the Order Paper. I have requested a reply several times but it has not yet been answered. Now I find that the information concerning at least one province has been released in this morning's Montreal Gazette by the Liberal party caucus.

If it is possible to compile the information for one province, why is it not possible to compile the information for the rest? Obviously, therefore, the government had the information for which I asked in the public interest and refused it to me while releasing it to non-parliamentary persons for partisan purposes. I bring this matter to the attention of the House Leader again and ask that the members of this House be granted equal and proper treatment.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the bulletin to which the hon. member refers is not a government publication. I understand it is made up from information which is available to anyone on demand or which is in public documents. Therefore, if the hon. member wants to have the research people attached to his party compile the information they can do it quite easily from public documents.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Does the Prime Minister think that a provincial election campaign where separatism is one of the main issues is outside his jurisdiction, beyond his influence, or both?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would not think that a question asked in those terms is acceptable. The hon. member is asking an academic question, or is asking it in academic terms, and I would have some doubts whether it would be acceptable procedurally on that basis.

MANPOWER

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON AVAILABILITY OF SUMMER EMPLOYMENT FOR STUDENTS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Government House

Leader. Would he request his colleague, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, to make a statement on motions at the earliest opportunity next week as to the present state of availability of employment for students during the summer months? I ask this question, Mr. Speaker, because as all hon. members of the House know there is a great demand by students of all ages—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has asked a question. It is not necessary for him to explain why he is asking it.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I believe it was yesterday that my colleague indicated in response to a question that he would not be in a position to determine the absolute level of employment this summer until the end of the summer was reached, but he did indicate he would be prepared to make available to the House in the near future the measures which the government proposes to undertake to assist student employment. I will bring the hon. member's question to his attention and remind him of the previous answer.

TRANSPORT

DEMOLISHING OR REPAIR OF NEW WESTMINSTER GRAIN ELEVATOR

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister now in a position to answer my question relating to the grain elevator at New Westminster, B.C., as to whether the elevator is to be torn down at an approximate cost of $250,000 or will it be repaired at the same approximate cost and thereby be available for grain storage and shipment?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have taken account of the previous question which the hon. member asked me and I provided him with some information. I regret I do not have the subsequent information on the question he asked this morning but I will undertake to get it as fast as I possibly can.

REPORTED REDUCTION OF AUTOMOBILE SAFETY FEATURES BY MANUFACTURER

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Yesterday I asked the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs a question relating to a report that an automobile company was reducing or eliminating certain safety features in some automobiles in association with a reduction in price, and the minister undertook to bring it to the attention of the Minister of Transport. Can the Minister of Transport give the House any assurance that these reduced safety features will not in fact constitute an additional hazard on the highways, and can he tell the House whether he has investigated this matter?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have conducted a preliminary investigation. The facts, as I know them at the moment, are that the so-called reductions are not within the guidelines or regulations which are now being adhered to voluntarily by the industry. As the Leader of the Opposition will know, we are now in the process, as a result of the passing of the highway safety bill a few weeks ago, of drafting new regulations. I can assure the House that in those regulations will be all the necessary safeguards, and if it should happen that some of these co-called withdrawals do not conform with the regulations we will see that the regulations are enforced.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the minister's statement that some of these changes will reduce the safety factor below what the regulations will permit, can the minister give us a firm date on which these regulations will become effective?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I said they had gone below what the regulations permit because we are not sure at the moment whether they are below. In so far as the date for proclamation of the regulation is concerned, the technical details are complex but we have undertaken to have them out within the next two months and I would think the announcement will likely come within the next six weeks.

Mr. Stanfield: A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister had an opportunity to inquire whether the direction to reduce these safety features came from the head office in the United States? If so, is this a matter of concern to the minister and is any action to be taken in regard to it?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge of where the so-called instructions originated. I should emphasize, however, that the major one that appears to be of concern in some models and in a limited number of cars is the retractable seat belt rather than the one that simply lies across the seat. They have removed the device which caused the safety belt to retract. We are trying to determine whether this constitutes a reduction in its safety value.

ENFORCEMENT OF NEW AUTOMOBILE SAFETY REGULATIONS

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): I have a question for the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister give some assurance to the House that the 30 regulations he indicated to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications will be enforced when he proclaims them?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Just to amplify what I said, as I am sure the hon. member knows the technical standards, which are very complex, are now being drawn. I have said the very outside figure is two months but I think they will be ready in six weeks. We will be publishing them as fast as we can and proclaiming the act simultaneously.

[Translation]

AGRICULTURE

DAIRYING—POSSIBLE AMENDMENT OF POLICY RESPECTING GRANTS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Since the new dairy policy will compel some milk producers to sell their herd, is the minister in a position to tell us whether he will soon introduce a subsidy policy for each milch-cow sold for slaughtering purposes?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker. We do not have any such policy under consideration at the present time.

PENITENTIARIES

INVESTIGATION OF SUICIDES

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): I should like to direct a question to the Solicitor General, Mr. Speaker, who recently appointed a commission to investigate suicides in Canada's penitentiaries. When may we expect the report of this commission?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General did not appoint any such commission. I take it the hon. member has not read the answer to the question which was given a few days ago and which explains the situation rather fully.

AIR TRANSPORT

UNLICENSED FLYING TRAINING OPERATIONS —EFFECT ON SAFETY

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): I have a question arising from one asked by the hon. member for Fraser Valley East two weeks ago today, Mr. Speaker, concerning the operation of unlicensed flying training schools. At that time the minister indicated that he would propose new regulations. Could he indicate to the House when they will be ready? Also, can the minister state whether subsequent investigations have revealed any cause for concern about safety in the air around our major airports as a result of unlicensed flying operations?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): On the second part of the question, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe there is any untoward or special danger. I have met with some groups, including the Air Transport Association. Without going into detail, which I am sure you would not permit, Mr. Speaker, it is quite a complicated job to ensure that the so-called bootlegging over licensed routes can be restrained. We are trying to find a simple formula, and I can only say that I hope to have it within a matter of weeks. I have been talking to the CTC about this matter as well.

Mr. Speaker: I believe the hon. member for Assiniboia has a supplementary to a previous question.

TRANSPORT

MOVEMENT OF GRAIN—APPOINTMENT OF CONTROLLER

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have a related question to one previously asked of the Minister of Transport. Since it appears that the railways are falling far short of the agreed target of moving nearly 1,300 carloads of grain daily to Thunder Bay, is the minister now prepared to appoint a boxcar controller for western Canada?

Mr. Diefenbaker: We asked for that a year ago.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated on many previous occasions in the House, my responsibility in this matter is to convey these representations to the railways, which I do on each occasion they are brought to my attention. Perhaps the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Wheat Board might have a more complete answer.

GRAIN

WHEAT—ACREAGE REDUCTION PROGRAM—AVAILABILITY OF REGULATIONS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that the planting season is rapidly approaching and that farmers will be seeding within the next week or so, can the minister inform the House when the regulations for operation LIFT will be in the hands of the farmers?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Very soon, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL PARKS

BONNE BAY, NFLD.—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT REGARDING ESTABLISHMENT

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. On April 8 I asked if he would indicate his department's position with regard to the establishment of a national park in view of the white paper produced by the province of Newfoundland and he said he would give me an answer as soon as he had studied it. Would the minister now be prepared to give his views?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we have considered that problem and our position in the matter is always the same, it has not changed for two or three years. We are waiting for Newfoundland to decide which area it can make available to the federal government for the development of a second national park in that province.

[English]

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

CONSIDERATION OF PAYMENT FOR OVERTIME

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Solicitor General if the government is now giving consideration to overtime pay for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, that question was raised by way of a suggestion in the standing committee of the House of Commons which was examining the estimates.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, as the member who raised the question there I am asking the Solicitor General for a direct answer. Is the government giving consideration to overtime pay for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, when the committee completes its work and reports back to the House the government will consider all the matters that have come before it.

AGRICULTURE

CANADIAN DAIRY COMMISSION—APPOINTMENT OF WESTERN REPRESENTATIVE

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Is the government considering the appointment of a western representative to the Canadian Dairy Commission to replace Mr. L. A. Atkinson, the western representative who retired recently?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there are no vacancies on the Canadian Dairy Commission at the present time.

Mr. Dinsdale: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the growing concentration of the dairy industry in Ontario and Quebec, is it the government's policy to eliminate dairy farms on the prairies?

Mr. Olson: No, Mr. Speaker.

INDUSTRY

COMPANY SHUTDOWNS—PROVISION FOR ADEQUATE NOTICE AND FEASIBILITY STUDY

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the major lay-offs of employees at the Dunlop Tire plant and the Canadian General Electric plant, their allegation that foreign imports caused these shutdowns and also their refusal to participate in a feasibility study, would the minister consider legislation covering companies under federal jurisdiction that would set up machinery whereby companies would have to go through the process of a feasibility study and also would have to give adequate notice before shutting down?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): This would certainly not be my immediate responsibility, Mr. Speaker, but the subject is very much in the minds of many people at all levels of government at this time.

FINANCE

IMPLEMENTATION OF CONSUMER CREDIT REGULATIONS

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Now that the so-called budget has passed the House almost unnoticed, can the minister state whether he has had meetings with representatives from the credit industry as intimated in the budget, and can he state if he will definitely be keeping to his timetable of new legislation in six or eight weeks?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, consultations with people in the credit business have been going on since the budget was announced in the House and the legislation is presently under preparation. I cannot give the exact date when it will be introduced in the House.

ASSURANCE TO SMALL BUSINESSMEN RESPECTING METHOD OF TAXATION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, while I would not expect the Minister of Finance to give a general outline of those portions of the white paper on tax reform which from time to time he advises are going to be diminished, altered, or abrogated in whole or in part, I would ask him that in view of the serious blows suffered by small businessmen in Canada, would he give them the assurance that there will be no reduction in the amount now in effect in respect of profits on which the lowest rate of tax applies? If he would do that he would do a great deal for small business across Canada.

Mr. Trudeau: Anything else?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the matter of the white paper is presently before a parliamentary committee. In due course I hope we will receive recommendations from that committee.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I ask the minister why he is so diffident about this matter that affects the bulk of business across Canada when from time to time he utters ex parte statements as to alterations are going to be made. Why does the minister not come clean?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why does the minister not come clean?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Come on there, Hoot Gibson.

AIRPORTS

TORONTO—APPROVAL OF LAKEFRONT SITE BY MUNICIPAL REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that his officials are still discussing, I believe, with the city of Toronto, Metro Toronto, and other groups the proposed jet airport in the southern part of the city of Toronto, would he give an undertaking that no project of this sort will be proceeded with without the approval of the elected municipal representatives?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think there is some misunderstanding with regard to the report which was published, today, I believe. I reiterate my statement of some months ago that there is no intention whatever of establishing a large so-called international airport on the lakefront in Toronto. What is being examined is the possibility of what is known as an intercity type of airport, and this would involve the kinds of runways which were dealt with in the story. I want to assure the hon. member, through you, Mr. Speaker, that in so far as the Department of Transport is concerned we are perfectly willing to make full disclosure of our plans with regard to this project and to consult with all levels of government to the extent that we can obtain their co-operation to do so.

RESEARCH

UNITED STATES ARCTIC PROGRAM—CONSULTATION WITH CANADA—CANADIAN INTENTION

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, may I answer a question asked by the Leader of the Opposition last week. With respect to the use of surface effect vehicles in the north, which it has been announced the United States now intends to investigate, I may say that Canada has for some time been carrying out research on the use of these vehicles in the north. Because of the possibility of general applicability we would naturally welcome any development work the United States authorities may carry out along these lines in their territory.

I should also like to say a word about the broader subject of Arctic research. The responsible departments have, of course, been engaged in a considerable amount of such activities for many years. There has been no direct consultation with representatives of the U.S. government concerning the proposed U.S. program of research in the fields of Arctic environment and resources. However it may be of interest that this coming weekend an inter-disciplinary group of United States research scientists will visit Canada—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: Sit down!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the minister realizes he cannot make this kind of statement without reverting to motions. Is it agreed that we revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is no such agreement and the minister cannot reply to the question in that way.

Mr. Chrétien: I had almost finished, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development must be a mind reader because I was about to rise to try to catch your attention, Mr. Speaker, and ask the Prime Minister if he could now answer the question I asked last week relating to the announced intention of the United States to carry out certain projects of a research or experimental nature in the Arctic and whether there have been communications from the United States or discussions as to the area in the north in which these United States activities would take place. Can the Prime Minister say whether there have been any such discussions?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot add anything to what the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development had just begun to state in the House. He may wish to add something.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that there will be a conference this weekend with United States scientists. We will always welcome exchanges with United States officials, but there are no official discussions taking place with the U.S. government about this matter at this time.

POLLUTION

THE ARCTIC—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON MEASURES TO ENFORCE ANTI-POLLUTION PROVISIONS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Prime Minister would be prepared to agree to what I am about to request in view of the obvious desire of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to make a full statement on this matter that is of concern to him. I ask the Prime Minister whether he or some other minister who may be considered more appropriate would on an early occasion make a full statement as to the measures the government of Canada proposes to take with regard to the enforcement of the anti-pollution provisions incorporated in Bill C-202?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will ask the minister to consider this.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, with all respect, may I suggest to the Prime Minister that it is the responsibility of the government as a whole to make this statement, since it seems to involve the operations of several departments of government.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CRACKS IN FOILS OF PROTOTYPE HYDROFOIL SHIP—COST OF REPAIRS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister indicate the impact made upon our defence program as a result of cracks which have been found in the foils of our experimental hydrofoil ship? Also, when does he contemplate that this prototype will be operational?

Mr. Fairweather: In 1984.

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there is an element of that question which is highly speculative. I cannot say what impact it would have on the stature of our national defence but I can say so far as the experiments are concerned, and my information may not be quite up to date, that I think this erosion problem has been solved. We are to complete the experiments in heavy seas. After that, of course, the fundamental decision will be, where do we go from there?

Mr. Crouse: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the cost of this project, which was originally $9 million, has now risen to some $52 million, can the minister indicate what will be the estimated cost of these additional repairs?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps that supplementary might be placed on the Order Paper or, if there is urgency, it can be considered at the time of adjournment.

TRANSPORT

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE FOR REGINA RAILWAY LINE RELOCATION

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has a decision been reached on representations by the city of Regina and the province of Saskatchewan for federal assistance on a rail line relocation plan for the city of Regina?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, a number of negotiations are under way simultaneously with regard to the relationship between the city of Regina and my department. We have turned back to the city a considerable amount of land near the airport. We have also agreed—if the hon. member will allow me to finish I will give him the answer to his question—to mutual arbitration with regard to the value of additional land. With regard to relocation, this is also part of the over-all negotiating package, and when all three matters are resolved, I hope the answer will be satisfactory to the city of Regina.

Mr. Burton: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the government considering legislative changes that would enable or facilitate the federal government to make a more adequate contribution to rail line relocation projects such as those proposed by the city of Regina and, I believe, by the city of Winnipeg as well?

Mr. Jamieson: And by about 25 other cities, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Cadieux (Labelle).]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Jamieson: We are trying to find a formula that will cover them all.

AGRICULTURE

STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS TO REDUCE FARM MACHINERY PRICES

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. The importance of the matter arises from the season of the year. Can the minister indicate if any progress at all is being made in his negotiations to reduce the Canadian farm machinery prices of major companies now operating in Canada?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker, but I could not give details of that progress on this occasion. I have made statements outside the House, where I had a little more time, and indicated what steps have been taken.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister indicate whether he feels that sufficient progress is being made to bring about some final conclusion of the matter within the next week or two?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether the question as asked is in order. The hon. member is simply asking the minister to express an opinion. That is not an acceptable question.

URANIUM

REGULATIONS RESPECTING OWNERSHIP OF COMPANIES

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources whether the regulations covering the policy with regard to ownership of uranium products and uranium companies are yet ready. If not, when may we expect them?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, they are not yet ready but we are working on them as quickly as possible. I hope we will have the regulations very shortly.

Mr. Lewis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister what purpose there is in the meetings which are reportedly being held between him and Mr. Roman, the president of Denison Mines, at this time? What role are these meetings playing?

Mr. Greene: I do not have any meetings scheduled with Mr. Roman at this time, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RENTAL INCREASE FOR PERMANENT MARRIED QUARTERS

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. What action is his department taking to assist servicemen who must now support an added burden amounting to about $4.5 million in extra rent charges? Is he aware, too, that civilian landlords are alleged to be charging servicemen greatly increased rents following the increase in rents for permanent married quarters?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): I cannot talk about that allegation, but as far as servicemen's rents are concerned this question has been under study for some time. We are now proceeding as easily as we can; we have delayed implementation of the recommendation from Treasury Board by about a year. We are going by what we call a weighted national average in determining these rents, but we have made sure that in no instance will a serviceman have to pay a rent which would amount to more than a quarter of his earnings. I believe the phasing-in of this plan is not unfair; it relates to economic realities.

Mr. MacLean: Would the minister seek assistance from his colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, if necessary, to make sure that civilian landlords are not taking undue advantage of servicemen where sufficient permanent married quarters are not available on bases?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): I am grateful for that recommendation to my colleague and I hope he has noted it.

POST OFFICE

MONTREAL—PROVISION OF TRUCKS AND DRIVERS—NORMAL DELIVERY

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): My question is addressed to the President of the Treasury Board. Can the hon. gentleman advise us whether sufficient trucks and drivers have been secured for the delivery of mail in Montreal? Further, can we be told when the government expects mail delivery to return to normal in that city?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): As yet we have not completed the fleshing out of the plan in respect of the drivers or mechanical equipment.

An hon. Member: Flushing out?

Mr. Drury: I hope progress in an orderly way is being made. I would hesitate to attempt to forecast a date when there will be a complete return to normal conditions.

Mr. Macquarrie: I thought at the beginning it was rather thin. Could the minister now tell the House how many drivers are employed? Can he give us an interim report?

Mr. Drury: I think the number of new men is approximately 200 but I would want to check that figure and correct it if necessary.

TRANSPORT

U.S. NATIONAL SCHOOL BUS SAFETY WEEK—CANADIAN ACTION

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Bearing in mind that this week, across the United States, an extremely useful traffic safety measure is being undertaken by the observance of National School Bus Safety Week, would the minister consider encouraging public support of a similar effort in our country?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I would be very glad to give all the support I could to a National School Bus Safety Week.

An hon. Member: A holiday?

Mr. Jamieson: I would not make it a holiday because of the added pollution as they threw more beer cans in the sides of the lakes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): School children?

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Jamieson: Who knows? I should like to say that early in May, since all members like to stay in Ottawa on Saturdays, I am inviting all the school safety patrols in Ottawa to attend a special safety parade on Parliament Hill. I hope you will all stay around and help us celebrate.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day. Order. Is the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development rising on a point of order?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I would ask for the forbearance of the House so that I may reply briefly to an important question put to me last week by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). It is a short answer, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Some hon. Members: No.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING COST OF MEDICAL AND HOSPITAL SERVICES TO CREW

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-10, to amend the Canada Shipping Act, as reported (with an amendment) from the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova) moved:

That Bill C-10, an Act to amend the Canada Shipping Act, be amended by deleting the words "designated by the minister" at lines 21 and 22, page 1 thereof.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have already spoken on second reading of this bill and I made representations to the committee while the committee was studying this question. The amendment is very simple and it will not take long to explain once more. The situation is this. At present, the Canada Shipping Act provides that a sick mariner can only be treated by a designated medical practitioner. I have argued that the words "designated medical practitioner" must surely be out of date by now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Comeau: These appointments were, surely, made several years ago; they were probably political appointments. This might have been the reason for improving wording of the kind we find in the bill, but at this point I suggest that any medical practitioner should be allowed to treat sick mariners coming off their ships.

[Mr. Speaker.]

There is one example I can give—I will repeat it, because I have cited it before. I have in mind the case of a sick mariner who lives maybe 50 miles from port. He goes ashore sick and he is treated by a doctor. We should remember that when he lands at the port he can be treated only by a designated medical doctor. When he reaches his home, 50 miles away, he is unable to receive further treatment under the Canada Shipping Act because the port practitioner is obviously reluctant to travel 50 miles to treat him. I say that any doctor should be allowed to treat these sick mariners wherever they live and that the phrase, "designated by the minister" should be eliminated.

• (12 noon)

I know what the Parliamentary Secretary will say in his reply. He will tell us that the bill is to be erased from the statute books within a few months. That is right. The government is proposing that when the medicare legislation comes into effect in all the provinces, this provision under the Canada Shipping Act will not apply. The mariners will be treated under the medicare plans of the various provinces. But this is not the point. The federal government is reneging on its responsibility in this connection. This is a responsibility which the government has accepted, historically. Now, it is simply passing on 50 per cent of the cost to the provinces. The federal government is saying that it will cover only 50 per cent of the cost of the service through its 50 per cent share in medicare. By making only a 50 per cent contribution they are reneging on their responsibility, since at present they pay 100 per cent of the cost of treatment.

This amendment is straightforward and simple. I contend that sick mariners should be treated by any doctor, regardless of port. I will have some things to say on the other amendments.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the hon. member who has just introduced this amendment is concerned about what is apparently an administrative practice in that part of the country he represents. If the situation there, as he has outlined it, is indeed the fact, then I am in full sympathy with his attempt to eliminate the practice. But I suggest that it is an administrative practice and, therefore it is not necessary to alter the law.

With regard to how this particular part of the law operates in the part of the country from which I come—and I have done a little checking into this since the matter was raised by the hon. member in committee—the idea of designating a physician is simply, as I understand it, to ensure that a physician is prepared to act to treat sick mariners in emergency cases. This does not in any way limit the right of the sick mariner to enjoy the services of the physician of his choice.

In one of the ports in my constituency where I checked into this matter it was made quite clear to me that the customs officer is free, if the particular physician who has been designated is not available at the time, to call upon another physician to attend the emergency. There is an arrangement made to have some physician there, at least on a standby basis, to treat sick mariners as required.

While I have every sympathy with the desire of the hon. member to eliminate any form of patronage appointments as far as the provision of medical services is concerned, it is for this reason that I do not feel I can support his amendment, which I think is really unnecessary. I think it is really a question of this member and other members, from that part of the country whom I noticed applauding him conducting a bit of a campaign to straighten out what may be an unfortunate administrative hangover from the past.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a few comments in support of this amendment. It has long been a principle in this country that people should be entitled to treatment by any physician they choose.

Mr. Pepin: Especially since 1963.

Mr. Yewchuk: This amendment simply reiterates this principle of free choice of physician. It is a good principle and I think it should be supported.

I suppose the government's objection to it may well be an economic one. Perhaps the government thinks it will cost less if a designated physician at the port provides what could be determined as initial treatment or an emergency service. If the citizen of another country is ill while the ship is in port and urgently requires medical treatment there should be a physician near the port to render such treatment. If the situation were such that the citizen lived some distance away from the physician and might require continued treatment of his illness for a month or so, he would no longer receive the coverage he received for the physician who looked after him at the port. There is much to be said against changing doctors in the middle of the treatment of an illness. As it stands now, the bill almost automatically requires that one physician commence treatment and another physician continue treatment for the duration of the illness.

The suggestion contained in the amendment is an extremely reasonable one and is in keeping with the democratic principle of freedom of choice, in this case of physician. Certainly it would be in keeping with our interpretation of a just society. I know this has now become an undesirable term for the government to use, and over the past few weeks government members have declined to use it. Nevertheless, we must keep it at the back of our minds because a lot of people supported the concept at one time.

Mr. Comeau: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, is the parliamentary secretary not going to respond and explain whether or not the amendment is acceptable to the government?

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank all hon. members of the House and of the standing committee who have shown interest in Bill C-10. The government has tried to be as sympathetic as it can to all of their suggestions.

May I again state in this House that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) did instruct me to bring at the committee hearings on this bill an amendment along the line the committee members requested. It relates to clause 4 of Bill C-10, allowing mariners insured under the bill to obtain drugs at the cost of the insurer.

As far as the first amendment submitted by the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau) in connection with designated physicians is concerned, may I say in answer that treatment by a designated physician, or in large ports at a government operated clinic located on the waterfront, is provided for by the internal regulations and has been found to be satisfactory. Since the purpose of Bill C-10 is to phase out the provisions in Part V of the Canada Shipping Act as they become redundant for residents of Canadian provinces that introduced medical care insurance plans, there is no intention of increasing benefits in the last few months to the service that is being provided already. The department designates physicians who become agents of the government and, therefore, responsible to it for carrying out the intent of the act, and also become responsible to the government as far as financial requirements and other procedures are concerned.

Without designation there would, in the view of the department, be no such responsibility to the federal government. Therefore, a totally new set of regulations would be necessary in order to establish procedures and standards to implement the act. Completely different arrangements would be necessary, and there is no intention of altering the existing arrangements to provide a completely different type of service during this phase-out exercise.

In most instances foreign sailors in large ports would not have sufficient knowledge of local physicians, for example, to make a logical choice of doctor. In the small ports where the majority of people treated are local residents, it has been customary to designate several port physicians, provided the physicians signify a willingness to do the work which is required by the government regulations.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my view the nays have it.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Amendment (Mr. Comeau) negatived.

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova) moved:

That Bill C-10, an Act to amend the Canada Shipping Act, be amended by striking out lines 26 to 30, both inclusive at page 1, and lines 1 to 4, both inclusive at page 2 thereof, and substituting therefor the following: "(c) 'port' means any port in Canada."

[Mr. Haidasz.]

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is also a very simple and straightforward amendment. I have already made my argument. Hon. members can read the evidence of the committee or my speech made on second reading. Port, as it is now designated in Bill C-10 means:

—any port in

(i) the Province of Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, British Columbia or Newfoundland,

(ii) the Province of Manitoba on Hudson Bay, and

(iii) the Province of Ontario on Hudson Bay or James Bay.

In my opinion that definition is almost ridiculous. I realize that the government does not want to increase these benefits because they want to phase out part V of the Canada Shipping Act. I will argue this later.

The point I wish to make is that the definition of "port", as contained in Bill C-10, has not been changed from what it was in the old regulations under part V of the Canada Shipping Act. For example, it does not take note of recent developments in the Arctic where we will soon have ports. There is nothing in this bill to cover the situation of a ship docking in an Arctic port. The same applies to the Great Lakes. Also, I do not think the Yukon is covered.

My amendment is very simple and straightforward. It simply says "any port". If my other amendment had been agreed to, it would have covered any doctor. This change would have been very simple and logical. If someone became sick, he would simply have to forward the medical bill to the government agency. There would be no complications. I repeat, this amendment is very straightforward. I hope the government will accept it.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had framed the amendment to cover the prospect of the development of seacoast ports on our Arctic shores, I would have been quite prepared to support him. I agreed with him when he raised this question in committee. I think this is something the government should certainly have in mind.

The act, as presently drafted, is designed to cover the seacoast ports of Canada and the operation of agreements covering sick mariners. As far as I can see, such agreements are unnecessary except in the seacoast ports of Canada. I wish to point out that there are a good many other ports in Canada. For example, there is a port in the city of Winnipeg on the Red River. An agreement covering sick mariners would not be applicable to such a port. As matters stand, the port of Churchill in Manitoba is covered. In addition, any Ontario ports on salt water are covered.

As the hon. member has drafted his amendment, I do not feel it would be an entirely practical arrangement. While I appreciate the hon. member's motives in proposing this amendment, I regretfully do not feel I can support it as it stands.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): I wish to make one further observation, Mr. Speaker. I think distinguishing between ports, as to whether they are fresh water or salt water ports, is highly irrelevant in terms of the matter now before us. I urge the government to give some consideration to this amendment because the question of a sick mariner is indeed important, particularly to the poor mariner who is the one most directly affected. If a sick man happens to be on a ship, it does not matter very much whether that ship is tied up at a fresh water port or a salt water port. The fact of the matter is that, invariably, he will be away from his home and family physician. Usually, he will not have community contacts so will not know the specialists in the area. All these circumstances would tend to create difficulties.

I suggest there will be administrative difficulties within the departments concerned, both federal and provincial. The acceptance of this simple amendment would go far to remove that type of difficulty. I urge the government to accept the amendment. As the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau) pointed out, it is a very simple one.

Mr. Haidasz: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments and views expressed by hon. members with regard to this particular amendment. However, as I stated in this House during the debate on second reading of this bill, the entire Canada Shipping Act is being thoroughly studied. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) has said that many amendments will be proposed to the Canada Shipping Act which may have to do with some of the points raised by hon. members. In view of this, it is the opinion of the department that we should keep the designated ports intact as at present.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my view the nays have it.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Amendment (Mr. Comeau) negatived.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that Bill C-10, to amend the Canada Shipping Act, as reported (with an amendment) from the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Munro moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

• (12:20 p.m.)

Mr. Comeau: Mr. Speaker, I again rise. I am sorry to take the time of the House. I like these Fridays, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps I am the only one who is really interested in this bill because I do represent salt water fishermen and the bill was presented by a minister from a fresh water area. What struck me quite funny was the fact that I had an amendment similar to the amendment brought in by the department. In fact, I submitted my amendment to the Clerk yesterday and was advised that because it was exactly the same as the departmental amendment it should be retracted. I did, therefore, retract it. I must say I take a little credit for the amendment which is now on the books. My amendment was stolen, Mr. Speaker.

The point which was made on second reading and also twice today is that Part V of the Canada Shipping Act is to be phased out. It has been, and still is, my argument that in this case the government is simply reneging on some of its responsibilities because, as I say, the government has had a long-standing and historic responsibility to provide medical assistance to sick mariners. Now, the government wishes to eliminate the provision in respect of free drugs. The bill fails to provide for the care of foreign fishermen. This is something which historically we have always done. Several provinces in which medicare is not yet in force will be particularly affected by this bill. We hear that New Brunswick, Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island and Quebec will enter the plan, but at present only the province of Nova Scotia in the Atlantic area is in the medicare plan.

Provinces which have medicare plans, because of the discontinuance of Part V of the Canada Shipping Act, are being forced to assume almost half the medical costs of a group of people in respect of whom the federal government formerly paid 100 per cent of the cost of assistance. Now, under this bill, the services are to be provided to fishermen under the medical care plans of the various provinces and the provinces will have to pay 50 per cent of the cost of such services, which traditionally were a federal responsibility. It would seem to me that the provinces probably will have enough difficulty trying to provide hospital facilities under this increased responsibility. This is another example of the federal government simply passing on the responsibility to the provinces.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Comeau: This is true. If the minister wishes to argue this point, I shall be glad to hear him. As I pointed out in respect of Canadian fishing vessels, practically all the fishermen have taken advantage of the services provided. Because of the high crew per ton ratio on fishing boats there has probably been an abuse of the services provided in respect of this inexpensive medical care, free drugs and so on. In some instances, fishermen probably place their entire families on the crew list in order that they may qualify for medical care. I agree that something should be done to correct that situation.

The amendments in Bill C-10 provide that service to sick mariners will not include any service to which any fisherman is entitled under a medical care plan. The department's main contention is that this service to sick mariners will be redundant if medicare is also available in the province. Under Bill C-10 there will be one major change. Whereas previously fishermen received free drugs under this program, this no longer is to be the situation other than those drugs administered directly to the sick mariner by a designated medical practitioner. This again is something about which I suppose I cannot do anything at this late date, although I have tried. It seems to me we are decreasing a service which traditionally has been provided to these people. The Canadian crews of coastal vessels have received this service in the past although I understand it has constituted only a small part of the program. The result of the amendments in Bill C-10 is to eliminate the service to sick mariners as medicare is implemented by the provinces.

However, there are many provinces which still have not signed an agreement under the medical care act. These include British Columbia as well as the Atlantic provinces to which I referred a moment ago. The result of this bill, therefore, will be that the service to sick mariners will be completely phased out. Departmental officials expect that existing clinics in certain ports will be phased out over the next year or so. But to my mind they are bound by international agreement to maintain a service for sick mariners in cases involving such things as venereal disease. I hope this service will be continued.

In the case of foreign vessels, the department argues that even though this aspect of the service makes money it is no longer required for modern shipping. This probably is a valid argument. However, although most shipping lines take adequate care of their crews and maintain adequate insurance policies, there is no guarantee that all ships will do this. It is still possible that the owner of a small shipping line or of an unaffiliated tramp steamer would prefer to abandon a sick crew member rather than care for him. I realize such occurrences have been few during the past century and that probably there is a valid point in saying that the service is not needed. However, there is no assurance that such situations will not occur again. In such cases the municipal or provincial authorities would be responsible for the sick man's expenses. There would be no way to collect from the ship owner. Therefore, because this possibility exists, and because federal involvement in this area over a century implies an historic obligation, I submit a case can still be made for a residual guarantee of federal responsibility.

One might accept a federal withdrawal from this service so long as the federal treasury would underwrite the cost of an indigent seaman abandoned in illness. However, I do not see such a provision in this bill. The actual medical services might be administered through normal community facilities, but the provincial government could claim the actual costs from the federal government. Perhaps this should be the situation. I have raised my objections to this bill and thank the House for giving me the opportunity to do so.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, we reach the third reading stage of this bill conscious of the fact that it has come back to us from the committee in an amended form. I think it is important perhaps to clarify just what the change made by the committee signifies, and that has already been mentioned in the discussion this morning. In some respects this bill proposes a phasing out of the arrangement for sick mariners which have operated over a long period of years in Canada. There are two aspects to the proposed changes: one is to shift the financial responsibility directly to the owners of non-Canadian ships for the provision of medical, surgical and hospital care for the crews of those vessels. If I understand the proposal correctly, it places this liability but does not necessarily mean that the Canadian authorities operating under the terms of the Shipping Act will withdraw from any responsibility for a sick mariner if, in fact, he is left stranded in a Canadian port. In view of the explanations that were given to us about the growing trends around the world toward the adoption of various forms of medical insurance plans to which ship owners directly or indirectly contribute in their own countries, I for one am content that this particular amendment is appropriate at this time.

The other aspect of the bill has to do with the situation in respect of Canadian ships, and in particular with the effect of this bill upon Canadian seamen who are engaged in fishing. As I indicated at the committee stage of the bill, a good deal of concern was expressed by fishermen on the Pacific Coast of Canada that, as a result of the passage of this bill, they would lose their rights to benefits which they had enjoyed. There was an impression that they might lose some benefits which they had enjoyed if they become ill and require medical attention or hospitalization in U.S. ports. Following the introduction of the bill, the committee held its first meeting on the bill on February 10. This matter was examined and discussed by those concerned with the welfare of fishermen on the British Columbia coast, and it appears to me now that the effect of the bill will not be to deprive Canadian fishermen of benefits which they might have enjoyed in U.S. ports had it not been introduced. Therefore, the objections which I initially raised would appear to have been met by an investigation of the facts.

As I understand it, there is out-of-country coverage provided for hospitalization under our national hospitalization plan. In addition, if a province, in this case the province of British Columbia, is in the medicare plan, there is provision of medical services under the terms of that plan. As I understand it, the British Columbia medical plan, in line with the national provisions, provides coverage for costs incurred up to the level of the costs which would be paid for under the plan in British Columbia. This, I suppose, is about as far as one can rightfully expect Canadian authorities to go. There may be cases where costs are higher in a foreign port where some liability would rest upon the fishermen. This is what I understand the situation to be.

The other aspect of the matter is directly related to the amendment which was made to the bill in committee. I refer to the coverage of fishermen for medical expenses which are not covered by the medicare plan. I am happy with the fact that the committee, in its amendment, met the principal point which was argued by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) and myself at the committee stage when we met on February 10. The original bill specifically exempted, under the proposed Section 318A, any coverage of drugs if a medical plan was in effect, other than drugs administered directly to that sick mariner by a designated medical practitioner. As we all know, under the national medicare plan drug coverage is not provided and I am therefore glad that the way is left open for the optional arrangement to be made by a fisherman to cover himself for drug costs under the sick mariner provisions of this act, and under the scale of fees which would normally be payable. This may well be an insurance coverage which a great many fishermen will desire to obtain and continue.

So, in considering this bill at the third reading stage, I would like to say I am pleased that the department, on considering the discussion that took place in the committee, has agreed to this particular amendment for which we argued. For that reason, I am happy to support the third reading of the bill as it stands now.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): This is one of those occasions when a member interested in a bill is thoroughly aroused by good, thoughtful speeches in the House of Commons. I think my colleague, the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau) has certainly aroused my interest to the point of participation with the two amendments that he tried to get through earlier. I think the one relating to the designation by the minister of a doctor is worth examining again. I would like to examine it from two viewpoints. The first one is the relationship between doctor and patient. I suggest, since that is a professional relationship it is based, particularly from the standpoint of the patient, upon confidence in the man or woman who is looking after his medical problems. I suggest that for the ill seaman to have to go to the customs officer or to whoever's duty it is to point out which doctor is on the designated list, would have a very natural result. The poor, sick person thinks that the curing of his ills is in the hands of some government functionary. I suggest that this does raise a barrier, not in all cases but certainly in some cases, that is unfortunate and does not have to be there at all.

There is no good reason for adopting this course and I think there are several bad reasons why it is being adopted. I do not know why, even at this point, the minister does not reflect on what he is asking us to do in this legislation which otherwise, I suppose, merits support. It would be a shame if it had to be left to the institution of sober second thought down the hall to make a change which is, I think, very necessary. My point about the confidential relationship that has to exist between the person seeking professional advice and the person giving it is that there should be a freedom of choice by the person who needs professional advice. I say that that freedom of choice is at the very heart of the problem of the sick mariner.

The second point I want to make is that you are dealing with the international community when you are dealing with shipping, particularly when it is shipping over salt water. I realize that this bill is presented to us by a minister from a fresh water community, and is seconded by a minister who is also from a fresh water community. But these landlubber-minded gentlemen should not allow their vision to be restricted, in comparison with we who are fortunate enough to live by the salt water and who have the nobler and wider vision.

Many shipping crews now come from Taiwan or Hong Kong. Many of them come from Spain, and of course the other marine countries that are well known such as Norway, the United Kingdom and places like that. Liberia gets into the act too, but one does not call that a marine power; one calls that a marine loophole. Panama is also in that category. The point I am making is that your ill seaman is not necessarily going to be speaking one of the two official languages of Canada. He may be speaking any one of 30 or 40 foreign languages.

He is ill, and he is taken to hospital in Halifax. There, somebody trots out the list of designated doctors for his treatment but in the yellow pages of the telephone directory he finds a doctor who is familiar with his language and to whom he can explain his belly-ache, his appendix problem or whatever it is. Sometimes, sir, it is very difficult to make a speech in view of the suggestions that come from one's own colleagues which never quite reach Hansard but which have a sort of paralyzing effect.

The sick mariner conceivably could have treatment from a doctor in the community where he is ill, who understands his language, yet he is forced to go to a designated doctor who may not understand his language. Therefore the whole probe of the illness, the symptoms and the like, has to be dealt with through an interpreter. I imagine that is the way it happens. Again, we have the ridiculous situation where you cannot have the proper professional-patient relationship for a man who needs help. Again, I plead with the minister to broaden his vision on this question. He is a professional man himself. In addition, he should bring a little bit of international thinking into this thing and see to it that the correction is made in this bill which otherwise, I gather, merits the support of the House.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have about four points to make on this bill, and I hope they are not too disjointed. The first one is a general observation that it is bad legislation. It is the type of legislation that causes the watchers of Parliament to ask us questions, "Why did you do that, and why did you not do this? Didn't anybody think about this, or didn't anybody think about that?" Twice in the space of the last eight or ten months we have had the supreme courts of our country question certain laws, and I suggest they questioned them because the legislation was not properly thought out and indeed was bad legislation. In fact, this legislation is bad because nowhere in it is there provision for our mariners who may happen to be in a foreign port. We have taken a unilateral step. What are the bilateral implications of that? What are the multilateral implications of that?

I am one of those people who, as mariners, have had to seek medical attention in foreign countries. I was always treated with courtesy by the country in which I sought it. There was never any question of the administrative processing of the cost, and no difficulty whatsoever. But now we have this government asking this chamber to approve the unilateral step in proposed new section 298A, which reads:

> The owner of every ship that is not a Canadian ship is liable for the cost of all medical and surgical treatment and hospital care provided in Canada to a person employed by him on that ship.

The question may have come up in committee, and I apologize if it was dealt with there, but to the best of my knowledge nowhere has the question of reciprocal action by countries in which Canadian ships find themselves from time to time been mentioned. It is true that in 1970 we do not have the mercantile fleet that we had 10 or 15 years ago, but that does not mean that Canada could not have merchant shipping in the future or that in the future this would not be a widespread and serious problem.

The second point I wish to make is to express amazement that we have amendments of this nature in front of us, particularly when the government is going to withdraw from this area totally. Why do they come before us? Is it because the government has nothing better to bring before us? Is this a priority when there are Canadians starving to death, when there is continuing disparity, and continued unemployment? Why do we spend the time of the House dealing with this bill which, as I have said, is bad legislation, when the time of the House could more properly be directed to matters that have some priority for Canadians?

To indicate further the grounds upon which I feel this is a bad piece of legislation, I wish to make a personal observation. In my opinion this is another indication of the government's total lack of concern for individuals. I can only imagine that the government is more concerned with having a tidy piece of legislation that with the individual, and it is that essential thing which marks the difference between myself and the government. I was going to say this marks the difference between myself and the supporters of the government, but I know there are some hon. members opposite who are concerned for individuals. However, one would never gain that impression from reading legislation like this, especially considering it in the context of the role which this House is supposed to fulfil in the lives of individuals.

It does not matter how small or large a group you collect, it is made up of individuals. When you have a piece of legislation that directly affects the well-being of an individual you have to be aroused, as my colleague from Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) said, and you have to participate in the discussion. On that ground along this is a second-rate piece of legislation. I wonder why this legislation is before us? I have asked, is it because the government has nothing better to do or because it has no other legislation ready to bring before us? I think that is a fairly serious charge. This is the principal point which brought me into the debate on third reading.

Now, I am afraid I must extend my remarks, Mr. Speaker. I come back and deal again with external relations. I hope the Parliamentary Secretary will find an occasion to deal with the international implications of our taking a unilateral step in this way. I would like answers to questions which I am sure have not been dealt with up until now. Hon. members opposite can laugh if they want. I am concerned about whether or not there were international negotiations. If there were, what contribution has been made to the debate to satisfy government supporters that this is not a unilateral step taken without concern for reciprocal arrangements in other countries?

We have not heard from the minister and there has been no comment from the Department of External Affairs in connection with this question. It appears that we have put ourselves into a situation that may have serious effects on the individual. Before members in the House could, in conscience, vote approval of this measure they would have to satisfy themselves as to what would happen to men sailing ships under the Canadian flag when they arrive in foreign ports. Geographical location has no relationship to illness and these seamen could become ill in China or Australia just as easily and quickly as at home. I suggest this is bad legislation, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, may I call it one o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock I do now leave the Chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, if I might make a suggestion I think item No. 76 could be disposed of in five minutes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

RADIATION EMITTING DEVICES BILL

ESTABLISHMENT OF STANDARDS, APPOINTMENT OF INSPECTORS

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (for the Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that Bill S-14, respecting the sale and importation of certain radiation emitting devices, as reported (with an amendment) from the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs be concurred in.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Pepin (for the Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief, but I should like to draw the attention of the House to clause 13 of the bill where, in the case of an offence, the onus is placed upon the accused. Clause 13 reads:

> In any prosecution for an offence under this act, it is sufficient proof of the offence to establish that it was committed by an employee or agent of the accused whether or not the employee or agent is identified or has been prosecuted for the offence, unless the accused establishes that the offence was committed without his knowledge or consent and that he exercised all due diligence to prevent its commission.

This places the onus upon the accused to prove his innocence, something which has never been considered justice in Canada except by the Department of National Revenue which has taken this view for some time. I maintain that the onus should be on the prosecution to prove guilt and not upon the accused to prove innocence.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Monteith: Too much legislation is being brought before us in which the individual is losing his ordinary rights. In this particular case, the prosecution is given the opportunity to say "You are guilty". I cannot stress strongly enough the recent trend in legislation toward taking away the rights of the individual. I think this is completely wrong. Aside from that point, the legislation meets with my approval. When the matter was before the committee, unfortunately, either I was not a member of the committee or was out of Ottawa and I wonder if the Parliamentary Secretary could explain the amendment as reported by the committee.

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the amendment in committee actually pertains to section 2 of Bill S-14 and deals with the definition of a radiation emitting device. The amendment was that radiation emitting device means any device which emits radiation. This would meet the point of view of many members of the House who wanted to know whether a colour television set which emits a certain amount of radiation would be covered by this bill. As far as the other point raised by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith) is concerned, it was discussed by the legal authorities of the department both when this bill was studied—

Mr. Monteith: Bureaucracy is taking over.

Mr. Haidasz: —by the minister and also in committee, and we were assured that all of the provisions of this bill are in order. Such fears as those expressed by the hon. member for Perth really should not be entertained.

Mr. Monteith: I entertain them all right.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT RESEARCH CENTRE

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-12, to establish the International Development Research Centre.

He said: Mr. Speaker, we have before us a bill that was approved by this House on February 20 and has since been amended in the other place in two respects, as appears in Votes and Proceedings for March 24. I should first like to address myself to the amendment to clause 19. In approving this change, I understand the hon. senators were anxious to avoid the connotation of the term "charitable organization" used in the legislation as approved by the House. The terms was included in the bill simply to indicate the legal status of the centre for income tax and estate tax purposes and not to imply in any way that its activities in relation to the developing countries will be in the nature of "charity". The clause, as now amended, makes this legal reference quite explicit by quoting the respective acts. The centre's taxation position is thereby defined and protected, without the unnecessary implications of the term "charity".

In moving that this House concur in this amendment, I would commend our colleagues in the other place for their alertness and sensitivity in recognizing the undesirable reference of the original wording. Certainly, the House will agree that if international development is to be equated with charity, it will undoubtedly fail. For charity is often conceived as a vertical activity with the giver on top and the taker below. Development, on the other hand, must be considered as a lateral activity for the benefit and improvement of all parties. The reciprocal exchange of ideas and data made possible by research is particularly consistent with this lateral activity of international development. I am grateful to the hon. senators for noting this important distinction and I have no hesitation in recommending that we endorse the amendment.

Let me now turn to clause 10 (3), which was first introduced by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) in the committee. It has now been amended. It is now proposed that two of the governors of the centre who are Canadian citizens may be members of the Senate or members of the House of Commons. As I understand it, there are several combinations which would be made possible by this proposal. There could be one member from either the House of Commons or the Senate, or there could be two, both from one chamber. Although the potential parliamentary representation on the International Development Research Centre Board is thereby doubled, I hasten to point out that the operative word in the amendment is "may" and not "shall". The proposal remains therefore permissive, not mandatory. This was recognized by the committee of the other place on Foreign Affairs from whose report I now quote:

> The Governor in Council, under this amendment, does not have to appoint any member of parliament —It is permissive.

Nevertheless, the questions I raised on third reading here in the House are of even greater importance to us now. Though I do not wish to repeat my remarks, I believe those questions and my reservations which were expressed to be even more cogent in view of the present amendment.

Surely, we do not wish the International Development Research Centre to be viewed as an institution requiring special measures for surveillance by our legislative bodies. On the contrary, because of its international character and the need to establish clearly its integrity and objectivity as a research organization, it is imperative that the autonomy of this centre be protected. The respect felt for it in the international centres of the world could be seriously compromised if two members of our legislative bodies were to be appointed and regarded as representing a special form of supervision unique to the centre amongst Canadian governmental institutions. Hence their role should be clearly defined before any such appointments are made, and until there is clarification the government does not intend to make any such appointments.

The composition of the Board of Governors of the centre, then, has been of lengthy and considerable concern to both the House of Commons and to the Senate. I can only assume that this attention reflects a growing awareness among all Canadians of the vital importance of international development. At a time when investment in foreign aid is diminishing among many of the major donor countries, it is particularly encouraging to see Canadian leaders in all parties and in both houses represent with such responsible care, attentiveness, and thorough deliberation the international concerns of the Canadian people.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I share the minister's view that the Senate has performed a useful function in ensuring that there is no connotation of charity attached to this important proposal.

I hope, too, that in the course of carrying out international development research we shall also avoid attracting the word "paternalism"; there has been too much evidence of a latent paternalism, at any event, toward the developing countries.

As to clause 10, perhaps it would have been better had the government shown the courage of its convictions and voted my amendment down. Despite the fact that the committee supported by a substantial majority the view I held, the minister has declared that he does not intend to make the appointment. So be it. The arguments have been put forward in the committee, as they were at another stage of the proceedings here. If the government does not like this proposal there is open to it a perfectly valid and legitimate way of getting rid of it, that is, by using its majority in a perfectly democratic way to toss it out. It seems to me it is somewhat hypocritical to accept it and then to point out that the wording is permissive and say that the government will not make the appointment.

I have one other thing to say. It was never in my mind to suggest that the parliamentary representatives on such a board should exercise surveillance. I had the odd feeling that among the 264 members of this House and the 102 members of the Senate there just might be people whose competence in the field of international affairs is such that they could make a useful contribution, like the other 19 or 20 members of this board, to the on-going work of international development research. If the minister feels this is beyond the realm of possibility, that is up to him. I remain convinced that Members of Parliament and Senators can make a useful contribution to this work. If the minister does not like the proposal and will not make the appointments, why does he not have the bells rung and get rid of the proposal now so that it will not clutter up the record?

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, two considerations prevent my hon. friend and myself from insisting that we follow the suggestion of the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather), namely, that a vote should be called on the question whether this Senate amendment should be defeated. One of these considerations is the importance of getting this bill passed so that the centre can begin to function. Though he did not say so, I suspect the minister feels as we do on this point. I suspect the government has already been in touch with a number of people who are now waiting for the bill to become law before taking up their duties. If we were to defeat this proposal the bill would, I suppose, go back to the Senate and there would be further delays. In these circumstances I am satisfied merely to state our position briefly for the record, rather than to insist on a vote.

The other consideration I have in mind is the minister's firm undertaking not to make any appointments under this clause, thus ensuring that nothing will happen of a sort which I believe would be undesirable. When the proposal of the hon. member for Fundy-Royal first came before the committee he expressed it in mandatory terms. The words were: "One member of parliament shall be a governor..." After some discussion which, if my memory serves me correctly, I initiated, it was agreed that the word used should, at least, be "may" rather than "shall". I had grave doubts about the suggestion, then, even though I gave it reluctant support in the committee. I have graver doubts now, since the Senate wants a piece of the action. This is partly because of the opposition of myself and my party to the Senate as part of Canada's Parliament and partly because, though there may be some reason for the presence of an elected Member of Parliament on a board of this sort, I see no reason whatever why Senators, most of whom are members of God knows how many boards directing God knows how many large corporations, should be represented on a board of governors concerned with aid to developing countries. One has to be very polite when speaking of the other place but I think it was an excess of gall rather than an excess of zeal which made them suggest an amendment such as they have produced. We are thoroughly opposed to it. It is about time members in the other place knew they were appointed by the government and that there are things they ought not to be pushing themselves into. This is one of them.

• (2:20 p.m.)

I agree entirely with the uneasiness that the minister feels, and which my colleagues and I feel, about introducing this proposal in connection with an International Research Development Centre when a similar proposal has not been made with regard to any other Crown corporation. My information is that it is already the fact that some of the representatives of developing countries are wondering precisely whether this parliament is so anxious to have direct connection with the board of governors of the centre because it wants some direct political and Parliamentary supervision of the centre. I think it would be an egregious error to make any appointments under this clause.

I was delighted to hear the minister say in a forthright way—may I interject that forthrightness is a rare thing in a Minister, and one is delighted with it not only in view of the subject but also because it is there—that he will not make any appointments. I hope that at the earliest opportunity we will be able to discuss the whole question of a parliamentary member being appointed to boards of crown corporations to see whether this makes any sense at all.

I look to this centre to make a really valuable contribution to the problem of development in the less developed countries of the world. It will be able to do that only if it is a genuinely international body, if its entire orientation is toward developing countries and not toward Canada or any other developed country. In my estimation it will do this only if the board of governors includes in high positions, as well as among the membership of the board, fair representation from the developing countries. It will do this only if the priorities that the centre sets for itself are priorities that are agreed upon by the developing countries.

Finally, I think it will do the job of being a real stimulus to development in our sister countries that are not as fortunate as we are if much of its work is done in those developing countries—obviously, not all of them—and done in collaboration with institutes of research and development in developing areas of the world. It is with that approach and with that orientation that we enthusiastically supported this idea and that the committee of the House accepted some other changes to the original draft that sought to underline the international character of the centre, some of which changes I brought to the attention of the committee. I hope that the entire approach of the centre will be along that line.

There have been reports that the government is asking a Dr. Hopper to become president of the centre. I am informed by people who know him that he is a very able and sensitive person. I hope that he will agree to serve and that the government will be able to persuade him to do so. I hope that in its choice of vice-president and members of the board, the government will be as careful in its selection as the suggestion that the government is seeking Dr. Hopper for the job of president indicates that it is being careful in filling that position.

I do not intend to support the amendment to clause 10 of the bill. Although I think it is an undesirable amendment, I do not intend to take the time of the House by suggesting a recorded vote. I will yell "On Division" loud enough for Your Honour to hear me; I do not want to hold up passage of the bill.

As to the other amendment, it is obviously a desirable one. It achieves the same purpose that the original clause 19 had in mind, and does so in language that contains nothing offensive. Therefore, I certainly support the amendment on behalf of my colleagues. I sit down now, saying that if the Senate keeps on pushing itself into legislation in this way, the time may come soon to start an anti-Senate campaign that will be even more vigorous than it has been for several years.

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I also spoke earlier, before the bill was sent to the Senate, and I will try and restrain myself from repeating what I said at that time.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Hear, hear.

Mr. Anderson: The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) obviously heartily agrees with that approach.

The first amendment that the Senate has introduced is basically a tidying up amendment, and once more we can thank the Senators for taking the time and trouble to correct something that perhaps the committee of this House overlooked and should have picked up earlier. Indeed, this is the type of thing—a very small thing, I might add, but nevertheless precisely the sort of thing—that the Senate is meant to do. While I personally have doubts about the value of the Senate, it is nevertheless nice to know that, at least in this regard, Senators are doing their job.

Mr. Lewis: They have nothing else to do.

Mr. Anderson: In any event, I accept the amendment quite happily.

The second amendment gives me a great deal of trouble. Since I feel that the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), who spoke before me, expressed himself very well, I should like to adopt his approach. He pointed out that while he has no intention of forcing this matter to another vote which might send this particular bill back to the Senate, the amendment is nevertheless a bad one. I agree.

We have a curious situation here. A committee of this House put in an amendment to a bill with great reservations, as anyone who was on the committee knows. We struck out the words "a member of the House shall be appointed" and put in the words "a member of the House may be appointed", which could be done in any event without this amendment. We added superfluous language to the bill in order to indicate that, perhaps under certain circumstances, it might be a good idea to appoint a member of the House to this board.

Following that, the bill went to the Senate, and the Senators said that, "since this House thinks one elephant is a good thing, we will have two or three". The Senators are acting very much like the proverbial Hollywood director of the twenties, who thought one elephant was a good thing, a whole herd of elephants was a great deal better.

It is quite clear that the Senate have introduced an amendment which would result in the Senate insisting, if a member of this House were appointed to a board, on a Senator being appointed as well. That is a bad approach. This position is not a plum or a nice little job to be handed out to a member of the Senate or a member of the House simply because we think if would be nice. It is a working job, which needs a qualified person. Anybody reading the words of the Senate amendment will realize that the Senate amendment is motivated by the wrong approach. This is the wrong type of amendment to insert in the bill.

The dilemma described by the hon. member for York South is that if we vote against the amendment we will tie up valuable time in sending the matter back to the Senate for reconsideration. The matter would then have to return here for further debate. Therefore, it was with great pleasure that I heard the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) say this afternoon that he intends to regard these words, which include the word "may", as permissive only. He will be governed entirely by that. Indeed, he went further and indicated he has no intention of appointing either a member of this House or a member of the Senate to the board without very careful consideration. I think this is a wise attitude in the light of the Senate amendment.

The committee of the House made a change that was very tentative and permissive. We realized that there would perhaps be occasions when it might be desirable to have a member like the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson), who has had great experience in the field of international development, sit on this particular board. The bill was sent to the Senate and they clearly misread our intentions. Now, the bill has come back to the House, and by a decision of the minister, who has taken a very firm stand on this question, we are back to the point from which we started. It will, therefore, do no harm to leave this particular clause in the bill. Ideally, it would be better to scrub the whole thing at this point, and get rid of it. However, the procedural difficulties that we are faced with will make me, like the hon. member for York South, keep my mouth closed when the amendment comes to a vote. I do not intend to vote for the amendment.

However, I think the principle that we introduced in the committee should not be entirely lost, even though the Senate has unfortunately treated this matter as it should not have been treated. I still feel that the original amendment proposed by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) had certain merit. Not every board should have a Member of Parliament on it. Neither should every commission. However, there are occasions when the service of a member on such a board, commission or other body might be desirable.

In putting forth this amendment in committee, we simply raised the suggestion that perhaps this was an area where a member might be appointed. I hope the fact that the minister has quite rightly decided, in the light of the Senate amendment, not to appoint members of Parliament to this particular board will not result in the idea being abandoned. I hope in future, under certain circumstances, the government will reconsider, and regard Members of Parliament as first-class citizens, just as able and capable of being appointed to boards as any other citizen in this country, or as in this very particular case a citizen of any other country. I do not think we should be barred from such service just because we hold office here. I hope this unfortunate development which has taken place with regard to this particular bill will not result in the idea being lost for the future.

Mr. Thomson: Will the hon. member permit a question? Where will a Member of Parliament find time to serve on these boards?

Mr. Anderson: The hon. member has asked where a Member of Parliament will find the time. If we were not serving on committees of the House, we would probably say that we do not have time for committees. Some hon.

members make speeches. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) speaks frequently throughout the country on a number of subjects. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and ministers of the crown do the same. Members of Parliament can make time to do such things. Some Members of Parliament manage to carry on a business or farming activity in addition to their service in the House. There is the possibility that some members could find enough time for service on one of these boards. The hon. member may disagree, but I have a different opinion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the representatives of the parties. It has been agreed that we should now proceed to private members' hour, proceed with private members' business for one hour and rise at that time.

Some hon. Members: Where's the legislation?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I might point out to hon. members that there are about 30 pieces of legislation now before the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS PUBLIC BILLS

CANADA DAY ACT

MEASURE TO SUBSTITUTE "CANADA" FOR "DOMINION"—REPORT STAGE

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-29 (Amended title: An Act respecting Confederation Day), as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. In the event that these amendments might come forward for a vote later this day, I might make the following suggestion, that motions numbered 1, 3, 5 and 7, which were first received in order of time, be given priority, grouped for purposes of debate and disposed of in one division, if required. Since motions numbered 2, 4, 6 and 8 propose the same question as do motions numbered 1, 3, 5 and 7, those motions in effect will be disposed of at the same time. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will now put motion No. 1.

Mr. Colin D. Gibson (Hamilton-Wentworth) moved:

That Bill C-29, respecting Confederation Day, be amended by substituting in Clause 1 the words "Canada Day" for the words "Confederation Day" at lines 4 and 5.

Mr. Bell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The public bills hours has been moved ahead this afternoon and we would like to put a reservation of a procedural nature on the debate. We were preparing a procedural argument on this bill. What would happen to it should it take the full hour this afternoon? There seems to be a disagreement among the procedural experts of the House as to whether it would drop to the bottom of the list. We are quite agreeable to going ahead with it, but I would like to put a full reservation on this subject. I hope that we will be given an opportunity at some stage to argue that this bill should not drop in the regular way to the bottom of the list should it be talked out this afternoon.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, that is a very legitimate concern on the part of the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell). If this stage of the proceedings has not been disposed of by the end of the hour this afternoon, I suggest the bill should retain its place on the Order Paper so that it may come up first at the next time public bills are called. Perhaps if the House is agreeable, that could be made an order, and hon. members could present their arguments at a later stage in the proceedings.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Colin D. Gibson (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I take great pleasure in moving the amendments to Bill C-29, moving that the name of our national holiday be Canada Day as originally proposed by a respected senior member of this House, the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Brown), one of the most popular and respected members of this House both in seniority and experience. His idea was Canada Day. Let us preserve that idea. Let us crown this member's fine career to this stage at least by honouring his idea which is the result of many years of experience in the House of Commons.

My objection to the name Confederation Day is based on the fact that the word "Confederation" does not have any real definitive significance for Canadians. It does not reflect our history. In fact, to quote that noted constitutional authority, Maurice Ollivier:

> Confederation applies to sovereign states which, without losing any degree of their sovereignty, unite for certain specific purposes, and at the same time, reserve the right to abandon this union, which is valuable only so long as it serves their purposes.

Dr. Ollivier gives as an example the Confederation of the Rhine, which existed in 1805 under the protection of Napoleon and was dissolved several years later. We also have the example of the Confederate States of the United States of America which have a different background from the colonies of Canada which became a Federation by Act of Parliament of the United Kingdom.

I wish to thank the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Gervais) and the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) who have both expressed themselves forcefully in support of this motion at the committee stage. As Members of Parliament from Quebec they have expressed the same view as I have, a member from Ontario, that no name compares in suitability to that of Canada Day.

• (2:40 p.m.)

A recent poll conducted by the Ottawa Citizen revealed that a large majority of the people favoured the name Canada Day as opposed to Confederation Day. I recall an occasion in my area last July when 10,000 people, young and old, assembled at Stoney Creek for a Canada Day celebration. Although it was unofficial, it was official in their minds. With the co-operation, support, friendship and good will of this House of Commons this measure could be passed this afternoon. I hope we can take a new constitutional step forward by passing this amendment in respect of Canada Day. The spirit and soul of our nation demands response to a strong will on the part of the Canadian people to develop our significance as a united nation. One method of so doing is to unite behind this amendment today. We have the opportunity today. It is a rare opportunity and a wonderful chance for those of us who are present in this House today to lay stress on unity by creating a change in Canada by unanimous consent. If any member should dissent, may I point out that the cause will be delayed. This bill will go to the bottom of a large pile of bills and never return here for months.

I appeal to all members of the Conservative party to unite with us in respect of this amendment. I understand there is a general disposition on all sides of the House to pass the amendment. If toward the end of the hour any member should continue talking so that a vote may not be taken on this bill, the unity which seems to exist in this House today would be destroyed. If toward the end of this hour this should happen we would be losing a real opportunity for co-operation. When I look across the way and see the hon. member for Halifax I think of the history of that part of Canada. When I see the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) I think of the tremendous historical significance of his part of the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gibson: I think of the great history that learned gentleman represents. When I think of these members, who are strong Canadian Members of Parliament, I cannot help but feel that there will be a disposition to pass this bill.

An hon. Member: What about the hon. member from Edmonton?

Mr. Gibson: Edmonton, too. I think of the fine people from Edmonton to Victoria. It is with a real feeling of national pride that I stand here today.

Mr. Osler: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? Does the hon. member recall that this is the one-hundredth anniversary of Canada becoming Canada, and that we became a three million square mile country instead of—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question?

Mr. Gibson: Certainly.

Mr. Brewin: I should like to ask the hon. member whether he would direct his honeyed words beyond Halifax to this corner of the House.

Mr. Gibson: Certainly, Mr. Speaker. As I look at the learned member for Greenwood, who is always eloquent during hours like this, and as I look around this chamber at other hon. members, it occurs to me that I have never seen this House so united. It would seem that every member of this House wants Canada to move. If we go along with this amendment, we will be helping this country to develop constitutionally and we will be a part of the process of change in our Canadian history. Every one of us here today, in a small way, will play his part by simply wanting to pass this bill this afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, through you, I wish to assure the hon. member that I, at least, warmly support this motion. The hon. member may have noticed that a similar motion appears in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Had I any doubt before about the propriety of this motion I would have lost it immediately upon learning that this motion, in effect, is co-sponsored by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

We are faced with a choice between the word "Confederation", which as has been well pointed out by the hon. member is inappropriate to our particular status, and the word "Canada". I hope my brand of nationalism is crossed with a sense of the importance of international developments. I am not by nature a chauvinistic person. It seems to me, however, when dealing with this historic day which represents the foundation of our country, particularly at a time like the present when we are rocked with a certain amount of difficulty and doubt, we should have no hesitation in choosing the term "Canada Day" rather than "Confederation Day".

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, despite the very nice things which have been said by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Gibson), I regret that I must stand up and say it does not seem to be necessary or desirable to make this change. We constantly see our historic past being chipped away, not deliberately, but more or less by natural erosion. I think the people who suggested the term "Dominion of Canada" at the London conference and at the Charlottetown and other conferences when the nation Canada was formed did not make a mistake. The word "dominion" is a quotation from the bible—"dominion from sea to sea". It has honourable origins. The statement has been made that somehow or other the word "dominion" implies not complete and full sovereignty. It does not necessarily have that connotation except to those who deliberately read such an interpretation into it. This subject was discussed at length before the committee. I recommend to hon. members proceedings Nos. 14 and 17 of the committee, in particular the testimony of Mr. Eugene Forsey. The matter was discussed at length and it was pointed out quite clearly that, while some people had the impression that the word dominion somehow meant that the nation was not fully sovereign, this is an incorrect view.

Should we go along with the suggestion by some people that we should abolish Dominion Day and thus endorse this incorrect view? That is the question before the House. I do not think it is necessary or wise to go along with or endorse this incorrect view. I think we should state flatly that there is no need for this country to constantly search for new ways to demonstrate we are united, or not united, or that we are a sovereign country or something else. We talk too much about something we should take more for granted. I think we should grow up and accept the fact that this particular term, which comes from our rich history, was brought in by no other people than by our excellent Fathers of Confederation whose faces stare grimly down at us from so many pictures in this House. I think we should recognize that this word, and this day, are connected with the historic event of Confederation when the first provinces joined together. It does not, to my mind, in any way imply that we are not united Canadians, as I gather others who have spoken before we believe.

The term "dominion from sea to sea" has a biblical connotation. The implication is that we are united right from the Pacific to the Atlantic. Although I quite agree that one should attempt at all times to encourage a healthy spirit of nationalism in Canada, I do not think in the expression "Dominion Day" there is anything that would take away from the spirit of unity. I think this has a rather attractive connection with the days of 1867 and indeed before 1867 when this question was discussed at length. I could of course carry on at much greater length on this point but I understand another member who represents an area where this particular decision was taken wishes to speak in this debate. I will shortly defer to him.

I simply wish to say that personally I do not approve of this change. I do not think that the substitution of the word "Confederation" or "Canada" for the word "Dominion" would do anything but change something which has served us well. As I said earlier, there are people who misunderstand this particular word. I think our job should be to go out and point out to them that they are wrong in their understanding. As I see it, our job should not be to endorse their view and to change this interesting semantic connection with the earliest days of our country. What we should get back to is the spirit of a century ago. I say this, thinking ahead to the Quebec election where, for the first time, an organized and fighting separatist party has emerged with a fair chance of getting a good number of votes and of seats. What we should do is get back to those days when people realized that this country would not be perfect and that it would have difficulties, yet nevertheless decided to unite and cast their lot in together.

I think that changes such as this one do not encourage us to look back to those days when this country was born. It is all too easy to say that Canada is not really a viable nation. This is wrong. We should look back to the tremendous strains which were put on this country over the last century, the tremendous obstacles and difficulties that were overcome in 1864 and 1867, and realize, by looking backward, that the present difficulties are perhaps minor compared with those faced by our people a century ago.

I regret that I cannot agree with this suggestion of my hon. friend from Hamilton whose enthusiasm I admire greatly, or the suggestion of the hardworking member for Brant (Mr. Brown). I do not believe that the day on which we celebrate Confederation, namely Dominion Day should have its name changed.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, for a while I thought we were getting into something like a love-feast. I was much flattered by the generous remarks of the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Gibson), but I must say that while I was charmed and delighted by his compliments I was actually more impressed by the arguments of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Anderson). For a moment I thought, when the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth was referring to me, that he was suggesting that in some way I have become a museum piece. It made me feel terribly important because I understand that yesterday when I was on my way back from my constituency and a few minutes late in arriving in the House, a minister noted that the country was momentarily bereft of my services. In this place, such things could go to the head of a normally modest person!

I have been interested in this matter for a long time. I think it is well that we look at these things because the mark of a civilized society is the interest of its members in intangibles. In fact, I remember a very learned anthropologist coming to the conclusion that the only difference between a civilized group of people and an uncivilized one was that the civilized people believed in symbols or baubles and that they found something beyond the purely intrinsic to which they gave social value. So it is fitting that we discuss our national birthday, its significance, and it is fitting that we discuss ways whereby we can improve and enrich the celebration of our national birthday.

The fact that I thoroughly agree with the hon. member who has just spoken does not mean that I think there is no value in our canvassing other suggestions, and I too have the highest regard for the person who in this session brought to our consideration and deliberation the question of a change of name for our natal day. Birthdays are important to individuals. It is the one day in families where birthdays are celebrated on which a little extra attention is given to the person who is recalling that important event, his day.

We have reasons for celebrating July 1, and they have been touched upon. Something was consummated on that day, something that is very unique and very important. I appreciate the reference that was made to the city of Charlottetown which I have the honour of representing and which proudly and properly calls itself the cradle of Confederation, because it was in that city in 1864 that men of goodwill from the various colonies of what was then called British North America came together, with reasonableness, common sense and a regard for the problems, interests and preferences one of another, and began the process of confederating those colonies.

As Sir John A. Madonald said more than once, practically everything that was finally agreed upon in a formal way had in fact been informally agreed upon at Charlottetown in 1864. That it took three years to give formality to this indicates, as the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich pointed-out, that it was not by any means an easy process, indeed that it was an extremely difficult one. I think we have been remiss, as we Canadians so often have been about our heritage, in not praising sufficiently the great men who accomplished a remarkable achievement in nation-building.

We talk about Cavour, about Bismarck and about other great men, but our founding fathers, in a uniquely Canadian way—perhaps a plodding, unexplosive and unrevolutionary way, but in a uniquely Canadian way—achieved the birth of a new country over great difficulties, a country which has survived through many difficulties and on which there have been stresses and strains since July 1 when it was created.

Today we are always looking for something unique, something that is ours. We are fretting about losing our cultural heritage and our distinctive identity. It seems to me we strengthen our present by recalling and glorifying—I do not hesitate to use the word—the past. Sometimes I am told that we must have a new name for our national day because if we use the word "dominion" we are going back to the past. How in heaven's name can you celebrate a birthday without going back to the date of birth? It has always struck me as preposterous.

The amendment today refers to the substitution of the name Canada Day for Confederation Day. I think that the use of Confederation Day was an interesting suggestion but it recalls the process of confederating, the getting together of the colonies or provinces. But the product of the process was dominion, a new nation brought into being, and I think it is more appropriate and fitting to recall the product which emerged, which has remained with us and which we all hope will continue as the heritage of our founding fathers.

I never believe that one is very thoughtful or productive if he digs in against every suggested change. The man who is eternally the champion of the status quo is not likely to do too much for his contemporary society. I remember reading a humorous report about an old, old man being interviewed by a newspaper reporter. On those occasions they always ask such an old man what is his secret of long life: if he is one kind of chap it is his quart a day, and if he is another kind of chap it is that he did not smoke and did not drink. The reporter said to this old man, "I suppose, sir, in all your long life you have seen many changes". "Yes," said the old man, "and I was agin every one of them." But this is not my attitude. If change is improvement, if change is progress, if change is betterment of course you opt for change; but not for change for the sake of change, not constantly looking for something a little different just because it is different.

To alter this symbol and to change that name, to remove that title and put something else in its place is not of itself productive. There is meaning in the expression "dominion". The hon. member has referred to the biblical background. Since Maritimers are perhaps in the forefront of the righteous, it is not surprising it was a Maritimer who was reading the Good Book, and he came to Psalm 72.

We have it on our coat of arms; as we enter this building we can see engraved over the doorway, "The open sea is at her gates, Her gates both east and west." Recently I was reading a speech Sir Wilfrid Laurier made many years ago on a Dominion Day, and he closed his magnificently eloquent speech by simply quoting those lines. This surely symbolizes Canada. I think it is appropriate that I from the east, where it all began, should follow a member from the west; this is symbolic of all the great expansion across this country. This is what "dominion" means; it is the extension of a united government.

I have a feeling that many people are a bit hung-up on semantics and they think it is domination we are talking about. It is not that at all. We went through the same thing, not personally but historically, during the First World War. The propaganda of the Allies was that "Deutschland Über alles" meant the Germans wanted to be the champions of the whole world. But what it meant in the national anthem in the more decent days of Bismark was that the fatherland was more important than its components. This is what the expression "dominion" involves. The new entity was more than the sum of its parts, and certainly more than any of its parts. I think this is the kind of thing we want to evoke in our own hearts and the hearts of our countrymen as we celebrate our national day.

They say that people from small communities are more emotionally attached to them than people are attached to big communities. We are indeed sentimental about small communities. Lord Tweedsmuir told us in Charlottetown long ago that there was something about small countries that drew their people to them. He said that perhaps because a country is small it is easier to carry it in your heart. I would always hope that my emotional attachment to Prince Edward Island—and as a highland Scot we are filled with sentiment and emotion and are not as practical as we might well be in the marketplace—will never supersede my loyalty and attachment to the dominion. It seems to me that if that is not the case we are not going to hold together.

I am always impressed by the preamble to the British North America Act:

> Whereas the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick have expressed their desire to be federally united into one Dominion—

Someone made reference to events that may come, that may cause us concern and research ing of values. But it is the desire to be united that is very important. When that desire is gone there is no name, no title, no slogan that will be sufficient to encompass the reality. But in that preamble there is another reason why the name Canada Day is quite inappropriate for our national birthday, because the preamble says:

> Whereas the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick—

There we are enumerating the parts which formed the new entity. Our ancestors in Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia did not invite the Canadians to Charlottetown, did not come up to Quebec and did not go to Westminster with them to be submerged into or subsumed under one of the existing provinces, namely, Canada. I say this because the new title, the Dominion of Canada, signified and typified a new political entity. To call it Canada today would be stepping back and picking up the name of one of the constituent parts. I think it would be a very backward step, and here I am being helpful to the people who are supporting a government which is having a little trouble identifying with the east and the west, because the country is a great and broad country. It is not just that part which used to be called Canada East and Canada West. It is a new community and a great community.

I think, too, that those who are concerned about the idea that there is something antique and colonial about this should recall that it was under the title of "dominion" that this country not only achieved its own fully recognized independence but led—and not always is Canada able to lead on the international scene; not always is that position available to us. But in the days of Borden, Canada was in the forefront of asserting its own independence. If we had anything like a declaration of independence it would be the Statute of Westminster, and there are plenty references to the word "dominion" in that particular declaration of our independence.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Macquarrie: Certainly.

Mr. McGrath: I hesitate to interrupt the honourable and learned member, who is a noted Canadian historian, but is he not aware that in the same Statute of Westminster, Newfoundland was also declared a dominion?

Mr. Macquarrie: I am actually aware of that, Mr. Speaker, but it does not force me to abandon either my thesis or my emotional conviction. There was a time when Newfoundland, as the ancient dominion, asserted great leadership, but I know of no historical document which would indicate that the leadership in constitutional development, from colony to independence, gave primacy to Newfoundland over Canada. But I am sure that Sir Robert Borden was well aware of Newfoundland. In fact had things gone a little better at the time, Newfoundland might have come in with the rest of our dominion at that time rather than prolonging their marriage, regrettably I think, for another 30 years.

Mr. McGrath: Shame! I am surprised at the hon. member.

Mr. Macquarrie: I think my colleague misses the thrust of my welcome toward the ancient dominion. I also believe that this suggestion of Canada Day is not a very artistic one. I do not want to be overly critical, but I think it confuses what exists among many people in Britain, in Europe, and probably in other parts of the world—a difference between a name day and a birthday. There are many people who have two celebrations. It is fortunate, I suppose, when you have a name day and that is a celebration, and you have a birthday which celebrates only one event, obviously your birth. I think there is confusion here and it will be a preposterous suggestion to make to other countries. I can imagine an American going around on July 4 saying, "This is United States Day", or the President of France on Bastille Day saying, "I am celebrating France Day" or Mao Tse-tung saying, "This is China Day".

• (3:10 p.m.)

In these efforts toward something new there is a danger of losing something valuable. I say this with regret because I have the highest regard for the proposer of the original bill and for the man who is trying to get us back to that original bill today. I notice that the committee did not leave much of the original bill intact, except the number.

I hope this House will not adopt the suggestion but will cleave to something that is significant and unique to Canada and continue to celebrate something that was done in 1867 with more hope, confidence and unity than ever before. That is, the creation of a dominion proud, free and independent, one which we hope will remain united and strong. Let us not be afraid to use that word "dominion" which marks our independence, recalls our birth and gives all of us in all parts of this House and from all parts of this country the opportunity to work together in a free and independent nation created by those who were in this place before us.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join briefly in the discussion of Bill C-29 and to express to the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Gibson) who moved this amendment, my appreciation of his concern and my awareness of the sincerity of his efforts to bring to the attention of the Canadian people the significance of the celebration of our birthday. The original bill is deserving of equal treatment and consideration because it voices concern, and as long as there is this concern the well-being of Canada is protected.

In all fairness I must join my colleagues, the hon. member from Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) and the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Anderson), and indicate to the hon. member and to you, Mr. Speaker, that I think it is rather unnecessary that we are here this afternoon dealing with the name of the birthday of my country. I share the views and fears of some hon. members who have spoken this afternoon, as well as the views and fears indicated by some of my constituents in regard to the change of name.

In the last few weeks I have studied the meaning of the word "dominion". Not being a distinguished historian, I consulted the Concise Oxford Dictionary and with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to read the definition given there:

> dominion, lordship, sovereignty, control; domains of feudal lord, territory of sovereign or government; Dominion of Canada, name given to Canadian colonies united 1867; Dominion of New Zealand, title given 1907; Dominion of Ceylon, 1948.

In law it means right of possession. The interpretation in law is that the possessor possesses what is in his possession. But this country is ours, mine, and nobody needs to remind me on July 1 that the name of the country whose birth I am celebrating is Canada. I do not need to be reminded by the amendments before us that on July 1 we are celebrating the anniversary of the confederation of the parts. I think we should recognize the danger of chipping away at those things which are meaningful to most of us.

The hon. member for Hillsborough is correct when he says that Canada is not any of its parts, but the Dominion of Canada is something more than the sum of all those parts. It is manifesting itself this week in the fear, rightly or wrongly, of whether we will have a country a week from today.

An hon. Member: Not a dry eye in the House!

Mr. Forrestall: However, it is not in the context of what is happening in one of the provinces that I want to make my remarks this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, though it does point out the necessity of maintaining our identity as a nation. It seems to me rather important that we not turn our backs on the few tangible symbols that have withstood the pressures of 100 years.

Regretfully, I must indicate to my hon. friend that I think his amendment is redundant. I think it is a frustrated desire to do something worth while. I only wish he had directed his efforts to matters a little more productive of national unity rather than to a symbol which portrays the very essence of my right to possess what is mine. I wish I had my notes available so that I could tell the hon. member from whence the word "dominion" came.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I was very impressed with the discourse of the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie). As I listened, I was reminded of the warm June days about exam time in school when I sat and dreamed of things that might have been and should have been, and wondered at the greatness of it all. However, Mr. Speaker, Canada did not develop quite as simply as that. I was impressed with our history, but surely we must go onward. Without the doubtful benefit of having had a revolution in Canada, we do not have a Bastille Day nor an Independence Day. We did not develop that way.

Canada Day Act

I think most young people think of dominion as a special status in the British empire. I was surprised, unlike my hon. friend, to learn that Newfoundland was a dominion. I thought it was a colony, never dreaming it had reached the status of a dominion. For a long time Canada was proud of her status as a dominion within the British empire. Originally we were a colony, as has been mentioned, and then through a compromise on the part of Great Britain we became a dominion in the British empire, that status being somewhat greater than colonial status and somewhat less than the status achieved by revolution in the country to our south.

We have heard over the years, as we are hearing in the present election campaign in Quebec, that Canada is not a nation, that it is subject to the political will of others and that the influence of other nations is still at work in this country. I for one—and I believe most people share my feelings—think that "dominion" is a status we have grown out of. It is true that historically our nation was established by the action of a number of equal partners. But in my opinion what really made Canada a nation was not any act of Parliament but rather the role which Canada was able to play in two wars. During those wars when the apron strings of the mother country were loosened, we took on a national identity that otherwise might have been denied us.

I think most people agree that in these days our identity as a nation is established and that Canada Day ought to commemorate the day on which the dominion became a nation. History will not deny that we once enjoyed dominion status; it will not detract from the achievements that led to the colonization of this nation; it will not detract from the achievements of the people who originally came here. Certainly those who are yet to come will be aware of our history.

Also, I think it is more honest if we call this important national day Canada Day. Some people say we celebrate our birthday on that day, and this is a custom which has developed over a considerable period. There are conservatives—I spell that with a small "c"—who are unhappy when we give up anything of any significance at all in our history. To some extent we are all that way. These remarks may also apply to a young lady of illustrious name who is contemplating marriage. Having borne the illustrious name for 17 or 18 years, she does not wish to change it, but changes it in any event because the change will bring advantages. By taking another name she does not change the illustrious history of her former name. If we are to celebrate a day which is the anniversary of our establishment as a nation, I think we are in the position of that young lady. I think it is a step most Canadians wish to take, because we shall not be renouncing any of the illustrious parts of our history.

[Mr. Peters.]

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I was not in the House this afternoon when debate began on the amendment of the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Gibson). In my opening remarks I wanted to say that one of the supporters of the general proposition underlying the bill is my good friend from Brantford, the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Brown).

At the outset I should like to suggest to him and to others who are anxious, as demonstrated by this initiative, to change this particular aspect of Canadian history, that the initiative arises from a lack of appreciation of the true nature of that part of Canada which is beyond what those from western Canada refer to as central Canada or upper and lower Canada. I am sure that anybody who travels beyond the boundaries of the two central provinces acquires a sense of the broad sweep of Canada and a fresh appreciation of what is really involved in the term Dominion of Canada that is not possible until one has broken out of one's shell, as it were.

I am speaking briefly on this subject this afternoon because in Manitoba we are celebrating our centennial this year. Manitoba did not come into Canadian Confederation in 1867, simply because there was no province of Manitoba in the year of Confederation. We were carved out of the Northwest Territories, out of a wilderness that some pessimists in those days said would never be of any economic significance or any important part of this great Dominion of Canada. I suppose when we celebrate our birthday on July 15 of this year we will be marking the formal entrance of Manitoba as the first "in" province to use a phrase that has been chosen for the celebration, because we must note the fact that we are the first province outside the original group which joined Confederation. We will be very proud to refer to that day as Manitoba Day.

Speaking from the perspective of a Member of Parliament who represents a province that was not party to Confederation in 1867, I think hon. members will understand why we are not sympathetic to the idea of changing Dominion of Canada Day to Confederation Day or even refining it further to Canada Day. It is not Confederation Day as far as Manitoba is concerned. It is Dominion of Canada Day and that, of course, is enshrined in the official motto inscribed in the stonework at the entrance to this building, A mari usque ad mare—"He shall have dominion from sea to sea." I think it would be most inappropriate in this year 1867—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dinsdale: I beg your pardon; I meant to say 1970. I see some of my hon. friends are amused.

An hon. Member: Keep up to date.

Mr. Stanfield: We are living in 1970, unlike some of you fellows.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Dinsdale: My hon. friends on the opposite side of the House are seeing much hilarity in this matter. I was going to make the point that in the year 1970, when Manitoba is celebrating its entry into Confederation, we should stop juggling history in this respect and trying to rewrite it by substituting words that are fundamental in describing the historical process that has gradually seen this nation evolve from its beginning in 1867. Manitoba entered Confederation in 1870, and British Columbia in 1871. The two Prairie provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan entered in 1905. I am reminded by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) that Prince Edward Island, which really sarted the whole process, came in in 1873. More recently, the dominion of Newfoundland came in 1949. This is a part of Canada which has been described as Britain's oldest colony—the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) will correct me if I am wrong—and it has been called Canada's newest dominion, I think that is the word used, or at least our newest province.

In 1967 we celebrated Canada's 100th birthday. In that year an attempt was made by Canadians in all the provinces to look back on our history and our origins. I believe it was Sir Edmund Burke, known as the father of philosophic conservatism, who said that a nation which had no regard for its history or its ancestry had very little hope of posterity.

In recognizing this principle of nationhood, we realize, as the hon. member for Temiskaming (Mr. Peters) has pointed out, that we have no revolutionary tradition. If ours had been such a tradition, we would likely have no nation today. Our traditions are evolutionary. We have developed a national consensus because we have moved forward on the basis of accumulated traditions. It is the revolutionary nation which suddenly leaps forward with new names and new ideas, dramatically repudiating their past. In the past week throughout the world there has been some observance of the glorious October Revolution of 1917 when a nation broke with its traditions. Talk about rewriting history! As I read the reports there have been attempts to elevate the conduct of that revolution, one Lenin, from sinner to saint. They are trying to place around the head of that individual the halo of saintliness.

Another revolutionary change was marked by the rise to power of the nazi movement in Germany. When Hitler was reminded that history would condemn him for his actions, he said history would never condemn him because he would rewrite it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Dinsdale: We do not want to rewrite history in those terms.

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired and according to the order passed by the House this afternoon the time allotted for private members' business has also expired.

I think I owe it to hon. members to refer briefly to the procedural aspect of the bill and the amendments now before the House. The Chair has had serious doubts whether this amendment is in order, in the sense that what we have before us—as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie)—is not the bill which stood originally in the name of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Brown) but an entirely new bill. What we have been considering, substantially, is a bill standing in the name of the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Gibson). It might well be argued that under the terms of our standing orders, if the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth wanted this bill to be considered he should have introduced it in the same way as the hon. member for Brant introduced his own measure.

The question is whether a bill can be so amended in committee that it is not the same bill at all as when it came before the House. As the hon. member pointed out, the only thing left of the original bill is its number. I did not raise this point earlier, realizing that hon. members were anxious to discuss both aspects of this proposal. At the same time, I do not believe a precedent should be established for the consideration of an amendment of this kind. I am saying this ex post facto. I realize that if there had been real objection, and I had wanted to hear arguments for or against the bill from a procedural aspect, the matter should have been raised before. I do think the objections should be mentioned now, however, so that this form of amendment will not be used as a precedent should a similar situation arise later.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADA-U.S.—TABLING OF AGREEMENT ON RECIPROCAL FISHING PRIVILEGES

Mr. Speaker: I understand the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) would like the unanimous consent of the House to return to Motions for the purpose of tabling a document. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the other day I promised I would table a copy of the agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the United States of America on reciprocal fishing privileges in certain areas off the coasts of the two countries. This agreement was signed this afternoon, and since a public announcement is to be made I thought it would be only courteous to seek the first opportunity to table it in the House.

On motion of Mr. Cadieux (Labelle) the House adjourned at 3.40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, April 27, 1970

The House met at 2 p.m.

NEW MEMBER

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Chief Electoral Officer a certificate of the election and return of the following member:

Of Douglas Charles Rowland, Esquire, for the electoral district of Selkirk.

HOUSING

STATEMENT ON PROJECTS UNDER CMHC EXPERIMENTAL FUND

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, last February 2 I indicated that a sum of $200 million out of CMHC's capital budget for 1970 was being reserved temporarily in order to proceed with some experimental projects to provide shelter for low-income families. The object was to provide a catalyst to launch an intensive movement to find more effective ways to house families in the $4,000 to $6,000 income group. The reaction this proposal has generated from municipalities and provinces, and especially from the builders, has been most encouraging and I believe has justified our hope of two months ago.

In view of the number of proposals which were received, a special group of senior CMHC officials was formed under the direct chairmanship of the president to evaluate each of them. Proposals varied from municipal offers to convey land to developers at the cost of servicing, to amendments in zoning regulations and bylaws to permit higher densities, to a provincial offer from Alberta to provide the builder with a 2 per cent interest rebate on NHA loans under this program, to various new building techniques that eliminate unnecessary frills and provide higher densities without a dehumanizing overconcentration of units.

In view of this positive response and in order to maintain the incentive effect, I have instructed CMHC to proceed with negotiations on 15 projects which are to be located in the following cities; St. John's, Newfoundland, 50 units; Halifax, 60 units; Moncton, 150 units; Montreal, 1,450 units; Hull, 300 units; Kitchener, 50 units; Calgary, 200 units; Regina, 50 units; Vancouver, 300 units, and Toronto, 1,800 units. I have further instructed the officials to finalize discussions with all possible dispatch. This first phase of this special $200 million program for low-cost housing will involve the release of close to $56 million of this special fund and will provide for some 4,400 units and 200 hostel beds.

Before closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to emphasize that the real significance of this special program lies in the commitment implicit in these proposals to provide good, clean housing for families with incomes in the range of $4,000 to $6,000 per year. The projects thus authorized will be programmed for 1970 starts, and I am hopeful I will be able to announce the second phase of this program before the House rises.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to reply to the minister because I sincerely believe that innovation and experimentation are some of the keys in respect of housing and so far as the future of Canada is concerned. The housing authorities forecast a need for some two and a half million homes by the end of 1970 at a cost of $4 billion. Therefore we can readily see that the housing crisis presents a very great challenge to all of us. It will call for a great deal of imagination and co-operation at all levels of government and also of the industry, which is also so much involved. We are all interested in new house building techniques, and I hope the minister is placing some emphasis on the acceptability of mobile homes, modular construction and pre-fab mass production because of the need for these types of homes to be accepted in order to bring the cost down.

When we speak of innovations and new technique I think we must be aware of the fact that housing starts are down as much as 95 per cent in Saskatchewan, and of course we are all very aware of the figures in Toronto. We must be very concerned about the lack of money which is a critical factor in housing and, of course, one must place a great emphasis on the fact that high interest rates also are a very great deterrent. No matter how many innovations or new techniques we are presented with, the effect of these innovations and techniques will be minimal unless ways are found to ensure that an adequate supply of mortgage money is available.

In my respectful submission, the minister has three choices. First, he can ensure that CMHC makes more money available for mortgages. His second alternative is to have serious discussions with the lending institutions which seem to be more interested in equity and a piece of the action. As a matter of fact, they have stated that the amount of mortgage money so far as they are concerned will be very small. So I think the minister must reassess this whole problem to ensure that more mortgage moneys are allocated for this purpose.

He should also discuss the matter of housing with his confrere, the Minister of Finance who so far as I am concerned—and I say this with a great deal of respect—has shown no appreciation of the need for housing, particularly in view of his white paper which brings homes into the capital gains structure, and has shown very little interest in new societies in terms of bringing more money into housing.

In closing I should like to say that urban renewal also is a fact of life and as long as we have these great megalopolises we shall be continually confronted with urban renewal. I hope the minister will reassess the position he has taken with regard to urban renewal because there are many people in Canada in the low-income brackets who are looking for leadership and direction in this regard.

[Mr. Alexander.]

We on this side of the House are very pleased that there has been concerted action on the part of industry and the government to attempt to solve the very critical housing situation but, as I stated earlier, the key to solving the problem of housing lies in the provision of more mortgage moneys and the lowering of the exorbitant interest rates.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): On February 2 when the minister in charge of housing announced the capital budget of CMHC he said that $570 million would be applied to low-income families and persons. The breakdown of that figure indicated that 265 million would go for public housing, $105 million would go for low-rental housing and the development of co-operative housing, and $200 million would be reserved temporarily for innovations and the balancing of distribution based on need.

The minister's statement today is in regard to the $200 million. The minister said in February that that amount of money would produce 35,000 housing units for low-income families. I wish to remind the House that, as I said last week, there are 100,000 families across Canada on public housing waiting lists, and the 35,000 housing units to be built this year will cover less than one-third of the total need. The target should be between 60,000 and 70,000 for this year alone and will necessitate a substantial increase in the public housing budget.

The statement made today is only factual and does not deal with any innovations in the housing field. The minister said there will be 15 projects in 10 different cities, the net result of which will be 4,400 housing units and 200 hostel beds at a cost of $56 million. There is no information regarding the types of projects. There is no information on whether they are to be apartments, condominium housing, single family housing, row housing, mobile housing or co-operative housing. We would also like to know whether these are rental units, whether they carry with them the right of purchase, and whether there is an income range with regard to the purchase of these units and a form of rental subsidy if necessary.

Another important question which we would like answered is to whom these moneys are going. Are they going exclusively to private builders or are they going to other groups? Will any money go toward the development of co-operative housing? I thought the minister would say a few words about a conference in the Maritimes to discuss ways and means of building co-operative houses in that area and to develop techniques with regard to the purchase of materials for mass production building. I thought he would deal with the problem of shell housing in the Maritimes and Newfoundland and give some assistance in that respect. I thought he would deal with the open systems approach which has been developed by co-op housing groups and experimented upon in that field, whereby they integrate parts, they have mass production techniques, and have rationalized building techniques.

• (2:20 p.m.)

I thought the minister would also deal with moneys and the question of whether they were going to churches or not. Many churches across the country have the necessary vacant land upon which to build homes but they do not have enough interim financing for architectural and other administrative costs. I thought the minister would help trade unions with regard to their house building problems and assist them in land assembly.

The problem of mobile homes is one to which some of these moneys could be directed. The hon. member for Fraser Valley West and other hon. members have urged that the minister take steps with regard to assisting people in mobile homes.

I also thought that the minister would direct certain moneys to the development of homes for the Indian and Métis people that would be suitable to their particular areas and climatic conditions.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I thought that the minister would say he was setting up a crown building corporation which would specialize in building homes for low income groups, that he would use the facilities of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to meet engineering and architectural problems and the research facilities of the National Research Council to develop new building products, and use Polymer Corporation to manufacture these new products.

The statement is disappointing in that it is not bold and imaginative; it is dull and dreary. I would hope that the second-phase statement by the minister will be more exciting and challenging and more productive as a result of incorporating the suggestions of the opposition parties.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I will only indulge in a few brief remarks to express our satisfaction following the minister's announcement on housing. We hope that these $200 million in subsidies will be well received everywhere in Canada and mainly in the province of Quebec.

I do not want to enumerate everything the minister should have done. I merely want to say that we are satisfied with this announcement as a first step toward the improvement of the housing situation. However, I see that these funds are only intended for important urban centres and will be available to large contractors and, as always, the construction of low-priced housing is neglected.

There is no doubt that we always keep in mind the welfare of the citizens of our regions, and if the minister could some day announce a decrease in interest rates in order to promote the building of low-priced family units this would encourage our local contractors.

I do not live in a large urban centre, but since we always do as the United States do, I think the minister should have a look at what is going on there. In fact, our southern neighbour has started to reduce interest rates and I believe that if the Canadian government were to do likewise, this would be a first step giving a new start to the building of low-cost family units in our regions.

Today, while loans are granted at 10 and 10.5 per cent, the man who would like to build a small house for his family is not encouraged to do so. If he decides to build a $6,000 or $7,000 house, he will have to pay back $14,000, $15,000 or $20,000. And when the government claims that it is helping low income families, while at the same time, it allows finance companies and banks to charge such interest rates, I say that this is all a big joke. In my opinion, as long as no decision is taken to standardize interest rates, nothing will have been done to help build low-cost family units.

We wholeheartedly hope that announcing within the next few months the second stage of his program, the minister will state that his first objective was to reduce interest rates.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CONSUMER BILLS AND NOTES

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-208, to amend the Bills of Exchange Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

DEPARTMENT OF REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—PERSONNEL

Question No. 932—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. Are any personnel of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion stationed in Charlottetown and, if so, how many and what are their duties?

2. Is there a regional office of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion at Amherst, N.S., and what is the number of personnel there?

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): 1. Yes; six. Duties: Direction, one; Secretarial, two; Clerical, one; Resource development and adjustment program administration, one; Industrial, commercial and small business program administration, one.

2. No, but there is an engineering services unit; 42.

CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRY DEVELOPMENT COUNCIL PERSONNEL

Question No. 1,174—Mr. MacLean:

How many of the members of the new Construction Industrial Development Council are from (a) British Columbia (b) the Prairies (c) Ontario (d) Quebec (e) the Atlantic Provinces?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): (a) Four; (b) Three; (c) 17, including 4 federal public servants; (d) Nine; (e) Two.

Members of the Construction Industry Development Council were selected from candidates recommended by the industry, mainly through its national associations and institutes.

The submissions were reviewed and members appoin'ed on an individual basis having regard to special knowledge and expertise.

[Mr. Gauthier.]

In the selection process the principle of assembling a Council reflecting all facets of the building industry throughout Canada was observed. No one was appointed to represent an association, institute, corporate group or specific region.

INCENTIVE GRANT TO ERNEST HARRISON AND SONS

Question No. 1,257—Mr. Burton:

1. Has the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, under the Regional Incentives Act, authorized or provided an incentive grant to Ernest Harrison & Sons, Parrsboro, N.S. and, if so, what is the amount of the grant?

2. What is the total estimated cost of the project for which the grant was provided and what is the nature of the project and its location?

3. Who are the directors and chief executive officers of Ernest Harrison & Sons and what is the address of each?

4. To what extent is this company non-resident or foreign-owned or controlled?

5. What is the name and country of the known non-resident ownership in this company?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the Dominion Bureau of Statistics as follows: 1 and 2. This information was contained in the monthly report, tabled in Parliament on the operation of the Regional Development Act.

3. The directors and executive officers of C. Ernest Harrison & Son Ltd., as of April 1, 1970 were as follows: C. Ernest Harrison, President, Parrsboro, Nova Scotia; Donald Harrison, Vice-President, Parrsboro, Nova Scotia; Charles Harrison, Secretary-Treasurer, Parrsboro, Nova Scotia.

4. The company reports no shares held by non-residents, either directly or through intermediate holdings.

5. None.

CANADA SAVINGS BONDS

Question No. 1,271—Mr. MacLean:

1. What was the total value of Canada Savings Bonds held by the public at the most recent date for which figures are available?

2. What was the total value of Canada Savings Bonds held by the public which have the option of leaving the coupons unclipped, so that interest on interest may be collected when the bond matures?

3. What provision is made in the national accounts to offset the obligations of the federal government for payment of interest on savings bonds for coupons which are not cashed in the year they are earned?

4. (a) What is the total value of the first year interest coupons on the 1969 issue of Canada Savings Bonds held by the public (b) what amount is provided in the 1970-71 estimates for payment of interest on the 1969 issue of Canada Savings Bonds (c) what will be the disposal of any part of this amount referred to in Part (b) which may not be paid out in the fiscal year 1970-71?

5. What is the estimated total amount of interest which will have to be paid on the 1969 issue of Canada Savings Bonds in each fiscal year up to and including their year of maturity?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): 1. The total value of Canada Savings Bonds held by the public as at April 1, 1970 was $6,593,000,000.

2. At February 28, 1970 which is the latest date for which detailed information by issue is available, there were $6,626 million C.S.B. outstanding of which $6,145 million were of those series which, when issued, provided an interest compounding option.

3. Interest on the public debt is charged to budgetary expenditure as the interest accrues. Accordingly any unclipped coupons together with other accrued interest charges are reflected in the Public Accounts of Canada as current liabilities. In addition there has been established, in the Public Accounts, a reserve for the estimated outstanding liabilities in prospect of compound interest on Canada Savings Bonds.

4. (a) The total value of the first year interest coupons on the 1969-70 issue of Canada Savings Bonds held by the Public at February 28, 1970 was $331.6 million. (To the extent that there are net sales or redemptions of the 1969-70 Series after this date, the value of the first year coupons on the coupon date will differ from this amount). (b) The provision in Main Estimates 1970-71 for interest on the public debt, amounting to $1,799.7 million included an estimated amount for interest on the 1969-70 Series similar to that in (a) above. (c) See answer to no. 3.

5. Since 1969-70 Series of Canada Savings Bonds are redeemable at the option of the holder at any time, and since the rate of redemption and the utilization of the compounding option cannot be determined in advance for the lifetime of the issue, it is not possible to forecast the total amount of interest which will have to be paid on the 1969-70 issue of Canada Savings Bonds in each fiscal year up to and including its year of maturity.

Questions

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—RESEARCH STUDIES

Question No. 1,278—Mr. Robinson:

1. What research studies have been carried out by, or on behalf of, the Department of External Affairs during each of the years 1960 to 1969 inclusive?

2. What research studies are presently being carried on and/or are contemplated during the next five years?

3. What was the cost of each of the research studies completed in each of the years 1960 to 1969 inclusive?

4. What is the estimated cost of each of the studies presently in being or contemplated during the next five years?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Research into economic and political problems which affect Canada's relations abroad forms a major element in the normal work of the Department of External Affairs and it is not possible to provide a breakdown of internal research activities performed by Departmental personnel. The following research was done under contract to outside consultants.

Financial records are no longer in existence for years prior to 1964-65. 1964-65—(a) Rules governing the responsibility of the State in international law, $2,800; (b) History of early participation in the International Commissions for Supervision and Control—Indo-China, $2,143. 1965-66—(c) ...Supervision and Control in Indo-China (Cont'd) $545; (d) United Nations Education, Scientific and Cultural Organization, $3,275. 1966-67—(e) Ownership of off-shore mineral rights, $1,659; (f) Continental Shelf, $1,593. 1967-68—(g) Canadian content in United States education curricula, $3,742; (h) Sources of Information concerning Foreign Affairs in Canadian Press, $5,000; (i) Canadian public interest in Latin America, $3,122; (j) Canadian public attitudes towards NATO, NORAD and peacekeeping, $1,875. 1968-69—(k) Socio-economic and political reporting—Latin America Posts, $2,800; (l) Peaceful settlement of international disputes $3,600; (m) Trade between Canada and Commonwealth Caribbean $30,802; (n) State papers on Canadian External Relations, $9,460. 1969-70—(o) State papers on Canadian External Relations (Cont'd), $20,045; (p) Bibliography on Canadian External Relations 1600-1969, $3,000; (q) Arctic Sovereignty, $1,850.

2. (i) Projects presently in being and estimate of further costs: (o), (p) and (q) above $8,500, $500 and $4,000, respectively. (ii) Projects contemplated and estimated costs:

Questions

Research in the field of Arms Control and disarmament is currently under consideration but it is impossible to project an estimate of relative costs at this time.

Numerous studies are anticipated during the next five years as a result of negotiations at the Conference of the Committee on Disarmament in Geneva, at NATO or at the United Nations, but the nature and costs of the projects will depend on the requirements devolving from those negotiations.

The Department's 1970/71 budget includes an amount of $70,000 for research in the field of automatic data processing. It is anticipated that the Department's annual estimates for the next five years will include a similar amount for the services of professional consultants to study and to prepare in detail the means by which information which uses the language of international relations can be classified for automated storage, retrieval and analysis.

An electronic engineering study will also be made of improvements to the productivity of the telecomunications systems at Ottawa.

CANADA PENSION PLAN—INVESTMENT OF CONTRIBUTIONS

Question No. 1,489—Mr. Horner:

What are the total earnings and rate of earnings realized from investments made from contributions to the Canada Pension Plan for the years 1967-68-69?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Amounts credited to the CPP Investment Fund:

	($ millions)
	1967-68	1968-69	1969-70 (preliminary)
On investments	42.2	84.4	139.7
On operating balances	1.4	2.4	3.7

The average rate of interest on funds invested in securities of the provinces and of Canada during fiscal year 1967-68 is 5.84 per cent, fiscal year 1968-69—6.72 per cent and fiscal year 1969-70—7.63 per cent.

In addition to interest earned on investments the Plan earns interest on the daily operating balance on deposit in the C.R.F. equal to the average of the unweighted average yield at tender on three month Treasury Bills during the month in respect of which interest is being paid less $\frac{1}{8}$ of 1 per cent.

EQUALIZATION PAYMENTS TO QUEBEC GOVERNMENT

Question No. 1,513—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

What amounts did the federal government pay to the Quebec Government in equalization payments for the years 1966-67, 1967-68, 1968-69 and 1969-70?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Under the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act, 1967, and its predecessors, the federal government paid the Province of Quebec the following amounts on account of equalization for the following fiscal years: 1966-67, $155,529,018; 1967-68, $249,876,746; 1968-69, $276,507,486; 1969-70, preliminary, $360,308,964.

PERSONAL INCOME TAX EXEMPTIONS

Question No. 1,537—Mr. Rodrigue:

1. Of what amount would the federal Treasury be deprised if personal income tax exemptions were raised to $2,000.00 for single persons and $4,000.00 for married persons?

2. How many people would be affected by such a change, using the year 1969 as a base?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): 1. On basis of 1969 incomes and tax rates the estimated loss of combined federal budgetary and old age security tax revenue would be approximately $1,730,000,000.

2. All individual taxpayers, estimated to total 7,700,000 in 1969, would have their tax reduced. Of this group approximately 1,850,000 would be dropped from tax rolls.

INCENTIVE GRANT TO McCULLY AND SOY LIMITED

Question No. 1,559—Mr. Burton:

EXEMPTION FROM SALES TAX OF MATERIALS FOR SEWAGE, DRAINAGE AND WATER DISTRIBUTION SYSTEMS

Question No. 1,572—Mr. Burton:

1. Are materials used in sewage and drainage systems exempt from federal sales tax and what is the basis for government policy on this matter?

2. Are materials used in water distribution lines exempt from federal sales tax and what is the basis for government policy on this matter?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): 1. Yes, when sold to or imported by municipalities for their own use and not for resale.

2. No. The government has exempted from federal sales tax a limited number of items which are purchased by municipalities as a measure of assistance to these bodies.

FREE DENTAL SERVICE FOR INDIANS

Question No. 1,574—Mr. Burton:

1. Are people of Indian origin entitled to free health services for the extraction of teeth and, if so, on what basis is this service provided?

2. Are people of Indian origin entitled to free service for filling of teeth or work on dentures and, if so, on what basis is this service provided?

3. If there is any difference in the service provided in Parts 1 and 2, what is the rationale for such differences?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1 and 2. Not by treaty or statute. The federal government has always taken the position that responsibility for health lies in this order: (a) With the individual; (b) With his group; (c) Within the provincial programs.

Only when these three resources fail to meet requirements does the federal government become involved. This position is supported by the fact that traditionally and constitutionally health care services have been the responsibility of the provinces for all residents within each province.

Many of these people of Indian origin, however, either live in isolated areas or are indigent and thus are unable to obtain or pay for dental or medical attention in the ordinary way. Each year Parliament appropriates a certain sum of money for the provision of public health and essential dental and medical care for this group. To ensure that funds are used for the purpose intended, it is necessary to establish certain criteria concerning the acceptability of individuals for assistance, and to place certain limits upon those services which medical services is prepared to approve.

The acceptability of any individual is governed by the following conditions: 1. A patient must be listed on a Register for an Indian Agency; 2. The patient must be medically/dentally indigent, or so isolated that the costs of transportation associated with procuring necessary treatment would place such care beyond normal economic means; 3. No other Agency, e.g., Provincial, D.V.A., Workmen's Compensation Board, Insurance, etc., has responsibility for payment of the account; 4. When an Indian has established residence away from a Reserve or his Indian community for a period long enough to qualify him for assistance from a Provincial, Municipal or any other organization, he generally ceases to be acceptable for assistance from Medical Services.

The objective of the Indian Health Program is to provide or arrange for health services for eligible Indians in order to assist them in achieving a standard of health comparable to that of other provincial residents. Indian groups are, in most provinces, receiving the same benefits under hospital and medicare plans as all other citizens. Where special needs above and beyond what provincial programs provide are required, the federal government endeavours to augment provincial services.

1. Was competition number 69-NHW-NB-1 for CR4, Department of National Health and Welfare, Fredericton, withdrawn and, if so, for what reason?

2. Was Quebec included in the area from which an appointment could be made under competition number 70-NHW-NB-1 for CR4 positions in the above department, Fredericton, and if so, for what reason?

3. Are there any fully qualified people in the Fredericton office to fill the position being advertised?

4. Are employees with long service disqualified from promotion under this system?

5. Was an assessment of staff requirements made in the Fredericton office, Department of National Health and Welfare, before the above competition was announced?

6. If appointments are made, and assessment then carried out, could there be layoffs of employees with long service but who are not bilingual?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): 1. Yes. To prescribe knowledge of both official languages as an essential qualification.

2. Yes. To increase the number of potential candidates with knowledge of both official languages.

3. The selection board for this competition has not yet received the applications.

4. No.

5. Yes.

6. No lay-offs from the unit concerned have been or are being considered.

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. None.

2. No. However there has been a cordial exchange of correspondence between the CBC Northern Service and a member of the Northwest Territories Council concerning radio reception in the District of Keewatin.

The existing shortwave service will be improved with the installation of higher powered equipment including a specially designed antenna directed solely to the North. This is part of the Corporation's overall shortwave modernization project which has had to be phased over four or five years due to financial restrictions.

3. (a) Unknown to CBC. (b) CBC estimates that its radio service is available to 90% of the residents of the Northwest Territories through standard band or shortwave facilities.

INSTALLATION OF TIDE-GAUGE, DESCHAILLONS, LOTBINIÈRE

Question No. 1,611—Mr. Fortin:

Did the government grant special work contracts for the installation of a tide-gauge at Deschaillons in the constituency of Lotbinière in 1969-1970 and, if so (a) on what dates were these contracts granted (b) who were the contractors chosen (c) how much was paid to each contractor?

[Mr. Pelletier.]

Mr. R. J. Orange (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes. (a) and (b) On November 21, 1969, a contract for the construction of a tide gauge at Deschaillons, was awarded to Camille Vezina Construction, Fortierville, P.Q. On December 10, 1969, a contract for the relocation of the electrical power line connections at Deschaillons was awarded to Marcel Bastien, Pointe-aux-Trembles, Montreal, P.Q. (c) Camille Vezina Construction, $7,460; Marcel Bastien, $998.

TRAIN ACCIDENTS

Question No. 1,623—Mr. Mather:

1. What was the number of train accidents in Canada in 1965 and 1969?

2. What was the number of deaths in these accidents?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The Dominion Bureau of Statistics reports that: 1. The number of train accidents in Canada reported for the year 1965 was 1,955. Data for the year 1969 will not be available for several months. However the number of train accidents in Canada reported for the Year 1968 was 1,911.

2. The number of persons killed in these train accidents totalled 229 in 1965 and 215 in 1968.

MANPOWER RETRAINING—MINIMUM EDUCATIONAL REQUIREMENTS

Question No. 1,643—Mr. Nystrom:

1. What are the minimum educational requirements for manpower re-training?

2. What programs exist for those who have not met that standard?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. There are no minimum education requirements for assistance under the Canada Manpower Training Program. However, provinces set education entrance requirements for most skill courses offered in their institutions.

2. Adults may be provided with basic training for skill development so that they may meet the education requirements of employers or qualify for admission to skill courses.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES—AMOUNT PAID IN QUEBEC AND ONTARIO 1968-69

CREATION OF INFLATION BY TAX PROPOSALS

Question No. 1,657—Mr. Robinson:

Has the federal government considered the possibility of inflation being created by the "tax proposals" and, if so, will this be rectified and in what manner?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): The possibility that implementation of the White Paper proposals for tax reform might have inflationary effects has been considered and the Government believes that this would not be a result.

DUPARQUET, QUEBEC—REQUEST THROUGH ARDA FOR ASSISTANCE IN ORGANIZING TOURIST PARK

Question No. 1,683—Mr. Laprise:

Has the Quebec Government made a request through ARDA for a federal contribution toward the organization of a tourist park in Duparquet, Quebec and, if so, when was this request made and what amount was involved?

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): No, however in March 1969 the federal government agreed to assume under ARDA 50 per cent ($12,500) of the cost of a study of tourism and recreation for the northwest region of Quebec.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

EXPORT OF CATTLE

Question No. 1,366—Mr. Godin:

1. Since 1962, has the Canadian Government taken part in the exporting of cattle and, if so, under which program and to what countries have such sales been made?

2. Were such sales dairy or beef cattle?

3 What are the names and addresses of the Canadian producers who sold the animals?

4. For each, what were the number and total price obtained for sales of (a) cattle under 6 months of age (b) cattle under 1 year (c) cattle under two years (d) cattle 2 years of age and over?

Return tabled.

Return tabled.

Orders for Returns

INDIAN RESERVE COMMUNITY PASTURES, SASKATCHEWAN AND ALBERTA

Question No. 1,570—Mr. Burton:

With respect to the community pastures listed in answer to Question Number 1,031 (a) how many cattle were pastured on each reserve in 1969 which were owned by members of an Indian band (b) how many cattle were pastured on each community pasture in 1969 which were owned other than by members of an Indian band (c) with respect to Part (b), what is the name and address of each owner and how many cattle did each owner have in the pasture (d) how many cattle owned by members of an Indian band is it planned to have on each pasture in 1970 (e) how many cattle is it planned to have in each pasture in 1970 which are not owned by members of an Indian band (f) with respect to Part (e), what is the name and address of each person who has been authorized or allowed to have cattle in the pasture in 1970, and how many cattle has each such person been allowed to have in the pasture?

Return tabled.

BATH-MILLHAVEN PRISON

Question No. 1,595—Mr. Alkenbrack:

1. What is the total amount of the projected contractual outlay proposed for the construction and completion of the Bath-Millhaven Prison complex?

2. How many contracts have been let, to date, in connection with the construction of this prison?

3. What are the names of each successful bidder in the contracts which have been let?

4. What were the amounts of each bid, from the lowest to the highest?

5. How many more contracts will it be necessary for the government to let in order to complete the project?

6. What has been the method of inspection of each of the contracts performed and/or in performance?

7. What is the name of each inspector employed by or acting for the government on each of these Bath-Millhaven Prison contracts?

Return tabled.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I heard the Parliamentary Secretary refer to question No. 1,646. If he did, I apologize to him. This is a simple question with the facts lying squarely and immediately within the knowledge of the government. It deals with the S. S. Oronsay and in view of the public anxiety it should be answered. I hope the Parliamentary Secretary will direct his very intelligent mind to this question and that it will be answered soon.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, on December 19 I put question No. 773 on the Order Paper asking for information about a study being conducted on housing policy and urban problems for the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing. It is more than four months since I put the question on the Order Paper. It is a fairly simple question and I hope it will not be too long before I get the answer.

[Mr. Paproski.]

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, on April 19 I placed question No. 1284 on the Order Paper after a most interesting statement by the Prime Minister to students at Carleton University about our policy toward the Republic of South Africa. I asked the President of the Privy Council some days ago about hastening the answer. It is a pretty simple answer and I should like to have it soon, please.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I will look into the matter, Mr. Speaker.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—USE OF OTHER METHODS OF CONTROL

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to direct to the Prime Minister. As steadily rising interest rates have not slowed inflation during the last four years but rather have added to costs which have driven prices higher, thus causing inflation to increase at a steadily accelerating pace, will the government now give consideration to other methods of combating inflation, particularly the method of controlling price rises through tax incentives, before the government's policy of restricting economic activity and causing unemployment to rise drives this country into a depression from which it may take many years to emerge?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): That is a very interesting speech, Mr. Speaker. I will take up the substance of it with the Minister of Finance. Thank you very much.

Mr. Baldwin: It is about time you started.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Prime Minister be willing to debate this vitally important matter publicly at a time and place of his own chosing?

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I would consider, if the hon. member resigned his seat, speaking against him in his riding in the by-election.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hees: No, Mr. Speaker, we do not have to wait until the hon. member resigns, which he has no intention of doing. I challenge you to face me in a debate; you will not accept it because you know your policies will not stand up to public scrutiny.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hees: If you have any courage, accept that challenge on behalf of the government.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): That's right. Put up or shut up.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

ACTION RESPECTING FURTHER INCREASE IN PRICE OF COFFEE

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs regarding the announcement by General Foods Limited of Canada, a subsidiary of General Foods Corporation of the United States, that they are now increasing the price of coffee by six cents a pound following an increase of four cents a pound last December and also last October, thus bringing about a very considerable increase of some 14 cents a pound over a period of six or seven months. Does this increase come within the guidelines that were set down at the price stability conference? If not, what action is the minister's department proposing to take with regard to this increase?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is believed that all these increases are due to increasing world prices from exporting nations, and the hon. member has undoubtedly seen such statements over the past six months. However, the matter was brought to the attention of the Prices and Incomes Commission some little while ago.

Mr. Baldwin: They are no longer the housewife's friend.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have seen the statements to which the minister refers. Since it is the minister's responsibility to see whether these are valid reasons or merely excuses for these increases, I am asking whether his department has secured the necessary information to determine whether these three successive increases in the price of coffee were warranted or were just exorbitant profiteering? If the latter, what action does the minister propose to take?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I said a moment ago that the matter had been brought to the attention of the Prices and Incomes Commission some little while ago. It is the commission's responsibility to determine the factors that the hon. member has raised.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the findings of the Prices and Incomes Commission be made public? We have had matters referred to them for some time and nothing seems to happen. Will the minister undertake to publish the findings of the Prices and Incomes Commission with regard to these particular increases?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, all the findings of the Prices and Incomes Commission as a result of their price reviews will be made public. Quite a number have already been made public. I am sorry that the leader of the New Democratic Party is not aware that several reports have already been tabled in the House.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister prevail upon the Chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission, who comes under the minister's direction, to stop making speeches throughout the country long enough to enable him to appear before the committee more often than once every three weeks?

FORECAST INVESTMENT EXPENDITURES AND ANTI-INFLATION POLICY

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Following the announcement last week that the general investment plans of Canadian companies for the forthcoming year call for expenditures of approximately 14 per cent more than last year, does the Prime Minister not consider that this evidence ought to call into serious question his whole anti-inflation policy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the facts the hon. member refers to. I will look them up and draw my own conclusions.

Inquiries of the Ministry

DEPARTMENTAL POSITION ON INVESTIGATION OF PRICE INCREASES

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): A supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Would the minister clarify his position and that of his department regarding the matter of inquiry into price increases? At one time the minister accepted that responsibility. Is he saying now that the Prices and Incomes Commission only—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member but he will appreciate, I am sure, that he cannot ask the minister to make a statement at this time, by way of a reply to a question asked during the question period, that ought to be presented to the House by way of a statement on motions.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, may I rephrase the question. Would the minister consider making a statement on motions, in view of the confusion that surrounds his role and that of his department?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have had on the Order Paper for some time a motion to establish a committee, which would provide an excellent forum for such debate. I believe the House Leader has indicated that the motion will be proceeded with this week.

GRAIN

WHEAT—ALTERNATIVES TO ACREAGE REDUCTION PROGRAM

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the continuing emergency in western Canada and since the great majority of western farmers have rejected the LIFT program, is the government considering any alternatives? Also, will the Prime Minister consider reassigning the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Wheat Board to other portfolios where they can do less damage?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question in those terms, as the hon. member will appreciate, is not acceptable.

URANIUM

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS REGARDING INDUSTRY

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the unfortunate absence of the ministers concerned with commercial affairs, may I direct my question to the Prime Minister. As a result of the government announcement about three weeks ago with regard to the possible takeover of Canadian Denison Mines, the subsequent negotiations by the owners of that company with the government, the statements made within the last few days by the president of Canadian Denison, and the uncertainty of the situation at Elliot Lake, I wonder whether we could have a definitive, up-to-date statement of the government's intentions with regard to these matters and what the government has in mind to take care of the long-range problems of the uranium industry?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the long-range problems I did state that these would be the subject of a statement by the government when we are ready to make it. If there is anything further to report I will discuss it with the minister and see if he wants to make an interim report.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the government indicating publicly that it intends to cease purchasing uranium ore for stockpiling?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I will have to refer this to the minister.

BRIDGES

OTTAWA-HULL—PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND CAUSEWAY

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, in the continuing absence of the Postmaster General I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion which is prompted by the ministers' recent announcement of a new bridge to be built to Hull by the National Capital Commission. Considering that there is also an election in Prince Edward Island, will the minister follow his promise of a bridge for Bourassa with a causeway for Campbell?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

ALLEGED MISLEADING ADVERTISING OF GERITOL AND FEMIRON

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the fact that the United States government has filed a suit against the manufacturer of Geritol and Femiron and its advertising agency for claiming in television commercials that the products will help that tired, run-down feeling, does the minister propose to take similar action to protect the Canadian consumer against such false and misleading advertising?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member knows that health claims are a responsibility of my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, this is not a matter of health claims at all; it is a matter of false and misleading advertising, and the United States government is prosecuting in this matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hees: Stand up and answer like a man.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Basford: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, with respect to the statement by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings. It was clearly Your Honour's intention not to allow me to answer the question. Therefore I think it should be recorded that I remained in my seat as a result of directions from the Chair.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hees: On the question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member can answer but perhaps the statement made by the minister might also apply to the hon. member. We will go on to another question. I really do not think there is a question of privilege. If there is not, the matter should not be pursued.

Mr. Hees: It was equally obvious, Mr. Speaker, that the minister had no intention of replying at all, as usual.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has a supplementary.

Mrs. MacInnis: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. If the minister feels unable to handle alone this matter involving false and misleading advertising, is he willing to consult with his colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, to see if between them they can find some way of overcoming this tired and rundown feeling?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, first with respect to the matter of health claims, in order to clarify my previous answer may I say that we take advice in so far as whether or not anything is misleading from the experts on health in the government, namely, the officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare. When they advise us a health claim is misleading, we take the action. We have consulted on this before and we will consult again.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

VETERANS ALLOWANCES—ACTION TO COMPENSATE FOR DECREASE

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): I have a question for the Minister of Veterans Affairs but in his absence I will direct it to the Acting Minister. In view of the fact that retired civil servants are currently receiving their pension cheques with the first increase which was recently granted and that those in receipt of veterans allowances are finding a corresponding decrease in the moneys they are receiving, does the government plan amendments to the veterans allowance legislation to raise the ceiling in this respect?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have the impression this question was asked previously. In view of the importance of the matter, perhaps the minister might reply.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the minister is unavoidably absent today. I will see that he gets notice of the question at the earliest possible opportunity and provides an answer to the hon. member.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—REGIONAL APPLICATION OF ANTI-INFLATION MEASURES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Was the minister expressing government policy in Toronto on Saturday night when he said that regional economic disparity was now the No. 1 problem in Canada? If so, does this now mean that the government's fight against inflation will be conducted on a regional basis?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order. A question asked in those terms is not in order. The hon. member knows that he should direct the question to the Prime Minister and ask whether the statement made outside the House represents government policy.

Mr. McGrath: On Your Honour's advice I will rephrase and redirect the question. I ask the Prime Minister if the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion was expressing government policy in Toronto on Saturday when he said that regional economic disparity is the No. 1 problem in the country? Consequently, can we now expect a change in government policy in fighting inflation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, because it is such an important priority, our fight against inflation has always taken into account the regional disparities in Canada. The budget of the Minister of Finance indicated this and our very high expenditures with regard to regional economic expansion confirm this.

Mr. McGrath: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Prime Minister be good enough to convey that information to the premiers of the regionally disadvantaged provinces of Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: I am quite sure they are aware of it, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): In view of the fact that the Prime Minister has indicated that this is now the No. 1 priority facing the nation, is he prepared to put his money where his adequate mouth is in this respect?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member this type of question is quite unacceptable for many reasons.

MANPOWER

YOUTH PROGRAMS TO ALLEVIATE UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): My question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that the March unemployment statistics have revealed that nearly 40 per cent of the unemployed in Canada are under the age of 25, can the minister indicate to the House whether his department has begun any new youth programs that might help alleviate this situation?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member the question he has asked should be answered by way of a statement. The minister may want to indicate whether such a statement will be made in due course.

Mr. Nystrom: Can the minister indicate whether he is prepared to make a statement on this situation within the next week?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker.

IMMIGRATION

TRANSFER FROM PENITENTIARY TO ANOTHER INSTITUTION OF MAN UNDER DEPORTATION ORDER AND NEEDING SPECIAL CARE

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that a United States citizen, an inmate of Prince Albert penitentiary, completed serving his debt to society on January 28 last but is being held on a deportation order to the United States, and in view of the fact that this man is desperately in need of specialized individual care, will the minister say whether he will immediately initiate plans to have this man admitted to an institution other than a penitentiary until the deportation order can be carried out?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I heard about this case just today, Mr. Speaker. I will investigate and see whether any better arrangements can be made for this person's care.

Mr. Skoberg: A supplementary question. In view of the fact that United States hospitals have already refused admittance to this man, what facilities do we have in Canada to care for people in this type of situation other than leaving them in a penitentiary?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The supplementary should be placed on the Order Paper. The first question was quite in order, but not the supplementary.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE WITHDRAWAL OF DENMARK FROM NORTH ATLANTIC FISHERIES COMMISSION—EFFECT ON SALMON RESOURCES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the minister received any indication from the Danish Minister of Fisheries, Hon. A. C. Norman, that Denmark may withdraw from the North Atlantic Fisheries Commission if the other member nations insist on a ten-year total ban on high seas fishing for salmon in the north Atlantic? If so, in view of the implications this action would have on our resources control, what response has the minister given?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Like the hon. gentleman, Mr. Speaker, I have read this in the newspapers. I have not yet received direct information from the Danish government.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): A supplementary question. In view of the importance of this question to Canada's Atlantic salmon fishery, is the minister prepared to call in the ambassador of Denmark and discuss this matter with him?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, if that seems the best way of handling the matter, the answer is yes, but it might be more desirable to make our representations in Denmark.

LABOUR

EMBLEM ON MINISTER'S LETTERHEAD

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): My question is for the Minister of Labour. I ask the minister the reason for changing the emblem, insignia or design on his letterhead. Would the minister be so kind as to explain this to the House and advise under whose authority it was changed?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure what the hon. member's question refers to in detail. I respectfully suggest to the hon. member that the question might well be placed on the Order Paper. If it is a matter of urgency, it can be considered at the time of adjournment. The question can be placed on the list of questions to be debated on the motion to adjourn this evening.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): With all due deference and respect to Your Honour, I rise on a point of order. There is an element of urgency. Daily since it appeared many members have been trying to decipher this code, emblem or whatever it is. I think it is urgent to the extent that many members are spending time on this when they should be working on something else.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It may well be urgent as the hon. member suggests. My suggestion is that it be considered at the time of adjournment.

[Later:]

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour and is related to the previous question I posed. May I ask the hon. gentleman if this hieroglyphic that appears on his letterhead could be some form of graffiti which appeared on a wall some place?

CITIZENSHIP

PROVISION OF INFORMATION ON GROUNDS FOR REFUSAL

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister on a matter that is becoming more and more urgent in my ethnic riding of Vancouver East. I ask the Prime Minister if, with his motivation toward a just society, any policy action is anticipated at this session to ensure that no person is denied citizenship or landed immigrant status without any reason or objection being given to the applicant in order that the applicant will know the allegations and be in a position to refute any charge if it is false?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can only answer to the extent that the Secretary of State, under whom the citizenship laws come, is reviewing the situation of citizenship and the laws relating thereto and will be reporting to cabinet on the matter. I cannot indicate a date at this time.

TAXATION

WHITE PAPER ON REFORM—APPOINTMENT OF DIRECTOR OF REVALUATION AND ASSESSORS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that there has now been appointed by the government a director of revaluation for the five-year capital gains tax plan under the white paper on tax reform, together with five assessors of valuation, are we now to take it that this part of the white paper has become firm and is no longer subject to negotiation or change?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Annapolis Valley.

INFORMATION

MASS MEDIA GUIDELINES—RECOMMENDATIONS OF SENATE COMMITTEE

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State and refers to the submission made by the Secretary of State before the Davey committee on the mass media last Friday. In view of the minister's statement that officials of his department are working on guidelines for the control of the mass media, do the minister and the government intend to await the recommendations of the Davey committee before defining those guidelines?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I think that the phrase "control of the mass media", which perhaps goes beyond what the hon. member has in mind, and it certainly does in my case, does not appear in my testimony before the Davey committee.

The question of information monopolies, because that is what we are talking about, I presume, has, as a matter of fact, been under study in my department for many months. I told the Davey committee that the work was far from over as this is a very complex question, both in fact and in law, and that guidelines would certainly not be given to the CRTC tomorrow. That means that, most likely, the Davey committee will publish its report before any guidelines are given to the CRTC.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: A supplementary question. Does the work that is now being done by officials in the minister's department include and extend to attempting to define Canadian content for the press, the written media, so that the national press can foster and promote national unity in accordance with certain guidelines laid down by the government?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: No, Mr. Speaker. I think that the hon. member has an entirely wrong concept of the work and, above all, of this question. The point is to know what constitutes an information or broadcasting monopoly. It does not mean at all trying to direct the press or the broadcasting system of this country, particularly not as regards the views that they may express freely.

[English]

POLLUTION

CHEDABUCTO BAY—PAYMENT OF COMPENSATION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Justice. In light of the activity taking place in connection with the $1,300,000 pool set up by charter parties to clean up oil spills, can the minister indicate when those individuals who were affected by the oil spill in Chedabucto Bay might receive some procedural directions as to their recourse?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, any announcement about this serious matter would be made by my colleague the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Forrestall: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister give some indication as to time? Time is going by and the initial fund is being depleted and used up for other reasons.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think the timing will depend on the Minister of Transport. I really cannot add anything to what I have said.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

INCLUSION OF DENTAL CARE IN MEDICARE LEGISLATION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of figures issued a few days ago by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics which show that fewer than 42 of every 100 Canadians receive dental attention in any one year, can the minister say whether the government is giving consideration to including dental care in the medicare legislation?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it is not one of the areas of prime concern at the moment.

TRANSPORT

DECREASE IN CNR SYDNEY-ARGENTIA FERRY SERVICE

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Minister of Transport in the absence of the Minister of Transport. Can the minister say whether he has received protests from the town and community councils of the Placentia East area of Newfoundland against the decision of Canadian National to decrease ferry service on the Sydney-Argentia run, with the possibility of discontinuing the service altogether?

Hon. John N. Turner (Acting Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will take that question as notice on behalf of the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Carter: A supplementary question. In view of the fact that protests are being registered against this proposed decrease in service, would the minister undertake to discuss the matter with Canadian National with a view to having them abandon their plans to decrease the service and eventually discontinue it altogether?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is making a suggestion which he will have to assume the minister will take into account.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LAY-OFFS AT YARMOUTH TEXTILE PLANT RESULTING FROM CLOSING OF DUNLOP TORONTO PLANT

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that the Dunlop plant in Toronto is closing on Thursday, can the minister tell the House how many lay-offs, if any, will occur at the Yarmouth textile plant and what action will be taken to overcome this situation?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is true that when the Dunlop plant ceases activity this will have some effect, I understand, on the Yarmouth plant. We are aware of this. We have made some effort to identify the extent of the problem and if there are projected lay-offs we will offer to Yarmouth all of the services which we are currently offering to the Dunlop employees, and which we think will be very helpful to the situation.

Mr. Comeau: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister stated previously that he was going to look into the effects and study them. He also said he would offer other employment to these people in Yarmouth. I suggest that there is none in Yarmouth under the ordinary program of the government.

LAY-OFFS BY DUNLOP CANADA LIMITED—RESPONSE BY ONTARIO MINISTERS TO TELEGRAMS FROM FEDERAL MINISTER

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Has the minister received a reply to the telegrams that he sent to the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Trade and Development of Ontario in regard to any help that the federal government would give the provincial government in arriving at a feasibility plan to keep the Dunlop plant open? If he has not, what steps does he intend to take to get direct answers from those provincial departments?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, on my last check I had received no reply from either of the Ontario ministers. We are, however, working on our own in the Dunlop area with our manpower programs. I do not propose to take any further steps to get a reply to the messages that I sent some weeks ago.

Mr. Gilbert: A further supplementary question. Is the minister aware that his manpower facilities have yielded less than 10 per cent of employment opportunities for those employees at—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that this question is not in order.

LAY-OFFS BY DUNLOP CANADA LIMITED—LEGISLATION TO ASSIST WORKERS IN SIMILAR SITUATIONS

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Labour. Could the minister inform the House whether or not the federal government is giving consideration to legislation that would enable workers in the Dunlop kind of situation to have a more effective say in dealing with decisions that are made outside Canada?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that the Dunlop situation falls within the provincial field. The federal role, particularly that of the Minister of Labour, is very difficult in this sort of situation. I am afraid that the Dunlop lay-off has come about as a result of an international rationalization of an industry. With this type of international labour decision being made outside the country, the labour force and the government are becoming more and more helpless. While these decisions are very deplorable and do have an adverse effect on the labour market in Canada, we are almost helpless in light of the situation.

Mr. Broadbent: A further supplementary question. Is the minister saying that there is nothing the federal government can do in this area? This is an important point of clarification.

Mr. Mackasey: I did not say that, Mr. Speaker. I said that appropriate legislation in this field is particularly difficult because of the international connotations of the Dunlop decision.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance I will direct my question to the Prime Minister. Does the government of the right hon. gentleman intend to follow the example of its friends in Quebec and print currency that is partly blank to show the effects of inflation?

GRAIN

WHEAT—ACREAGE REDUCTION PROGRAM—EXTENSION OF HARVEST DEADLINE

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture relating to the LIFT program. Inasmuch as many farmers in the north central and northern parts of the prairies have indicated they will be unable to take advantage of the provisions of the LIFT program as it relates to the planting of nurse or cover crops because of the lateness of the planting season and the July 15 harvest deadline, can the minister say whether any consideration is being given to extending the harvest deadline to meet the climatic realities of these areas?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the date of July 15 when cover crops would have to be removed or when any farmer would be permitted to seed a cover crop, of course, is about the middle of the summer for all regions. I think we should dispel any misunderstanding about the purpose of a cover crop. It is not primarily designed for the purpose of growing a crop of any great value but to prevent soil erosion in those areas where there is a high risk of soil erosion from large areas of summerfallow.

Mr. Mazankowski: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister answer my question? I asked whether any consideration is being given to the considerable representations being made by the farmers in the northern part of the prairies for the extension of this deadline.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will examine the answer I gave he will notice that the answer to his question is very clear and specific in that respect.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

WHEAT—NUMBER OF FARMERS WHO WILL QUALIFY FOR PAYMENTS UNDER ACREAGE REDUCTION PROGRAM

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, could the Minister of Agriculture indicate if he has made an assessment to determine what percentage of western farmers will, in fact, benefit from the LIFT program?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Of course, Mr. Speaker, all farmers in western Canada will benefit because if the LIFT program is successful it will substantially strengthen our bargaining position in the international market.

Mr. Yewchuk: I have a further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I was not referring to the generalities of the program. I wondered whether or not the minister could possibly tell me what number of people will qualify for cash payments under this program?

Mr. Olson: All farmers who were farming in 1969 and who had a permit book have this offer open to them and, therefore, they can benefit if they choose to do so. In respect of the other part of the question concerning how many farmers will in fact apply for the wheat acreage reduction benefit, this of course will not be known until seeding is completed in western Canada. We do not expect all the applications to be in until farmers have finally decided what pattern their seeding and summerfallow operations will take.

USE OF 2-4-5T HERBICIDE

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture a direct question. It has to do with the use of the weed chemical 2-4-5T and it is further to his answer to my question on April 21 that the use of this herbicide is continuing to be reviewed. In view of the fact that the main application of this type of chemical will commence in some three weeks time, can the minister inform the House if it is his intention to ban the use of this chemical or is the matter still under review?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we have indeed restricted the use of this herbicide, and several pesticides, in respect of preparation which may be licensed. It may be that we will further restrict the use of 2-4-5T. I would draw to the hon. member's attention, however, that there has been no residue of this chemical found in any food and, indeed, if there should be the Food and Drug Directorate would withhold that food. In other words, there is a nil tolerance.

Mr. Gleave: In view of the fact that the threat in respect of this chemical is not the residue which may be left in plants but rather its effect on people who may use it, will the minister undertake in the near future to make a statement on motions concerning the use of this chemical and outline the manner in which it may be used.

Mr. Olson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. As I said in my previous answer a few days ago, this question is under active review at the present time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON USE OF PICLORAM TO DEFOLIATE BORDER

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On two or three occasions I have raised with him the question of the use of picloram for the purpose of defoliating the Canada-U.S. border and he stated his intention to look into the matter further to see if it could not be reconsidered. Has the minister any further information on this subject?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I think, Mr. Speaker, I have very little I can add to what I said previously. We have inquired into the possible damage and we have been assured that it is safe to use this chemical in the border areas. All the information I have is a reassurance on that point.

TRANSFER OF NERVE GAS FROM OKINAWA TO UNITED STATES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a related question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It concerns the projected transportation of nerve gas from Okinawa to this continent. A week ago the minister said he would give the House some information. Can he tell us now whether the United States government has acceded to the continued request that another route be found so that the nerve gas will not pass through the Strait of Juan de Fuca and whether he has any information concerning the date when the transfer is to take place?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): As the House will have noticed, we have been receiving some support from governors of states through which the nerve gas would pass. Apparently the United States government has not decided whether or not it will pay any attention to these protests as well as to ours.

IMMIGRATION

POLICY RESPECTING POLISH-JEWISH REFUGEES

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Will the minister state when the government will have a policy regarding Polish-Jewish refugees.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we do have a policy with regard to these refugees.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PROSPECTIVE LAY-OFF OF CPR CLERKS—LEGISLATION BASED ON FREEDMAN REPORT

Mr. David Orlikow (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, this question is directed to the Minister of Labour. In view of the announced lay-off of between 500 and 800 employees of the CPR, an industry which does come under the jurisdiction of the federal government, can the minister indicate whether the government intends to bring forward in the near future legislation based on the Freedman commission report which would deal with this kind of lay-off?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that, under the present collective agreement between the CPR and members of the affected union there is a provision for this type of advance notice. The difference of opinion between the railway and the union concerns whether a section of the collective agreement has been violated. I am now informed by the union that the matter is to go to arbitration in order that a decision may be rendered.

Mr. Orlikow: In view of the fact that there is a dispute concerning whether or not this action is covered, and in view of the fact that many agreements do not have that kind of provision, can the minister indicate whether the government intends to bring in legislation incorporating the recommendations in the Freedman report?

Farm Products Marketing Agencies Bill

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that no collective agreement is so carefully drafted that there are not cases sent to arbitration. This is the situation here, and I have full confidence that the unions are quite capable of looking after themselves in this particular dispute.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON QUARANTINING OF "ORONSAY"

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Would the minister seize the first opportunity to advise the House, by statement or otherwise, of all the facts surrounding the P & O Steamship Oronsay which was quarantined in Vancouver and the relationship of this matter to his department? In doing so would he refer to the question I have on the Order Paper, which is unanswered, having in mind the allegations made?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I made note of the hon. member's reference to his question of April 7 not having been answered. I expect the answer to be forwarded within the next couple of days, and if the hon. member finds that answer insufficient he can let us know.

Mr. Baldwin: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I thank the minister for his answer. Would he also take this opportunity to deal with all the facts surrounding this vessel, the quarantine enforced in respect of typhoid and the relationship of officers in his department which have been the subject of some discussion?

Mr. Munro: I am prepared to go into that subject in as much detail as possible in answer to the hon. member's question.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING AGENCIES BILL

ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL MARKETING COUNCIL AND AGENCIES

The House resumed from Tuesday, April 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Olson that Bill C-197, to establish the National Farm Products Marketing Council and to authorize the establishment of national marketing agencies for farm products, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a point of order. There were some discussions earlier today concerning debate on this bill and it was pointed out that the hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Danforth), who is the official spokesman for the official opposition, had not had an opportunity to participate in the debate. I think there might be agreement in the House to enable him to do so.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I should like to begin by expressing my sincere thanks and appreciation for the courtesy that has been extended to me by the various parties of this House in allowing me to proceed with the criticism of the bill. The necessity for this procedure arises because the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski), who began his speech the other night, is ill and unable to complete a very commendable statement on this subject.

In dealing with Bill C-197, which is a bill to institute in Canada a national farm products marketing council and national marketing agencies for farm products, we are dealing with what I consider to be one of the most important pieces of legislation to be brought forward with regard to agriculture in the current session. I say this because of the fact that should this legislation be passed in its present form or even in an amended form, no section of agriculture in Canada or, in fact, any allied business will remain unaffected to a large degree.

The minister in his introductory remarks indicated quite correctly that legislation along this line has been sought for a number of years. Various farm commodity groups, marketing agencies and farmers in general, have been asking the federal government for this type of legislation. I think they were justified in doing so because it has been the experience of the administrators of marketing agencies on a provincial level that often great advances have been made in stabilizing the prices which the primary producers were receiving for their commodities and at the same time creating stability in the marketing of these very products. All too often it has been our experience that whenever there were inter-provincial or international movements of these commodities, the provincial marketing agencies lost control, and all too often the market that they had established for their own membership became of benefit to areas or regions outside their control. Their experience has been very costly in many instances.

I maintain that there are some important differences between the bill presented to us today and the legislation under which the marketing agencies received their jurisdiction from provincial authorities. I note in an editorial in one of the daily farm papers in my own province of Ontario an indication that my party has gone on record as opposing the proposed national farm act because it gives too much power to the federal government. The editorial goes on to say:

> Yet the fact is that Mr. Olson's bill contains no more power than that which the Ontario farmer products marketing act has contained for more than 30 years.

The statement is absolutely incorrect. I would like to point out, for the benefit of this House, the primary differences about which we as representatives of the farm community are concerned and which make the present legislation very different from the provincial legislation. I should like to dwell for a few moments on the differences between the two. In a provincial scheme, generally speaking, no primary farm product is placed under an agency unless the following steps are taken in the following sequence: first, a group of the primary producers of this product petition the provincial government to form such a marketing agency; second, if this is thought to be a truly representative body, the government registers all the provincial producers and a plebiscite is held by ballot among all the primary producers to determine whether or not the majority feels that such a program should be introduced. This plebiscite would be carried out by the provincial government and a 66 per cent majority of those who cast their ballot would be required before such a scheme could be introduced.

Following this, the primary producers, at a meeting or meetings called specifically for this purpose, elect from among themselves the directors who will conduct the affairs of the agency, and from among these directors, officers of the agency are elected to conduct the affairs of the agency. These officers and directors are elected on an annual basis, so if there is any dissatisfaction, either with the administration of their duties or the representation of the primary producers, the producers may, at the next annual meeting, express their displeasure by changing the directors or even the officers.

The next step is equally important. If it is found that a particular agency is working to the detriment of the primary producers rather than to their benefit the provincial government can again be petitioned to hold a plebiscite on whether or not the agency should continue in being. If the agency fails to obtain a majority vote, the provincial government will dissolve the agency. This is a fair, just and democratic way of administering agencies.

• (3:20 p.m.)

It is at this point that I part company with the present bill because under this bill the government appoints the directors of both the council and the agencies. It is the government that decides whether or not there shall be an agency for any primary product. It is the government, not the producers, that designates who shall be the chairman, who shall be the vice-chairman, who shall be the men who create the policy for the agency. It is all right for the government to say, "Certainly, the producers and consumers will be considered and we shall choose an appointee for this particular purpose from among their ranks." But such an appointee, if he comes from among the primary producers, will be acting on behalf of the government from which he receives remuneration and not on behalf of the primary producers themselves. So, I say that although the principle of the bill is good, and marketing agencies need federal legislation to help them nationally, they do not desire, and I venture to say will not accept, state control through legislation such as we have before us now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Danforth: Anyone who states there is nothing in this bill that has not been in provincial legislation just does not know and does not understand the industry.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Danforth: What are the actual powers of this government appointed bureau with its government appointed directors? These regulations go as far as to refer to any other thing that the directors may wish to do from time to time, and "any other regulation" that may be prescribed from time to time by the governor in council, all of which constitutes a blank cheque? We have a prime example of this policy in the National Dairy Commission. Producers will need a licence if all the terms of this bill are implemented. Under this bill an agency will have the power to allocate quotas, to tell the farmers how much they may produce. This is already being done through the national dairy policy.

Mr. Olson: It is not.

Mr. Danforth: Not only are producers being told how much they may produce but there is a levy against any production over the amount that they are allocated.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Speaker, can you imagine Canadian producers being fined for producing food in Canada? This is what is happening. Is this what the agricultural industry wants for its members? These agencies have the power to allocate quotas, to licence producers, to set up grading stations, to place feed lots—

Mr. Olson: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Danforth: Certainly.

Mr. Olson: It is a very simple question. Is he aware that all of these things he is talking about with respect to production controls are in the Ontario legislation?

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Speaker, certainly they are in the Ontario legislation.

Mr. Olson: Of course; it is all there.

Mr. Danforth: The minister says it is all there, but it is all there under the control of the representatives of the industry, not of a government bureau.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Danforth: It is the members of the industry who make the decisions, not rocking-chair generals.

Mr. Hees: That is the difference. Listen, Bud, and you will learn something about your own legislation.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Speaker, not only does the agency have the power to allocate quotas, designate who shall produce, licence producers, control marketing, pricing, sales, processing, distributing and packaging, but under the new provisions set out here the agency can levy against producers all the expenses incurred in the administration of an agency, the office buildings of the agency and even, Mr. Speaker, the salaries and pension plans set up by the goverment for these government appointed directors. It is the producer who is going to pay, not the government, not the taxpayers, and all this is the work of a department which is supposed to promote the well being of the agricultural industry instead of decimating it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Danforth: The thing that bothers me more than anything else is that the basis of this bill is the establishment of a means for supply management and production control in Canada. I think the minister would be the first to agree with me. This is the basis of the bill.

Mr. Olson: And that power is exclusively within provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Danforth: At the present time.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Wait until this bill is passed.

Mr. Danforth: The minister says it is for supply management—

Mr. Olson: And production.

Mr. Danforth: What do we have under supply management? Who are the advocates of supply management? Naturally if I had a large well established business, with all the volume that I could handle, I would be a supporter of a bill such as this because I could set up a monopoly with the blessing of the government. Government regulations could prevent any young farmer in the nation from starting in competition against me and could prevent anyone else from extending his business to take a share of mine. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I would be in a comfortable pew and I would certainly support this bill. But anyone who has the welfare of the agricultural industry at heart, an industry that perhaps is going through its greatest financial crisis, will take a long look at this legislation which places such power in the hands of a government bureau.

The government is proceeding with this supply management effort and I am very much surprised because this was not the recommendation of its own task force. The government set up a task force to advise it on what was going wrong with agriculture, and I would like to quote that part of the report of the task force which was submitted to the Congress on Agriculture. I am reading from the official document:

> Supply management of the all-pervasive type which would be in a position to allocate resources rationally, would have to include most farm products, would involve inspection, research, administration and control far exceeding anything that we have experienced in Canadian agriculture to date.

It goes on to say, and this is important:

> Such an extreme should be avoided at all costs if reasonably satisfactory alternatives exist.

And it concludes by saying:

> Fortunately there are alternatives, which, though not fully satisfactory should be given every opportunity before launching the "ultimate weapon" of supply management.

That is not all, Mr. Speaker. I would like to quote from some statements made by Secretary Freeman, former Secretary of Agriculture in the United States. The United States tried this idea. There is nothing new in supply management. There is nothing new in government control of supply management, but the United States learned a bitter lesson. I would like to quote from part of a speech by Secretary Freeman, to be found in "Successful Farming" of June, 1963:

> Only about one-fourth of our farm income is from commodities for which both production and pricing decisions have been relinquished by the individual to central authority. This includes wheat, cotton, rice, peanuts and tobacco. Yet this 25 per cent of agriculture accounts for about 75 per cent of farm program costs, 85 per cent of the accumulated stocks, and 95 per cent of the contraversy.

He went on:

> For two years the Administration made strong efforts to impose or extend mandatory controls to feed grains, dairy products, turkeys, broilers, and potatoes. These drives were made from deep conviction and with abundant willingness to spend public money—by a political party in firm control of both the Congress and the White House. None of these drives succeeded!
>
> The new farm policy proposals by the administration have been few rather than many and voluntary rather than mandatory.

• (3:30 p.m.)

It has been tried and it is a failure, yet we in this country are being asked to pass a bill to set up government control of supply. That is why we take a dim view of this legislation and the power it gives to the government. We do not think it can succeed.

Experience shows that the agricultural industry in Canada is in balance. Wherever something checks the free flow of primary agricultural product, there is a natural and an economic tendency to diversify into something more lucrative. Governmental control on one primary commodity brings about a shift to another commodity, which in turn means a further shift to another commodity and so on ad infinitum. This is why the task force report emphasizes that supply management cannot succeed unless there is government control over all the main primary products in agriculture today. But Mr. Speaker, this is not what the industry wants; it does not want to be fenced in. What primary producers want is greater emphasis on markets, particularly in the international field, not a cutback to satisfy our domestic markets in a shrinking international field. This is not competition. This is throwing in the sponge.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Danforth: What would be the effect on agriculture if all the powers the government requests in this bill were implemented? Maybe the government will never use these powers, but we have to assume there is an intention to use them. We, in the opposition, must deal with the bill on that basis.

It is my contention, Mr. Speaker, that if this bill is implemented in its present form not only the agriculture industry but the allied industries, the chemical plants, packing plants, distribution and processing plants will be reduced to the status of public utilities working on government directive only.

Mr. Hees: For shame.

Mr. Danforth: The minister indicated that the National Dairy Commission was a prime example of what could be accomplished.

An hon. Member: Heaven forbid!

Mr. Danforth: Although the appointees to this commission were supposed to represent the producers of the nation, in the actual fact they turned out to be public relations representatives of the government, selling government policy to the producers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Danforth: If one thinks that a commission of this kind is going to be effective for the primary producers, one only has to look back to the time when the minister indicated to the industry that there would be a $10 million cutback, and that they should cut their coat according to their cloth.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Danforth: That is not misrepresentation from the industry, that is regimentation by government. I am afraid that is what is going to happen under this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Speaker, in initiating such a bill and in initiating government policy, there has been an indication that legislation to move farmers off the farms will be introduced. If this measure is so good for farmers, they should be moving farmers onto the farms. It is a deliberate policy to desiccate agriculture. Is it not ridiculous that in Canada today, when the highest price in the history of our country is being paid for fluid milk, the government has embarked on a program to restrict its production? There does not seem to be any logic in this.

The terms of this bill imply that consumers will profit but, Mr. Speaker, consumers cannot profit under supply management. It just means additional costs to the producer and to the consumer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: How about the tobacco industry?

Mr. Danforth: Experience has shown that the consumer does not profit, either. When this government reduced the tariff on the importation of head lettuce, for example, the consumer did not profit from that. This is an indication of what happens as a result of government intrusion and interference.

An hon. Member: What a mess they made.

An hon. Member: Dictatorship.

Mr. Danforth: I started by saying—

An hon. Member: When are you going to finish?

Mr. Danforth: —that we agree some form of control is necessary interprovincially and internationally. Farmers have found through bitter experience that their marketing agencies cannot compete with state trading nations or international food cartels. What they want from the government is aid in putting muscle into their efforts to enter the international market. Instead, the government brings in supply management control to curtail supply. The government will be the only one to benefit. There will be no problem connected with marketing surplus farm products because there will not be any more farms.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, completely transfers responsibility for all the major decisions connected with the agriculture and agro-business industries to a government bureau. The bill does not lay down the qualifications for the members of this bureau and we have learned from experience the criteria used by this government when placing people in office. It will not be their knowledge of agriculture which gains them a place. This is what bothers me about the bill before us. We have been asked to transfer the power of decision making from the industry to a government appointed bureau. Anyone reading this bill who has a knowledge of agriculture will realize that it was drafted by administrators for administration purposes and not by anyone with a knowledge of agriculture.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say this. During debate on this bill our prime objective will be, by way of amendment, to attempt to retain in the hands of the primary producers the control of regulations which the government will seek to impose over the industry.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. Hees: Hear, hear.

Mr. Danforth: We feel that no one is better able to assess the climate of agriculture and the moves that ought to be made than the person who is engaged in the agricultural business. It is not our intention to play God as far as the farmers of this nation are concerned. They must make their own decisions and our objective will be to point out as forcefully as we can the weaknesses of the bill and the direction in which we are heading which will lead to absolute state control. It will then be up to the farmers to make their decision.

Mr. Hees: Hear, hear.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, as I read this bill, it is a proposal to bring the federal government into the field of farm product marketing and to give it a great deal of power and scope in that field. I suppose few primary producers in Canada are as vulnerable to the pressures of the market place as the farmers and ranchers in western Canada. There are few producers who have suffered more at the hands of market forces, both domestic and international, than the people on the farms and ranches of Canada. So, when we look at a proposal such as this, the first question we ask is: what sort of bill is it? Will its provisions meet the needs of our farming people? Is it going to help them to achieve their aspirations for the good life, the just society or, more important than that, security.

I remember a number of years ago being at a meeting here in eastern Canada. We had invited an economist from the University of Saskatchewan—an economist for whom I had the highest regard and who is no longer with us—to come to that meeting and discuss the role of agriculture in an industrial society. He agreed to come. In his reply to me he said, "If you had written me a letter before the second world war, or even six or seven years ago, asking me to talk about the role of agriculture in the industrial society of Canada, I would probably have refused the invitation because at that time, in my opinion, we did not have an industrial society; but now we do have an industrial society." Therefore, the role of agriculture has to be defined, considered and dealt with in light of the fact that agriculture is operating within an industrial society.

An industrial society as I see it, or as I observe it, Mr. Speaker, is a society in which monopoly operates, in which price maintenance is a daily fact of life and in which the government of the day—and in my province it brags that it is a free enterprise government—busily sets up a Prices and Incomes Commission to prevent those who are practising price maintenance from gouging the consumers of Canada. Admittedly, this commission is almost totally ineffective, but none the less this is its purpose. So, this is how the government of the day regards Canadian society.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, this bill is designed to operate in that kind of society. If this is so, it seems to me that the first question is, how effectively will it operate in that kind of society? The other question is, how much of a role will the actual producer play under the provisions of this bill? To what extent will the producer play a part in those decisions that will have to be made? To what extent will he continue to be the master of his own fate; to what extent will he become the servant of the state and, even worse, a pawn of the state in its manipulations of the economy and in the pursuit of its objectives in the world in which we live?

The previous speaker mentioned the Canadian Dairy Commission. I agree with him. The operations of the dairy commission give me cause for concern.

Mr. Dinsdale: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gleave: I have received letters from people who are desperate. Because their right, and indeed their ability, to earn a living on their farms has become seriously jeopardized, because in some instances they have been partially denied the opportunity to follow the vocation they had been following, and because they have been unable to put their case before the commission, these dairy farmers have, in desperation, written to their Member of Parliament asking, "What can you do for me?"

It may be, as individual marketing boards operate, that some instances of this sort of thing are unavoidable. But such things under the aegis of such boards, in my opinion, have been only too common. Under operation LIFT, we have a situation in which the government has taken powers wholesale unto itself. The Government advised this House that it was doing this with the support of the farm organizations and the provinces concerned. Yet within a few weeks of that announcement, we heard one of the major farm organizations saying, "No, this is not our baby." It seems to me, therefore that there ought to be a provision in this bill, a provision I have not been able to find, that the farmers who are going to be affected by this legislation shall have the right to elect either the majority or possibly all the people responsible for directing any marketing board or agency which is set up.

• (3:50 p.m.)

It seems that this is an essential requirement if the individual farmer is going to be able to say when the operations of an agency are not serving his purposes or if an agency is operating very well. An individual farmer or a group of farmers who do not consider they are being fairly treated as a result of the operations of the agency should be able to come before a forum of their own people and say that this or that is happening to them or, in their opinion, the agency is not working well. This is the protection the farmer should have. According to this bill, the appointment of those people who are going to operate such an agency, will be at the pleasure of the government. The people who dreamed up operation LIFT in western Canada were selected at the pleasure of the government. Some individual farmers will suffer severely under that program because of the limited alternatives open to them. The unfortunate thing is there will be many such instances. I could say more, but we are not here to discuss operation LIFT. We are here to discuss this particular bill.

I refer to page 5 of the bill which reads:

(1) The duties of the Council are

(a) to advise the Minister on all matters relating to the establishment and operation of agencies under this Act with a view to maintaining and promoting an efficient and competitive agriculture industry;

I wish to emphasize the words "an efficient and competitive agriculture industry." Before the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) and the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Lang) visited Saskatchewan in February, the grain industry in Saskatchewan and in the rest of western Canada was an efficient and competitive industry. No one denies that fact. This bill says, "maintaining and promoting an efficient and competitive agriculture industry". What does it omit? Only the people.

Even though there may be an efficient and competitive agriculture industry, there may still be a lot of people who are hard up. I have looked through this bill in vain trying to find a place where it proposes to attempt to maintain the income of the people on the land. There is no such statement in this bill. This is not an objective of the people who will be the commissioners or administrators. According to this bill, they are not to be concerned with the income level of the people on the land. The bill further states:

(2) (b) have regard to the interests of consumers of farm products and of those engaged in the marketing thereof as well as to the interests of producers of farm products.

The producers of farm products are not mentioned first, Mr. Speaker. The consumers of farm products in this nation have done very well. The consumers of farm products in this nation pay a smaller percentage of their income for food than do the consumers in almost any other country among the developed nations. The consumers are able to buy products that are sorted, crated, washed and packaged. If there is anything more that can be done to make the product more presentable to the consumer, that is done. These are the services the consumer is receiving today from the distributors of farm products in Canada, yet in this sentence that I referred to the producer is mentioned last.

I wonder why the government found it necessary, in introducing this bill, to very carefully state that the interests, of the consumer will be carefully protected. Has the consumer been that badly abused? If so, where and when? Beef is imported from New Zealand so that the consumers in eastern Canada will not be forced to pay high prices. Last year the amount of beef imported from New Zealand was tripled. Great care is taken to ensure that the consumer is not at the mercy of the farmer or rancher on the North American continent. Alternative supplies are available.

The bill also refers to "those engaged in the marketing thereof". They also take precedence over the producer. Those who have been doing the marketing have not done that badly. I refer to those marketing our grain, the elevator companies and the brokerage people. They are guaranteed a return that is sufficient to enable their operations to run very smoothly. They have not been suffering that much. The packing industry slaughters, processes and packages our beef and hogs. It packages our eggs. This industry has managed very well, Mr. Speaker, yet in this bill it has a special place.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Under this bill control can be exercised over any farm product. Clause 17 provides:

The Governor in Council may by proclamation establish an agency with powers relating to any farm product or farm products the marketing of which in interprovincial and export trade is not regulated pursuant to the Canadian Wheat Board Act or the Canadian Dairy Commission Act.

This means that the agency will have power over practically any farm product in Canada, with the exception of wheat, barley and oats.

Clause 19 provides:

The members of an agency shall be appointed by the Governor in Council to hold office during pleasure.

As I said before, the bill makes no provision for producer participation. The agencies can operate without it. I thought I heard it said that these powers were given to the provincial governments, but this is not the case with regard to marketing grain. The government found it quite possible to get around any provincial participation here. Never has a member of the Wheat Board been elected by the producers: all have been appointed by the federal government. There are at least three different types of operation in connection with the marketing of hogs, one of which is a commission in Manitoba.

So as I see it, this bill gives the agency concerned the power to do almost anything with any given agricultural product. Unless provision is made within the bill for participation by farmers and producers in the decision making by the agency, you could conceivably see much of Canada's farm production handled, administered and sold without any producer participation. The producer would be little more than the hired man of the agency that is to be set up, and I do not think this is what we want. Our thinking should be much more advanced than is evidenced by the provisions of this bill.

In this day and age one hears the phrase "industrial democracy". People connected with plants, factories and some of the academics in our universities are saying that the man who does the work should now be thinking in terms of participating in those decisions and operations that affect his daily life. This the farmer has done up till now, though as I said at the beginning of my address he has done it at a frightful price in terms of income. We know that farm income has lagged consistently below the national average in Canada, with the exception of the odd occasion. Indeed, a recent report issued by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics indicates that farm income in Saskatchewan dropped by 19.9 per cent, I think is the figure, between 1968 and 1969.

In order to correct this kind of situation and to give the farmers the bargaining power that they need, does the government have to take all of the decision making with regard to the marketing process and other matters away from the farmers? I think not. As I say, unless some protection is afforded the farmers in the bill, I am afraid in many areas they will merely be trying to conform to decisions that are made by civil servants, ministers, and perhaps managers in the processing industry who have power to make such decisions. The only thing that will assure the farmer a say in this kind of operation is the elective process. The farmer is one of the thousands at the bottom of the ladder; at the top you have the few. Only the elective process will assure him any real part in the decision making that takes place.

Supply management has been brought into this discussion, and this could very well be part of the government's objective in this legislation. Operation LIFT in western Canada is nothing more nor less than a supply management operation; indeed, it is declared to be such. Yet the farmer was given no vote or opportunity to make a decision in a matter that affects his daily life.

The stated objective of the bill is to establish an efficient and competitive farm products marketing board. This we must have, otherwise the needs of the people of Canada will not be served. But in addition to this stated objective, the bill should provide that part of the job of those who administer the act is to improve the income position of the farmer. This the board can do by bargaining for a better price for his product in the marketplace. The regulation of quality and markets is something that benefits the consumer. Any regulation that controls the product the farmer sends to the marketplace is not designed to protect his interest but to protect the interest of the consumer.

So, if this is to be a bargaining agency and if the objective is to bargain for a price for the farmer, then that objective should be stated in this bill. If it is not stated in this bill that the objective is to bargain for a price in order to achieve an acceptable income for the farmer, I would have very considerable difficulty in supporting the bill. What other objective is there in asking the farmer to submit to regulations under which an inspector, by virtue of a piece of paper someone gives him, could enter the farmer's premises any time and find out what the farmer has there, how long he has had it and what he intends to do with it. If a farmer should not choose to conform to these regulations, under certain circumstances he could land in jail. If a farmer is to submit to this kind of pressure, then there should be some benefit for the farmer. What the farmer is interested in is a fair price for his product.

We can use all the fancy words we know to say that we need economic, efficient and competitive farms. One could stand up at meetings and say all these things, but when one is all through the farmer would ask, "How much income will I have; what is the price of the product going to be and what will my balance sheet show at the end of the year?" That is what the farmer wants to know. This information is not contained in this bill. I suggest this is one of the important things which should be considered in respect of this bill. I refer to income maintenance. If the farmer, as this bill suggests, is to be an efficient and competitive individual, then we should also tell him how he is going to live. Any good economist will tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the term "perfect competition" is a term that is used. This is a situation when there is no control over price and when a product has to fight for its place in the market place. If perfect competition is carried to its logical conclusion the result is bankruptcy. Any group of businessmen who possibly can avoid perfect competition do so, because the result of it is ruin.

We have the example of the Canadian Wheat Board. We have heard people say many times that we should let the Wheat Board go into the markets of the world and sell wheat for whatever it would bring. At a meeting which I held in western Canada a farmer said, "If you do that how far will we go down; what will the end be"? I said to him that I do not know how far down it would go. I do not believe anybody else knows the answer. In this situation we would have perfect competition, and when you have adequate supplies and perfect competition there is a long way to go. So I should like some government member or the minister, either while this debate continues on second reading or after the bill goes to the standing committee, to tell us what the objectives of this bill are in respect of income for the farmer and what the pricing policies are to be.

As we know, under the support policies of this government, there is some support in respect of beef, hogs and so on. This support is very small. It is set low because there is no control over the volume of product as there would be if the government should raise the support price and have to buy the product. So, the support price is kept very low. This bill, however, proposes to institute supply management. The intent is to control the volume of product that will come on the market, the manner in which it will be handled and the manner in which it will be marketed. If the farmer is to be controlled to that extent by a bill such as this, he is entitled to a fair price. If he were to be left alone to sink or swim, then maybe there would be some justification in saying that we will not do anything about pricing.

Perhaps we could tell farmers they can produce what they like and then they would be on their own. But if we introduce legislation of this type to establish a policy of supply management, then the farmer is entitled to know what is to be done about price and income. This is the essence of the Dairy Commission operation. This is the only way they can justify what they are doing to the producer. In return, the Dairy Commission says the producer will not go broke. That is the essence of it. There is a similar situation here. We are saying these things to the producer and at the same time we should be willing to tell him what we intend to do about price and income.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I should not want to miss this opportunity to say a few words on Bill C-197 to establish a National Farm Products Marketing Council.

At first sight, this bill, like all the others, seems to make sense. It seems it would be wise to create a National Farm Products Marketing Council. But it is always in the application of legislation that we are taken for a ride and this bill is a classical example of all the legislation introduced by this government since it came to power.

The setting up of councils, royal commissions, boards and other bodies means further expenditures. In addition, the government certainly has many friends to bring in and I presume all appointments will be made by the government itself at the cabinet level. That is exactly what I am concerned about in connection with this bill.

• (4:20 p.m.)

As a matter of fact, when you read the Governor General's recommendation, you note that, having dealt with the establishment of the Council, it goes on to salaries, fees and expenses. It never fails. That has to come first. The recommendation then deals with the organization of the Council and its staff, with the expenditures to be paid out of moneys appropriated by Parliament therefor, and with the creation, if necessary, of marketing agencies for farm products.

If the National Council is unable to advise the minister adequately, agencies will be created. In this connection I would like to quote in part the recommendation:

> —to provide that the agencies shall conduct their operations on a self-sustaining financial basis without appropriations therefor by Parliament;

It is said that the agencies will be self-sustaining. This means they will not be swayed by money. It is said further that the government may grant a certain amount of money, and I quote:

> —to enable the agency to meet initial operating and establishment expenses, the aggregate amount of such grants not to exceed one million dollars.

And that is how the government establishes the agency. It reminds me of the way Information Canada was established. In my opinion, it will be another agency like Information Canada, for the purpose of selling government policy to farmers.

It has always been my belief, Mr. Speaker, and it still is, that in a democracy the government should support the efforts of producers whereas in a dictatorship the government gives them orders. When I examine both systems, I wonder where the present government stands. And that is what frightens me, Mr. Speaker. We claim to be a democracy, we pretend to be one. We claim to be a democracy and we are living under the worst dictatorial government we have ever known. All the decisions the government has made so far in the field of agriculture prove it.

The farmers cannot foresee the plans of the government, nor wait for it to announce its policy, without participating in the study of those programs. They must wait for what the minister will be willing to give them.

This bill provides for public hearings, but we know what the results are of those famous public hearings. Pretence is made of consulting the farmers, but when the time comes to apply the law the recommendations of the people who are really concerned, the producers and their associations, are totally disregarded.

We have had a striking example of this in the province of Quebec in the case of the manufactured milk production. Everyone expected concrete results, after numerous evening study periods and numerous meetings with the government and each and everyone of the parties. We ourselves had talks with the C.F.U. and farm organizations with a view to submitting, to the government, a well defined plan on the future dairy policy. All this was confined to oblivion, and the officials of the Department of Agriculture, as well as those of the Dairy Commission, completely ignored the recommendations and studies that had been made.

That is why one could read in La Terre de Chez Nous, on the editorial page, after the dairy policy was announced by the minister, and I quote:

> Quebec manufactured milk producers bitterly disappointed.

It is quite a disappointment, for it means the disintegration of our dairy production. Indeed, a third of the farmers are now leaving their farms, precisely because of the "good" conditions the Minister of Agriculture has provided for them.

If only the same fairness had been shown, the same advantages had been given the milk producers, as the wheat producers out west. We are not asking for much, all we want is equal treatment with the wheat producers, which would put an end to bitter criticisms by the farmers.

How are the wheat producers treated? There is too much wheat, so we are going to pay to prevent them from producing. It is nothing terrific, but at least we do not let them perish with their wheat, without a cent. They are paid so as not to produce.

If our farmers were paid, $200 per dairy cow for instance, to be able to kill a percentage of their dairy cows, they would keep only the herd that would enable them to get their quotas. But no. More cruelty, more barbarism is shown here. They are smothered. The dairy farmer does not get a single cent for his surplus dairy cows. While the western farmer is being paid not to produce, this dairy farmer is penalized because his cows produce milk. What a ridiculous situation.

If he were at least given $200 for each cow to be killed, that cow would no longer give milk, milk he does not know what to do with. There would be some justice. But no. Producers have to pay $1.25 per hundredweight of above quota milk.

For two or three years, they were asked to produce more, by means of propaganda on television and over the radio, so much that I wondered what the Department of Agriculture was driving at. Now that they have accepted the conditions assigned to them, they are penalized.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Only one solution could be adopted today: if a dairy producer exceeds his quota by 50,000 or 100,000 pounds, he should be paid to slaughter some cattle in order to remain within the limits of his quota. He would then use the money available to turn to some other crop. We should not be afraid, for the farmers are not crazy. They will not waste that money. On the countrary, they will use it to grow other crops or to breed stock.

The government has ignored all the relevant studies that were conducted in the province of Quebec. In fact, an editorial writer has stated the following, and I quote:

> These studies and this research made by the associations of producers, which are far from easy, were not made, without the federal authorities knowing about them. Far from it. Since November 1969, all the federal members from Quebec, the Standing Committee on Agriculture, and the cabinet ministers concerned have been kept informed through continuing consultations that everybody tried to keep objective and as close as possible to the problems of the producers. What did all that work result in? Nothing or almost nothing.

Such is the farmers' conclusion.

That is why the farmers are now asking themselves: what is wrong? You may find the answer to that question on page 4 of the April 8 issue of La Terre de Chez Nous, and I quote:

If agriculture is not sick its leaders are—

This article does indeed state the truth of the matter. Some members of the Canadian Dairy Commission should submit to an economic health cure.

This bill provides also for the creation of new jobs in order to have studies undertaken. Indeed, consideration will again be given to the possibility of marketing farm products. I was under the impression that all the employees and experts of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce would devote themselves to the sale of Canadian products, but it seems that another council will have to be set up, in each department, in order to advise the minister's own council so as to bring about marketing planning.

Once all those councils, sub-councils and agencies have been set up, farm producers will be told that nothing can be done for them, as the milk producers have already been told. Formerly, when there were some hard to solve problems, particularly in our area where illnesses like, for instance, brucellosis, have caused considerable damage, it was possible to try to cope with some cases.

Today, that is not possible anymore. The door is closed and locked.

Once the agencies and sub-agencies are established, the minister will be like the queen-bee surrounded and well protected by his staff. One word from him will be enough for the implementation of a decision. Indeed, no matter how many laws are passed and how many agencies are created, we can see in the last part of the bill that the minister is the supreme authority: he is the only one to decide.

That is exactly why so many farmers are dissatisfied, and rightly so. We know that there are surpluses. Farmers should be spared some of the blows and be able to diversify their production. They must be helped as were wheat producers. The government must give them assistance if it prides itself in helping producers.

Today, we have some indications that the government is no longer helping the producer, but gives him orders and lays down conditions. This is why I am protesting.

I do not accept a dictatorship at the ministerial level or at the government level. We are living in a democracy and as long as I am here, I will plead on behalf of democratic rights and all the more for those of farmers and milk producers which make up our basic industry in the province of Quebec as well as for hog and potato producers.

Mr. Speaker, if the government wishes to pass Bill C-197, it should make it more democratic. How can that be done? Instead of having these public servants appointed by the government in power, it would be desirable to divide the Council into three sectors. First, the federal sector, second, the provincial sector and, third, the producers' sector. Each sector would choose its own representatives.

That seems to me the only way to set up a national administrative council of a democratic nature so that farmers and producers may have their say for once and may delegate to the council representatives of their associations. Furthermore, relations with the provincial governments are anticipated since the recommendation reads and I quote:

and further to provide for federal-provincial agreements.

If agreements are to be entered into it is absolutely necessary that provincial governments be represented on this council.

• (4:40 p.m.)

In introducing this bill, the government has acted in the same way as when it introduces any other legislative proposal. The government decides, without consultation, and then it says to the provincial government: Do this, or else you will not receive anything. And it calls that co-operation. Well, I suggest that this is not co-operation. And co-operation must be established without fail at the council and the agency levels. And there will be co-operation as I recommended a moment ago, through the establishment of a council comprising three members from the federal government, three members representing the producers and three members from the provincial governments. To be logical and to ensure the autonomy of this council, each organization represented on it would pay its own delegates. It may be said that because this is again a federal organization, it should pay the representatives of farm associations and provincial governments. I do not agree since this would endanger democracy. Let these three elements pay their delegates to the National Council. This would be the best way to be sure that everybody will be entitled to participate in studies and findings.

And if, after these findings, the minister does not agree, as is sometimes the case, it will rest with Parliament to show the people the lack of sincerity of some representatives regarding findings reached in a democratic way.

I feel that this would not only protect the producer but the members of the Council, the federal government officials as well, and would permit more objective studies at the federal and provincial levels. It would be a great relief to the Council and it would eliminate a good deal of controversies which set provinces over against each other presently, because of the dictatorial spirit that you feel hovering over each of them.

If the government wants to force dictatorship upon us, let it say so. We shall get organized accordingly. Provinces are led to believe that government is exercised in a democratic manner but it is not so. That is the reason why the provinces are in revolt. I hope that for once, the minister will think it over and amend the paragraph of his bill which provides for the establishment of the National Marketing Council, so that each one of the elements which I mentioned earlier will be represented. Here is a way to obtain more democracy, which will greatly contribute to the understanding and national unity that we all want.

Today, we have reached the point where most provinces are at war with the federal government. And who is to blame? Not the provinces. No, no! Let us face facts. It is rather against this dictatorship which is forced upon them. For once, let us come back to democracy and I sincerely hope that this bill will provide the opportunity to make such a gesture.

[English]

Mr. Jerry Pringle (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in support of Bill C-197 and in doing so, I congratulate the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) for the speed with which he has implemented another of his pre-election assurances. These assurances, Mr. Speaker, were given to the vast majority of farmers who are clamoring for the right to study, plan and organize their commodity groups on a proper business-like basis in competition with other food commodity producer groups, as well as area and international competitors.

The enabling legislation provided in Bill C-197 is not new or earthshaking. It complements similar enabling provincial legislation which will extend the benefits of planned production and marketing on a national basis. Farmers everywhere have been conducting a quiet revolution in an attempt to bring stability to farm product markets. They have worked diligently in co-operation with governmental experimental research and have been highly successful in reducing production costs over the years. As costs were reduced, the savings were passed on to the consumers. Little or no work has been done on a national basis relating to market research. The only factor in our economy which can assure a fair return to the producer is the market price. This factor has been almost totally neglected. Most business and service industries are permitted to price their products and services, while the farmers must take what they are offered.

Individual farmers engaged in commodity production are expected to estimate market requirements without the slightest scrap of information regarding the intentions of the other thousands of farmers. It is true that periodical market outlooks have been issued by various government agencies and that politicians have made forecasts, but no specific approach to market research relating to individual products has been carried out which could assure producers some safeguards when the time came for the product to go to market.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that Canadian agricultural producers have been encouraged to produce in surplus in order to provide cheap food. Overproduction causes low market prices, usually below cost of production. The low prices discourage production and subsequently result in short supplies and high prices to consumers. For many years farm product prices rose and fell like the ocean waves. This unstable, disastrous system was called the law of supply and demand. The producer received high prices when he had little or no product to sell, disasterously low prices when he overproduced. Occasionally the surpluses, especially on perishable products, became so burdensome that the law of supply and demand was temporarily repealed. The government would then provide a subsidy, but this policy has never been able to solve the problem of instability in market prices.

Subsidies, Mr. Speaker, were and still are a valid charge against consumers. The subsidy payments merely pay production losses and enable producers to stay in business. Today, we live in a climate of agricultural subsidies and as long as farmers are unable to plan their production to a market, with allowances for safe inventories, subsidies must continue to exist. Any thought of removing or reducing subsidies at this time is unconscionable and must be resisted, especially while labour continues to force increased costs. But farmers know that living in a climate of subsidies during today's standard of living is unacceptable and are now demanding an opportunity to gradually shift away from a system of indiscriminate production and ignorance of market potential.

During this debate, we will undoubtedly hear the usual reference to curtailment of farming opportunity. This argument usually comes from people presently engaged in surplus production who are more interested in confounding governments for political purposes than seeking solutions to existing production and marketing dilemmas. Hon. members opposite speak in terms of hypothesis and refuse to listen to reports from groups who are already operating within successful programs.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, this legislation is not new. Highly successful planned production and marketing schemes have been operating in Western Canada for many years. The uninformed members will endeavour to quote hypothetical possibilities suggesting ruination without taking the trouble to study existing results available to them for the asking. Provincial governments have found a way to pass acceptable enabling legislation. Bill C-197 will provide national assistance.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that previous attempts by the federal government to provide enabling legislation to establish marketing boards have failed to produce desired results. If we examine the reasons for failure at the federal level, as opposed to success at the provincial level we find that the fedeal approach has relied heavily on the public service whereas the provincial legislation places the burden of administration and responsibility on the shoulders of the producers—the people who actually own the product for sale. We also find that the federal approach fails to recognize that orderly marketing must be accompanied by orderly production. Orderly production, Mr. Speaker, is practised by every type of production and service industry today, with the exception of agriculture.

There is no successful production type industry in Canada which would deliberately manufacture or produce without positive assurance that they can control their inventories. It is true that occasionally giant corporations misjudge the markets or ignore the warnings of their research departments. However, Mr. Speaker, when they do, it is always a temporary problem. I refer to the potash industry in Saskatchewan. When excess inventories of potash became evident and the bottom fell out of the market, a plan to cut back production was introduced, because world demand for potash did not coincide with excess production. As demand increases production will increase, as will sensible and safe stock inventories.

There are two requisites to the successful operation of supply-management programs. The first is to plan production for safe inventories and market demand. The second is to serve secondary industries and through them the consumer with adequate production of low cost products. Surplus production beyond safe inventories and market demand must not occur. Therefore, self-discipline by producers has proven the only successful method of avoiding costly surpluses to date. If there is another method which works I would be most happy to learn of it, because I have been unable to find one over the years. Secondary industries have engaged in a system whereby they buy indiscriminately at prices suitable to them and sell their products for prices they can obtain. Certainly, that type of approach has not brought sufficient return to the farmer to enable him to stay in business and anticipate any kind of stable market.

I wish to deal for a moment with the advantages of producer controlled boards operating under self-discipline. My first reference is obviously directed towards successful commodity marketing boards now in operation. May I ask the indulgence of the House to refer to the practice in British Columbia? That province has been my base of operations, and I gained my experience there. That province has also the longest record of successful operations involving this type of planning. There, provincial marketing legislation has established a type of marketing council similar to the council proposed in this bill. I have no quarrel with the government for suggesting that the council should be made up of men from the public service. They are the shock troops between the producers, their agencies and government itself, and I would not request that that part of the bill be changed.

In British Columbia, the ground rules are provided in the Natural Products Marketing (British Columbia) Act. It contains the enabling legislation. A council of three public service employees act as a council of referees. Those in each commodity group hold a plebiscite of all producers who qualify for registration. If the majority of producers within that commodity group favour a marketing board, the producers proceed forthwith to plan the type of operation they feel suits their commodity group within the terms of reference provided in the act.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, the producers themselves study the regulations proposed and submit a plan to council. The council looks at the plan, and eventually approves it. But it is important to note that participation by the council in the administration of the regulations ceases at this point. The producers' organizations elect the board, and in so doing place the responsibility for the requirements of product supply directly into the hands of the producers of the product where, I submit, it rightfully belongs.

Advisory committees are formed and include representation from all interested secondary industry groups. It is the duty of the advisory committee to advise the producer board. It is not their prerogative to be involved in final decisions. Production quotas are increased or decreased according to market demand, plus reasonable inventories. May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg)—Trade—grain—suggested permanent foreign sales missions; the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale)—Veterans affairs—integration of veterans charter with social welfare programs; the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) Royal Canadian Mounted Police—consideration of payment for overtime.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business listed in today's Order Paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

INCOME TAX ACT

RECOMMENDATION THAT DEDUCTIONS BE ALLOWED IN RESPECT OF COST OF TOOLS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville) moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that the Governor in Council will amend the regulations under the Income Tax Act whereby the deduction in computing income allowed self-employed professionals, tradesmen and workmen in respect of capital costs of tools necessary to their trade and similar property be extended to all professionals, tradesmen and workmen, whether self-employed or otherwise who must purchase themselves such property in the course of their employment.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this notice of motion is to draw to the attention of the House what I consider one of the most glaring inequities in the present Income Tax Act, as it relates to certain tradesmen and professional people. At the present time such people, unless they are self employed, are unable to claim any deductions or depreciation for the tools and equipment which they are compelled to purchase and maintain and which are used in conjunction with the discharge of their respective duties and responsibilities. In many cases the inventories of such tools and equipment cost many thousands of dollars, and yet there is no provision in the Income Tax Act for the deduction of the cost of those tools and equipment.

Specifically, I am referring to those people who by occupation are mechanics, plumbers, carpenters, technicians, electricians or any tradesmen who find themselves forced to invest quite substantially in tools and equipment which are necessary if they are to perform their respective tasks. To some degree, perhaps, teachers and professors are similarly affected in that their investment in books and instructional aids amounts to a very significant outlay of capital which directly relate to the discharge of their duties. It is quite true that under the white paper proposals for tax reform, provision has been made for a maximum allowance of $150 per year as employment expenses for any one who is employed.

However, this provision in no way removes the inequity which this resolution seeks to remove because it does not distinguish between the classifications of employment. For example, an office clerk probably does not have to purchase his own pen but, on the other hand, a mechanic may invest up to $2,000 in tools and equipment. He must maintain those tools and equipment, provide replacements, upgrading the tools from time to time with new and improved items. Both occupations are treated alike at present, and proposals for the future indicate no changes, which to me is unfair and calls for reconsideration.

I respectfully submit the tax reform proposals provide an excellent opportunity to correct this anomaly and thus create a more equitable tax benefit with the self-employed counterpart. However, once more we see another of the numerous shortcomings in this so-called great revolutionary tax reform document which in the final analysis will discourage incentive, will discourage productivity and will do nothing more than make us all slaves of the state. This observation simply reiterates the assertion that this document is a proposal for social reform rather than tax reform, with very little consideration being given to help those who are in need and those who, by virtue of their trade, are being subjected to unfair tax treatment.

Returning to the specific motion as related to the present act, Mr. Speaker, one would naturally assume that, in the spirit of the act, all persons who are self-employed, or those who must provide the tools of their trade as a condition of employment, are covered in the same way by the provisions of section 11. However, this is not the case, Mr. Speaker. For some reason, perhaps known only to those who drafted this section, a large segment of our working population is excluded from enjoying the exemptions allowed under this section. Furthermore, if we turn to section 11, subsection (11) of the Income Tax Act, we see a provision allowing any employee who must use an automobile in the performance of his duties to deduct for tax computation purposes capital cost allowance in accordance with the corresponding tax regulations. I simply say if such a provision can be made for an automobile, it should certainly be provided in the same spirit with respect to tools and equipment necessary for the performance of one's duty. It seems this is a realistic analogy.

Looking at it from another aspect, a doctor, under the provisions of medicare, quite frankly is no longer a private practitioner or a self-employed entrepreneur. He is really now an employee of the government. I ask, what then is the difference between a doctor, who is being paid by the state, being allowed to claim deductions and depreciation on capital equipment expenditure and a mechanic who works for Myers Motors in downtown Ottawa? For that matter, he may work for the federal or provincial government. He can claim no deductions whatsoever with respect to the often significant capital outlays that he is compelled to make to provide him with the tools necessary to discharge his job.

Similarly, we can make an analogy with respect to a lawyer. A carpenter, who must provide his own tools as a condition of employment, is not allowed the same exemptions. It might be said that a doctor's instruments and lawyer's books are necessary conditions of their employment, but a carpenter without a hammer, a saw, a plane, a wood chisel in my estimation is no different. These tools are in integral and necessary part of his occupation.

I am sure most hon. members will agree that tax reform is needed in many areas, this being only one. What I want to say is this, Mr. Speaker: A reform such as outlined in this resolution would not require a white paper, it would not require the expenditure of millions of dollars in public hearings, answering services, debate, committee meetings etc. It would simply require an amendment to the present act which would ease the burden on many people in this country in the lower end of the income scale. Above all, such a resolution would not overburden our governmental structure with a huge build-up of bureaucratic officials.

It is my belief that we can make a meaningful start in the direction of tax reform by such methods as outlined in this resolution. First, by isolating examples of gross inequities in the tax laws and bringing forth provisions to correct these injustices. I think we would do much to restore confidence in our governmental process without upsetting or disturbing the fundamental goals and desires of Canadians. This resolution simply seeks to amend section 11, and the capital cost regulations of the Income Tax Act, to broaden the scope of exemptions allowed to persons who must provide their own tools, and maintain their tools at their own expense, as a provision of their employment.

One wonders, Mr. Speaker, whether those who drafted this section of the act failed to include such a large segment of our tradesmen and skilled workers from the exemptions allowed professional persons simply through the lack of knowledge of the extent to which tradesmen are required to invest in the tools of their trades. For example, Mr. Speaker, a first-class mechanic—I mention a mechanic because I happen to be familiar with mechanics—working in an automobile repair shop is required to invest, out of his own pocket, as much as $2,000 for necessary tools in order to secure a job. In addition, he must continue to spend money to maintain his tools. He must replace broken tools at his own expense, and must replace worn out tools as well as those tools that eventually become outmoded as the design of machinery changes. This can conceivably run to $500 per year.

Today, we hear a great deal about productivity. Productivity must be directly related to the skill of the user and the availability of adequate tools and equipment, at his disposal. If we are truly concerned about increased productivity within large segments of our population, let us ask ourselves what are we as a government, as a society, doing to encourage the upgrading of those fundamental components, skill and equipment? In the field of training perhaps, we are doing a fair amount, but in the field of advanced equipment and tools the present Income Tax Act certainly does not provide any encouragement or incentive at all.

I will conclude my remarks by saying I feel it is grossly unfair that a person who goes to work each day and uses nothing more than his two hands and a couple of university degrees, degrees which were obtained in schools which we collectively as taxpayers provided, should be granted the same exemptions under the provisions of the income tax legislation as a worker who must provide and maintain the necessary chest of tools and equipment that is supplemental to the requirements of those in other occupations and professions. Whether such regulations in the Income Tax Act are deliberate or simply an oversight, it is urgent that such inequity be removed without delay. I ask all hon. members to join with me in support of this resolution.

Mr. Barney Danson (York North): Mr. Speaker, I listened with considerable interest to the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) and found what he had to say a rather useful contribution to the discussion on the white paper on tax reform. As a member of that committee, I may say we have questioned the officials of the Department of Finance in this area and, as he knows, the subject is dealt with in the white paper on pages 15 and 16, sections 210 to 215, but more specifically section 213.

As the hon. member pointed out, it is difficult to make a precise distinction in this regard. In the committee the other day we had a rather lengthy discussion in attempting to determine whether this amount was equitable. I do not think any of us were thoroughly satisfied that it was completely equitable, any more than we could really reach a truly equitable tax system; but like many things, it seems to be the most practical and workable approach that we could see. I must say I was rather interested to hear—because this is beyond my experience—that the cost of tools could amount to $1,000 or more. I think this is something that those of us in the committee should reflect upon.

There are also other inequities. I think we would be looking to the working man who has tools or safety or special clothing when this particular provision is considered. On the other hand, this provision is available to all employees. I assume that it is available to the secretary of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) so that she can have her hair done and look as attractive as she does.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It will also be available to the hon. member, whether or not he has to provide tools.

Mr. Danson: If I can have the tools I can finish the job. However, I would have been more impressed with the hon. member's concern for the working man if he had not found it necessary to tie this particular notice of motion in with his criticism of the white paper, and particularly with his suggestion that it is going to discourage incentive and make us all slaves of the state. I suggest that the intention here, in the hope of achieving reasonable equity, is to give each of us the same opportunity to grow and prosper, to build a dynamic and growing economy which will found the economic and tax base to enable us to provide those social benefits to which all Canadians are rightfully entitled.

To suggest that doctors are now employees of the state is, I think, an exaggeration beyond credibility. This is just an indication of what takes place when people say they are in favour of tax reform, that tax reform should be encouraged. People say it can be done by way of notice of motion, that we do not need tax reform to correct inequities in our tax law. Although all parties say they believe in it, many fail to offer alternatives, or offer such weak alternatives that they are ludicrous.

The other day I had the opportunity of appearing on a panel discussion with the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) and he suggested that the leader of his party, if he were ever Prime Minister, would withdraw the white paper. That is the sort of thing we can expect in the name of tax reform! I suggest there is developing, for the first time in this country, a significant radical right, and I think Canadians should be conscious of this. Groups are springing up in the name of tax reform that are using tax reform as a tool to discredit any social benefits or movement that the country is making toward a just society—and I am not afraid of that term.

Mr. Bell: Ha, ha!

Mr. Danson: The hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell) may laugh at the expression "just society". I do not think we will ever have a just society, any more than we will ever have an equitable tax system. But I suggest it is not a bad objective, and I would like to see his party substitute something better.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is too bad that the Prime Minister dropped it.

Mr. Danson: If he drops it, I will pick it up. To me it is an objective, an ideal, and ideals are things to which we should aspire.

To get back to the notice of motion, I suggest that the provision in the white paper seems inadequate to most of the members of the committee. I suggest the hon. member has given us room for thought when we pursue the matter further and listen to representations made by delegations appearing before the committee, particularly those representing labour groups who might have more to say on the matter. It also presents some quite massive administrative problems.

The hon. member is concerned about growing bureaucracy. Again this might not prove to be insurmountable. I think we should be more concerned about some of the things that we do rather than what we do not do, things that very much affect the working man, or for that matter all Canadians. I think we are aiming at a certain class in our society—it is not quite a classless society yet—in the allowances that are provided for working mothers, in the deduction of unemployment contributions, something quite new, and in raising basic exemptions, which I think will give fundamental relief. What we are looking at is the process of examining our tax structure, and the hon. member's notice of motion, I think, should be given very serious consideration.

This is a new thing for us. Although white papers themselves are old, the way they are being used now is a departure from past practice, and I think a very healthy one. It gives the government an opportunity to present proposals without being locked into legislation, thus putting the government in a position of not having to defend those proposals quite as tightly. It gives those most affected by them the chance to respond, so that there is a dimension, a balance, a greater reality when the legislation finally comes into being.

This is not the first white paper. There was a white paper on Indian affairs, one on veterans affairs, one on housing and one on antidumping. All of them were very helpful. The hon. member mentioned a white paper, and I assume he is referring to the one on tax reform, which is just one of many. But a white paper is a process to which we must respond. It is a process that challenges us all very much. It is also disturbing. It is disturbing to us as politicians because it makes us work harder; we have to try to deal with the immense amount of work it generates. It is disturbing to the public, because it makes people think about legislation, something they have never had to do before. It is a process that I think contributes to good government. I am convinced it is democratic. I am not sure it is good politics, because people used not to like to be disturbed, or challenged, or asked for their ideas. Nowadays, our young people do. They want to be involved. This is a departure that I hope will work well for future legislation.

• (5:20 p.m.)

I could not help but be impressed by a statement of Mr. Malcolm Davidson of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture. He said:

> If they (the government) don't listen to our constructive proposals, then they've thrown away participatory democracy. But if we act hysterically, then we've thrown it away in advance.

So, this gives us an opportunity to reflect about the effect of legislation such as is before us this afternoon. Perhaps we have chosen something which is too complex in respect of tax reform. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in speaking in Toronto, referred to an old German saying something to the effect that you should not allow the public to see you making sausages or tax laws. Maybe there is something in this. This is a very complex matter which touches everybody very deeply. However, I think that to fail to proceed with this process would be giving up too easily. I believe it is a challenge to all of us and to our democratic institutions. I think it is a credit to the intelligence and maturity of Canadians who I believe are benefiting and will benefit by being able to participate in governing themselves.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, in rising to support this interesting resolution introduced by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) I feel almost inclined to say to him, "Welcome to the club". The subject matter of the resolution deals with something related to our tax laws that I have followed rather closely ever since I first arrived in this House. Indeed, I have put forward many amendments and resolutions and have made many proposals on this particular subject matter to various governments. I know my colleague sitting in front of me, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), was doing much the same sort of thing long before I arrived in this House and certainly back into the 1940's, unfortunately without too much effect so far as our income tax laws are concerned.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Except in respect of trade union dues.

Mr. Barnett: I was about to say that one of the points raised by the hon. member in the 40's concerned the deductibility of trade union dues which is one item that is now allowed as a deduction by working people under the provisions of the Income Tax Act. I believe this is an item which is equitably applied to the general working force. I have examined the terms of the motion. Perhaps I should spell them out, because I wish to make one or two comments concerning the details of the proposal. We find that the hon. member proposes the following:

> That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that the Governor in Council will amend the regulations under the Income Tax Act whereby the deduction in computing income allowed self-employed professionals, tradesmen and workmen in respect of capital costs of tools necessary to their trade and similar property be extended to all professionals, tradesmen and workmen, whether self-employed or otherwise who must purchase themselves such property in the course of their employment.

In the course of his remarks, the hon. member made particular reference to Section 11 of the existing Income Tax Act. I should like to point out that in my view his resolution is so phrased that he is asking the government to amend regulations. I would submit for his consideration the idea that what is required is not an amendment to the regulations but rather an actual amendment to the act itself. As I understand the act, it is not possible to cope with the situation he has in mind by a simple change in the existing regulations. I should like to direct his attention, and the attention of members of the House, to Section 5 of the Income Tax Act which I believe to be more pertinent to this issue than Section 11. Section 5 of the Income Tax Act is the section which spells out specifically, exactly what deductions a person whose income is from wages or salary is allowed. As I recall the phrasing in that section it makes very clear that, except for those particular items, no exemptions are allowed for anything else or for any benefits of any kind whatsoever.

At various times and in various arguments, I have submitted that there are three main areas in which the working force of Canada whose income is derived from salary or wages is discriminated against, so far as deductibility of expenses under the Income Tax Act is concerned. Two of these areas apply particularly to working people who, in the course of their employment, must be away from their normal place of residence for periods extending into days, weeks or months. This involves the cost of living away from home and all unusual travelling expenses incurred in going from the place of residence to some other part of the country in the course of carrying on employment. The third area is the one to which the hon. member makes particular reference in his resolution; that is, the type of expenses incurred by a tradesman or professional person employed for salary or wages in supplying himself with the necessary tools and equipment which he is required to have in order to carry on his particular trade or vocation.

These three areas of expense are freely allowed to self-employed people as a deduction, but they are not allowable in respect of persons whose income is from salary or wages. Herein undoubtedly lies the discrimination which is of concern to the hon. member for Vegreville, as expressed in his resolution. I submit that the appropriate manner in which to bring about this change would be in the form of an amendment to Section 5 of the Income Tax Act. There was an occasion when rectifying this situation was almost within the grasp of members of this House.

Indeed, in a very fragmentary and partial way, it was dealt with in a proposal advanced to this House by a Minister of Finance in his budget. I refer to the budget introduced by the Minister of Finance in 1957. The Minister of Finance at that time was the Hon. Donald Fleming. As a result of a change of administrative practice in the Department of National Revenue, at that time the Minister of Finance did propose—and if the hon. member has not noticed this he can look it up—a special amendment to Section 5 of the Income Tax Act which partially covered the situation in respect of discrimination against some people in so far as expenses incurred in earning a living are concerned.

That amendment provided that people employed in the construction industry can claim as a deductible expense the cost of living away from home and the cost of travelling to their place of work from their normal place of residence. This was restricted to those people who maintained a self-contained domestic establishment, to use the phraseology of the act. In that sense, I believe it was very realistic. In other words, a single person who had his home where he was working, perhaps in a camp, would not be eligible to deduct this kind of expense while a person who was maintaining a home elsewhere would be. I remember pleading with the Minister of Finance—the Minister of Finance of the first Conservative administration in recent times—to go the whole way while he was about it. In other words, I pleaded that he make this amendment to Section 5 of general application to all workers under similar circumstances. I pleaded that it should not be restricted only to construction workers and should be extended to cover loggers, miners and other people, whatever their occupation might be, who were involved in this situation.

I also argued that it should be extended to cover the particular cost to which the hon. member refers in his resolution, namely, the cost incurred by tradesmen or professional people in supplying themselves with the necessary tools to do the job which they are called upon to do in their particular vocation. Unfortunately, that particular opportunity went by. While at various times and in various ways this argument has been advanced in the House since that date, no change has been made in the Income Tax Act to deal with the situation which is of concern to the hon. member.

We did have the report of the Royal Commission on Taxation which, I was delighted to note, covered the particular point that is of concern to me and to the hon. member as indicated in his resolution. I hoped that after all these years of fighting an uphill battle, and with the weight of the royal commission four-square behind the idea of eliminating this discrimination, perhaps at last the government of Canada and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) would place before this House proposals to amend the Income Tax Act in order to deal with it.

To my great regret this has not been the action of the government, as indicated in its White Paper proposing not necessarily tax reforms but tax changes. I think the Minister of Finance would have been much more accurate if he had labelled this document "Proposals for tax Changes". The question of whether they are all reforms is very debatable, and some of the issues are under discussion in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs to which the hon. member for York North (Mr. Danson) made reference.

What did the government do? They completely ignored the concept that has been advanced in this resolution. They completely ignored the concept that was partially implemented in the Income Tax Act in 1957. They certainly completely ignored the argument that I put forward in amendments to income tax bills at various times, which were ruled out of order. They came in with something that I described as political nonsense. Let me refer to the White Paper proposal at page 10, entitled "New Deductions". The government's proposal is as follows:

> The government has examined the deductions individuals may claim for various costs they incur, as well as differences in treatment between taxpayers who are employed and those who carry on a business or profession. The royal commission said many employees have been over-taxed because they have been denied the deduction of almost all expenses incurred in earning wages and salaries. But millions of taxpayers are involved, and a very wide range of expenses could be related to earning their employment income. These taxpayers do not keep detailed records. The government has found no practical way to permit employees to deduct actual costs as do those carrying on a profession or other business. We proposed to provide employees with a general deduction to cover expenses, in addition to certain specified deductions. The amount would be 3 per cent of employment income, up to a total of $150 a year.

This is the complete opposite of the principle of bringing fairness to the tax law, because all it does is provide an additional basic exemption to all workers whether or not they have any definable expenses in the course of earning a living. Here the government is advancing exactly the same arguments that Hon. Walter Harris used to advance in the House, and they have the gall to label this a document for tax reform.

In 1956 the Minister of Finance admitted this discrimination and said the government would look into it. Apparently Liberal administrations have been looking into it ever since, and this one has come up with exactly the same answer that was given to members of the House in 1956 so far as the principle involved is concerned. That is why I submit that any suggestion advanced in this House or elsewhere that this proposal in the White Paper is designed to meet the situation outlined by the hon. member for Vegreville in his speech is at complete variance with the fact.

All this nonsense about the millions of taxpayers involved and about not keeping records has nothing to do with the kind of situation the hon. member for Vegreville is outlining in his resolution, or the kind of special expenses incurred by certain workers because their employment requires them to live away from home or to travel long distances from their normal place of residence. These are the kinds of expenses that self-employed people are allowed to deduct. Self-employed people are not allowed to deduct the bus fare from their home to the office, and neither should any other working people be allowed to deduct these expenses. Presumably these expenses which everyone has—we all have to eat, have clothing and shelter—can be covered in a general basic exemption.

Let us not confuse these two issues. To do so simply makes nonsense of any suggestion that we are moving toward tax reform in the area covered by the resolution of the hon. member for Vegreville. This matter would not involve millions of taxpayers. It would not involve any more difficulty so far as administration is concerned than administration of the tax law for the self-employed farmer, fisherman or any one of a dozen other categories of people, be they professionals or tradesmen. I wish that for once the government could get this simple proposition through its head. Let us not have any more of the kind of nonsense that is peddled with the white paper, about the government being the great white father and saying, "We are going to be very big hearted and allow you an extra $150 a year." This is not what it seems.

I submit, Mr. Speaker—I mention it for the benefit of the hon. member for York North who participated in the debate—that this proposal will increase discrimination against working people so far as expenses are concerned because it is based on a percentage of income principle. It has no relationship whatever to the amount of the expenses. In other words, as long as one is discussing income below the ceiling, in effect the more poorly paid worker is charged more for the expenses he incurs than the person in a higher income bracket. Is this equity? I suppose it is the Liberal concept of a just society.

I hope the hon. member for York North will make an attempt at least to consider my argument. He is a member of the august Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, to which I have not ventured to aspire. Nevertheless, when it comes down to these fundamental, practical questions of equity and tax law it seems to me that one does not have to move too far into the ethereal realm of high finance to be able to understand simple economic justice for working people.

I am very happy that the hon. member for Vegreville has recognized the existence of this problem and has taken the initiative to put this resolution on the Order Paper. I hope he will continue to pursue this matter. I think there is a growing disposition in various quarters of the House to recognize that this is a real problem of discrimination and that it can be dealt with in a sane, practical manner. We no longer need to be fooled by the kind of smokescreen of administrative difficulties that has been drawn across this issue over the years in many sessions of Parliament.

• (5:40 p.m.)

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, this is the second occasion on which a member of the official opposition by private member's resolution has brought to this House matters that are basically under consideration in the Finance Committee study of the white paper. On the previous occasion resolution No. 12, in the name of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Southam), dealt with similar matters—basically, the travelling expenses incurred by certain categories of employees. With some regret at that time I found myself unable to support the motion, principally because due to faulty research and draftsmanship the motion, if adopted, for some unaccountable reason never explained, would have discriminated against persons who were ordinarily domiciled in situations that did not involve relationships such as by blood, marriage or adoption.

The single man or the man living in sin, but working away from his place of sinful activities or of his single bliss as the case may be, would not have been allowed the same deductions for travelling expenses—

An hon. Member: What about for tools?

Mr. Mahoney: —as the man who was more conventionally situated. Now we find a resolution which certainly is very fine in spirit but again, due to faulty research, we are asked to recommend to the government that it deal with regulations under the Income Tax Act. As the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) has pointed out, passage of this resolution would be futile because the particular provisions of the law that give offence to the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) are contained in the act itself and not in the regulations.

Mr. Mazankowski: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I did say an amendment to the act and the regulations.

Mr. Mahoney: I am sincerely sorry, Your Honour. I was merely reading the resolution as it appears on the Order Paper. We are being asked to support the following motion:

> That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that the Governor in Council will amend the regulations under the Income Tax Act—

I did not catch the hon. member amending the motion in the course of his comments. In any case, the provisions of the act define income from office or employment and the deductions by which a taxpayer is permitted to reduce his income, and the act itself states that no other deductions are allowed. Accordingly, while one may comment on the principle advanced here, it is with regret that I cannot support the resolution because to do so would be futile.

The hon. member for York North (Mr. Danson) has spoken most eloquently on the white paper that we are studying in the general area of tax reform. That is certainly an exposition which the country and members of this House perhaps not as intimately acquainted with the process as members of the Finance Committee would do well to refer to. This is a genuine exercise in participatory democracy. Whether or not it will be a successful exercise remains to be seen. However, I think its success will in large measure be affected by the sincerity and honesty with which members of this chamber on all sides approach the process, and comments that the white paper proposals for tax reform contain certain social goals are not particularly honest when expressed in terms of amazement at the discovery of some sinister plot.

The fact is that the white paper states very frankly and openly that one of the goals of tax reform in Canada is a social goal. Paragraph 1.13, for those who have been critical of the white paper without getting down to reading to page 7 of it, gives the reference and it is very clear and very precise. There are other goals as well. Just what weight a person gives to the achievement of different goals is a matter of bona fide contention and bona fide debate. It is my personal feeling that economic goals should carry considerable weight, since I cannot quite visualize how an economic shortfall would result in anything but a social shortfall, whereas I do not feel that a social shortfall would necessarily bring economic disaster to Canada.

So, Mr. Speaker, in considering the white paper we are being asked to consider many goals. Certainly the social one mentioned by the hon. member for Vegreville is one, but it is far from the only one. Just what priority a Member of Parliament or a Canadian taxpayer may give the achievement of the various goals is, as I have said, a matter of very legitimate choice on this part. But let us not kid ourselves that there is anything sinister in the white paper suggestion that social goals are legitimate objectives of the tax system.

A second item which the hon. member for Vegreville evidently discovered with some surprise is the rather inequitable situation which exists, and I would be the first to admit it, regarding the treatment of bona fide expenses incurred by employees in earnings their salaries of wages. This is nothing new, either. The Carter Commission noted the situation in rather eloquent terms on page 290 of volume III of their report, when they said in one short sentence:

> The present unfair discrimination against employees should be removed.

However, they rather disputed the basic premise of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni by saying:

> —because a large number of employees would be involved, the task of assessment would be enormous if each employee submitted an itemized claim for his or her actual expenses.

Further on in their report they noted that the Income Tax Department was having quite enough difficulty dealing with the half million itemized expense claims that it was dealing with when the commission was conducting its hearings, and that the problem would probably be insurmountable if it had to deal with another 4½ million itemized claims from all the taxpayers of Canada. However, the Carter approach was different from that taken in the white paper. The Carter approach would suggest that employees should have the option of deducting actual expenses of this nature or electing the optional deduction of 3 per cent with a ceiling of $500. I think that the Carter approach on this particular item has considerable merit, and I know it is an alternative which the Finance Committee of this House will be considering in its study of the white paper.

The proposals in the white paper dealing with this item, in paragraphs 2.12 and 2.13, suggest no option at all—everyone drawing wages may take a deduction of 3 per cent up to a maximum of $150. That effectively places the ceiling, so far as deductions are concerned, at $5,000 wages or salary. The $500 ceiling proposed by Carter would have raised this ceiling to the $16,606.77 mark. I am not too sure that the Carter ceiling is necessarily desirable. It seems to me that employees in that salary range have a considerable amount of influence on the conditions of their employment and on the supply of tools, books or whatever is necessary for the proper conduct of their trade.

I was very glad that the hon. member for Vegreville mentioned the problem faced by university professors and teachers. In this area it may be said that the law is an ass. A university professor cannot claim the cost of books or research materials relating to his employment by an institution, but if he does freelance work or independent research the cost of the materials used can be set off against the income derived in this manner.

Some years ago a journalist took a case to the Income Tax Appeal Board in the full knowledge that he could not win, but he hoped to draw attention, to the rather silly situation which existed in the case of a person whose income was derived from salary and freelance work. He pointed out the illogical treatment of expenses under the law. The board informed him that had he chosen to set off his expenses against the freelance income instead of the salary, the appeal would have been allowed. His was a public spirited gesture to demonstrate the folly of the existing procedure, but all he obtained from the appeal board was sympathy.

This question comes before the House at a time when taxation is of great concern to all of us. I am grateful to the hon. member for Vegreville for bringing it before us so that we may discuss it publicly. However, I must oppose the motion because I do not feel it will achieve his objective. With a general revision of the income tax laws due in a short time, we will have a opportunity to deal with this and other items that appear inequitable. Hopefully, we will be offered an income tax system easily administered and understood, which will not require an extra cadre of bookkeepers on the staff of the Department of National Revenue. It should be simple enough that the taxpayer can understand it and that the tax collector can quickly establish the identity of those evading taxation.

I suspect that the Carter recommendation might have resulted in an overly complex system. There is merit to the suggestion of setting tax as a flat percentage of salary with a ceiling as an allowance for employment expenses, but this opposes the pure equity of the idea that a person should be able to deduct legitimate expenses incurred in the earning of income. Practicality is also an objective of a tax system, and I am prepared to listen to argument for a workable system which would allow the deduction of expenses without imposing too great a burden on the taxpayer and the tax collector. This Mr. Speaker, is desirable but it may not be possible.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question.

Mr. E. B. Osler (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, there is not very much time left but I should like to say a word in this debate and congratulate the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) on the intent of his motion. As has been pointed out, it may not be the right way to raise the subject, but this is a matter of opinion. I feel that it should be brought to the attention of the Finance Committee and included in the consideration of the white paper changes.

I am sorry that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) took a cynical line about the processes of the white paper and the intent of its authors. I do not think he has any reason to believe that the process will not be followed. It is the government's job to bring in legislation, and the job of the opposition to criticize it. In fact, everybody in Canada has been given the opportunity to criticize and comment on the white paper on tax reform. I hope the hon. member will have constructive criticism to offer to the committee.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING AGENCIES BILL

ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL MARKETING COUNCIL AND AGENCIES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Olson that Bill C-197, to establish the National Farm Products Marketing Council and to authorize the establishment of national marketing agencies for farm products, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. Jerry Pringle (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, just before the witching hour set aside for private members' business, I was discussing the success, work and involvement of various marketing boards throughout Canada. I was somewhat pleased with the speech delivered by my hon. friend from Kent-Essex (Mr. Danforth) who, while seeming to disagree with the most vital requisite of programming and planning involved in marketing boards and questions relating to supply and management, nevertheless agrees, I feel, that producers must be in a position to plan their programs.

I was also interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) who spoke about some of the problems in Quebec. It is interesting to note that the dairy industry there is considering adopting a program which would effectively reduce surplus milk production in Quebec. I hope this type of thinking will spill over into other agricultural endeavours in Quebec which are experiencing very heavy surpluses in domestic and other markets. We hope their endeavours will be successful. I hope—this may not be the right term to use—that a somewhat different position will be created with regard to broiler prices across Canada.

In speaking about marketing boards of British Columbia previously, I wanted to state categorically that I was not referring to hypothetical examples. I was making a report from actual experience. For many years past various commodity groups in British Columbia have brought a measure of stability unequalled anywhere in Canada. A great deal of work has been done in our dairy industry. While we all agree that this is a very complex problem, it is interesting to note that the cost to the taxpayer in that province for the subsidy payments for manufacturing milk have been somewhat less than $1 million. They operate so as to take care of their fluid milk but import many of the products developed from manufacturing milk from other provinces.

If Your Honour will permit a reference to the broiler industry, may I point out that only twice during the past eight years has that industry suffered from depressed wholesale markets. On both occasions secondary industry processors pressured the broiler board into excessive quotas. The experience was very educational for them and I doubt if the processors will permit a repeat performance.

A frequent argument of the uninformed and inexperienced centres around the mistaken conclusion that supply management programs tend to stifle competition. The opposite is true. Indiscriminate production is usually coupled with indiscriminate diversification. Of course, in this way a farmer can swing from commodity to commodity as the bottom falls out of the markets. Supply management programs tend to lean toward more specialization. We therefore find commodity groups competing with each other for the consumer's dollar.

I feel this is a very important point that ought to be considered by all those now endeavouring to examine Bill C-197. It will not create monopolies if those in the various individual commodity groups are prepared to establish programs, plans and agencies so as to be in direct competition with those in other commodity groups. Turkey men will compete with broiler operators. The hog people are continually striving for a higher spot on the volume scale, as opposed to beef and poultry operators. The egg industry is also in there pitching. We never experienced that degree of sincere competition during the days when secondary industry was in the driver's seat.

Another argument that I feel is false is that under supply management we protect the small and inefficient producers. In view of many years of involvement in the food industry—an involvement in areas of hatchery production, processing plants, cash crops and egg farms—I am convinced that bigness alone does not guarantee efficiency. We small operators have successfully competed with giants in the meat packing industry for years. Under a program of supply management, inefficient operators still go out of business or sell out to more efficient operators. The important point to remember is that under supply management programs the efficient operator can survive in competition with other commodity groups.

Area and international competition play an important role in demanding high efficiency without wrecking stability. Anyone who imagines that Bill C-197 will create a giant monopoly for farmers and farm products is simply mistaken. The facts show that farm commodity groups operating under supply management programs are providing high quality, low priced products at reasonably stable prices the year round. If you doubt this, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that you ask a consumer to list the high protein items she prefers, based on quality and price. While doing so it might be advisable to undertake a producer check as well. Learn of the hazards of the sharecropper operating at the mercy of secondary industry in certain areas. This is only one area in Canada where marketing boards are not in evidence. Compare them with the independent, financially sound farmers operating within a supply management program. I refer again to British Columbia because that is where my experience lies.

It has been said that supply management boards assist giant corporations to build vertical integration at the expense of independent farming. Here again, the opposite is true. Vertical integration preceded supply management programs and were stopped in their tracks by marketing boards. There is no evidence that vertical integration can provide lower-cost farm products to consumers. Millions of dollars have been wasted in the United States while attempting to prove that vertical integration without supply management works. In one attempt a number of years ago a giant corporation in California lost $40 million before they gave up. A very large milling company lost $21 million in Washington and Oregon before they gracefully withdrew.

Only the companies who were content to draw on their huge financial reserves have continued their vertically integrated operations in the United States. There is presently a great deal of evidence to show that since a few companies now virtually control the entire production of some commodity groups in the U.S.A., they are commencing to practice supply management techniques. Farmers have been reduced to production helpers. It now appears their only hope is to join unions which will give some financial security while further eroding their once enjoyed independence.

There is an expressed feeling by some that self-disciplinary measures as provided by enabling legislation restrict individual rights. Proponents of voluntary participation should explain why voluntary restraints as recommended by the Prices and Incomes Commission are not working. Without the totally unsatisfactory policy of tight money and high interest rates, inflation will not be brought under control. Human nature will not permit it. Voluntary restraints in marketing simply have not worked. They have been tried on many occasions in many sections of Canada.

I quote from an article by Mr. D. C. Fillmore, Q.C., who is considered an authority on marketing as related to the tree fruit industry in British Columbia. He stresses the importance of industry self-discipline in these words:

> The British Columbia growers long ago found that merely having most of the growers co-operating to build expensive cold storage plants so that the marketing season could be extended, merely supplied an umbrella under which the selfish minority of growers could find good markets (which would not otherwise exist) and be able to sell all their crops in a few weeks without incurring any of the costs of co-operative marketing. A brief review of the tree fruit industry bears this out clearly. It had become obvious even as early as 1913 that some form of collective action would have to be taken by the growers and these were primarily men who had come from other parts of Canada and from the United Kingdom and were as staunch supporters of free enterprise as any that could be found.

He says in a later paragraph:

> Even the most individualistic growers realized that there had to be some means of ensuring that when a substantial majority had decided that a certain method was essential to permit economic survival, their plans could not be upset by a minority who could gain an advantage through staying outside—an advantage that would only exist because of the foresight of the majority.

While I am referring to testimonials in support of this bill, Mr. Speaker, may I also quote from a speech delivered by Mr. Fred Beeson, editor of Canada Poultryman. His speech was presented in San Francisco on invitation from the American Poultry and Hatchery Federation, the largest trade organization of its kind in the world. This quotation is from a letter written by B. H. Creelman, general manager, Surrey Co-operative Association, Cloverdale, B.C.:

> In reply to your enquiry as to my opinion of the merits of the B.C. Broiler Marketing Board, since its inception in January 1962, I may say that without the control of this board, our broiler industry would not be nearly as financially sound as it is today, and I believe that many of our producers would not have been able to carry on in the business but would have lost their investment and been forced out of the industry. I can recall the very desperate condition of the industry before the board came into being. The prices were low and uncertain but since the board has been functioning there has been much more stability in the industry here and prices have been more stable. There have been occasions when great pressure has been exerted on the board to lower prices due to large stocks on hand but the board in their wisdom have been able to maintain a reasonable price and reduce the placement of chicks until the surplus stock has been reduced. This board is elected by the producers of broilers and this gives democratic control of the industry by the industry itself. I feel that orderly marketing of agricultural products is necessary and desirable in the interest of all phases of the industry.

It is interesting to note that Mr. Creelman does not represent a producer co-operative in the sense that they market farm produce. They service farmers with feed and other essentials, operating more as a secondary industry. I wish to point out that during the formative years to which he is referring the price of broilers remained stable, even at the chain store level, and the quality of the product improved tremendously. This can be confirmed by those who purchased chicken products in the area.

Bill C-197, Mr. Speaker, must be considered to be a good bill. However, there are those who agree with me that it is not a perfect bill. I am therefore serving notice that I intend to introduce some amendments for the consideration of the Standing Committee on Agriculture when the committee is in session.

Mr. Ricard: Do you have permission?

Mr. Pringle: I consider that early reference to the committee is most important in order to enable consultation with witnesses from organizations representing farm commodity groups across Canada. It is felt that the definition of "farm products" requires more clarification. More emphasis relating to producer majority representation on the council and agencies should be considered. Without being specific in Bill C-197, it has been suggested that the definition of authority of the agencies should be broadened to facilitate administration. The powers of inspection could also stand some clarification.

I am confident, Mr. Speaker, that the committee will approach the examination of Bill C-197 objectively, fully realizing it is long overdue and can only serve to provide agricultural producers with the incentive to join other Canadian industries in adopting operational programs which will allow full competition between food commodity groups, while providing Canadian consumers with high quality food products at the lowest possible price, commensurate with efficient costs of production. I am confident the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) is looking forward to the meetings with members of the Standing Committee on Agriculture. I am confident that with suggestions from his department and suggestions from the committee we will be able to introduce some very worth-while amendments which I think will improve this bill.

• (8:20 p.m.)

Governments can continue to establish the ground rules, and they should, in consultation with producers and members of allied industries. But the governmental, paternalistic approach is really not acceptable any longer. Farmers in many areas have proven themselves capable of handling their production and marketing affairs in face of competition from various food commodity groups, and to the mutual advantage of producers and consumers.

Bill C-197 will lend some federal support to existing provincial legislation. It behooves us all to support Canadian farm producers in their earnest desire properly to participate in the production and marketing of the products they produce. I am confident that Bill C-197 will be given early second reading and sent to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. H. A. Moore (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, may I begin by saying I consider Bill C-197 is the most amazing piece of legislation ever presented to a democratic Parliament. It is not the type of marketing board referred to by my good friend from Fraser Valley East

(Mr. Pringle), though I would add that I agree with some of his opinions on vertical integration.

No one can deny the need for marketing agencies to handle the produce of half a million farms spread over a vast area embracing millions of square miles. But we wonder whether in this legislation we are discussing state control rather than marketing boards. The bill proposes to take control out of the hands of the primary producer and provincial bodies and place it in the hands of government appointed bureaucrats. What guarantee have we that all areas of agriculture and all sections of the country will be represented by these appointees? Does this not suggest some shocking possibilities, such as the favouring of some areas of the country over others? I will deal with this question further in regard to the Dairy Commission.

Although the bill mentions the interests of the consumer, no examples are given of how the consumer will benefit. I failed to find any mention of specific benefits to the primary producer in my study of the bill. On different occasions the minister has talked about "consensus" and about the "requests made by a substantial majority of producers" for marketing boards. But I should like to ask what relation Bill C-197 has to this particular concept.

After an initial grant from the government for the purpose of establishing such an agency, the producer will be required to pay for maintenance of that agency. With the rigid controls that will be placed on his production, the farmer will be uneasy, to say the least, about the benefits, if any, that he is going to derive from this legislation. His profits are dwindling now, and this is but one other expense added to many. It is something like buying a pig in a poke.

Cannot you picture, Mr. Speaker, the farmer, who is one of the most independent operators to be found anywhere—I might add he has not much left but his independence—reacting to the added chore of keeping the records that are required by this agency, to be submitted to them on request? What about his reaction to having an inspector prying into the sale of every item? I shudder to think of the cost, paid by the farmer, of hiring enough inspectors to police every farm in Canada. Considering the mood of today's farmer, he may well ask whether he will also be asked to contribute to the cost of building more jails to house those farmers who, inadvertently or otherwise, fail to come to heel and may be required to spend two years in jail to bring to their attention the fact that this is not a free country after all.

As an example of this type of legislation—and this surely cannot be regarded as a hypothetical one—let me refer to the Canadian Dairy Commission. When it was formed in 1966 it seemed an innocent enough body, set up to handle dairy products and related problems and to pay subsidies where subsidies were required. For the record, I may say the commissioners were top-flight men. They were co-operative in every way, and I mean no criticism of them by any of my remarks tonight. However, the commission set limits on production or quotas for subsidy payments on manufacturing milk. Aside from an upper limit, a producer had to produce so much per year or no subsidy would be paid. When a dairy herd was dispersed, if the quota attached reverted to the commission it could be reallocated or not, as the Dairy Commission wished.

The next step was to subtract all costs involved in exporting milk surpluses from the amount of money voted for the payment of subsidies. A hold back of 26 cents from the $1.25 subsidy per 100 pounds of 3.5 per cent milk left a subsidy of 99 cents a hundredweight. On all over-quota production, the holdback was doubled to 56 cents a hundredweight. This year the holdback on overproduction has been increased to $1.25 a hundredweight. In addition to this, the government is now seeking provincial co-operation to get control of the fluid milk business so that it might place a levy of $1.25 a hundredweight on all surplus milk produced by fluid milk shippers. As most fluid milk quotas are small in relation to total production, this would, if allowed to take place, put many producers out of business immediately. If anyone thinks this is not so, they should, as I have, talk to these fluid milk shippers. Since fluid milk shippers are not subsidized on any portion of their milk, this cannot be called a holdback but a straight, downright fine. Is it any wonder, then, that as a farmer for over 30 years I am suspicious of the absolute power that is granted by Bill C-197?

The provincial governments are going to be asked to collect this fine for the federal government. It is to be hoped that they will have enough guts to stand up to the federal government on this matter and protect the rights of their fluid milk shippers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Moore: I mentioned earlier that there is no guarantee that the official appointed by the government to act on the proposed National Farm Products Marketing Council will represent all areas of production, geographically or otherwise. To illustrate this, I understand that recently the official from western Canada resigned from the Dairy Commission. Has his place been filled by another man from western Canada? Western Canada is a pretty big area. I will answer that question: It has not. This only adds to my suspicions, shared by many western farmers, that this government is not too interested in the problems of agriculture in general and in western Canada in particular. Can we be blamed for being concerned when the officers of the marketing council are to be appointed by the government?

What are some of the results of this rigid state control by the Dairy Commission? I do not think this sort of control can be called anything else. First of all, the producers are receiving little more for their product, in the face of rising costs. Some are receiving less. Many have been forced out of business. In addition, it is virtually impossible for a young dairy farmer to become established at the present time. The fluid milk shipper, especially those with small operations, is worried about his future, and he has cause to be.

The consumer is paying more than ever before. In other words, there are more problems than ever before and nothing has been solved. We might ask the many members of this House who have a dairy industry in their constituencies about the number of letters and calls for help they have been receiving. An illustration of the type of assistance we can expect is contained in the statement made by the minister concerning what the farmer could do with the $2 milk which would result after a fine of $1.25 per hundredweight had been levied.

There is no suggestion that it should be fed to school children, needy families or even all consumers. No, the $2 milk is to be fed to calves and $4.85 per hundredweight will be realized for the milk. Remember that the minister is speaking about the dairy industry and dairy cows. Most dairy cows in good herds today—and we are talking about good herds because we are talking about fluid milk shippers—produce about 100 or more pounds a day when they freshen because of the advances in breeding and genetics. One hundred pounds of milk today will not feed only one calf; it will feed at least five calves. We are talking only about male calves. I am quite sure the minister is aware that one can count on 50 per cent of his calves being male calves and 50 per cent being heifer calves. No good dairyman will pour the milk into a heifer if she is to be a producer when she matures.

Therefore, what do we need? We need cows that have litters, I guess. I know from experience that before the dairy policy was enunciated, 104 dairy bull calves were sold in one afternoon at a little sale down in my constituency. By the way, these calves sold for an average of $70 each. They were about three weeks old, because under the law in Alberta they cannot be sold at an earlier age by public auction. Shortly after the dairy policy was announced the price went up to $1 a pound, and soon there were not any for sale; people became panicky and decided they should keep their calves since they would have the surplus milk. There certainly would not seem to be much thought behind this suggestion.

In conclusion I ask, is it not dangerous to place this particular control in the hands of a government-appointed body which can make up the rules as it goes along? The welfare of an industry, a basic industry, and in fact the very way of life of a great number of Canadians, is to be placed in the hands of a few bureaucrats.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, as a farmer I am naturally quite interested in legislation of this type. During most of my life as a farmer I have been involved with the problem of surpluses and low prices. Sometimes these low prices were not necessarily a result of a surplus but, rather, because farmers did not have the power to ask for the prices for their products to which they were entitled. As a consequence, when legislation of this nature is being discussed I have more than a normal amount of interest in it.

Sometimes people who do not understand the problems of farmers and the marketing position of farmers, and who do not understand the situation in respect of the low prices farmers receive for their products and the high cost of farming these days, suggest that farmers are a little like purple people eaters and ask what is the matter out on the farm.

I should like to suggest one reason is the poor bargaining power and consequently prices which are too low. I have a book entitled "The Search for Stability," written by Charles Schwartz. It is not a new book, but after reviewing it today I find that some of the arguments in it are still valid. He deals with a time during the 1920s when farmers were concerned about the lack of bargaining strength, or what he calls the countervailing power. My father was a farmer in Saskatchewan early in the history of that province. The story he tells me is quite similar to my own experience.

With the exception of a short period during World War I and a short period immediately following World War II, the farmers in western Canada have fought low prices and a poor bargaining position. Last spring and last summer, as a member of the Agricultural Committee I toured the country and discovered that Prairie farmers are not the only people who have problems in this regard. I discovered, for example, that in the Niagara Peninsula there are vegetable producers, fruit growers and so on whose problems are similar to mine except that they produce a perishable product which must be marketed within a very limited time so that its value will not be lost.

I was a little disturbed about the bitterness expressed by some of these farmers. In Prince Edward Island I heard the same story. In the Fraser Valley I heard a somewhat similar story. I have heard the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle) talk about market management and the value of it. I would agree with him that this is a desirable objective. I have also heard the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Howard) talk about the problems and experiences of fruit growers. They do have their problems, but I believe they have been more successful in respect of marketing than some other producers in Canada. I suggest that it is not as simple a matter as they seem to think. I do not say this facetiously at all. They produce a product in a relatively small area among relatively few farmers. It is easier to organize these farmers than it is to organize farmers who are spread right across the country. I think they have achieved more than has been achieved in other agricultural or farming activities. I compliment them on that.

I suggest to the members who represent these areas it is my experience that in a wider area of farming, involving a larger number of farmers, the problem in respect of organizing farmers and the marketing end of the business is not as easy as it is in a smaller geographic area or in an area where there is a relatively limited or, if you like, captive market which is shut off by mountains or other physical features from the remainder of the country. As a farmer and producer representing a farming area, I should like to see the farmers in my area emulate what they have achieved or at least come closer to achieving it.

As a Member of Parliament representing a farming area, I should like to place in the hands of the farmers more power to control the marketing methods and the price of their products. I think this would be a desirable objective and one which the farmers would applaud. How can we achieve this? I support orderly marketing such as we have had through the Canadian Wheat Board in respect of grains. However, I regret that over the years we have not had more farmer representation on this board. I feel that the farmer's interests might have been better served had this been the case.

On looking at the legislation and checking the Agricultural Products Marketing Act, if my understanding of these two acts is correct, I find that the one which we have on the statute books already allocates federal powers to provincial marketing boards, while in the case of the act now before us the reverse is true. Under the bill before us we are to set up a federal agency and request or invite provincial marketing authorities or boards to cooperate. In effect, this bill is permissive, not compulsory.

I am not quite sure—perhaps someone will tell me before the debate is over—how we will secure the participation of all provinces in a particular item. A particular province might be allowed to participate if it has such legislation on its statute books. I should like someone from the government side of the House to tell us how this might work. Certainly, I look forward to discussing some of the items in the committee. As I understand it, this legislation is permissive. If the provinces wish to join, they may.

Some mention was made earlier today of the reservation that many of us have about the lack of control by farmers over their products. This disturbs me somewhat. The last speaker mentioned the dairy policy in his province. I have seen things happen in regard to the Wheat Board which I thought were errors of judgment. We all make errors, so I do not suppose we should throw stones too readily. But if the people directly affected by this legislation have no means of registering a protest except through their Member of Parliament, I wonder if this is the wisest type of legislation to have. If we could introduce some means whereby farmers who grow fruit in the Okanagan Valley, or who produce meat in other areas, or chickens or eggs, could register a protest directly to the board, I would be happy to hear about it. Perhaps the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary could enlighten us in this respect. I understand he is going to speak on the bill.

I read the minister's speech this evening and I find that he did not go into great detail on how this legislation might work. I do not see in the legislation any means whereby farmers may have some control over the products which they grow and which presumably will be handled by a suitable marketing agency.

As I said earlier, I favour this type of approach. I feel very strongly that farmers need more bargaining power nationally. I notice that the minister made reference in his speech to the fact that foreign trade is not covered by this legislation. I am not sure of the reason for this. As I recall, he did not say what it was but told us only that the act does not cover it. Again, this raises a question in my mind: Why is there this reservation? Perhaps a government spokesman, again, will tell us why this particular item is omitted. For example, if we raise meat in Canada and there is an import of beef from the United States, why should not a board or agency dealing with domestic beef also deal with imported beef? I would be glad to have an answer to that question. I am raising the question now, not arguing about it.

As I have said, the intent of the legislation is good. What I question is how it will be applied. I think that primarily there is concern among farmers that they will be forced out of farming in increasingly large numbers, and that the need for them is disappearing. I wonder if it is wise policy for the government to reduce the number of farming people in rural areas of Canada. It is true that some of them may not have economic farming units, but when they are forced into cities or urban communities they become a social problem and they increase the unemployment problem.

I ask: What is the cost, financially or socially, of the disruption when a rural family is forced to move into the city? I believe that a cost analysis would prove it to be more efficient to maintain the size and viability of rural communities, and that the thousands who find rural life attractive should be provided with incentives to permit them to remain on the land. I hope that legislation of the type that we are presently considering will stabilize the price of some agricultural products to such an extent that at least those farmers who have efficient and economic farming units will be enabled to continue farming.

I should like to speak for a moment about some of the changes I have seen taking place in the area which I represent. When I was home during the Christmas recess I visited two large-scale hog producing plants on individual farms. They are somewhat like those one sees on experimental farms. They are efficient units run by up to date, forward-looking farmers. We see quite a few of these, and I am sure there will be more. Farmers nowadays know more about their business. Many of them are highly skilled, efficient operators but they have to be guided by advice from the government.

Not too long ago we were advised to grow more wheat. This, of course, proved to be a mistake. Now we are advised not to grow any wheat. I feel that this, too, is a mistake. I think that if farmers were given some voice and the right to make a decision in the growing, marketing and pricing of their products, there would be less error. Government statisticians and theoreticians are a long way removed from the production area and they do not always understand the problems involved in production.

It is true that we will have surpluses in Canada. I feel that a reasonable surplus in one area is not a bad thing. I recall hearing Jimmy Gardiner at one time talk about having to keep enough butter in the pipeline because if you did not, someone would charge too much money for it. The thing that he did not get around to explaining satisfactorily was that the minute there was five pounds too much, the price went down and nobody made any money. This is something I cannot accept.

We should be prepared in Canada to produce at least some surplus in all fields. I think this would be a national asset, particularly in some areas which produce, for instance, grain of which we should have at all times a fairly large amount in reserve for our own benefit as well as for the benefit of those who depend on us for supplies. I do not think it is a bad thing to have a little extra butter or a little extra of some other produce.

I would not suggest that we go out consistently and overproduce in any line. I do not think we should plan for overproduction in this sense, but I do not think necessarily it is a bad thing when we do have an oversupply, except that the way in which we market our products can mean that prices will be too low. I cannot accept this as being necessarily a right way of doing things. It does not happen with automobiles. If automobile manufacturers overproduce, they do not cut prices very much. Maybe the automobile manufacturer will cut the price on one line, but not on all lines. In agriculture, the price of everything comes down.

I know there are other hon. members who wish to speak on this bill, Mr. Speaker. I look forward to dealing with it in committee. I have raised questions which I hope someone on the government side will answer.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words about this bill which is one I consider to be very important. As the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Thomson) so kindly pointed out, I represent an area of the country that has had a great deal of experience with organized marketing and I would say a great deal of successful experience because organized marketing in the Okanagan Valley has served as a guidepost for agricultural organizations throughout Canada. The fruit growing organizations there have accomplished a remarkable thing with their central selling and marketing agency. They have developed a very close link between the customer, wherever he may be in the world, and the producer, the man who grows the fruit in the Okanagan Valley. I think this close link is lacking in the control of our agricultural marketing programs in Canada.

A few months ago I had an opportunity to travel with the Agricultural Committee into some parts of the Prairies. One of the things that impressed me was the lack of understanding between the producers of grain on the Prairies and their customers throughout the world. The attitude there seemed to be, "We produce it; now here it is, Mr. Government, go out and sell it. We don't care what you do with it in the meantime; just get rid of it. Don't bother us." One of the great benefits of a central selling organization, provided it is run and controlled by the producers, is that a link develops between the producer and his customer whereby the producer begins to understand the customer's demands, he understands better what he should produce and how he should produce it and market it.

I heard some startling things this afternoon when the hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Danforth) was complaining about government intrusion, through a marketing bill of this kind, into the affairs of the farmer. There was talk of government interference. We have heard all these phrases previously, yet what happens when there is a problem in the agricultural industry? Who comes to this House first to say, "We must hand out some money. We must do something to help the farmer"? The hon. member for Kent-Essex is right in there. He wants government interference then. He does not want government interference, regulations or any sensible control by the farmers themselves to solve their farm management problems.

I am not afraid of controlled marketing because I have seen it work. Many years ago when the program began in the Okanagan Valley during the depression years, the farmers were suffering badly. They got together and they said, "A cent a pound or on the ground". That was the beginning of central selling or orderly marketing in that area. Over the years it has become a very successful program. It has built an agency that has developed packaging programs, shipping, sorting, controlled atmosphere storage, educational programs for growers and all the facets of an advanced marketing system that is run and controlled by the producers, the farmers themselves.

Mr. Danforth: That is it.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): I agree with you, and there is provision in this bill to allow and to encourage that to happen.

Mr. Danforth: You had better read the bill.

Mr. Olson: Somebody there has not read it.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, Dean MacPhee of the University of British Columbia produced a monumental report on the fruit industry in 1958. One of the things he said was, "Fruit growing may be a way of life, but it is also a way of making a living". I think that sometimes people in our farm communities forget this, when we hear about the God-given right of anyone, anywhere, any time, any place, to be a farmer and to produce in any way that he likes without regard to the effect that his production may have on other producers in Canada. I suggest that perhaps this is the only economic sector where we say it is possible for anybody at any time to go into the business and do whatever he likes in it. There are not very many opportunities of that kind today.

Here we are faced with an industry that is affected by the vagaries of nature, sometimes great and sometimes poor. It is sensible that the people engaged in it take measures to market their products in an orderly way so they can dispose of surpluses in an orderly fashion when they have surpluses, and so they can store for lean years and build up production if demand is greater than the supply. These are sensible things which sensible people do. I do not shy away from them, and I do not shy away from recommending this bill to the people of Canada.

I am surprised when I hear opposition members saying this is not the kind of thing we should be doing. I heard the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Moore) say what a shameful thing it is that growers, producers, might have to keep records, that there might be some kind of control on production and there might be some regulation of supply. I do not think that is a strange thing in this modern day and age: it is not at all surprising.

I wish to quote from the 1958 MacPhee report on the fruit industry of British Columbia. One of the recommendations in the report reads as follows:

> That the provincial government request an amendment by the Governor in Council to the federal Order in Council under the Agricultural Products Marketing Act of Canada to give the Fruit Board powers similar to those given it by the Lieutenant Governor in Council in the province of British Columbia, and in addition the powers to pool and equalize returns on tree fruits sold in interprovincial and export trade.

We are beginning to get around to that with this bill. I have some other words here, this time from one of the producer organizations in the Okanagan Valley, with regard to this bill. This is what they say:

> There are situations for certain commodities where co-operation between producer groups and different provinces is needed for the benefit of orderly marketing and can only be effective with national or regional agencies which must be provided for by federal legislation.

That is what the farmers of Canada are saying. I wonder if hon. members opposite who are opposing this bill listen to the farmers of Canada. I admit that this bill is not perfect. I share the concern of other hon. members as to how marketing agencies should be controlled, but if hon. members opposite would read the bill they would see there would be a board which did the controlling.

It is intended that with respect to an individual marketing sector, be it hogs, dairying or whatever, the producers themselves can form a marketing board under the guidance of the government body set up under this bill—a board set up by the producers themselves with their representatives on it to organize and control marketing for the industry. If that is done I think we will solve the problem of control.

This is an extremely important point, not just from the standpoint of farmers having the say in the affairs of their industry; it is important in itself. It provides that vital link, contact between the producer and the marketplace, something which is lacking today in the sale of wheat and feed grains on the Prairies. In that case there is not enough contact between the farmer and the customer, and for that reason I do not agree with some of our marketing methods. The provisions of this bill are such that a link will be established. This is why I support this bill with great enthusiasm, Mr. Speaker. We should proceed with it as quickly as possible and develop it fully in the next few years so that it becomes an important link in our agricultural marketing program in Canada.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, a few minutes ago when I stood up, before the previous speaker, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) whispered to me across the aisle, his surprise evident, "Are you going to speak on this bill?" I have not spoken on agricultural matters more than three or four times in the past ten years since I ceased to be Minister of Agriculture. However, this bill is so dangerous, Mr. Speaker, that I feel I have an obligation to point out the manifest dangers which I believe to be inherent in it—dangers to the agricultural industry and to Canadian society generally.

In my view, if this bill were passed and fully implemented we would have a completely state-controlled agricultural industry in this country, meaning the complete removal of freedom on the part of the farmer to decide how to manage his land in the best way, what to grow, and how to dispose of it. I do not think the farmers in this country want that.

I have been connected with agriculture all my life. My first memories are of a farm near Brampton, Ontario. My boyhood was spent on a ranch in Saskatchewan. I have owned farms or been connected with farming enterprises since that time. Of the tens of thousands of farmers I have known and spoken to, each wanted to make his own decisions, individually or collectively. He did not want some outside group of people telling him how to run his business. Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what this bill is designed to do.

Mr. Danforth: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harkness: I do not think the farmers of this country realize what is involved if this bill is passed and fully implemented. Of course, I do not believe it is possible to fully implement the bill but the attempt could be dangerous and could cause a great deal of difficulty. The bill leaves full control to the government. For his own purposes the member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Howard) spoke about producer-controlled marketing boards in British Columbia. I think he is speaking of the fruit boards, and possibly the Fraser Valley milk producers and things along this line. But, Mr. Speaker, these are producer-controlled boards which control the products of their own members. They have an annual meeting and the members can get rid of the board or the officers if they are not satisfied. A board of that kind is formed when 66⅔ per cent of the producers are agreeable and the producers themselves have complete control.

This bill proposes a completely different thing. It bears no relationship to these producer-controlled boards. Under this legislation, control will be in the hands of government or its appointed council or agencies. The people appointed to those positions will be responsible to the government and can be fired by the government; and they will be fired if they do not do what the government tells them to do. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, most of them will be Liberal heelers of one kind or another.

An hon. Member: That is the whole idea.

Mr. Harkness: They will be defeated Liberal candidates and people like that. These certainly will not be boards such as the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary mentioned, elected by the producers and responsible to the producers. They will not be responsible to anybody except the government, and will be completely under the thumb of the government.

Mr. Olson: The people elect the government.

Mr. Harkness: They do, but unfortunately once the government is elected it is in office for four or five years and a lot of damage can be done in that time by an irresponsible government such as this one. If the minister wishes to ask a question or make an intelligible interruption, I shall be delighted to deal with it, Mr. Speaker, but it is very difficult to deal with unintelligible interruptions.

An hon. Member: Or intelligent.

Mr. Harkness: Well, I did not say that, but people can draw their own conclusions. This bill is designed to put the producer in the position where these government appointed councils or agencies can tell him how much of any particular commodity he can produce, how it is to be marketed, and so forth. There is no doubt that this will make for an extremely dangerous rigidity in the whole agricultural industry. We will have the same type of system in effect in agriculture as there was in the feudal ages, when the economy was in a rigid frame and it was impossible to break out of it. If this bill is passed and implemented, we will have in agriculture a rigidity which will make it difficult for farmers to operate and which in the end will drive them out of business.

Mr. Gibson: Would the hon. member permit a question, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Harkness: Certainly, Mr. Speaker. I am always delighted to accept a question.

Mr. Gibson: I ask this question with humility, realizing that I am not an expert on the subject. Is not the real aim and substance of this bill the guaranteeing of various marketing factors in the country, particularly with reference to interprovincial matters, where there is a problem in one province in the west, say, and a different problem in another province? Is the idea not to get the various farm agencies in the different provinces together, and through co-operation to set up a network of agencies so they can come together on policy and serve their common interests?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I understand the hon. member's lack of appreciation of this bill just from the short speech he has made.

Had he made a longer speech, I suppose he would have demonstrated his lack of knowledge of agricultural matters to an even greater extent. Regarding the question he asked, I think the purpose of the bill is to have the government assume complete control of the agricultural industry in this country.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

• (9:10 p.m.)

Mr. Harkness: I can see nothing else for it but that.

Mr. Gibson: Will the hon. member permit another question?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, not now, if my hon. friend does not mind.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Dinsdale: This bill is nothing but state control.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member kindly resume his seat? The hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Harkness) has the floor.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member may think he will interrupt my train of thought by these questions, but that is not the case. I will be delighted to answer his questions as soon as I have finished my remarks. He can get up at that time.

Mr. Gibson: Thank you, sir.

Mr. Harkness: In addition to the rigidities which the implementation of this measure will impose on agriculture, and therefore on our economy as a whole to a considerable extent, this bill will put those people who produce a particular commodity that comes under the act in a monopoly position and make it extremely difficult for anybody else to get into that type of production. We have laws against monopolies, but apparently they will not operate so far as this bill is concerned.

I consider one of the worst features of this bill the fact that it will make it extremely difficult for any young man to get started in any type of agricultural production. In order to do so, he will have to obtain a permit and pay for it. And if the production of any commodity, be it hogs, eggs, cattle or anything else, is profitable it will cost a great deal for someone to buy a permit, quota or whatever is necessary in order to get into production. These rigidities, again, will be reflected in the entire industry.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Another inevitable effect of the bill will be that it will squeeze out the small farmer. We have already seen what has happened in this country so far as the Dairy Commission is concerned. According to figures I have seen, between 25,000 and 50,000 small dairy producers have been squeezed out of business as the result of the operations of the Dairy Commission. An effect of this bill will be that inevitably the type of board contemplated will exercise complete control over commodities to be produced, whether the commodity be carrots, honey or anything else, and again the small man will be squeezed out.

You will find that the production of various commodities will be concentrated in the hands of a relatively small number of people, and our whole agricultural industry as well as our rural areas will suffer very materially as a result. One of the effects of this situation will be to expedite the flight of people from the country to the cities, which in my view has been a very bad development in recent years. You will be left with an extraordinarily small rural population. So, just from the general social point of view, I look upon this as a bad and dangerous bill.

Now I should like to pose a question which really comes back to what my hon. friend was asking me. What is the purpose of the bill? Is its purpose to secure a greater return for the producers? I think nearly all farmers who support the bill are supporting it because they think they will get greater returns by doing so. Is this the purpose of the bill? If so, how is this purpose to be accomplished? Surely the chain of marketing which we have at present is going to remain the same. Commodities will move from the farm to the processor—who may be a meat packer, an egg crater or somebody like that—from the processor to the wholesaler, and from the wholesaler to the retailer who will distribute it just as at present to the general consuming public.

That marketing chain will continue; I think there is no question about that. Of course, there will not be any reduction in the cost of marketing at the levels of processing, wholesaling and retailing. That cost will not be any less and I think it will be a great deal more, because farmers and others will be filling out returns for the government and will have to waste lots of time taking inspectors around and showing them they are not bootlegging eggs, butter or something else. Therefore, the total cost involved in this general marketing chain will be greater.

In addition to that you will have the costs of a very large bureaucracy, which will be added to the marketing costs. There will be costs attributable to this council, to these agencies and probably to a horde of inspectors who will be going round to make sure the farmer is not selling a few dozen eggs to his friends. So you will see a very great increase in the cost of marketing because of the bureaucracy which is essential if you are to operate a system of this kind.

If you are to have an increase in marketing costs—unquestionably there will be an increase; I do not think anybody can argue otherwise—this increase will have to be borne by someone. If the purpose of the legislation is to give the producer more money, who will bear the increased cost? It will be the consumer. Perhaps that is the government's idea. Perhaps the idea is that the consumer will be charged considerably higher prices for all agricultural products. If this is the case, I think the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) has the duty and responsibility toward the consumers of this country to tell them that the cost of butter, eggs, beef, pork and so forth, once this bill passes, will go up and up by fairly considerable amounts.

That being the case, I suggest that the government, before putting this measure through, should wait for the reaction of the consumers. If the government wanted to be honest about this matter, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs should, as it is his duty to do, inform the consumers of the country that the purpose of the bill is to increase considerably the consumers' food costs. As I say, if the purpose of the bill is to secure a greater return for the farmer, the inevitable effect is that there will be an increased price for consumers, and that ought to be made clear to the consumers.

Mr. Olson: No, that is not correct.

Mr. Harkness: However, Mr. Speaker, if that is not the purpose of the bill, its only other purpose that I can see is to give to the government complete control over our most important basic industry and, in effect, to reduce the farmers of this country to a status very little different from that of feudal peasants of medieval Europe who were told what to do, what to grow and how they were to grow it, only to have their produce taken from them. That is the position the farmers of our country will be in. They will be told by the government and its bureaucrats exactly how to carry on their business, what to plant, how much to plant, and so on.

Mr. Gibson: Not under clause 8.

Mr. Harkness: That is so under any clause, so far as I can see.

Mr. Baldwin: President Pierre will tell the farmers what to do.

Mr. Harkness: Let us look at the clause which particularly appalls me, clause 37(1), which provides in part:

> Every person who violates any provision of this act or of a marketing plan that an agency is authorized to implement or who fails to comply with a requirement of the council pursuant to paragraph (e) of section 7—

In other words, any farmer who violates any provision of the act or any regulation made by the council, and so on, under the act is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years. Here we can charge a farmer with an indictable offence if he decides to grow, we will say, 40 acres of tobacco after the marketing board has told him he can grow only 20 acres. He will be liable to be imprisoned for two years, or he may be guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction in which case he will pay a fine or go to jail.

How ridiculous can we get in this country, if farmers are to be jailed for growing or selling wheat, cattle, eggs, tobacco, or whatever the product may be, without first having authorization from the duly authorized board to do so? Here you have a situation in which a poor little farmer who sells a few dozen crates of eggs to some of his friends will be liable to go to jail for two years for doing so. The thing is so ridiculous that in any past period, when I would consider more common sense attitudes prevailed, to bring in any provision along that line would have been laughed out of his House. In addition to that, I submit from the practical point of view this whole scheme is a sort of pipe dream. It cannot be put into operation on a Canada-wide basis unless all the provinces agree.

I find it almost impossible to believe that as far as marketing a certain number of commodities is concerned, in fact quite a large number of farm commodities, every province will agree, particularly if the farmers of a province have a relatively small share of the production at the time the bill is put into effect, and they would have the possibility of very greatly increasing their production. It would not be in the interest of the farmers or the province to agree. In any case, I think it is an unpractical pipe dream. I hope the government will have second thoughts and withdraw the bill. If the hon. member wishes to ask me a question, I will be delighted to answer it.

Mr. Gibson: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member castigated the government pretty solidly for being undemocratic in its approach to this problem. You seem to have overlooked the fact that clause 8 provides for a public hearing. The words of the clause are:

—broadening the authority of an existing agency to cover an additional farm product or farm products—

My question is, do you not consider that if you have an agency set up, the members of that agency can go to the people and ask them what their problems are and if they want an agency? Does he not consider that is a step in the right direction?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member replies I want to remind the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Gibson) that his question should be directed to the Chair. Also, I have some misgivings about discussing the individual clauses at this stage. Hon. members know at this point we ought to be discussing the content and the principle of the bill; we should not get involved in detailed consideration of the individual clauses of the bill. This having been said, I am sure the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Harkness) should be permitted to reply to the question.

Mr. Harkness: I quite agree with Your Honour that we should be discussing the general principles and features of the bill. This is what I have been attempting to do. In connection with the hon. member's specific question, I consider clause 8 nothing more than camouflage designed to fool the farmers of this country into thinking that they are going to have some control with regard to the marketing of their products. The clause says "A public meeting may be held"; that is all. It does not matter what goes on at the public meeting. The government or the bureaucracy they have appointed can go ahead and do what they want anyway. The fact that a public meeting has been held means absolutely nothing.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Gibson: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Gibson: The hon. member said a public meeting may be held. The bill stresses that a public meeting should be held.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is hardly a point of order. Again we are discussing the details of the clause.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I ask hon. members not to embark upon a detailed discussion of the individual clauses of the bill. Obviously, this is what the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth is now doing. I think we should limit our discussion to the question of the principle of this bill.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is attempting to do a little nit-picking which has no connection whatever with the general purpose of the bill. Furthermore, as I said before, I think it makes no difference whether a public meeting is held so long as the government still has the power to go ahead and do what it wants, no matter what the feeling of the public meeting.

[Translation]

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak at great length on this bill and I shall endeavour to be as brief as possible.

First of all, I should like to say that I support the principle of Bill C-197, and I am even ready to state further that during my election campaign, I promised to my constituents that I would support the principle of the establishment of a National Farm Products Marketing Council and national marketing agencies, especially in respect of potatoes which is an area that concerns me most, since I represent a riding where they produce a lot of potatoes.

[English]

I do not question the sincerity of hon. members who direct questions to the minister and others on this side of the House as to why the government introduced a bill of this nature. They ask what the need is for such a bill. In answer to that, Mr. Speaker, I could quote headlines from fairly recent newspaper articles. I quote from the March 1, 1969, Telegraph-Journal published in Saint John, New Brunswick, a three-column headline which reads, "Potato Growers Ask for Help. Prices are Plunging".

I wish to quote from an article in the Fredericton Daily Gleaner, the most Conservative of Tory papers in the Maritimes. The headline reads, "National Potato Board Urged by Federation." This is the New Brunswick Federation of Agriculture. I quote from the article regarding the potato situation:

> The New Brunswick Federation of Agriculture meeting in Fredericton voted for establishment of a National Potato Board, to operate in a similar manner as the Canadian Wheat Board.
> The National Potato Board would be responsible for marketing the Canadian potato crop, establishing price levels, and imposing marketing quotas on producers.

The New Brunswick Federation of Agriculture is a body composed of farmers, producers and potato growers. This board is not talking on behalf of the government or the government establishment; it is talking on its own behalf. The federation is requesting the government to set up a national marketing board and to introduce legislation to that effect. The article continues:

> In the discussion which took place, before the potato board resolution was adopted by the meeting, it was pointed out that the procedures currently being developed for the operation of a Canadian Egg Commission might be adapted for use in the national marketing of potatoes.
> New Brunswick growers, during the past two years,—

This refers to the 1966-67 and 1968-69 potato crop years.

> —have been selling potatoes at less than the cost of production, estimated at 80 cents for a 50-pound bag.
> It was also pointed out that in order for a National Potato Board to operate effectively, it would be necessary for growers in each potato producing province to organize provincial marketing plans. Growers in New Brunswick in the past have found it impossible to agree to any marketing plan for a long enough period of time to give the plan a chance to work.

That was in 1968. This year we have had another example of farmers, not refusing to cooperate with the provincial government but refusing to find a decent compromise to the solution of some of their most pressing problems in the field of marketing. I may make reference to this situation later on. The fact is that farmers recognize that something must be done, and done soon, to organize their industry, because they are left at the mercy of fluctuating markets and the law of supply and demand which does not always work out, in this age of technology, the way they would like.

• (9:30 p.m.)

In respect to the bill itself, I think it is imaginative and far-reaching. I am a little sorry that some hon. members opposite did not feel it proper to adopt a more positive attitude when commenting on the purposes of the bill. As a matter of fact, they seemed to prefer to point out some of its shortcomings. Mind you, Mr. Speaker, there are some shortcomings and I have recognized a few. If I am given the opportunity to sit on the Agricultural Committee, I intend to speak about them. But tonight we are discussing the principle of the bill, which I think is a good one. Some order in the over-all field must be brought to the marketing of agricultural products. Too often has the whole industry been open to speculation.

[Translation]

—and open as well to dishonest people, to profiteers who have no qualms about crossing provincial boundaries now and then in order to shamefully exploit these poor farmers.

Needless to say, the latter sometimes take us to task for blaming them for their ignorance. It is true that there may still be illiterate farmers, but they are not ignorant.

However, when we the representatives of the people, in many cases elected by a majority of these farmers, want to make constructive suggestions to them, they immediately believe that we want to make them look like a bunch of ignoramuses.

Personally, I blame the farmers not for their ignorance or their illiteracy but especially for their stubbornness and their refusal to want to consider a situation and co-operate more with governments. After all, they are the ones who elect the representatives, but once these have become members of the government in power, the farmers sit back and wait for the government to work miracles and get them out of their troubles.

Sad to say, it just happened again in New Brunswick. While the farmers resent our saying these things in public, they do not hesitate to sling mud at us when things are not going well. In fact, when the year has been a good one and potatoes sell well, the politicians get no credit for it, but when things go wrong, the farmers blame it on the members of Parliament, the government and the Public Service.

Mr. Speaker, I said my remarks would not be very long. So I shall now conclude by saying that this bill must be referred to the Committee on Agriculture as soon as possible so that we may study it in depth and point out its benefits. I think most of its components are very good, but I also recognize that there are some loopholes in it and that, in a few places, there is room for improvement. The proper body for that study would be the Committee on Agriculture. Even though I might add a few things tonight, I shall sit down, for I intend to come back on this later on.

[English]

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, at this stage, as you have rightfully pointed out to the members of the House, we are discussing merely the principle of Bill C-197. I want at the outset of my remarks to indicate that this is the point on which I mean to dwell this evening, and to state quite emphatically that I disagree fundamentally with the purposes of the bill that is sponsored by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson).

I think, unfortunately and tragically, that the bill is moving in the general direction of dealing with the many economic problems that confront Canada at the present time by depending on government action as the final solution and arbiter. Every time a problem, particularly an economic problem, presents itself in this country, automatically the government's response is to have more and more arbitrary power and control in the hands of the government, and perhaps what is even worse than this, more and more arbitrary control in delegating power to a growing public administration in Canada.

It is not necessary for me to enumerate some of the recent trends, but we had the notorious example of Rule 75C which was before the House less than one year ago, under which the government, in its desire to streamline parliamentary debate and to deal with what it regarded as a major difficulty in the Canadian body politic, the expeditious handling of public issues, gave unto itself by legislative decree—in this particular instance, by the use of closure—absolute control over the debating time in this House of Commons.

I oppose Bill C-197 because it follows precisely this trend that has become the pattern of the government's approach to all problems facing Canadians at the present time. I suggest this approach is moving in the opposite direction to that required for the solution of our extremely difficult agricultural problems.

My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture was in my constituency about two weeks ago and met a group of concerned citizens and farmers in the city of Brandon. I think he will agree with me that he did not get a very positive response to some of the solutions that he, as minister in the government responsible for dealing with agricultural problems today, is proposing as long-term solutions. I know that this particular bill was not directly under consideration that evening; the farmers were most concerned with the topical subject of LIFT, the "Lower Inventory For Tomorrow" program which they have nicknamed the "Lower Income For Tomorrow" program. The farmers oppose LIFT for precisely the same reasons as they will oppose this piece of government legislative initiative to set up a National Farm Products Marketing Council as it becomes understood and filters down to the grass roots of the farm economy.

The government has failed to deal with the fundamental problem in respect of agriculture. This is a marketing and sales problem rather than a supply management problem. I do not know why the Minister of Agriculture, who is a westerner and a farmer, has embraced this dogma. It has become such a well established pattern that I think we can refer to it only as a dogma or an automatic conditioned response whereby the solution to any problem on the agricultural front is to cut down on the supply. That is what the LIFT program is all about and it is what this measure is all about.

Instead of bringing forward this and other measures, the minister should take a more positive position and deal with the question of marketing the farm commodity. I am sure it is fair criticism to say that the government has decided that the number of farmers employed in the agricultural industry must be reduced by government action. The government says that the farm economy can no longer sustain the number of producers in the industry, and therefore is deliberately by its policy initiatives aggravating rather than solving the problem of the rural-urban drift which has been going on apace in the North American continent, if not in the world, during the past two or three decades.

By its policy the government is merely shifting the major problem from one sector of the economy to another, because the only possible alternative employment for farmers who have been displaced due to the decline of the agricultural industries is in the big, booming, buzzing urban communities which already have reached such a size that in many respects they have become quite unmanageable. I believe it is already quite clear that the problems of our urban communities are even more pressing than the economic problems of our rural communities. This government has not even started to think in terms of solving the problems in respect of the rapid urban growth. Indeed, the housing situation is in a state of confusion. We are told there are 18,000 people in the city of Toronto alone waiting for adequate public housing. We know that urban renewal has not entered into the government's program or planning at all. A Minister without Portfolio has been appointed to deal with this particular situation. As yet, however, no solutions have been forthcoming.

We know the situation concerning one leading minister of this government, the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer), who with great, crusading zeal set out to solve one arm of our economic problem. He gave up in disgust because he could not get any action from the administration. I would think that rather than bring in this type of negative approach to the rural side of Canada's economic difficulty, the government would be much better advised to use the time at its disposal to deal with solutions concerning the other side of the coin, the urban situation which is in such a critical state that it will become much worse before there is any improvement.

In returning specifically to the principle of this bill, may I say that it is just a few years since we were concerned with the problem of the world food supply. Agriculture is the basic arm in the matter of food supply. We sent representatives abroad to participate in FAO conferences. This organization was the leader in respect of positive programs to establish food banks to feed the hungry of the world. We emphasized that the Canadian agricultural economy had all the production potential necessary to meet the growing demand for food in the world, so long as we could on a basis of international co-operation work out suitable marketing policies.

There was progress in this regard until this administration took over. I do not know why it has suddenly departed from this international outreach in assisting the world which is obviously short of food. We know that three-quarters of the people of the world are undernourished. Surely the real demand for food is not being met by any nation. One might ask why at this critical juncture in international affairs the government of Canada should retreat behind a negative supply management system with relation to agricultural production. This is beyond my understanding and it is beyond the understanding of the farmers.

This is one theme the farmers repeat over and over when they discuss the critical problems they face. Why does the Minister of Agriculture, a westerner, not use his influence in emphasizing marketing and international co-operation, rather than restricting production which will inevitably lead to a further integration of our agricultural industry? I know the administration is committed to a continental policy. In its international relations, politically and militarily, it is withdrawing behind the continental frontier. It could be, of course, that the same philosophy in respect of agriculture is motivating its action in this regard.

Surely all members of the cabinet, particularly the Minister of Agriculture, do not subscribe to this sort of nineteenth century, narrow nationalism. Surely the minister could use his influence to persuade his colleagues who are continental isolationists to move out into the mainstream of twentieth century life and become tuned into the needs of the word as they exist. If the minister does not agree with the approach of the government, he has an alternative, as had the former minister responsible for housing. He could resign and express his protest over the present trends in government policy.

Those who defend Bill C-197 say that it is a response to the wishes of the farmers for a more orderly production and marketing system. I have been reading the comments that have already emanated from farm organizations such as the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and the National Farmers Union, and I find they do not express the sort of sympathy and general support for the legislation that the minister in his opening statement earlier in the month indicated was present.

The minister, speaking in Alberta on March 24 of this year, obviously ran into the same negative response with which he was confronted when in Brandon a week ago last Tuesday because of the failure of the government and the minister to consult the farm organizations. At that meeting, according to press reports, he promised that there would be consultation in detail. He also stated, as he as stated in the House, that the legislation is merely enabling legislation, it merely sets up the machinery and once the machinery is set in place it will be up to the farmers themselves to determine whether they want to make use of the machinery provided by government policy and government planning.

As I read the bill—whether this is deliberate, I do not know—it seems to me it is certainly a misrepresentation of the powers that are set down in the bill to control rigidly and coercively the whole agricultural industry at the production level, because it seems to me that the cabinet has complete monopoly power. The minister and those who defend the bill talk about public hearings where the vox populae will be able to express itself. But this is optional, it is not mandatory; and judging from our experience in other areas of government action and policy it will be the exception rather than the rule for the government to consult, in the intimate terms that it professes in the statements of the minister, with the agricultural producers.

There is nothing in the legislation, as I see it, which indicates that after the consultations, the recommendations which will be forthcoming will be followed by the government. I know that the government's attitude has been to completely ignore public opinion because it follows the philosophy—this goes back to the pursuit of power that has been characteristic in most areas of government action under the Trudeau administration—of going completely against the wishes of the public with respect to public action and policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dinsdale: The minister also makes the point that in this legislation he is attempting to follow the precedent of provincial marketing boards that are already established. As I read some of the background papers that were presented to the Agricultural Congress, which will result in a task force report which has been pending for several years, the warnings with respect to marketing boards were diametrically opposed to the sort of solution proposed in this bill. For example, one of the papers said that to provide the marketing boards with powers on the scale proposed in the legislation would be to provide the "ultimate weapon" in supply management control.

This is not the positive program of agricultural adjustment to be implemented without authoritarian police and procedures such as was requested, for example, by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture in its representations to the cabinet as recently as April 9. To compare it with the sort of producer-controlled marketing board at the provincial level is, of course, a deliberate misrepresentation of the situation. Rather than being patterned on that precedent, the federal plan erodes the constitutional rights of the province in agricultural marketing. For example, they will be able to levy special charges or make special levies, which is a sort of arbitrary, delegated, indirect system of taxation.

My time has almost expired. Rather than go into another aspect of my argument, may I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

TRADE—GRAIN—SUGGESTED PERMANENT FOREIGN SALES MISSIONS

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Perhaps the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) has had enough punishment for today, but since he is in such a genial mood I hope he will take my comments into consideration.

On March 13 I asked the minister whether, in view of the statement of the secretary general of the Canada Grains Council, we should have permanent foreign marketing missions to promote grain sales, if Canada is to retain markets and gain new markets, and if the minister could tell the House whether the government was considering the establishment of such foreign marketing missions.

The minister suggested at that time that the Canada Grain Council was really set up to consider this type of selling mission. In a supplementary question I asked if the minister could indicate whether the government was considering setting up such missions throughout the world. Again he suggested that he had received no direct communication from the secretary general of the Grain Council and that all he knew was what he had read in the newspapers.

The reason I raised this question was that many people throughout this country are condemning the Canadian Wheat Board. They are suggesting there should be selling agencies other than the Canadian Wheat Board. I then placed on the Order Paper a question which related very clearly to the question I asked on Orders of the Day, asking how many brokerage firms are now handling Canadian grain sales.

To my amazement I found that 43 eastern and western exporting firms are acting as agents of the Canadian Wheat Board and handling Canadian grain sales abroad. I suggest that if these exporting firms are acting as Canadian agents, and at the same time as agents for other countries, Canadian producers can expect no consideration in so far as the handling of Canadian grain is concerned.

There are some supposedly responsible people—we have them in Saskatchewan—who deliberately attack the Canadian Wheat Board for not doing a proper job. Does the minister not think that if we set up permanent Canadian missions abroad to sell our agricultural products, under the control of the Canadian Wheat Board, giving that board the tools to do the job, instead of letting these 43 eastern and western exporting and shipping firms handle our produce, we would have better selling machinery?

We know that certain private entrepreneurs would love to see the Canadian Wheat Board broken. We know that certain stockbrokers would like to see the Canadian Wheat Board broken. At the same time we know that the Canadian people, particularly those engaged in the agricultural industry, would like to see selling missions permanently established throughout the world to sell our produce. Such selling missions would look after the sale of Canadian produce alone; they would not attempt to handle everybody's produce at the same time.

I am given to understand that some of these 43 exporting firms also have interests in shipping firms. No one has to draw a map to realize that if they have interests in shipping firms, and at the same time are trying to sell agricultural produce, they will try to sell that produce from the country in which their ships are located at any given time. It is important that we look into this situation now. If we are to have credible grain selling Canadian missions, we must establish them under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board. This is something Canada must decide today, not tomorrow. We cannot wait for the Canada Grains Council or any other board to carry out a further examination.

I am pleased to note that the Alberta Wheat Pool has come up with an excellent suggestion, one which I wish to read into the record. In a statement dated April 16, 1970, it says:

> While existing agencies have achieved commendable results in selling its products, Canadian agriculture is ready for a yet more aggressive marketing attitude on the part of all those responsible for handling and selling its products. Techniques now being used by competing nations, and marketing procedures not now in effect must be explored and developed if Canada is to maintain any success in the world's agricultural marketplace.

Through you, Mr. Speaker, I say to the minister that unless Canada establishes permanent selling missions throughout the world, our agricultural economy is due for a complete bust. We simply cannot have 43 exporting and shipping firms trying to handle our produce. Unless the government realizes this, it will stand accused forever and a day. Our producers know what is going on. They do not really expect these 43 exporting firms to handle their produce properly. I plead with the minister to give serious consideration to the suggestion that we establish these permanent marketing agencies throughout the world, otherwise our agricultural economy will suffer complete collapse in the very near future.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member asked this question a few days ago, part of the question, as I then understood it, was with respect to the response we had given to the Canadian Grains Council in respect of its declared purpose in promoting sales of Canadian grain in the international market. It seems to me there are a lot of contradictions in the hon. member's assertions respecting the best interests of the producer in selling the largest volume of grain on the international market. It certainly does not seem to me that we would enchance our position by withdrawing our offer to sell to all the international agencies because that, in my opinion, is certainly not in conflict with the sales promotions that the Canadian Wheat Board has carried on so effectively over the years. Certainly we are the first to admit that they have the same difficulties as every other country when we run into a situation such as the present one where supplies are excessive in relation to the immediate market demand.

I believe there are some encouraging signs, however, and I would not agree with the hon. member that it would enhance our situation, or the position of the Canadian Wheat Board, to stop selling through all the international agencies who would be willing to take large or small quantities from time to time. It seems to me that they can be complementary. Some action is being taken by XCAN, a collaboration among the various wheat pools and producer organizations in western Canada, in their attempt to establish an export marketing agency. As I have said many times, I welcome this. But I know, and so do they, that they will have to meet the competitive position in the world market, which includes arrangements for shipping so that they are competitive on that basis as well. This is a very important part of delivering grain, arranging for shipping from the export point to the delivery point at the lowest possible cost. My friend knows how important it is to arrange for shipping in advance in order to obtain the service at competitive cost.

I do not have time to go into detail, Mr. Speaker, but I reject the hon. members accusations that we are trying to break the Canadian Wheat Board. In my view, the function of the Canadian Wheat Board and other agencies is to continually and constantly promote sales in the markets we have.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the Minister, but his time has expired.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—CONSIDERATION OF PAYMENT FOR OVERTIME

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on behalf of 12,000 Canadians, 9,800 who are regular members and the remainder public service and other supporting staff for the finest police force in the world, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. We have often seen municipal police forces in different parts of Canada engaged in activities such as policing ball games and that sort of thing. It may be of interest to know that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police do municipal police work in 145 municipalities across Canada. For this work they receive no overtime pay. It is overtime pay that brings the illustrious Solicitor General (Mr. McIlraith) and myself into confrontation this evening. The commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, W. L. Higgitt, put it this way at page 7 of No. 16 of the Minutes of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs:

We are one of the last police organizations in Canada—I hope it can remain that way, but I do not see how it can for much longer—certainly of any major size, at least, that does not have overtime compensation. We simply do not have compensation for overtime and last year we put in an equivalent of 2,068 man years of overtime or something over 3.75 million hours of overtime for which there is no compensation at all.

At page 10 he said:

I think we are the only police organization in Canada where management is still speaking for the men. I think we always have been successful in getting a pretty good deal for our members, and so long as that exists I do not foresee that this system needs change.

Prior to this pay increase—

He was speaking of the last pay increase of the RCMP.

—from a pay point of view we were about 17th in the scale of police pay in Canada. I am basing that on the pay of a first-class constable. This pay increase brought us up to where we are tied at this moment for second place, which is not a very unhealthy place to be. However, it is a little unrealistic for me to say this because you will recall that I just said we put in last year something in excess of 2,000 man-years of overtime, for which there is no pay at all. When I say that we are tied for second place, that is only in basic pay—

You see what I mean, Mr. Speaker.

• (10:10 p.m.)

—because every other police force in Canada gets fairly handsome overtime allowances and payments which we do not enjoy at all. So while I say we are tied, that is only in a basic pay way. If it was really take-home pay and we actually could examine the take-home pay of the various constables, we probably would find that we had dropped down considerably from the second position.

When I asked the witness at page 16:13 a question about the overtime problem, he answered in part:

—we are still nowhere near the top pay across the land if we take overtime pay of other forces into account. We are not, at this moment, pushing an overtime case. If I could answer it that way.

Finally, at page 16:14 of the Minutes of Evidence there is a reference to a 4 per cent attrition rate in the force. I wondered whether that related to lack of overtime pay or not. I then asked this question:

I am just wondering, Mr. Chairman, how the commissioner proposes to solve this overtime problem. If he is not asking for 20 per cent more men and he is not vigorously pursuing a question of overtime payments, where is the solution?

I should say here, parenthetically, that I estimated that the men worked more than 16 per cent of their time as overtime, and Commissioner Higgitt calculated that the overtime work amounted to something like 20 per cent of their time. So that is one answer to the question I have put on record. Answering the question I asked of him on page 16:14, Commissioner Higgitt said:

There are two answers to that. One is that I am sure that we are not going to have to pursue this overtime matter before too long as a separate item. However, I should like to be able to think that we can take cognizance of this in our general pay packages each time. If our men can see that we in management are doing a pretty good job for them in general pay negotiations I think they will be reasonably content to carry on.

I think, sir, it is fair to say from the evidence that was given by Commissioner Higgitt, a truly excellent witness before the committee, that there was a sort of split in this respect. He would like to have seen things go on as they had been going on, but on the other hand he could not see that they could go on this way. That perhaps sounds like Alice in Wonderland talk, and I think that is exactly the position our witness found himself in. So the other day in the House of Commons I dared to raise this matter with the Solicitor General.

I cannot say I was dissatisfied with his answer, because I know that when someone schooled at the feet of the late Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King gives you any kind of answer, you must be prepared to accept it. None the less, I thought I would press our dear friend, the Solicitor General, to come here this evening and answer the question further. I will boil it down to this, Mr. Speaker, and this is my question to the Solicitor General: Would the government welcome the recommendation from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs that the matter of overtime pay for members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police be considered by the government?

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Answer in the affirmative.

An hon. Member: Agreed.

Mr. Bell: Now get out of that one.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, there are two rather interesting questions raised by the hon. member tonight. One is the procedural question emphasized by the new question he raised at the conclusion of his remarks, and the other is the substantive question of overtime pay for members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

The first question is a purely procedural one and is rather interesting. He apparently is asserting the proposition that this motion to adjourn, and the right to debate it, can be used for a discussion of current matters while proceedings on those matters are before the standing committees of the House of Commons. This matter is before a standing committee of the House of Commons, the Standing Commitee on Justice and Legal Affairs which is examining the estimates of the department. In that examination a question has been raised and an answer given.

When the hon. member raised the question the other day, despite his remarks about my reply I would point out to him that, as I said, when the committee completes its work and reports back to the House, the government will consider all the matters that have come before it. That is the exact position. But I would point out to hon. members that they are making a new departure tonight in permitting this matter to be debated at this time, because now items in respect of all matters currently before standing committees of the House may be debated here concurrently.

As to the substantive question, which is a matter of real importance, the situation is that the RCMP, in addition to their specialized duties with regard to federal statutes, police eight of the ten provinces, and the two territories. A large part of the work is done in a vast area with a small population. This means that many detachments are small with regard to the number of personnel. In some places there are only two men. I invite hon. members to consider the question of overtime in parts of the Northwest Territories. There is every indication that the men do not want this problem handled, as the hon. member pointed out, by way of overtime pay. The point is, how to deal with the extra requirements put on them. It is unrealistic to blandly assume in relation to a force covering so much of the area—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the minister, but his time has expired.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, April 28, 1970

The House met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

HOUSE OF COMMONS

HOURS OF SITTING, THURSDAY, APRIL 30, 1970

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will have noticed the motion in my name on page 7 of today's Order Paper. There have been certain discussions among representatives of the parties along the line that it would assist in planning Thursday's business if that motion could be dealt with by the House now. Could there be agreement to bring the motion forward at this time and, if the House is agreeable, make it an order of the House?

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, that is one of the few motions in the name of the hon. gentleman that we can say we agree with.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Believe it or not, Mr. Speaker, we are unanimous.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale) moved:

That on Thursday, April 30, 1970, immediately after the disposition of the Oral Question Period, the House shall stand adjourned until 11.00 o'clock a.m., Friday, May 1, 1970.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

POST OFFICE

POSSIBLE NATIONAL STRIKE BY LETTER CARRIERS AND INSIDE WORKERS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Acting Postmaster General. Am I correct in assuming that is the President of the Treasury Board?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes.

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the apparent or at least reported failure of the Post Office to come to terms with both the letter carriers and the inside workers on a new contract to replace the one that expired on September 30, can the minister state briefly to the House what positive steps he is now taking to avoid a national postal strike which is reported to be imminent? I ask this question at this time in view of the great concern that has surrounded and continues to surround the operations of the Post Office.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I share the concern of the Leader of the Opposition in the difficult negotiations we are having with the Council of Postal Unions. I think he is probably aware that these negotiations have passed from the direct bargaining stage to the appointment and the functioning of a conciliation board to endeavour to find a solution to the dispute. The conciliation board is now at work and is expected to report shortly. Until such time as it does render its report, I think it would be inadvisable for me to make any comments.

Mr. Stanfield: It is also reported that the minister responsible for the Post Office has refused to renew the working conditions that were incorporated in the last agreement. Is it correct that the Postmaster General or his officials are denying the postal workers assurances with regard to the working conditions that were incorporated in the last agreement?

Mr. Drury: As I indicated, representations by both sides to the dispute are being made to the conciliation board, and I do not think it would be helpful to analyse publicly the respective positions being taken before the board.

Mr. Stanfield: I have one further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I think the time has gone by, if I may suggest, when the country can merely be given bland assurances about what may happen to the postal service, and I wish to ask whether the minister can assure the House that this matter will not be treated with the same sort of approach that resulted in a serious strike in 1968 and a postal tie-up in Montreal which still denies Montrealers and other Canadians adequate postal services despite the intervention of a good many ministers of the Crown?

Mr. Drury: Perhaps I should only say that even if hon. gentlemen opposite do not have faith in our conciliation machinery, I do.

[Later:]

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): I should like to ask the President of the Treasury Board whether he could, without divulging any of the details of the government's position in the current negotiations, tell the House if there is any hope that the government's attitude in regard to the working conditions of postal employees will be somewhat easier than it was a year ago when the minister's insistence on the unilateral imposition of rule changes led to a strike?

Mr. Drury: I think the Postmaster General himself has indicated on a number of occasions that he is interested in improving substantially the working conditions of Post Office employees. Indeed, during the course of this year he has directed considerable efforts to this end and in these efforts he is supported by the government.

MONTREAL POSTAL DISPUTE—FURTHER DISCUSSIONS WITH UNION

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board, Mr. Speaker. Has the President of the Treasury Board had any recent discussions with representatives of the CNTU with reference to the continuing Montreal troubles, and is he able to point to any amelioration of this serious situation?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I had a meeting a short time ago with the president of the CNTU at which he indicated the intention of the members of the union in question to persist in their stand and asked me whether there was a likelihood of any modification of the position of the government in adopting and implementing the report of Dr. Goldberg. I told him that unless he had some better suggestions than had occurred to me, I did not see any prospect of the government changing its course.

Mr. Baldwin: What else is new?

Mr. Macquarrie: May I ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether, as this is the third week that the Postmaster General has not been on roster duty, the minister has left the country or, even worse, left the cabinet and, if so, who is his replacement?

[Later:]

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister regarding the Post Office. Would he confirm that Mr. Carl Goldenberg is at present warming up on the sidelines and is expected to take the field in a government uniform at any time?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that he cannot ask the Prime Minister to confirm or deny a rumour.

GRAIN

WHEAT—SUGGESTED WITHDRAWAL OR ALTERATION OF ACREAGE REDUCTION PROGRAM

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): In view of the fact that the Minister without Portfolio responsible for the Wheat Board is absent, I should like to direct this question to the Minister of Agriculture. In light of the likely fate of operation LIFT, will the minister give an undertaking to the House that he will immediately initiate negotiations with the representatives of bona fide farmers' groups for the purpose of substantially altering or totally abandoning the program?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree with the premise upon which that question is based and therefore I cannot reply.

Mr. Rowland: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister then give an undertaking to the House that he will rapidly develop a program of assistance for areas like Manitoba's Interlake region for which operation LIFT has absolutely no application?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, there already are a number of federal programs particularly applicable to that region. However, they are not administered by this department. So far as operation LIFT is concerned and the complexities of dealing with such a program, again I cannot agree that there are no provisions that will enhance the situation for grain producers in that area if operation LIFT is, in fact, successful.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): A supplementary question Mr. Speaker. Would the minister not at least take this under advisement with his department, having in mind that the usual gestation period for ideas to help western Canada with this government is at least two years?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, there are a number of considerations to be taken into account. One is in response to the request of farmers from western Canada, and indeed occasionally from members across the way, that we should finalize the regulations and administrative details with respect to operation LIFT so that farmers can make plans dependent upon those regulations.

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, no farmers in the opposition have requested the continuation of this program.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker, regarding the Post Office.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville has a supplementary to this question.

WHEAT—ACREAGE REDUCTION PROGRAM—REINSTATEMENT OF UNIT QUOTA SYSTEM

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): In view of the difficulties facing many small farmers in regard to operation LIFT, will the government give consideration to reinstating the unit quota system?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not responsible for that particular aspect but the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatoon-Humboldt has given many explanations of the reasons for removing the quota system and I believe the reasons are still valid.

INDUSTRY

TEXTILES AND SYNTHETIC FIBRES—PROTECTION AGAINST UNFAIR COMPETITION

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. When will the minister be making a statement which will result in action to protect the textile and synthetic fibre industries of Canada from unfair dumping and unreasonable competition from Oriental countries?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, last week I said "soon"; today I will say "in the near future".

[Later:]

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Since the Premier of Saskatchewan has entered the Quebec election campaign by his recent announcement that Quebec entrepreneurs have been making inquiries in Saskatchewan, can the minister state whether his department has been inundated by requests from Quebec-based firms to locate in Saskatchewan?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is not in order.

[Translation]

FINANCE

FEDERAL TAXES AND PAYMENTS TO QUEBEC —PUBLICATION OF FIGURES

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

On television last night, we heard a serious charge made by the leader of the National Union to the effect that a certain propaganda sheet distributed in Quebec has apparently been paid for directly from federal public funds. Would the Prime Minister confirm or deny this news?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity of commenting on a similar charge made by the leader of the National Union and I replied that the publication "What's New" had no connection whatsoever with the federal government and that it had been issued by the Quebec branch of the Liberal Federation of Canada.

[English]

TARIFF ADJUSTMENTS TO OFFSET FOREIGN COMPETITION WITH CERTAIN INDUSTRIES

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Will the government give serious reconsideration to its tariff policies applying to the importation of footwear, textiles and electrical goods, particularly those which come from Japan, Taiwan, Hong Kong and other low wage countries whose wages make it impossible for Canadian industries to compete and are thus causing very serious lay-offs by these industries?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Well, Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend would spend more time in the House he would find that we have stated that these matters are under review. In addition, just about two and a half minutes ago the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce indicated that he would be making a statement very soon on this matter.

Mr. Hees: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I will bet any amount of money that I have spent twice as much time in the House this session as the minister has.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Baldwin: You should issue a white paper on that one, Ben.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for the purpose of asking a supplementary question.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order. All bets are off.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is: As it is the Department of Finance that controls tariff policies, and as the minister has said that he is not interested in these matters, would he mind telling the House where he buys his blinkers with which he keeps out any views that are not acceptable?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would not think that question is acceptable from a procedural standpoint.

Mr. Hees: Sit down, Ben! Take it easy! You are getting high blood pressure. Relax!

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[Later:]

Mr. Barney Danson (York North): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Could the minister tell us if the blinkers referred to earlier are worn on the end of the horse personified by the member for Prince Edward-Hastings?

Mr. Hees: Oh, go back to grade 3!

REASON FOR QUEBEC UNEMPLOYMENT RATE

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of statements made by the Premier of Quebec concerning the employment situation in Quebec, is the Prime Minister still insisting that the unemployment rate in Quebec is the result of provincial policy rather than his own anti-inflation policy?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Dauphin.

POLLUTION

EFFECT OF MERCURIAL DUST USED IN TREATING SEED GRAIN

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister say what, if any, has been the role of mercurial dust used in the treating of seed grain in western Canada in contributing to the mercury content of western rivers and lakes?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that this type of information ought normally to be given by way of a general statement. I am not sure whether the minister can find some way to reply to the question briefly. Perhaps he might be given an opportunity to attempt that.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, very briefly, the experts who are examining the situation have not been able to determine this, yet. It seems to me that more time is required so that we can obtain a consensus on whether or not this is a major contributing factor.

TAXATION

WHITE PAPER ON REFORM—POSITION OF PROPOSALS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether the proposals contained in the white paper on tax reform still stand as the proposals of the government for the consideration of the country?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would simply like to say yes. In further answer to the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings—

Mr. Hees: Wind it up, Ben. You have not got the picture.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Benson: —I apologize for suggesting that he was not in the House. He may have been in the House but just could not understand what was going on.

Mr. Hees: Wind it up, Ben.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question following the minister's red herring?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: I should like to ask the minister why, following the several months of debate and discussion in the country of the white paper proposals, the government has not seen fit to change even one of those proposals?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, the position is that the white paper is before the House of Commons Committee and the Senate Committee. I believe in the committees of the House of Commons and the Senate, and I wish my hon. friend would, too.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): The minister can say that because there is a Liberal majority on the committees.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the Leader of the Opposition in a moment. Will the hon. member kindly resume his seat? It seems to me that we are now entering into a debate and I respectfully suggest there is not much point in pursuing this line of questioning.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Let us hear what the minister has to say.

Mr. Speaker: I understand the Leader of the Opposition has a supplementary. I will recognize him.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I understand that the minister has great respect for Parliament and the committee system when it suits his convenience but really, since many thousands of people in the country are giving serious study to these proposals, would it not be proper for the minister to indicate to the country at large what changes, if any, the minister has decided upon following the discussions that have already taken place?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the Minister of Finance and to the Leader of the Opposition that if this kind of statement is to be made it should not be during the question period. It should be made by way of a statement on motions. I do not think the minister would be in order if he attempted to make that kind of statement.

POLLUTION

MERCURY CONTENT IN LAKE WINNIPEG AND SASKATCHEWAN RIVER FISH

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. In view of the orders which have been made curtailing commercial fishing in Lake Winnipeg and parts of the Saskatchewan River and in view of the fact that sports fishing is going to be permitted in this area, is the minister willing to make a full statement in the House with regard to the findings of his officials as to the mercury content in these fish with relation to human consumption?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We will soon be able to give an analysis of the situation. I met yesterday in Manitoba with the Hon. Sidney Green to discuss this subject. We expect to reach an understanding shortly.

LAKE WINNIPEG—COMPENSATION TO FISHERMEN—SOURCE OF CONTAMINATION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): In line with the answers the Minister of Fisheries gave last week, has he reached an agreement, about which he can now give some details, with regard to compensation to the fishermen of Lake Winnipeg and the other areas of Manitoba which have been affected by Mercury pollution?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): We have an understanding with the government of Manitoba and jointly we will be negotiating with the fishermen to arrive at a formula, which I will wish to put to my colleagues concerning financial compensation on the Prairie.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a supplementary question. When the minister makes his statement on this matter, will he also report to the House the results of any discussions that have gone on with the authorities in the United States concerning the source of the mercury pollution of the Red River and Lake Winnipeg?

Mr. Davis: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—NEGOTIATIONS WITH INDUSTRY RESPONSIBLE FOR MERCURY CONTAMINATION

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Will the minister also be prepared to report to the House on negotiations with the industry the minister has said is responsible for the mercury pollution in the Saskatchewan River?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): We are meeting with the industries which are responsible for the pollution with a view not only to making sure that they recycle all their effluent within their own premises but also clean up the rivers downstream and from plants themselves.

INDUSTRY

U.S.-CANADA AUTOMOBILE PACT—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON POSITION OF NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Will the minister be able to make a statement to the House before the end of this week on the state of negotiations between the governments of Canada and the United States on the Canada-United States auto pact?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I do not think so, Mr. Speaker, but I will speak to the hon. member on the subject.

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary question. Can the minister inform the House whether the cabinet has made a decision on the extension of the period for which auto workers may obtain TAB benefits?

Mr. Pepin: No decision has been made on that subject.

REDUCTION OF PRICES OF AUTOMOBILES MADE IN CANADA

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): In view of the great amount of unemployment in the car industry and the low sales of cars, has the minister or any member of his department recently contacted the car manufacturers suggesting that the prices of cars made in Canada be brought in line with the prices of the same cars sold in the United States?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, "unemployment" might have been replaced by "layoffs" in the question. No, Mr. Speaker, we have not done that. In consultation with the presidents of these companies it has been rather well established, however, that the gap has been declining progressively in recent years and that it might not be wise to expect that the gap will be eliminated totally in the future in view of the different circumstances in the two countries. I do not have the time to go into the differences.

OIL

APPLICATION FOR BUILDING OF PIPELINE FROM PRUDHOE BAY TO EDMONTON

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): I have a question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Has the federal government received an application from a consortium of oil companies to construct a pipeline for the carriage of Prudhoe Bay oil through the Mackenzie Basin to Edmonton?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, but I will check with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

An hon. Member: He is here now.

Mr. Aiken: Perhaps I might address the question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It had been my intention to direct it to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development but I would appreciate a reply from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources if he heard the question.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I believe the hon. member asked whether there had been an application in connection with the building of a line. Such an application would go to the National Energy Board, and to the best of my knowledge none has yet been filed.

[Later:]

Mr. Aiken: In his reply to the question I asked a few moments ago the minister said an application had not yet been made with regard to the oil pipeline I mentioned. Is the minister aware of any negotiations which may be under way in connection with the construction of such a pipeline?

Mr. Greene: I do not know about negotiations, but research is being done by the Mackenzie river pipeline group with respect to oil pipelines and by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines and other pipeline companies with respect to gas pipelines. I do not believe any of these research groups has yet reached the stage of finalizing their arrangements and making an application to the National Energy Board.

IMMIGRATION

ENTRY INTO CANADA OF STOKELY CARMICHAEL

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, Mr. Speaker. In view of the long record of Mr. Stokely Carmichael as a promoter of violence and race hatred, was a special permit issued to enable Mr. Stokely Carmichael to enter Canada in the last few days?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I would have to check. I have no information that he has come to Canada but it may be possible that he has been admitted under existing policy.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): When the minister is investigating the matter would he also inquire whether the purpose of Mr. Carmichael's visit is to take part in the Quebec election?

ENERGY

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CANADA'S POLICY VIS-À-VIS UNITED STATES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): My question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It arises out of a comment he made recently in the city of Washington, D.C., indicating that Canada-United States discussions would begin fairly soon at an official level in the hope that there might be discussions at cabinet level in June. I want to ask the minister whether, prior to those discussions, he would be prepared to make a statement on motions setting out Canada's energy policy vis-à-vis the United States?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I believe Canada's energy policy is very clear. It has not been altered for some years. If the hon. gentleman wants references which would clearly indicate to him the statutory authority for Canada's energy policy I would be very glad to get them for him.

Mr. Baldwin: Send him your speeches.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Since the minister said in Washington that the sale of water is not negotiable, I am sure the House would be interested to know what items are negotiable. Does the minister not consider that the making of a statement would clarify the position of the Canadian government and allay many fears which have arisen in the minds of the Canadian people?

Mr. Speaker: With respect, I suggest to the hon. member and to the minister that a statement of the kind proposed ought to be made on motions. I wonder whether that is the suggestion now being put forward by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands?

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): That is exactly what I was asking. I was asking the minister whether he would be prepared to make such a statement on motions before these negotiations begin.

Mr. Greene: I do not think a statement on motions could fully cover the wide ambit of Canada's energy policy as affected by numerous statutes which include the National Energy Board Act, the legislation covering the sale of natural gas, and a wide variety of other statutory and historical authorities, which in total sum up Canada's national energy policy. But I will be glad to consider the hon. member's suggestion. Maybe a speech of mine would enlighten him in this regard.

Mr. Hees: Anything but that.

BILL OF RIGHTS

ALLEGED VIOLATION IN REMOVAL OF CHAIRMAN OF ONTARIO LEGISLATURE COMMITTEE

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): In the absence of the Minister of Justice my question is directed to the President of the Privy Council. Having in mind the action taken by the provincial government of Ontario to unseat Dr. Richard Potter from the health committee because of his criticisms of the government's policy, would the President of the Privy Council consider whether some action could be taken on the ground that his removal constitutes a violation of the terms of the Canadian Bill of Rights?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): That merits serious study, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Baldwin: Was that question directed to the President of the Privy Council because of his attitude toward the Auditor General?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order. I had some doubts as to the validity of the original question by the hon. member for Ontario.

AGRICULTURE

DAIRYING—REQUEST FOR MEETING OF MINISTER AND MILK PRODUCERS TO RECONSIDER POLICY

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture.

I have here a copy of a resolution of the Union of Industrial Milk Producers of Joliette county that was sent to the Minister of Agriculture and in which they recommend that representatives of producers in Canada—I wonder why they added "and in Quebec"—should meet with the minister as soon as possible in order to discuss further the unfortunate dairy policy that is detrimental to Canadian dairy producers.

May I ask the minister if he will give an affirmative answer and give the assurance that the meeting will be held in the interest of milk producers?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Certainly we would welcome a meeting of this kind. I have to disagree with the premise contained in the question that some of these policies are affecting certain producers more than others. What I suggest is that we would welcome a meeting attended not only by the producers from that particular county but by representatives of producers from all over Quebec as well as by the responsible provincial authorities in order that we might work out these problems.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Has the minister decided to give back the $10 million subsidy to milk producers which they need so badly and which the government so unjustifiably took away from them?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

MANPOWER

HOURS OF WORK OF STUDENTS EMPLOYED BY FEDERAL DEPARTMENTS

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, on April 23 I directed a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I asked whether he was aware that some students worked in excess of 80 hours per week for federal departments last year and whether this would still be the policy of federal departments this year. The minister said he would check into this situation and report back to the House. Is he now in a position to answer my question?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I have checked the information which the hon. member was good enough to provide but I have not yet had an opportunity to discuss the matter with the minister concerned. I shall do so as soon as he is in Ottawa.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED PRESENCE OF FOREIGN SUBMARINES IN ARCTIC WATERS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Defence, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister assure us, in light of confirmation during the latter part of last week by the Commander, Maritime Command, of the presence of submarines in our Arctic waters—

An hon. Member: Whether they are causing pollution?

Mr. Forrestall: That is a good question, too—whether or not the presence of foreign submarines poses any danger or threat to our own activities in the north or to the country as a whole?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): This is a difficult question. Generally we approach these questions in a prudent fashion. I have no particular information leading me to suspect the presence of enemy submarines in the Arctic.

An hon. Member: Are we at war, then?

Mr. Forrestall: Is the minister not aware of the public statements which have been made by Admiral O'Brien about the presence of foreign submarines in these waters? If he is not aware of them, perhaps in the interest of the country I should send him some files so that he will know what is going on.

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): When we speak of files in a matter like this we may be exaggerating somewhat. I have not seen the statement of Admiral O'Brien but I am sure there must have been some qualifications in what he said.

RENTAL INCREASE FOR PERMANENT MARRIED QUARTERS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I have a question, Mr. Speaker, for the Minister of National Defence. Has he protested very strongly to his colleague the President of the Treasury Board about the extremely unjust and unfair increase of $15 a month in the rent for married quarters on military bases across Canada? If so, what was the result?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that that question was asked previously.

POLLUTION

REPORTED OIL SPILL OFF ALASKA

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence concerning a reported oil spill off Alaska which may affect Canadian waters and may be the result of a spill from a submarine. Is the minister aware of this oil spill, and are investigations under way to see whether it came from a submarine?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have to confess that I am not aware of this, but obviously if such a spill did take place the appropriate department, which is the Department of Transport, would be investigating the matter, though the spill may not necessarily be in our waters. However, I will check on the report.

HOUSING

ALLOCATION OF $56 MILLION FOR CERTAIN PROJECTS—PUBLIC HOUSING GUIDELINES

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister in charge of housing and relates to the statement he made yesterday. Is the $56 million of the $200 million in experimental funds for housing going exclusively to private builders, or are other organizations such as co-ops, trade unions and churches included in this housing program?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, within the $56 million, if my memory serves me correctly, there are co-operative sponsors. So far as the whole $200 million is concerned, we would welcome proposals from all legitimate sponsoring groups as defined by the National Housing Act, which includes churches and the other organizations mentioned by the hon. member.

Mr. Gilbert: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister tell the House whether he has completed negotiations with the provinces with regard to new public housing guidelines? If so, when will they take effect?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, we have not completed negotiations in the sense that each province has indicated in precise terms that it will follow the guidelines that we have suggested or, particularly, the exact date on which they will implement them, but from the initial reactions, as I said the other day, we have been encouraged to think that this matter will proceed smoothly and quickly.

USE OF PORTION OF EXPERIMENTAL FUND FOR URBAN RENEWAL

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In light of the fact that the $200 million was primarily to be used for experimental projects in connection with low-income housing, and in view of the fact that urban renewal affects low-income housing, is the minister contemplating using any of the $200 million for urban renewal projects this year?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the answer to that is no. I would say that urban renewal does affect low-income housing, but unfortunately in Canada to date it has affected it adversely.

Mr. Alexander: A further supplementary question. I understood the minister to say that urban renewal has affected certain areas adversely. I respectfully submit that there are some areas in this country that have now presented further urban renewal plans to the minister, particularly the city of Hamilton. Is the minister prepared to receive favourably an application from the city of Hamilton for $1,500,000?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, it is doubtful. I have discussed this matter with the mayor and a delegation from the city of Hamilton. However, we are examining their proposals and I will be communicating my decision to them very shortly.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FISHERIES

ATLANTIC SALMON—REVIEW OF CUTBACK IN NUMBER OF RIVER GUARDIANS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-Ste. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. In addition to the positive action taken by the minister to conserve our stocks of Atlantic salmon, would the minister be prepared to review the cutback in the number of river guardians made last year on the basis of austerity measures and increase the number of wardens in order to afford better protection of our rivers?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, we are reviewing that program at the present time.

ATLANTIC SALMON—PRESENTATION OF CANADIAN POSITION TO DANISH MINISTER

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the attitude taken by Denmark in regard to the harvesting of Atlantic salmon on the high seas and its recent threatened withdrawal from the North Atlantic Fisheries Commission, can the minister say whether he has approached the Danish Minister of Fisheries, Mr. Norrman, and made the Canadian position clear in regard to high-seas harvesting?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, we have made our position relative to the harvesting of salmon on the high seas very clear to Denmark in the various meetings that have been held by the North Atlantic countries involved in ICNAF. As the hon. member knows, we will obviously have to follow this matter up, as other countries have done, through other channels.

Mr. Lundrigan: A supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are running short of time and the hon. member has asked one supplementary. I may return to him in a moment.

IMMIGRATION

TRANSFER FROM PENITENTIARY TO ANOTHER INSTITUTION OF MAN UNDER DEPORTATION ORDER AND NEEDING SPECIAL CARE

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Further to my question yesterday in regard to an inmate at the Prince Albert penitentiary being urgently in need of assistance at this time, could the Minister indicate to the House whether or not he has removed this man from the penitentiary and, if he has, to where has he been moved?

[Mr. Andras.]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge no action has been taken to remove this man from the penitentiary. As my hon. friend may know, he is the subject of a deportation order which will be effected just as soon as it is possible to arrange for the reception of this person in the United States. I am advised that the psychiatrist or the doctor in charge of the psychiatric ward at the penitentiary has advised that there seems to be no advantage, from the health point of view, in transferring this person from the psychiatric ward to the hospital at North Battleford.

Mr. Skoberg: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the presence of this inmate is well known to all inmates in the penitentiary, and in view of the fact that there is insufficient staff at the penitentiary to care for this individual, would the minister immediately remove this man to some other institution in Canada where he could receive proper care and be treated like a human being?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, on this point I prefer to take the advice of the doctors who are on the scene rather than the advice of my hon. friend.

POST OFFICE

MONTREAL—RETURN TO NORMAL SERVICE

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Postmaster General in the continuing absence of the Postmaster General, whom I miss profoundly. Can the minister tell us when he now expects mail delivery service in Montreal to return to normal? I ask this question particularly since I have received a letter sent first class mail from Montreal 15 days after it left that city.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Acting Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman would give me a copy of the envelope I would be glad to inquire why it went wrong.

Mr. Bell: Because it went through Westmount.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PHASING OUT OF MEAFORD TANK RANGE—EFFECT ON CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Minister of National Defence. Does his department have plans that would necessarily result in the dismissal of civilian employees at the Meaford tank range?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the fate of the Meaford Range is being considered now. As a matter of fact, I have just signed a letter to the hon. member to whom I want to talk about it. The usual procedures in the case of a closure would, of course, provide for six months' notice for the civilian employees concerned. We would also try to put in motion the procedure that we have developed over the years of co-operating with other departments of government in finding alternative employment.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

• (2:50 p.m.)

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—CREATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT BY ANTI-INFLATION POLICIES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition) moved:

That this House condemns the government's arrogant acceptance of recession-level unemployment in slow-growth areas of Canada and cost-of-living hardships generally while dogmatically continuing discredited policies that have failed to put the national economy on a non-inflationary upward course.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it was recognized in the government white paper concerning inflation, tabled I think late in 1968, that the policies that had been pursued by the government to attain the objectives of stable prices and satisfactory employment had not worked. Following this, the Prices and Incomes Commission was established, and while the emphasis of the chairman of that commission has been pretty steadily upon the importance of pursuing the fight against inflation without creating excessive unemployment the government has gone on creating more. The policies of the government have been to cause the main burden to be carried by those Canadian citizens who are least able to protect themselves and are most subject to unemployment, such as the aged and those Canadians with low incomes who are still required to pay income tax.

I do not believe that we must ask the older people of this country to suffer a deterioration in the purchasing power of government pensions, particularly older people in need. Surely, we have not reached such a state of desperation in this country that we must limit the adjustment of guaranteed income supplements to a maximum of 2 per cent regardless of what change takes place in the cost of living during the year. We know that during the past four years our older people have fallen farther and farther behind the increase in the cost of living, and this is something that we cannot justify.

There is also the low income taxpayer with a shrinking real income, a shrinking purchasing power as a result of inflation, who faces a rise in the cost of living. Here again we have given him no relief but in effect have increased his taxes. This is inexcusable. I propose that we should be prepared this year to take off the income tax rolls those who are below the poverty line. Even if the government has to persuade itself that it cannot go that far, surely in the light of the inflation that has been going on something should be done. Surely there is no need to hold up this kind of relief until agreement can be reached on a total package of tax reform. So what we have had for the last couple of years at least, and indeed longer, is not an alleviation of poverty in the country but rather a deepening of poverty.

As a result of the policies of the government, we have excessive unemployment across the country. There is a very real question as to whether this unemployment is really attacking the sources of the inflationary psychology that exists. None of us has any doubt that, in time, we can defeat inflation by creating a recession of sufficient depth. As has been pointed out, we can do this, but at what price to the individuals who are suffering loss and what strain upon the fabric of this country? How far is this policy going to be pursued?

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) suggested the other day that the government was prepared to pursue this course until there has been an absolute elimination of all inflation in the country, something we have not seen in this country or indeed in any western country since the war. Surely, the Prime Minister could not be serious when he made that statement. This is the third time in three months that the opposition parties have dedicated opposition days to matters related to the stubborn insistence of the government upon economic policies which are inappropriate and wrong. We have also devoted time to putting forward resolutions against the determination of the architects of the just society to put Canadians out of work.

There are, of course, other great issues in the country. There are other areas where the government is failing and deserves to be censured. But at the root of most of these other problems is the single fact that the government is so preoccupied with its own plans that it does not respond to the realities of the hardships in this country, and it gives the continuing impression that it does not care about them.

Under this government Ottawa has become a sort of separate principality, cut off from the real problems Canadians face and increasingly incapable of finding a solution to these problems. There is no better symbol of that detachment from reality than the cold and brutal insistence of this government on creating unemployment. If one needs a symbol of the differences between the parties in this House, that symbol is to be found in the stone-cold response of this government to the human problems of fear, misery and self-contempt that come with unemployment.

I suggest it would be instructive to have the Prime Minister trade places for a day with the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan). Certainly, it would be refreshing for the country to be presided over, even for a day, by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate. But the real test would be to see whether the Prime Minister, with the roles reversed, could remain so insensitive to the human side of unemployment if he had to answer for a day directly to the unemployed of Gander-Twillingate or to the unemployed of any other region where the hardship of this government's harsh policies is concentrated. Perhaps under those circumstances the Prime Minister could explain to them the importance of their contribution as "regrettable side effects" of high national policy. That is the latest euphemism. If you are out of work you are "a regrettable side effect".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: According to the last DBS figures, we have now in Canada some 542,000 "regrettable side effects", and as usual unemployment is most acute in the areas least able to stand it, the areas of slow growth. Across the country there are more unemployed than a year ago, but the number of employed in Ontario, British Columbia and, by a small margin, in the Prairies, was a little higher than a year ago, although the number of unemployed was greater. However, in the Atlantic provinces for two successive months the number of employed has been actually less than a year ago. That is true in Quebec as well, at least according to the last report.

• (3:00 p.m.)

The only reason the unemployment figure is not substantially higher in the Atlantic provinces than a year ago as a result of the even lower number of people employed is that the work force, according to DBS, has shrunk, indicating that a large number of people in the Atlantic provinces has actually given up hope. They are no longer applying for work. No doubt the government will come up with some ingenious explanation of these figures, some way to show that they aren't really there, perhaps by a comparison with the unemployment situation in Bombay or Calcutta. Perhaps the government will try to play games with the unemployment figures, as the Prime Minister did the other day, using some seasonally adjusted manipulation with respect to October when he tried to show that the employment situation was better in the Atlantic provinces, and consequently that the government's anti-inflation policies could not be having the detrimental effect in areas of slow growth that members of the opposition had been saying they were having. It is this kind of manipulation that has put statistical discussions into disrepute.

You must remember, Mr. Speaker, that this government has had a difficult time with figures. The most recent manipulation of figures under the auspices of the government party was so misleading that even the leader of the Liberal party in Quebec dismissed it as "inopportune, awkward and unjustified." Some of his associates were even less restrained. One aide is quoted as saying "The Feds are maniacs". Of course, everyone in this House can remember the earlier difficulties this government had with simple figures. Of all the troubles the government has had, one of the most basic seems to be that it just cannot count. Some of us would argue that a more serious problem is its refusal to recognize that these unemployment figures stand for people and not just numbers, people who are out of work, out of hope, and who are running out of patience.

When the Prime Minister is told that more than one half million Canadians are out of work, he has the curious view that it is an adequate answer to say there were more out of work sometime in the past. Mr. Speaker, this is certainly the first time in our history that a Government of Canada has deliberately tried to create unemployment, and that sets this government apart from any government in the past. But what the Prime Minister does not seem to care about is that many of the people who are out of work today are the same people who were out of work in the days past of which he spoke, and in some of the areas of chronic unemployment they are the sons and the daughters of people whose unemployment a decade ago the Prime Minister is so prone to refer to today. The Prime Minister and his ministers should stop these debating tricks, and recognize that these are human lives they are dealing with and which, in some cases, their policies are deliberately destroying.

The government offers a ritual defence of its policy of deliberately creating unemployment. It suggests that it is necessary to fight inflation and that we must choose between inflation and unemployment. That is a false choice. It is an old trick, to reduce every problem to two contradictory extremes. The suggestion that we can fight inflation only by creating unemployment is a deliberate attempt to mislead and to polarize Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: The alternatives, in fact, are not as singular or as stark as the Prime Minister and his colleagues suggest. Their argument, that we cannot fight unemployment and inflation together, directly contradicts the views expressed by the Chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission as well as the view of many other economists. By posing these false and stark alternatives, the government not only perpetuates unemployment but it impedes the discussion or development of alternative means to fight inflation, which would not lay so heavy and so unjust a burden on the weak, the poor and the unemployed.

I would remind the House that the policy of the government not only deliberately creates unemployment, but that the government is also deliberately encouraging the view among the well-to-do in Canada that unemployment does not really matter; that it is a necessary evil and that, in the words of the Prime Minister, it is a regrettable side effect; that the government in fact is pursuing a bold initiative in which someone has to suffer and it might as well be the poor. It is important to remember that this policy, this willingness to relegate the unemployed to the status of "a regrettable side effect," is all being done in the name of a just society. It is not a just society at all. Instead, these things are calculated to create a society that is as cynical, selfish and as callous as the government itself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: I would not often make this kind of judgment in a debate, but, Sir, this is an immoral policy. The government has no moral right to throw half a million Canadians out of work and to suggest to the comfortable majority who have jobs that this kind of callousness is somehow acceptable. The basic premise of the government's policy is that the weak should suffer so that the strong can prosper. That is unacceptable, Mr. Speaker. That is uncivilized.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: If we do nothing else in this debate we must force the government to see unemployment in its proper context in this country, not as a cruel weapon in a hesitant campaign to achieve other goals but as a cause of human misery and regional depression, and possibly as a source of serious social disorder.

A figure of more than half a million unemployed is bad enough as it stands, but the crisis of unemployment extends well beyond the people it affects directly. It creates fear among hundreds of thousands of other Canadians who are not certain that their jobs will continue, who fear that they will be the next victims of the government's determination to put more slack into the economy. This policy affects families, Mr. Speaker, and the planning of all those Canadians, whether they are out of work already or whether they fear they will be put out of work soon, and that means hundreds of thousands more Canadians. Probably millions of Canadians are made more insecure and miserable by the fact that unemployment is high, and that the Government of Canada, their government, has stated—and it is hard to believe, Sir—that it is prepared to push the unemployment figure higher.

The government can dismiss this as soft talk if it wishes. It can make the claim that it is really being tough. It can make the claim that the current level of unemployment really helps the unemployed. It can make the claim that the unemployed Canadians, and members of the opposition, just are not smart enough to understand that the government is working in the interest of the unemployed. That kind of argument might wash in some boardrooms, but not too many I think; it might even wash in the caucus room of the government party, although I am not even sure of that; but it won't convince anybody else in Canada.

Unemployment is more than being out of work. Unemployment kills the will not only of individuals but of the communities where it is concentrated. That is why it has such a harsh and unfair effect upon the areas which traditionally have been areas of slow growth. If there is to be renewal of these areas, if they are to achieve economic equality or anything like it, one fundamental ingredient must be the desire of the people who live there to move up and the belief that they can. No amount of money from Ottawa can help an area whose spirit of self-help has been strangled or killed. The government is trying to claim that its policies are in fact helping the slow-growth regions. That is not the kind of help they would choose. The D.B.S. figures, as I have mentioned, are quite clear and affect not only the Atlantic provinces but other parts of the country as well.

• (3:10 p.m.)

It is difficult to know what effect, if any, the programs of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) are having. He is the most mysterious minister in the House, in terms of what his department is doing. We can, therefore, judge only by the effects the eye can see. On the record, the policies of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion have so far been a failure, and one of the reasons they are a failure is that the government is at the same time pursuing a deliberate policy of creating unemployment. Once again, the government is working at cross-purposes with itself. One minister is charged with building up the slow-growth regions, while the others are busy building up unemployment. You cannot have it both ways. If this government wanted to organize a hockey game, they would have one minister spend millions on new uniforms and ask another minister to go out and melt the ice. Then, they would boast about what it all cost.

The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion was speaking in Toronto the other night. He did not have a text so we cannot be sure of exactly what he said.

An hon. Member: He doesn't know himself.

Mr. Stanfield: The report in the Toronto Globe and Mail reads as follows: "He (the Minister) said that the source of separatist feeling in Quebec was basically economic". The report goes on:

> The largest number of nationalists and separatists are in the eastern parts of Montreal and the province, where unemployment is highest, many people are on social security and the average income for each person is about $1,000 per year.

I assume the message we are to receive from that—and the message the Prime Minister has also been implanting recently—is that current events in Quebec are the result of economic hardship. There is no reason for the government or Canadians to take any comfort from that. There might be some distinction in logic between the Canadian who supports a separatist party out of commitment, and the man who votes separatist out of desperation. But there is very little difference in effect. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion should be the last people to express satisfaction that protest votes are not against federalism per se but against federalism as it is practised by this government.

This country has enough natural divisions already. More than most federations, it needs a central government which is respected as an ally by every part of Canada, and particularly by the disadvantaged who have the strongest natural cause to question federalism. This government instead has gone out of its way to infuriate or alienate the people on the economic margins of the country. It has virtually ignored the crisis facing farmers in the west. It turns its back on the aged and on those Canadians who live below the poverty line. It creates economic conditions which mean that young Canadians cannot get work when they come out of school. It callously and deliberately creates new unemployment in the name of fighting inflation.

I do not intend to dwell on the issue which the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion raised. But surely it is clear to us all—and certainly it is proper for the Parliament of Canada to discuss—the fact that unemployment is creating or confirming instability and unrest in many parts of Canada. Unemployment is creating an explosive situation. Young people are out of school and out of work. One startling feature of the most recent unemployment statistics is that they reveal the degree to which younger Canadians are being forced to start what would normally be their working lives without jobs. Particularly when one considers the extent of social criticism and dissatisfaction among the young today, this unemployment for the young is an invitation to disorder. Consider the difficulty students are going to have finding summer employment under these conditions.

The same would be the case if unemployment were disproportionately high—as we must assume it is—among native people, and others who already feel they are the victims of prejudice. It is an unhappy fact of life that many of the native people of Canada live in areas where growth is slow and jobs are few. Since the effect of the government's policy to deliberately create unemployment is particularly harsh in regions of this kind, we must assume that the proportion of unemployed native people is higher than the proportion of unemployed Canadians generally.

Sometimes people accuse this government of a lack of respect for tradition but I think it sometimes shows too much respect for tradition. Indeed, in one area at least I think the Prime Minister is trying to recreate the past, unemployment and all. One hears of the possibility of the government creating a poverty council, the aim of which would be to spread poverty evenly across the country with special attention to areas of slow growth. If this were to be done the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) would be an appropriate adviser on theory.

This is a government policy which is cruel and inappropriate. It is not only harmful to the people who are unemployed today. It amounts to a serious attack upon the prospect of development in many of the slow growth regions of the country. It amounts to an invitation to the young and the dispossessed to protest, and the old to give up in frustration in whatever way is at hand. It is a policy destructive of human dignity, destructive of social order, destructive of national unity and development. It is a policy which suits the theorists in the East Block, and no one else. It is a policy which must be reversed.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House draws attention to the recent level of unemployment and to slow economic growth in Canada. I think it is significant that nearly all of the opposition days have been devoted to the lamentable condition of the Canadian economy. That is because when members in all parts of the House return to their constituencies they find this to be the number one issue. There can be no doubt that the Canadian economy is in serious trouble.

First of all, there are all the signs of an economic slow down. Even the budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) predicted a one and a half to two per cent drop from the 4.8 per cent growth in 1969. This means that in this year, by the minister's own figure, we will probably have a reduced growth rate in real terms of 2.8 to 3 per cent. That contrasts very poorly with the recommendation of the Economic Council of Canada that we require a real growth rate of 5.5 per cent to 6.5 per cent if we are to maintain full employment in this country.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Athabasca on a point of order.

Mr. Yewchuk: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I should like to point out to the House that when this very important issue is being discussed there are only four government members in the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is hardly a point of order. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): There are no ministers.

Mr. Greene: I just sit back here so that I can have a better perspective.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): You don't have any say, Joe.

Mr. Dinsdale: That is so, Joe.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The state of the economy is shown further by the fact that we now have an unemployment rate of 6.7 per cent, the highest we have had in Canada for some six years; and that is certainly the highest rate of any industrialized nation in the western world. Professor Seymour Friedland, Director of Capital Markets Research Program at York University, said this recently:

> The question is no longer whether we are going to have a recession—we already have a recession—but how serious the recession will be.

It is because the parties in the opposition recognize that we are in a recession and are concerned about the government's lack of action that the matter is being discussed here at this time. As an hon. member pointed out a few minutes ago, significantly, the government's interest in this matter is demonstrated by the rows of empty seats on the government side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): There are rows and rows of empty seats.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The Minister of Finance is the only cabinet minister present and he only came in a few minutes ago. I think there are four Liberal members in the House at this time, which shows how concerned they are about the present economic conditions of this country.

An hon. Member: Only four Liberals are here.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The government's anti-inflation program is based on the wrong diagnosis and on wrong economic prescriptions. We agree that the government is justified in being concerned about inflation and rising prices. Any government has to be. Galloping inflation can destroy an economy and any government would be negligent in its duties if it did not cope with the problem of inflation and rising prices for the consumer. The government has got into trouble because it has made a mistaken diagnosis. It has mistaken the symptoms for the disease. The Government has accepted as a fact the mistaken notion that our inflation in Canada is the result of too much money chasing too few goods. Consequently, it has adopted the nineteenth century tools of blanket fiscal and monetary restraints. Senator Lamontagne, who formerly sat on the government side as a cabinet minister in the Liberal government, said this recently in the city of Toronto, as reported in the Globe and Mail of March 25:

> Canada currently is suffering from cost-push inflation, rather than the demand-pull variety,—

The Senator went on to say:

> This kind of inflation is structural, not cyclical in character, and it originates from the use of monopolistic controls in the supply side by both business and labour unions, not from excessive over-all demand. Thus it is quite possible to have at the same time cost-push inflation and deficient aggregate demand, rising prices and recession.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Senator Lamontagne said the government's anti-inflationary policy was the work of "decadent Keynesians", and he charged the government with "unconscious cynicism". There can be no doubt that the results of the government's ill-advised anti-inflation policies have been disastrous for Canada. We still have rising prices, and to that misfortune the government has added unemployment and an economic slow-down. The victims of this policy are the poor and the people who live in the least developed areas of Canada. The poor are hit twice: first, because the cost of living is still going up; and second, because many of them are thrown out of a job. When discussing these things in the question period, the Prime Minister keeps saying, "The Canadian people must exercise discipline" and "We have to break the inflationary psychology." Mr. Speaker, why is it always the people in the low income groups who have to learn discipline?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Does anyone think that the government's anti-inflation policy will teach discipline to bank presidents, company managers, Members of Parliament and Senators? They will not be affected by the government's restrictive measures. It is the people who had nothing to do with inflation, the people who suffer most from inflation, who are now suffering most from the government's attempt to cure inflation. The same thing is true of the poorer regions of Canada. These are the regions that were not responsible for the cost-push inflation which we are experiencing; but they are suffering all the consequences of the economic recession which this government has imposed on Canada in an attempt to stop inflation. The work of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) is being nullified every day by the monetary and fiscal restraints imposed by the Minister of Finance.

The motion before us speaks of the government's arrogance. Nowhere is its arrogance shown more clearly than in its persistence in following an anti-inflation policy that has incurred the criticism of almost every reputable economist in Canada. The government's Economic Council, which contains some of the best economists in the country, told the government as far back as last September in its Sixth Annual Review that:

> Further fiscal and monetary restraint could conceivably result simply in higher rates of unemployment and economic slack with no more than marginal effects on current rates of increase in prices and costs.

Before the Economic Council said that, many members in this House had said it, but the government has paid no heed to those warnings. It has gone on like a hippopotamus trampling through a field of tulips in persisting in this program, regardless of the results. I have in my hand a list of economists, including some of the best economists in Canada, who have tried to tell the government exactly what the Economic Council tried to tell it in its review. Professor Arthur Kruger of the University of Toronto called for reduced tariffs and a more vigorous anti-trust policy. Professor Rotstein, also of the University of Toronto, urges the separation of Canadian and United States economic policy. Professor Jack C. Weldon of McGill University says government policy has led to a 12 per cent unemployment rate among Quebec's French-speaking males. He claimed Canada would be better off accepting some degree of inflation rather than fighting it with rising unemployment. Professor Rosalind Blauer of Brock University, St. Catharines, called for a fluctuating exchange rate rather than measures with a heavy social cost. Senator Lamontagne, to whom I have already referred, described the government's policy as "the worst theoretical aberration since the mistakes that preceded the depression of the 1930's."

Mr. Alexander: You could go back even farther than that.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Just to make absolutely sure that the government got the message, the Quebec leader of the Liberal Party, Mr. Robert Bourassa, said recently in Montreal that the Quebec Liberal Party does not accept the anti-inflation policies of the federal government. He went on to blast the federal government for allowing its fiscal policies to be dictated by "mandarins operating in a closed circuit". He said he would do everything in his power to bring about a reversal in federal policy if his party came to power in Quebec.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Just a few days ago the Federation of Mayors and Municipalities met with the government. One of the mayors, Mayor Sidney Buckwold, a former Liberal candidate, reminded the government that urban construction was grinding to a halt. The mayors told the Prime Minister and the government that there is a serious unemployment situation in our cities. Is it not strange, Mr. Speaker, that the Economic Council of Canada, a former cabinet minister, the leader of the Liberal party in the province of Quebec, a whole battalion of outstanding economists and the Federation of Mayors and Municipalities are all telling the government of the disastrous consequences of their anti-inflationary policies? The government is satisfied to do nothing about it. It is like the old army joke, everybody is out of step but Pierre.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The government is still trying to apply the policies of the Herbert Hoover era. The Prime Minister says that unemployment is a regrettable but necessary corollary of its anti-inflationary policy. What the government is really saying is that it is not possible in this country to have full employment and price stability. The government is saying that we have to choose between having galloping inflation or unemployment in this country. Any government that is not able to plan the economy of this country so as to establish a National high level of income and full employment and at the same time a degree of price stability have no right to continue sitting in the treasury benches.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): If the government cannot manage the economy of this country, then they should resign. They did not tell the people of Canada two years ago that the price of trying to halt inflation would be to throw people out of work and slow the economy down to a halt.

Mr. Alexander: They promised a just society.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): They promised the just society. It is just so-so! Having failed to either stop the rising cost of living or to maintain relatively full employment, the government is now trying to find a scapegoat. Their program of voluntary restraints has been a colossal failure because prices are continuing to rise, despite all the commitments that were made at the conference on price stability. Price increases have even been made by some of the tycoons who attended the conference, and this has been done with the acquiescence of the government.

The government seeks to place blame on organized labour. The Prime Minister told members of the Canadian Labour Congress that their share of the national income had risen from 62 per cent in 1950 to 72.6 per cent in 1969. I want to point out how misleading those figures are. The only fair way you can measure labour income is on the basis of the gross national product. Wages, salaries and supplementary labour income in 1950 was 48 per cent of the gross national product and by 1968, it had increased to 53.9 per cent. What the Prime Minister did not tell the people of Canada was that the figure of wages, salaries and supplementary labour income includes executive salaries and supplementary income which have grown faster than wages.

The government is asking the organized workers of this country to accept mandatory restraints based on collective bargaining agreements while only requiring corporations to give voluntary commitments which experience has shown to be worthless. As far as labour is concerned, there is no such thing as a voluntary restraint. When organized workers sign a collective bargaining agreement, that document is binding on them for the next two or three years. When a corporation makes a voluntary commitment not to raise prices, we can see how binding such a commitment is by some of the examples of the past few months.

The New Democratic Party has repeated in this House again and again what we consider to be an adequate program to deal realistically with the plight of our economy. I did this on October 24 in the Speech from the Throne debate at the beginning of this session. In the few moments I have left I wish to again mention some of the things this party thinks should be done.

First, we in this party think we must lessen the effects of United States inflation because undoubtedly some of our inflation comes from the United States where they have been spending $24 billion to $30 billion a year on the war in Viet Nam. Naturally, we are affected because of our economies being so closely interrelated. We suggest we should return to a floating exchange rate and set our interest rates in the light of our own domestic situation rather than in relation to American interest rates.

Second, we say there should be selective fiscal and monetary restraints for any areas of our economy that are overheated. We are not quarrelling with fiscal and monetary restraints. We are quarrelling with the fact that the government has adopted a buckshot approach. There are areas of the economy in which restraints could be advantageously applied.

Third, we suggest selective investment controls to direct available capital into socially desirable projects such as housing and infrastructure. If we have to keep down spending, then surely the outlays of available capital should be apportioned on the basis of social needs and not on the basis of the market. The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has just released the figures of projected capital spending, public and private, for the year 1970. It is rather significant that commercial construction in trade, finance and commercial services will increase by 55 per cent in Ontario this year. It goes on to outline that much of this construction will be for hotels and prestige office buildings. However, in the same province where commercial investments are increasing by 55 per cent, housing expenditures are decreasing by 11 per cent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired. Unless hon. members are disposed to allow him to continue—

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is agreed.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I just wish to make one or two points before I conclude. I am not going into the details of this report of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce except to point out that in the areas where we need more capital investment, such as the Maritimes and the Prairies, capital investment is decreasing. The places that are already affected by unemployment are the areas of Canada where capital investment is decreasing. That is why we in this party say there has to be some allocation of financial and material resources in this country rather than the shotgun approach which the government has been using in trying to cope with inflation.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Fourth, we urge that there should be genuine tax reform designed to redistribute income and to increase purchasing power of those on lower incomes. There is not too much money for 40 or 50 per cent of the people of this country. Certainly, the people below the poverty line, those in a state of deprivation, do not have too much money. One of the ways in which the economy could be strengthened would be to raise the income tax exemption and lower the taxes of people with low incomes so as to give them the purchasing power to buy goods.

The fifth thing we are suggesting is that there should be a mandatory prices and incomes policy to prevent unjustified price increases and to roll back some of the administered prices which are now being imposed by monopolist and multi-national corporations. The government has surely learned by this time that we shall not achieve price stability merely by relying on voluntary commitments by industry. About two-thirds of the economy of Canada is controlled by monopolies and quasi-monopolies. The prices of the commodities which they produce are administered prices, set not only to cover costs and a reasonable return to the shareholders, but designed to generate capital for future development. These corporations are in a position virtually to set their own prices and to demand whatever they wish from the consuming public. Unless the government is prepared to adopt a mandatory prices and incomes policy we shall completely fail to deal with the question of rising prices.

I say to the Minister of Finance and to the government, there is only one thing worse than making a mistake: it is the refusal to recognize a mistake once it has been made, refusal to reverse a program. The government started out to cure inflation. It adopted a program of blanket restraint, and the results have been catastrophic. If it continues, a vicious circle will develop; every person thrown out of work is a person whose purchasing power is sharply curtailed, and this leads to others being thrown out of work. As more people find themselves out of work, the cost of production increases and it becomes more difficult to compete in foreign markets. An economic recession can develop into an economic depression very rapidly. The Prime Minister should not then be worrying about breaking an inflationary psychology; he should be worried about breaking a depression psychology, something which can be deadly as anyone who lived through the great depression will testify.

I am urging the Minister of Finance, not that he give up any idea of controlling inflation but that he should recognize that to fight inflation requires much more sophisticated economic tools than the blunt ones he has been using. He should look into this question of selective controls, both monetary and fiscal, of selective investment policies and the mandatory control of prices. It should be possible to do this in this age when we have computers and more knowledge of economic forces than ever in the history of mankind, it should be possible in a country like Canada, with its vast resources, to have relatively full employment, a high level of national income and, at the same time, a relatively even and stable price structure.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take part in this debate on a motion of non-confidence against the government concerning its employment policy or rather its unemployment policy.

The Leader of the Progressive Conservative party has put a motion which reads as follows:

> That this House condemns the government's arrogant acceptance of recession-level unemployment in slow-growth areas of Canada and cost-of-living hardships generally while dogmatically continuing discredited policies that have failed to put the national economy on a non-inflationary upward course.

Mr. Speaker, we know that the government led by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had promised the establishment in Canada of a just society which seems to exist only for a few individuals. Indeed, the large number of people who must live with the insecurity that unemployment creates surely do not benefit from the just society that the present government has promised, and the Canadian people are not deriving any advantages from the country's resources, for instance its natural resources that must be developed to bring wealth.

We are told that the rate of unemployment in Canada has now reached 6.7 per cent.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Needless to say, that is the official figure, but one must not forget that, during the year, some individuals who become unemployed may later find work while others may, in turn, lose their jobs. On this subject, I had the following question placed on the order paper:

> How many initial requests were made to the Unemployment Insurance Commission during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1968?

The answer I was given reads as follows:

> 1,389,366 initial claims were made through the Commission's offices during the fiscal year which ended March 31, 1968.

There is a gap between the unemployment figures mentioned above and the 6.7 per cent rate that is reported. As I explained a short while ago, an individual may not be without work the year round, but rather for one, two, three or four months. Some sort of rotation takes place during the year. This means that approximately 1.25 million people are unemployed during a certain period of the year.

Everyone knows that forest workers, miners, construction and other workers must have a yearly income, otherwise they cannot make ends meet.

If a man goes back to work after having been unemployed during a certain period of the year, his financial problems are not over. When people are jobless bills pile up. Necessary clothing cannot be bought. People must therefore try to increase their earnings when they go back to work. In 1968 1,389,366 people were affected by unemployment.

Furthermore, we know that most of the time 40 to 45 per cent of the unemployed are to be found in Quebec, which is not a very enviable record. It is therefore not surprising to see signs of dissatisfaction among some people who get panicky when they think of the probable result of tomorrow's election in that province.

Some Progressive Conservative members have made representations to the government so that Quebec does not separate from the rest of Canada. I do not think that the citizens of Quebec have reached that stage but, nevertheless, it is true that discontent is general in Quebec because people are fed up with having to put up with a false, obsolete and outdated system.

The night the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) tabled the budget, newsmen interviewed the Prime Minister about unemployment and the fight against inflation. He answered then that the fight he had undertaken against inflation had not yet given any result and that he was carrying it on in this area. In short, we do not know where we are going but we are going anyway.

With a view to checking the steady increase in the cost of living, we are trying to create more and more unemployment, without showing the least concern for the Canadian workers and taxpayers. The cost of living must definitely be brought down. However, people do not realize that the methods resorted to could well lead to an economic recession, which would be just the opposite of the results that are being sought.

What we ask of the government is not an increase of the unemployment level, but the creation of more jobs while it is still time.

[Mr. Laprise.]

There are many things that can and must be done but we do not want the battle against inflation to be fought at the expense of the workers.

Often enough I hear people say that we should promote full employment in every field. In the province of Quebec, the chief of one party recently announced that if his party gets into power he will see that 100,000 new jobs are created.

We are wondering how he will create these 100,000 new jobs.

What does he prefer? Certainly, if one looks at the various economic sectors, we find there is no problem in the production area. As a matter of fact, we are not short of consumer goods. This year, payments of about $100 million will be made to the western wheat producers to get them to reduce their production. Thus, we are granting subsidies and it is not because we are short of wheat.

However, dairy producers are penalized because they produce too much. They have to pay a fine of $1.50 if they produce milk in excess of the quota allowed to them by the government. It is not because we are short of milk, since Canadians produce more than they can consume. I am not saying they consume all the dairy products they should. Far from it. But the unemployed cannot afford to buy butter. They must be satisfied with margarine, and they cannot provide their families with all the fluid milk they would need. Sometimes, they have to make do with a pint of milk, whereas they should drink a gallon a day.

I do not say that there is overproduction of dairy products, but rather underconsumption in that field in particular—although there is an across-the-board underconsumption—because thousands of unemployed people cannot buy everything they need. What will happen to the 100,000 new jobs? What kind of products which are required at present could we produce when there is already enough production?

In his book "The American Challenge" Jean-Jacques Servan-Schreiber reports that the forecasts are such that in the U.S. and therefore, in Canada, its vassal, the average income will reach $7,500 in just 30 years and the work week will be made up of four 7-hour days, or 28 working hours. The year would be divided into 39 work weeks and 13 holiday weeks, which would give the workers 218 free days for 147 work days if one takes into account week-ends and holidays.

It is expected that this will happen in less than a generation.

The purpose of reducing continually the number of working hours is to enable the highest possible number of workers to find employment since it has been found that machines, automation and cybernetics make it ever easier to produce.

One will recall that barely a hundred years ago, at the time the internal combustion engine revolutionized industry, mechanical power replaced physical strength.

About 20 years ago, automation appeared and there was another industrial revolution greater than the previous one. Now today, cybernetics is at our disposal.

In 1964, Robert Cooney said the following about unemployment, and I quote:

While we urge young people to get degrees, technicians devise office machines that will make unemployed people out of those young graduates when they leave the university.

While the retraining of technicians displaced by the introduction of a machine doing their work is proceeded with, a new machine is being devised that will make the retraining as outmoded for those unfortunate people as the old techniques that had become useless to them.

—unemployed educated people are being added to unemployed uneducated people.

Mr. Speaker, that reminds me that in 1960-61-62, we were told that if there were so many unemployed people in Canada, it was because those people were uneducated.

Yet, on March 19 last, the JOC pointed out that in the Province of Quebec alone, out of a total of 200,000 unemployed Quebecers, 57,000 were in the 16 to 24 age group. Yet one cannot say, that those young people are uneducated. They all have to attend schools and universities but we realize that once they leave such institutions, there is no job for them. Therefore we are now confronted with educated unemployed. There is now another excerpt from Mr. Cooney's article and I quote:

We have now come to the point where the machine has become a substitute not only for man but also for the former, less sophisticated machine. Furthermore, the machine is now manufacturing other machines.

I cannot see any production problem in anything happening now. In his book "The American Challenge", at pages 93 and 94, Servan-Schreiber describes what is occurring now. This book was written three years ago but Servan-Schreiber was forecasting the things that would happen in 1980 and, which in fact, are just beginning to happen. Here is what Servan-Schreiber has to say in his book:

• (4:00 p.m.)

Well before 1980, computers will be small, powerful, and inexpensive. Computing power will be available to anyone who needs it, or wants it, or can use it.

In many cases the user will have a small personal console connected to a large, central computing facility where enormous electronic memories will store all aspects of knowledge. Corresponding developments in man-machine interaction will make it as easy to learn to use the new computers as to learn to drive a car.

The more exciting developments in information processing are based on "real-time" computer use. In these uses, the computer memory and processor are large enough to handle within seconds a variety of jobs, without needing to call for additional information from a non-computer store, such as punched cards. There is in these cases potential opportunity for the human operator to interact with the computer at a speed not too different from person-to-person conversation.

It is estimated that the entire store of information in the world's libraries amounts to 10^{15} (one quadrillion, or one million billion) bits. This information is stored in the form of books and other printed documents, and is doubling every 15 to 20 years.

A leading computer manufacturer has recently announced the commercial availability of a new type—

These predictions have now come true.

—of direct-access computer memory that will hold a thousand billion bits, or one thousandth of the world's recorded information. There appears the possibility that by 1980 a small number of computers will replace all the written documentation existing in the world, and that they will work in "real time"—replying to questions with information at the speed of human conversation.

Well, such are the advances of technology which make it possible to almost instantly disseminate information throughout the world. In the face of such development, I wonder where the problem of production comes in. If it has become so easy to exchange information and to produce, why do we try to solve the problem of production when it is non-existent?

Instead of subsidizing production at the executive level, the government should distribute more purchasing power to the people. While the Prime Minister suggests credit restraints in order to reduce prices, his colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) grants subsidies right and left in order to create new industries, thus contributing to increase production. Both approaches are contradictory.

In my opinion, it is not advisable to subsidize industries which will produce goods for which we have little or no need, since in every field, Canadian industry is already able to meet all our needs. Indeed, industries close down in some areas because they fail to sell their production.

Therefore, instead of subsidizing production at the top, let us rather consider subsidizing consumption at the bottom. Let us subsidize the consumer so that he may ask industry for what he needs. He could also specify the standards he expects. Thereby, we shall help consumers as well as industries, which would still obtain subsidies, though indirectly. Industries will therefore be urged to produce what Canadian consumers want, instead of the government wants. It would then be a much more logical way of helping our people, who expect their governments to pass fair pieces of legislation.

My colleague, the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin), last week put forward a guaranteed minimum income plan designed for all Canadians. I believe that the program of the New Democratic party includes a similar plan. I also believe that the Progressive Conservative party is considering the advisability of such a plan, and I know that in the United States, a universal guaranteed minimum income plan is being seriously considered.

I think that the methods of financing such a plan differ from one party to the other. This government should therefore consider establishing such a system in Canada in order to guarantee to all citizens a decent income, enabling them to control production. The same result might be achieved by increasing family allowances, old age security pensions and other welfare benefits across Canada, so that the recipients would not have to rely on employment. If full employment is clearly not possible, people should be able to enjoy just the same the goods produced by the machine which has replaced them.

If a system were established whereby citizens would have additional purchasing power, I am convinced that this would eliminate certain worries, particularly those currently felt by Quebecers. By establishing such a system, Canadian families would be in a position to benefit from the resources available in Canada.

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Over the past several months there has been much debate both inside and outside the House about the most serious economic problem facing Canada today—that of inflation. The continuing debate about the policies adopted by the government involves fundamental economic issues of profound importance to us all. It is essential, therefore, that all Canadians should carefully weigh the consequences of the various alternative courses that have been urged upon us.

• (4:10 p.m.)

As a nation, we are confronted with two basic choices—fighting inflation or ignoring it. Among those who believe there is no practical alternative to fighting inflation, there is broad disagreement about how vigorously the fight should be waged and with what weapons. There is an equal measure of disagreement among those who believe that the fight is not worth waging in the first place.

Consider the second and most beguiling option first, that of ignoring inflation. Many of those who press for the adoption of this course argue that the continuing inflationary spiral in Canada is largely the result of sharply rising costs and prices abroad. There is little that Canada can do to insulate itself from these foreign inflationary pressures, they argue, and as a result there is little advantage to be gained in adopting domestic economic restraints that may cause increased unemployment.

Instead, they contend, the nation should learn to live with inflation, if not to love it, by building an inflationary escalator into the economic system that would enable the incomes of all of us, pensioners and wage and salary earners alike, to keep pace with spiralling prices. That, Mr. Speaker, would be like administering tranquilizers to offset the effect of an economy on "speed".

It would be foolish to deny that the level of costs and prices in Canada may be substantially influenced by inflationary pressures from abroad, particularly from the United States. But it is equally foolish to ignore the fact that the inflationary spiral in Canada has received a sharp impetus from cost and price pressures originating with the Canadian economy.

It is admittedly unrealistic to expect that Canada can succeed in maintaining relative price stability at home in the face of swiftly rising prices south of the border. Conversely, however, it is entirely possible for Canada to do very much worse than the United States if it does not adopt complementary policies to restrain its own inflationary pressures.

There is another allied school of thought which, while conceding that inflation is a serious problem, holds that our policies of restraint are misdirected because they will have little or no effect on the cost-push type of inflationary forces at work in the economy today. The use of fiscal and monetary policies to restrain economic growth are only appropriate, they insist, if inflation is being caused by an excessive demand on the part of Canadians for goods and services.

There is no doubt that cost-push inflation poses a particularly difficult and stubborn problem, one that is not readily cured by the policy instruments we have at hand. But there is equally no doubt that the problem would be compounded in a major way if we lifted our restraints and allowed the economy to run at full throttle. When he spoke in Ottawa in February, Paul McCracken, Chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers in the United States, put it this way:

> If profits were lush and enlarging rapidly, would this be apt to influence the size of negotiated settlements? Would it affect pricing decisions? Obviously, the answers must be in the affirmative.

To opt for a decision to ignore inflation is to ignore the critical fact that Canada is a trading nation which is linked in an integral way to the economy of North America, to say nothing of that of many other countries around the world. Nor is inflation a static thing. There is no assurance whatever that in the absence of restraining measures the rise of costs and prices would maintain just the recent rate of increase. On the contrary, inflation feeds on itself if it is left unchecked, eventually gathering the kind of frightening momentum we have witnessed in a number of other countries. One could choose Brazil as an example, where inflation got up to the rate of 100 per cent per annum.

For Canada to adopt a deliberate, long-term policy of ignoring inflation is to invite economic disaster by exposing itself to ruinous foreign competition both at home and abroad. While the effect of such a development might be offset in part by a steady reduction in the exchange rate, the adverse consequences for Canadians as a whole would remain very severe.

I think there is little doubt that the vast majority of Canadians, including the vast majority of the members of this House, are deeply concerned about the impact of inflation and are convinced that we must break the current spiral of costs and prices. There are, however, differences of opinion about the strategy we should adopt and the emphasis that should be placed on particular implementing policies.

In order to put the present problem in its proper perspective it should be remembered that Canada has just completed nine years of continued economic growth. For example, our gross national product has doubled since 1961, from $39 billion to $78 billion. This is an achievement without precedent in our country which, until the beginning of the last decade, had experienced a never-ending cycle of prosperity followed by recession. Clearly our goal must remain that of maintaining continued economic expansion in order to provide jobs for tens of thousands of young Canadians entering the labour force every year and to provide a rising standard of living for all of us.

To avert the danger posed by inflation, the federal government and the Bank of Canada for some time have employed fiscal and monetary policies aimed at moderating the growth of the economy in order to remove the pressures which set the existing inflationary spiral in motion. Although the government has introduced a number of measures to offset the adverse impact of these policies, particularly in the slow growth regions of Canada, there has inevitably been a moderate increase in unemployment.

I should point out that in the 1970-71 year, expenditures, loans and investments under the regional economic expansion program for the slow growth areas, areas of high unemployment, are estimated at $353.7 million, an increase of $120 million over last year's estimated program. Equalization grants are estimated at $755 million, an increase of $81 million over last year. For 1970-71 the manpower component, that is largely for retraining, in the Manpower and Immigration Department is estimated at $420 million. Other important programs are the farm credit program, the wheat inventory adjustment program, and various public works projects.

Without engaging in the kind of numbers game played by some members of the opposition in recent days, I would stress that the increase in unemployment has been moderate. I mentioned in this House last week that the February rates of unemployment were equalled or exceeded in eight of the past 13 years, and indeed in 1961 reached a record level of 11.2 per cent in the month of February.

Most hon. members will be aware that the Toronto Star editorially has criticized us for not being sufficiently concerned about the number of Canadians without work. That makes all the more significant an observation by Jack McArthur, the Star's financial editor, in a column last week.

There are two things to keep firmly in mind. Most of our unemployment is not caused by Canadian policies related to inflation; and the increase in joblessness has not been large even though the increase in controversy has been.

Like the Star some members of the opposition have accused us of being overly concerned about inflation and insufficiently concerned about unemployment, as if we had a choice between the two. But inflation and unemployment are not two separate and unrelated problems, only two aspects of the central problem of maintaining strong and steady economic growth in Canada, with relatively full employment and without undue increases in the cost of living, all of which are our aims, and which the government, until the last couple of years, was reasonably successful in achieving over the period from 1961 forward. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said in the House last week, "We are fighting inflation in order to prevent greater unemployment in the future."

In a recent speech to the Canadian Club in Toronto, the Governor of the Bank of Canada observed that in choosing the appropriate economic policies we must assess the direction in which the greatest risk lies. He said:

Under present conditions, having regard in particular to the state of inflationary expectations and to the strength of the underlying demand factors—

I think these were indicated to some degree in the statistics for proposed capital expenditures brought out by the leader of the New Democratic Party.

—both in the private and public sector, I believe that there is no doubt that the most serious risks lie in allowing inflationary pressures to regain strength.

Perhaps no one has made this crucial point quite as clearly or quite as bluntly as the financial spokesman for the Progressive Conservative party. Speaking during a meeting of the Commons Finance Committee last November 4, the hon. member made clear his own deep concern about the problem of inflation. While he critically questioned some of the measures we had adopted to meet this problem, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) underlined the danger of failing to persist in our efforts. He said:

If the national effort results in an underkill on this score it will be far worse than the overkill; because if we have a national underkill in this fight against inflation we will have to start all over, and I think the square of zero is going to be much further back again.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Hon. members will recall that only last February this same Commons Finance Committee made a strong recommendation, and I quote:

—that there be no relaxation of current monetary and fiscal policy until it results in a distinct deceleration in the rate of increase in the elements of cost, particularly incomes, and in prices.

Even though there have been some encouraging signs of progress, we still have not reached the point where there has been a clear slowing down in the rise of costs and prices. Nevertheless, there are those who now urge us to reverse the thrust of our monetary and fiscal policies and to promote full-scale economic expansion—in other words, to abandon the fight against inflation. If we were to follow this course, there would undoubtedly be some temporary decrease in unemployment. But we would also court the extreme risk of unleashing new and stronger inflationary pressures that eventually would create havoc in our economy and result in far greater unemployment than that we are now experiencing.

There are those both inside and outside the House who have contended, however, that it is possible to have our cake and eat it too, who have contended it is possible to promote maximum economic growth while at the same time overcoming inflation. When we debated the issue in the House of Commons last February, for example, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) suggested that the problem would somehow be magically solved by the government laying down voluntary wage and price guidelines.

I seriously question whether anything would be accomplished, on balance, by the government proclaiming guidelines which it was quite unable to enforce in any comprehensive way, particularly if the present fiscal and monetary restraints were removed. Contrary to the inference of the Leader of the Opposition, the government has strongly supported the efforts of the Prices and Incomes Commission to develop national support for the exercise of voluntary restraint.

Another alternative that has been proposed by the New Democratic Party, and an hon. gentleman in the other place, is that the government go beyond present efforts to achieve voluntary restraint and instead impose sweeping price and income controls on the economy. Speaking in the House during the February debate, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) contended that, as he put it, "we are suffering from managed and administered prices in the most important areas of the economy and they no longer respond to the broad fiscal and monetary policy." Unlike the gentleman in the other place who spoke about the influence of market power in raising costs and prices, the member for York South made no reference to the strong market power exercised also by certain segments of organized labour.

There is little doubt that the lack of perfect competition in our economy and the degree of market power that can be exercised both by certain companies and certain unions aggravate the problem of bringing inflation under control. It should be noted, however, that the increase in prices in the durable goods industries has been significantly less than in other sectors of the economy, even though this is an area where there is a potential for the exercise of market power. Conversely, some of the greatest price increases have taken place in parts of the service sector where the potential for exercising market power is less evident.

Mr. Stanfield: Then why is the government introducing consumer credit controls?

Mr. Benson: While the possibility of being forced to adopt temporary price and income controls under certain conditions cannot be ruled out, such controls would be disruptive to the economy and cause major aggravation to the Canadian people.

Mr. Stanfield: Surely, that is an argument against consumer credit controls.

Mr. Benson: I was talking about price and wage controls.

Mr. Stanfield: I was saying that the minister's remarks were an argument against consumer credit controls.

Mr. Benson: My hon. friend can argue against almost anything.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): At least he can put up an argument, instead of talking the drivel the minister is talking.

Mr. Benson: Furthermore, unless a host of other measures were also adopted, such controls would have only a limited effect in containing the inflationary forces in the economy generated from abroad. And certainly controls over prices, wages, salaries and other forms of income are not an adequte long-term solution to the ever-present threat of inflation that will face an economy expanding close to the limits of its growth potential. In addition, Mr. Speaker, it is important to note that the proposal for price and income controls urged on us by the New Democratic Party does not even have the backing of the Canadian Labour Congress.

In the brief which it presented to the Cabinet on March 23, the Congress observed that the Prices and Incomes Commission had indicated its intention, in the CLC's words, "In effect to exclude from its price reviews all business firms in Canada except a very tiny minority whom it would regard as being in a position to exercise major market power."

Commenting on the position of the Commission, the Congress brief asserted:

> All of this is perfectly understandable. It would require a huge government bureaucracy, which would be politically unacceptable (except under wartime conditions), as well as physically impossible to set up in time to monitor a broad range of price increases in 1970.

For its own part, the Labour Congress expressed its concern over inflation, but offered no alternative means of resolving the problem other than through the dismal one of recession. "Wages and profits," the brief maintained, "are heavily influenced by the business cycle, with profits taking the lead and wages lagging behind when the economy emerges from a recession". "On the other hand," the CLC continued, "when the economy begins to turn downward, profits, again being a leading indicator, are the first to decline, followed shortly after by a decline in the rate of wage increases."

The hon. member for York South, Mr Speaker, has accused the government of being hidebound by doctrinaire orthodoxy. I wonder how he would describe the views of his friends in the labour movement about the inevitability of recessions and the necessity of relying on such a harsh cure for inflation. Over the last decade, one of our foremost objectives has been to break with this boom-and-bust pattern of the past and instead seek to maintain strong but stable economic growth. I may point out that this is the course that has been repeatedly recommended by the Economic Council of Canada in successive reports signed by the representatives of organized labour who are members of that body.

In its last Annual Review published in September, 1969, the Council concluded that "fiscal policy in Canada has, for the most part, operated at a setting more consistently appropriate to underlying economic developments since the mid-1960s than has been the case in the United States." In this same context, the Council cautioned that under the circumstances existing at the time further fiscal and monetary restraint—and the operative word is 'further'—could conceivably result simply in higher rates of unemployment and economic slack with no more than a marginal effect on current rates of cost and price increases.

I would point out in this regard that not only has the government not increased the degree of restraint in the interval, but in fact moderately eased that restraint through the budget which I introduced in the House last month. Were we to allow the economy to fall into the kind of recession that the leaders of the Canadian Labour Congress appear to consider inevitable, it is probable that the inflationary spiral would be broken fairly quickly. But as a nation, we would pay dearly in terms of heavy unemployment and lost incomes. To follow the other course, that of seeking gradually to ease the inflationary pressures reverberating through the economy while continuing to maintain reasonable growth necessarily takes much more time and patience.

There are a few hopeful, if still only tentative, signs that these inflationary pressures may be easing. During the last two months the rise in consumer, wholesale and industrial prices appears to have levelled off. During March, the rise in consumer prices represented an increase at an annual rate of 2.4 per cent, compared to the year-to-year increase in the index during 1969 of 4.5 per cent. At the same time, some interest rates have declined significantly from the high levels reached at the turn of the year.

Against these developments must be set the fact that inflationary pressures apparently continue to remain strong in the United States. During March, the U.S. Consumer Price Index rose by half a percentage point and stood 6.1 per cent above the level a year earlier, compared to the year-to-year increase in Canada for the same month of 4.6 per cent.

[Mr. Benson.]

• (4:30 p.m.)

In its brief to the cabinet, the Canadian Labour Congress maintained that the restraints imposed on the economy by the government would soon have an appreciable dampening effect on the rate of wage increases in Canada this year. But in his recent Toronto speech, the Governor of the Bank of Canada pointed out that the average pattern of recent collective bargaining settlements indicate we are continuing to build into the economy average annual wage increases of more than 8 per cent. "These rates of pay increases," he said, "are obviously far in excess of the average productivity growth in our economy and are not compatible with a movement towards price stability."

Because of these kinds of developments at home and abroad, it is obvious that no swift and dramatic results can be expected in our battle against inflation. Diverting the economy from its inflationary course and back to a path of stable growth will, as I said before, take time and patience. Although this policy is not dramatic, it represents a more innovative approach to dealing with the problem of inflation than we have ever followed before in Canada and one that over the long haul is in the best interests of all Canadians.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words about this motion sponsored by my leader. I quote part of the motion:

That this House condemns the government's arrogant acceptance of recession-level unemployment—

I think that is well worded. All we have to do is look across this House at "Trudeau baby". We see arrogance there all the time. As soon as someone asks a question concerning unemployment, the "old shrugger" shrugs his shoulders and either will not give an answer or gives a crazy answer. He will not come down to earth. I continue to quote the motion:

—in slow-growth areas of Canada and cost of living hardships—

Ask the housewives of Canada if they have a cost of living hardship. What is their dollar worth?

—while dogmatically continuing discredited policies—

Instead of the word "dogmatically", I would have used the words stubbornly and stupidly.

—that have failed to put the national economy on a non-inflationary upward course.

I would have liked to say a few words with regard to the remarks of the previous speaker, but I have other comments to make. However, may I say to the previous speaker, through Your Honour: Ben, get down to earth. Get with the ordinary people. Get out of your ivory tower. Don't let yourself be swayed by academics, fuzzy-wuzzies and the professorial types who surround you. You think everything is fine. You think that all is well in God's heaven and on God's earth.

An hon. Member: They even write his speeches.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): I didn't say that. You have gained the impression that everything is great, that the increase in unemployment is only moderate.

An hon. Member: You can live on $30 a week.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Unfortunately, the minister still feels that anyone in Canada can live on $30 a week. I suggest he tell some of these stories to those unemployed people who cannot get a job and are finding it most difficult to support their families. Many members receive letters daily from the unemployed regarding their problems. I do not intend to go into great detail to reply to the drivel just spouted by the minister. There are others in our party and the NDP who will have no difficulty whatsoever refuting what the minister has said.

The degree of the heartlessness of this government is best exemplified by an article that appeared in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald on Thursday, April 23 which contained unemployment figures, province by province, for the Atlantic region. The unemployment figure in Newfoundland stood at 15.3 per cent of the labour force. This would be a shocking rate of unemployment for an under developed nation. However it is the rate of unemployment in a province of Canada that has a Prime Minister who based his drive to the leadership of the Liberal party and the election campaign that followed, on regional economic disparity and the elimination of same. This indicates the degree of gross incompetence of the government in its handling of national affairs.

Last week the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) said in Toronto that regional economic disparity is the number one problem facing this nation. He finally wakened and found out what the problem was. The Prime Minister told us that in 1968. Then, he undertook a campaign to create unemployment in all areas of this country, including those facing regional economic disparity. The end result is unemployment, hardship, misery and heartache, coupled with frustration for the people who live in the underprivileged areas of this nation. Now, roughly two years after the general election, the government has discovered that its heartlessness has neither solved the problem of inflation nor the gut problem of chronic unemployment. What we find instead of the elimination of regional economic disparity is a more severe degree of unemployment in certain areas of this nation than has ever been the case before.

This government has discovered its policies to be disastrous and devastatingly damaging to the labour force of this nation. There is no good news in Ottawa. There has been no good news in Ottawa for the working men of this country. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) grins and smiles. He had a lot of good things for the Lapalme employees and for the other union people of this country. This shows what he would do if he had full sway in this country as far as the working people and the unions are concerned. He sits and smiles. He sneers. He has probably never been unemployed and probably does not know what it is to pound the streets looking for employment.

The Prime Minister has proven himself to be a calloused, heartless and disinterested observer of the plight of the working man. No man holding the office of Prime Minister has been willing to say "no" to the working man as quickly and as often as this Prime Minister, the great friend of labour. Where is the just society? It has gone out the window. When speaking at Carleton University a few weeks ago he said, hush, hush, let's forget about it. Don't mention it again. It is to be put away until he finds a new slogan or cliché for another election. It has been long forgotten by this over-fifty swinger.

An unemployment rate of 15.3 per cent in Newfoundland means that some of the areas of that province must be suffering from a degree of unemployment that will exceed 25 per cent of the labour force. This is the Canada of today under this Prime Minister. This is the Canada two years after the just society became the hallmark of the Trudeau administration. This is the Canada of participatory democracy—the Prime Minister coined that phrase; actually he stole it from an American election campaign—where you can participate in everything but gainful employment.

Unfortunately for the working man, the statistics for Newfoundland do not improve when you leave that province. Indeed, the labour force of New Brunswick discovered that 11.8 per cent of its members cannot find employment. In Prince Edward Island, 9.7 per cent of the labour force find themselves in the same position. Nova Scotia holds the lowest figure standing at 7.7 per cent. While unemployment in this country is a federal responsibility, I feel that the aggressive activities of the government of Nova Scotia have had something to do with the fact that their unemployment rate is the lowest of all the Atlantic provinces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): In the Atlantic region, 10.8 per cent of the labour force is unemployed. The President of the Treasury Board seems to be muttering and mumbling. If he has anything to say that is encouraging for the unemployed of this country, I will be glad to let him have the floor after I finish my speech. He can then state all the wonderful things he is offering to the unemployed of this country. Let's hope this great union lover comes out with a good story, an encompassing exposé, stating what he and the government intend to do for the unemployed. I know he has a soft spot in that flintstone heart of his for the labour movement.

• (4:40 p.m.)

It was once a cornerstone of Liberal manpower policy to assert that an unemployment rate of 5 per cent indicated the nation was feeling the severe effects of a recession. Today, the figure stands at 6.7 yet the government continues to tolerate and, indeed, to bring about rising unemployment as part of its policy to check inflation. It intends to continue this policy even if it means that every man in the country is out of work. It is placing the burden of the fight against inflation on the backs of the half million men and women who are unemployed. And, in my opinion, the figure of 542,000 which has been suggested is, in reality, closer to 600,000, because I do not believe we are getting a true picture of the actual number of the unemployed; so many have become disgusted after going so often to manpower offices and hearing there are no jobs available. The people who staff the manpower offices cannot help the situation. They are willing to do their best, but there is no employment to offer.

The determination of the Trudeau administration to conquer inflation regardless of the unemployment statistics is exemplified by the stubbornness displayed by the Prime Minister daily in this House. He takes advice from no one but himself and the working man of this country has discovered that his adviser is a damn poor mentor.

Advice has been freely given by my leader as to the way in which inflation can be conquered without placing the burden on the shoulders of the unemployed. Advice has been given by all the candidates for premier, or, should I say, prime minister, in the province of Quebec, including Robert Bourassa, the Liberal leader. And this advice is significantly different from the policy presently being followed by this government. Advice has been offered by economists who have not reverted to the economic philosophy of the 1930's as to how both inflation and unemployment can be checked. But the government hears no one, sees no one and does nothing but create greater unemployment with each passing day.

Have we now arrived at the point at which the economy is out of control and out of the hands of the government manipulators? Are we heading into the worst recession this country has faced since the dirty thirties? These are questions which must be answered in the very near future by both the Prime Minister and his Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), to say nothing of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) and the Minister of Manpower (Mr. MacEachen) who, with the President of Treasury Board are supposed to be the great friends of the working man. All we have received from the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Manpower are flowery words that put neither money in the pockets of the working man, nor bread in his lunch pail. Flower power has failed, but maybe if we listen to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) we will go to pot.

The only place in Canada where unemployment is not a problem is in the Prime Minister's office. Each day we pick up the paper and see the Prime Minister has added another manipulator to his staff, until we realise he has an army of personal procrastinators at an annual cost in excess of $800,000. I am sure that if he continues to get his way, this will be the only army Canada will have.

If the government, even at this late date, really believes that regional economic disparity is the number one problem facing the nation, which I believe to be a fact, then let it look at projects such as the Prince Edward Island causeway. They spent millions to have a candidate turn over a sod the day before the election, and I think the Auditor General had something to say about that. However, the government intends to fix him in some way, to put him out of a job.

An hon. Member: One more unemployed.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): There is the Prince Edward Island causeway or the harnessing of the Bay of Fundy tides to provide power, the type of project which would immediately employ the labour force of the Atlantic region.

We live in an age when statistics are passed out by government agencies, defended when confronted by other statistics, checked by a computer lest a mistake has been made and our slip is showing. Then, they are filed and forgotten. Not only the statistics are filed and forgotten, but also the stories of human tragedy which lie behind those cold and seemingly meaningless statistics.

We talk of 6 per cent unemployment; we talk of 6.5 or 6.7 and we can quote statistics of up to 20 or 25 per cent. But does anyone on the government side stop to think and say: Twenty per cent unemployed? Why, that means one in every five is out of work. One in every five is walking the streets. One in five is facing problems the like of which few of us can comprehend during these days of affluence and plenty. It is the tragedy of Canada in 1970—in the so-called "Just Society". What is the government's attitude to this tragedy? It can be summed up, I think, in the remarks of a man who said, some years ago:

> I have known people to stop and buy an apple on the corner and then walk away as if they had solved the whole unemployment problem.

Maybe the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene), though still youthful in appearance, can remember those days when people tried to earn a living by selling apples on street corners. Few of us can comprehend the thinking which has led to unemployment on its present scale in the era of the just society—

An hon. Member: The age of Aquarius.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Yes, the age of Aquarius. And the age of the rule of the millionaires in the cabinet of Canada.

Mr. Drury: How did I get into it?

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): The government does not give a damn about creating unemployment. Indeed, it is using unemployment as its chief weapon in the fight against inflation. We raise our hands in horror when we hear of troops herding innocent villagers before them to take the bullets of the enemy. This country should raise its hands in horror that the government of the day is herding innocent citizens before it to take the brunt of inflation. It is true these people will not die physically. But for many life will not longer have meaning. Their agonies will be the cries of their children who must be deprived of some of the very basic necessities of life when they are surrounded by plenty. Is this how the government has to fight inflation? No kidding, Mr. Speaker, there must be other ways.

The Prime Minister of Canada has said he can live with 6 per cent unemployment, and he will not worry. How much different is this statement by the Prime Minister from the voice of yesteryear, that old cliché that still applies, "Let them eat cake"? Do the Prime Minister and his colleagues, his "millionaires row", really know what it is like to walk the streets despairingly looking for work, knowing that all doors are closed; that you are possibly too old at 40; that "sloppy Joes" and spaghetti will be the nearest you will get to a sumptuous feast; that your kids will have to go without shoes even if the ones they have are pinching or full of holes; that those same kids will be denied the opportunity of improving their station in life because incentive dies in poverty? Do they really know these things?

• (4:50 p.m.)

Perhaps I am doing him an injustice. We know that the Prime Minister is prepared to sleep with a high rate of unemployment. We also know that unemployment is a painful side effect in the fight against inflation. The Prices and Incomes Commission has issued a pamphlet on this very issue. As the House knows, this Commission is headed up by the man who has received a tan from the television camera lights that are always shining on him; I am referring to Mr. Young.

Mr. Bell: He is like the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Yes, and he is just about as active as far as talking and doing nothing are concerned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired, unless he has unanimous consent to continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. Muir).

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): I wish to thank hon. members of the House for giving me a few moments; I shall not abuse that privilege. This pamphlet to which I was referring contains this paragraph:

> In the meantime, however, it will be difficult to avoid temporary but painful side-effects—higher unemployment and a loss of production affecting every region of Canada.

That is a profound statement! I should know this character who heads up the Prices and Incomes Commission because I have seen him so often on television. He really has a job for himself. He is going to make up the Canadian content for television that Pierre Juneau is going to enforce before too long. Let us have some action from him. Let him do something as head of the Prices and Incomes Commission. I would appreciate it if this great wonder from the west would really do something apart from making these unrealistic speeches of his in which he damns labour. The government, of course, does the same thing. Every opportunity they get they damn labour and the unions. They have no time for either. The same policy is being followed by this Commission.

With regard to this statement by the Commission, I should like to ask to whom these side-effects are going to be painful. Are they going to be painful to Mr. Young, or to the Prime Minister, or to the cabinet ministers of this government? No, they are not. Higher unemployment will not affect them. I suppose the government wishes the unemployed to tell their children, when they ask for shoes and for the bare necessities of life, to adopt the motto of Mr. Young and company, which I suggest should be hung up on the wall so these children can see it when they are trying to get themselves a meal.

There is criticism throughout the country of this government's rigid policy which has brought many areas to the brink of recession. The Fredericton Daily Gleaner for April 20 had this to say:

> In the Atlantic provinces, where the unemployment rate has for decades been greater than that of the rest of the nation, the policy of economic restraint is pushing unemployment to intolerable levels.

[Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys).]

> There are, moreover, increasing doubts that policies which tend to reduce production can really be the right remedy for inflation, which by definition is a condition in which demand exceeds supply or "too many dollars chasing too few goods." The flaw in the remedy is particularly obvious in areas like the Atlantic provinces where production standards and totals were already below rational or acceptable standards.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I am a long way from being an economist, but I always felt that inflation could be defeated without creating massive unemployment. It would appear that economists throughout the country agree. The President of the Treasury Board smiles. He does not really seem to be upset about unemployment, and this is the traditional attitude of the government; they are not too excited about it. I would ask the President of the Treasury Board to consider the thinking of these economists who have stated that it is not necessary to have unemployment to fight inflation.

I make that appeal to the minister. I suppose my words will fall on deaf ears, but I am told that the minister has a lot of influence in the cabinet. Certainly, he must have some influence in crushing labour unions and working hardships on labour, so I presume he must have some influence among the seats of power in the government. Therefore, I appeal to the government to cease this headlong plunge into policies which I feel cannot but bring hardship to the unemployed of this country and their dependants.

Having started on this downward spiral, how are we going to stop it? I observe in the House this afternoon the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. Flemming) who, as the House knows, was formerly the premier of the province of New Brunswick. When a previous Liberal government instituted a tight money policy, one of their many infamous policies, he asked the then federal government with regard to the policies it was applying, if a man had 10 children—and we have ten provinces in Canada—and he had to apply a remedy to fight a case of constipation, would he give all of his children a dose of castor oil? Would he treat them all the same? This seems to be the remedy that the government is applying right across the country from Newfoundland to British Columbia. In some of the underprivileged areas of Canada, such as in the Atlantic provinces, portions of Quebec, parts of the west and Ontario, this remedy would not have any effect.

One is all right, of course, if one lives in that stretch between Windsor, Toronto and Montreal, close to the United States border, where building is going on all the time and there appears to be plenty of jobs. But this is not the case in western Canada or in eastern Canada, so why does the government make all of the people across Canada suffer under these crude, cruel policies?

Mr. E. B. Osler (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I did not have the privilege or opportunity of listening to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) when he introduced this motion. Indeed, I can only assume that it was the Leader of the Opposition who introduced the motion since it is in his name. Unfortunately, I had to be out of the House at the time. I do not know what he said, but I feel that the wording of the motion is particularly unfortunate.

The hon. gentleman condemns this government's "arrogant acceptance of recession-level unemployment". There is nothing arrogant about the government accepting recession-level unemployment. As usual with this party across the way, the hon. gentleman confuses the central problem of unemployment with the fight against inflation. He ties the whole thing together and assumes that there is an arrogant acceptance of a dreadful situation. It is too bad because whenever you are dealing with people who are out of work you should not treat that situation lightly; it is something to consider as seriously as possible in order to try and find remedies. It always has been thus.

• (5:00 p.m.)

This government, like any other government, could certainly use intelligent guidance. So far, it has received none.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): You can say that again.

Mr. Osler: So far it has received none this afternoon. That is only a minor qualification, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bell: How about the speech by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson)?

Mr. Osler: I heard that one. I thought it was a pretty fair speech anyway. Unfortunately, the problem of unemployment has been with us for too long, and it has nothing to do with inflation. What about 1938 and 1939, the figures for which were given in the House the other day in another exchange, when 18.6 per cent of the people were unemployed?

An hon. Member: Under a Liberal government.

Mr. Osler: It may have been a Liberal government but that was at a time of great world wide depression.

Mr. Stanfield: What about in 1873?

Mr. Osler: In 1961, the unemployment figure was 11 per cent, and it was not a Liberal government then. In 1968, it was 6.4 per cent, and in March of this year, 1969, it was 6.7 per cent. I would say that to mix the two problems, the fight against inflation and the very serious problem of nagging unemployment, is to do less than a service to the people of Canada in view of the figures I have quoted. In view of these figures, we have to say to ourselves that we have too much unemployment too often.

In 1966, before the fight against inflation had begun, the average annual rate of unemployment was 3.6 per cent, and in 1968 it was 4.8 per cent. It is somewhat more at the moment. Again, I would suggest that this tells us that the problem of inflation is separate from the problem of nagging unemployment, which is brought on either by a great depression like in the 1930's, which God knows we hope will not happen again, or by technological upgrading of the demands on people who are employed. Nowadays people require higher skills, and through no fault of their own the people who are unemployed to a great degree are under educated, at least a great percentage of them. I shall return to what can be done about that later.

There are other special circumstances such as the collapse of the grain market, which has affected Saskatchewan and has put its unemployment figure up 2½ per cent higher this year than it was last year. Presumably lack of confidence in Quebec has put that province's figure up also, although by not nearly as great a percentage as in the case of Saskatchewan. However, inflation, which the government is making a valiant effort to fight, was also one of the causes of the plight in which the Saskatchewan farmer finds himself, and the government is attempting to do something so that he will not continue to be caught in the cost-price squeeze.

I would not like anybody to tell farmers that it is quite all right for the prices of everything they buy to keep on going up and up. The fact is that the poor old farmer has to produce two or three times as much to earn his living, and the result has been that he has grown so much that all the produce cannot be sold. Inflation is not something to be bandied about. If we look at the figures for the past 13 years, Mr. Speaker, we see that since 1958, in Canada as a whole, unemployment in March has equalled or exceeded its present level—I am talking about the unadjusted figures because some people do not seem to understand the implications of the adjusted figures—eight times during those 13 years. In March 1961, it was 11.2 per cent, a lot worse than it is now.

In the Atlantic provinces as a whole, and I know Newfoundland has had the worst experience of all of them, in ten of the last 13 years the unemployment situation was worse than it is today. In the Atlantic provinces in March, 1958, the unemployment figure was 19.8 per cent. I am not bandying these figures around in order to get the government out from under its responsibilities, but I am trying to say it is dishonest to couple the fight against inflation with the fight against unemployment. These figures prove the exact reverse, that unemployment is a thing that has been here for a great deal longer than the fight against inflation has been in progress.

It does not appear that the fight against inflation has caused much unemployment in the areas that are most in trouble at the moment, but the figures do suggest that regional economic expansion and manpower retraining policies have been badly needed for a long time, and are still badly needed, and that they are appropriate to getting—

Mr. Lundrigan: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Osler: When I have finished my speech I shall be glad to accept a question from the hon. member. The policies that the government is trying to follow in the areas of manpower training and regional expansion are an honest attempt to get at the root causes that have been there for a long time, and which still persist today. It is perfectly fine for members of the opposition parties to say that the particular way in which the government is attacking these problems is something with which they disagree. That is their privilege and prerogative, but I resent their suggestion that there is something sinister, arrogant or what have you about what the government is doing, or that the government is doing nothing.

I would like to repeat what other people have said, that the choice is not between inflation and unemployment, it is between the level of unemployment that we have now and the level that we will have if we do not fight inflation. The situation we have got now is bad and we have to improve it. We are trying to improve it. If we do not persist in the fight against inflation it will get a hundred times worse, and as we price ourselves out of world markets we will have nowhere to sell anything. We depend on world markets to a greater extent than many other countries.

The timing of the use of controls to fight inflation again is an area where people may have genuine differences of opinion. It is perfectly honest and honourable for someone to say, "Now is the time to take them off," or "Now is the time to put them on." As the Minister of Finance pointed out, the Conservative party financial critic last November was saying his worry was not about what the Minister of Finance was doing, but about what he might not do. He was advocating, "Don't underkill. Don't take off your restrictions. Don't stop this fight against inflation." That was only in November. He may feel differently today, I do not know; he has not said. But my point is that it is a matter of an honest difference of opinion between people who are frankly looking at the situation and trying to see what can be done about it. But again there is nothing arrogant, deceptive or dogmatic about the way this government is conducting this fight.

I know that people find it difficult to accept adjusted and unadjusted figures. If you compare things annually, there is no need to use adjusted figures, and I have not done so until this moment. If you compare things on a less than an annual basis, you have to use adjusted figures in order to get a fair comparison. This is perhaps open to question, but Mr. Braithwaite of the Globe and Mail in his "Report on Business" wrote on April 23—

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Why don't you quote from a Wall Street journal?

Mr. Osler: —that of all the unemployed at present—which I agree is too high a figure and usually is too high—perhaps 12,000 are out of work because of the inflationary policy, and the rest are out of work because of regional problems, seasonal problems, etc. I suggest again that we do ourselves no service by sloughing over the regional and seasonal problems. In my own part of the world, all building used to come to an end in the winter time. I do not know where we got our know-how, perhaps from visiting Russia where they have been doing it for years; but people have learned how to carry on building in the winter time so now there is a reasonable pace of construction in Winnipeg in winter. Construction workers are not laid off automatically as soon as winter arrives, like they used to be.

We have to conquer problems of that sort if we are ever to get away from this seasonally adjusted employment. Recently, at a meeting of the mayors of municipalities, the conclusion was reached that urban unemployment was caused by the fight against inflation. I look upon that conclusion with suspicion, unless they had later figures than have been available so far, because in their outlook for 1970 the Dominion Bureau of Statistics stated that the total capital spending intentions for the current year appear to be a 7 per cent increase to about $17.6 billion, which would include some price inflation. Thus, it seems to me that the statistics provide no evidence that the slowdown in capital investment has contributed to rising unemployment in urban areas generally.

The particular mayor who made that statement is the Mayor of Saskatoon. It is possible he has a very serious problem because of conditions in Saskatchewan; but again I say, le us not confuse his problem with the fight against inflation. Let us get to the root of the matter which is to secure world markets for the produce which western farmers have been growing in the expectation they could sell anything they could grow. This survey by DBS showed that the Atlantic provinces expected a 6 per cent increase in capital spending; Quebec, about 6 per cent; British Columbia, about 14 per cent; and the prairies about the same as before, no increase. So, it does not appear that inflation is the culprit here.

I think it was particularly tragic, in view of the association that the New Democratic Party has with labour movements, that Mr. Walter Reuther should have made such a blunt and critical attack upon the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) at a recent meeting in the United States. In the first place, as a Canadian, I find it very annoying to hear a man, whether he is a labour union leader, a capitalist or a functionary in the government of a foreign country, make a personal attack on the Prime Minister of my country. If I were a member of another party, I would feel the same way. The Prime Minister of our country is our Prime Minister no matter of what party he is a member, at present and I do not like to hear foreigners criticizing him.

I took the trouble to look up a few facts in relation to this attack and I find that whoever advised Mr. Reuther misinformed him. One of the allegations he made was that the Prime Minister deliberately attempted to cut down health and welfare programs and to somehow or other undermine provincial efforts in this direction. Again, the figures prove this not to be so. In this year's estimates we have $156 million new dollars going into fiscal transfers, $95 million new dollars into hospitals, $70 million into medicare, $49 million into post secondary education, $38 million into the Canada Assistance Plan; and there are increases in regular federal programs that are very close to health and welfare such as regional economic expansion, Indian affairs, and manpower development, which amount to $135 million or $140 million. So, the next time an important foreign labour leader—who has, I think, in many ways done a very fine job for his own people—starts sounding off about our Prime Minister, I hope he takes care that he gets better information.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): He is telling the truth.

Mr. Osler: I do not know how one can bang this into some people's heads. I have made my point by giving figures, and yet I hear someone say that what the man said was true. It seems very difficult. However, the facts will be on the record.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): A working man like you knows all about labour.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Osler) has the floor.

Mr. Osler: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I consider that some people work in some ways, other people work in other ways, and some people happen to be employed at the moment and others are not. The hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys and I, luckily, both happen to be employed at present; so his remark was irrelevant if it was personal.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): I was unemployed many times under the Grits.

Mr. Osler: You are having better luck this time.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): The people see to that.

Mr. Osler: On manpower retraining, which I think is the long term guts of this situation—

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): But you ain't got it.

Mr. Osler: —there is a similar trend. In 1969, 320,000 people were retrained. One can assume that a large degree of unemployment is caused by the fact that people do not happen to be sufficiently competent to take the sophisticated jobs that they are required to take today. It is nobody's fault, it just happens that people are required to do more exacting tasks in this changing age than they used to do. Last year, thanks to manpower training programs, 320,000 people were retrained.

In the Atlantic provinces $55 per head of the labour force was spent and it diminishes to $20 in British Columbia. But right across Canada between $20 and $55—that is the scale—was spent on manpower training per head of the labour force last year. One can argue that this is insufficient and one can demand that the government spend more. This is a perfectly legitimate demand; but do not say that the government is not trying, because it is simply not true.

Some 55 per cent of the trainees were unemployed when they started their training. About $100,000 of the money that was spent was spent on those who were unemployed and living below the poverty line. About 43 per cent of the trainees had grade 8 or less education, and 22,000 had less than grade 6 education. How can one expect a man to gain a living wage if he has less than grade 6 education, unless he is a natural genius and there are not too many of them?

So manpower retraining is on the right track. This year the government will spend $273 million to train adult workers.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but it appears that his time has expired. He can only continue with unanimous agreement.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think this great dissertation should be continued. I am sure we all agree on that. Maybe the hon. member will say something shortly.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member appears to have some kind of agreement which will allow him to continue beyond his allotted time.

[Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys).]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. Osler: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank hon. members for allowing me to continue. I shall be only a moment. Eighty per cent of the 8,000 students who were retrained under manpower retraining courses last year, and whose progress was followed, obtained jobs within three months after completing their courses, as against 41 per cent of the people who had not taken the course. The income of the retrained people had increased by approximately $55 a month within that three month period. So, I would say that the government is not being cynical and not being indifferent.

An hon. Member: It is being incompetent.

Mr. Osler: Being composed of human beings, any government may make mistakes. Any government does some things which are wrong. I have lived through times when governments that were not Liberal governed, and the country managed to survive. So, you cannot say this government is arrogant, callous, indifferent and does not give a damn.

An hon. Member: Oh, no?

Mr. Osler: Anyone would be stupid to say so. For heaven's sake, how does any politician hope to be re-elected if he makes no effort to help people and do things for people? The hon. member's arguments are specious and I was disappointed that they were the best arguments that could be raised on an allotted opposition day.

Manpower retraining is doing a good job. It ought to be accelerated; it may well have to be re-evaluated, changed and if possible made better. The government's regional economic program is only just beginning to roll in high gear and is only starting to have a meaningful effect. It will be some time before we can be sure we are on the right track this time.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): In the meantime, we are starving to death.

Mr. Osler: We hope the program will bring about the desired results. Regional economic development must continue; there must be greater accent on regional economic expansion. Perhaps, since I come from a region that is relatively unfortunate when compared with certain areas of the central and western provinces, I may be excused for saying that perhaps we ought to look at the power structure itself. Perhaps we ought to look at constitutional reform. I believe in this country from the bottom of my heart, but perhaps the constitution ought to be taken apart, examined closely and perhaps altered a bit. My part of the world could have been considered a colony 100 years ago, but now it is a viable economic entity of its own. The people there feel that the ground rules may well need to be changed somewhat in the second 100 years of their participation in confederation. Theirs are legitimate hopes and aspirations.
