CHAPTER XXVIII.
IN CALM WATER.

Allan was now lord of Redhills both by his father's will and by the right of his wife. Old people on the country side were saying 'he'd never make such a man as his grand-father'; middle-aged people substituted 'father' for 'grandfather'; while young people readily expressed their opinion that 'he'd lick the lot'. No doubt his father was similarly commented upon when he succeeded to the inheritance which had cost him so much to keep. However, in a very few days after Philip Bourcier's death people talked of Allan as Mr. Bourcier, of Redhills. The titles of the dead prince fit the new one very naturally.

Redhills was without a prince as present. It is in the hands of servants. Mr. Bourcier is at Shortlands with the best people while Allan, Francis and Josephine are at a watering place in Devonshire. Francis is convalescent, and will very soon be quieted to health. To Allan she is looking more lovely than ever, although, terrible as it seems to have to record the fact in connection with her, she wears a wig. But the most beautiful of women is obliged to wear a wig, and she is no exception. A quarter of an inch in length; and Miss. Françoise, with her experience, may be trusted to have selected a becoming one. These visits to the water cure and the good looking young man—a great puzzle to the inhabitants of the quiet little watering place who were selected to sojourn there on the last day of the season. The ladies and the young man they might be a newly married couple, had not the companionship of the third lady and the fact that the early part of the season was said otherwise. Yet the two first never seemed tired of each other's society. No husband and wife in the first flush of the honeymoon could have been more wrapped up in each other than they were. The early summer days went by, and each day the look of retaining health grew more apparent on Francis's face, while Josephine, free and at ease, began to look much like a spoiled, toned-down edition of the girl of eighteen, before she listened to the specious words of a rascal, and nearly wrecked the whole of her life.

But now the particulars of George Manders's end were known. Although the manner of his death made her shudder, Josephine could never commit the hypocrisy of pretending to regret him. To have wept or lamented for the man who for the last few years had made her life almost a hell, would have been to confess to a confession that, after years of labor, after the brief term of uncheeked success, now to be called upon to give up fame and her art.

She looked her face on her hands, and the tears forced themselves through her cold fingers. Her thoughts were very bitter ones. So few women are able by their own gifts and exertions to attain to such a position as hers had been, that her distress can scarcely be wondered at. She cherished no false hopes; all along she felt this was coming—felt so certain of it that until now she had shunned the trial. Now she had reached the worst. This, then, was the end of that famous career she had promised herself!

She went to her writing case and drew out a letter. It was from her friend the manager, expressing sincere, if not interested hopes that she would soon be well enough to return to her professional duties; also that the change in her husband's condition would induce her to abandon at the outset what promised to be the most glorious artistic career of the present day.

The manager, if the truth were known, was having a bad time of it, so far as Miss Françoise was concerned. He considered it very doubtful whether the wife of Bourcier, of Redhills, a country magnate, with ten thousand a year, would be allowed to treat the boards again. The only way of bringing this about was by appealing to her ambition. If he succeeded in inducing her to return, he would be a greater hit than ever. He was a shrewd man, and had studied that 'big stupid,' as Thackeray called the public, for many years.

This she must answer. It would not do to assert on her own authority that her voice had failed her; so she wrote begging that the eminent specialist, who had once before attended her, might be sent down into Devonshire the next day. And her request made the manager's heart sink into his boots.

Having written her letter, she joined Allan and his sister, and spent the rest of the day in the usual way. He had swept away every trace of her distress, but she would tell Allan nothing of the discovery she had made until the doctor's visit had been paid. Then she would accept her fate and murmur not. After all, it was not a very hard lot.

When they were sick, we gave her Castoria. When she was a child, she cried for Castoria. When she became Miss, she clung to Castoria. When she had children, she gave them Castoria.

A Bad Cold
If not speedily relieved, may lead to serious issues. Where there is difficulty of breathing, expectoration, or cough, or of the chest and bronchial tubes, with a constant rattling cough, the very best remedy is Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. It removes the phlegm, soothes irritation, stops coughing, and induces repose. As an emergency medicine, Ayer's Cherry Pectoral should be in every household.

CURED BY
Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. I have my life—GEO. B. HUNTER, Gosport, N. S.
"About a year ago I took the worst cold that ever was had, followed by a terrible cough. The best medical aid was of no avail. Last I began to spit blood, when it was supposed to be all over with me. Every remedy failed, till a neighbor recommended Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. I took a teaspoonful of this medicine, three times a day, regularly, and very soon began to improve. My cough left me, my sleep was undisturbed, my appetite improved, my emaciated limbs gained flesh and strength, and to-day, I am as well as ever. I am a well man."—H. A. BROWN, St. John's, N. B.
