House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Thursday, November 7, 1940.

SECOND SESSION—NINETEENTH PARLIAMENT—OPENING

The parliament which had been prorogued on the fifth day of November, 1940, met this day at Ottawa, for the dispatch of business.

The house met at three o'clock, the Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Speaker read a communication from the Governor General's secretary, announcing that His Excellency the Governor General would proceed to the Senate chamber at three p.m. on this day, for the purpose of formally opening the session of the dominion parliament.

A message was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And the house having returned to the Commons chamber:

OATHS OF OFFICE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 1, respecting the administration of oaths of office.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that when the house did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

Since last you met for deliberation, all countries have come to have a clearer conception of the magnitude of the present conflict and its menace to civilization. Additional nations have been threatened with war, or have become involved in war. But little of freedom is now left in Europe. Force and fear have been supplemented by subtle intrigue. International tension has been heightened by the formation of an alliance between the axis powers and Japan.

While these events have added enormously to the uncertainties of the world situation, other events of even greater significance have served to confirm our confidence in the ultimate outcome of the struggle. First and foremost has been the magnificent resistance of the United Kingdom. For four months, Britain has constituted the front line of battle against the forces of aggression. The spectacular advance of the enemy has been halted by the indomitable spirit of her people.

The destruction of freedom throughout Europe has awakened, in the western hemisphere, a fuller consciousness of the nazi menace. In the face of the common peril there has arisen a closer association and an increasing measure of cooperation between the United States of America and the nations of the British commonwealth.

You have been summoned at this time that opportunity may be afforded for the fullest consideration and discussion of Canada's war effort and of national problems which war has served to intensify or create. You will be fully advised of international developments; of Canada's cooperation with the United Kingdom, and of relations with the United States. The measures which will be submitted to you are such as seem necessary to my advisers for the welfare of the country, and for the prosecution of the war to the utmost of our strength.

Members of the House of Commons:

You will be asked to make financial provision for expenditure caused by the state of war which now exists. The estimates for the current fiscal year will be duly submitted to you for your consideration and approval.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

In the discharge of your very responsible duties may Divine Providence guide and bless your deliberations.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both houses of parliament be taken into consideration on Friday next, and that this order have precedence over all other business except the introduction of bills, government notices of motion and government orders, until disposed of.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING COMMITTEES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a special committee be appointed to prepare and report with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the standing committees of this house, under standing order 63, said committee to be composed of Messrs. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre), Casgrain, Casselman (Grenville-Dundas), Taylor and Johnston (Bow River).

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) presented the following message from His Excellency the Governor General:

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons a certified copy of an approved minute of council appointing the Honourable T. A. Crerar, Minister of Mines and Resources, the Right Honourable Ernest Lapointe, Minister of Justice, the Honourable J. L. Ralston, Minister of National Defence, and the Honourable J. L. Ilsley, Minister of Finance, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons as commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of chapter 145 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, intituled An Act Respecting the House of Commons.

WAR MEASURES ACT

TABLING OF ORDERS IN COUNCIL PASSED SINCE JUNE 30, 1940

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, during the preceding session I tabled copies of orders in council which had been passed under authority of the War Measures Act from August 25, 1939, to June 30 of this year. I wish now to lay on the table copies of the orders in council which have been passed since June 30, until November 2.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

PROPOSED CONFERENCE WITH PROVINCES ON RECOMMENDATIONS MADE BY ROYAL COMMISSION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, November 2, I sent in identical terms to each provincial premier a communication respecting the report of the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations. In that communication I mentioned that the government would seek an adjournment of the House of Commons during the month of January in order to permit of the dominion having a conference with the provinces with respect to this report.

In the letter I stated that the report commended itself to the judgment of the government, and that we should like to have an opportunity of presenting our views to the provinces in order that there might be a full consideration of them. I expressed the hope that at that time it might be possible to reach an agreement between the provinces and the dominion with respect to the recommendations contained in the report.

I need not review what I set forth in the communication, but I would suggest that the letter itself might be printed in the votes and proceedings in order that it may appear in the records of the house and that hon. members may be in a position to read the text in full.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is satisfactory.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

TABLING OF COMMUNICATIONS RESPECTING ADJOURNMENT OR PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT ON NOVEMBER 5

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand copies of some communications which passed between the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and myself with respect to adjournment or prorogation of parliament on November 5. My hon. friend is agreeable, as I am, to having these communications tabled. I would suggest that they, too, appear in votes and proceedings, so that hon. members may have an opportunity to read them.

REMEMBRANCE DAY—ADJOURNMENT FOR OBSERVANCE OF STATUTORY HOLIDAY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it has been intimated to me that, in view of the fact Monday next is the statutory holiday known as remembrance day, a number of hon. members would like to be present in their constituencies on that day. I am advised, too, that the legion would appreciate it very much if parliament should make that possible by not sitting on Monday next, unless such sitting were absolutely imperative.

In the circumstances I move:

That when the house adjourns on Friday, November 8, it stand adjourned until Tuesday, November 12.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I realize that this motion is not debatable. I rise not for the purpose of debating it but rather for that of expressing concurrence. In addition to the matter of the convenience of hon. members there is the point that remembrance day is a national and statutory holiday, and one dear to the hearts of a large number of our people. In my view it is most fitting that the house should adjourn for the purpose of observing remembrance day.

Motion agreed to.

ACTING DEPUTY SERGEANT-AT-ARMS

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have appointed J. Laundy to be acting deputy sergeant-at-arms during the present session.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 3.55 p.m.

Friday, November 8, 1940.

The house met at three o'clock.

WAR MATERIALS

PRESS REPORT AS TO ASSISTANCE BY THE UNITED STATES IN EMPIRE WAR EFFORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a brief statement and to base thereon a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I regret exceedingly that the matter was brought to my attention so late that I could not apprise him of the subject matter, and if that is embarrassing or inconvenient I should not expect an immediate answer.

It is reported to me by the press that the president of the United States has stated that Great Britain and Canada will get one-half of the flying fortresses and other fighting planes, arms and munitions produced in the United States. I would ask the Prime Minister if this report has come to his attention, and if so, has he any statement to make on behalf of the government with respect to it?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I say to my hon. friend that what he has just read is the first intimation I have had of any such report.

WATER DIVERSION

OGOKI AND KENOGAMI RIVERS—COMMUNICATIONS BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND CANADIAN GOVERNMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Before the orders of the day are called, may I ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) if an agreement has been made with the United States with reference to the diversion of certain rivers in northern Ontario, namely the Ogoki and the Kenogami; and if so, has the agreement been tabled; and if not, is he in a position to advise us when it will be?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I shall be glad to lay on the table on Tuesday the communications recently exchanged between the United States and Canada as related to the development of power on the international rapids section of the St. Lawrence, and as respects the diversion of the Ogoki and other waters of the north into lake Superior. There has been an exchange of communications on the subject.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY MR. BROOKE CLAXTON AND SECONDED BY MR. RENÉ JUTRAS

The house proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. BROOKE CLAXTON (St. Lawrence-St. George) moved:

That the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Earl of Athlone, Knight of Our Most Noble Order of the Garter, a member of Our Most Honourable Privy Council, Knight Grand Cross of Our Most Honourable Order of the Bath, Grand Master of Our Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, Governor General and Commander in Chief of Our Dominion of Canada.

May it Please Your Excellency:

We, His Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious Speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both houses of parliament.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in rising to present this motion I realize that a heavy responsibility rests on me at this momentous time.

I must first acknowledge the honour paid to the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George. The honour recognizes the importance of the division in the life of Canada. Everyone in this house is already familiar with its many interests and advantages. The division is a true reflection of the complex character of Canadian life. Although its citizens are predominantly of English or French descent, it is interesting to note that during the national registration one office registered people speaking no less than twenty-two languages.

The division also reflects our troubled times. McGill university has given hospitality to the international labour organization. I feel that hon. members, and indeed all Canadians, will share our satisfaction that we have been privileged to welcome this great institution. All of us hope that the time may not be far distant when in a wider field it can resume its work for the good of humanity. That will come when the world has been freed from the cancerous growth of Hitlerism, sprawling over Europe, causing more suffering than has ever been caused before.

I feel I correctly interpret the interests and views of St. Lawrence-St. George when I say that we seek no local interest, we want no personal advantage, we are not interested in partisan politics. Every true Canadian feels the same to-day. We seek the welfare of Canada and of every part of it. We are as much concerned in the prosperity of the wheat farmer on the plains and of the fisherman on our coasts as in that of our own workers. We join with all others in seeking the defence and security of our own country. This means that to-day we should do everything in our power to aid Britain in her fight on our front line. The courage and fortitude displayed by her men and women have won the admiration of the world.

The greatest things are of the spirit. You cannot see or touch or hear them. In fact you can hardly describe or express them. They are things which take place in the minds and souls of people. In all recorded history there are few greater examples of this than the spirit which has arisen among the people of Great Britain in recent months. It is the spirit of Britain, revealed anew in the miracle of Dunkirk, and reaffirmed each day by the ordinary citizen's attitude to the worst the enemy can do. Men will talk of this as long as there is history, long after everyone has forgotten gains or losses of territory and power.

In Canada we admire the spirit that has gripped the people of Britain. We give thanks that it has stopped the onward rush toward us of the evil forces loosed in Europe.

Next to Britain, Canada is the strongest power facing the enemy to-day. The speech from the throne is a reminder to parliament and the country of just how huge our national assignment is. The government is leading the country in a stupendous effort. We know much of what has been done and what is under way. We are waiting to hear more from the government as the session proceeds. We know of the immense expansion of our forces. To the three services, over 200,000 Canadians have streamed from the farms and mines, the factories and offices, the universities and the professions to answer the call that they heard in their own hearts. They are as fine men as the world has ever seen. Their number has doubled since this parliament met six months ago. More than two divisions are in England in the front line. From all sides we hear that they are fit and trained, ready to maintain the high traditions of the Canadian corps.

At sea we now have twelve destroyers and more than 100 other vessels taking a major part in convoying the stream of supplies and food we are steadily sending across the seas. Every one of us is proud of what the Canadian navy has done in its far-flung operations. Not long ago the Prince Robert captured a German vessel in the Pacific and took it as a prize to Esquimalt.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): An armed merchantman.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes. But there is unfortunately the dark side. We learned with sadness of the loss of the Margaree with its gallant commanding officer and so many of its brave officers and men. To their mothers and wives no words can express our sympathy. We can share their pride; we cannot share their sorrow. These men are a noble example to us all. They gave their lives in the service of our country.

We hear of the immense progress being made in the air training plan, which the new Secretary of State for the Dominions, Lord Cranborne, said a few days ago "is months ahead of schedule." The country is beginning to appreciate its magnitude, its complexity and its importance. It may be a vital factor in victory. At Winnipeg, Toronto, London, Ottawa, Montreal, to my knowledge, and I dare say at every other Canadian city, the roaring hornets of the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) insistently remind us that his boys are at work from early dawn to starry eve, nights, Sundays and holidays as well. We need have no fear about the quality of our fliers. The record of the Royal Canadian Air Force abroad has already shown that they can equal the record of Canadian airmen in the last war. Nothing better can be said than that.

We know, too, of the progress in the production of war materials and of the new establishments under construction. It is estimated that these will produce munitions having in annual value the colossal sum of $800,000,000. Our workers, counted now by the hundreds of thousands, form a great working party whose contributions are as vital to the fighting forces of Canada as those of the men in uniform. These workers have responded with splendid resource and willing industry to the heavy demands made on them. They are playing their full part.

To gear the resources of a country like Canada to make the utmost effort takes time. Each new undertaking creates new problems. Inevitably there have been delays and difficulties. Inevitably there will be shortcomings, mistakes, disappointments. Our supplies of men and resources are by no means unlimited. Even if we had unlimited money we could not buy things which do not exist. We must avoid the danger of dissipating our efforts, spreading ourselves too thin. This war is not like the last war. The Germans have probably less than one-third the men under arms they and their allies then had.

What we do and what we are going to do require long-term planning. The conflicting demands of the armed forces and of industry upon our limited man-power have to be resolved. Priorities must be established. We are already training many workers; we shall have to train more. We might start in now with an additional 100,000 men and an additional 100,000 women and find, a year from now, that we had not trained half enough.

The immense job of getting our war machine under way has been done with little or no dislocation of our day to day economy. This is not due simply to accident. National finance, the control of prices and the supply of raw materials are among the many services that have been superbly handled. I know that bankers like to remain as anonymous as they are inscrutable, but it is only fair to say that the Canadian economy could not have been transformed smoothly from a peace-time to a war basis without the technical skill of the Bank of Canada.

The financial burden is great and it is becoming even greater. People have not yet begun to realize what it means. If the estimated economies on ordinary account of $50,000,000 are realized this year, the government's ordinary expenditure will be about $450,000,000. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has estimated that the war cost for this first year may amount to $940,000,000. That is about twice the cost of the final year of the last war and more than twice the peace-time budget. We hope to meet two-thirds of all our expenditures this year out of taxes and one-third out of internal loans that have already been made.

Last week I was in the United States describing what we were doing, and I found that its magnitude impressed people, even those who were accustomed to the astronomical figures that they deal with in that country.

We have gone through the period of initial expansion, of new taxes, new loans and greatly increased production. It all seems to have worked out as planned in the war budgets which won the admiration of every one. It is now becoming evident that we are not going to be able to produce all the war materials that we shall need unless we restrict the consumption of articles which divert work or materials from war purposes. The diversion from private consumption to public use is a puzzling question to the individual, but the time is coming when the government will have to show the ordinary citizen where his duty lies in this respect. No more will be needed than that.

The experience of the second war loan campaign showed that when the people realized what was expected of them there was no lack of response. The fact is that while we have supported national participation we are only beginning to translate national sentiment into personal action. Few of us have yet begun to give up things we like, still less things we think we need. Unless we also tighten our belts, our effort will fall short of what is necessary to stop the nazis. We must consume less, save more and steadily invest in war savings certificates and war loans.

In Canada many of the essentials of war production do not exist in sufficient quantities. Machine tools are one example. We must get them from the United States and we must pay for them in United States dollars. I understand that in the first year of war we spent in the United States $220,000,000 more than we spent the previous year. Disregarding anything from Britain, the balance of payments against us may well run to a figure of $160,000,000. We may in part offset even larger balances to come by further increasing our exports, or by decreasing our imports of United States goods for civilian purposes. But the best way, as far as it goes, is to increase our tourist trade. With the increased friendly interest in Canada being shown in the United States I believe this can be done. It can be done if the Canadian people are made to realize its importance, and if all the agencies which can help to promote it are fully mobilized. I hope that the government will see its way clear to spend not less than a million dollars on the encouragement of this business. It would not only bring dividends of badly needed United States dollars but also mean the continuance and strengthening of normal friendly relations with our good neighbour; for the tourist trade is not only a sinew of war, it is a tie of friendship. It is a great human industry, a moving belt of common understanding running north and south, all the way along the line between the Pacific and the Atlantic seaboards.

And our relations with the United States are to-day more important than ever before. While we are helping Britain and defending ourselves on the front line we are also playing our part by joining with the United States in the defence of our heritage and our way of life on this continent.

The setting up of a permanent joint board on defence was the most momentous, the most heartening step ever taken in the relations between Canada and the United States. Now that the step has been taken we realize that since we have a common interest it is only common sense that we should cooperate in making the best use of our resources of men and materials, and should have a joint plan of defence. Some governments might have sat back and drifted along, letting the opportunity go by of achieving this great stroke for our country's welfare. By their actions the governments of the United States and Canada showed that democracies can act together decisively; they gave a great demonstration of leadership and proved that we have not outgrown the tradition of treating new situations as soluble problems.

The announcement came as a surprise to Canada no less than to the United States or England, but it was received on all sides with acclaim because it was such plain common sense. That is what a policy requiring initiative and daring always appears to be when it has been successfully carried out.

In Canada there were a few people—just a handful—who, not wishing or not daring to oppose the agreement, took refuge in complaining of the way in which it was made, or of the people who had made it. In England it was acclaimed at once, without these local qualifications. It was realized there that it helped Britain when she most needed aid. It was realized that it was not just a coincidence that joint defence, bases and destroyers were dealt with in a couple of weeks. It was realized too that our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had played a leading part in bringing about this, the greatest act of cooperation among English speaking peoples since the war of independence. Here is what a writer in the London Spectator said, in the issue of September 6:

> A Canadian soldier to whom I gave a lift on Sunday reminded me of something I ought to have commented on before, the extent of the debt that the whole commonwealth owes to Mr. Mackenzie King, the Prime Minister of Canada, for the part he has played in cementing relations between the commonwealth and the United States. At earlier stages in his parliamentary career Mr. King has been bitterly criticized by his opponents for what was regarded as his too "pro-American" attitude. The harvest that attitude, so far as it existed, is bearing now is such as to close all cavillers' mouths. Canada seems always destined to be the link and the interpreter between Great Britain and the United States, and it has never filled that role more effectively or more valuably than to-day. That is due in no small measure to the personal friendship between the Canadian Prime Minister and the American president which rids contacts between them, whether by telephone or in the flesh, of every vestige of formality.

As far as I have read it, the English press was unanimous to the same effect. Some of it went much further.

The concluding sentence of the passage I read explains the feeling that some Americans had that some Canadians might prefer the reelection of President Roosevelt. We certainly congratulate him most heartily on his reelection. But we would equally have congratulated Mr. Willkie and ourselves had he been favoured by the electors; for, despite the temptations of a political campaign, there seemed to us to be no fundamental difference in the declared policies of the two candidates so far as they affected us. They wanted to give all aid to Britain short of war, and that seems to be the view of the great majority of the people of the United States.

We are grateful from the bottom of our hearts for what the United States is doing.

A few days after the announcement of the exchange of destroyers for bases, the following telegram was sent by Mr. Churchill to the Prime Minister, on September 13:

> I am touched by the personal kindness of your telegram and all our people are cheered and fortified to feel that Canada is with the mother country heart and soul. The fine Canadian divisions which are standing on guard with us will play a notable part should the enemy succeed in setting foot on our shores. I am very glad to have this opportunity of thanking you personally for all you have done for the common cause and especially in promoting the harmony of sentiment throughout the new world. This deep understanding will be a dominant factor in the rescue of Europe from a relapse into the dark ages.
> On behalf of the government and people of the United Kingdom I send you heartfelt thanks for your memorable message.

Canada has not only helped Britain by promoting harmony of sentiment on this continent, but that very harmony, by strengthening Canada, has increased her own capacity to help Britain.

Think now of what has happened at home. Canada entered the war united, and the way in which we entered the war, by a separate declaration, was of the utmost importance in securing the unity which resulted. It was important in Canada among those people who put Canada first; it was important in the United States, as showing that Canada, a north American nation, had seen fit to enter the war of its own accord. Since we entered the war, that unity of the Canadian people has steadily strengthened, by reason of the increasing realization by all Canadians of their essential unity and of their essential interest in defeating Hitler in Europe.

In a message issued on St. Jean Baptiste day the Prime Minister said:

The tragic fate of France leaves to French Canada the duty of upholding the tradition of French culture and civilization and the French passion for liberty in the world. This new responsibility will, I believe, be accepted proudly.

It has been accepted proudly, Mr. Speaker. French Canada yields place to no one in its loyalty to this country. To-day we are glad to think that there are twenty-one members of this house in military service of one kind or another. We congratulate them, we envy them, and we wish them good fortune. We are proud to say that of the twenty-one, seven are French Canadians from the province of Quebec. No Canadian will ever forget the part played in achieving this unity on October 25 by the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). Is there a member here who doubts that this was a victory for the true spirit of Quebec? Since then Mr. Godbout, the premier of Quebec, has stood loyally for its best traditions. His Eminence the Cardinal and His Excellency the Archbishop of Montreal also have raised their voices in support of Canada's cause.

I am glad to be the first to congratulate the government on the appointment of a new senator, Hon. Mercier Gouin. Incidentally this makes five senators who live in the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George. Senator Gouin is the son of a man who rendered great service to Quebec and to Canada, but he has earned this honour in his own right. Without lessening his proud attachment to his own people he has worked night and day to promote harmony between both races and for the welfare of Canada. His appointment will give the utmost satisfaction throughout Quebec and the whole country.

The English-speaking citizens of Canada should appreciate how difficult some of us make it for French-Canadians to have a loyalty to all of Canada. I should like to try to explain what I mean. Some people in Canada voice a kind of loyalty which, by definition, no Canadian of non-British descent can share. In being more British than the English, they astonish the English, but tend to drive Canadians of other origins, sometimes back to their ancient affiliations and sometimes to a local loyalty. If some of us have a feeling about Canada which French-Canadians cannot share, is it surprising that some French-Canadians should also have a loyalty which is exclusive, a loyalty to their own province and their own race? After all, too, they have been here for some two hundred and fifty years before confederation.

The one common ground on which all Canadians can meet is a common loyalty to Canada. If this country is to be as strong as it can be, it must be strong on the basis of understanding, tolerance and respect by all for differing views honestly held; and it can only be on the basis of an attachment to Canada, all of it.

Do you remember what Lord Tweedsmuir said to the Canadian Institute of International Affairs on October 10, 1937:

This is a sovereign nation and cannot take her attitude to the world docilely from Britain, or from the United States, or from anybody else. A Canadian's first loyalty is not the British commonwealth of nations, but to Canada, and to Canada's king, and those who deny this are doing, to my mind, a great disservice to the commonwealth.

The profound truth of his final observation has been borne out by everything that has happened since the beginning of the war.

To-day Canada is united as never before, grimly engaged in utilizing her resources of power, agriculture and minerals, her industry and her men, in the best possible way to defend our front line in Britain. We are encouraged to do our utmost by the pride we feel in the courage shown by the people of that beleaguered country. Visitors coming from England speak of the people being happy there. They are happy because they have looked danger and death in the face and kept on smiling. They are happy because of the changes that have come about in English life: the sharing of risks and work, the levelling out of privilege, the new spirit arising out of the equal sacrifice, the new efficiency coming out of working together. The country is being literally reborn in the ordeal of fire. The sword of democracy is being reforged in England with a keener edge. You remember near the end of Pilgrim's Progress, when Hopeful starts to cross the dark river. It is an awesome experience, but towards midstream Hopeful calls back in ringing tones:

Be of good cheer, my brother. I have felt the bottom and it is sound.

That is what the spirit of England says to us to-day. It speaks to us through the words and deeds of the men and women, and the children too, who are in its front line. It finds its echo in the imperishable words of its inspired and inspiring leader, Mr. Winston Churchill. Hon. members will be familiar with the magnificent passage with which he concluded his speech on October 8. I shall not repeat it, because already it is known to all of you. It has become part of the literature of England.

Our government can make plans, let contracts, set up new producing companies, levy taxes and ask for loans. All these things it has been doing and will continue to do at an increasing rate. But what Canada accomplishes will depend on her people, and what they do will depend on their own will, their own spirit. That is why it is essential that the government keep the people informed, in the greatest possible measure, of what it is doing; that it gain understanding for its actions, and do everything it can to develop in the nation a spirit that can do for Canada what it has done for the people of Britain. There they have a popular war-time catchword to the effect that civilians are suffering more from the bombing than are the men in the front lines, in the armed forces. The figures given this week by Mr. Churchill show this to be true. There is little likelihood just now that civilians in Canada will have to stand up to bombing, but they are going to have to make other sacrifices. They are going to have to give up for the war cause many of the things they otherwise would have. They are going to have to deprive themselves until it hurts. Soldiers, sailors and airmen, munitions workers and producers of all kinds, are going to have to play their vital part; but ordinary people, too, will be called upon for sacrifices. That is why we need and are glad to have a united national spirit. In the hard world we live in it is not enough for a nation to defend its old way of living, to try to maintain the easy ways to which it was accustomed. The past year has shown that nations which try to hold a shield in front of a body lacking in vigour are lost. We have only to compare the Britain of to-day with the France of June to bring home this lesson. To survive against the powerful desperate marauders ranging the world, a nation must have a driving power within itself.

In all history those who have prevailed have always been those who were driven by a common desire for something better. Democracy is far from dead in the world, far from being a spent force. But if we are to beat back the evil powers—and they are strong—we must have a dynamic democracy, one that has hitting power because it is moving forward, one that has not lost its force through standing still. This idea was emphasized by Lord Baldwin at Toronto in 1939, when he said:

[Mr Claxton.]

> Democracies must attain to new levels of technical efficiency for self-defence and learn to cooperate.

And he added that democracies must strive with more insistence and passion than ever before to make real the twin ideals of social justice and individual freedom.

Well, in Canada we have plenty of opportunity. We can begin with the Sirois report. The government is to be congratulated on the step in this direction announced yesterday. The report is not only a great state document, resulting from years of study and work, but, without altering the fundamentals of confederation, it represents a new charter for the people of all Canada. People from end to end of Canada would like to see it implemented, because they know that we cannot get along in a very difficult twentieth century world with a constitution which was designed to meet the financial and social needs and conditions of the nineteenth century.

I had the honour of being associated with my friend Senator Gouin in a study for the Sirois commission. Our study is printed at appendix 8 and this is what we say at page 33:

> There is to-day an uncertainty and a sense of frustration comparable to the conditions which confederation was intended to improve. It is no part of our duty to recommend what course should be followed, but we believe that the picture of legislative confusion outlined in the pages which follow shows that constructive steps must now be taken if the needs of the Canadian people are to be properly met and if the integrity of Canada is to be preserved.

That was written in 1939, when neither of us imagined that we could be here to join with you in doing what we can to clear the air of this continual "miasma which we meet at every turn as to the respective jurisdiction of the dominion and of the provinces" as one highly respected private member put it some years ago. We are ready to-day to show the same self-reliance, the confidence, the faith that the fathers of confederation had seventy-three years ago.

Some critics may object that the recommendations of the Sirois report should be left until after the war, that it is our business to get on with the war. We can get on with the war effectively only if we are strong at home. In war the strength of the home front is as essential to success as strength on the battle front. In reality to-day there are not two fronts but only one. For this reason we should be planning, working, directing every effort to make Canada a better place, to make Canadians better citizens, so that our contribution to the cause we have at heart will be more effective and more successful.

In all the fields of government and education, in the training of skilled labour, in public health and charitable and social services, yes, even in art and music, and certainly in religion, we should be doing what we can to make our bodies tough and our minds strong and our hearts warm with affection for our country. All the modern instruments of press, radio, film, should spread words, music, pictures, all used to intensify among Canadians their knowledge and love of Canada. And we cannot fight a long, grim war without opportunities "to enliven our sentiments in common."

Lord Baldwin expressed two ideas. I have said a word about democracy's attaining new levels of efficiency. May I conclude by repeating his reference to the other subject of social justice and freedom. He said:

> We must strive with more insistence and passion than ever before to make real the twin ideals of social justice and individual freedom.

It seems appropriate to relate what I have to say on this score to the resignation of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) from the leadership of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation. However much some hon. members disagreed with the policies he advocated, they could not help respecting the sincerity of his views or the fearless way in which he put them forward. What is important is that he had the right to express his views. If we are sincere in our desire to defend democracy, we must practise democracy as well as preach it. In war time there must be limitations, but we must be sure that those limitations are really necessary to preserve the security of the democratic state for which we are fighting.

We say, Mr. Speaker, that Canada is going to put forth her utmost effort. We can put forth our utmost effort because we have a burning faith in our cause, because we believe that our democracy is worth living for, working for, dying for. In this we shall be inspired by the spirit of the British people and by the sacred recollection of everything that has been accomplished before us in Canada. Our people are prepared to do any service, to make every sacrifice for their country, Canada.

It does us good now and then to restate our faith in our own country. When this war is over Canada will still be here with the same land and forests and lakes it had before. Our fields, our mines, our water powers are not surpassed anywhere. Long after Hitler has gone to his dismal end, they will be here and there will be Canadians to use them. We are all working for one end. This government, this parliament, this people, are united in the confidence that we can overcome all obstacles. Out of this ordeal of fire we can forge a new and better Canada, and make our proper contribution to the good life of our people, and all others.

Mr. RENE JUTRAS (Provencher) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw attention to the fluency and eloquence of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) and to tender him my sincere congratulations. Following the noble words which you have been privileged to hear and applaud, and bearing in mind the fact that I represent here a constituency whose very name, Provencher, recalls the virtues and devotion of the great prelate who brought into outstanding prominence the name of my race, and who, with the cross, implanted civilization in Manitoba, I feel constrained to request your kind consideration.

On this occasion, as a free member of a free parliament, a title whose importance and honour I fully appreciate to-day, I deem it my duty to avoid oratorical devices or stock phrases, and I shall merely seek to express my thoughts as a Canadian.

I wish to thank the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for the honour he has bestowed upon my friends and electors from Provencher, when he entrusted me the task of seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Consequently, my constituents from Provencher desire to pay him a respectful tribute and to acknowledge the honour thus bestowed upon them.

May I also convey to him my gratitude for the acumen he has shown in the numerous decisions which he has taken with coolness and efficiency since the beginning of the present emergency. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian people as a whole are convinced that this war is truly Canada's war, and that the efficient defence of the country lies in the use of the organized and united power and force of this dominion for the annihilation of the German hordes.

Any one who travels over Canada to-day is gripped by a spirit of resolute determination and confidence, because he notices that this population, among which many citizens had been compelled, for some years back, to put away their tools on account of the depression and join the march on the exhausted source of public funds, this very population is to-day exceedingly busy erecting hangars, airdromes and factories in the fulfilment of a common aim. Throughout our valleys, our plains and our hillsides, buildings are springing up as our field crops do in the spring, and the wheels of industry are humming without interruption. That is truly the answer of the Canadian people to the stirring appeal of the London chimes, an appeal that was far remote but nevertheless quite clear.

I desire to pay a tribute to the British people, who have brought to mankind the vision of a better world. The blood, the tears, the toil, the stout determination of the men, women and children of Great Britain have opened an era of heroism and restored to the world the common ideals of free people. Their sacrifices will spare us many of their sufferings. They have shown us that a democracy can survive, that it can secure from its citizens a supreme and constant devotion, and that it can also create a world better than any system wherein the cost of material progress is the degradation of human mind. And the intrepid leader of that people, Winston Churchill, is the living symbol of the unity of the democracies, a unity which constitutes the strongest hope of mankind. All praise to that people so fiercely proud of its traditions and of its liberty! All praise as well to those Frenchmen who have so proudly shed their blood in defence of their freedom! Their country, their noble country, has fallen, but we refuse to believe that their soul is dead. I shall simply repeat to them the words of the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe): "You have not only our affection, but our support", and those of that great Frenchman, Gambetta, regarding the future of France: "Think of it always, speak of it never."

I am not one of those who, gulled by nazi propaganda, believe that the totalitarian system is necessarily more efficient and can easily dominate the democratic regimes. It would be foolish to deny the extraordinary power of the German military machine, but its ruthless efficiency is no proof of the strength of the totalitarian regimes or of the weakness of the democracies. Let the latter never forget the resistance opposed by one small nation against more than a hundred million aggressors prepared by twenty-two years of totalitarianism. The sole effect of the totalitarian system is to stamp out all sense of humanity. The triumphant barbarism which brought Germany within an ace of victory will assuredly lead it to a defeat from which it will never recover.

I also wish to say a word about the agreement concluded between Great Britain and the United States. This agreement is the most significant and noteworthy event in Anglo-American history. It constitutes a tangible proof that these two nations are living on good terms with each other and are working out together in brotherly fashion the solution of the military and naval problems of their common defence. May I express my gratitude to my leader who has always wholeheartedly sought to cultivate and develop this spirit of cooperation and good understanding with our neighbours to the south. Canada has become an indissoluble link of better understanding and cordiality between the British Empire and the United States. The noble task of consolidating between the British and the Americans the strongest and most durable friendship in the history of nations is an ideal, a summit which we shall reach through unwavering loyalty to Great Britain and acts of respectful friendship towards the United States. It goes without saying that when countries have common interests to defend their first act is to study their common interests and problems together and to divide the responsibilities between them. The speeches delivered during the recent presidential election campaign in the United States have clearly shown us that the soul of the American people is with us in the struggle we have undertaken for freedom and independence. Though we are neighbours, we live in the same house. The agreement in question assures us that all the doors of our house will be closed to the plunderers of nations.

I still have a tribute to pay, a tribute owed to the citizens of Canada, to the members of this house and to the Government for the wonderful esprit de corps and the complete cooperation which they manifested on the occasion of the national registration. This same spirit of Christian and patriotic abnegation has showed itself every day in the application of the National Mobilization Act. Canada is marching loyally with its sister nations. No nation with so generous a soul can perish, however hard the trial.

(Text) As we enter upon this new session, Mr. Speaker, every one realizes that it will be one of the most momentous in the whole history of the Dominion of Canada, and no one is more conscious of the tremendous responsibility that rests upon his shoulders than the private member. It would be idle for me to take up the time of this house in an effort to review the events which have taken place in Europe and their significance to Canada.

Since the fall of France, when the whole world seemed on the verge of collapse, a new world has arisen stronger and more determined than ever. It is our foremost duty to keep it as such and never to relax our efforts. We are fully confident that the Canadian people are doing all that is possible, but our enthusiasm has led us to wonder if we should not now attempt the impossible. Before Dunkirk it was thought impossible to evacuate in a few days from a half shattered harbour more than 30,000 men. The optimists said that 50,000 might be evacuated.

but the fact is that 335,000 were saved. The allies had tried all that was possible; they were then faced with the necessity of doing the impossible, and they did it. This fine spirit of Dunkirk is not confined to the European continent. It has found expression on many occasions in Canada since the outbreak of war and is now, I believe, more alive than it ever was.

To-day France, our noble ally, has fallen. She lies with guns pointed at her heart and disarmed. Relations between Great Britain and France are becoming more and more acrimonious. It would be most unfair to try to judge downtrodden France, and any discussion of the hypothetical decisions of her government is bound to lead us into misrepresentations as well as misunderstandings, and to risk our great asset, the unity of our beloved dominion.

Many people of France have lost their lives, and those who have survived are menaced by tyranny. Great Britain and France have great confidence in one another. Mr. Speaker, I beg of hon. members of this house and of all Canadian citizens that they save that confidence, the one thing that can be saved. I cannot think of a better way to do it than to think of our friends, their kindness and affection. No matter what is said of the Frenchmen, no matter what is said of the Englishmen, let us think of certain Frenchmen, let us think of certain Englishmen who we know are incapable of any but noble and generous thoughts. Let us extend our kindness and friendliness. The need for kindness in the world to-day is appalling, and yet there lies, I believe, our strength and the key to this new and modern world to which we have harnessed our lives and for which we are shedding our blood.

I wish to refer briefly, Mr. Speaker, to the problem of agriculture, which has become a national problem and an integral part of our war effort. It is made clear by every process of logic and by the proof of historic fact that the wealth of a nation, the character of its people, the quality and permanence of its institutions, are all dependent upon a sound and sufficient agricultural foundation. Not armies or navies, or commerce, or diversity of manufactures, or great distributive systems, or anything other than the farm, is the anchor which will hold through the storms of time which sweep all else away.

The last great war was the principal cause of Canada's rise to the position of a great wheat exporting country. Canada expanded her acreage to become the leading wheat exporting nation of the world, which position she still holds. At the time of the declaration of war some people expected wheat to soar in price simply because a war was in progress. They overlooked the fact that Europe had been preparing for war for several years and that substantial reserves had been stored up in that continent. Never before has a major war started with such an abundant supply of food in the world.

The prairie farmers realize that they are called upon to guarantee ample supplies of food for the allies during the war. They have learned to produce abundantly. Gradually, by the use of machines, agriculture is being relieved of back-breaking manual labour. The faithful and diligent horse is gradually being relegated to the background, and fast, efficient and economic machines take its place. One hundred years ago it took the efforts of ninety per cent of the population, busily employed on farms, to feed and clothe the nation. To-day twenty-five per cent of that population can easily do the job. This great productivity has served only to beat down prices to penurious levels.

There are three million Canadians living on farms, and there are another two millions living in rural areas whose livelihood depends almost directly on agriculture. Thus when agriculture's existence is imperilled by low prices, five million Canadians suffer jointly. The western farmers realize the complexity of the problem and are not asking for excess profits, but they feel that a reasonable parity should be maintained between the prices of farm products and the prices of the things they have to buy.

(Translation) At the outset of this new session, I express the hope that nothing will be said or done in this house which might be prejudicial to what is still our most valuable asset: national unity. The effective defence of our country requires the concentration of our efforts at such a place and time, and in such a way, that they will best contribute to the defeat of the German armies. Our real aim is the mobilization of a well-organized and wisely-led Canadian people. We have already achieved this, to a large extent, and we shall march on towards this goal with a common will, as long as we enjoy the full confidence of the Canadian people.

If mobilization on a national scale has been such a success, it is due, I believe, to equality in sacrifice. All able-bodied citizens must be prepared to make the same sacrifices, and all classes will find comfort in the thought that there will be no exemptions. This is of prime importance. There must also exist equality of financial contribution. I will abstain from enlarging upon this point, but will briefly refer to excessive war profits. Means of controlling such excesses are not wanting and it must be stated that such as have been put into force during the last session have proven quite efficient. For this, the Canadian people are grateful to their leaders, retaining withal their constant vigilance in this regard.

While government contracts should not insure what might be considered excessive profits, it would nevertheless be contrary to public interest that their financial basis be such as to paralyse contractors and limit their productive capacity.

We are confident that under firm and competent direction Canadian industry will prove equal to the task of ensuring maximum results from our war effort.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, when I came to Ottawa this week I had hoped to be able to make my contribution to this debate immediately after the mover (Mr. Claxton) and the seconder (Mr. Jutras) had concluded their addresses. But we are living in a changing world where things change from day to day, and I find myself unable to proceed this afternoon. I shall therefore ask leave to adjourn the debate and take my seat after congratulating my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) upon the very fine contribution which he has made in this House of Commons to-day, and my young friend from Provencher (Mr. Jutras), who has, I think, distinguished himself so creditably in both languages.

I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 4.20 p.m. until Tuesday, November 12, at 3 p.m.

Tuesday, November 12, 1940.

The house met at three o'clock.

DEATH OF FORMER PRIME MINISTER OF GREAT BRITAIN—TRIBUTES TO HIS MEMORY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, hon. members of the house have learned with deep regret of the death of the Right Hon. Neville Chamberlain. It is fitting that I should place upon the records of this house some few words in honour of his memory.

Mr. Chamberlain left the scenes of his labours in circumstances made especially poignant by the sufferings of his closing days. Canada will not soon forget the fortitude with which he faced, and met, and endured, the terrors and horrors of war; nor, in the preceding years, his long and earnest fight for peace —a peace which he once described as one which will enable mankind "to live their lives without fear, and to devote their energies and their gifts to the development of their culture, the pursuit of their ideals, and the improvement of their material prosperity."

With the permission of the house, I should like to repeat within these walls the substance of a public tribute I have already paid to his memory.

As the tragedy of Europe and the world began to unfold, Mr. Chamberlain as the Prime Minister of his country bore the greatest burden of all. He found himself the victim of conditions which he did not create, and of circumstances which he could not control. In a world rushing headlong to war, for which Britain was not prepared, peace had been placed in his keeping. From the compelling burdens of those conditions he did not flinch. He fought those circumstances with all the virtues of his race and, above all, with what has been called the greatest of all the virtues—unwavering patience. The judgment of time will determine the responsibility for the conditions and the circumstances which he inherited. It is no less certain that as those who follow us gaze in retrospect upon these tragic scenes, they will see in the late Prime Minister of Great Britain a forthright, fearless, honest, Christian gentleman, who laboured for peace because he loved his fellow men, and who led his country into war as the only means left to preserve their freedom.

When the testing time came at Munich in 1938, he, hating war, found himself opposed by men who were determined to wage it. Whatever may be the present opinion of the pact of Munich held by some, at the time when it was made it was hailed with joy in Britain, in France, in Canada, in the United States, and also by the people in Italy and in Germany. In fact, the world sighed with profound relief as Mr. Chamberlain gave to the hearts of mankind a new lease of hope. To-day the memory of Munich has no doubt been embittered by the apparent failure to fulfil its promise. That was not the fault of Mr. Chamberlain.

Many men in public life have suffered, often undeservedly, from the fickleness of public opinion, and the forgetfulness of public gratitude; but few men have had the experience of these vicissitudes of fortune crowded more dramatically into so short a period of time. Mr. Chamberlain enjoyed prosperity in humility, and suffered adversity with silent dignity. He moved steadfastly towards peace, when peace was possible. He did not flinch from war, when war was inevitable. He bore praise with modesty, and censure without complaint.

History will, I believe, pay his memory these tributes. His passion for peace and his patient search for it gave to the cause of Britain a moral strength in the eyes of the world, invaluable in a struggle between good and evil.

The temporary peace which his patience gained, gave mankind a year free from the horrors of war, unmasked the true character of the new tyranny, and strengthened the preparations of free nations to meet the threat to the Christian civilization which they cherished.

In the midst of danger, discouragement and defeat, Mr. Chamberlain never despaired of his country or of her great cause in the world of men. Canada, to-day, joins with the other nations of the British commonwealth in honouring a faithful servant of humanity.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has given a very eloquent appreciation of Mr. Chamberlain and of his position in and contribution to the empire, and I am grateful for the opportunity afforded to me to pay a tribute to his memory.

Mr. Chamberlain was an Englishman—not born in the purple, as it is said, but truly a notable product of that great middle class non-conformist England which made her great in commerce, in industry, and in the sciences and arts.

The son of a great imperialist, he did not choose in his early years to follow in his father's footsteps; rather did he choose the path of commerce and peaceful pursuits. But he was bred in the Birmingham tradition—the tradition of public service—and after serving his fellow citizens in the municipal arena as Lord Mayor of his city it was inevitable with his background that he should enter parliament and become one of the leaders of the nation. He served in several ministries, first as Postmaster General, Paymaster General, Minister of Health and subsequently Chancellor of the Exchequer, and finally Prime Minister of Britain.

It has been said that he was severely competent as an administrator. In the domestic field he did his best work in the health ministry where he instituted many reforms. Yet he was a man who found zest in living. He was a famous fisherman. I know something of the joys of that pastime. On the day he became Chancellor he wrote in his diary:

> What a day! Two salmon in the morning and then Chancellor of the Exchequer in the afternoon.

What more could a man want? And yet, when Mr. Baldwin retired in 1937, Mr. Chamberlain went to the highest and greatest position in the empire, Prime Minister, almost as a matter of course. And he took the position without show or ostentation—another duty to be performed, another task to accomplish.

There are those who will say he failed. He laboured for peace in our time. He believed he had attained it, only to find that all his hopes had crashed. He laboured for decency in international affairs, only to find that he had been dealing with a band of robber barons who knew no decency, no honour, and who have had no equals in history. But because he was a man of courage, because he had failed in the other alternative, he did not hesitate to lead the nation into the great struggle—reluctantly no doubt, but none the less courageously.

We all remember Munich! But who is there among us so bold, in the light of the then known facts and pledges, as to condemn Mr. Chamberlain for Munich? Who is there who would not have rejoiced if Munich had in fact succeeded?

History—that history which is written from a true perspective—will do him justice. It may condemn his judgment. It may say he lacked wisdom. It is so easy to criticize and so difficult to achieve really great deeds. But of one thing I am certain: history will record his rectitude, his courage, his high purpose, and his sincerity.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): We join with those who to-day pay tribute to one who held high office in the councils of our commonwealth. As a group, and like the British Labour party, we disagreed profoundly with his international policies, which he followed sincerely and to the bitter end.

Mr. Chamberlain will, I believe, be regarded by historians as a symbol of the age in which he lived, an age which is drawing uneasily to its close. He represented, as did his immediate predecessor, a high type of British business man in public life. As such, his associations and his environment together largely determined his course of action. Lord Byron once wrote:

> I live in myself, but I become a portion of that around me.

And so it was with Mr. Chamberlain. He became in a very real sense a portion of that around him, and tried to carry out to the best of his ability, and in all sincerity, that which he believed to be good.

We extend our sympathy to his widow and to those who to-day suffer from a deep sense of personal loss. As to his place in contemporary affairs, history will eventually appraise his work and judge aright, but few will question his integrity or sincerity of purpose.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): With the passing of Neville Chamberlain the British empire has lost the services of a great Englishman. He was the last of a family of illustrious British statesmen. Where is he who can divine the motives that impel the thinking, speaking and acting of any man, much less a public man, be he statesman —or be he politician? Even if those motives be known, how almost impossible is it to judge rightly of their worthiness or unworthiness? But of a man's utterances or actions, select even the simplest word or deed, analyse the judgments that led to it, weigh the results, direct and indirect, which derive their cause from it, then seek justly to appraise it, and you will find yourself thoughtful and humble.

It is with thoughtfulness and humility that I regard Chamberlain to-day. In most minds his name is, and for a long time will be, associated with appeasement and Munich. To be fair to him, we must remember that he carried responsibility in Britain while the motherland was staggering from the consequences of the folly of one of the most abjectly fatuous periods in Anglo-Saxon history; a decade when men made almost every kind of blunder in their economic thought and practice, and then allowed themselves to be deluded into almost every kind of disarmament. The marvel is that he agreed to assume office at all. A double marvel is that he did as well as he did. Let us be grateful for his courage and good intentions and good achievements, whatever they might have been. Let us be charitable towards his errors, whatever and whyever they may be found to have been. For judgment let us leave him to the future, when men will be able to arrive at conclusions more calmly considered and better informed than ours possibly can be.

WATER DIVERSION

OGOKI AND KENOGAMI RIVERS—TABLING OF COMMUNICATIONS BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND CANADIAN GOVERNMENTS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I wish to lay on the table copies of recent correspondence between the government of Canada and the government of the United States whereby agreement was reached in regard to certain developments on the St. Lawrence-Great Lakes system. This is the correspondence asked for on Friday last by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). It consists of a formal interchange of notes between the Canadian Minister to the United States and the United States Secretary of State embodying the points of understanding arrived at in previous conversations between the two governments.

I should like at the same time to table copies of the correspondence exchanged recently with the premier of Ontario and the premier of Quebec on this subject.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

INQUIRY RESPECTING AGREEMENTS ENTERED INTO WITH BRITISH GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). I am sure everyone is gratified that he has returned safely from his journey overseas.

My question is: Has the minister any information to give to the house as to the result of his discussions with the British authorities concerning the sale of Canadian farm products in Great Britain, and if not to-day, when may we expect such report?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The agreements which were entered into with the British government were just to-day submitted to and accepted by council. They have yet to pass through the ordinary official stages, and I have a definite understanding with the British government that before making any announcement here they shall be put in a position to make the announcement in Britain at the same time. It is my intention to make a full statement to the house as soon as I have an opportunity of doing so in the debate on the address.

LABOUR DISPUTE

AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY — QUESTION AFFECTING WORKERS AT CHRYSLER PLANT IN WINDSOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty). On Saturday morning forty-five union members were locked out at Windsor, Ontario, by the Chrysler corporation. Attempts to inform their fellow workers peacefully were frustrated by local police, and since then several arrests have been made. Will the government undertake to protect workers against such violations of their democratic rights, which are specifically safeguarded under No. 27 of the defence of Canada regulations, as approved by order in council P.C. 3751 of August 13, 1940?

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour): The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) was kind enough to give me notice of his intention to ask this question.

I received on Sunday morning a telegram similar, I believe, to the one he received, in which the chairman of the local committee, No. 195, of the Chrysler corporation employees advised that the corporation had locked out forty-five employees. Subsequently I received notification from the company to the effect that it was not in any sense whatever a lockout, but on account of the transferring of one employee from one department to another thirty-eight men in the other department decided voluntarily to walk out. There being such a wide variance between the two statements as to the facts, I thought the only way to handle the matter properly was to have someone from the Department of Labour go to Windsor and advise us accurately as to the actual facts. That was done; the representative was in Windsor yesterday and is still there. When I received the notice from the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar I endeavoured, unsuccessfully, to get in touch with him. Until we have a definite statement as to the actual facts I think we should not prejudge the matter or take any premature action in connection with it.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRIVATE MEMBERS' DAYS

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I should like to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), in view of the way the business was carried on last session with no private members' day being provided, whether we shall have private members' days during this session?

Mr. HANSON: You had better wait and see.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think we should first conclude the debate on the address. What may be possible or desirable after the debate is concluded will depend, among other factors, on the length of time which the debate itself occupies. There will be a chance to discuss the matter later.

INTERNED ENEMY ALIENS

INQUIRY AS TO EMPLOYMENT ON CONSTRUCTION OF ARMY HUTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State (Mr. Casgrain). Is it correct that German prisoners in a certain internment camp outside of Toronto are being employed on the construction of army huts at the rate of twenty cents a day, thus displacing Canadian carpenters who in consequence are unemployed?

Hon. P. F. CASGRAIN (Secretary of State): I cannot give an answer offhand, but I shall make inquiry and try to have an answer for my hon. friend to-morrow.

ANNIE RUBELIETZ

PETITIONS FOR COMMUTATION OF DEATH SENTENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANTHONY HLYNKA (Vegreville): May I ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) whether, in view of the many petitions which have been sent both to the government and to members with respect to the death sentence passed upon Annie Rubelietz of Sturgis district, Saskatchewan, the minister is considering the commutation of the death penalty?

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): An appeal has been lodged in the court of appeal of Saskatchewan against the conviction in question. Until the decision on that appeal is made we cannot deal with the numerous petitions which have been sent in urging clemency in the matter.

SOLDIERS ON LEAVE

INQUIRY RESPECTING PROVISION OF TRANSPORTATION AT CHRISTMAS AND NEW YEAR'S

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) in connection with the statement in this morning's papers about the Christmas and New Year's leave for soldiers. Will any arrangements be made in reference to transportation to and from their homes?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): No arrangement has been made except the usual one providing for a rate of single fare for the return trip.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Friday, November 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Brooke Claxton for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we are met to-day under the shadow of the tragedy of the greatest war in history. When we left here in August last we were conscious that the battle of Britain, possibly the invasion of Britain, was in the immediate future, and we watched the developments from day to day with the greatest possible anxiety. Now we are happy to think that the invasion of Britain did not take place, but we are equally certain that the battle of Britain is not yet over.

I think at this point I should say a word or two with respect to the question of the summoning of parliament at this time. There was considerable discussion in the newspapers with respect to what took place between my right hon. friend and myself on October 3. I must confess to you, sir, and to the house that, obsessed as I was during that intervening period with what was occurring in connection with the invasion of Britain and the battle of Britain, I did not conceive that it was immediately necessary that parliament should reassemble. Having received an invitation to visit my right hon. friend and discuss the question; having approached that discussion with those considerations in mind, and the right hon. gentleman having already intimated that the government had no legislation ready, I concurred in the suggestion which was then made. I have nothing to take back with regard to that decision; nor do I think my right hon. friend has anything to take back. Nevertheless, in view of statements which were made in the press and in view of statements by my hon. friend to my left (Mr. Coldwell), I did suggest to the Prime Minister that it should not be said that he or I should be taken in any sense as having arranged in advance that there should not be public discussion in this house; and we are here for that purpose.

Since we adjourned we have had four by-elections in Canada, which returned the four very fine, estimable gentlemen who were introduced to you last week, sir, and who took their places on the floor of this house. I am indeed proud to have our party strengthened by the addition of two young men, for whom I predict a great future as members of this House of Commons. My right hon. friend has received an accretion to his ministry in the person of an hon. gentleman of whom I spoke once before in, shall I say, friendly terms. To-day I am glad to add my welcome to him as he takes his place here and participates in the business of this house. Macdonald! What a name to conjure with. And Macdonald of Kingston! How that takes our memories back seventy-five years; yet what a difference we see. After all:

> What's in a name? That which we call a rose,
> By any other name would smell as sweet.

Yet one of the greatest assets of the hon. gentleman is his name.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I say that with the utmost good spirit; I do not understand the laughter. The name of Macdonald is an asset on the floor of this parliament. It is a name which I hope will never die, and my hon. friend now is called upon to hold that name high, as I am sure he will. Yet when I pause to reflect that the hon. gentleman represents the city of Kingston and that he comes from my neighbouring province of Nova Scotia, my mind goes back to the election of 1935, in which I was a participant. I recall the announcement made by this hon. gentleman as he began to assault the citadels of protection in the province of Ontario. And he did assault them; the results speak for themselves. Yet to-day he is sitting as the representative of one of those citadels of protection, supporting a government that maintains around this country a tariff wall higher than ever obtained in the history of this country; and he sits for what is often called the "Derry" of Canada. May I say to my hon. friend that I hope he will enjoy his position, because I venture to prophesy, as his right hon. leader once did about me, that he will not occupy it very long.

I wish now to turn to the speech from the throne. The right hon. Prime Minister has put in the mouth of his excellency what I suppose is the shortest speech in the history of this parliament. It has the merit of brevity, but it falls short in everything else by which we measure what a speech from the throne should be. In this speech there is not the slightest intimation of what the government's programme is, save and except that it will report to this parliament. Are we to believe that in summoning this, the second session of this parliament, the government has no programme of legislation, nothing for parliament to do but meet and discuss? That is probably the truth. During the latter part of last session and during the three intervening months this government lulled the people of Canada to sleep in the belief that we are living in the best of all possible worlds. In effect we were told that we needed no direction, and none is given in the speech from the throne. It is true we are promised that opportunity will be afforded—> for the fullest consideration and discussion of Canada's war effort and of national problems which war has served to intensify or create.

But the right to debate and discuss is ours already. What is wanted is full opportunity for interrogation and cross-examination. That cannot be done, I submit, in an ordinary debate on the address. It can be done properly only by having ministers appear before a special committee or committees, or at a round table conference. However, we welcome these declarations, and we shall take full advantage of the opportunities accorded us.

At this point may I direct the attention of hon. members of this house and of the public in general to the fact that to all intents and purposes we have not at this time full responsible government in Canada. As I look back on the work of the last session and on the legislation passed then I am conscious now, as perhaps I was not then, that we, the representatives of the people, have been forced to abdicate many of our functions. War is the excuse. We no longer legislate in the true sense of the word, because we have delegated to the government the power to legislate by order in council. In effect we have set up in Canada a totalitarian state as truly as they have it in Europe. The government even legislates by order in council, when parliament is in session. That ought not to be; it is wrong, and should cease. In one important sphere only has the House of Commons retained its hard-won power and authority. We have, at least, in theory, retained the right to vote supply and to levy taxation—but only under the will and at the direction of the executive. Everything else may be done by order in council.

What a situation, Mr. Speaker, to contemplate and reflect upon! And all this under a so-called Liberal administration, an administration led by a gentleman who throughout all his public life has been most vociferous in upholding the theory of the supremacy of parliament!

May I at this point direct the attention of hon. members to another speech from the throne, one to which we listened only a few days ago. I refer to the speech delivered by the deputy of his excellency when proroguing the last session of parliament. In that speech appears the following sentence:

> The measures which you have taken have had in view the immediate task of sharing more completely in the defence of Britain and securing our own country more effectively against internal subversion and external attack.

Those words are significant. For the first time since Canada entered this great struggle, first things are put first. It is the first time the government has recognized the doctrine that the defence of Britain is first. I congratulate my right hon. friend on those words. That is the principle which I and those associated with me in the house and throughout the country have valiantly sought to have recognized ever since the war began. To me it is fundamental; for Britain is the defender of democracy and civilization, the defender of our democracy and our civilization in this western hemisphere. For us, aid in the defence of Britain should be our first objective; the defence of our beloved country will follow.

The other day my learned and hon. friend the member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton), in the very accomplished speech in moving the address in reply, referred to those who were "more English than the English". I thought there was a touch of sarcasm in that reference, because I assumed he meant myself and those associated with me. That may have been a reference to those in his majesty's loyal opposition who have never ceased to urge upon the government more and more aid to Britain. I say to my hon. friend that those associated with me on this side of the house are as good Canadians as are to be found anywhere else in the house. We all love Canada as we love our wives and children. I believe too, that love for Canada is not confined to hon. members on this side of the house. But those of us who are of united empire loyalist descent, and who have British blood in our veins, love Britain as we love our mothers. Shall we be ashamed of that?

May I ask the government, and particularly the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) who, I understand, is to speak shortly, what is the attitude of the government with respect to the supreme objective of Great Britain as announced by Mr. Churchill on more than one occasion recently? What about Mr. Churchill's proposal for 1942 and 1943 concerning the freeing of France and the low countries? What is Canada's attitude with respect to that matter? In Mr. Churchill's view, and I believe in the view of all of us, this war will not be won until Hitler, with all that he stands for, is crushed.

I make this inquiry of the Minister of National Defence for two reasons. Recently, while inspecting eastern defences in the city of Halifax, he gave an interview. There was nothing improper in that interview, but he indicated no commitments beyond those which the government has already undertaken. I believe we should be taking the long view with respect to the position in Europe. I grant that Mr. Churchill's vision with respect to the reestablishment of France and the low countries is a great and very important one, the realization of which will require a supreme effort on the part of Great Britain and her allies. He visualizes such a campaign in 1942 or 1943 and has intimated that that is the objective of Great Britain. When the Minister of National Defence speaks to us I ask him to tell us whether or not this government is preparing anything in the way of reinforcements to strengthen our units in Britain, and to provide new units when Mr. Churchill's plans are matured. I would ask him for a statement of policy in that regard.

May I at this point pause to enunciate the views with respect to public business of the party I have the honour to lead. I want to be very definite about this matter. To-day the policy of the Conservative party is to continue the policy of cooperation with the government in waging the war over there, and for the defence of the nation here, and to render such assistance as may be in our power to attain the supreme objective.

I say further to my right hon. friend that we desire to persevere in this course by offering constructive criticism. We reserve the right to criticize the proposals and actions of the government which are deemed not to be for the common good, both in its war and in its domestic activities. With respect to all domestic and peace-time questions we reserve the right to criticize, condemn or praise. In a word we will preserve all the rights and will exercise all the privileges of a peace-time opposition.

I hereby rededicate this Conservative party in the House of Commons and in the country to the service of the state, to the supreme task of helping to win the war overseas, to prepare for the defence of our beloved country, to help solve the problems of government in the domestic sphere, and, so far as in our power lies, to promote the greatest good for the greatest number of our fellow citizens.

I assume that the government and I am quite sure that the country would not wish this opposition to be a mere rubber stamp. It would not be good for the government, and I am equally certain that it would not be good for the country. If this were not a party government there might be something to be said for the theory of non-opposition, but there is nothing to be said for such a theory when the affairs of the country are being conducted on the party basis which we have in Canada. I say this in the face of the fact, that, regimented as we are to-day, it is not always popular in some quarters to criticize this government. However, as long as I occupy this position I shall not be deterred by adverse criticism from doing what I deem to be my duty. Fortunately to-day in Canada there is evidence that the question of freedom of discussion in the press and on the public platform is forging to the front. In any free country there must be freedom of the press and freedom of discussion, otherwise liberty perishes.

I approach the consideration of Canada's war effort with some diffidence, and may I say with some reluctance. I approach it with diffidence because I realize that with my limited knowledge of matters military I am not well equipped either to criticize or to make real constructive suggestions. But subject to that handicap I propose to give to the house and the country the benefit of such views and conclusions as I have arrived at.

My main objective during the last session of parliament—this was also the objective of this opposition—was to push on by admonition and precept the supreme task of assisting Britain in winning the war, winning the war over there, not here on this western hemisphere. I said then, as I say now, that Britain with her mighty navy and dauntless air force was our only defence. I now desire to add to this my humble meed of praise and admiration for the dauntless courage of her leaders and of her people. I pause here to pay them all a tribute, humble though it may be.

Throughout all the ages of history there has never been witnessed an epic like Dunkirk, and there has never been such a display of dauntless courage and tenacity as has been exhibited by our hard-pressed kinsmen in the old land. Dunkirk stands as an historic moment comparable with the Charge of the Light Brigade. Some day soon it may be that a great poet will record this heroism in immortal poetry. Pride in their success, pride in their determination and pride in their courage wells up in the heart of the most humble Canadian. To those of us who have in our veins the same blood which flows in the veins of our kinsmen overseas there will ever arise a feeling of pride and thanksgiving that we are sprung from the same race. No wonder people everywhere are singing the toast, "There'll Always Be An England." May I be permitted to quote just the first and last verses of this song:

> There'll always be an England
> While there's a country lane;
> Wherever there's a cottage small
> Beside a field of grain;
> There'll always be an England,
> And England shall be free,
> If England means as much to you
> As England means to me.

But while we are thankful and grateful that there has been no invasion of England we are conscious of the fact that the battle of Britain is not yet over. In these circumstances the theory of aid and more aid to Britain should be the controlling motive of our military preparations. For again I say that our first and only defence is in England, and we should strive to keep the battle there. In the recent fighting in and over England we are grateful to think that Canada has been ably represented in the Royal Air Force. I am glad to know that a Canadian squadron which forms part of the Royal Air Force has played a distinguished part. I have some reason to know about this. Some of the finest young men that Canada ever produced went over to the other side from my province in 1937 and 1938, and many of them will not return.

But, after all, our contribution to the first battle of Britain has been rather pitiful. In fact it has not been a factor in the defence of Britain at all, so far as I am aware. If I am wrong I hope my hon. friend will illuminate the position. I recall with feelings which I shall never forget the call of Mr. Eden over the radio in June last for planes, guns and tanks—and we had none to send. I recall that we were told early last session by the Minister of Munitions and Supply that we could not make tanks in Canada. I was assured at that time that they could be made in Canada. At that very time I knew that the Angus shops were ready and willing to undertake the manufacture of tanks. I had it from one of the responsible officials that they were only waiting for the word to go. I am glad to know that the minister has changed his mind. It was several months late, but better late than never. Apparently he changed his mind by reason of the persistent and patient efforts of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce), who although derided from across the floor of this house kept to his text. All honour to the hon. member for Parkdale.

Then a word with respect to the manufacture of aeroplanes in Canada. This is a great problem which this country should have faced long ago. A number of years ago a leading Canadian company was willing to undertake the task of building planes in this country, but the government would not. Latterly the government had another change of heart and decided to build these machines in Canada. A government owned and controlled company has been set up for this purpose. I congratulate the government upon this change. May I also congratulate the minister upon having enlisted the services of an outstanding young Canadian executive to take charge of these operations. I have known this gentleman since his boyhood.

In connection with the manufacture of aeroplanes I should like to have from the minister some explanation as to why Mr. Sanderson of Fleet Aircraft Limited was brought into this work, and then a few months afterwards his services were dispensed with. Some explanation is due beyond the terms of the platitudes contained in the minister's letter to Mr. Sanderson at the time of his retirement. Is it possible that his position as head of aircraft production in Canada was inconsistent with his position as head of Fleet Aircraft Limited? The minister should tell us the naked truth about this. Nor have the Canadian people ever been told the truth about the retirement of Mr. Wallace Campbell from the war purchasing board. I invite the minister to tell us the facts about this.

Then there is the question of big guns. To my knowledge we have never made big guns in Canada, but I understand that we are now approaching the task. In an interview given on October 10 by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson), he declared that before the end of 1940 Canada would be making heavy naval guns, the largest used in the empire. That was announced by the director of public information in a release dated October 10 on Canada's war effort. This was part of the government's propaganda, and I have it under my hand. To me that was an astonishing claim. It seemed incredible to me. It simply is not true. Why make such claims? They only puzzle and confuse the Canadian people, and it is a most reprehensible practice.

Mr. GIBSON: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The statement which has been quoted by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) was not correct. I never made such a statement. I did say that naval guns were to be made in a factory which was to be one of the largest and most modern in the British empire—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member can make a speech later.

Mr. GIBSON: —not, a factory making guns which were the biggest and most modern. That is the statement which was made.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Here is what the government's director of public information said: "Canada's War Effort"—this is an official release—a weekly review of developments on the home front, issued by the government; and the eighth item is:

Hon. C. W. G. Gibson, Minister of National Revenue, states in an interview that heavy naval guns, the largest used in the empire, will be produced in Canada before the end of 1940.

Well, where is the crossing of the wires? Somewhere.

By next year, said Mr. Gibson, the dominion will be producing seven tanks a day.

If he did not say that, I suggest that the wires were crossed in his department or some other department; and I will tell him further, that he will never catch up with the story; first impressions are always hardest to remove. I accept absolutely his statement that he has been misquoted. But something is wrong.

I want to refer now to motorized equipment. If there is one thing which we should be able to make in Canada for this war, it is motorized equipment. We, rightly or wrongly, have fostered the motor industry in Canada over a long period of years and at great cost to the consuming public. In September last the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), speaking in Toronto, I believe, made the statement that Canada was producing 600 motor units a day. That seemed to me to be an extravagant statement. A few days later I read that an executive of a big tire company closely allied to the motor industry had stated in a public address in the same city that we were making 100 motor units per day. That seemed to be an understatement. Therefore I made some investigations on my own account, and my information is that neither statement was correct—an overstatement in the one case, and an understatement in the other. But I am glad to say that my investigations lead me to the conclusion that we are now approaching 600 motor units per day, and that spells great progress. Yet, late in the last session, information reached me privately from a reliable source in England that motor units ordered by the government had landed in England in an incomplete condition. Before I could verify the facts, a representative of the Southam newspapers had cabled the story to Canada.

I made no public reference to the report, but after the session was over I made a friendly call on the Minister of National Defence and told him what I had heard and what had been reported to me. I found that he had heard more than I had. He was exceedingly frank with me. He explained the modus operandi of the department—how the Department of National Defence had requisitioned these motor units from the supply ministry. The specifications were provided by his department, which also undertook the inspection. Some hundreds of these cars which arrived in England could not stand a brake test, others were incomplete, and parts had to be secured hurriedly, in England, in Canada and in the United States. I am told that the cost aggregated $80,000. I am not blaming the minister at all. He told me, and I believe every word he told me, that they had set up what they considered to be as good an inspection service as was to be found anywhere else in Canada. That is all a minister can do.

An hon. MEMBER: Most of them Tories.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I do not know whether they were Grits or Tories. If they did not do their duty they ought to be disciplined, and I am sure the minister has taken care of that. I mention this matter to say that the inspection was either insufficient or faulty.

In the light of these facts—I attempt only to give a few of those that have come to my knowledge; I have had a flood of information and allegations coming to me from which I have had to separate all the chaff—what are we to think of speeches made by ministers and by deputy ministers that in our war effort Canada is living in the best of all possible worlds? I sometimes wonder, when ministers read speeches prepared in many instances by subordinates, whether they ever verify the statements. The Canadian people are puzzled; they are confused; they do not know what to believe. I do not know what to believe, and I call upon the responsible ministers to make as soon as possible, clean, truthful, factual, and honest statements, free from propaganda and partisanship, so that we may examine and know.

The Canadian people want to help the government win this war; make no mistake about that. The heart of the people is sound. We want to help this government win this war—make no mistake about that. But we must be told the naked truth.

I want to know, too, whether in the huge contracts which are being let every day, in such quantities and in such amounts and covering such a variety of products, we are getting value for our money. I am talking now to the Minister of Finance. The Canadian people who provide this money, either in taxes or by way of loans, want to know. But the statements which we get must have the ring of truth. Too much has been put forward which is in the nature of propaganda. The public will swallow just so much of that, but after a while it nauseates.

In passing, may I ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply why no contracts for equipment have been given in the maritime provinces? Aside from minor contracts for supplies, such as boots and shoes, woollens and lumber, the industrial facilities of the maritimes have not been utilized and developed. The only work being carried on in the city of Saint John is confined to the Dry Dock company, and the Saint John Iron Works, which they control. The steel company at Sydney is occupied largely with British orders. There is no industrialization of the maritime provinces or marshalling of our efforts there. I ask my new friend from Nova Scotia—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Kingston.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —from Kingston; I am afraid I never can dissociate him from the bluenose province, and I do not think he desires to be dissociated, either—to give an ear to this plea and to see if we cannot have something done. We have facilities down there. I have in mind a little town not far from the New Brunswick border; I shall not name it. Why are the facilities there not being utilized? Why are there no new developments in the maritime provinces? I want to say this: if you are going to centralize everything in central Canada, as has been the custom for decades, do you think the people of the maritime provinces are going to tolerate that sort of thing? They will not. They are just as loyal as and perhaps more loyal than the people in the central provinces. I would make the same reference to people in the other parts of Canada—in the west. Things can be done out there; they can be done in the maritime provinces; let us have them done. One hears so much talk—and if one judges by what appeared in the newspapers yesterday morning we are going to hear more to the same effect when the dominion-provincial conference is held—about central Canada paying the bill. Well, I am not one of those who wants to create dissension in the country. I believe in Canada. We are all making a contribution. But in our war effort, not merely as regards the supplies, but in respect of equipment, let us really distribute it. It is up to the Minister of Munitions and Supply to see that something is done in this direction: he seems to forget that he ever lived down there. I do not think I need say more on this point at the present time; we will wait until we hear what the reports are.

Now I wish to devote a little time to the consideration of a speech made in the city of Ottawa on October 23 last by the chief of the general staff, Major-General Crerar. It is a rather unusual thing for a chief of the general staff to get up in any public body and make a speech about a matter which is or may become the subject of political discussion in this country. I am not going to take exception to General Crerar's speaking on this matter, but I should like to know whether the speech was inspired by the Department of National Defence, and I ask the minister to say whether it was or not. The copy of the speech which I have under my hand bears all the earmarks of having been issued by the department itself, and it may therefore be considered to be a speech on behalf of the minister, because the copy I have was issued from the press liaison office of the Department of National Defence, Ottawa.

I have read that speech very carefully, and this is what I believe it to be: The speech has served as an apologia for and defence of the government's war effort, particularly in respect of the thirty day training scheme—and I use the word apologia in its classical sense. It is a defence of the government's war effort and particularly of the thirty-day scheme. And what is the apologia? The gist of it was that the effort was limited because of lack of preparedness, lack of equipment, lack of the implements of war. That is the story in a nutshell, if you read that speech carefully.

On page 8 of the speech General Crerar states:

> The major issue confronting Canada in particular and North America in general is to win this war in Europe and so to prevent any possibility of this continent finding itself in a definitely isolated and exposed situation.

Mr. Speaker, I agree with every word that General Crerar has said in that regard. It is fundamental and it is something I have iterated and reiterated from the very beginning; and I say further, with him, that the question of home defence will follow. Then he draws certain lessons. I am not hoping to cover the whole scope of his speech, but he draws two lessons from our experiences to date. The first appears on pages 8 and 9 of the speech, and it is this: That Canadian forces must be fully provided with mechanized power, including modern artillery, armoured fighting vehicles, and ample assistance for close support aircraft. That of course is fundamental and quite sound. The second lesson he derives from the history of the war so far is this: Reliance on static defence is inviting defeat. The failure of the allies in the field has been due to the lack of attacking power. That is what he says, and to quote from page 9:

> To take the offensive, military forces must be highly trained, as well as powerfully armed, and, furthermore, trained to cooperate closely with the air force.

On page 10 he says we must concentrate on two things:

1. Utilization to the full of all the skill, ingenuity and facilities we now possess "to advance the fundamental training of all ranks now in our army in the science and art of their profession."

2. Intensification of our efforts towards the complete provision of the armaments required by those men before they are called upon to meet the enemy in battle.

On page 11, he reveals his views with respect to compulsory training and to service for home defence of our man-power. I ask this question: Are these the views of my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence, and are these the views of the ministry with respect to compulsory training. I quote:

> All my life I have firmly believed that true democracy means equality of service of all for the state, as well as equality of opportunity for all, within the state.

Then he takes full responsibility for the thirty-day training plan and justifies it. I should have supposed that this responsibility belonged to my right hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his colleagues. I do not think the chief of the general staff is called upon to take the responsibility. That is the function, that is the jurisdiction and the obligation of the ministry, and I do not think the chief of the general staff ought to be put in the position where he has to take responsibility for matters of policy of this sort. However, he has done so.

Mr. RALSTON: The chief of the general staff was not put in the position of having to take responsibility. He was invited by the Canadian club of Ottawa to deliver an address before I ever heard of it, and he asked me if I had any objection to his delivering an address.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If that is all my hon. friend has to say he had better keep his seat and speak later. I understand the department asked the Canadian club to ask General Crerar to make that speech.

Mr. RALSTON: That is absolutely untrue.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I leave it at that. I do not see the point of my hon. friend's interruption at the moment.

Mr. RALSTON: I had to contradict that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He takes full responsibility for the thirty-day training plan, though I do not think he is called upon to do so, and he justifies it. First of all he says:

> The short period enabled a larger number of young people to gain a proper conception of their national obligations within a given time.

There is a certain element of truth in that statement. The conception of national obligation is needed by many of our people, and if this thirty-day training plan was put forward with that as one of its objectives, and if it has accomplished that purpose, it will at least have served a fair and useful end in so far as it goes. Then he says, as to the second reason for our limited period of training:

> Our limited supply of modern weapons made it impracticable to carry the individual training of these men beyond the basic stage and the limited syllabus.

Those are the two reasons alleged by the chief of the general staff for this limited period of training. I have some ideas on this whole proposal. I do not condemn the scheme: I want to make that abundantly clear. I know there are difficulties. There is the lack of equipment and there is also the necessity of building up a sense of national obligation to the state in time of war, to which the chief of the general staff has alluded. But I do not think that anyone in this house will contend that a thirty-day training scheme is likely to make much of a soldier. I could give this house reams of criticism of this thirty-day training scheme, and all our war effort. In passing may I commend to the attention of the Prime Minister the very dignified and able letter written by Major-General Elmsley and published in the Globe and Mail of Toronto a week or so ago. I am not going to take the time of the house to read it but I hope he has read that letter, that he has plumbed its depths and will respond to some of the suggestions contained in it. This man, I am told, is a very distinguished soldier; surely he is worth listening to.

An hon. MEMBER: In what war?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Both the South African war and the late war, I understand.

This training plan is spoken of as thirty days' training: Is it? I think you can deduct eight or ten days; you have to take off the days for registration and for breakaway, two days at least, four Sundays, four half holidays, the time for inoculation, and what not. I am told that the actual period of training does not exceed 150 hours. That may be an understatement, I do not know; but I do know that it cannot be much in excess of 150 hours. And I do not think you can do much towards making a soldier in 150 hours.

Yet I do not condemn the plan, because I watched these boys myself in my own city and I want to say how pleased I was to see the progress they made in a week. I want to pay tribute to my colleague (Mr. Brooks) who was at the head of that camp for the work he did down there. I saw them on their march out the first Sunday and I saw them on the second Sunday, and you would hardly believe what a metamorphosis there was. The physical training alone did them a world of good, forty-five minutes every morning at eight o'clock—I wish I could do it; I would be the better for it. It is a grand thing for these young boys. They learn to march and form threes and go through the elementary evolutions. So far as it goes the syllabus is good, and I would not condemn it except to say that it does not make a soldier. To stop this training at this point would be a great waste of money, especially if they are not attached to some non-permanent active militia unit.

Mr. RALSTON: They are.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): These men should put in the non-permanent active militia training. I hope my hon. friend will make that clear; there is no compulsory further training now, as I understand the position. I hope he is right.

Mr. RALSTON: I said they are attached to a non-permanent active militia unit.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It would be a great waste of time and money, I think, if they did not go further. After giving the matter the best consideration I can, and having obtained the best advice I can, I am going to make two concrete suggestions. I hope the minister will give heed to them, because these suggestions are offered in the best of good faith, designed to achieve an objective which I think both he and I have at heart.

The first suggestion is that the length of time of training for these men be increased to at least four months, and that we train three groups a year instead of ten. The first eight weeks of this four months' course should be designated the basic recruits' course, and the second eight weeks the trained men's course, and graduation being required from one course into the other.

I am not going to compare what we are doing with what they are doing in the United States, but certainly I think no one will suggest that thirty days' training will make a man a soldier. I am told that a four months' course will make a man quite a good soldier. These two courses would be in some degree repetitions, but the courses have been worked out to be the minimum period necessary for initial training. Lengthening the course would mean that fewer men would be taken away from industry at the present time. That is important. And it would mean that those taken would receive training that would be of great value when they are called to active service.

My second concrete suggestion is this. I propose that all men, when they have received the four months' course, should be posted to the local non-permanent active militia units, not merely put on the reserve, as I understand is the present position. If I am wrong I hope my hon. friend will correct me. This would ensure their training being continuous and would prevent them from forgetting most of the rapidly given instruction already received, as will probably be the case under the present plan. It would keep up their morale, which to-day I am glad to think is magnificent. These young men have fine morale and we ought to keep that up.

The non-permanent active militia units are probably able to absorb one or two groups, but their facilities for doing so would soon be overtaxed. Therefore it is extremely difficult to post the trainees from the thirty-day course to the non-permanent active militia units because of excess of numbers and lack of facilities. The saturation point would soon be reached.

If the war to date has taught our military authorities anything it is that a few well trained and well equipped troops are better than vast numbers of partly trained men. That was implied by General Crerar in his speech before the Ottawa Canadian club. To-day in Canada we have recruited for our armed forces more men than we can train and equip. I think I am within the limits of the truth when I make that statement. Our military effort is ahead of our industrial effort. Let us strengthen our weakest link first. I would point out that the United Kingdom, with a population of approximately forty million people, has raised upwards of one hundred divisions. Of course I realize that England is an armed fortress, that she must raise proportionately more men than we, but if Canada were doing its pro rata share we would be required to raise twenty-five divisions, as well as carry on the air training plan. I point this out to give an idea of the effort that Britain is exerting and what we should be prepared at least to contemplate.

Let me recapitulate. I suggest that the plan be continued, with a four months' training period instead of thirty days, and that all men be required to join non-permanent active militia units and receive further training with them and the special instruction peculiar to the arm of the service that they are finally to enter.

I desire now to turn to a consideration of Canada's war effort as viewed by our friends to the south. This is a matter upon which I have reflected deeply and upon which I believe the Canadian people have reflected deeply.

When I left here on August 3 last I did so with the consoling thought that in some measure at least I had made some contribution with respect to driving the ministry into a real war stride, and I think I had a right to that consolation. I honestly thought that after ten months of hesitation and delay and not grappling with the great problem of the war, Canada was really getting into its war stride. I held that belief until early in October. It will be recalled that a large number of eminent journalists from the neighbouring republic were invited to visit Canada in September last. I believe that the Canadian government was the host and that the arrangements were consummated and carried through under the auspices of the Canadian Press. In any event these gentlemen came to Canada. They were taken to see everything their conductors wanted them to see. Presumably they were told everything their conductors wanted them to hear. Certainly I have the right to assume that, and certainly I have the right to assume that they were not shown or told anything that would be detrimental to the prestige of the government. That was not the idea at all; that never was contemplated. Mr. Rupert Davies, head of the Canadian Press, would see to that. They were shown and told of the best of Canada's war effort. They went home and early in October wrote their impressions and ideas in their own way, and I judge without any censorship. This does not make pleasant reading. Frankly I was greatly disillusioned. I did not have an opportunity of studying all they reported, but some of their reports rather made my heart sick. I suppose the most outstanding military expert among them was Mr. Baldwin of the New York Times, a newspaper which in my view ranks as high if not higher than any other journal in the world. His report appeared in the New York Times of October 1, and the headlines themselves are disheartening:

War Effort Peak in Canada a Year Off.
Dominion Expected to Become Major Factor in Conflict Late in 1941.
Bottlenecks in Skilled Labour, Machine Tools and Plane Engines Revealed.

How does that jibe with what we were told in the months of July and August, when parliament was in session? Particularly how does it jibe with what Canada had been told by ministers and others after parliament had adjourned?

I am glad to think that Mr. Baldwin's comments and reflections were not all adverse; far from it. It is a great pleasure to read that he found Canada virtually united in an earnest determination to prosecute the war and to defend the western hemisphere. He paid well deserved tribute to the men of the armed forces; but his comments give no cause for the complacency exhibited to us. On the contrary, in some instances they tend to give cause for grave humility. He found Canada "sadly lacking, not in man power but equipment," all of which we knew. He found "many shortages of equipment, as well as bottlenecks in aircraft engines, machine tools and skilled labour." Industrial production is described as "but a small drop in the huge bucket of war." But he did find that in the empire air training scheme—and I want to commend this to my hon. friends opposite and especially to the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power)—there was the most promise for effective aid to the mother country; that it would be "Canada's greatest war contribution," but that it would not produce its first class of about forty pilots until this month, November, and would not reach its peak until late in 1941, two years or more after the war started. He made this statement with regard to aircraft production.

No aircraft engines are being produced in Canada. Air frames (or planes) are being produced at the rate of about 130 a month. About 110 or 120 of these are training planes —Fleets and de Havillands; the other ten are Bristol Blenheim and Hampden bombers and Hawker Hurricane fighters. About ten planes a month—mostly training planes—are being received from the United States. Present plans call for peak production—which it is hoped will be 320 to 360 planes a month, two-thirds of them training planes—by March, 1941, a plan that is not likely to be realized.

The next extract I shall skip, for it is long and not particularly important. This writer does not attach any blame; it would not be his function to do so. He gives independent testimony on what I have always maintained and on what the former Minister of National Defence specifically denied to me across the floor of this house; that, with respect to our first and second divisions, except for motor transport, rifles, uniforms and gas masks, they were virtually equipped in England.

Mr. Baldwin praises the quality of our fighting material. He states that, because of equipment shortage, men cannot be finally and well trained, but adds that personnel is alert and eager, and mentally of a high standard. They have been thoroughly drilled in fundamentals and are particularly well schooled in concealment, field craft and protection against gas. He was not, of course, referring to the thirty day training plan.

Summing up, Mr. Baldwin states that Canada's war effort is now—as of September, 1940, a year after the war began——commencing to mesh into gear, though it will still be eight to twelve months before the Canadian effort becomes a major factor in the war.

So much for the opinions of our friends to the south.

Recently I read with interest an article appearing in the London Spectator, written by Mr. Grant Dexter, reviewing the position of Canada a year after the declaration of war. No one will accuse Mr. Grant Dexter of being unfriendly to this government. His article is laudatory rather than critical, as was to be expected; yet he too recognizes what we all know now. Canada made no real strides for the first eight months of the war. It was not until things began to happen overseas that Canada awoke from her complacency. Still she proceeded leisurely, and it was not until the fall of France and the epic of Dunkirk that this country and this government really awoke to the seriousness of the situation. There were people and newspapers which knew and which vainly attempted to arouse the Canadian people and this government, but it took a major disaster to the allied cause really to arouse all of them.

To-day the people of Canada want to know results. Since last June they have been fed a staggering array of figures of contracts let for equipment, munitions, supplies and a hundred other things. What are the results to date, fourteen months after the declaration of war? That is what the people want to know. That is why there was such a demand to have parliament resume its sittings.

I have a list of specific questions I want to ask the government.

1. Why have no rifles been made in Canada to date for use by our battalions? Why are our thirty-day trainees given only old Ross rifles, many of which may not be fired? Only those which have been reconditioned may be fired.

2. Why is there such a shortage of machine guns for use by machine gun units?

3. Why is signal equipment practically non-existent? Mr. Baldwin stressed this in his review of our conditions on October 1.

4. What is the position with respect to Bren guns? Why is there so much secrecy about their production? From time to time we are told that production of this and production of that is up to schedule or ahead of schedule, but we hardly know what the schedule is. What is the schedule in connection with Bren guns? We are told that it calls for a thousand guns by the end of next March, a large portion of which are to go to England.

5. Are there any 25-pounders for our artillery? According to Mr. Baldwin the answer is "only one." Our artillery units are armed only with obsolete 18-pounders left over from the last war. Two artillery units in training in my province, one at St. Stephen and one at Fredericton, have never even had a wooden gun with which to train. I talked to the officers personally, and they are just sick about it.

6. What is the stage of production of tanks in Canada? How far, if at all, have we progressed?

7. How far have we progressed in the manufacture of aeroplanes? I have been told that no engines are being made, that it is only hoped to make them at some indefinite time in the future.

8. What is the production of aeroplane propellors and hubs?

9. How does our effort compare with that of our sister dominion, Australia? From a recent account I read it would appear that in every field of war endeavour, Australia, with only about two-thirds as many people and probably less than two-thirds the wealth of this country, is far ahead of Canada.

I do not suggest now that there is not now the will to do. At one time that charge might have been justified, but the force of public opinion, coupled with the tragic trend of events last spring and summer, have shaken that complacency. It is no longer to be a comfortable, moderate war contribution, such as was promised in some quarters, in which Canada was to assume her own coastal defence and provide economic and material aid in foodstuffs and supplies.

These are some of the questions surging through the minds of the Canadian people after fourteen months of war. I suggest to the ministry that, in making reply, they eliminate the superlative and get down to realities and let the people know the facts. The people have been fed long enough with propaganda, dished up to them by high-powered press liaison officers. And when one man does not suit a certain cabinet minister he is fired, and somebody else is put in his place—probably for cause, I don't know. Specifically, will the government set up a committee or committees of the house before which these matters may be examined concretely, so that the naked truth may emerge?

Briefly—and I apologize to the house for taking so much time—may I refer to the international position. Certainly I do not want to do anything which would embarrass the government with respect to the situation on the Pacific coast. I do suggest, however, that the ministry should tell us something about our relations with Japan. From the information I get from British Columbia it would seem that there is a great deal of arrogance on the part of Japanese nationals who live in that province. I hope the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) will make some reference to this situation.

Then, what about Vichy? From the beginning I have refrained from saying anything with regard to Vichy. I believe Canada should follow a certain course, and I have indicated to the Prime Minister what in my opinion that course should be. I should not like to do anything which in any degree would embarrass the administration, but I do suggest the Prime Minister ought to make some reference to Vichy.

Now I turn to our relations with the United States. After the Ogdensburg meeting there was set up a joint defence committee and, to say the least, it has been functioning with great publicity. I have never condemned the Ogdensburg conversations. In the speech I made in Toronto I said it was capable of a high and noble purpose, and I believe so yet. But I thought I should sound a note of warning to the Canadian people that what was transpiring at Ogdensburg with great and blatant publicity had been carried on before with profound secrecy. And my colleague (Mr. Stirling) told that to the Prime Minister when we visited him on August 20.

I want to say this with respect to the references I made concerning Mr. Roosevelt, to the effect that it was window-dressing for him: I had no idea of referring to the impending election. But I did have reference to the difficulties Mr. Roosevelt was having with his own congress and his own congressional leaders. Why, it is well known that he had to get his attorney general to reverse his legal opinion about the delivery of the fifty destroyers. But he got the quid pro quo, and it took away the opposition from congress. That was the window-dressing I had in mind in connection with Ogdensburg.

Was there anything wrong about that? The hon. member for Yale and I went to see the Prime Minister. He was very frank with us; he told us that the conversations had been initiated by Mr. Roosevelt, and he told us why. He told us there were no commitments. I want to know what commitments there are to-day. I have not been able to find anything in the records yet, and I am asking the Prime Minister to be frank with the people of Canada. I agree that if Great Britain falls, which is unthinkable, then the matter becomes a very live and important one. But so long as Great Britain stands, so long as the British navy is there, so long as the Royal Air Force is our defender, the matter is not of first-class importance. I say that because the people of the United States themselves, and their leaders, have admitted that the British navy is their first line of defence.

There are one or two further points to which I should like to refer, and I turn first to the situation in Ireland. Last week I was greatly disturbed, in reading Mr. Churchill's speech on the progress of the war, by his very specific references to the fact that one of the great menaces at this time to the successful winning of the war is the destruction of British and allied shipping by submarines. I was deeply interested in the problem presented by the refusal of the government of Mr. de Valera in Eire to allow the British government to lease naval bases in Eire, and to use airports in the same jurisdiction. The failure of Mr. de Valera to cooperate with the British government and his adoption of an extreme position of neutrality in this great conflict constitutes a serious problem in respect of the success of the British arms and the winning of the war. In my humble view such failure is a valuable contribution to the axis powers. Something should and must be done to meet this situation. It is apparent, I believe, that the government of Eire will not recede from its position of non-cooperation as a result only of a request from the government of Great Britain. But that very fact opens an opportunity to the government of Canada to make a wonderful contribution to the allied cause.

On Friday last I read with great interest and appreciation a letter written to the Montreal Gazette by a famous padre, Archdeacon Scott of Quebec. May I be permitted to quote one or two sentences:

> We who in Canada live with and love the Irish (so many of whom have gone overseas, keen in their loyalty to the empire) feel that something could be done to save the bitter situation. We have nothing to do with the sad differences of Britain and Eire in the past. We are a new nation. French, Irish and British have found a deep heart union strengthened now by a common danger.

Then follows a most valuable suggestion, one which I desire to urge upon the Prime Minister and the government. I say the government should make a personal appeal to Mr. de Valera to lease to Canada for the duration of the war two ports on the west coast of Eire for use as empire naval stations. In addition to that, I suggest that Canada approach Mr. de Valera with a proposal that Eire lease to Canada certain strategic airports in the south and west of Eire for use as empire air stations.

I do not know whether such a proposal would be acceptable, but I do know that Canada should make the attempt. In days gone by Canada has been the friend of Ireland. She gave a warm welcome and opportunity to many Irish exiles in the days of long ago. She watched sympathetically, and sometimes helpfully, the creation of Irish freedom, and at successive imperial conferences and at Geneva Canada was a friend of Ireland. It may be that the position is not easy for Mr. de Valera. The extremists in his party would raise the cry against him in days to come that he had brought back the British to Ireland. That theory would not be valid if he leased his bases to Canada, because no one can doubt that Canada would fulfil not only the letter but the spirit of the lease, and withdraw at the close of the war.

I do not think there is anything impracticable about the suggestion. It is important; it is pressing, and every avenue for its adoption should be explored in the common interests of all concerned. The suggestion is worth more than a trial; it should be pressed to fruition. More than that, may I make the further suggestion that if in approaching Mr. de Valera Canada finds opposition, it should enlist in such an effort, and I have no doubt would receive, the warm and sympathetic cooperation of the government of the United States.

Whatever may have been the attitude of Canada toward Ireland in the past, there can be no doubt that in days gone by a substantial element in the United States stood by the people of Ireland and gave material help and contributed in no small degree to the goal of Irish freedom. The support and sympathy and active aid of the United States should be enlisted. The problem must be solved, and it must be solved by peaceful negotiation. I suggest that here is an opportunity for this government to render a real service to the allied cause at a time when the submarine menace bears heavily upon our position.

May I bring to the attention of the Minister of National Defence a matter which is of some importance to the members of our armed forces. I want to make a plea on their behalf. I understand that the request has been made to the government that free transportation should be provided at the expense of the treasury for those entitled to what is known as the long leave or furlough. I am informed that this request has been made already, and refused. I hope the latter part of my information is not true. No doubt the matter is a difficult one, but I ask the government to reconsider its position and yield what is considered to be a right on the part of these men and their relatives. Home is sweet to all of us, but how much sweeter it must be to our volunteers who have been absent for six months or more, perhaps in an ancient colony or on one of the islands of the sea? There is a sentiment about this which just cannot be ignored. If the government will not yield, there will be much heartburning in Canada. We pay the entire cost of the transportation of the thirty-day trainees to and from the training camps. That is right and proper. I simply urge the government to pay the transportation of those on furlough. I am informed that this was done during the last war.

Mr. RALSTON: I may say to my hon. friend that that is not true.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I stand corrected, but I was told that by a gentleman who served in the last war and who ought to know. If these men, some of whom have been absent from their homes in Canada for months in places distant two thousand or three thousand miles, are not given the necessary assistance, they cannot possibly make the trip home. I beg of the government that it reconsider its position and if at all possible yield to what seems to me to be a very human and, may I add, reasonable request.

I do not think that I should be doing my duty if I did not make some reference to finance. When the Minister of National Defence was Minister of Finance he brought down a budget providing for ordinary expenditures of about $477 million, which expenditures I think could have been materially reduced. He budgeted for war expenditures of over $900 million, a total of nearly $1,400 million. I am told that the daily war expenditures, which of course are in addition to the ordinary expenditures, are now approaching $3,000,000. The revenue from taxation is about $750 million, which is based upon a national income of $4,500 million. This would appear to be an over-estimate when we consider that we cannot sell our wheat and other field crops which form the major part of our normal production. This deficit of $600 million must be taken care of by borrowing.

We have had two war loans. The first war loan of $200 million was over-subscribed by fifty per cent in three days. The second war loan of $300 million was subscribed for only after three weeks, and then under pressure.

Mr. ILSLEY: Under two weeks.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think it was longer than that; my recollection is that it was three weeks. However, that does not matter. We do know that the second war loan was a flop.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It was a flop; I do not care what the minister says. I have been out through the country and I know what the people think about it. What were the causes for the failure of this second war loan? I am trying to help the minister, if he only knew it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Hon. members may laugh, but I am concerned about this thing. This money must be forthcoming. It is a matter which concerns the credit of the Canadian people. This money must be forthcoming from the Canadian people, because there is no other source from which it can be obtained.

I have been trying to analyse the causes of this failure, which are many and varied. The first cause, I think, is the lack of war fervour on the part of the rank and file of the Canadian people. I am convinced that there is nothing like the war fervour that existed between 1914 and 1918. To-day we have the radio over which we get broadcasts from here, there and everywhere, and it may be that we have become saturated with war news and are ready to turn away.

I believe another reason for this lack of fervour is the fact that there are not the heavy casualty lists which we had in the last war. Those were the things that made us think and act. I pray that we may not have them, but I do believe that that is one reason for this lack of fervour. I am trying to analyse the situation as honestly and objectively as I possibly can. That is number one.

Then I lay at the feet of the administration the charge of having imposed tremendously heavy and oppressive taxation by the 1940 budget. This taxation affected those who ordinarily would have subscribed millions of dollars. The people are now bewildered with the fear of being unable to pay this greatly increased taxation. We are taxing the well-disposed to the limit. There was no equality of sacrifice in the 1940 budget. I place the responsibility for this squarely upon the administration.

I think there was another reason for the failure of this war loan. It was left entirely in the hands of the investment dealers' association. I have nothing against these gentlemen, although there were times when I wish they had not come around—that is, as far as my own private affairs were concerned. They unloaded a lot of pretty poor stuff upon the people of this country between 1921 and 1930. I suppose the old maxim of caveat emptor prevailed during that time as well as at other times. War loans cannot be put over in this way. The Minister of Finance set up a national committee composed of a number of men with imposing names, some of them with one foot in the grave and others who could not act at all, but this committee never met. Provincial committees were set up, but the members were never asked to meet. There is a gentleman in my town, one of the finest citizens we have, who would have been only too glad to act, but he was not asked to do anything.

This kind of set-up is not good enough. When the next loan comes along, and I assume it will be upon us before very long, some better method will have to be adopted. I suggest to the minister that there should be community efforts headed by men who are absolutely disinterested. We on this side of the house will be ready to help with the greatest good-will. We know the money must be forthcoming.

Then there is another factor to be considered, and I draw this to the attention of the Minister of Finance. There has grown up in the minds of the people of this country a resistance against lending money to the government when they know that there has been great extravagance in government expenditures. This has created resistance in the minds of many whom I have met.

Take the question of the building of these hutments. They are built on a specification which I suggest is too high. I am told—the minister will correct me if I am wrong—that it was established in England. I have talked to contractors and engineers, including government engineers. Of course the government engineers justify the specifications for a high-class type of building. Naturally if these buildings are to be occupied for a number of years they should be well built; but what excuse is there for putting 2 x 10's planed on four sides in these buildings? Do you know what that costs? If you do not know, just go and ask any good lumberman here in Ottawa and he will tell you how much it adds to the expense to plane on two sides.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Is there any difference between the cost of planed lumber and the cost of rough lumber?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Certainly. I will say, yes.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Not in British Columbia.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have been in the lumber business for a long time, and associated with it in a big way, and I tell the hon. gentleman that it costs more to buy planed lumber. But that is mentioned only as an illustration of what I am trying to impress upon the house. I have found that you cannot tell engineers much, and I have had some experience with them. I am told by competent engineers that the hutments could be built by contract, instead of by day labour, at a saving of twenty-five per cent. I commend that information to the minister.

He has got to step on this thing. The people of Canada look to him to protect the treasury; if he does not do it they will not give him the money. This charge of extravagance is in the mouth of everybody.

I will give the house just one other illustration. Potatoes come to the camps in 90-pound bags. The bags in which they are packed cost and are worth five cents each. For a long time those bags were not reclaimed; they were thrown out and afterwards picked up by the kitchen help, and a dealer came around and obtained them in return for a few cigarettes, and took them away and probably sold them to those who were supplying the government. That sort of thing went on for quite a long time. I believe that now it has been corrected. I mention it merely to illustrate the fact that apparently nobody is charged with the responsibility of looking after little things and that there is terrible waste. All war, of course, is waste. But here is one reason why this loan did not go over; people see every day instances of extravagance.

I am not going to dilate on the fact that there is a feeling that this is a Liberal war. It is true that in some quarters there are people who say, "All right, you are running this war, you can pay for it." That is not a good enough excuse. Neither is that excuse good enough which I heard from a man—I am not going to tell you where or when—who said that he would not subscribe to the war loan because the rate of interest was not high enough. I have no sympathy at all with that kind of person. This is Canada's major or premier security, and I want to say to the minister that in my opinion the rate of interest is adequate, and he should be able to get under present conditions the money which we know is available, because there is more than a billion and a half dollars in the savings banks of this country. Moreover, the money which the government is spending is trickling back to individuals and companies who will invest more. The money is there if you can get it, but you must get it by proper means, and you must induce people to give upon proper premises.

The plain truth is that the treasury must step in and put a brake on foolish and extravagant expenditures. I once told this house, I think it was in a budget debate, that I believed the people of Canada would give the government the money with which to carry on this war, but they will hold the government to a strict accounting; they want to know how and where the money is going.

I had intended to call the attention of the Minister of Finance and of the government to the question of empire and Canadian trade balances with the United States. This is a matter which should give this government and this country some cause for consideration. It is of grave concern how we are going to protect and maintain our exchange position on anything like an equitable basis. It we are to do so, drastic steps will have to be taken by way of further restrictions on imports or we shall have to sell more to the United States.

I need not refer to the Montreal terminals—that shocking thing which the minister put over last session to pay an election debt—the steel for which, I am told, was all imported from the United States. The first problem, that is to say the protection and maintenance of our exchange position, is wholly within our own jurisdiction. But the matter of selling more to the United States depends on the generosity, perhaps on the business foresight, of our great neighbour to the south.

What is the position? I have grouped a set of figures which I do not wish to take the time to read but which are obtained from the October letter of the National City bank. They refer to commodities only; they do not relate to invisible balances or, I believe, to exports of gold. I am going to ask leave to have these figures printed in Hansard; otherwise I shall have to take the time of the house to read them. They show substantial adverse balances, as between the empire and the United States, for the three years ended August 31st last, totalling $1,624,-000,000, or over a billion and a half dollars.

From the same source I have the figures with respect to Canadian trade with the United States in the same period. They show an adverse balance in respect of commodities only of $569,000,000. The comparative figures are all taken from records published by the National City bank, and I should like to ask the privilege of putting them on Hansard so that they may be available to hon. members.

Mr. SPEAKER: With unanimous consent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The table follows:

Empire-United States Trade—Commodities

Year ended August 31	Empire purchases from U.S.	U.S. purchases from Empire	Adverse balance
1938-39	1,291,000,000	639,000,000	652,000,000
1939-40	1,790,000,000	1,070,000,000	720,000,000
Total	$4,453,000,000	$2,829,000,000	$1,624,000,000

Canada-United States Trade—Commodities

Year ended August 31	Canadian purchases from U.S.	U.S. purchases from Canada	Adverse balance
1937-38	$ 510,000,000	$ 399,000,000	$ 111,000,000
1938-39	468,000,000	260,000,000	208,000,000
1939-40	660,000,000	410,000,000	250,000,000
Total	$1,638,000,000	$1,069,000,000	$ 569,000,000

We cannot continue indefinitely to carry this burden. I ask the Minister of Finance to do me the honour of reading and studying these figures, and to tell us at some time what the government proposes to do about the situation which they disclose. It is not exactly for me to suggest a remedy. That task is imposed on the minister, but the remedy must be found. We cannot, I submit, provide these balances on the three-way basis of settlement as we have done for years and years. The adverse balance of trade as between Canada and the United States since confederation has reached, not hundreds of millions, but billions of dollars. This balance we have paid only by our exports to other countries.

It seems to me that there are two remedies: first, further restrictions on imports, particularly luxuries; second, our good neighbours to the south should have their attention called to the situation and be invited to help in providing a remedy. I would say that the best type of remedy would be greater purchases of Canadian commodities by the United States, and to that end the whole position at present existing in respect to the Canada-United States trade agreement should be reviewed.

It seems to me an anomaly that a nation of 130,000,000 people should buy from a small nation of less than 12,000,000 so much less per capita than we buy from them. Here, I suggest to the Prime Minister, is an opportunity to exercise that power of good-neighbourhood for which he is so justly famous and to which his follower referred the other day.

Applying the remedy which lies within our own power, namely further restrictions on importations, I believe that will have to be done. We shall have to tighten our belts still more. May I point out to the minister that when he applies that remedy he may create an evil that should be avoided. If you shut out anything in the nature of competition it may cost the Canadian consumer a great deal more—and I want to illustrate that with one article. I know of a commodity produced both in Canada and in the United States, a manufactured article used as raw material in the manufacture of a finished product sold to Canadians and to the Canadian army. I have been told that up to October 15 last this product could be purchased in the United States and laid down in Canada cheaper than it could be purchased in Canada from Canadian producers after paying a burden of 48 per cent on the invoice cost.

Mr. RALSTON: Will my hon. friend let us into the secret to the extent of saying whether it is a military supply, or a supply for the air force or the navy?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is used by all of them. I will tell my hon. friend privately that it is something which is in common use. He uses it; I use it; the navy, the air force, the army, all use it. It is a simple thing—sole leather.

Mr. RALSTON: The secret is out.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes. Let me give an illustration. Take an invoice of $100. You add 10 per cent exchange tax and that gives you $110; 25 per cent duty, or $25, brings it to $135; add the sales tax of 8 per cent on $125, or $10 more, and you have $145; then take freight, cash discount, and so on, 3 per cent, or $3, and you have a total cost of $148 on an invoice of $100. Up to October 15 a man could buy goods of this kind to the value of $100 in the United States and bring them here and save money. That is a condition I should like the government to look into. It should be referred to the war prices board. I do not want them to be bamboozled by any leather controller who is himself interested in leather production. Let us get away from that sort of thing.

We have been told that prices are being held down. Perhaps they are, but I have been informed that the price of sole leather has been raised three times in Canada since the declaration of war. The price index shows that wholesale prices have risen 14·4 per cent since the war began, yet we are told that the cost of living has advanced much less than that. I know it cannot be so; just ask the housewife. We have war inflation. Wages will have to increase, and the vicious spiral is upon us.

I am not going to apologize for dealing with the Rowell-Sirois report. This is one of the most important matters that should engage the attention of parliament. I will try to compress what I have to say with respect to it. I regret exceedingly that the Chief Justice of Ontario, who originally headed the commission, had to resign because of ill health, but I do congratulate the government on having been fortunate enough to obtain the services of Mr. Sirois, whom I have known for quite a number of years and with whom I have collaborated professionally in days gone by. He carried on with great competence and dignity, and I met him in Fredericton when he acted on the commission.

I have always felt that, however eminent was the personnel of the commission, its composition had a decidedly political flavour. It would have been wiser if someone who took a rather different view of our constitutional problems had been a member. That suggestion was made before, I believe, but it was not adopted. However, I do not wish to be taken as in any degree attacking the personnel of the commission. They were all students and exponents of our constitution, although it is fair, I think, to say that they were all of the same school of thought.

The report is voluminous and it is beyond my capacity to analyse it all. At this stage it is not necessary. I have, however, read the summary of its recommendations and portions of the report itself. I have likewise read with great interest a number of articles analysing the recommendations. With some of the recommendations I am in accord; with some I feel sure there will be great difficulty in reaching agreement and action, and as to others I hold the view that they should not be implemented at all. The time has not arrived, however, at which any specific declarations should be made with respect to my particular position. I suggest that it is wholly wrong to say that this report represents "a new charter for Canada," as was suggested on Friday last by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton). It is not a new bill of rights. Rather is it a reorientation of the powers conferred by the British North America Act—a reallocation of powers. As I understand our constitution, we now have all the powers we need as a member of the British empire, save and except the right to amend our own constitution. The most vital part is a reallocation of the powers of taxation, and it is that part of the report to which attention should be given.

On Thursday last the Prime Minister announced the calling of a dominion-provincial conference to be held some time in January, while parliament is not in session, and he laid on the table—and this has been printed in votes and proceedings—his letter of November 2 to all the nine provincial premiers. As I recollect, it was reported that eight provincial premiers had accepted the invitation to attend, and since the Prime Minister made the announcement the premier of Ontario has announced the intention of his government to attend and participate. But the announcement was coupled with a warning that "Ontario is opposed to any move to raid Ontario taxpayers for the benefit of other provinces." Well, to say the least, that is rather a jarring note and does not suggest unanimity. I do not wish to characterize it as anything worse than that. Apparently the premier of Ontario was opposed to any discussion, according to newspaper report, taking the view that there should be no possibility of any controversial issue arising which might impair national unity and the effective prosecution of the war.

It has been said in the press that the conference will be a re-confederation conference. In my view this is a rather large order and one that is not likely to be achieved. There are in this country some people who are apt to view lightly the achievements of the fathers of confederation. I do not share that view. I hold the view that they did a wonderful work in that they created a nation in the northern half of this hemisphere, and I believe that their work will endure. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George on Friday quoted some unnamed private member with reference to the British North America Act as speaking of "the miasma of the constitution". That, I suggest, is a misnomer. Our constitution is not a miasma, but the interpretation of the constitution by judicial bodies has in a degree led us into a miasma of doubt as to just what at times the constitution really is. It is a repetition of the theory enunciated by a great chief justice of the United States that "the constitution is what the judges say it is"—speaking in reference to the constitution of the United States. That was never the intention of the founding fathers so far as Canada is concerned. Down to 1910 no great difficulty had arisen out of the interpretation, but in that year a noble law lord developed a new theory from which trouble has flowed almost ever since. I could refer to suggestions that have been made by Mr. W. F. O'Connor, K.C., with reference to a declaratory statute. I shall not take the time to do so.

I hold the view that the fathers of confederation intended that Canada should have a strong central government. That view has been weakened by judicial interpretation of the British North America Act. It must not be weakened further. That is my own personal view, and I have not asked any of this galaxy of constitutional lawyers who sit behind me what their views are. I am very strong in the view that the central authority must not be weakened. If anyone doubts the soundness of the view that we must have in Canada strong central governmental powers, let him read the "peace, order and good government" clauses in section 91 and note the use to which these powers have been put in the testing times of war. That is the acid test as to whether we should have a strong central government or not. If we are to consider the Rowell-Sirois report I am in agreement that we should not postpone dealing with it until after the war. But I do suggest to the Prime Minister that because of preoccupation with war measures and war activities it may well be that the government and parliament cannot give to the consideration of the problems arising all the thought and reflection necessary. But in my view that is not a valid reason for postponing its consideration. We may not get as good results as we might under less pressing conditions, but we should not postpone its consideration.

It is stated by the commission, and I believe the Prime Minister has more or less adopted this theory that:

> The need for some action designed to enable the people of Canada to throw their whole weight into any great national effort, such as the struggle to which they have committed themselves, and at the same time to ensure the smooth working of the social and educational services necessary for the welfare of the mass of the people, is far greater and far more urgent in time of war and of post-war organization than it is in time of peace.

The commission also declared that it is precisely to these two main objectives that its chief recommendations have been directed; that is to say, the throwing of the weight of the country into a great national effort and consequently ensuring the smooth working of the social and educational services on which the welfare of the people depends.

If it is necessary to implement the report in order to enable the people of Canada to throw their whole weight into the great national effort in which we are engaged, why has the government waited so long? The report was in the hands of the government when parliament met in May. It is now six months since it was tabled, and the whole outline of the recommendations and the suggested new relationship between the dominion and the provinces has been well known and well understood. We had a recess of three months from August. Why was this move to confer not made between August and November, if it was so important and so urgent? I do not know whether the talk of coalition had anything to do with the matter. I ask the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) who flew out west the other day for some reason or another.

Mr. CRERAR: May I set my hon. friend's mind at rest immediately—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): My mind is not troubled about anything the minister may do.

Mr. CRERAR: May I say my hon. friend has a totally wrong impression.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am just querying the minister.

Mr. CRERAR: I may tell my hon. friend that any coalition in Manitoba had nothing whatever to do with this question.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then we have the answer. A cat can look at a king; surely I can look at the Minister of Mines and Resources and ask him a question.

It will be exactly eight months from the time the report was tabled until it is to be considered at this conference. One of the leading recommendations of the commission is with respect to the reallocation of taxing power. This is of great and direct interest to industry and to every part of the community upon which the burden of taxation falls. Portions of the recommendations of the commission go some distance in an effort to meet the submissions on taxation made by various semi-public bodies, and it is felt that the implementing of these recommendations will contribute greatly to the financial strength and stability of the country, because it is believed that it will

(a) reduce substantially the cost of tax collection;

(b) remove causes of friction between the ten existing taxing authorities;

(c) and enable business to expand, with relative increase in national income.

To these I should like to add this hope, that

(d) there is a strong possibility that their implementation will reduce in some degree the burden of taxation itself.

One word more on this subject. I am bound to say that I believe that a dominion-provincial conference is not good enough. There will be seated at that conference representatives of probably less than half the people of Canada. There should be, in addition to the provincial premiers, the leaders of the opposition groups in this house and in the provincial legislatures, and there should also be invited to be present—and not merely as spectators—leaders of public opinion in other spheres of human activity in Canada; in particular, representatives of taxpayers. Surely they are entitled to be represented; they pay the bill. Boards of trade, chambers of commerce, labour and farm organizations should be invited to be present and join with the government in a great round-table conference. Unless that principle is recognized it can never be said that there was a genuine national attempt to solve the problems immediately under discussion. I desire to emphasize this particularly. It may be a departure from the practice of the past, but I suggest to the Prime Minister and the government that such a course would be an evidence of the working of democracy in Canada that in days gone by has not been evident. In any event it would do nothing but good; it may do a great deal of good.

I did intend to say something about the St. Lawrence waterway, but I do not think I should trespass much longer on the time of the house. The Prime Minister to-day tabled the correspondence, and I have not had opportunity to look at it. I shall therefore reserve what I have to say on that matter. I had also intended to say something about leadership in Canada, but also reserve my remarks on that subject until a later date.

I cannot, however, refrain from saying something about the position of truck transportation in the province of Prince Edward Island. I want to draw the attention of the Prime Minister to a condition in that island, which gave him a haven at one time, also of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) who has a haven there now, and of my friends the hon. members from the counties of Queens and Kings. I refer particularly to a condition that obtains there with respect to the ability of the farmers of Prince Edward Island to market their products. I hold in my hand a copy of what is the charter of union for the province of Prince Edward Island, an order in council passed at Windsor on June 26, 1873, with which I suppose every individual in that province is familiar from childhood, but which, strange to say, I never heard mentioned in this house until now. I am sure the senior member for Queens (Mr. Douglas) knows that upon this charter of union the people of Prince Edward Island have always based their claims in the matter of transportation.

For years Prince Edward Island has suffered because of its insular position. I well remember the agitation, extending over a long period of years, for a tunnel. That hope was never realized; probably it never will be. But I remember that in 1911 in Charlottetown Sir Robert Borden made a great speech in which he said that Prince Edward Island had never been fairly treated by any government in the matter of transportation. He promised then and there that he would have a car ferry established, and he did so. Since then we have heard nothing more about a tunnel. The operation of that ferry was entrusted to the Canadian Government Railways, now the Canadian National, and for a time all went well. Then, with the changing character of transportation, there came into operation in Prince Edward Island, together with the rest of Canada, motor truck transportation, using the internal combustion engine; and with this truck competition it is no longer economical to transport island products by rail for short hauls. This condition is apparent everywhere, but the advantage to the primary producer has not reached the island producer, who has a substantial grievance against the Canadian National, which operates this ferry for the government, and also against the government.

The position is this. A producer with a truck desires to sell his load of potatoes, or oats, or whatever it may be, on the mainland and bring back a return load of coal, lumber, manufactured goods or something else. He can get transport on the ferry for his motor truck, all right, but not on the basis of a private motor car. He must pay ferriage on his truck, railway freight on his load of potatoes, ferriage on his truck when returning and freight on his return load, the freight depending upon the classification of the commodity. The charge for a five-ton truck is $12 each way for the truck alone, or a total of $24. With a three-ton load of commodities I am told that total charges for ferriage and freight both ways is about $50, in order to get across nine miles of water with a third class commodity.

I am sure this matter has not been brought to the attention of the Prime Minister or it would have been remedied long ago. This was the first I had heard of it, at all events, and I am bringing it to the attention of the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues. What would the other provinces of Canada think of such a cost, which is equivalent to a tariff, in order to cross the border of an adjoining province? Then think of the expensive canal system which we have built and which we operate without charging any tolls to the ships using it. What farmer can stand a toll like the one I have mentioned? I am told that this situation has obtained for years and has been a source of great inconvenience and loss to the island farmers. This is a restraint of trade by a government service.

Some two or three years ago an effort was made, I think by Mr. Dunning at the instance of the Charlottetown board of trade—I am quite prepared to give the credit wherever it is due—to alter this position. A scheme was suggested and adopted whereby, under the auspices of members of the Charlottetown board of trade, a company was formed with sufficient paid-up capital for the establishment of a truck and motor car ferry between Wood Islands, Prince Edward Island, and Caribou, near Pictou, Nova Scotia. By means of a grant from this parliament, facilities were constructed for landing docks on the island and at Caribou. This scheme was to be assisted by an annual subsidy of some $28,000 from the federal treasury for the service of a ferry steamer which was to operate for seven months of the year, from May 1. I am told that this scheme, if developed and put into operation, would greatly reduce truck transportation costs between the island and the mainland. A boat was purchased; I think it was called the Sea Hawk, or some such name, and renamed the Charles A. Dunning. I am told that this boat was admirably adapted for the service, but shortly after the outbreak of war it was requisitioned by either the Canadian or the British naval authorities, so the service never went into operation. Then another boat was obtained and put into condition at great expense. This boat also was requisitioned by the naval authorities, and again the service was not put into operation. Finally the old Hochelaga was trotted out. This boat is totally unfitted for the service, as I can personally testify.

I do not want to say anything I should not say, but it appears that the first boat obtained, the Dunning, never has been put to use by the navy but is being used as living quarters for naval officers in the city of Halifax. I am told that there is some naval etiquette attached to this matter, and I may not know all the ramifications of it, but I should think we could find some place else for the naval officers to live, if they must live afloat, instead of robbing the people of Prince Edward Island of the boat they bought and fixed up for this important service. I think I know the true significance of it all, but I am not going to say anything more about it. This sort of thing ought to be rectified. The first boat never has been used for anything but living quarters for certain officers. This state of affairs seems unfair to the private interests developing the scheme, to the farming and fishing industries, and particularly to the tourist trade of the island province. Prince Edward Island is represented in this house by four supporters of the government, but so far as the records show, their voices never have been raised in connection with this matter. Why? Let us have an end to this sort of thing; let the farmers of Prince Edward Island have a fair chance to sell their produce in competition with those on the mainland. That little island sent five thousand volunteers, out of a total population of eighty-nine thousand, while voluntary recruitment was in force. Its record has not been equalled by that of any other part of this dominion. That is the sort of people they are, and I submit that they are entitled to a little better treatment in this matter. I have high hopes that I need only to mention these facts to have the situation rectified. How can the island farmer live, let alone prosper, with oats at 25 cents a bushel and potatoes at 30 cents a bag? Those were the prices in October.

I have almost finished, Mr. Speaker, but before I take my seat I want to refer briefly to two other matters. We on your left, sir, hold the view, and I believe it is well founded, that it has been the deliberate policy of the government, during the past session as well as during the interval since we adjourned in August, to endeavour to create the impression that all was well with our war effort. In our view the government has sought to lull and soothe the Canadian people into a false sense of security, and continues to do so. It has sought to convince the people that we are living in the best of all possible worlds. Those who are alive to the situation know the dangers that lurk behind such a position, and they are alike alarmed and anxious. Knowing of this feeling I am impelled to propose to the government that it cause to be set up immediately two select special committees which will be charged with the responsibility and the duty of investigating and reporting to this house factually, objectively and truthfully, without bias and without partisanship—and I have no doubt that is possible—what is our exact position (a) with respect to our fighting forces, military, naval and air; and (b) with respect to the production and delivery of all the important materials, equipment and supplies necessary in our war effort, so that the Canadian people may know the truth. Before such committees ministers could appear and be subject to questioning. Progress reports in the form of speeches in the house by ministers are not good enough. You can never elicit the naked facts in that manner. Only the time-proven method of cross-examination by question and answer will suffice. The process should be free from anything in the nature of propaganda. The public has been fed that until it is nauseated. Let us face the facts—not by the methods of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation but by the methods of the round table.

The government may hold the view that it is not in the public interest that the facts and figures for which I am asking be disclosed. I know the matter is not free from difficulties. When I make the proposal I visualize many of its implications, but I am convinced that the method I have suggested is the only real way in which the government may satisfy the public. I am willing with some of my colleagues to meet with the Prime Minister and some of his colleagues so that we may consider the whole proposal, in an honest effort to arrive at a conclusion.

The other point to which I wish to refer is the plight of agriculture in Canada. From observations I have made and from reports which have reached me I know that agriculture in Canada is in a serious condition. How is the farmer of New Brunswick to live on 50 cents a barrel for his potatoes, when the production cost is nearly a dollar? Help is being given to the wheat farmer—and properly so—and to the apple farmer. What about the farmer in New Brunswick? In Canada we have nearly a million farmers. Approximately one-half of our population is directly or indirectly dependent upon agriculture for its daily bread. The farmer is not and for a long time has not been receiving a just, fair and reasonable return for his products. Instead of improving his position, as was anticipated by most people—and I must confess I was among the number who thought his position would be improved—the war has actually accentuated his distress. To say that until we have a prosperous and contented agricultural population in Canada we can have no happiness is merely to repeat a truism.

It is a matter of profound regret to me, and I am sure it will be to the agricultural population of Canada, that no action of any sort is even indicated in the proposals set out in the speech from the throne. This condition cannot continue, and I desire to bring home to the government the seriousness of the situation and to ask that this omission be given immediate attention. With that end in view I propose to move an amendment to the resolution under consideration. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling):

That the following be added to the address to His Excellency:

"We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that this house regrets that the government has continued to soothe the Canadian people regarding the war effort of the nation, thereby creating a false sense of security when a clear-cut call to action is desperately needed.

"And this house further regrets that despite the serious condition of agriculture no effective action is proposed to alleviate that condition and to ensure to the Canadian farmer a just, fair and reasonable return for his products."

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) in the congratulations he has extended to the mover (Mr. Claxton) and the seconder (Mr. Jutras) of the address to His Excellency in reply to His Excellency's speech from the throne. May I also thank my hon. friend for the tribute he paid to the talents of the hon. members who moved and seconded the address in reply.

Speaking at the opening session of this parliament I remarked that I believed Canada was particularly fortunate in the fact that a large percentage of members elected for the first time to seats in parliament had given so much of time and thought to a study not only of Canadian but of international problems. I pointed out that not only was that a fortunate condition for the hon. members themselves, but one particularly fortunate for parliament. If we needed a demonstration of the truth of that statement I am sure we received it in the excellent speeches made on Friday last.

The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) comes to us with an established reputation. The high position he has attained at the bar of his own province was known to many of us. We knew, too, the extent to which he had given serious thought and study to social, industrial and international problems. Therefore we expected that, when he addressed the house, we would hear a speech which would evidence thoughtful consideration of the great problems confronting the world to-day. We had reason to believe that the hon. member would be statesmanlike in his utterances. We were not disappointed. The speech delivered on Friday last by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George revealed how fully he appreciated the magnitude of present-day problems and that he had gone deeply into the causes which have contributed to the present world situation. It indicated, too, that the hon. member had given careful consideration to the policies which may be necessary to meet the situation which faces us. No finer introduction could have been made to the consideration and discussion of the great problems with which in the present session we shall be obliged to deal.

The same might be said of the speech of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras). His, too, was an excellent introduction to the consideration of questions we shall have to take up this session. The hon. member sustained the high position enjoyed by his constituency in the public life of Canada. In a way Provencher is typical of the whole of Canada. It is a constituency standing midway between the Atlantic and the Pacific. Its population is divided almost evenly between English-speaking and French-speaking citizens. Moreover, through the course of the years since confederation, it has enjoyed representation of a varied character. I need not remind hon. members that at one time Conservative opinion in that constituency was represented by no less distinguished a person than Sir George Etienne Cartier. I need not remind those who, like myself, are inclined to be more or less radical, that Louis Riel was also elected to represent that constituency. I need not add that through the years the constituency has been represented by many distinguished Liberals. To do justice to a constituency so representative, that it is practically a microcosm of our whole dominion, is no small task. I would say to the hon. member who, by the way, is one of the youngest members in the house, that in the manner in which he spoke on Friday alike in French and in English he reflected great credit not only upon himself but upon his constituency.

With respect to the speeches of both hon. members there is one significant fact which I hope all of us may find it possible to keep in mind during our discussions at this time and in this place. The two hon. members are representative of minorities in their respective provinces. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George is of the minority in race and religion in the city of Montreal and the province of Quebec. The hon. member for Provencher is of the minority in race and religion in the province of Manitoba. These two gentlemen made a similar appeal to this House of Commons. Each made a strong appeal for toleration, and above all for unity in this dominion of Canada. In that appeal for toleration, in that appeal for unity, I believe they rendered the greatest service that could be rendered in addresses given at the opening of a new session of parliament. I noticed that their speeches were eloquent of that feeling of harmony and goodwill which, despite the existence of war in the world to-day, fortunately continues to be characteristic of the spirit of our country.

In the nature of things we will be forced to discuss, probably pretty warmly, many questions which will come before us. I am sure, however, that hon. members will realize that at this time, perhaps as never before, each and every one will be called upon to exercise a measure of restraint in what we say concerning our own problems, and an even greater measure of restraint with reference to what we say about other nations and their problems.

May I come now to the remarks of my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson). Let me say that I do not intend to be critical of what he has said. He has fallen into the error, of which I have been guilty frequently, of trying to take up too many things at one time. I can be sympathetic with him in that regard. I feel that his address would have been improved had he devoted more of it to the immediate world situation and Canada's effort in relation thereto, and foregone taking up so great a variety of topics. He might have waited until a little later in the session to deal with some of them.

His first criticism was of the speech from the throne. I was not at all surprised at that because I fully expected it. Had I made a long speech—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —or, rather, had I advised His Excellency to make a long speech, I am sure my hon. friend would have taken me severely to task and told me that I had not learned from experience. On the other hand, because the speech has the merit of brevity, he now says, to use his own words, that "it falls short in everything else by which we measure what a speech from the throne should be." This afternoon my hon. friend showed great admiration for Britain. It would be a strange thing if any speaker to-day or at any time had not the strongest admiration for Britain. I share all his admiration for Britain, but I believe that perhaps I have a greater admiration for Canada than he has. I do not mean that my admiration for Canada is greater than is my admiration for Britain. I mean that on the score of admiration I see no reason for drawing a line between our respective loyalties.

I refer to what my hon. friend has said about Britain because in thinking of the advice I should tender his excellency I went to the trouble of looking up the speech from the throne which was delivered in the United Kingdom at the session held after war was declared. I found it so admirable that I thought I could not do better than repeat as nearly as possible the language of that speech. Perhaps I should give hon. members quotations from the speech from the throne delivered in Britain on November 28. I hold in my hand one page which contains the entire speech. I should like to direct the attention of my hon. friend particularly to the first paragraph. He has said a good deal this afternoon which has been critical of Canada's war effort. I feel that he has been giving us a picture of what is in his own mind, arising out of his conception of his duty as leader of the opposition. I do not believe, however, that the point of view which he has expressed in regard to Canada's war effort reflects the opinion either of the people of Canada, or of the people of the great republic to the south to which he has referred also, or of the people of Great Britain. He will find in the opening sentence of the speech from the throne delivered in Britain on November 28 words which will be a complete answer to much that he has said by way of criticism of Canada's war effort. The king's speech was as follows:

My lords and members of the House of Commons,

The prosecution of the war commands the energies of all my subjects. My dominions overseas are participating wholeheartedly and with an effectiveness which is most gratifying to me.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was a year ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This was delivered on November 28, 1939. I quote again:

Throughout the world my navies, together with the merchant navy and fishing fleets, are keeping free and open the highways of the sea. At home, in France and in all stations overseas, my armies and air forces are fulfilling their tasks. I am well assured that they will be equal to any efforts and sacrifices to which they may be called.

Members of the House of Commons,

You will be asked to make further financial provision for the conduct of the war.

My lords and members of the House of Commons,

Grave responsibilities rest upon you at this time. You will, I am convinced, express the resolution of the nation.

The measures which will be submitted to you are such as seem necessary to my advisers for the welfare of my people and the attainment of the purpose upon which all our efforts are set.

I pray that Almighty God will give His blessing to your counsels.

I wish to draw particular attention to the reference to the legislative programme, because it was to that aspect of the speech that my hon. friend referred especially. It was that reference which caused him to say that "the speech from the throne falls short in everything else" — meaning brevity — "by which we measure what a speech from the throne should be." The legislative programme of the parliament of the United Kingdom relates to all its responsibilities, both domestic and imperial. That parliament has to deal with matters similar to those dealt with by our provincial legislatures, in addition to those matters with which this parliament has to deal. The parliament of the United Kingdom has also to do with a vast colonial empire scattered over many parts of the world. Yet the legislative programme as related to all this, as outlined in the speech from the throne, reads:

The measures which will be submitted to you are such as seem necessary to my advisers for the welfare of my people and the attainment of the purpose upon which all our efforts are set.

This resembles fairly closely what His Excellency was kind enough to say at my suggestion:

The measures which will be submitted to you are such as seem necessary to my advisers for the welfare of the country, and for the prosecution of the war to the utmost of our strength.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, before the recess I had occasion to refer to the comment which my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) made upon the speech from the throne. In the course of my hon. friend's remarks he referred not only to the speech of his excellency at the opening of the present parliament, but also to the speech which was delivered by the deputy to the Governor General at the closing of the last session of parliament, which took place two days previously. My hon. friend's comment in reference to that speech was that it indicated a change of point of view on the part of the government; he said that he had been urging all along that the emphasis in all matters of war effort should be placed upon the defence of Britain, whereas the administration seemed to have had in view as its first obligation the defence of Canada. My hon. friend cited as evidence of the accuracy of his statement the following passage from the speech from the throne of November 5:

> The measures which you have taken have had in view the immediate task of sharing more completely in the defence of Britain and securing our own country more effectively against internal subversion and external attack.

He did not read the next sentence, but I shall read it:

> They have also had in view the long range task of insuring the ultimate defeat of the enemy.

I fail to see wherein the statement as there presented differs in any particular from the announcement of policy of the government with respect to Canada's participation in the war as it was made at the very outset and has been ever since. Hon. members may recall that on September 3, 1939, His Majesty the King addressed all parts of the British empire over the radio in the afternoon, that being the day on which Great Britain went into the war; and his majesty made an appeal to all the dominions to make their own the cause of freedom which Britain had taken up. That same day I broadcast on behalf of the government to the people of Canada; indeed, it was a broadcast which went, I believe, to all parts of the British commonwealth; I then announced what I had already stated the policy of the government would be in the event of war—the policy which we would present to this parliament at the time it would be called upon to decide as to Canada's participation. I have here the broadcast which I made on that occasion, and I find in it the following passage:

> This morning the king, speaking to his peoples at home and across the seas, appealed to all to make their own the cause of freedom which Britain had again taken up. Canada has already answered that call. On Friday last the government, speaking on behalf of the Canadian people, announced that in the event of the United Kingdom becoming engaged in war in an effort to resist aggression, they would as soon as parliament meets seek its authority for effective cooperation by Canada at the side of Britain.

That was the statement of policy of this government, made before Britain herself had gone into the war, made known to the people of Canada as the policy this government would follow if Britain went to war to resist aggression—that we would immediately summon parliament and we would ask parliament to stand at the side of Britain in that great struggle.

Now, what is it in this speech which my hon. friend says denotes a change of policy:

> The measures which you have taken have had in view the immediate task of sharing more completely in the defence of Britain and securing our own country more effectively against internal subversion and external attack.

All through the days and months which have passed since war was declared the government has held to that one position, that we were fighting at the side of Britain against aggression; and in doing so we have noted particularly two obligations; one, the primary obligation of defence of our own country; second, co-operation with our forces at the side of Britain in Britain herself.

But my hon. friend, if I gather rightly, says, "You are reversing the order. Your primary duty should not be that of defending your own country, you should be over in Britain at the side of Britain, your primary responsibility is there." Well, may I say to my hon. friend that in the course of the years that I have had responsibility I have attended several imperial conferences in the old land. The first conference I attended was as long ago as 1923; the next conference I attended was in 1926; I attended another imperial conference in 1937; and in each of those conferences a main subject of discussion was the question of defence, of how most effectively the different parts of the British commonwealth of nations could co-operate in the event of the different parts deciding to join together in the face of a common foe. In the discussions which took place on each of those occasions a definite policy was laid down. It was the same on each occasion; the primary duty of each part was its own defence.

I have in my hand the proceedings of the conference of 1926, and I find under the heading "Defence", page 28:

> The conference gave much consideration to the question of defence and to the methods by which the defence arrangements of each part of the empire could be most effectively coordinated.
> The conclusions reached by the imperial conference on the subject of defence may be summarized as follows:

The first conclusion refers to the resolutions on defence "adopted at the last session of the conference". These are reaffirmed. What were the resolutions adopted "at the last session"? They were those of the conference of 1923.

The conference of 1926 reaffirmed the policy laid down at the previous conference. In the policy then laid down there appear the following words:

> The conference suggests the following as guiding principles:

That has been the policy of every imperial conference, namely, that the first duty of each part of the empire was its own local defence; having secured its own local defences, it would be in a position the more effectively to cooperate with the other parts of the empire in any effort against a common foe. That is the policy we have pursued from the beginning, the policy that we are pursuing to-day, and the policy that we intend to pursue so long as we are responsible for the administration of Canada's war effort.

I noticed my hon. friend contradicted himself a little before he got through. It was not his only contradiction. He referred with some concern to the situation on the Pacific. Really, according to his reasoning I do not see why we should be concerned about the Pacific if our main concern at this time is to be in England. The Pacific is even farther away than the Atlantic. The truth of the matter is that we are deeply concerned with the defence of the coasts of Canada both on the Atlantic and on the Pacific, and have been regarding both with the utmost care and concern during the period that we have had responsibility.

I pass now to what my hon. friend had to say about discussions in parliament. That was the next subject to which he referred. He suggested that there again the government and I in particular were going back on a principle for which we had stood and which we had advocated very strongly in past years, a principle which my hon. friend regards as all important, namely, the supremacy of parliament. I agree with my hon. friend entirely that no principle is more important than that of the supremacy of parliament. But where my hon. friend errs is that he mistakes the supremacy of the opposition for the supremacy of parliament. Analyse his words and you will see that this is what they come to. He complains that we have been legislating by order in council during the period of the war. Where did we get the authority to legislate by order in council with respect to war measures but from this Canadian parliament? If we do not exercise that power in the light of our responsibility as viewed by hon. members of this parliament, the power that gave us that authority can take it away and will take it away. And that power is the supremacy of parliament. But each time my hon. friend speaks he seems to feel that he is parliament—he and the group that sit about him—and that because he and his followers are outnumbered by others in this house, therefore parliament is not supreme. I look upon the parliament that has been sent here fresh from the people of Canada as the parliament the people desire to carry on the business of the country. The people have designated in the representatives here assembled those whom they consider best able to give expression to their will at the present time. The gentlemen who have received that responsibility and trust are all assembled within the walls of this building and they are supreme; and their supremacy is at all times the supremacy of the majority in this house. This government will at all times bow to the will of that majority. So long as we have that majority behind us we intend to act in the light of the responsibility which is ours, a responsibility we owe to the majority, and through the majority to the people. The moment our actions cease to command the confidence of the majority in this House of Commons, that moment we shall be the first to submit our resignations and to let others take our place.

May I pass now to the next subject discussed by the leader of the opposition. It had reference to the conduct of public business here. My hon. friend rather dramatically rededicated the Conservative party to the public service. I must say that, after the name which the party gave itself in the last election, and under which it ran, it needed rededication. My hon. friend did himself and the party and his friends a good turn when he laid emphasis anew on the word "Conservative". It is a much more congenial designation than "Union government", the name under which most of those directly opposite me were returned to the House of Commons.

My hon. friend made a statement of the policy of his party as it would be at this session. I wish to thank him for that statement. It is one which I think does both him and the party credit, and if he can only hold to it I do not think there will be much difference between us during the session. In that statement my hon. friend undertook to cooperate with the government in its war effort, to be constructive in his criticism of that effort, to reserve to himself the right to discuss any of the matters pertaining to the business of the country as they might be considered in time of peace, and generally speaking to further as far as possible the interests of all at this very critical time. That was a good statement and I hope my hon. friend and those associated with him will be able to live up to it throughout the session.

My hon. friend says he does not intend to be a rubber stamp. I would not wish him to be, but may I say that that is the role that most minorities play in national governments, and I hope we shall not find on any side a desire for a step that will lead to rubber stamping at this particular time.

The leader of the opposition dwelt at some length upon what he said was a mistaken attitude in the government's war effort, namely, putting Canada first. I touched upon that just before the recess. He seemed to think that we ought to put Britain first. May I remind him that it was not this party, it was not the members on this side of the house that created a "Canada first" policy and tried to educate the Canadian people in their attitude towards interimperial relations on a "Canada first" point of view. At the time the "Canada first" cry was raised I protested against it as strongly as I could. I felt that the day would come when those who were responsible for it would wish very much that they had not made it quite so prominent in the ears of the young people who were then growing up in this country. It always represented to my mind a grossly selfish and unfair attitude in interimperial relations, and I am glad that my hon. friend has to-day repudiated a cry under which at one time he came back into this House of Commons as a member.

The leader of the opposition went on to speak at some length of Canada's war effort. He asked many questions of the ministry in regard to matters pertaining to the different departments. I shall leave to my colleagues, the ministers of the different departments of defence, the Minister of Munitions and Supply, the Minister of War Services and the Minister of Finance, replies which I think they are better qualified to make than I am, and which would come more appropriately from them. But I do wish to answer at once the statement made by my hon. friend that, because of a single article which he quoted from a New York paper, the opinion which is held of Canada's war effort is that on the whole it has been inadequate. My hon. friend quoted from a statement made by Mr. Hanson W. Baldwin, the military critic of the New York Times. Almost any article, written by whoever it may be, is capable of the kind of interpretation which the reader may wish to put upon it. Particularly in an article which is to a large extent descriptive, which covers a lot of ground, which tries to view a situation, not in the light of the moment only, but in the light of passing events, and in the light of the future as well, can anyone place upon its paragraphs the interpretation which he pleases.

My hon. friend has chosen a few paragraphs from this particular article and apart from the text as a whole has cited them as the reason for changing his mind about the necessity of having parliament meet earlier than it otherwise might have met. He had not realized, until he read the words of a military critic, that we could be as far behind in our war effort as we are, and he cited the statement of Mr. Baldwin that he found what were termed "bottle-necks" with respect to the development of some of our industries, that he found shortages here and insufficiencies there. May I say to my hon. friend and to hon. members that bottle-necks, shortages and such things are inevitable among the preparations for war. No country has escaped them, not a single country, as my hon. friend well knows. The fact that there should be here and there limitations in our war effort is inevitable. The change from a peace-time economy to one of war is a tremendous change, it takes time. If my hon. friend wants to get illustrations of how difficult it has been for nations to make that transition he does not need to begin criticizing his own country's effort, but could find instances of it in every country that is engaged in this war or fears its possibilities.

My hon. friend did not stress what, after all, was the real opinion of Mr. Baldwin, as those like myself who talked with him well know, namely, one of tremendous admiration for the war effort of this country and appreciation of the speed with which it had been carried on. Let me read just two paragraphs which my hon. friend did not quote but which I think will be sufficient to answer those he did quote. I read from the report of Mr. Baldwin's statement that appeared in the Montreal Gazette of October 2, 1940. It is a full reproduction of the article in the Times:

> Nevertheless an inspection of air force, army and centres from Hamilton, Ontario, to Halifax, Nova Scotia, showed that Canada's defence establishments have been tremendously expanded in a year of war, that her programmes to aid Great Britain and to defend herself have been considerably modified, expanded and speeded since the German blitzkrieg of May and June; and that to-day the great majority of Canada's 11,315,000 people are wholeheartedly behind the dominion's war effort. That effort is now passing its preliminary planning and plant expansion stage, and with increasing speed will commence to prove a factor in the war.

And the concluding two paragraphs, summing up the essence of the whole article:

> The Canadian war effort—definitely aligned with and therefore influenced and limited by the British war effort at the start of the war—is still complicated by the necessity of reconciling the needs of North American defence with the necessity of waging a war abroad. The programme, still far from its peak, was slow in starting through no fault of Canada. It is now commencing to mesh into gear, though it will still be eight to twelve months before the Canadian effort becomes a major factor in the war.

What could we ask more than that? I would be prepared to go before the Canadian people at any time and ask, everything considered, if that is not a record of which they are proud. That this country should be found by a great military critic such as Mr. Baldwin is, to be a country that, as a result of its careful planning in cooperation with the British military authorities, is destined to become a major factor in the war, is as high a compliment as could be paid to any nation at a time like this. That, in a war such as that in which we are engaged, Canada may within a year become a major factor in this war, is a very high tribute indeed. We stated, at the outset, that we were planning for a long war, a war of three, possibly four years, as we were advised by the military authorities of the United Kingdom to do. If we had simply wished to win the first battle regardless of all else we might have directed all our energies to that end. It is what from some well known sources we were told we ought to do, hurry up, get multitudes of men to the other side, no matter how, get them over. You might win a first battle by such a method, but in the end you would most certainly lose the war. On the other hand by careful planning, by avoiding mistakes at the outset, by taking a long-range view instead of a short-sighted one, I believe this country is recognized to-day, in the eyes of the world, as a great force rapidly coming forward to do what the British government itself said we would do, if we put long-range plans into force, namely, make what may well be the decisive stroke for victory in the later stages of the war.

My hon. friend suggested that something should be said about Japan, something about Vichy, something about the situation in Ireland, and something about our relations with the United States. I intend to-night to touch on the latter subject at considerable length. With regard to Japan, Vichy and Ireland I think perhaps it would be just as well if I say no more this evening than what I intend to say to the house a little later on. I want to repeat what I said in speaking of the addresses that were made here on Friday last; I do not think that we can be too careful in this House of Commons about what any of us say with regard to other countries and their position at this time in the matter of war. We cannot be too careful with regard to what we say about Japan. It may sound very brave on our part here to be critical of Japan, to talk about the situation as my hon. friend did this afternoon, saying that he understood there was considerable trouble with the Japanese in British Columbia. That is not helping to win the war.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not say trouble; I said it had been reported to me that there was truculence on the part of Japanese nationals out there and the government should look after them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Truculence on the part of Japanese nationals, yes. Does my hon. friend think those words are going to help in maintaining Canadian unity, to help in the very critical situation existing at this moment not between Japan and Canada, but between Japan and Britain, and between Japan and some other parts of this world? The situation in British Columbia has been receiving the most careful attention of the administration. If there is an attitude on the part of any Japanese that has to be looked after there is need equally, I may say, for great caution on the part of some people in that province not to be over-zealous in their attacks on the Japanese at the present time. With all the seriousness of which I am capable I say that words spoken lightly here, however well intentioned they may be, may be read and interpreted in other countries in ways entirely different from those in which they may be read and understood here. In Canada we know when a statement is being made for a political purpose. We know, too, who the individual is who makes the statement, and whether he is given to saying things just as they come into his mind, or whether they are said after careful thought and reflection. We know, too, whether they are being said by a critical opposition, or on the responsibility of a government. But, in Japan, the morning press with its headlines does not interpret words spoken in the parliament of Canada in that way. And the same is true with regard to the situation existing in France at the present time. And the same is true with regard to critical conditions which may exist between Great Britain and Ireland. I want to tell the house very frankly that this government will take any and every step it can take to help heal any breach and to prevent any wound becoming worse than it is, but we will do nothing we have reason to believe will make a bad situation in any country or between any two countries worse than it is at the present time.

Now I come to the report of the Rowell-Sirois commission. I want to thank my hon. friend for his expression of agreement with the view of the administration that it is desirable to have a conference between the provinces and the dominion to consider recommendations contained in the report. I do not know that I could go the length he has gone in suggesting that this ought not only to be a conference between governments, but should be a conference at which not only the governments in office would be represented but at which oppositions, chambers of commerce, boards of trade and the like, if I understood him aright, would meet as well in a great round-table discussion. I am afraid nothing would sooner end useful discussion than a huge gathering of the kind dealing with a report, particularly one of the magnitude of that presented by the Rowell-Sirois commission. No; the place to begin the consideration of that report is at a conference between the representatives of the properly constituted authorities of this country; that is, the provincial and dominion governments. If we can succeed in reaching a measure of agreement between the dominion and provincial governments in the first instance, I have not much doubt about the success that ultimately will result in regard to the changes that will have to be made later on in our constitution. But, if we cannot get that agreement at the outset, then I submit it would be folly to enlarge the number and classes of representatives to be called together to consider the report.

My hon. friend asks, "Why wait so long?" Well, if we had proceeded any sooner the criticism would have been, "Why did you go ahead so fast? You have not given us time to read the report. You have not given the provinces time to read it. Why have you brought on this conference so quickly?" I have only to mention the dates on which certain events took place to let the house see that we have brought on the conference just as quickly as it reasonably could have been expected to be brought on. In the first place the report itself was not tabled in this House of Commons until the month of May. We were then engaged in a war session. I doubt if there was a member of the ministry, or half a dozen members of the house, who had the opportunity, during that session of the house, to read the report carefully. It was August 7 before parliament adjourned. Three months have since gone by, but for a considerable time after parliament adjourned the ministry was busier than ever seeking to get along with the war effort in particulars to which it was not possible for ministers to give their attention while the house was in session. More than that, the provincial governments at that time would not have had an opportunity to peruse the report. Any reasonable person will see that in choosing the date we have chosen, in waiting until parliament met to see if we could reasonably count upon an adjournment in January, and in asking members of the provincial governments to attend at that time, we have taken the earliest possible opportunity of calling a conference to deal with so important a matter. And I am very happy to say that, by proceeding in this manner, we have been able to get the assent of the governments of all the provinces to be represented at a conference in the month of January: That of itself, I think, is a real achievement. While undoubtedly there will be different points of view presented, and while the provinces may differ with each other in some matters of detail of greater or less importance, I have no doubt that, after discussion, and particularly in the light of the situation with which this country and the world is faced at this time, those who attend the conference will come with a sense of responsibility, and that they will seek to do all they possibly can to keep unanimous the feeling that exists at the present time in regard to all matters pertaining to the well-being of our country. It is too early to speak of what may come out of the conference, but, at any rate, I think we are taking the right step at the right time and in the right way.

My hon. friend suggested that we should have special committees of the house to discuss matters having to do with the war effort. He says it is impossible to get the information desired in a formal debate in this house. Hon. members will, I believe, be surprised at the information they will receive in the course of this debate. The government will make every effort to see that the fullest possible information is given the house; and while I agree with my hon. friend that all details cannot be brought out during formal discussion, there is no reason why this house should not resolve itself later into committee of the whole and consider matters in detail as a body. However, my hon. friend has suggested that he and some of his colleagues should meet with myself and members of the ministry to discuss what may be best. I thank him for that suggestion and wish to say that I will take pleasure in seeing that a conference between us is arranged for at an early date. That, I think, is the right way to proceed in any effort to discover what course it may be best to pursue.

I come now to the last part of my hon. friend's speech, at the close of which he moved an amendment in which something was said to the effect that the government had been soothing the Canadian people with regard to the security of the nation. Just where my hon. friend got that idea I cannot understand. If there is one single thing above another that this administration has sought to do, it has been to have the people of Canada realize not only the magnitude of our war effort but also the tremendous seriousness of the whole situation as it exists in the world to-day. Far from trying to sootne the people in any way or to lull them, which was another expression used by my hon. friend, in regard to the nation's security, we have gone to the utmost pains to have the situation as it really exists in the world fully understood. I will not take time to-night to quote passages from various speeches to illustrate the truth of what I am saying, but I would remind my hon. friend that in the last campaign the criticism levelled against me, as leader of my party and of the government, was that I was trying to frighten the people of Canada with the war situation, that I was making the situation out infinitely worse than it then was. That was the criticism, as I think my hon. friend will recall. I have in my hand a sample of the sort of thing I said to the people at that time. It was said over the radio, so that it was heard far and wide. It does not strike me as in any way calculated to lull the country into a sense of false security. It is from a radio address delivered on February 23, of this year:

> Who will say what nation is safe from attack as the fateful months roll on? It may even be that before the forces of evil are vanquished the whole world will be engulfed in the angry sea of battle.
> Let us not imagine that our land will inevitably escape the wrath that darkens land and sea, or that our shores will necessarily be spared as the conflict grows and spreads. He would be a foolish man who refused to face the possibilities and realities of a shattered world.
> We face a future unknown and unpredictable. We cannot tell what calamities may strike us before the present year is ended or what perils may be upon us in 1941 or 1942. Failure to view the situation as a whole, and to take account of all conceivable possibilities, might be fraught with the gravest dangers. There must be no surrender to the insistent clamour of those who refuse to look beyond the problems of the moment.

There is no lulling the country into a sense of security in words like that. And yet those are the kind of words I used during the last campaign, which returned the present House of Commons; and I have been using words similar to those ever since. May I say that I purpose answering that part of my hon. friend's amendment to-night. What he has said with reference to agriculture will be discussed by others. But I have felt increasingly the awful seriousness of the world situation as it has become—every day, every week and every month as the war has gone by. I have sometimes felt that, forced as we are to deal with questions arising from day to day, we lose a certain perspective of the trend of events. Particularly do I feel that, when picking up the morning paper and reading the headlines, listening to radio accounts from the old country and from different parts of our own, as they come in from hour to hour—accounts given in part to help to strengthen the morale of the nation—we are apt to get the impression that all is going well, that we have only to wait for the moment of victory, and that, all we have to do now is to continue to talk of victory in the various speeches we make, and victory is certain to come.

I believe the British forces are going to triumph. I believe democracy will win. I feel certain that right will triumph, but I believe it is going to be a longer road, a harder road and a more terrible road than any of us even at this time begin to believe. That is what I wish to speak about to-night to this House of Commons. We have been brought here primarily to discuss the war, and particularly to discuss Canada's war effort. We are here to get a picture of the situation as it is to-day. As the people's representatives we must face the situation in its stark reality. We are here to do the best we possibly can to meet the situation, to the utmost of the nation's strength.

To present the picture as I see it, I have taken considerable pains to bring together in a form which I hope will enable hon. members to carry away in their minds the developments which have taken place in the last three months, that is to say, in the period of time between that at which parliament adjourned on August 7 last and its reassembling at the present session. I have tried to place these events in their proper setting, to disclose them in the light of events which preceded them, so that all may see the trend, and appreciate what really is in the minds of the dictators. I intend then to set out what we, as a government, have sought to do in our war effort, touching only the main points. I shall leave to my colleagues statements in detail. In dealing with our relations with the United States, I shall seek to place before hon. members what I believe has been a real contribution on the part of Canada, not only as respects our own effort toward the winning of the war, but more particularly in reference to the combined effort of the democracies in the common cause in which they are now more closely united. I shall seek in a few words to say what I feel about our war aims—or peace aims, whichever term may be considered preferable. I shall begin by outlining the international scene as it developed in the last few months.

When parliament adjourned, at the end of the first week of August, the enemy had already established his bases along the channel coast. With France and the low countries in his power, he had begun a carefully prepared and formidable attack by air on the United Kingdom. In the months that have followed, the attack has been pressed persistently, ruthlessly and relentlessly. It has been supplemented by long range artillery trained on the strait and on the streets of Dover. It has been extended to the sea, where, since August 17, the waters around the British isles, as in the unrestricted submarine warfare of 1917, have been declared by the Germans a zone of military operations.

The assault on Britain has not stopped at military objectives. It has been extended to open cities. It has indeed been deliberately aimed at the civil population, in the hope that incessant and merciless bombing will break down morale, and lead to the evacuation, in panic, of cities and towns, and to the disorganization of British industry.

Nevertheless the apprehension felt in those August days, when the savage onslaught was unloosed, and Britain stood, virtually alone in Europe, to face the German hordes, and the unknown destructiveness of unlimited air war, has been dissipated for the time being at least. It has been dissipated by the magnificent skill and courage of British airmen, and by the determination of the whole population to let no attack, however ferocious or long sustained, deter them from their purpose. Not only is their purpose that of defending Britain; it has been from the outset and will continue to be that of freeing their fallen allies, and, ultimately, of removing the menace of nazi domination from Europe and the world.

The battle for the mastery of the air over Britain still goes on. Long, grim months of siege, with constant threat of death from the skies, still lie ahead. Nevertheless the numerical superiority which the nazis enjoyed throughout the summer and early autumn, and which, indeed, they still enjoy, is gradually but surely being whittled down. Greater losses by the enemy of pilots and planes, combined with a smaller relative production are beginning to tell their tale.

The British army has been reorganized, reequipped, and strengthened by fresh divisions and reinforcements from the dominions overseas. The Royal Navy has been strengthened by flotillas of destroyers from this side of the Atlantic. The whole country bristles with defences. After months of waiting, the German army of invasion remains impotent to cross the narrow seas that separate it from Britain's shores. In spite of all her suffering and losses Britain is stronger, and stronger by far, than when we separated in midsummer.

Members of the government of the United Kingdom have referred repeatedly in the most appreciative terms to Canada's contribution to the strengthening of the British defences. On September 17, Lord Caldecote, speaking in the House of Lords, referred to what he termed:

> . . . the invaluable cooperation and assistance which we are receiving from the dominions in the common trouble.

He said:

> It is well known that the defences of this country include very substantial land forces from Canada, Australia and New Zealand. These forces are at present available to repel invasion, should invasion come. There are also with us units of the Royal Canadian Navy and a naval contingent from New Zealand. In the air it is common knowledge that a Canadian fighter squadron has helped us immediately to increase the enemy's losses, and we have had invaluable assistance from a unit of the Royal Australian Air Force. More recently we have welcomed an air contingent from southern Rhodesia. In our own Royal Air Force, there are many pilots from all the dominions and indeed from all parts of the empire. Newfoundland also has made a most substantial and indeed a remarkable contribution to the forces defending the British isles by sea and by land.

As recently as October 30, the present Secretary of State for the Dominions, Lord Cranborne, told an audience that thousands of Canadian troops were waiting in Britain with eager impatience for a chance to deal faithfully with Hitler's forces of invasion. He referred also to the Canadian destroyers which were in close cooperation with the Royal Navy. The following day the British Under-Secretary for War, Lord Croft, who fought beside our Canadian troops in the last war, visited the units of the Canadian active service force at present in the United Kingdom, and told them that the British army council was extremely proud of having fine Canadian formations cooperating with the great army being built up in Britain. Lord Croft also praised our Canadian airmen and added these significant words:

> When the river of supplies of pilots from the great imperial camps in Canada turns to flood, air ascendancy will be won.

Everyone senses the improvement in Britain's position. The enemy's hope of a quick victory has been shattered on the rock of British resistance. He is now turning his attention in considerable measure to other regions, and to the maintenance of his supply of foodstuffs, of oil, and of other materials necessitated by a war of attrition. His great aim now is to break the stranglehold of the British blockade. At the same time, he is seeking to blockade the United Kingdom. Already destruction at sea by the U-boat has become a peril to Britain greater even than that of bombardment from the air.

Coincident with Germany's concentration on the battle of Britain and the consolidation of her gains in the west, events of far-reaching importance have been happening in eastern Europe. The Baltic states of Latvia, Estonia and Lithuania have been taken over by the soviets and with them a rich portion of Roumania, the provinces of Bessarabia and northern Bukovina. Sensing a shift in the wind, Roumania adopted the trappings of fascism and renounced the British guarantee. Her conversion, however, came too late. At the end of August, following a conference at Vienna, she was brusquely forced to cede half of Transylvania to Hungary and, some weeks later, southern Dobruja to Bulgaria. These renunciations of territories did not save her. Working characteristically, through disaffected elements in the population, the nazis succeeded in bringing Roumania entirely within their orbit. They secured complete control over her wheat, corn and soya bean fields and, most important of all, her oil wells and refineries. These without doubt they will exploit to the full. German garrisons are already installed in the more important towns. A German military mission is reported to be organizing the Roumanian army on the German model. In Hungary, Jugoslavia and Bulgaria, nazi policy is developing the closest possible economic collaboration. Already, however, these countries are finding that such collaboration involves political control as well.

At the other end of Europe the enemy is following a similar policy. Spain, like Italy at the beginning, has declared for non-belligerency, instead of neutrality. For the present, however, so far as Spain is concerned, the enemy seems to have been obliged to content himself with economic rather than military collaboration.

The position of France is more difficult and more tragic. I shall speak later of it and of our relations with our once powerful ally. All I wish to point out at the moment, or rather to emphasize, is that the prestige of the smashing German victory in the west has placed almost all of Europe west of the Vistula under German control. All the ports and air fields from Norway to Spain are in nazi hands. The resources, human and material, of these countries will be organized with German method and thoroughness in German interests alone. A formidable war potential has been placed in the hands of a ruthless enemy. It is all important that everyone should realize how vastly, as compared with the last war and the early days of the present conflict, this new augmentation of nazi military power increases the difficulties which we of the British commonwealth have to face.

To indicate what I have in mind I shall speak of only one or two important commodities. Steel production is the standard index of industrial capacity. The annual production of steel in Germany was estimated at the beginning of hostilities at 22 million tons. With the countries she has conquered or controls, and making considerable allowance for war damage in France and Belgium, German capacity for steel production now amounts annually to 42 million tons. This is to be compared with a capacity of about 18 million tons in Great Britain and other parts of the British empire. Supplies of iron ore, so difficult for Germany to secure in the early days of the war by the precarious route through Narvik from the Swedish mines, have now become plentiful through easy access to the neighbouring mines of Luxemburg and Lorraine. Hitherto short of aluminium, so vital for the manufacture of aeroplanes, the German factories now have access to the French bauxite mines, among the richest in the world, while our own supply is correspondingly diminished. We must face the fact that control of these resources represents a powerful addition to the effective strength arrayed against us. We must also face the fact that Germany has now the great munition plants of Skoda and Creusot, as well as Krupp at her disposal. Let us not underestimate the enemy. It is in the light of facts such as these I have mentioned that we see the significance of aid from the United States with its capacity for steel production of 50,000,000 tons a year.

There are, of course, weaknesses in the imposing nazi facade. Pillage, however systematic and well organized, cannot go on indefinitely. Subject populations, if they are to give even passive acquiescence to the designs of the conqueror, must be left with sufficient supplies on which to exist and to work. There are a good many essential commodities such as copper, manganese, nickel and cryolite, which even the whole of Europe cannot supply in adequate quantities. Moreover, the scope of the enemy's conquests has given, as I have already indicated, a new urgency to a problem that was already vital, namely, the problem of oil. Roumanian wells, even if the Germans are permitted to exploit them undisturbed, can, it is estimated, hardly produce more than five, or at the most, six million tons a year. All the rest of Europe outside of Russia can produce but another five million tons, and Russian supplies and ability to transport them are problematical. Europe's requirements for essential industries and transportation, however, are twice the amount of her total production. With supplies cut off by the blockade, it is not difficult to understand the new interest of the enemy in Iraq and Iran, or the drive for control of the Mediterranean basin.

In this region the defection of France and her African colonies created an unexpected and exceedingly embarrassing naval and military position. Any withdrawal of British forces from the Mediterranean was obviously impossible, first, because of British commitments to Greece and Turkey; second, because of the importance of holding the Suez canal; and, finally, because the enemy's route to the pipe line at Haifa and the supposedly inexhaustible oil supplies of the middle east lies across the eastern Mediterranean.

These circumstances explain why Italy, a few weeks ago, suddenly discovered that Greece had made provocative attacks on Albania, the territory Mussolini treacherously attacked on a Good Friday eighteen months ago. The Italian attack upon Greece and the decision of the Greeks to resist have made a further demand upon Britain. Despite the threat of one powerful army across the English channel, and another powerful army in the Egyptian desert, Britain is responding as best she can to this new demand. There has already been established on the island of Crete a naval and air base which will extend the radius of the activities of the British navy and air force in the eastern Mediterranean.

The British position in Africa and the middle east was calculated on the basis of the existence of French armies in Syria, Tunis, Algeria and Morocco, on the cooperation of the French navy, and on the joint use of French naval and air bases. The collapse of French resistance destroyed these calculations and presented the British with what appeared an almost hopeless problem. The Italian army in Libya greatly outnumbered the British forces in Egypt, and there seemed a real danger that it would march across the desert to the Nile, and even to Suez. All through the months of threatened invasion of Britain, the policy of reinforcing the British army in Egypt has gone forward. To-day the balance of forces is much less favourable to Italy than it was in August. At the same time it should not be forgotten that in the area the Italians still have numerical superiority. Their attack upon Greece may be designed in part to draw off British troops from Egypt to assist the Greeks and thus to improve the Italian position in the western desert of Egypt.

The battle of Britain, the nazi pressure on the Balkans, the apparent stalemate in Africa, the Italian attack upon Greece have not been the only events on the international scene since parliament adjourned. The axis powers have also sought by diplomacy, propaganda and intrigue to isolate Britain, and to begin a process of piecemeal destruction of her power and possessions. The pact signed by Germany, Italy and Japan at Berlin on September 27 cannot be viewed as other than an instrument to that end. It contains articles providing for recognition of the respective conquests and spheres of influence of these powers—an open avowal of their existing attitudes towards one another. Article 3, however, goes much farther. It provides that the three axis powers will:

> . . . assist one another with all political, economic, and military means, if one of the high contracting parties should be attacked by a power not at present involved in the European war or in the Sino-Japanese conflict.

A subsequent article provides that this commitment does not affect the relations which exist between the three contracting parties and soviet Russia. Significantly, no mention is made of the United States. The whole agreement, and the publicity given to it, however, are obviously aimed at intimidating the United States. No matter how clear it may be that freedom and the democratic way of life everywhere are bound up with the fate of Britain, the United States are to be prevented from moving any closer to Britain's side.

The role of Japan in the new alliance is particularly significant. Germany and Italy have formally recognized Japanese leadership in creating a "new order" in east Asia. Within the sphere of this new order lie French Indo-China and the Netherlands East Indies. The mother countries of those two rich colonies are occupied to-day by German troops. French Indo-China, by the agreement of Hanoi of September 27, opened its gates to Japanese troops in circumstances that strongly suggest German pressure. We may expect further demands on French Indo-China.

The Chinese army, although split up into small and widely scattered groups, is still actively resisting. The 710 miles of highway known as the Burma road was, as is known, closed to the transport to China of gasoline, trucks and munitions. This was intended as an approach to Japan, which it was hoped might facilitate a possible termination of hostilities in the far east. The closing of the Burma road having failed to accomplish its purpose, it was reopened on October 18. The embargo on the export of gasoline and petroleum products, and on iron and steel scrap, established by the government of the United States at the beginning of August, is in force. No scrap iron or steel has been exported from Canada since October, 1939. There has not been any export, except to the United Kingdom, the allied countries and the United States, of nickel or zinc since February, of aluminium since April, and of cobalt since August last. On October 8 the same limitations were placed upon exports of copper. Shipments of other metals and minerals from Canada to destinations outside the British empire and the western hemisphere have been kept within the limits of our normal peace-time trade with the other countries concerned.

The formation of the triple axis has, without doubt, contributed to international tension, particularly in the far east. It has not, however, served either to intimidate the United States, or to isolate Britain. Indeed, its effect has been the exact opposite. There has been a marked stiffening of policies both of the United States and of Britain in the far east, and an intensification of sentiment in the United States in support of aid for Britain.

I have endeavoured to review the developments on the international scene since the adjournment of the house in midsummer. I wish now to say something of their significance—of what they reveal of the designs of the enemy. The events of the past few months make it clearer than ever that the immediate aim of Germany is a new world order, based upon spheres of influence to be controlled by nazi Germany and her axis partners. Hitler plans, by holding out specious hopes of collaboration, to secure the participation of the subject peoples in the elaboration of his grand design. This is the subtle method by which he is supplementing aggression in his effort to achieve world domination.

Nazi intrigue and the deceptive cloak of collaboration fail, however, to conceal the underlying tyranny of force and fear on which the structure of the new order is to rest. It becomes more apparent, with each new development, that we are engaged in a titanic and terrible death struggle between two conflicting philosophies of life. On the one side is tyranny; on the other, democracy. On the one side, brutality and slavery; on the other, humanity and freedom. On the one side, the law of force; on the other, the force of law.

I should like to recall to the house the words I used in this place, on September 8, 1939, at the outset of this struggle which many still regarded as no more than another European war. These were my words:

> No, Mr. Speaker, the ambition of this dictator is not Poland. At one time he said it was only the areas in which there were German-speaking people. But we have seen that ambition grow. That may have been the thought in his mind some years ago, but we all know how ambition feeds upon itself; we all know how the lust for power blinds men's senses to all else. We know where and how he started, first with the militarization of the Rhineland. He then said—I quote Hitler's own words—he had no thought of annexing Austria. After giving his word that there would be no further attempt at conquest, he took Czechoslovakia. Then he took Moravia and Bohemia, then Memel, now Danzig and Poland. Where is he creeping to? Into those communities of the north, some of which to-day say they are going to remain neutral. I tell them if they remain neutral in this struggle, and Britain and France go down, there is not one of them that will bear for long the name that it bears at the present time; not one of them. And if this conquerer by his methods of force, violence and terror, and other ruthless iniquities is able to crush the peoples of Europe, what is going to become of the doctrine of isolation of this North American continent? If Britain goes down, if France goes down, the whole business of isolation will prove to have been a mere myth. There will in time be no freedom on this continent; there will in time be no liberty. Life will not be worth living. It is for all of us on this continent to do our part to save its privileged position by helping others.

That does not sound, Mr. Speaker, very much like trying to lull and soothe the Canadian people into a sense of security. And that statement was made in this house on the 8th of September last year.

At the close of the last war, there was an attempt to build up a genuine world order based on international law and international justice. The democratic nations tried, with many failures, with many weaknesses, and, perhaps at times, with too little conviction, to maintain the relations between nations on a basis of respect for the pledged word and the solemn covenant. They may, on occasion, have failed to grasp opportunities for reconciliation, but there can be no doubt of their genuine desire for the preservation of peace.

Unhappily, love of peace and respect for justice were not shared by all nations, or, at least, not by all governments. From the Japanese attack on Manchuria in 1931 to the nazi attack on Poland in 1939, the world witnessed a steady progression of successful acts of aggression. Each of the aggressor nations has, in turn, through withdrawal from the League of Nations, expressed open contempt for the condemnation of world opinion, for the principles of international law and for the rights of other nations.

From the moment that Hitler achieved power in Germany, the tempo of aggression increased. Germany herself began to rearm. In 1934, through the murder of Dollfus, she began to undermine the independence of Austria. In 1935, Italy attacked Ethiopia. Germany took advantage of the Ethiopian crisis to remilitarize the Rhineland. In 1936, the civil war broke out in Spain. Immediately the totalitarian powers began their sinister intervention in that struggle. In 1937 the present conflict between Japan and China began at the moment when the Spanish civil war threatened to embroil the whole of Europe. On March 15, 1938, the nazis marched into Austria. In September of that year Europe was almost plunged into war by the Sudeten crisis, which ended at Munich. In March, 1939, Germany seized the rest of Czechoslovakia and, a few days later, she took Memel. On Good Friday, 1939, the Italians occupied and annexed Albania. Finally, on September 1, 1939, Germany attacked Poland.

While at first these acts of aggression were unrelated and unconnected, they began gradually to assume a pattern and to be based on a time-table, which point to a conspiracy for world domination. The conspiracy was half avowed by the formation of the so-called anti-comintern pact, ostensibly directed against the menace of communism; but, as we can now see, it was in reality a conspiracy for the destruction of freedom in the world. Individual bandits, acting alone, became gangsters acting in concert.

The formation of the Rome-Berlin axis was an open threat to the peace of the world. But, so long as Hitler had reason to believe that Russia and the western democracies might be combined against him, he was not ready to risk actual war. His great moment came with the conclusion of the nazi-soviet non-aggression pact in August of 1939. The preliminary phase had ended. The unfolding of the nazi world order was about to begin.

The first act in the new development was the conquest of Poland, and the destruction, with unexampled ferocity, of the Polish state. In the conquest of Poland the nazis for the first time used actual force rather than the threat of force to attain their ends. The brutality of their conduct in the subjugation of the Poles was designed not merely to crush that unhappy land but to strike terror into the hearts of all the peoples of Europe, and to paralyze their will to resist nazi domination.

In the destruction of Poland, soviet Russia participated. In the weeks that followed the conquest of Poland, the soviet government successfully extended its domination by threat of force to the smaller Baltic nations: Lithuania, Latvia and Esthonia. With Finland, the same tactics were not successful. It was just a year ago that the Russians invaded Finland and, after a bitter winter campaign, broke the resistance of that heroic people and partitioned their country.

The next blow was struck, suddenly and swiftly, by the nazis on April 9, when they occupied Denmark, almost without firing a shot, and simultaneously attacked and occupied all the principal cities of Norway. Just a month later, on May 10, came the great onslaught in the west. In a few days Luxemburg, Holland and Belgium had been overrun. Barely five weeks had passed when French resistance collapsed, and the French government was seeking an armistice.

With the collapse of France, practically the whole of Europe, west of Russia, lay prostrate at the feet of Hitler and his Italian ally, who, on the eve of the fall of France, had joined him in the war. The military machine of the nazis seemed, in June, well nigh invincible. Britain stood alone in the path of the onward march of the conquerors. There she stands still; the one obstacle left in the way of the establishment, in the old world, of the new nazi order.

What Hitler has failed to accomplish by fear or force—the destruction of Britain—he has now set about attempting to effect by intrigue and guile. A new world order, based upon spheres of influence to be controlled by nazi Germany and her axis partners, is now the immediate aim. This is the subtle method by which, as the ultimate end of aggression, Germany hopes to attain world domination. Through the alliance between Japan and the axis in Europe the new order in Asia has been linked to the new order in Europe. The pattern is now plain. The world, as I have said, is to be divided into spheres of influence. Germany and her greater vassals are to dominate a world of lesser vassals. The new order in Asia and the islands of the Pacific is domination by Japan. The new order in Europe is domination by Germany. The new order in the Mediterranean and in Africa is joint domination by Germany and Italy. The areas to be dominated by the soviets would appear, at the moment, to be a subject for further negotiation. By promises of collaboration, Hitler and Mussolini are seeking to beguile France and Spain.

The subject peoples will be the menials of the new lords of creation. Their economies will be economies that satisfy the greed of their masters; their farmers will be peasants, and their workers, slaves. The new nazi order is not in fact a new order at all. It is a return to despotism and the age-old tyranny against which mankind has ever struggled in its upward march.

I turn now from the international scene to a review of the salient features in our national war effort in the period since parliament adjourned on August 7 last. The house will not expect me to give the picture in detail. That task will be undertaken, as the debate proceeds, by the ministers in charge of the several departments. The wish of the government is to inform parliament and the country just as completely as military exigencies will permit.

In my review I shall deal first with armed in council, P.C. 2685, setting out the proper training, then with munitions and supply, labour and our war finances, in that order.

First the army. In the review he gave on July 29 last, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) told the house that the total strength of the Canadian active service force on July 21 was 133,573 officers and men. This figure had risen by November 6 to 167,417, which represents an increase of 33,844.

At that time, the strength outside Canada was 31,607. This has now risen to 52,093. The strength of the Canadian active service force in Canada on November 6 was 115,324.

The first division is an integral part of the army corps which, under the command of Lieutenant-General McNaughton, has taken its place in the defence of Britain. The second division is completing its training in preparation for incorporation in this corps which will then become a Canadian unit.

Canadian troops continue to share in the garrisoning of Iceland and of the British insular possessions in this hemisphere.

In Canada, apart from troops on garrison and other special duties across the country, and units still in training, the Canadian active service force has been grouped under two coastal commands, one for the Atlantic and one for the Pacific. The troops in Newfoundland are under the Atlantic command.

An armoured brigade of four Canadian active service force tank regiments was recently formed. Two hundred tanks have been secured in the United States for use in training this mechanized force.

No review of the activities of the army during recent months would be complete without reference to the 65,000 officers and men of the non-permanent active militia who, during the summer, gave up their time and frequently their holidays, to training in the militia camps to prepare, if the need should arise, to take their part in defending the country.

I should like, too, to pay a tribute to the officers and men on both our coasts who, throughout the year, are engaged in garrison duty which has so little of seeming glory and so much of loneliness, but which is essential to our national security.

Since the collapse of France, there has been little action for armies in this war. We cannot assume this will continue to be true. What we do know is that action may be precipitated at any moment, and that the nazis will never be finally defeated until armies have played their active part. They must be trained, equipped and ready for that day.

Since the outbreak of war, the development of our small Canadian navy has been little short of phenomenal. Even in the last three months its personnel has risen from about 9,000 at the beginning of August to 13,034 on November 7.

At the beginning of August we had about 130 vessels in commission, excluding destroyers. By the end of October the number had risen to over 140 and as well seventeen corvettes and four minesweepers of our new construction had already been launched. In the same period, thanks to the arrangement concluded with the United States, our destroyer strength has doubled. We now have twelve destroyers in commission.

It is a tribute at once to the efficiency of our naval service and to the eagerness of Canadians to volunteer for the defence of their country that no difficulty has been found in enlisting crews for the new vessels. Indeed, there are far more young Canadians eager to join the navy than the navy with its present establishment can possibly take.

Some of our destroyers are still participating in European waters in the defence of Britain against the threat of invasion. Our navy, too, continues its vigilant patrol of our own coasts and takes its part in the vital task of keeping open the life-lines of Britain across the north Atlantic.

It was a source of particular satisfaction for Canadians to learn of the gallant exploit of the converted merchant cruiser Prince Robert in capturing the German merchant vessel Weser off the Pacific coast of Mexico.

With regard to the air force and air training, the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) told the house last July that on July 24 the Royal Canadian Air Force numbered 1,765 officers and 17,688 men, or 19,453 in all. By November 2 these numbers had risen to 2,343 officers and 28,256 men, or a total of 30,599. This represents an increase of over fifty per cent. In addition, 3,187 men had enlisted for training as air crews at the beginning of August. On November 2 this number had reached 6,884.

The Royal Canadian Air Force continues to perform its threefold task. Its home defence squadrons continue their constant patrols over our coasts and coastal waters. They take their part in the escort of convoys to and from our shores.

Our air force too has shared in the battle of Britain. Since the house adjourned, our Canadian fighter squadron, flying planes produced in Canada, has engaged with memorable success in active combat with the enemy. The main energies of the Royal Canadian Air Force continue to be directed largely to the development of the British commonwealth air training plan.

The gigantic proportions of the air training plan are now beginning to be appreciated by the public. At the beginning of August, twenty-four of the training schools had been opened. By the end of October, thirty-six were in operation. To put it another way, throughout that period an average of one school a week was started.

On September 26 the Minister of National Defence for Air welcomed at Vancouver the first detachment of Australian pupils who had come to Canada for their advanced training.

Until recently, progress reports on the air training plan had been confined to announcements of new construction, of new schools opened, and of increases in personnel. I am happy to be able to report that the plan is already beginning to realize the ultimate purpose for which it is designed. The first group of air observers to be trained under the plan completed their training on October 24. In years to come October 24 may well become a historic date in the history of the struggle for freedom.

The progress which has been made in the air training programme has been warmly commended by the British government. Hon. members will perhaps be interested in one or two of the statements which have been made. In reply to a question about the progress of the plan the British Secretary of State for Air, Sir Archibald Sinclair, told the House of Commons on August 20 last:

> I do not think I ought to give figures, but I will tell the house this, to show that substantial progress is being made. Whereas we were expecting to reach a certain figure of pilot production from Canada in July, or even as late as August, of next year, we shall reach that figure by April. I think that that will convince the house that more rapid progress than we were led to expect is being made with the empire air training scheme. Let me say how grateful the government are for the energy, the enterprise and the drive which the Canadian government and the Canadian air staff, with the assistance of Air Vice-Marshal McKean who represents us there, have thrown into this empire air training scheme.

The parliamentary under-secretary of the air ministry, Captain H. H. Balfour, visited Canada at the beginning of September. In an interview to the press at the conclusion of his visit he used these words:

> I am more than impressed with the progress made here on the empire air training scheme.

Just the other day the present Secretary of State for the Dominions, Lord Cranborne, said in a speech in London that the empire air training scheme when in full operation was designed to produce twenty thousand pilots and thirty thousand air crews yearly, and he added these significant words:

> It is months ahead of schedule.

Hon. members will recall that at the time the British government proposed this great undertaking it indicated that with the facilities which Canada possessed this cooperative effort might prove to be of a most essential and decisive character. It is therefore a source of no little satisfaction to the government, as I am sure it will be to the house and to the country, to have the assurance that the plan is more than meeting the expectations of the British government.

Any review, however brief, of Canada's war effort, demands a reference to the losses which our armed forces have sustained. The nature of the war itself has hitherto fortunately spared us from heavy casualties. Our troops, twice under orders to proceed to the front, were denied actual participation in battle, first by the withdrawal from Norway, and next by the collapse of France. The restriction of active warfare, since the fall of France, to Britain and the waters surrounding the British isles, and the comparative rarity of naval engagements, have combined to restrict our losses on land and at sea. In the air up to the present the heat and burden of battle have been largely borne by British pilots.

Our main losses have been at sea. Canada has lost three armed ships, the destroyer H.M.C.S. Fraser, with a loss of forty-seven ratings; the destroyer H.M.C.S. Margaree, with a loss of four officers and 136 ratings; and the armed trawler H.M.C.S. Bras d'Or, with a loss of five officers and twenty-five ratings. In addition to these some twenty-four officers and ratings have been lost in active service from various causes. The total of the lives lost at sea up to the end of October was 241. These figures do not include the losses of Canadian merchant seamen, of which I regret to say no accurate figures are at present available. I should like here to say just a word about the sinking of the Empress of Britain. Although she was requisitioned by the admiralty at the beginning of the war, and was not serving as a Canadian ship, her many associations with Canada were such that the shock of her loss brought the reality of war particularly close.

It has been my sad duty to express to the next of kin of the brave men who have died at sea the sympathy, gratitude and pride of the Canadian people. In all such expressions which have been made and in those which may be made I know that every member of this house will wish most sincerely to join.

Our two major losses at sea have been due to tragic accidents of war. The men who lost their lives in the sinking of the Fraser and the Margaree and the foundering of the Bras d'Or, and the merchant sailors who have faced all the dangers of the ocean, made more perilous by a ruthless foe, have died as heroes in their country's cause.

In the air, up to and including the end of October, we have lost in the Royal Canadian Air Force twenty-seven officers and forty-one airmen in Canada. Outside Canada we have lost five officers and two airmen. In addition to these casualties, 203 Canadians serving with the Royal Air Force have lost their lives on active service.

The men who have lost their lives in the training schools have sacrificed themselves for their comrades who will carry on their traditions in the skies of battle. Their gallantry will long be remembered in our land.

The Canadian army has lost by death in action, death from wounds, from disaster, accident and misadventure, 168 officers and men. To all who remain to fight on sea, on land and in the air, it behooves every man, woman and child in the country to dedicate every hour of labour which may be necessary in order that our sailors, our soldiers and our airmen may be fully equipped to face the perils that lie before them. They deserve at our hands the best machines, the best material, the best care that money and honest labour can provide. We know how nobly and courageously they will acquit themselves. We do not doubt them. They must have no reason to doubt us.

May I now say a word about national registration. This gigantic task was the first undertaking of the Department of National War Services after its creation on July 12. I do not need to tell hon. members how promptly, how vigorously and how efficiently the registration was organized, or how smoothly and efficiently the machinery for registration worked on August 19, 20 and 21. I want, however, to express to hon. members of all parties and groups the warm appreciation that the government feels for their effective cooperation in this great national task. The cost of the registration itself was kept at a minimum owing to the enthusiastic response of citizens in all walks of life to the call for voluntary unpaid assistance in carrying through this great survey of Canada's human resources. The response of our people to this first universal call to duty was magnificent.

Rapid progress is being made in the tabulation of the results of the national registration in order to provide a complete picture of Canada's resources of man power to meet the many and varying calls for war-time service. The government did not await completion of the laborious task of tabulation before getting under way the immediate purpose of the national registration. The first task undertaken, when the registration itself had been completed, was the preparation of the lists which have since been used for the national mobilization for basic military training of single men and childless widowers between the ages of nineteen and forty-five.

The training itself has also got under way with amazing despatch. While the Department of National War Services was engaged in preparing the lists of men to be called for service, and setting up the thirteen national war service boards, the training camps themselves were being prepared to receive the men. Critics said it could never be done in the time set by the government. But it was done, thanks to the untiring efforts of the officials and officers of the departments of National Defence and of Munitions and Supply, and the invaluable cooperation of the construction industry. On the 13th day of September a proclamation was issued calling out men for military training in the 21, 22 and 23 year old class. Shortly afterwards the registrars of the national war service boards sent out the first call for training. In response to the first call 27,559 men appeared at the training camps. After a second medical examination 2,034 of these men were rejected. The rest of the men have now completed their first period of training.

The national training scheme has taken the form recommended by the military advisers of the government. The present period of training was, to some extent, determined by the present availability of equipment. The experience which has been gained, and will be gained, by the men who are called up under its provisions will be of advantage both to the armed services and to the young men who have been called up for this branch of national service. It is providing an opportunity for a careful estimate to be made of the individual capacities of our young men, to determine their aptitude for service in the army, the navy, the air force, and war industry. As time goes on, it will also mean that those who enlist for active service, having had that basic training, will be able to complete their additional training more quickly and more efficiently. The men who have been called up have responded with an alacrity and an enthusiasm that have made us all proud of those to whose loyalty and strength the future of our country is being entrusted.

The most graphic index of the progress made in furnishing needed munitions and other war supplies and equipment is perhaps the total of war contracts let. On August 12 we had awarded for the account of Canada contracts to the total amount of $302,000,000. By November 4, that amount had been increased to more than $443,000,000. Of the $443,000,000 worth of contracts, 87 per cent have been placed in Canada, 8 per cent in the United Kingdom, and 5 per cent in the United States. In addition to these amounts, Canadian industry had undertaken as of September 3, 1940, total contracts from the government of the United Kingdom in the amount of $134,000,000 for equipment and supplies, and commitments have been made by the United Kingdom for capital expenditure of an additional $81,000,000. The figure of $443,000,000 which I mentioned a few minutes ago represents contracts for the delivery of munitions, supplies and equipment. We have also made commitments for capital expenditures in the form of plant construction and extensions to the amount of $235,000,000. These capital commitments include: Fifteen explosive and chemical plants at a total cost of $70,000,000; twenty-five armament plants at a cost of $66,000,000; forty ammunition plants at a cost of $36,000,000; additions to automotive plants at a cost of $5,000,000. Further details and subdivisions of these expenditures will be given by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe).

The production of aircraft in Canada in the three months from July to the end of September increased more than three hundred per cent over the preceding three months. This rapid acceleration of production is still continuing. In the production of munitions, some seventy companies are now at work on orders; some forty-four plants are now engaged in the manufacture of gauges. On the 10th October of this year the Minister of Munitions and Supply announced that designs had been approved of a new type of tank, and that preparations were under way to manufacture 3,000 of them in Canada.

I have tried in very brief form to fix at the given specified dates the increased momentum of our war production. The curve is rising with remarkable rapidity. In addition to providing for our own requirements the Department of Munitions and Supply is, as the house is aware, responsible for placing orders and securing supplies for the British government in Canada. Hon. members will be pleased to know that our efforts in this regard have received enthusiastic commendation. The Right Hon. Herbert Morrison, then Minister of Supply in the United Kingdom, gave an interview to the London Evening Standard on September 16 in which he said:

If ever I was tempted to indulge in a mental slump—which I seldom am, being an incurable optimist—I immediately think of what Canada is doing and going to do. That is more than enough to knock the bottom out of any fit of blues.

In the same interview he added that Canada already had been equal to all the demands made upon her, and he referred specifically to the "colossal"—that is his own word—quantities Canada had supplied of timber, non-ferrous metals, steel and aluminium. He concluded with words which I believe every Canadian will echo. "Whatever the demands of the future may be," he said, "I am sure of one thing—Canada will be there."

War production depends upon keeping up ample supplies of raw materials, and upon the organization of industry for new production. It equally depends upon skilled labour. Industrial employment in Canada has already reached a level never attained before in our history. Labour has extended its hours, surrendered its holidays, and in its determination to increase and advance production has taught the young and the inexperienced the intricacies of complicated trades. It will be the duty of the people of Canada, realizing these things now, to remember them in the hour of victory.

I shall conclude my account of Canada's war effort by a very brief summary of our war finance. I need not remind the house of the principles on which the government has decided that our war effort should, as far as possible, be financed. We have relied upon taxation and upon domestic borrowing. Even if we desired to use them, foreign markets are not at present available.

In the first twelve months of the war our expenditure was $290,000,000, or about $800,000 a day. The collapse of the resistance to the nazi offensive on the continent of Europe and the elimination thereby of many of the protective factors of time and space, were followed by an immediate increase in our financial and material responsibility. The result was a rapid and progressive rise in our war-time expenditures. In June and July we were spending about one and a third million dollars a day; in August, nearly two million dollars a day. In the month of September we spent $66,000,000; in October our war expenditures were over $81,000,000. The October expenditures were at the rate of almost a billion dollars a year.

Our revenues fortunately are at the highest level in Canada's history. Our second war loan of $300,000,000 was oversubscribed. Its subscription was broadly based. It was not unduly concentrated in the hands of banks and financial institutions, but many thousands of small investors rallied to its support. More than one million war savings certificates have been issued with an average holding of approximately $25 each. The original objective of $50,000,000 in the first year has been raised to $122,000,000. We have recently concluded arrangements with the United Kingdom to repurchase Canadian securities to the amount of $109,000,000 to provide the United Kingdom with Canadian funds for war purchases in Canada.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) will, of course, give a detailed report of our war finances. I should, however, not like to conclude this brief survey without pointing out that, thanks in no small measure to the excellent work of the Foreign Exchange Control Board there has been no major disturbance in the international exchange position in so far as it affects Canada. Equally, due to the splendid services performed by the War-time Prices and Trade Board, there have been no undue burdens placed upon Canadian consumers.

Before turning to another aspect of my subject, I should like to remind the house that the only limits the government is prepared to place upon Canada's war effort are those imposed by the extent of our resources, both human and material, and by our capacity for sacrifice. We will make financially possible, the utmost effort the people of Canada are physically and morally capable of making.

The policy of the government in this respect was clearly set forth by the present Minister of National Defence when, as Minister of Finance, he brought down the budget on June 24. Let me repeat his words:

> I need hardly say that our war effort is not in any sense to be limited by any such financial calculations or by what we can comfortably accomplish. We must make the maximum effort of which this country is capable. Financial provision can be made and will be made for whatever it is physically possible for us to produce or to procure in the way of war services, supplies and materials. The limits of our effort are not fiscal; if there are any such limits they are physical, mental and moral—by that I mean the physical limits of our resources and the mental and moral capacity of Canadians to bear burdens and make sacrifices.

A similar statement of government policy was made by the present Minister of Finance at the close of the review he gave the house of our war finances on July 30, when he said:

> See that Canada does her utmost—on the land, on the sea and in the air—and the cost, in so far as money can meet it, will be gladly and proudly paid.

I wish now to speak of Canada's relations, and indeed of the relations of the whole British commonwealth, with the United States, in the period under review. Before discussing these relations, I should like to say a word about how much our own Canadian war effort owes to the cooperation of the United States. Aircraft and tanks for training purposes, and destroyers for active service, are outstanding among the many essentials of warfare which the United States has so generously made available to Canada. The president's announcement on Friday last of the priorities being given to Britain and ourselves is only the most recent example of United States assistance magnanimously given to the United Kingdom and to Canada. Every member of the house will, I am sure, join with me in an expression of our appreciation and gratitude.

When history comes to record the time and place at which the onward sweep of nazi aggression was halted, and the tide of war turned, that place and time will be found, I believe, to be the English channel, during the months of August and September. Just as the evacuation of Dunkirk will remain a chapter unsurpassed in the history of British arms on land, on sea and in the air, so the indomitable resistance of Britain, the stout hearts of the people of London, the unflagging skill and daring of the young men in the air, and the unceasing vigilance of the navy will mark the supreme moment in the present world conflict when tyranny was halted in its threatening course, and despair was changed to hope.

There remains little doubt that when French resistance collapsed last June, the government of France and her military leaders believed that not only France but also Britain was doomed. In their despair, they thought that the nazi onslaught was irresistible and that Britain, too, would crumble before the might of the German attack. The terms of the French surrender and much that has happened since can be understood only in the light of this conviction of nazi invincibility.

Nor were the French alone in this appalling belief. It was generally held on the continent of Europe and, to a surprising degree, even in the United States. Public attention there became concentrated on the extent of American preparedness to meet the threat to this hemisphere which would follow the defeat of Britain. The myth of isolation was dissolved in an almost frenzied preoccupation with self-preservation. In order to meet the requirements of United States defences on land and sea and in the air, a movement of opinion developed even to the length of urging the retention in America of supplies of equipment and munitions desperately needed by Britain. Ominous rumours spread and gained credence that Britain could not hold out.

But Britain did hold out, and held out magnificently. The world's vision cleared, Great Britain stood forth as she has through the centuries, an impregnable fortress of freedom. On this side of the ocean despair vanished. The English channel came to be viewed as the first line of defence of the United States and of the new world. This break in the encircling gloom, this dawn of fresh hope on the horizon, inspired in the United States a new desire to do all that was possible, short of actual war, to aid Britain in her resistance, and in her determination to destroy the enemies of freedom.

The practical expression of that new hope was a steadily increasing supply of planes and guns and munitions and other essentials of war from the factories of the United States to the battlefield of Britain and the training fields of Canada. As each week passed, British determination evoked increased admiration. As admiration increased, support also increased.

The overwhelming majority of the people of the United States came to see in Britain an outwork of their own defence. They saw the need of giving all possible assistance to Britain. But they saw, too, the need for strengthening their second line of defence. If the coasts of America were to be immune from attack, naval and air bases were needed on the islands of the Atlantic. Joint action between the United States and Canada was recognized also as necessary to their common security. From the point of view of Canada and the whole British commonwealth, what followed constitutes the most significant development in international affairs in the three months since our parliament adjourned in August. In ultimate importance, it far surpasses the formation of the triple axis.

The first inkling of developments already under way was given to the public by the president of the United States, on August 16. On that day Mr. Roosevelt announced that:

> The United States government is holding conversations with the government of the British empire with regard to acquisition of naval and air bases for the defence of the western hemisphere and especially the Panama canal. The United States government is carrying on conversations with the Canadian government on the defence of the western hemisphere.

I shall have something to say to the house in a moment about these conversations. I wish first to recall the events which followed immediately on President Roosevelt's announcement.

The following day, which was August 17, I met the president at Ogdensburg. Our conversations that day, in continuance of conversations previously held, culminated in the formulation of an agreement which was made public the next afternoon, in a joint statement issued by Mr. Roosevelt and myself. I should like now to place the joint statement on record. It has come to be known as the Ogdensburg agreement. These are its terms:

> The Prime Minister and the President have discussed the mutual problems of defence in relation to the safety of Canada and the United States.
> It has been agreed that a permanent joint board on defence shall be set up at once by the two countries.
> This permanent joint board on defence shall commence immediate studies relating to sea, land and air problems including personnel and material.
> It will consider in the broad sense the defence of the north half of the western hemisphere.
> The permanent joint board on defence will consist of four or five members from each country, most of them from the services. It will meet shortly.

The Ogdensburg agreement was reached, as I have said, on August 17, and the joint statement setting forth its terms was issued on the following day. On August 20, Mr. Churchill announced in the British House of Commons the decision of the British government "spontaneously and without being asked or offered any inducement" to offer the United States sites for naval and air bases in the British possessions in the western hemisphere. I should like particularly to draw the attention of the house to one sentence of Mr. Churchill's announcement of the decision of the British government. "In all this line of thought," he said, "we found ourselves in very close harmony with the government of Canada."

On August 22, the Canada-United States permanent joint board on defence was appointed. Colonel O. M. Biggar, K.C., became chairman of the Canadian section and Mayor Fiorello LaGuardia of New York, chairman of the United States section. The first meeting of the board was held at Ottawa, in the following week. The board has met since on several occasions, and has been engaged upon continuous study of the sea, land and air problems immediately related to the defence of the north half of this hemisphere.

The next significant announcement came on September 3, the anniversary of the British declaration of war. On that day President Roosevelt announced that an agreement had been reached between the governments of the United Kingdom and the United States by which sites for bases in British Atlantic possessions were to be made available to the United States. In Newfoundland and Bermuda these sites were leased for no other consideration than Great Britain's interest in the strength and security of North America. The other sites in the Bahamas, the British West Indies and British Guiana, forming an outer ring of defence to the Panama canal, were leased in exchange for fifty over-age United States destroyers.

The house is aware that six of the fifty destroyers have since been made available to the Royal Canadian Navy and are already in commission. During a recent visit to Halifax, I had an opportunity of visiting some of the destroyers about to be transferred and of seeing how completely they were equipped. I was also privileged to extend to the United States admiral who brought the destroyers to Canadian waters the thanks of the government and people of Canada. I had previously written to the president to express our appreciation. Hon. members may be interested in the contents of my letter and the president's reply, and perhaps I might be permitted to place these on Hansard without reading them. My letter was as follows:

Ottawa, 30th September, 1940.

Dear Mr. President,

During the last few days I have been receiving reports from the officers in command of our naval service concerning the delivery and transfer of the United States destroyers to Canada and to the United Kingdom. One of the aspects of this transfer which has been repeatedly referred to in these reports is the splendid condition in which the vessels arrived in Canada and the cordial and cooperative attitude displayed by the officers and crews when the transfer was actually being effected. I have been told, for example, that the vessels were so completely equipped that not only were the mess appointments in perfect condition but the larders were stored as though the vessels were to be used for prolonged cruises with their United States personnel aboard.

I want you to know that the thoughtfulness and consideration which have been displayed in these, perhaps minor, but very characteristic actions, have been recognized and very deeply appreciated by the Canadian naval service and by the government of this country as well. I hope that you will inform the responsible officers that the way in which they have acted in arranging and carrying out the transfer of these vessels has been brought directly to my attention, and that I have asked that they should be thanked collectively and individually on behalf of the Canadian navy, the Canadian government and the Canadian people.

With kindest personal regards, I am

Yours very sincerely,

W. L. Mackenzie King.

The president's reply reads:

October 17, 1940.

Dear Mr. King:

Your very cordial letter concerning the manner and condition in which our destroyers have been turned over to Canada and the United Kingdom has given me great pleasure. I shall be happy indeed to have conveyed to the responsible officers the sentiments you have so graciously expressed.

On their behalf and that of the United States navy please accept my sincere thanks.

With kindest personal regards, I am

Yours very sincerely,

Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Now for a word as to the conversations which preceded the Ogdensburg agreement. The agreement itself was not due to any sudden or precipitate action. It was the outcome of several conversations between the president and myself with respect to coastal defence on both the Atlantic and the Pacific, in which the mutual interests of Canada and the United States were discussed. It has seemed to me that I should reserve for parliament such statement as it might be advisable to make with reference to those conversations which, in their nature, necessarily were highly confidential. I might say I have received the president's permission to refer to them publicly.

In the matter of time and significance, the conversations between President Roosevelt and myself on matters pertaining to the common interest of our two countries in the defence of their coasts, divide themselves naturally into two groups: the conversations which took place prior to the commencement of the war, and those which have taken place since.

The first conversation was on the occasion of a visit I paid the president at the White House, as long ago as March, 1937. At that time the discussion had reference to the position on the Pacific as well as on the Atlantic coasts. It was then agreed that, at some time in the future, meetings might be arranged between the staff officers of both countries to discuss problems of common defence.

On September 30 of that year, the president paid a visit to Victoria, British Columbia, crossing on a United States destroyer from Seattle. This visit led to arrangements for talks between staff officers regarding Pacific coast problems, which took place in Washington in January, 1938.

I think I may say that on every occasion on which I have visited the president in the United States, or on which I have met the president on his visits to Canada, matters pertaining to the defence of this continent have beeen a subject of conversation between us.

The defences on the Atlantic were referred to particularly in our conversations in August, 1938, in the course of the president's visit to Kingston, and the opening of the Thousand Islands bridge at Ivy Lee. At that time, it will be recalled, the president made the open declaration that the people of the United States would not stand idly by if domination of Canadian soil were threatened by any other empire. To this declaration I replied at Woodbridge, Ontario, two days later, that we too had our obligations as a good, friendly neighbour.

Our common problems of defence were discussed at length and in a more concrete and definite way when I visited Washington in November, 1938, to sign the new Canadian-United States trade agreement.

In the summer of 1939, the president paid a visit to Canadian waters off the Atlantic coast. He subsequently told me that this visit, like his similar visit to Victoria two years earlier, had been occasioned by his concern with the problem of coastal defence.

With the outbreak of war, the question of coast defences became of vital importance. At the same time, the fact that Canada was a belligerent and the United States a neutral complicated the problem of pursuing the discussions. In the face of the European menace it was obviously desirable to give expression to the needs of joint defence. To the means, however, of effecting this end, the most careful consideration had to be given in order that there might be no grounds for the belief that there was any attempt on Canada's part to influence the policies or to interfere in the domestic affairs of a neutral country. Had there not been, between the president and myself, complete confidence in each other's purpose and motives, I question if the situation could have been met without occasioning genuine embarrassment to one side or the other, if not indeed to both. Fortunately, in the light of our previous conversations, there was no danger of the position being misunderstood, and my visit with the president at Warm Springs, in April of the present year, afforded an exceptional opportunity for a careful review of the whole situation.

This is perhaps an appropriate place for me to say that, from the beginning, and at the time of each conversation, the president made it perfectly clear that his primary interest in the subject was the defence of the United States. I was equally frank in making it clear that my concern was the effective defence of Canada, and the defence of the British commonwealth of nations as a whole.

If one thing above another became increasingly evident in the course of our conversations, it was that our respective countries had a common interest in the matter of the defence of this continent. Since this was the case, everything pointed to the wisdom of planning carefully in advance for whatever contingency might arise.

The conversations begun between the president and myself before the war, in the direct manner I have described, and at Warm Springs taken up anew after Canada had entered the war, were supplemented as the weeks went by, by conversations conducted through diplomatic channels. Staff conversations followed in due course.

I should perhaps say that I gave to my colleagues who were members of the war committee of the cabinet my entire confidence with respect to the conversations I had had with the president, and subsequent steps were taken with their knowledge and full approval. I should also like to say that the British government was kept duly informed of what was taking place. The Canadian government likewise was kept informed of the defence matters directly discussed between the British government and the United States. The discussions naturally included questions pertaining to the leasing of air and naval bases on the Atlantic.

As I have already mentioned, the president had announced the day before our meeting at Ogdensburg that conversations had been taking place between the two governments. The Ogdensburg agreement formally confirmed what the previous conversations and planning had initiated. It made known to the world that plans of joint defence were being studied and worked out between the two countries. It did one thing more: It made clear that the board which was being established to make studies and recommendations was not being formed for a single occasion to meet a particular situation, but was intended to deal with a continuing problem. The board on joint defence was, therefore, declared to be permanent.

By a minute of council approved by His Excellency the Governor General on August 21, the establishment of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence was formally ratified and confirmed.

With the permission of the house, I should like to insert in Hansard a copy of the complete minute:

The committe of the privy council have had before them a report, dated August 20, 1940, from the Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs, representing:

That on August 17, 1940, at the invitation of the President of the United States, he proceeded to the United States to Ogdensburg in the state of New York, to meet Mr. Roosevelt for the purpose of discussing mutual problems of defence in relation to the safety of Canada and the United States;

That conversations on this subject between the Prime Minister and the President of the United States, accompanied by the Secretary of State for War of the United States (Mr.

Stimson), took place on August 17, and the following joint statement with respect to agreement which had been reached was, on August 18, released for publication by the Prime Minister and the President:

"The Prime Minister and the President have discussed the mutual problems of defence in relation to the safety of Canada and the United States.

It has been agreed that a Permanent Joint Board on Defence shall be set up at once by the two countries.

This Permanent Joint Board on Defence shall commence immediate studies relating to sea, land and air problems including personnel and material.

It will consider in the broad sense the defence of the north half of the western hemisphere.

The Permanent Joint Board on Defence will consist of four or five members from each country, most of them from the services. It will meet shortly."

That the actions of the Prime Minister in conducting the said conversations and in agreeing, on the part of Canada, to the establishment of a Permanent Joint Board on Defence for the consideration of the defence of the north half of the western hemisphere, are in accord with the policy of the government as approved on many occasions by the war committee of the cabinet and the cabinet itself.

The Prime Minister, therefore, recommends that his actions in conducting the said conversations and in agreeing to the establishment of the said Permanent Joint Board on Defence be ratified and confirmed.

The committee concur in the foregoing recommendation and submit the same for approval.

I draw particular attention to the following paragraph:

That the actions of the Prime Minister in conducting the said conversations and in agreeing, on the part of Canada, to the establishment of a Permanent Joint Board on Defence for the consideration of the defence of the north half of the western hemisphere, are in accord with the policy of the government as approved on many occasions by the war committee of the cabinet and cabinet itself.

The Permanent Joint Board on Defence might well be considered a logical development from the declarations made by President Roosevelt and myself in August, 1938. Let me recall these declarations to the minds of hon. members. The vital passage in Mr. Roosevelt's declaration at Kingston on August 18 reads:

The Dominion of Canada is part of the sisterhood of the British empire. I give to you assurance that the people of the United States will not stand idly by if domination of Canadian soil is threatened by any other empire.

My acknowledgment of Mr. Roosevelt's Kingston declaration at Woodbridge, Ontario, on August 20, 1938, contained these words:

We, too, have our obligations as a good friendly neighbour, and one of them is to see that, at our own instance, our country is made as immune from attack or possible invasion as we can reasonably be expected to make it, and that, should the occasion ever arise, enemy forces should not be able to pursue their way, either by land, sea, or air to the United States, across Canadian territory.

These declarations marked the first public recognition by both countries of their reciprocity in defence.

I should be the last to claim that the Ogdensburg agreement was due wholly to the conversations between the president and myself, or to our reciprocal declarations in 1938. I am happy to know that, in a moment of crisis, personal friendship and mutual confidence, shared over many years between Mr. Roosevelt and myself, made it so easy for us to conclude the agreement reached at Ogdensburg. In reality the agreement marks the full blossoming of a long association in harmony between the people of Canada and the people of the United States, to which, I hope and believe, the president and I have also in some measure contributed. The link forged by the Canada-United States defence agreement is no temporary axis. It was not formed by nations whose common tie is a mutual desire for the destruction of their neighbours. It is part of the enduring foundation of a new world order, based on friendship and good will. In the furtherance of this new world order, Canada, in liaison between the British commonwealth and the United States, is fulfilling a manifest destiny.

It cannot be assumed that our common background would, of itself, have produced harmonious relations between the two countries, much as that background has helped to make possible a close understanding between us. The understanding which exists owes its vitality to positive and far-sighted statesmanship over more than a century.

May I recall in this connection the words I used at the opening of the Thousand Islands bridge on August 18, 1938:

Our populations, after all—

I said, in referring to Canada and the United States.

—do not differ greatly from those of Europe. Indeed, the European countries have contributed most to their composition. Each of our countries has its problems of race and creed and class; each has its full measure of political controversy. Nevertheless we seem to have found the better way to secure and maintain our peace. . . . In the realm of international relations, we, too, have learned to bridge our differences. We have practised the art of building bridges. . . . In the art of international bridge-building there are two structures, each with its association with the St. Lawrence and the great lakes, of which I should like to say just a word. They stand out as monuments of international cooperation and good will. Each has its message for the world of to-day. The one is the Rush-Bagot agreement of 1817; the other, the International Joint Commission created in 1909.

The Rush-Bagot agreement is a self-denying ordinance of mutual disarmament. The International Joint Commission is an instrument for the peaceful adjustment of differences. The permanent joint board is a mutual arrangement for common defence. All three may appear an inevitable progress dictated by ordinary common sense. But we need only to pause for a moment's reflection to realize that, in the madness of the world to-day, common sense is the highest statesmanship.

I doubt if any act by a Canadian government, and certainly no development in our international relations, has ever received such unanimous acclaim in this country. So far as I have been able to ascertain, not a single newspaper from coast to coast uttered a syllable of disapproval of the Ogdensburg agreement itself. Though estimates of its importance and of the contribution made by myself may have varied, almost no voice was raised to decry its significance.

To illustrate the reception given in Canada to the Ogdensburg agreement, I might cite three brief appreciations, all of which appeared in papers which are frequently critical of the government. The Ottawa Journal of August 19 stated:

> Because they are joint trustees of this North American continent little can be wrong about Canada and the United States setting up a permanent joint board of defence. It is a measure of sane caution.

The same day, the Toronto Globe and Mail said:

> English-speaking peoples, and all who love liberty, will applaud the arrangement, which welds the bonds of friendship that have grown steadily stronger in the last century and a quarter.

The Quebec Chronicle-Telegraph echoed the same sentiments in these words:

> This decision, making the two countries a defence entity and revealing graphically how the greatly changing conditions in Europe are affecting North America's war problems and policies, will undoubtedly be warmly approved in both the United States and Canada, will be of considerable comfort to the British empire as a whole and to the entire Christian civilized world in general.

Although the presidential campaign was already in progress in the United States, and some effort to make political capital might perhaps have been expected, an examination of American press comment reveals a similar unanimous approval of the Ogdensburg agreement. The general sentiment in the United States seems to have been aptly expressed by the Chicago Tribune on August 21 in these words:

> Each nation is obliged to defend the other because that is its own best defence. Common sense dictates that arrangements for such defence should be made in advance, to assure efficiency and economy of force if the necessity for cooperation arises. The making of these arrangements is to be the function of the permanent joint board on defence which President Roosevelt and Prime Minister King have agreed to establish.

The realization, both in Canada and in the United States, that each nation is obliged to assist in the defence of its neighbour because that is its own best defence, has grown in the two years which elapsed between the Kingston and Woodbridge declarations and the Ogdensburg agreement.

The events of those two momentous years have served, as well, to allay the fears of those in Canada who felt that closer relations with the United States would weaken Canada's ties with Britain. Throughout my public life, I have consistently maintained the view that the friendliest relations between Canada and the United States, far from weakening the bonds betweens the nations of the British commonwealth, would, at all times, prove a source of strength. Moreover, I have always held that in the promotion of Anglo-American friendship, Canada has a very special role to play. This belief, I am happy to say, is shared, in all three countries, by those who have worked for closer relations between the English-speaking communities. It is shared in fullest measure by the present Prime Minister of Great Britain. More than ten years ago, at a time when he himself was holding no public office, Mr. Churchill expressed this belief in terms which I should like to quote from an article of his which appeared in the Saturday Evening Post of February 15, 1930.

The words gain a prophetic significance in the light of all subsequent developments and of none more than those of the present day. I quote:

> Great Britain herself has for centuries been the proved and accepted champion of European freedom. She is the centre and head of the British commonwealth of nations. She is an equal partner in the English-speaking world.
> It is at this point that the significance of Canada appears. Canada, which is linked to the British empire, first by the growing importance of her own nationhood, and secondly, by many ancient and sentimental ties precious to young and strong communities, is at the same time intimately associated with the United States.
> The long, unguarded frontier, the habits and intercourse of daily life, the fruitful and profitable connections of business, the sympathies and even the antipathies of honest neighbourliness, make Canada a binder-together of the English-speaking peoples. She is a magnet exercising a double attraction, drawing both Great Britain and the United States towards herself and thus drawing them closer to each other. She is the only surviving bond which stretches from Europe across the Atlantic ocean. In fact, no state, no country, no band of men can more truly be described as the linchpin of peace and world progress.

It is a happy coincidence that the soundness of this view of Canada's position as a link between the British and American peoples should have been so amply demonstrated at a moment when the one who shared it so completely, and who expressed it in such eloquent terms, has come to hold the office of Prime Minister of Great Britain.

In an editorial comment which appeared in the London Times on August 22 of this year, the significance of the Ogdensburg agreement in the wider relations between the English speaking peoples was recognized in terms reminiscent of Mr. Churchill's utterance of ten years ago

"The two countries" said the Times, "will henceforward have closer ties than they have ever had in the past, and Canada more than ever before will be the linchpin of Anglo-American relations."

Let me quote two other extracts, one from a Labour, and one from a Liberal newspaper. They serve to reveal the unanimity of view of the British press. The London Daily Herald said:

Faith in the British system has been revitalized. So to-day it is with blessing we say: Canada, through you new links can be forged between us and our cousins across your unarmed frontier. Make your own decisions. They are ours.

On August 20 the Manchester Guardian said:

There is a close connection between the two announcements of the week-end of the negotiations with Britain for the leasing by the United States of naval and air bases in the Caribbean sea and of the agreement between the United States and Canada for setting up a joint defence board. They are part of the preparations for the defence of the western hemisphere against the dictatorships. They have a bearing on the war and on American help for Britain.

In view of the extent to which, throughout my public life, my known attitude towards the United States has been so greatly misrepresented, I may perhaps be pardoned if I venture to give to the house some indication of how this attitude and my occasional visits to that country have been viewed by those in the United Kingdom who are perhaps in the best position to judge of their value.

In a cable which he sent to me as recently as September 13, and which was first made public in the United Kingdom, Mr. Churchill was kind enough to use the following words:

I am very glad to have this opportunity of thanking you personally for all you have done for the common cause and especially in promoting a harmony of sentiment throughout the new world. This deep understanding will be a dominant factor in the rescue of Europe from a relapse into the dark ages.

A few days later—September 17—in the House of Lords, Lord Caldecote, who was at that time Secretary of State for the Dominions, made the following reference:

Perhaps the most striking development in the recent weeks has been the coming together of the British empire and the United States, as illustrated in the recent agreement for the grant of defence bases to the United States in certain British territories and the supply of American destroyers for our naval forces. But this is not all. It has been coupled with and indeed preceded by the agreement between the United States and Canada for the setting up of a joint defence board and perhaps I may be allowed to repeat the tribute which the Prime Minister paid in a recent message to the Canadian Prime Minister, Mr. Mackenzie King, for the great part which he has consistently played in promoting a harmony of sentiment between the British empire and the United States of America. I need not remind your lordships how pregnant with possibilities this new development may well be for peace and freedom in the years to come.

Any part which our country may have had in bringing about a harmony of sentiment between the British empire and the United States may well be a legitimate source of pride to all Canadians. In the midst of the darkness which to-day enshrouds mankind, the relations between the United States and the British commonwealth shine forth as the one great beam of hopeful light left in the world.

During the American civil war, when the relations between Britain and the United States were strained almost to the breaking point, John Bright, speaking in the British House of Commons on June 16, 1863, used these conciliatory and prophetic words:

I can only hope that, as time passes, and our people become better informed, they will be more just, and that ill feelings of every kind will pass away; that in future all who love freedom here will hold converse with all who love freedom there, and that the two nations, separated as they are by the ocean, come as they are, notwithstanding, of one stock, may be in future time united in soul, and may work together for the advancement of the liberties and the happiness of mankind.

What greater hope can we entertain for humanity than that the vision of John Bright for the union of souls of the British and American peoples may find its realization in their work together for the preservation of the liberties of mankind.

I was going to say something with reference to the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence development, but the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) had also the same intention, and as he has decided to defer to another time his remarks on that subject I am glad now to do the same. I shall continue with a few references to our relations with France.

The present war has, as I have shown, enlarged the opportunities and the solemn responsibility of Canada to serve as a vital link between the United States and the British commonwealth. This role is, however, not the only one which Canada is uniquely equipped to play in international relations. There is a third great nation with whom our ties are close. I have spoken of Canada's place as an interpreter of the English speaking peoples. Canada, however, is not merely an English-speaking nation but is also a French-speaking nation. It is, indeed, the second French-speaking nation of the world.

The agony of France has thrown upon Canada a great responsibility and a great mission. As I pointed out at the moment of the collapse of France, "the tragic fate of France leaves to French Canada the duty of upholding the traditions of French culture and civilization, and the French passion for liberty in the world. This new responsibility will, I believe, be accepted proudly."

Events are throwing upon Canada not only the mission of upholding the traditions of French culture and civilization, but also the duty of helping to keep alive in the hearts of Frenchmen, all but prostrate to-day before a brutal conqueror, their devotion to liberty and their hopes of its ultimate triumph.

In the consciousness of that mission, my colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), recently broadcast a message to the French people. May I repeat a few lines from that message:

> "Over there, you are our allies because we know too well the heart of France to doubt an instant of her heart's loyalty. Because we love the same things, we know that, no matter what fate may bring to her, no matter what tribulations await her, France will never fight against the British, against us, French-Canadians, so many of whose sons have been resting in the soil of France for the past twenty-three years."

I appeal to hon. members in the house and I appeal to my fellow-countrymen in all parts of the dominion to bear always in mind the task which Canada alone can perform in keeping hope alive in the hearts of the grief-stricken people of France. Let no word from Canadian lips add to the agony of her open wounds. Let us inflict no new pain, and let us be ever watchful to exercise the healer's art. In the new world which will follow the destruction of the evil thing which now crushes France, Canada's part in cementing the bonds between the French and the English-speaking peoples may be just as great as her role in bringing into closer relationship the peoples of the British commonwealth and the United States.

A word in conclusion concerning our war aims, or, if the term seems preferable, our peace aims. Rightly considered, the two constitute opposite sides of the same shield. There has already been a good deal of discussion concerning aims in this war. It is said on the one hand that the only aim of importance is to defeat the enemy; on the other, that most important of all is to bring into being a new social order, an order in which freedom, truth and justice will increasingly prevail in the relations between individuals, between classes and among nations. Personally I do not see that any conflict need arise between our war aims and our peace aims. If nazi Germany is not defeated there will be little of freedom, truth and justice left in this world. If on the other hand we are in earnest in our desire to have freedom, truth and justice prevail in all human relations we should be prepared to fight as men have never fought before.

The hidden source and latent power of all human action lies in its motive. The motive of nazi Germany is domination, its method the most brutal and barbarous which evil minds have been able to conceive. The motive of domination to achieve its ends must be accompanied by material power. That power may be exercised through the instruments of violence and force, or through any of the agencies of propaganda, trickery and treachery which serve to foster aggrandizement and beget fear. Material power alone, however, is not an enduring power. Strip domination of its material trappings and there is nothing left. Freedom, truth and justice belong to a different realm. They are not material things capable of being consumed and destroyed; they are of the mind and of the spirit, they belong to the eternal realities. They are attributes of God Himself. In the end they are certain to triumph.

In their conflict with those who make of material power an end in itself, those who treasure the world of mind and spirit may, for the preservation of their physical existence, find it necessary to forge and to use against their adversaries the weapons of material power. It is well to remember that "he that liveth by the sword shall perish by the sword" is a part of Christian doctrine. To my mind the simple test of the right or wrong of any aim or of any institution is: Can it endure? Domination by a single dictator or group of dictators may last for a time. It may extend its sway and its sweep, but it cannot endure. Freedom, truth and justice crushed to earth will rise again. It is the breath of God which alone gives life to the bodies of men. Freedom, truth and justice, these will endure; for not only do they give life but they continue to give it more abundantly.

What is necessary then to win the present conflict? It is to put on the whole armour of God, not the outward material trappings only, the helmet, the sword and the shield, necessary as they may be for purposes of defence and of attack. Let it never be forgotten that "we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places." Let us make sure that the helmet is also one of salvation; the sword, one of the spirit; and the shield, one of faith; that our loins are girt about with truth and that our breastplate is one of righteousness, and that our feet are shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace. If these things are ours, and I believe they are the weapons with which Britain and the dominions seek to slay the dragon of nazi Germany to-day, we shall find little difficulty in reconciling our war aims and our peace aims. To slay the dragon which has been fascinating its victims by fear, poisoning the springs of their moral and intellectual being at the source, and which would prey upon their vitals for years to come is clearly the first task of a civilization which would save itself. In equal measure, however, we must strive throughout the struggle itself, and more than ever when the evil dragon of nazism is slain, to see that never again, in our own or in any other land, shall the gods of material power, of worldly possessions and of special privilege be permitted to exercise their sway. Never again must we allow any man or any group of men to subjugate by fear and to crush by the power of might the spirit and the lives of honest and humble men.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I do not propose to follow closely to-night the arguments or the statements of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I shall have some criticisms to make, but before I do so I should like to congratulate the Prime Minister upon an anniversary in his life which I understand is reached to-day. I am told that thirty-one years ago, on November 12, 1909, he first took his seat in this house as Minister of Labour. I should like on behalf of the group to which I belong—and I am sure I express the feelings of other hon. members as well—to wish him good health and strength to carry on the difficult task that is now his.

I should like also to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address, and to express to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) the appreciation we feel for his kindly reference to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). We feel that in that reference he placed before the people of Canada as well as hon. members of this house one of the reasons why many people who might otherwise oppose the use of force believe that the struggle now in progress is one for the very fundamentals of democracy; for in this parliament on more than one occasion the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre rose in his place and freely expressed opinions which were in direct opposition to the views held by a vast majority of the members of this house. The very fact that that could be done in this chamber is in my opinion a demonstration of some democracy in the Dominion of Canada.

I would also congratulate the seconder of the address (Mr. Jutras), and to pass this remark, that his excellent use of the English language and the fact that I am told that he speaks French equally well, coming as he does from an English-speaking province of this dominion, constitute an example which I wish more of our young people throughout this broad dominion would follow. I want to congratulate him upon his ability to use both languages so proficiently.

The members of our group welcome this new session of parliament. We believed, and we believe, that this house should neither adjourn nor prorogue for a longer period than ninety days during the continuance of the present struggle. It is, I think, a sad commentary on the Prime Minister's professions of democracy that he has treated parliament with what I believe to be scant consideration since the outbreak of war. In the first eight crucial months of this great struggle parliament sat for only six business days, including January 25. When it was suggested that parliament should adjourn and not prorogue on August 7 we were careful to inquire if reassembly on November 5 would be mandatory. The Prime Minister gave us his assurance that it would be. The question was prompted by a desire to prevent a repetition of the farce of January 25. It was with surprise, therefore, that we read in the press the announcement that the meeting on November 5 would be merely formal and that the house would adjourn without discussion until some time in January. The announcement went so far as to say that members who lived at a distance need not attend.

Without entering into the controversy between the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) as to who suggested this strange method of procedure I would remind them both that this is still a free parliament and not a fascist grand council or nazi reichstag, to be assembled and dismissed at the will of any member of the house, no matter how high the office he may hold. The members of this house decided to adjourn until November 5, and neither the Prime Minister nor the leader of the opposition had any right to suggest that some members need not attend or that there would be no discussion. Fortunately the press and public opinion prevented the attempted usurpation of the rights and privileges of the people's representatives. We at least are determined that in a war fought for freedom of speech, freedom of assembly and democratic institutions, parliament, not the Prime Minister or the leader of the opposition or any other person, shall be supreme. Parliament may be a nuisance to some people; it always has been, and many attempts have been made to get rid of it. Methods were cruder three hundred years ago when, on another November 5, Guy Fawkes proposed to blow it up with gunpowder. This November 5 the Canadian parliament was not to be blown up; it was to be blown out. Well, both plans fortunately were frustrated, and parliaments continue to be symbols and instruments of an age old and still to be completed struggle for freedom and self-government. Surely it is the duty of members of this house to meet frequently during this period of grave crisis.

Since we rose in August events have occurred which have profoundly affected the future of the world. The Prime Minister reviewed them to-night. The war has continued to spread, and we have watched with admiration the truly magnificent effort of the British people in defence of their homeland. Meantime France has fallen more completely under the domination of the dictators. Pierre Laval, the long time friend of fascism, now is vice-premier of that stricken country, guiding Marshal Petain, who is old and tired, just as Hindenburg was old and tired when Hitler began his rise to power. What then is to be our relationship to the Vichy government? No longer can it be regarded as a free government representing the will of the French people. Its decrees obviously are dictated by its nazi masters.

This tragic situation at once raises the question of the position of its legation in Ottawa. Is it wise and proper, in the light of everything that has happened in France and in Europe, that representatives of any pro-fascist governments under the control of Hitler and Mussolini should continue to enjoy all the privileges and immunities of the diplomatic corps? It seems to us that while representatives of foreign states and powers should be treated always with the utmost consideration, yet now we should remember that we are engaged in a new kind of war, no longer a struggle between nations in the old sense of the phrase but, as the Prime Minister said earlier this evening, ideological. Ideological wars cut across boundaries, just as the religious wars cut across boundaries and across nations centuries ago. This leads me to say that our government might make it known to neutral powers that it is the wish of this country that accredited diplomatic representatives from abroad shall be persons who in the recent past have shown no satisfaction with the successes of Mussolini or Hitler in Ethiopia, Spain, Czechoslovakia or any other place where the menace of dictatorship has raised its ugly head. This precaution we owe not only to the people of Canada but to our good neighbours to the south to whom since we adjourned in early August the government has linked us closer.

We agree with the mover of the address in expressing our deepest satisfaction with the agreement that has been reached with the United States for the joint defence of this continent. Indeed last session we urged that attempts should be made by Canada to discuss such a proposal. At that time our suggestion met with a very cool reception by this house, but I am glad that President Roosevelt invited the Prime Minister to meet him at Ogdensburg. The press and public generally approved whole-heartedly the meeting and all its happy results. Indeed, it is our hope that the friendly relationship existing among the peoples of Canada, the British commonwealth and the United States may be even more firmly cemented as the days go by. Meantime the Prime Minister has been wise to inform the house regarding the agreement, and I would suggest that further information can be obtained later in the session regarding the extent and scope of the agreement perhaps in greater detail. Should this or other matters require a closed session of this house, then I think the government should facilitate its being held.

From the United States agreement it seems to me two facts emerge. First, it is another recognition by our populous, rich, and powerful neighbour to the south that she has no security apart and distinct from the collective security of her neighbours as well as herself. And, second, Canada recognizes her position as a part of the north American continent, and undertakes new obligations in regard to it.

Thus, I repeat, understandings which may profoundly affect the world position of our own country ought to receive the fullest consideration by this parliament. We are of the opinion, too, that every phase of our war effort should receive the most careful scrutiny by this house. Recently Major-General Crerar, from whose speech before the Ottawa Canadian Club some quotations were made by the leader of the opposition this afternoon, has been giving addresses across Canada. In them he has been emphasizing our need to intensify our efforts toward the complete provision of armaments for our men in uniform. We of this group believed a year ago that Canada's most effective contribution in this war ought to be made in the national organization of industry for the supplying of economic aid without profit to ourselves. We still believe this to be the major contribution that we can make. So far public attention has been focussed upon the raising of men. Our mobilization act so far has been used only to register the adult population, and to call out certain classes of young men. In our opinion the act should have been used first to mobilize industry for an efficient war effort.

Apart from every other consideration I submit we have no right to ask men to surrender themselves for the common cause unless and until we ask industry and our financial institutions to place themselves on the same basis at the disposal of the country in her hour of need. And this has not yet been done. On the contrary large sums of money are being spent by the governments on the enlargement of privately owned plants and upon the erection of new plants which are to be owned by the governments but operated by certain private corporations.

I would remind the house that reliance on private enterprise nearly lost the war of 1914-18, and private enterprise, according to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), blocked the making of certain war supplies in Canada during the first eight months of the present war. It was not until a new government in Britain revolutionized the control of her war effort that the picture began to change. Yet in Canada, under the policies favoured by the Department of Munitions and Supply, this country is being delivered more completely into the hands of those who already monopolize our economic life.

Indeed, I will go a step farther and say that it would appear that government-owned institutions are being sacrificed in the interests of private corporations. Allow me to illustrate:

Last week I was in a large western city near which a new war industry is being established. The Canadian National railway and the Canadian Pacific railway run almost parallel into this city. The site for the plant was selected just half a mile from the large mains supplying the city with water and on the main electric power line. The site was level, without buildings and in every way suitable. The Canadian National Railways could run their spurs quite easily into the plant, but the Canadian Pacific Railway could not. A short time ago the site was changed to the other side of the Canadian National Railways' track, in order that the Canadian Pacific Railway might serve it. The change necessitates, among other things, the building of a water main four and one-half miles long, instead of the half mile required before at a cost of approximately $60,000 a mile.

Mr. TURGEON: What city was that?

Mr. COLDWELL: I believe I may say that it was the city of Winnipeg. This is not hearsay. I was taken out to see the sites by the responsible city head, so that I might be quite fully and reliably informed.

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member's information is not complete, however.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is the information as it was given to me by the mayor of the city.

No doubt other members of this house can give, and I hope will give, examples of how powerful oil companies, gas and power companies, chemical concerns, milling interests and aeroplane corporations are being encouraged to dig in now, so that when the war ends Canada will be thoroughly controlled by monopolistic finance and industry. I say that it is the duty of this parliament to change the trends and to relieve those who are responsible for the situation from any further control of our war effort. Otherwise the Canadian people will have lost the war on the home front.

Some industries, too, are pursuing labour policies which must ultimately bring them into conflict with their employees. Up to the present time, unemployment has enabled employers to prevent attempts at organization. Men who wished to organize in the unions of their choice have been dismissed. But the intensification of our war effort and the growing realization that this is a war not of men but of machines, will create a labour shortage. Then these employers will face a new situation and will demand legislation to control labour. Indeed, one order in council, P.C. 6286, tabled last Thursday can be used to prevent workers from trying to better their working conditions. Apparently this order in council has some teeth in it in the form of a heavy fine. But another order in council, P.C. 2685, setting out the proper relations between employer and employee is a dead letter because it has no teeth in it, and the government has given the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) no power to enforce it.

In Britain the success of the war effort in the last six months is due to the fact that labour is organized and its power made manifest in the highest councils of the nation. In Canada employers thwart with impunity attempts to organize. Even plants financed by the government deliberately discriminate against men who wish to organize. Indeed, a government corporation, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which for some inexplicable reason the Minister of Munitions and Supply took with him when he left the rest of his former department behind, forbade organization among its employees.

True, the Prime Minister repudiated Major Murray's attempt to speak in the name of the government on that occasion, but apparently nothing further was done about the matter by the minister. What is his attitude toward the unionization of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation employees, or that of workers in government-financed plants? And what of the broadcasting corporation? Radio is an important feature of modern life. Through it great good or evil can be done. In a free democratic country it ought to be available to all. But in Canada, people on this side of the house are never invited to participate in the discussion of public issues. That is reserved for members of the government and for officials who praise them. Indeed, radio stations in some parts refuse to allow representatives of organized labour to use their facilities, even though their manuscripts may have been passed by the dominion censor. Yet employing interests are able to use the same facilities to pat themselves on their backs or to smother the country with soap. Nevertheless it was through the efforts of public-spirited citizens that radio in Canada was made a public service subject to the control of parliament.

Now that radio is an important weapon of war it is deplorable that this great service has been allowed by the responsible minister to deteriorate to the extent that a gentleman, whom the Winnipeg Free Press describes as being "one of the oldest and staunchest supporters of publicly owned radio in Canada" has resigned.

Mr. Alan Plaunt's charges are very serious. In his letter of resignation he states that he has long ceased to have confidence in the internal organization and executive direction of the corporation. He adds, and again I quote:

> It is my considered view that the present conditions seriously hamper the corporation in fulfilling its functions in the war emergency, and prejudice its survival as an effective instrument of national unity afterwards.

These, I repeat, are serious charges and demand careful investigation by this parliament. This is not the time to enter into details, but a few things occur to one who has listened to the radio during the past year. In time of war the news and propaganda which come over the air are of the utmost importance. This is particularly true in the case of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, because its broadcasts are heard by our neighbours to the south. In war time it is essential that our educational programmes should be attractive, pleasant to the ear as well as appealing to the intelligence of the radio audience. Its day-time sustaining programmes, consisting largely of soap advertising, are turned off in thousands of homes across Canada. People are tired of hearing about suds, dirty clothes and the airing of imaginary family squabbles and difficulties.

But I have been wondering if the situation in the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation may not be due to inadequate ministerial supervision. I have tried to imagine why the Minister of Munitions and Supply retained radio under his control when he abandoned the transport portfolio. It is impossible to see any connection between radio and the production of munitions and supplies; surely its proper place is with those in charge of information and propaganda. Why did the minister of one of the heaviest and most important war departments retain an additional department which has no relation to his work? This should be explained.

Finally—and this must be said by someone—there are the most disquieting stories in circulation regarding the competence and so on, of the general manager. A reputable journal like Toronto Saturday Night no doubt refers to this in its last issue when it says:

> And after poking around it seems that there is a mess in the management and policy of the C.B.C., that a public airing will probably do good.

If this is true, then the sooner parliament looks into the matter the better. This country cannot afford the luxury of incompetence or unreliability in the management of one of our most important war and post-war instruments. In short, I believe, that this parliament has the right to know what serious weaknesses the investigation by Mr. Thompson, to which Mr. Plaunt refers in his letter of resignation, disclosed. A committee should be appointed to investigate the entire matter, and most certainly the Minister of Munitions and Supply should be relieved of a department to which he cannot possibly give the required attention.

Questions have been asked already by the leader of the opposition with regard to the progress of our munitions output. To what extent are we supplementing the factories of Great Britain in the production of tanks and other heavy equipment? Have plans for the making of these commodities been approved and have we the workers and materials in sight to carry through the plans when they are approved? Then, too, what efforts are being made to conserve certain essential material for our own and Britain's needs? I notice that in a statement which he issued on October 23, 1940, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) said that our exports to Portugal, Spain and Switzerland have shown sharp increases. For example, the minister said that Spain has been getting automobiles, scrap copper and asbestos.

Spain is a member of the fascist circle, and several times it has been thought that she might participate actively in the war although Berlin states that, like Italy before June, she is more useful neutral than at war with Britain. Why are we sending Spain scrap copper when that country is one of the world's sources of copper? Why asbestos? Why automobiles? All these in larger quantities. We have sent, and I thought that we were still sending—the Prime Minister corrected this belief to-night—material to arm Japan. Are we now helping fascist Spain to prepare for war against us, or to arm Germany and Italy. The Prime Minister stated to-night that Germany is short of copper. We cannot sell wheat to Russia, and I am not complaining about that if there is a danger of its going to Germany, but why sell copper, asbestos and automobiles to fascist Spain which is the creature of Mussolini and Hitler? We demand that the export of goods to our potential enemies cease at once. In saying this I am certain that I am expressing the desire of a vast majority of the Canadian people.

On motion of Mr. Coldwell the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, November 13, 1940.

The house met at three o'clock.

INTERNED ENEMY ALIENS

STATEMENT RESPECTING INQUIRY AS TO EMPLOYMENT ON CONSTRUCTION OF ARMY HUTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. P. F. CASGRAIN (Secretary of State): With reference to the question asked yesterday on the orders of the day by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) I may say that all construction in connection with internment camps is performed under the engineering branch of the Department of National Defence. I have made inquiries and have ascertained that the services of no prisoners of war have been employed in construction work outside the internment camps. In a few instances where the construction of all the buildings had not been completed when the prisoners of war arrived, their services were used to complete the buildings and the camp equipment in order to avoid additional expense to the public treasury and to ensure speedy completion. The employment of these prisoners on such work was conducted in strict accordance with the international convention relative to the treatment of prisoners of war, and any payment made therefor was in compliance with the provisions of that convention.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Tuesday, November 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Brooke Claxton for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury).

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): War has effectively closed our principal markets for farm products. Our Canadian farmers realize that the necessities of the blockade make it quite improper to export food and other basic materials to countries which may in turn supply Germany and her victims. But they insist that exports of minerals and other supplies shall be controlled in precisely the same manner. Our agricultural problems are, however, not due to war conditions exclusively. Economic nationalism and the increase in production encouraged by the first great war, and made possible by the mechanization and scientific development of agriculture, have combined to increase the difficulties of Canadian agriculture. The lack of any intelligent policy or direction on the part of the government has greatly increased the difficulties.

In western Canada particularly, restriction of delivery, causing a serious loss of financial return, together with a lack of proper storage space, and lost markets, have caused a condition which endangers the entire economy. The wheat situation can best be illustrated by saying that the carryover of last year's crop, including stocks of Canadian wheat in the United States, was 301,000,000 bushels. The last estimate of the new 1940 crop is 561,000,000 bushels, so that for all purposes we have over 860,000,000 bushels available in this crop year. If domestic and foreign requirements reach 350,000,000 bushels, which in my opinion is too much to hope for, our carryover into the next crop year will be more than 500,000,000 bushels, or nearly 50,000,000 bushels more than all elevator and storage capacity in Canada.

This, however, is not the calamity it appears to be, because it may well become our greatest war asset. For Britain it is an assurance that so long as she can keep the seaways open we have over two years' supply of food for her in our own country; and second, it is an assurance to the suffering people of Europe that as soon as they care to and can cooperate with us in the overthrow of the dictators they too can be fed. In that respect it may prove to be a trump card. We therefore contend that the burden of carrying this asset ought not to be left with the producers, but should be assumed by the entire nation.

Since similar conditions face other branches of agriculture, we would make these suggestions:

1. That the marketing of all farm produce by appropriate boards with adequate producer representation be provided for.

2. The suppression of gambling and speculation in food products, including of course the closing of the grain exchange.

3. The acquisition by marketing boards of all farm produce at parity prices.

4. A cash advance on grain properly stored on the farms of 75 per cent of the wheat board's initial payment, and an issue of participation certificates on all farm produce marketed through the appropriate boards.

5. That on the participation certificates issued last year an interim payment should be made at once. This would assist the farmers to provide proper farm storage for grain, enabling the producers to benefit from the storage charges, now being paid to elevator and other companies.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

6. That all processing and packing plants be brought under cooperative or public ownership and control, to eliminate monopoly exploitation and to establish parity prices.

7. The appointment of a full-time Minister of Agriculture devoting exclusive attention to the industry, and the transfer of all agricultural marketing boards from the Department of Trade and Commerce to the Department of Agriculture.

The policies suggested require the establishment of a planning commission for the agricultural industry. Such a commission should recommend future policy, coordinate the work of the marketing boards and prepare plans for the saving and storage of surplus products during the war period. It should arrange for adequate distribution of food to persons on relief, on small pensions and on low standards of living. It should arrange also for the establishment of a domestic freight rate which would enable producers in other parts of Canada to use our lower grades of grain for the feeding of live stock. In addition, it should arrange for the export to Great Britain without profit to Canada of surplus supplies of food now rationed in the mother country. But let me emphasize that in addition to this immediate policy it should recommend long-term plans for the rehabilitation of the agricultural industry.

There are other matters which time will allow me only to mention briefly now. Foremost among them are the defence of Canada regulations. As I indicated to the special committee at the close of last session, I am far from satisfied with them in their revised form. I believe that every accused person and every accused organization ought to have the right of an immediate and fair trial before an impartial tribunal. I realize that provisions of a different sort relating to the examination of witnesses may be necessary during the war, but an accused and his counsel should have the right to examine fully the written evidence upon which detentions and internments of British citizens are made. In other words, we are again demanding that the rule of law shall be safeguarded and observed. Without these guarantees there can be no democracy and we are in danger of establishing in Canada the very system which we are fighting abroad. The government should provide the house as early as possible in this session with an opportunity of discussing the report of the special committee which dealt with the defence of Canada regulations at the last session.

Last evening the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) concluded his remarks with a reference to war and peace aims. I was disappointed that he left the matter, shorn of all the verbiage, with a statement that our ability to defeat the enemy would determine our opportunity of building a new social order. With that rather trite statement I fancy we can all agree. But we affirm our belief that this government owes it to the Canadian people, and to our men in the armed forces particularly, to define its aims in consultation with the British and the allied governments. Democratic Canadians want this war to end in a lasting peace based on social and economic justice and the rule of law nationally and internationally. To achieve these ends peace must be negotiated between peoples freed of course from the threat of force. Great and small nations must realize that their security depends upon collective security and not purely upon national power. This conception involves the establishment of an international authority superior to individual states and the abandonment of force as an instrument of national policy. It therefore follows that all people must have the right to develop their own civilization and that the rights of national, racial and religious minorities must be guaranteed and respected. This involves the renunciation of all forms of exploitation and the making of provision for economic cooperation and equal access to raw materials and to the markets of the world. In our opinion a statement of such aims at this time would do much to destroy the influence of Hitler and Mussolini in their own countries and consolidate democratic peoples behind the allied cause.

There are other matters which I should have liked to discuss at some length but time does not permit me to do so. We are of the opinion that the government is doing the right thing in calling a conference to consider the Sirois report. Much of the factual material gathered together by the commission will be of great value to students and others in considering the dominion-provincial problems which have to be solved at this time and in relating them to the necessities of our war and post war problems. We shall be glad to give the matter our most intelligent consideration.

I should like to close with the thought that to-day we are witnessing an unhealthy war boom. Employment is increasing; our factories are busy; some prices are rising and bank loans are on the increase. But this is not prosperity in the sense that we use the term in peace time. Neither is it the solution, for which we have been looking, of our unemployment problem. The solution lies deeper and will require great and fundamental changes for which we must prepare. We are witnessing the passing of an age. We must revamp, reform and revitalize our constitutional, economic and social relationships in preparation for the great task of rebuilding on new foundations a world which at the present time is being subjected to physical and moral deterioration.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the members of this group were elected on March 26 as New Democracy members I believe I would be remiss in my duty if I neglected to seize the first opportunity to refer in this house to certain recent occurrences.

Mr. Joseph P. Kennedy, United States ambassador to Great Britain who recently returned home, is reported in the Boston Globe to have said during the course of an interview:

> Democracy is finished in England. It may be here. Because it comes to a question of feeding people.

This is a rude shock. Have we not been hearing that we are fighting for democracy? Were not the nations on our side incessantly characterized as the democracies, as opposed to the dictators? Was not Britain held up to us as the leader, the bulwark of democracy? Now we hear this! It is true that Mr. Kennedy hastened to explain that his remarks were intended to be "off the record," but that fact will only make them the more significant.

It is well that Canadians should note what Mr. Kennedy was reported to have said of democracy in the United States. In that country there would seem to be dangerous trends. I wonder if our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) knew about those trends. I hope that throughout his efforts to bind Canada more and more closely to the United States he has taken and will continue to take adequate precautions to safeguard Canadian democracy.

But there is circulating a malodorous rumour of another sort. Into the October, 1940, issue of Canadian Business, that impeccable bulwark of all things orthodox and reactionary in Canada, there somehow crept an article entitled "The U.S. and Us," by one Leslie Roberts, in which we find such passages as this:

> You might also say Britain has been communized, but you certainly could not say she had been Stalinized, and there is a vast difference except to a man who cringes when he sees labels.

And such bold notes as:

> The joint defence plan is more than politics, it presages a new international, industrial and economic order in North America.

and:

> Canada can expect a "communization" such as Britain has seen, although the transition will be more gradual.

and:

Planned production, the standardization and interchangeability of munitions and equipment in both countries is beginning.

So now Canada is to be communized but not Stalinized, is it? Are we to understand, then, that Canada is to be Leninized or perhaps Trotsky-ized? And what is the difference between the brand of communism Canada is to have and the brand that has been so meticulously declared unlawful, which has been so dutifully hunted down and so rigorously punished? How astonishing all this is; how astounding, how utterly bewildering!

Certainly it is time for a new democracy, for a philosophy that knows not only how to talk about democracy but how to recognize it, safeguard it, preserve it and perfect it among men. Perhaps no one has better defined democracy than did Lincoln when he characterized it as government of the people, by the people and for the people. To bring his statement up to date we might specify "what" people, making the expression read: "Government of all the people, by the majority of the people, for the greatest good of the greatest possible number of the people, especially the common people."

There should be at least three kinds of democracy: social, political and economic. Towards each of these three the British peoples throughout the generations have striven fervently and sternly. By insisting upon freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of association and freedom of religion we have made some progress towards social democracy. By establishing the vote by secret ballot, universal suffrage, representation by population, a carefully elaborated system of parliamentary institutions, responsible government and the like, our fathers have attained a fair measure of political democracy. Several pernicious influences, however, have been and are now at work disintegrating our political democracy. These influences fall under two main categories.

The first category comprises economic considerations: fear of the loss of a job or of advancement, fear of the loss of patronage and other similar fears deter many men from voting sincerely. Then powerful interests constantly seek to modify the policies of parties and the behaviour of governments. The second category comprises intellectual and emotional considerations. Propaganda distorts people's understanding and judgment and beclouds the issues in elections. Each year these forces are becoming more and more intense and devastating in subversive effect. Meanwhile life is growing more complex and, to the average citizen, incomprehensible. Political democracy is gravely endangered.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Economic democracy has been dreamed of and striven for but never achieved in any substantial measure. Economic democracy is fundamental. Without it the other kinds of democracy are becoming more and more futile and will cease to exist. We must have economic democracy.

How to attain economic democracy and so establish it that it will endure is one of the main considerations of our generation. The London Economist has envisioned the object to be achieved. It is quoted by the Western Producer of October 31, 1940, as saying:

The thirties are over and gone, and the time has come for constitutional guarantees to the right of food, clothing, medical care and education, along with free speech, press and worship.

How to achieve this is the problem. People will insist that it be done. Two plans are developing in men's minds. One of these presupposes a socialistic dictatorship more or less resembling that of Hitler, Mussolini or Stalin. It means the destruction of democracy. The other plan declares that power can be decentralized, that ownership can be decentralized, and that individual freedom and security can be maintained. The great example of this second plan to attain a higher economic democracy and self-government of other kinds is social credit.

I beg leave to move in the following terms an amendment to the amendment which has already been moved:

That the following be added to the amendment:

"And this house further regrets the failure of the government to adopt a monetary policy that would permit a maximum war effort without either increasing debt or reducing the standards of living below that necessary for maintaining maximum efficiency;

Furthermore this house is of the opinion that a continuation of the present financial policy will further destroy the precious liberties so essential to, and recognized as being inherent in a true democracy."

Social credit proposes to use the national credit to provide money without additional debt, without additional taxation. Social crediters maintain that in any well-organized and well-managed state with rich and varied resources, such as we have in Canada, the national credit can and should be used to provide fair prices and adequate home markets for all essential industries.

What a boon to the wheat growers would be the application in Canada of the social credit technique! Without it, as Canadians are now going, our farmers will be destroyed. Wheat growers and other primary producers must have fair prices, involving cost, plus a just profit. They must have markets—if not abroad, then at home, and, if necessary, by government purchase. The wheat situation in western Canada is an example of how serious the condition is becoming among our producers. At the present time the supply is as follows: According to figures I have obtained we had, before this year's crop was reaped, a carryover of 300,000,000 bushels. The latest estimate for this year's crop shows an amount of 547,179,000 bushels, of which quantity the west produced 540,000,000 bushels.

With regard to markets, in our domestic market and under the present system Canada can use 140,000,000 bushels. Great Britain will probably take 150,000,000 bushels, and others will take 30,000,000 bushels. The carryover will, as everyone knows, be the largest in history. What does this mean? In the west, alone, 300,000 farmers will be affected, and the condition will affect more than 20 per cent of Canada's export, 25,000,000 of Canada's best acres and two billion dollars of investment. When we consider the whole of Canada the figures become much more impressive than the ones I have placed on record.

What is the storage situation? Canada's storing capacity, including terminals, is estimated at 425,000,000 bushels. The line elevator companies and the wheat pool, by constructing additional bins, are estimated to be about to supply space for 25,000,000 bushels more. That is not enough. The result is that we have a most deplorable situation. I have seen huge quantities of wheat, wheat upon which this country may be dependent for its very existence, heaped in roadside ditches, piled up in the fields, in danger of wasting.

That is not all which concerns the western farmer. It seems that few people realize that there is a rapidly rising secondary price structure. According to the Searle letter of October 23, 1940, prices of the 147 commodities western farmers buy have risen, since 1914, as follows:

	Percentage of increase in price since 1914
	Per cent
Groceries	22
Clothing	33
House equipment	66
Farm equipment	44
Farm machinery	67
Municipal taxes	74

The whole 147 articles sent out in the Searle index now cost on an average 42 per cent more than they did in 1914.

According to the same letter, since the present war broke out the cost of articles the farmer must buy has risen on an average of 8 per cent. The following are some specific increases:

	Percentage of increase in price in last 12 months
	Per cent
Groceries	14
Clothing	7
Household equipment	11
Farm equipment	7·5
Farm machinery	7
Municipal taxes	2

These index figures indicate increased cost of absolute necessities for living and producing. It is impossible for the average hon. member sitting in comfort in this chamber, without knowledge of the situation confronting those farmers, to realize even remotely how serious the picture has become. The Searle index shows that the actual cost of living of farmers has risen more in the first year of this war than it did in the first year of the last war. The index points out that one bushel of wheat now has only 54 per cent of the purchasing power it had in 1913 and 1914.

With wheat at such a ruinous level, so far as its purchasing power is concerned, imagine the tragic plight of the farmer, with his grocery bill, gasoline bill, repair bill, taxes and a wide variety of other bills still unpaid, in a position to sell only part of his crop! Imagine the plight of those who trusted him and supplied those commodities! Imagine what will happen to his credit next year when he undertakes to put in another crop! Who will advance him the gasoline? Who will trust him for repairs to machinery? What effect will that condition have on Canada's productive power next year? Imagine what is happening to those who would have sold to him! And this is a consideration which affects eastern Canada particularly.

Let it be borne in mind constantly that when the western farmer cannot buy, the eastern producer cannot sell and cannot obtain payment for the commodities he has already sold. If eastern producers cannot sell, then those same eastern producers cannot continue to produce. The economic strength of Canada is impaired to the extent to which production falls off.

Mr. BLAIR: What about the eastern farmer?

Mr. BLACKMORE: The same thing applies to the eastern farmer. I happen to come from the west. If I came from the east I would speak for him. But I do not see why other hon. members do not say more for the eastern farmer.

All these considerations are very bad for Canada's morale. Whether or not hon. members are aware of it, the people who are out on the economic, home battle line are aware of it. Failures like this do not give men confidence in democracy. This is the very kind of thing which is creating in the minds of the people of Canada a mental and emotional attitude likely to result in some sort of rash, ill-considered action.

Failures like this are unnecessary.

Let us look at Britain. I find that in the Ottawa Citizen of November 8, Lord Beaverbrook's weekly, the Sunday Express is quoted as follows:

> Must we be ruined in order to win this war? Is it necessary that we impoverish ourselves for a generation in our drive to victory? These are the questions that many men ask to-day. The answer is—no! The wealth of the nation does not consist of its capital in terms of money. Its wealth is contained in the capacity of its population to labour and produce goods for consumption.

Canada's capacity to produce is simply unpredictable. She can produce great quantities of a wide variety of commodities, to such an extent that she can become virtually self-sufficient. We are ready to grant that she might not be able to supply the people of Canada with the lemons they need, but the British people have been told that they cannot have many lemons. They have also been told that perhaps they may not be able to have many onions and eggs. Our people can have plenty of onions and eggs, and they can have plenty of a wide variety of other commodities. There is no reason under the sun, except stupidity and mismanagement, why the people of Canada cannot have these things.

What can be done about the situation? In the first place, we are not going to solve this problem by taxing the people to an extent where they cannot buy, by taxing them to an extent where they cannot produce, or by neglecting them to an extent where they cannot produce. I would point out that policies which we social crediters have been urging in this house for five years have apparently been proved to be sound. At least the government is condescending to do some of those things which we have been urging them to do.

Let us consider the matter of created money. What an all-wise attitude was taken by some people when reference was made to the creation of money! It was said that it could not be done. But we find in the Financial Post an article by Professor A. F. W. Plumptre, who must be a model of orthodoxy. This is dated October 5, 1940, and deals with the topic of "putting over the next war loan." I read the following significant words:

> There are some general matters of theory which must be kept in mind in preparing for the next war loan. It must be remembered, primarily and seemingly paradoxically, that the government's object is not to get money but merely to reduce the public's spending.

Will someone put that together with the western wheat situation, and make sense? I should be glad to see that done. Will someone put that along with the onerous tax structure which has been placed upon us and which is impoverishing the people, and make sense? He continues:

> The government can always "get money" because it may, as an alternative to borrowing or even to taxation, create the required funds. This it can easily do nowadays through the leadership of the central bank and the co-operation of the chartered banks. In this way 200 millions were created in this fashion last autumn.

If $200,000,000 were created, what consistent excuse can be given by this government for allowing that $200,000,000 to be registered as a debt against the Canadian people? If that money was created, beyond any question it belongs to the Canadian people and the Canadian people have a right to be relieved of the burden of having that $200,000,000 charged against them as a debt and of having to pay interest thereon. If $200,000,000 can be created, the ordinary man on the street will say, "Why not more than $200,000,000?"

This question raises the bogy of inflation. Many people will contend that it will cause inflation. Why will it cause inflation? If the creation of $200,000,000 did not cause inflation, will hon. members tell me why the creation of $205,000,000 must of necessity cause inflation? There must be some reason for stopping at this point. What is the reason? What is inflation? I should like to trouble the house by citing a statement which I think will help to guide us in our conception of inflation. I do not think there is a word in the English language concerning which more tommyrot has been talked than "inflation." One of the gravest charges that can be laid against the Liberal government and the Liberal party is that they have contributed to the general confusion regarding inflation. I should like to quote from "Basic Principles of Constitutional Money" by Etta M. Russell. This is a textbook for high schools and the general public, copyrighted in 1940 by the constitutional money league of America, Washington, D.C. I quote from page 47:

> Here we must first acquire a very clear idea of what inflation means. On March 21, 1939, Governor Eccles of the board of governors of the federal reserve system, gave a very clear definition, in testimony given before a committee in the United States senate. In answer to the question by the chairman—"What do you call currency inflation?" Mr. Eccles replied, "To me it would mean where the supply of money, bank deposits and currency, in the hands of those who spend that money, is greater than a country's ability to produce the goods for the market. It would be a condition of overemployment, a condition of inability to produce the goods so that the supply of money in the hands of those who spend it, is in excess of a country's ability to supply the demands."

This definition and explanation should be read and reread in the light of present conditions.

I contend that if that definition were read and reread by the members of this house and the members of the administration they would begin to see a way out of our predicament at an early date. Does Canada lack the ability to produce goods? We hear about a surplus of wheat, and about a surplus of beef. Something has been said about a surplus of apples. If we took the trouble I know we could find that there are surpluses of a number of other commodities. We could find in this country the productive ability, the application of which would produce great surpluses. Why deny the people the use of these commodities in order to stop them from using too much? Of what goods have we a shortage? Of what goods is there a danger of a shortage developing? If we can find that out, then let us start to work to remedy these possible shortages. Of 147 articles which the Searle index listed as being used by the western farmer, 139 are produced in Canada and only eight have to be imported from outside. Surely that must have great significance for us in this crisis.

Inflation can be controlled, and there are several ways of doing this. We must remember first of all that inflation is a rise in prices which results from having more money in circulation than there are goods to be purchased. Inflation can be controlled by employing credit restriction. That is what this government has been doing for years and years. Another way is by taxing the people until they have no money to spend. This is a way very dear to the heart of the present government. Another way is by price fixing. This can be done by setting a point beyond which a commodity price cannot rise. It can be done by the government paying part of the cost of the article. Great Britain is spending £60,000,000 annually in order to keep down the prices of staple foods to the poor. This will be found on page 304 of The Economist of September 7. Great Britain is commencing to use the principle of the just price which was condemned when it was advocated by social crediters. And the degree to which Britain safely solves her economic problem will be the degree to which she accepts other principles of the social credit doctrine, just as sure as we are in this house.

There are other devices by which a government can prevent inflation. It can establish quotas. Is it afraid that the people are going to buy too many radios, too many silk gloves or too many coonskin coats? Then let it just set a quota on these articles, a limit beyond which people may not buy them. Let it not tax the people so much in order to keep them from buying coonskin coats that they cannot buy bread and butter. Where is the sense in that? It is absurd. But that is largely the kind of policy which this government is following to-day. Again a government can ration. The government rationed in the last war. It rationed sugar and a number of other commodities. So, if there is danger that we are going to have too big a demand for the supply of certain goods on hand, why not ration? But do not raise the price by taxation.

Further, we can manufacture substitutes if we can only be assured what commodities we are likely to run short of.

It is positively dismaying to listen to the radio talks and read the newspaper editorials about how we must tighten our belts and deprive ourselves. Yet no word do we hear of what we have to deprive ourselves. Let it be borne in mind that if the Canadian government takes 25 cent pieces and dollar bills away from the people, the people are going to be able to buy less of bread, less of cake, less of pie, less of cookies, and less of other commodities which are made from wheat, and all that will still further cut down the market for our wheat. Such is manifestly an absurd procedure. It accomplishes exactly the opposite of what ought to be brought about. If the government has discovered what commodities we are likely to run short of, why not advertise that fact in all these radio talks that are going on, so that people can refrain from buying those particular commodities?

Another action possible is to increase the production of needed commodities. Too few people realize that there are two general ways of dealing with inflation. You can either cut down the amount of money in circulation or increase the supply of goods in circulation. There is no danger of a rise in the price of wheat or potatoes or bread, or milk perhaps. Why? Because there is plenty of these goods. Then let us have plenty of other commodities so that there will be no danger of inflation with respect to them. Let the government deal with inflation realistically, instead of talking so much nonsense about it, as so many are doing to-day over the radio and in the newspapers. There is material coming over the radio and through the propaganda machine to-day which will be a disgrace to the sponsors of it ten years from now.

The government can increase production by loans to producers. It is advancing, and quite generously, I read, money to concerns which are to build munitions factories and other means of producing the goods that we shall need in this war. There is nothing wrong with extending the application of that principle to include the producers of any other commodity, watermelons, for instance, if we wish to have more of them.

Again, why not give assistance to both the producers and consumers of goods? Why not bonus home production? Already the government is paying, I understand, a bonus on choice cheese, and that is a sound way of stimulating the production of choice cheese. Why not try bonusing the production of any other commodity that we are in danger of running short of?

People may ask, where will the money come from? Let those people read Professor Plumptre and then try to get sense out of their question. We can bonus the producers. Why not, for example, bonus the producers of our sugar? I have time and again on the floor of this house urged that our beet sugar industry should be assisted by way of bonus, but I never hear of anything being done about it. Why not do it if there is danger of a shortage of sugar? Why not bonus if there is danger of a shortage of oil and of each of a wide variety of other products?

Why not grant the consumers a bonus as we do in Alberta through the Alberta treasury branch? It would, I know, be a disgrace for this government to adopt any monetary policy advocated in Alberta. But the time may come when men will yet go to Alberta for instruction. They may find that there is still good to come out of Nazareth.

Why not bonus both producers and consumers by providing cheaper freight rates; for example, by extending and increasing the subventions on coal to other commodities so that Alberta wheat, for instance, may be sent out to British Columbia chicken producers? Why not? Men are tremendously worried about the surplus of wheat, but one hears of no attempt being made to modify the freight rate structure to enable our Alberta wheat to move more cheaply to the egg producers in British Columbia. Freight rates would be the first thing a common sense administration would think of. Why not remove the sales tax on certain desired commodities; why not have a tariff exemption on certain essential raw materials and component parts required in the production of commodities the supply of which we wish to increase?

[Mr. Blackmore.]

All these measures would tend to prevent inflation by increasing the supply of goods. Other means of preventing inflation would be to encourage investment and production by fair remunerative prices, by assuring the producers of immunity from injurious taxation and from destructive changes in tariff policy.

I suggest to the government that it study social credit proposals. Solutions for the ills of the world have been discovered in less reputable sources in times past. Let the government learn the truth about social credit and then through its elaborate propaganda machine, always at work, tell the Canadian people the truth about social credit. Tell the people what inflation is, and what causes it, and how it can be prevented. Tell the people the cause of the adverse exchange rate on our Canadian dollar. Tell them what economic nationalism really means. Tell them why nations with a shortage of resources have resorted to economic nationalism and will continue to resort to economic nationalism as a measure of self-preservation. Tell the people the truth so that they will know these things. Why not tell the people of the real productive power of Canada with respect to the various commodities of Canada? Why not tell them of the real consumptive power of Canada? If that is done, the people will be ready for the introduction of social credit.

When we have sound economic production, sound economic consumption and a sound economic price structure in Canada, we shall be well on our way to the introduction of the much maligned system of social credit. Social credit is just common sense in action. Then and only then, when the government introduces those three things, sound economic production, sound economic consumption, and a sound economic price structure, can Canada contribute to the maximum, of her glorious power in defence of her heritage, her people, her empire and her king.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps the house will permit me to make a statement which I believe will be of intense interest to all, and in so doing to follow the example of the Prime Minister of Great Britain, who interrupted the proceedings of the British House of Commons to-day to make the statement which I wish to quote.

NAVAL ACTION IN MEDITERRANEAN

SUCCESSFUL ATTACK ON ITALIAN FLEET AT TARANTO—STATEMENT OF BRITISH ADMIRALTY —MR. CHURCHILL'S COMMENTS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in the British House of Commons to-day Mr. Churchill

read a communique from the British Admiralty. In doing so he said:

I feel it my duty to bring this glorious episode to the immediate notice of the house. As a result of a determined and highly successful attack which reflects the greatest honour on the fleet air arm, only three of the Italian battleships now remain effective.

This result, while affecting decisively the balance of naval power in the Mediterranean, also carries with it reactions upon the naval situation in every quarter of the globe.

The following is the Admiralty's statement. It is now appearing in the evening papers:

The Royal Navy has struck a crippling blow at the Italian fleet, the main units of which were lying snuggling behind their shore defences in their main base at Taranto.

On the night of November 11-12, aircraft of the fleet air arm carried out an attack, the results of which have now been established by photographic reconnaissance.

It is now known that one battleship of the Littorio (35,000 ton) class is badly down by the bows, that her forecastle is under water, and that she has a heavy list to starboard. (The Littorio and Vitorrio Veneto, only recently commissioned, are among the most powerful battleships in the world.)

One battleship of the Cavour (Conte de Cavour, 23,622 ton) class has been beached and, from her stern up and including the after turret, is under water. The ship is listing heavily to starboard.

It has not been possible to establish the fact with certainty but it appears probable that a second battleship of the Cavour class also has been severely damaged. (Italy has four battleships of the Cavour class.)

In the inner harbour two cruisers are listed to starboard and are surrounded by oil fuel. Two fleet auxiliaries are lying with their sterns under water.

The total strength of the Italian battle fleet was six battleships, two of the Littorio class, which have just been put into service, and four of the recently reconstructed Cavour class.

As a result of this determined and highly successful attack probably only three Italian battleships now remain effective.

It will be recalled that the Italian communique issued on the 12th of November admitted that one warship had been badly damaged. The Italian communique also claimed that six of our aircraft were shot down and three more probably shot down. In fact only two of our aircraft are missing, and it is noted that the enemy claim that part of the crew have been taken prisoner.

On the night of November 9-10 a successful bombardment was carried out on Sidi Barrani. The fire was returned by shore batteries, but our ships sustained no damage and no casualties.

The Mediterranean fleet have also continued to harass the Italian army communications in Libya.

It is also reported that one of our submarines has recently attacked a convoy of two supply ships escorted by a destroyer. As a result, one heavily-laden ship of 3,000 tons was sunk and a second ship certainly was damaged, and probably was sunk.

After reading that communique Mr. Churchill concluded with these words:

The spirit of the Royal Navy, shown in this daring attack, is also exemplified in the forlorn and heroic action fought by the captain, officers and ship's company of His Majesty's ship Jervis Bay in giving battle against overwhelming odds in order to protect the merchant convoy which they were escorting and thus secure the escape of by far the greater part of the convoy.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Brooke Claxton for an address to His Exellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Blackmore.

Mr. J. T. THORSON (Selkirk): I am sure that every hon. member will be greatly heartened by the splendid news which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has just announced, the great victory of the Royal Navy, and I am equally sure that every hon. member rejoices in the fact that we meet in this session under much more favourable circumstances than those that faced us at the beginning of the last session. At that time the nazis had just overrun the low countries, Denmark had surrendered without a struggle, Norway was being crushed into submission, and the fall of France was imminent. We felt one shock after the other and we were dismayed. The dramatic evacuation of Dunkirk, followed by the tragic fall of France made the defence of Great Britain itself a matter of intense concern. Dramatic events took place quickly in Great Britain, which fast became an island fortress. We were dismayed in Canada. There was anxiety here that our war effort was not adequate. The government had been elected, in the main, I believe, because the people of Canada had confidence in the administration and felt that it would give Canada a wise and careful administration of its war effort. That war effort had been geared to the war effort of Great Britain, which had been conducted in an orderly and somewhat leisurely manner. The dramatic turn of events in Europe changed all that. It changed the course of events in Great Britain. The anxiety that was felt in Canada was reflected in this house in the spirited criticism that came from hon. members opposite. The government of Canada made rapid decisions. It took one step after another in quick succession. It rapidly increased the size of the army and the navy.

It accelerated the British commonwealth air training plan, it made provision for the mobilization of the man-power and the material resources of the country, it provided for national registration, which was subsequently carried out with great success, and stepped up the arrangements for munitions and supplies. I think it may safely be said that the government came out of that session in as good command of the situation as could reasonably be expected. I think also that some measure of praise is due to hon. members opposite for the part they played in bringing about that result for their criticism of the efforts of the government had its due effect. I am confident that the end of the session saw the Canadian people with confidence in the administration of the country and conviction that the government was doing its utmost to meet the needs of Canada in the discharge of its national duty.

In this session we meet under much more favourable circumstances, although the war outlook is still grim and ominous and victory is not yet in sight. I am free to confess that personally I feel a great deal happier over the war prospects than I did three months ago. This is due in large measure to two great events that have taken place. The first is that the battle of Britain, and particularly the battle of London, although not yet over, have resulted in a major nazi defeat. The world has seen great exhibitions of heroism and courage in the course of its history—the Spartans at Thermopylae; the great French at Verdun; the Canadians at Ypres. But the world has never seen a greater exhibition of fortitude than that displayed by the civilian population of London during the past two months. If there is one predominating thought in the mind of every member of this house it is one of profound admiration of the grim determination and splendid morale which the people of London have displayed in the face of the most savage and ruthless attack that has ever been made in the history of the world upon a great city. The people of Great Britain have shown that the nazis cannot successfully invade that island. They have shown that there are definite limits to the nazi might. The Germans are not invincible. One phase of the war, the possibility of an invasion of Great Britain, has to some extent been concluded.

The second great event is the formulation of a joint defence policy by the United States and Canada and the changed attitude of the people of the United States to the war and their fixed determination to give Great Britain "all aid short of war." By reason of that change of attitude in the United States that country has now become a great potential reservoir of victory for our cause, and for their cause as well for there is a growing realization in that country of the fact that the battle for civilization cannot safely be left to this hemisphere, but must be fought in Europe, where the enemies of civilization exist. There have been strong critics of the Prime Minister in his long period of public life, but no one will deny him his fair measure of praise for the splendid part that he has played in promoting friendly relations between Canada and our great neighbour. We are deeply grateful to the United States for the assistance that it has given and for the assistance that it is still to give, and we are thankful—I think I can say this in the name of the whole Canadian people—that we have in the present Prime Minister a leader who can be relied upon to preserve and promote the strong and growing feeling of friendliness and common purpose which exists between our country and our great neighbour.

These two events of which I have spoken have given the people of Canada a strong feeling of personal security; for we have now two definite lines of defence. The first line of defence is in Great Britain, and that line has not yet been broken; indeed it is stronger to-day than it was five months ago. But we have also a second line of defence, on this hemisphere, in our alliance with the United States, with its great power of mass production, and the splendid spirit of its people, who have never yet been defeated. Both of these lines of defence must be retained by the people of Canada; for both are of incalculable value to us.

Our own war effort has made rapid progress. Our army and navy have been increased in size and efficiency, and our commonwealth air training plan has been rushed forward with surprising and gratifying speed. I need not dwell on this subject, for particulars have already been given by the Prime Minister and more particulars will be afforded by the government as this debate proceeds.

But there is one aspect of the present situation which does cause me some concern and I deem it my duty to deal with it. It is absurd to say that the sense of personal security of which I spoke a moment ago was deliberately created by the government or that the sense of security is really false. A sense of security does exist by reason of the facts that I have mentioned, and it is worth having; but there are some dangers involved in it; for I am afraid that there is not even yet a sufficient realization in this country of the supreme necessity on our part of safeguarding and maintaining our security. It is quite true that serious warnings have been given, both by Mr. Churchill in Great Britain and by our own Prime Minister, but the fact remains that Canada has not yet really suffered from the war.

Apart from war casualties, and fortunately they have been comparatively few, no one thus far in Canada has really been hurt by the war. The financial volume of business in this country reached in September its highest point in twenty years and employment in industry reached its highest level in the same period. Very few people in Canada are worse off than they were before the war, and countless thousands of persons have found their financial positions greatly improved. The impact of tax increases has hardly yet been felt. The cost of living has not greatly increased. Indeed, at the moment, we are in the midst of an exhilarating war construction and industrial expansion boom.

I think that this feeling of personal security had something to do with the slowness of the Canadian response to the war loan, but it would be absurd to say that the war loan was a failure. Nevertheless, the people of Canada are not yet as fully conscious as, in my opinion, they ought to be of the necessity of making the utmost personal sacrifices to ensure the continuance of the security which they now enjoy. Such warnings as the Prime Minister gave last night must be continually emphasized. While we are happy that the threatened nazi invasion of Great Britain has failed, every responsible person knows that there are grim days ahead, that there is serious danger involved in the intensified nazi submarine campaign, and that war-weariness is bound to bring about some reduction of morale. It is one thing for Great Britain to avert defeat by staving off an invasion, but it is quite another thing to accomplish victory. Great Britain will need every possible assistance that we can give her, and it is our solemn duty as a freedom-loving nation to give her our maximum aid.

For this reason we, as members of parliament and representatives of the people, will wish to know, not only what progress has been made with our war effort—and we are proud of its increasing momentum—but, what is perhaps even more important at this stage of our war effort, we will wish to be informed as to what has not yet been done and what must still be done. Are there any deficiencies in our war effort? If so, what are they and what steps can be taken to remedy them? Are we running short of efficient man-power in our war industries? If so, what efforts are being made to train men for special purposes? Is our war effort being restricted in any manner by financial considerations? If so, in what respect and how can these restrictions be removed? I suggest that it is on such matters as these that we should concentrate our attention this session, and I am confident that if we do so the government will emerge from this session, as it did from the last one, with confidence on the part of the Canadian people that it is doing its utmost to discharge our national duty.

I said that I felt much happier over the war outlook than I did three months ago. Confidence in our ultimate success is essential, but excess of confidence and the taking of victory for granted have elements of danger that may well impede the success of our war efforts. The realities of the grim struggle in which we are engaged and the necessity of making every possible sacrifice must be continually placed before our people. I do not say that we should deliberately seek to create fear in our people, but it seems to be a fact that in all great conflicts nations make their strongest and most successful efforts when they are most hard pressed. Confidence of victory is valuable, but fear of possible disaster is an even more powerful incentive to united effort. It was fear of an invasion of Great Britain that stirred the people of that country to a united and determined war effort which has challenged the admiration of the world. It was fear of the possible destruction of Great Britain and the invasion of this hemisphere that brought about a changed sentiment towards the war in the United States and created their determination to give Great Britain all aid short of war. These facts should not be forgotten, and our own people must be kept continuously alive to the realization that an excess of optimism is dangerous. Victory for our cause is made more certain by a continuing realization of the appalling consequences of defeat and the necessity for the utmost sacrifice on the part of our people to prevent it.

In addition to making this country more conscious than it is at the present time of the grimness of the struggle in which we are engaged, in my opinion it is also necessary to embark immediately upon a programme of national reform which will at one and the same time accomplish two definite purposes: first, enable Canada to make its maximum contribution to the aid of Great Britain by removing any impediment to the success of our war effort that may exist in our national structure; and, second, at the same time lay the foundation for a strong Canada that will enable us to withstand the strains of the post-war period and prove to the people of Canada that democracy can work and is worth fighting for such a programme of national reform, but its outlines may be roughly sketched. In the first place we should establish a proper financial structure for this dominion and its provinces which will enable them to perform their respective functions with efficiency and economy. Second, we should ensure proper relations between industry and labour so that Canada may become a truly great industrial power. Finally, we should establish a policy for primary industry in Canada that will enable our primary producers to continue efficiently the production of the basic wealth of this country.

In this connection I hope that at a very early date the government will give this house an opportunity for a special debate on our wheat problem, with the house in committee of the whole. I urge that this debate should take place before the house rises for the Christmas recess, so that a carefully thought out wheat policy may be announced as early in the new year as possible. In my opinion such a debate would be preferable to a random discussion of the wheat question during the course of this debate.

Much of the programme of national reform which I suggest is contained in the recommendations of the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations, in what is called the Sirois report. I strongly recommend the recommendations contained in that report and sincerely urge their adoption at the earliest possible date. I was deeply stirred by the quiet announcement made by the Prime Minister that he had invited the premiers of the provinces to attend a conference here in Ottawa some time in January, and I read with interest his letter of invitation to the premiers with his indication of the government's approval of the report. I am glad to learn that all the provinces have indicated their intention of being represented. I sincerely hope that this conference will be successful, for I am convinced that the adoption of the recommendations and their implementation by the necessary legislative and administrative action will constitute the greatest act of Canadian statesmanship since confederation itself. At the same time it will serve the twofold purpose of increasing the efficiency of our war effort and establishing the foundations for a greater and stronger Canada, of which every Canadian may be justly proud.

In the short space of time at my disposal it would not be possible even to summarize the recommendations contained in the Sirois report. The main ones have to do with financial adjustments as between the dominion and the provinces. A very brief summary of these financial recommendations appears on page 86 of volume 2 of the report. I find it difficult to restrain my language in expressing my appreciation of this report and the splendid principles upon which it is based. I believe it to be the oustanding Canadian document since confederation. It is likewise a human document; for it is concerned with the welfare of the people of Canada as a whole, through the maintenance and expansion of the national income and its better distribution for the purpose of providing a greater measure of social and economic security. The report realizes the need for national unity in this country. It is a great unifying document for Canada, but it does not in any sense propose any centralization of authority. It stresses the need of a national minimum standard of social services in Canada as essential to national unity, but it fully respects the federal system and completely preserves provincial liberty of action in spheres which are primarily cultural and social.

In my opinion the commissioners have successfully carried out the instructions that were given them, and we should be deeply grateful to them for the careful study which they have made and particularly for the singleness of purpose that runs through almost every line of the report: concern for the welfare of the people of Canada from coast to coast. They have in true reality recaptured the spirit of confederation itself. This is a great reconfederation document, applying the principles of confederation to the changed needs and conditions of to-day. The commissioners also stress the necessity of continued and increased cooperation between the dominion and the provinces. They do not conceive of the provinces of Canada as nine separate, independent entities but rather as nine provinces interdependent upon each other and bound together by one bond, the bond of Canada.

It has been urged that we should defer consideration of the report until after the war. I do not agree with this point of view. This country will be put to severe financial strains before this war is over, and we shall have to eliminate every financial obstacle that stands in our way. If our financial structure was utterly inadequate for Canada in time of peace, it is even more necessary now than it would be in peace-time to make the changes recommended by the report. They are essential to the success of our war effort, and I sincerely hope that when we are summoned again in the new year one of our major tasks will be the necessary legislative and administrative action to implement the recommendations of the Sirois report; for I am confident that if we do that a new era for Canada will begin.

The speech from the throne is a unique document in that there is no reference in it to any specific legislation. The whole speech centres upon the Canadian war effort, and ends with a pledge for the prosecution of the war to the utmost of our strength. This is singularly appropriate at this session; for nothing must be allowed to detract our attention from our war effort. There is no country in the world more fortunately situated than Canada is to-day. I wonder how many people in Canada really appreciate the blessings that we enjoy. But Canada must be prepared to pay the price for its continued security. We must ensure the continuance of the personal security that we enjoy, and there is no premium of insurance within our power that is too high to pay.

There is one other note I should like to sound, and that is the need for the highest degree of national unity. Canada will need the aid of all Canadians, not only those of British origin, but also those of French origin and those whose origin is neither British nor French. Mr. Speaker, may I remind you of the fact that approximately half the people of Canada are not of British origin? Those people are not tied to Great Britain by ties of blood, but rather because of the principles for which Great Britain stands—personal freedom, liberty, and regard for the sacred rights of human personality; indeed these are the rights for which we fight. All of us are proud, regardless of our origin, to be associated with Great Britain in her heroic struggle, and we must not fail.

I should like to associate myself with the eloquent pleas made by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) and the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras) for a sympathetic understanding and appreciation of the different points of view that exist in Canada, knowing that the people of Canada can be and are bound all together in one unity by the common tie of Canada.

In the special war session of 1939 I had no hesitation in urging Canada's participation in the war to the utmost of her capacity. I felt it my duty to speak on that occasion by reason of certain views that I had previously strongly expressed. I spoke in the course of that debate as one who has sometimes been described as a "pacifist," and some of my friends have twitted me on what they have described as a change of heart. No change of heart has taken place. There is still honour in the term "pacifist," as I understand it. A great pacifist has passed away in Great Britain. He believed that it was his solemn duty, as the leader of his nation, to keep his people free from war and to hold them on the path of peace as long as peace was possible; that the maintenance of peace was his sacred responsibility, unless some issue greater than peace itself was involved. Perhaps history will be kinder to him than we have been during the past few months, and will honour him for the nobility of his purpose, in spite of the fact that his efforts met with failure. I am still a pacifist, in the sense that I have described, but love of peace must give way when an issue greater than peace is involved. Therefore I had no hesitation in voting for Canadian participation in the war, in the special war session of 1939; for an issue greater than peace had emerged. Indeed, the cause of humanity itself was in grave peril.

I conclude, Mr. Speaker, with one other note. I spoke in the special war session as a Canadian. I do so again. During a long period of schooling both in this country and in England, and both as a student and as a teacher, I have watched with pride the growth of Canada as a nation. When I was privileged to enter this house first, some fourteen years ago, it was my hope that I might be able to make some contribution to the development of the great country that has been kind to me, and has given to me the great opportunities that I have been privileged to enjoy.

I have always been an ardent admirer of the institutions and traditions that we have inherited from Great Britain, with their emphasis on freedom, and liberty, and the right and duty of self-determination and self-development. Perhaps I come by that admiration naturally, by reason of the fact that I inherit by racial origin, a longer tradition of personal liberty and freedom than is enjoyed by any other member in this house.

I have often spoken in this house on Canadian matters, relating to the development of Canadian nationality, on our equality of status with other nations of the British commonwealth, of the desirability of separate representation of Canada abroad, of our right and of our duty to determine all issues of policy, whether domestic or external, for ourselves—even the supreme issue of peace or war.

We have now seen Canada emerge from her former colonial status to that of full nationhood. When we entered this war, independently as we did and of our own free will as a free nation, we passed the greatest milestone in our history as a nation. I have always believed in the development of Canada as a nation. I have always shared the views—and I have never hesitated to express them—that were put forward by Sir Robert Borden when he said that Canada could not truly fulfil her destiny short of sovereignty. When we entered the war we assumed great responsibilities. I had a feeling of personal pride in the course that we took; for I had urged in this house, in the face of considerable opposition, that Canada must exercise freedom of choice in the supreme issue of peace or war and I was confident that she could always be trusted to face each issue as it arose in the interests of the Canadian people. I was not disappointed in that faith.

I am supremely confident that after this war is over there will be a great surge of truly Canadian sentiment in this country, and that the prophecy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier that this century belongs to Canada will ultimately be fulfilled. I am jealous of the honour of Canada as a nation. When this war is over I would not want anyone to be able to say that Canada had entered the war as a nation but had failed in her national duty; that she had promised her utmost aid to Great Britain but had failed to give it. There must be no blemish upon our national honour. It is our solemn and sacred national duty to carry out the pledge contained in the speech from the throne. Therefore, as a Canadian, devoutly proud of my country, I pledge my utmost support toward a maximum Canadian war effort in aid of Great Britain in her heroic and magnificent struggle for the cause of civilization.

Mr. GEORGE S. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, since the last time I appeared in this house I have been serving as adjutant of the second battalion of the Hastings and Prince Edward regiment, having enlisted on June 29. Notwithstanding what has been said to the contrary, I did not receive my commission from this government. I received my commission in August, 1930, and since that date I have been actively connected with the Hastings and Prince Edward regiment. I have held my present rank for over five years and was adjutant of the battalion long before the war. I trust hon. members will pardon me for making these personal remarks, but I do so in order that no one in this house will think I have received one of these lightning promotions of which we hear from time to time.

At the time of the formation of our battalion there were two officers at headquarters —the colonel and myself. Since July 1, I have seen our unit expand until at the present time there are over 900 all ranks, without taking into account those who have recently been attached to the unit on paper only from the training centres. During this period I have observed many things first-hand of which the public are entirely ignorant or in connection with which they have been misinformed. I should like to assure the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) that while some of my remarks may be critical, I offer them in the most friendly manner as constructive criticism. I also hope to be able to offer to him and the government some suggestions which may tend to overcome many of the objectionable things which are now inflicted upon our military forces.

I had looked forward with much interest to the address of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) which he delivered yesterday because I had hoped to learn more of our war aims, but I was disappointed. As a review of historical events, both ancient and modern, his speech was splendid, but that is not what the people of Canada are demanding to-day. The people want to be told in plain, simple language the military objectives of this government. They want to know by what plans the government aims to arrive at these objectives. The time has long passed for flowery adjectives and fervent statements of loyalty. Surely it can be taken for granted that every hon. member is a loyal British subject. It should not be necessary for them to try to outdo each other in allegations of extreme loyalty. Let the actions of hon. members speak for themselves. The people of this dominion are quite able to judge whether or not this government is doing all that it should in the prosecution of the war.

Let this government give the public the true facts of our war effort without this continual window-dressing. The Prime Minister is a lawyer, but he had a very poor case to present in his speech yesterday. Like a skilful lawyer addressing a jury, he skated round his subject very carefully. He used eloquent language and made obscure references to the real points of the case. He criticized the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) at some length for his use of the words "lull" and "soothe". Yet the Prime Minister in referring to the manufacture of planes in Canada stated that the output had been increased two or three hundred per cent. This sounds marvellous, but how much better it would have been if the Prime Minister had said that in July or August of this year the output of planes was two, four or five planes, or whatever the correct figure is, and then made the comparison with the output in September or October of this year.

The Prime Minister paid a tribute to the non-permanent units, but he failed to give any outline of the future of these units. The rumour persists at the present time that these units are to be demobilized. Their training period will be ended this month. He also paid a tribute to the manner in which the national registration had been carried out. I remember, however, that in June I pressed the Prime Minister on two different occasions to state whether or not there would be a registration before any young men were called up. It was only after this matter had been pressed quite strongly that we were able to get the information that there would be a national registration before any young men were called up under the Mobilization Act.

I say again to the government: Let us have the plain facts. How many divisions is it intended to raise in Canada? What does the government intend to do about altering the present set-up of the training centres? Why not tell the exact truth about the production of war materials? We should be told why we have not the machine guns, rifles, ammunition and the dozen other essential commodities necessary for the training of a 1940 army. If an offensive starts in Europe and our casualties are heavy, have the necessary precautions been taken to supply the first division with trained reinforcements? Every man who has been connected with the militia knows that for each man in the front line there must be five to seven men back to the recruiting office in order to keep him there.

I do not expect miracles to happen in connection with the training of men or the production of equipment. In the short time since I have been adjutant of my unit I have come to realize the many difficulties that beset the officers in forming and looking after a unit of only 900 men. At the same time we must remember that to-day we are in the fifteenth month of the war, and surely at this date there should be a sufficient supply of the essential war materials. Perhaps the Minister of National Defence will tell us when he speaks just how many Bren guns are being manufactured to-day and how many have been manufactured to date. This government, and this government alone, must assume responsibility for the present state of equipment of our armed forces. In England Mr. Churchill frankly tells the nation what is being done. He does not paint glowing pictures. Only a short time ago in a speech he offered the British people tears and sweat and dark hours, but here in Canada this government has seen fit to attach to many of the departments highly paid propaganda writers who colour the news and release only comments and opinions which are favourable to the government, so that anyone reading their reports in the press is led to believe that we are making marvellous progress, that there is nothing to fear, that Canada is going in high gear. All I ask the government to do is to present the true picture, to tell us exactly where we stand in the matter of production to-day.

At the very time our non-permanent active militia units were called up in June of this year, conditions looked very black in Europe. Up to that time there had been no shortage of recruits for the Canadian active service force. In fact a young man who wished to enlist in the Canadian active service force in my county or in this province had to search about for a place where recruiting was going on for the Canadian active service force. Whatever influenced the government to call up the non-permanent active militia units for only thirty days' training a year is known only to themselves. In a very short time, in record time in fact, those units were all over-strength, and recruiting for them stopped on August 15. Yet at the date those units were called up there was no clothing of any kind available for them. There were no rifles, no machine guns or other articles of equipment necessary for infantry rifle battalions. Everyone must realize that you cannot enlist men and keep them doing squad drill forever. It was over two months before the first uniforms were issued to my unit. The issue consisted of a cap, a blouse tunic, a pair of trousers, a shirt, a belt and a pair of boots. This clothing was issued two days before the unit left to train at Petawawa camp. Despite many articles that have appeared in the press from time to time as to the enormous quantities of clothing being turned out, this government was unable to issue more than one shirt to each man. The men had no socks and they have not yet received any socks. They received no underwear. They did not have a greatcoat or a cardigan jacket or a sweater of any kind. As for personal articles they received none at all. What a contrast is the list of issue used in all the non-permanent active militia units and the list of equipment actually supplied at the training camp.

Before going to camp one company of two hundred men of my battalion had no socks and they were unable to obtain them from the government. So I myself wrote to the Red Cross and asked for two hundred pairs of socks, and the Red Cross replied as they always do, "Certainly you can have them." Anyone who has trained at Petawawa camp knows that it becomes very cold there at night; yet these men were sent there without overcoats, and without sweaters, just in summer uniforms, and there was not a single place in that camp where there was a fire. If a man got his feet wet, or his clothing was damp, there was no place where he could go to dry himself and his clothing. In my opinion

September is far too late to have a camp under canvas at Petawawa. It has been published in routine orders that summer clothing is not to be worn after the sixteenth of September; yet there are many men in my unit who are still drilling in summer clothing because there is not enough serge battle-dress to go round. In one company alone there are eighty men who have no winter clothing. These men are drilling either in civilian dress or in summer denim drill—and this after the battalion had been mobilized for nearly five months.

Our unit was issued rifles two days before going to camp, with the 306 Lee-Enfield. Up to that time our company at Madoc had only three rifles, which had been borrowed privately, with which to instruct over two hundred men. There was absolutely no opportunity to train these men in the care and use of the rifle or in musketry before going to camp. I should like to point out to hon. members that there is a great difference between the 306 Lee-Enfield rifle and the rifle known as the short Lee-Enfield which was used in the last war, and which is used to-day for firing on the ranges. The difference briefly is this. The safety catch is different; the action of the bolt and of the magazine is different; but, most important of all, the sights on the two rifles are entirely different. The point of balance is also different in the two rifles. This may seem a small matter, but in teaching men to slope arms, present arms, port arms and go through other movements you must instruct them in detail just where to grasp the rifle and how.

At camp each man fired a round of musketry with a short Lee-Enfield rifle. When the man was ready to lie down on the ranges he was handed a short Lee-Enfield rifle, and there were just enough rifles to go round, one for each target. The point is this. What is the use of attempting to train men in musketry with one type of rifle and then asking them to go on the ranges and fire with another type of rifle which they have never seen before?

With reference to machine guns, the men in my unit had never seen a machine gun until they went to Petawawa camp, except for the one we carved out of wood. At Petawawa camp there was one Bren gun in the entire camp for one day, and the man who wrote the orders for that day must have had a sense of humour because at the bottom of the order with reference to the Bren gun he wrote, "The gun will pass briefly through your unit."

It was the same thing in regard to gas training. Some twenty-two men from my battalion—and we had 660 men in camp—were given very brief instruction in gas. I realize that gas has not figured to any great extent in this war so far, but at the same time it is essential that every soldier should receive training with regard to gas. But without proper equipment how can we possibly give these men gas training?

I wish to impress upon hon. gentlemen that these matters are no secret at all because every man who attended Petawawa camp, and there were several thousands of them, knows the actual conditions. I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether the district officers throughout Canada were consulted before these men were sent to camp, or were these men sent to camp purely for propaganda purposes? On several occasions after these camps were closed I saw, in the press, references to the men who had been at the camps as trained men.

Before leaving the question of the non-permanent units I would pay a short tribute to the rank and file. I would point out that many of these men travel up to forty miles at their own expense in order to obtain training. Their pay for one night is sixty cents. Let me give an illustration. In the village of Bancroft, which has a population of about 800, there are over 100 men in the Canadian active service force and over 200 men from Bancroft and the surrounding district connected with the non-permanent unit.

At the present time these non-permanent units are conducting classes for the qualification of junior officers and non-commissioned officers. In my unit we are conducting five separate and distinct schools. Officers and non-commissioned officers attend these classes at night and on Sunday and they are allowed no compensation of any sort for travelling expenses. All other non-permanent units are conducting similar classes. I would make a suggestion to the government. Instead of having thirty or forty or fifty classes conducted in one district, why not have one central class for a period of two or three weeks, where men and officers will be called in to take instruction all day? At the present time the plan of running schools in connection with each battalion for the qualification of officers and non-commissioned officers, in the midst of a war, is almost a farce. Such a course might be all right in a time of peace, but certainly it hardly appears proper in the midst of a war.

Some hon. members who were in France in the early days of the last war will recall the old type of bomb made out of a jam tin. Well, the non-permanent units are to-day making the same type of bombs. The only bombs we have for instruction are jam tin bombs along with some old Mills bombs brought home as souvenirs and a couple of German potato-masher bombs. We have no Webb equipment in the whole battalion. For example, you cannot instruct a man how to fix bayonets because he has no belt with frog whereby to carry the bayonet. We have no gas equipment of any kind; we have no aim correctors, no landscape targets, no aiming rests. In short, apart from rifles and bayonets, we have no equipment except what we have been able to manufacture ourselves, such as home-made bombs, bayonet standards, winter camouflage, barbed wire fencing and so on.

I would say to the Minister of National Defence that if national defence headquarters expect these units to drill and to have the men properly instructed, they must give us the necessary equipment for the purpose. Surely in one unit we could have at least one Bren gun. We could borrow at least one anti-tank gun and we could have a few gas masks and some kind of bombs and grenades. As a matter of fact, we cannot even get sufficient printed manuals. These men in the non-permanent units will have completed their training within a matter of a very few days and, as I mentioned a moment ago, the Minister of National Defence will perhaps make a statement as to what is to become of these units in the future.

I would refer to another matter that affects the militia. If my remarks in this regard are incorrect, or if the matters complained of have already been adjusted, I shall appreciate it if the minister will correct me.

The first battalion of the Hastings and Prince Edward regiment is in England. It went to France with the first division. The return of the first division from the front to England and the tragic events that followed are too well known to call for any comment, but many of these officers—in fact all the officers in the first division—lost all their personal kit. Some cabled home for money. I would point out to the government that this loss was occasioned through no fault or neglect of the officers themselves, but no provision has been made to reimburse them for the expense to which they have been put to replace the lost kit. Some such action should be taken. If the government have already remedied this situation, then I commend them for doing so.

I would also call the attention of the Minister of National Defence to the armoury in the village of Norwood. It is a first-class armoury in every respect but one that is not being used at all. In the adjoining town of Campbellford, some ten miles away, there is no armoury of any kind, but there is quartered there a company of the Midland regiment, and yet Norwood, where there is an armoury with fine facilities, is passed up. Surely at this time full use should be made of all armouries.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) yesterday referred to training centres. I would add a few remarks. Will the Minister of National Defence tell this house and the country the names of the men or the committee of men who advised the government and recommended this training scheme of thirty days? I remember very well when the mobilization bill came up for discussion last June. In Hansard of June 18, at page 899, the Prime Minister is reported as follows:

> The point I wish to bring home at the moment is this: It is essential that we should let this country know that there is an emergent condition of very grave character, and that not an hour nor a moment should be lost in giving the government all the enabling powers that it may need to deal with this new situation.

In the same speech he said, at the same page:

> . . . the time has come when we must mobilize to the full the whole resources of this country.

Again, in the same speech, the Prime Minister said, at page 902:

> What is the sense of introducing any legislation in this parliament if what appears in black and white and in type as a statute of Canada does not mean that the government intends to give effect to what appears in the statute?

One would have thought, listening to the Prime Minister that day, that his government had some marvellous plan which would unfold itself as soon as they received the necessary legislation, but now we see the sad results. The vote on that occasion shows that of the 204 members in the house, 202 were in favour of the plan and only two were opposed. I would ask the Minister of National Defence a further question: Before his department decided on this plan, did he consult the ranking district officers throughout Canada to obtain suggestions and advice as to how the plan should be worked out?

Let us look at the scheme for a moment, a scheme which these highly paid propaganda writers can hardly find enough adjectives to describe. Certainly the artist whom the government employed to draw the comic strip which is enclosed in the registered letter that every man receives when he is called up should at least have a medal struck in his honour. I would suggest that if he draws any further military comics he get a military man to advise him, because he has made several military mistakes. I think I am quite safe in saying that nearly one hundred per cent of the men who took the first thirty-day training had not had any previous military experience. It is a well recognized fact that discipline is one of the first essentials of army training. Hon. members who were in France during the last war can probably recall from their own experience many instances where it was only discipline which saved the occasion. But army discipline is not something which can be crammed down the recruit's throat at once; it enters into all his training. The average recruit going to a training centre needs a course of physical training along with a good diet in order to build him up and put him in physical condition for the hard army training, to be followed up with squad drill, route marches, instruction in the rifle, musketry, machine gun, gas training, military tactics, field craft and all the other work which enters into the training of the 1940 soldier. I understand that the present syllabus of the training centre calls for the recruit to do his first firing in musketry on the ranges after his eighth day in camp. It appears to me, Mr. Speaker, almost impossible that a recruit going into the army for the first time can absorb in a matter of eight days enough knowledge about the rifle and musketry, along with his other training, to obtain any benefit from firing on the ranges. The recruit is hurried from one lecture to another, from one course to another. In my opinion he absorbs only a smattering of many subjects and receives real training in none.

When you are training a large body of men, they can advance only as fast as the slow men in the class will permit. At the end of a thirty-day period the average recruit is only finding himself and is getting into the swing of the army, but he goes off home and the next draft comes in. It was pointed out yesterday by the leader of the opposition that to speak of thirty days' training is not correct, because when there is taken from the thirty days the time allotted to various preliminaries, holidays, and the rest of it, you will find that the recruit has not more than twenty days of actual training period; yet this training scheme costs the Dominion of Canada between fifty and sixty million dollars a year. Under the present plan it is estimated that three hundred thousand men will receive a month's training in the first year. Would it not be better to have sixty thousand men properly trained and equipped than three hundred thousand men with one month's training and only partly equipped? In the event of an emergency, with three hundred thousand men with one month's training, what use would they be? In my opinion they would be only an undisciplined mob, and without discipline the condition is hopeless.

[Mr. White.]

I should like to suggest a plan to the Minister of National Defence, and I sincerely trust that he will give it earnest consideration.

I mentioned a moment ago that the non-permanent units will finish their training within a matter of days. I would suggest that when these recruits are called up, they should be posted to the various non-permanent units for a period of two months. They would be documented, medically examined and outfitted with clothing and equipment. They would take a proper course in physical drill and elementary instruction in the rifle, machine gun and squad drill. At the end of the two months they would go to a training centre where they would train as a battalion. They would there complete their musketry training, run off their proper course of firing on the ranges; they would also fire with machine guns and anti-tank guns; they could take a proper course of training where gas chambers are available; they could take part in battalion manoeuvres and military schemes and do field engineering; in short, they would complete their training. At the end of a four months' period you would turn out a very creditable class of soldier, a force of men who would do more than give a good account of themselves if the occasion arose. The reason why I suggest a two months' period of training with the non-permanent forces is that in that time they could take all the rough spots off these men and get them out of the elementary or awkward squad stage so that when they went to the training centre they could immediately start on intensive training. I earnestly urge on the minister that before next January, when the next class of men is called for training, he will make some modifications in the present scheme.

I wish to make it perfectly plain that I am not condemning in any way the training centre. I approve this training, but I feel that the nature of the training which is being received is inadequate. Before leaving this topic I have only one further suggestion, namely, that every man who is rejected as medically unfit by the local examining physician should be called in and reexamined by a medical board of at least three men.

I was very much disappointed yesterday at the reply which was made by the Minister of National Defence to a question as to what arrangement, if any, had been made for soldiers' transportation on Christmas leave. It is unfortunate that this government has consistently refused to grant the soldier free transportation. All members of this house and their families, railway employees and their families, and many other classes of people in Canada are granted free transportation. Yet the soldier, who is more entitled to it than anyone else, is denied this privilege. Drive on any highway in this province and you will see that hundreds and hundreds of men are obliged to thumb a ride home. A private soldier receives for a thirty-day month $39. If he is married he is obliged to assign $20 to his wife. That leaves him $19 a month for cigarettes, canteen, haircuts, soap and other small articles, and the dozens of other articles on which a soldier has to spend money. Thus, when the time comes for leave, the soldier is not in a financial position to pay his transportation home. At Camp Borden there are many soldiers from the Belleville and Kingston district, and as far east as Brockville. At Petawawa are many soldiers from areas a long distance away. These men are unable to pay transportation home even though they receive at the present time a round trip for the price of a single ticket. What is the result? You find the number of men absent without leave is increasing all the time. You find that discipline is suffering. But the worst feature is the growing feeling of resentment among the soldiers. Surely any man who has grit enough to enlist in the Canadian active service force and is willing to give everything, even his life, is entitled to the very best this country can give him during his training period. I would have thought that this government would benefit by the lesson learned in the last war, because we all realize that in time of war the emotional strain is much greater, and the average soldier will go to almost any length to get home to see his family or his sweetheart.

Another feature I wish to mention is the cheerlessness of such camps as Petawawa. This camp may be all right in the summer, but it certainly is no place for winter training, and yet I understand that there are several thousand men who are quartered there and will continue to be there during the winter months. Petawawa is some fourteen miles from the town of Pembroke. From now on, as the days are getting shorter, the men are off parade at four-thirty o'clock in the afternoon or shortly thereafter. Apart from the Y.M.C.A. and other service club huts there is no provision for their recreation or amusement. Where troops are quartered in towns and cities they have a decided advantage, because they can go down town; they can change their surroundings; there are picture shows and bowling alleys which they can visit and where they can meet their friends. These are simple matters, but they all tend to break the monotony of the soldier's life. But at Petawawa, which is only a sample of such places, there is no such provision; and as I pointed out before, many of the men are a great distance from their homes and unable to pay the cost of transportation.

Apparently the government realizes that this condition is becoming serious, because within the last ten days orders were issued by national defence headquarters that all troops were to be instructed that to ride on trains or use other methods of transportation without payment was an offence and must cease. But this illustrates again the lengths to which the soldier will go in order to get home. I would make the following suggestion to the government, that every soldier be allowed two week-end leaves a month, one leave with free transportation, the second leave at his own expense. The leave with free transportation would be to his own home or, if his home were too distant, to whatever point he would choose. But there should be attached the condition that the soldier would be entitled to these two leaves only if he had committed no offences during the preceding month. I am more than satisfied that if some such plan were adopted, the various commanding officers and others charged with discipline would find most of their difficulties disappear. The soldier then would be more content and his family would more readily accept his absence. But whether or not this plan is adopted, I cannot too strongly urge upon the government the necessity of doing something about free transportation for soldiers, and in particular that they make a special effort to give this free transportation in connection with leave for Christmas and New Year's, which are fast approaching.

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend will permit me to interrupt, do I understand him to advocate that there should be one free leave a month?

Mr. WHITE: One free leave a month, and one at his own expense.

Mr. RALSTON: That would be twelve leaves each year with free transportation. Is that right?

Mr. WHITE: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. WHITE: I could finish in just a moment if I might have permission.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the consent of the house.

Mr. WHITE: I want to mention just one other matter and then I shall have finished. For many years there has been a great deal of resentment among the veterans of the last war with regard to the manner in which they have been treated by the pension department. I am quite frank in saying that the Conservative party have not treated the veterans any better than they have been treated by the Liberal party. Certain conditions which have existed since the last war must not be allowed to creep into the method of granting pensions in connection with this war, and I would suggest that the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) seriously consider overhauling his pensions staff and appointing examiners and officials with a little more sympathy for the private soldier than that possessed by a slab of Scotch granite. I have handled many cases for veterans before the pension board, but you soon find out that you are up against a stone wall. The pension department hides behind the old bogy that the injury or condition complained of was not contracted during war service or could not be traced back to war service, and the entire onus of proving his case is placed on the soldier. The average private soldier has neither the means nor the opportunity to do this; and in any event I can easily imagine the feelings of the average man appearing before this hard-hearted board with all its endless red tape. The pension board takes the position that its officials and doctors are always right, and it pays very little if any attention to the opinions of civilian doctors.

Already the pension board is beginning to operate in the same way with regard to the present war; I might briefly state a case to illustrate my point. This man enlisted on October 24, 1939. He had two medical boards; he was X-rayed and placed in category A. In December, 1939, he proceeded to England, but on account of inferior and ill-fitting boots he developed trouble with his feet. On April 4 he was reboarded, placed in category E and sent home. He was discharged on May 16, 1940, and needless to say has received no pension. The man is unable to stand on his feet for any length of time at work. He applied for a pension but his application was refused. The official letter from the pension board reads:

> This ex-soldier was discharged from the Canadian active service force on account of medical unfitness.
> The commission rules that the conditions noted above are pre-enlistment, not aggravated during service.

I have applied for a second hearing, and the matter is now pending. Surely these men are entitled to the benefit of the doubt, if there is any doubt. It has been the custom to laud and praise the soldier to the skies, but here we have such matters as free transportation—I was going to mention allowances—and pensions which must be dealt with. Surely it is the duty of this government to see that every last soldier receives everything coming to him.

[Mr. White.]

In conclusion I should like to just pass on a remark made to me a short time ago at the Trenton airport. I was speaking to a number of young Americans who had seen fit to come to Canada and join the air force. To one young American coming from California I said, "Just what made you decide to enlist in our army?" His reply was, "We are still brothers under the skin, and I just had to come."

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, the news received a short time ago of a naval victory in the Mediterranean was most welcome. It will not lessen the determination of the British commonwealth or the British people to bring the present conflict to a victorious conclusion, but it does make us realize even more fully that bulldog determination possessed by the British people, who now are suffering more than any people have suffered in the history of the world.

I should like to felicitate the mover and the seconder of the speech from the throne. I should like to pay a special tribute to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton), who told our people that to be a good Canadian is to be a good Britisher. I want to send a message to my native province, and particularly to the premier of that province, Mr. Godbout, in commendation of the splendid attitude he has taken in respect to Canadian unity and particularly to unity in Quebec, in asking them to master the English language. Having the honour, as I do, to represent one of the largest constituencies in Ontario, and one in which the majority of the constituents are English-speaking, let me say to Mr. Godbout that he is doing a proper and a national thing when he advises his compatriots to learn to speak the English language. It is an accomplishment they will need not only in Quebec, but also in their transactions with the rest of Canada.

The message delivered by Mr. Godbout has a corollary. The suggestion has been well received by all provinces and the newspapers that the desirability of a knowledge of the French language should at least to some extent apply to the English-speaking majority. My own personal experience has been that I would not sell, for any stated monetary value, even my imperfect knowledge of the English language, and I have no doubt that others hold a similar view. My knowledge of that language has given to me opportunities which otherwise I should never have enjoyed or cherished.

May I felicitate the young member from Provencher (Mr. Jutras) upon the fine speech he delivered in seconding the address in reply. He had poise, he had ability, and one could see that he had knowledge, too. Without trying to pose as a prophet, I have no hesitation in saying that a fine future lies before the young man who represents the historic federal constituency of Provencher.

I appreciated most the hon. gentleman's observations respecting the suffering of agriculture. He realized, as I do, that the western provinces are facing an agricultural problem, and he sought to have the nation realize that the problem was general. The import of his observations was that if we wish to have prosperity in Canada and throughout the world, we must of necessity have prosperity among the primary producers, namely, our farmers.

I have always greatly enjoyed and respected that day around the first of September in each year which is set aside as Labour day. I should hope that at some future time we might have another day set aside for the farmer, so that his value in the community may be brought to the attention of all.

It is realized that the problems of agriculture cannot entirely be solved at the moment. They may be alleviated, regionally or locally, but we must be aware of the fact that the problems of those connected with agriculture will be accentuated after this war, as they were after the first great war. Why? I know, from experience in my own family, from the first war, that a great number of our young Canadians who are now rendering actual war service will not, after their discharge from the army, come back to the farms. There will be no inducement for them to come back. They will flock to the larger centres of population, and it is because of that fact that I believe it is necessary for every Canadian worthy of the name to come down to a study of the basic problems of agriculture. I repeat that a prosperous agricultural community is essential to a prosperous country.

I am not a westerner, nor am I an easterner. Geographically speaking I belong to central Canada. That is the reason why, with some diffidence it is true, I intend to speak for a few moments about our great wheat problem. All agriculturists, in fact all Canadian people, are in sympathy with and appreciate the situation of agriculture in the three western provinces, where we have a wheat problem which cannot be traced to the present government, and which has not been wished or willed by the people of Canada.

We are willing to do what we can to help improve the condition in western Canada. We are willing to pay direct taxation on wheat or flour consumed. But at the same time the farmers in the western provinces do not want hand-outs from the federal treasury. During last summer and the early fall I received a considerable quantity of literature emanating from western Canada, from which it appeared that certain organizations which were holding conventions or other meetings were asking that the federal government pay the western farmer $1.25 for his wheat.

This is indeed an important problem, Mr. Speaker. But when the people of Canada as a whole compare their present position with that of the people in the British isles, they must at once realize that our load is much lighter than theirs. If it is possible to increase the price of wheat to such an extent as to involve an expenditure of $225,000,000, let us do it immediately. But if on the other hand the expenditure of that money would in any degree curtail our war activity; if it would prevent our enlarging our war effort, then I say we must maintain the present situation, namely a guarantee of 70 cents a bushel.

I point this out to the western provinces so that they may realize that in the east, too, we have agricultural problems. In the constituency I have the honour to represent, in the last twenty-five years there has been the finest and most pronounced development of agriculture to be found anywhere in Canada. In that constituency we have problems in connection with the production of hay. Our colonists were faced with problems arising from an unlimited amount of pulpwood with limited markets. It may be true that the problem in my constituency is not as large, as widespread or as national in scope as that of the western provinces, but the fact is that it does exist.

The farmer in the east has had to meet the loss of sale for his products, particularly hay, through the development of the locomotive and the internal combustion engine. It must be realized that the development of those means of transportation to a great extent eliminated the market for Canadian hay both in Canada and in the United States. It is true however that to some extent the government has helped.

I point out these facts so that hon. members may realize that the difficulties in connection with agriculture are not limited to western Canada. I believe I will be forgiven if I say I am convinced that it is impossible for the federal government at this time to dig into the federal treasury to bonus the western farmer to the extent of $225,000,000.

It has often been said that democracies are hard on their leaders when they are living, and that of necessity those leaders must pass to the other world before they receive any recognition. In the last few days I have read and listened to eulogies of one of the finest men Great Britain has produced, a man who went to his reward only a few days ago. Because of the sincerity of his convictions, because of his implicit belief in the principle of peace throughout the world, both his personal and his political reputation suffered. How pleasant it is for those who watched him in action to see the tribute that has been paid to him during the last few days.

Let me, however, take this opportunity to praise some of the men who are now living. I turn first to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), a man who has spared no effort in this time of conflict and stress. Particularly will he be remembered for what he did at Ogdensburg a few months ago. There we had the spectacle of two of the leading statesmen in the English-speaking world meeting together on a mission of agreement and understanding. At that time there came together two men who have been working all their lives for amity and rapprochement between their respective nations. It must have been gratifying to them to see their conversations take the form of definite agreements.

We do not want to expect too much from those agreements, but they will stand as a living and permanent example to those in Canada and in the United States who in the future may wish to find a common ground of agreement. People throughout the empire were thrilled by the message from Britain to the effect that she was to permit the United States government to take action in respect to certain zones on the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

May I at this point pay a deserved and sincere tribute, individually and collectively, to the members of the government of Canada; and I believe I may extend that tribute to every member of parliament. In the membership of the House of Commons we find represented a variety of services which, if necessary, could be made available to the government. Every member of parliament, no matter what section of the country he represents or where he sits in this House of Commons, I am sure will be always ready to give the best there is in him in furthering our war activities and the activities of the present government. We had an example of this during the national registration. There were no shirkers in the organization that carried out this registration, because every member of parliament did everything possible to make it a success. The same thing would apply to any activity in which this government might be engaged.

I believe it was a proper move to make to call parliament at the present time. We have already heard some very fine speeches dealing with the military and national situation. and I am sure we will hear more from those who will follow in the present debate. We all know the seriousness of the situation, and I am sure that no member would have the audacity to rise in his place simply to hear himself talk. We all have certain responsibilities, the back-benchers as well as the front-benchers. This is the proper forum in which to voice the sentiment of the Canadian people. They have no better way to express their thoughts than through their representatives in this House of Commons.

I listened attentively to the speech delivered by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). Before I go any further I should like to pay a sincere tribute to his leader, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), and express the fervent hope that the day is not far distant when his health will be permanently improved and he can again take his place in Canadian public life. I have not always agreed with his convictions, but I do not think anyone can challenge his sincerity of purpose or belittle the sacrifices he has made. He is ably replaced in the present house by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. The hon. member is not only an eloquent speaker; he is well versed in national matters. He is a wonderful propagandist as far as his own party and socialism are concerned. We could learn a lot from what he said, but at the same time we cannot get away from the idea which he has in his mind, that the only solution for our present difficulties is pure and unadulterated socialism. He believes that most of the troubles in connection with our present war activities can be obviated by the nationalization of Canadian industry.

I hold no brief for the capitalists or industrialists of this country, but I do not think that it adds to national unity when the leaders of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation attack the industrialists, as they have in the press during the last few months, and say that they are not playing the game. It would be just as fair to say that the farmers or workers of this country are not playing the game. You cannot take a whole class and put all its members in the same category. There may be some men in industry who are not doing their duty toward their country at the present time, but that does not mean that our industrial system is wrong. We have the necessary departmental and governmental agencies whereby these men can be kept in line. They should not be allowed to profiteer while other Canadians are making sacrifices. I believe that the great majority, if not all, of our industrialists are playing the game as far as our war activities are concerned.

What has socialism done for France, my old motherland? France nationalized her aircraft and munitions factories, and what happened? They had practically no production. No one can separate socialism from communism, fascism or nazism. In Germany they call themselves national socialists, and in Italy they call themselves pacifists. We should not forget that a nationalized industry leads to a dictatorship. If all rights are given up it means chaos or a dictatorship. They had socialism in France, and what happened? There was a deterioration of the moral fibre of the nation. The government did not have sufficient strength to guide the people. When the government has not sufficient strength to lead the people there is a breakdown of the national activities. There is no avoiding that. Surely the members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation must realize that the solution of our problem is not the nationalization of Canadian industry, but the closest cooperation with all the citizens of this country.

The hon. member stated that the House of Commons should not be adjourned or prorogued for more than ninety days. I think I express the feeling of all parliamentarians when I say that should the need arise the Canadian members of parliament would be willing and ready to sit here all year without any extra cost to the Canadian people. We realize our obligations and we are ready to meet them. During the last session it was stated in some sections of the press that the members of parliament were ready to accept extra remuneration. I feel sure that if this had been offered not a single member would have accepted it. So far as I am concerned, and I voice the sentiment of the constituency which I represent, if it is necessary I am ready to sit here all year, and certainly without any extra remuneration.

As to the holding of secret sessions, this will be decided by the cabinet. However, I believe that anything that can be said, should be said to the Canadian nation. Anything that is not secret and can be divulged should be given to Canada as a whole through the House of Commons.

I now have a few regional requests to make. There is a proverb to the effect that it is more blessed to give than to receive, and this certainly applies to northern Ontario. Our young men have enlisted by the thousands, and at the request of the federal government we have speeded up the production of gold and other minerals in order to help the national treasury. The first request I have to make was referred to a few moments ago by a previous speaker. I do not intend to ask the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) to grant leaves to the enlisted men twelve times a year, but I do think leave should be granted at least twice a year and transportation provided. Many of the young men who enlisted from my district live a long distance from the mobilization centres. Some young relatives of mine are now quartered at Ottawa, which is 650 miles from their home. Everyone likes to be home at Christmas time, but it is financially impossible for these young men to make the trip. It will be no revelation to this House of Commons when I say that a number of men from Moose Factory, the Porcupine, Cochrane, Kapuskasing, Hearst and other districts in my constituency paid their own travelling expenses in order to try to enlist in the air force. Some of these young men made two trips at their own expense. Because of these great distances from home, I do not think that these boys should be called upon to pay their own transportation to their homes at Christmas. I want to be fair. I do not contend, as has been argued by a previous speaker, that leaves should be given once a month. The thing would be financially impossible and most of the boys would not be able to make the trip. However, it should be possible to arrange that the boys get home at Christmas time, and at least once or twice a year at reasonable intervals.

I make this appeal quite sincerely. I generally try to keep my ear to the ground. I have been doing considerable travelling in Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes during the last few months, and I know what the mothers and fathers and other relatives of these Canadian boys feel should be done. They are demanding that something should be done for our soldiers. There will be some cost involved, but I believe it would be a good investment from the point of view of military discipline, and the satisfaction of the men in service. I leave the matter in the hands of the government, but with all sincerity I appeal to them on behalf of our boys who at this time are doing so much for Canada and civilization.

I should like now to make a brief appeal to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Affairs (Mr. Macdonald). I hope hon. members who are listening to me will not think this is a small or unimportant request to make. The people of northern Ontario were thrilled a few days ago to hear that one of the naval boats of his majesty had been given the historic name of our great mining centre of Cobalt. The name of Cobalt is an institution in our national life, and, more particularly, has done much to contribute to the prosperity of northern Ontario. I am not asking just at the moment for big munitions factories or special privileges for our part of the country, but I do say to the minister that the people of northern Ontario would be gratified to have in our Canadian navy a boat named H.M.C.S. Timmins.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Or Northern Ontario?

Mr. BRADETTE: That would be satisfactory, too. I think my request is a reasonable one, and that it should appeal not only to northern Ontario but to the whole of Canada. Timmins is one of the first and at present the largest gold mining town.

I understand that the policy of the Department of Munitions and Supply has been to seek decentralization of industry, and in that connection I would make a special appeal for my own section of the country. We have an abundant supply of electrical power to serve any munitions plants that may be established there, and it is a part of the country that may be regarded as sheltered from things that might happen elsewhere in Canada. The establishment of a munitions plant in northern Ontario would tend to bring about a better distribution of our war industrial activities, and if such a plant can be established I shall be very grateful to the government. Whatever may be the decision of the government I shall carry on the same as before, although I do think this request is deserving of serious consideration.

It has been mentioned in this debate, as it was in the debate on the address last year, that this war will bring about a new order of society. We have witnessed in the last few months some developments in the new order that war has brought about in the conquered countries of Europe. We have also witnessed, in the establishment of the joint defence board, a new order in the matter of defence which has been brought about by Canada and the United States. I believe that the war will also bring about what I might call an evolution in the industries of Canada. In making that statement I have more particularly in mind the fact that we in Canada are now working towards the standards prevailing in United States industries, and the time to consider what we shall do after the war is now. Of course it is impossible to foresee what may happen two or three months hence. No one who was in this House of Commons only a few months ago could have foreseen what has since happened to many of the nations of Europe, and similarly at this time we cannot clearly envision the new social order. But no matter what new social order we may have, we know that it can never be perfect, because in the very nature of things no human institution can ever be perfect. We must, however, bear always in mind the democratic principles which we seek to maintain, and I believe that in the future more will be asked of the people. There will be more said of their obligations and their duties than their rights. The young men who have enlisted and are ready to sacrifice themselves for the defence of Canada and the empire are making a magnificent contribution to civilization. They will come back, dynamic and full of energy, and our people generally will have to think less and less of good times and the leisure that civilization brings. By that time perhaps some of us older men will have dropped out of the race, but these young men who have been ready to sacrifice their lives in our defence will be coming back and they will be ready to fight for their ideals and the things that they profess. Any solution that we may find will not be a panacea that will suffice. The problem can be solved only by everyone making his contribution to maintain in its entirety that individual liberty which we prize so highly. All of us, except the aged, the unemployable, the afflicted and those unable to take care of themselves, will have to make a contribution to the new social order, a fuller and better order of things, and ways of life.

[Mr. Bradette.]

On motion of Mr. Bradette the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, November 14, 1940.

The house met at three o'clock.

WAR MATERIALS

VISIT TO CANADA OF SIR WALTER LAYTON—WAR PRODUCTION ADVISORY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I have a brief statement which I should like to make to the ministry, upon which I wish to base a question.

In to-day's Ottawa Journal it is stated that Sir Walter Layton, personal representative of Mr. Churchill, recently came to Canada, and it was understood that he has offered certain advice to the government about our war effort. In my view, parliament has the right to know what that advice is, and whether or not that advice has been or will be accepted. In his speech on Tuesday last the Prime Minister made no reference to this important event.

It is stated that the advice was to the effect that Canada's war effort should be rationalized, and that we should not waste effort and productive power on orders for things not vital. It is also understood that since Sir Walter Layton came and made known his views the government have set up a war production advisory committee, consisting of Mr. Towers, governor of the Bank of Canada; Mr. H. R. MacMillan, timber controller; Mr. R. A. C. Henry, the personal assistant to the Minister of Munitions and Supply; Major-General Crerar, chief of the general staff, and Mr. Chester, the new master of the ordnance.

Will the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) or the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) during this debate tell the house and the country just what the position is with respect to this matter? Furthermore we should like to know about this advisory committee. Has it been set up, and if so, what does it propose to do or to remedy?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I might answer my hon. friend's question immediately. Sir Walter Layton was sent by the British government to confer with the government of the United States at Washington. While he was on that mission he paid what I think he would describe as a courtesy visit to Canada, and in the course of that visit was kind enough to come to luncheon with me and give me an opportunity of discussing with him some matters of mutual interest. He did not come for the purpose of tendering any advice to the Canadian government; nor did he tender any advice, so far as I know.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Did he not submit a memorandum to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) as to what he thought ought to be done?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I regard Sir Walter Layton's mission as entirely confidential, and without his consent I would not think of seeking to intimate publicly anything with respect to what might have been regarded as a confidential communication. I have no doubt that Sir Walter Layton would give to our government any information he thought might be of help to us, but that was not the question my hon. friend asked. The hon. gentleman asked whether Sir Walter Layton came to give us advice on the part of the British government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I asked what it was proposed to do, assuming that to be so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He gave no advice whatever; and any information he may have given pertaining to the production of munitions of war would be information that it would be advisable for the British government or the Canadian government or the government of the United States to have, information which it would not be advisable to state publicly or disclose to the enemy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What about the advisory council?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Possibly my colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) will have something to say about the advisory council when he comes to deal with the estimates of his department. That council was not established as the result of any advice tendered by Sir Walter Layton when he was here.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does that mean that we will hear about it next spring or next summer, on the estimates, or will that statement be made at this session?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot understand my hon. friend's attitude. He seems to be seeking to criticize the government rather than trying to get information which will be helpful to all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, no; not at all. I am asking if there is such a committee, and when we will hear about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When my hon. friend the leader of the opposition asks whether the ministry intends to give this house certain information next summer or whether it will be given when the minister speaks, after I have indicated that the minister himself will deal with that matter, I cannot regard it as a remark which was intended to be helpful.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If I caught the Prime Minister correctly a moment ago, as I think I did, he referred to a statement being made "on the estimates". That was what prompted me to say next summer, because the estimates will not be down until after the long recess, as I understand it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am obliged to my hon. friend for drawing to my attention the fact that I mentioned the estimates. I meant to say during the present debate.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is good enough.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend had asked me whether I meant the estimates I would have told him that was a slip of the tongue.

LABOUR DISPUTE

AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY—CHRYSLER PLANT AT WINDSOR—REPORTED ARREST OF PICKETS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) the exact date on which he issued an order, if any, declaring the Chrysler plant at Windsor, Ontario, to be a protected place under the defence of Canada regulations, and for what reason any such order was issued.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): The plant was declared to be an essential service under subparagraph 2 (d) of the defence of Canada regulations, not by the Minister of Justice but by the governor in council, in order in council P.C. 3264 of July 20, 1940. The purpose of the regulation is to enable the civil authorities to enforce defence of Canada regulations relating to trespassing and loitering on or near the said premises, and prohibiting the doing of any act with intent to impair the efficiency or impede the working of any undertaking engaged in the performance of essential services.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): May I ask the Minister of Justice whether the recent arrests of pickets at the Chrysler plant in Windsor, on the ground, as reported in the press, that they were illegally in a protected place, were made with the knowledge, consent or approval of the government?

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I do not know anything about it. The administration of justice, even under the defence of Canada regulations, is under provincial jurisdiction.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour): My information is that the arrests were made by local and provincial police, under the instructions not of the dominion government but of the attorney general of Ontario.

Mr. MacINNIS: Is it the opinion of the government that the application of an order declaring that certain premises are protected areas may have the effect of stopping picketing or other trade union activities in such areas?

Mr. McLARTY: Mr. Speaker, realizing that this was a most important question I have asked for the opinion of the Department of Justice as to how far the application of the defence of Canada regulations may preclude picketing in general—not as related to the particular situation in Windsor, because there are certain facts there which complicate matters.

Mr. COLDWELL: What is the application of regulation 27, if it does not give protection to the men?

Mr. McLARTY: I have not had notice of the question, but I should think the answer would be covered in the opinion to be received from the Department of Justice.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I suggest that if this matter is before the courts it will be interpreted by them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But that should not preclude discussion here.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No; I know that. But I suggest I should not be asked for lgeal opinion respecting incidents which have been submitted to the courts.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is right.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I point out that some of the questions which are being asked might better be placed on the order paper. There should not be discussion across the floor of the house on a question asked on the orders of the day. I suggest that when an hon. member asks for a legal opinion from a minister he ought to have an opportunity of considering the matter before giving an answer.

LEGATIONS

PROPOSED APPOINTMENT OF MINISTERS PLENIPOTENTIARY TO ARGENTINA AND BRAZIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): I should like to direct the attention of the Prime Minister to a Canadian Press dispatch from Buenos Aires, appearing in the Ottawa Citizen this morning, in which it is reported that the British ambassador to Argentina has notified the foreign minister of that country of Canada's decision to instal diplomatic representation, with the rank of a legation, in Argentina. May I ask the Prime Minister whether or not this report is accurate, and whether he would be willing to amplify it; also to let us know whether or not it is the intention to send ambassadors to any other countries in South America and, if so, to which ones.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): If I recollect aright, when we were discussing the estimates of the Department of External Affairs at the close of last session, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) asked whether the government intended to have representation in the Argentine or any of the other South American republics. At the time I replied that the government was giving consideration to the matter. I am now in a position to state that the government has decided to have a minister sent to the Argentine and also to have a minister sent to Brazil.

At the time, when my hon. friend previously brought up the question, I indicated that the government was considering whether or not it might be possible to have an arrangement with respect to the South American republics similar to that which was made with regard to Belgium and Holland, having one minister represent this country at two capitals, in this case Buenos Aires and Rio de Janiero. For obvious reasons, however, it has seemed inadvisable to restrict the appointment to one minister and has seemed very desirable to have two appointments.

I might say that the formal approval of His Majesty the King is necessary before a step of the kind is taken. That approval has been obtained, and the governments of the Argentine and Brazil have been informed, at our request, by the foreign minister of the United Kingdom through the British ambassadors to those countries, that it is the intention of our government to make the appointments in due course. I should say that both countries intimated to the government some time ago that they would like to be in a position to send ministers to Canada. Each of these governments asked whether we would be prepared not only to receive their ministers but to reciprocate in the matter of making appointments to their respective countries. It is just within the last month or two that it has been possible to give them a definite answer on that point.

My hon. friend has asked me to elaborate. I do not know just what he may have in mind. It may be that he refers to the possibility of trade commissioners being able to perform the duties that ministers might perform; I notice there has been some comment in the press to that effect. I imagine, however, this would not commend itself to my hon. friend. I do not think any country has a finer trade commissioner service than Canada has, and the work that is being done by our trade commissioners in the South American republics is satisfactory in every particular. But as hon. members will realize, representatives of the Department of Trade and Commerce as such have not immediate access to foreign governments. In many countries to-day, in order that the ministry may be approached by a representative of another country, that representative must have ministerial standing. Hon. members also are aware that at the present time matters of trade are becoming largely controlled by governments themselves, by means of quotas, prohibitions and restrictions of various kinds, so that it is becoming imperative to have someone with the authority of a minister to gain the contacts that are necessary with governments on these matters. Perhaps I need only add that the importance of the South American republics, both from the political and the economic point of view, is obvious; and the government feels that it would be in the national interest that we should have this representation at an early date.

WHEAT

MARKETING OF ONTARIO PRODUCTION—OPERATIONS OF BOARD FOR EASTERN DIVISION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon). On August 2 last, in reply to a question by myself, the minister stated that the accounts in connection with the handling of Ontario wheat were then being audited, and that accordingly payments would be made in a very short time. He also said that there would be a final payment. The holders of participation certificates are anxious to know when this payment will be made; and can the minister state what the amount per bushel will be?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Haldimand was kind enough to send me notification of his intention to ask these questions to-day. I am glad to say in reply that the wheat received from the producer in Ontario during the 1939-40 season has been sold, and the operations of the board completed. The result of the marketing of this wheat shows a surplus of $80,729.27, which amount, less the cost of distribution, will be paid immediately.

At the commencement of the marketing season the board, with the approval of the governor in council, sets initial prices for each grade and variety of wheat. Naturally these spreads cannot be estimated exactly, but as the wheat is sold records are kept of the variations between the prices obtained for the different grades, so that now when the wheat has been sold the producer will be compensated for any inequalities in the initial prices.

The amount paid on each grade of wheat, initially, for the 1939 crop, the average price obtained after deducting therefrom the handling and administrative costs, and the balance per bushel payable on each grade is as follows:

	Initial price cents	Final price cents	Balance per bushel cents
Canadian Eastern Mixed Winter—
No. 1	70	71·623	1·623
No. 2	68	70·255	2·255

No. 2	68	70·062	2·062
No. 3	65	67·715	2·715

With the approval of the house, I shall be pleased to place on Hansard a statement of the operations of the board for this particular period (eastern division).

An announcement was made in the press yesterday advising the producers to forward their producers' certificates, properly endorsed, to the Canadian Wheat Board, 80 King Street West, Toronto.

The per bushel cost of the uncontrollable expenses incidental to the physical handling of the wheat, interest and bank charges, etc., amounted to 3·610 cents per bushel, and for administrative and general expenses 1·169 cents per bushel. Deliveries to the board from the 1939 crop totalled 4,254,935-50 bushels.

EMPLOYMENT OFFICES

ANNOUNCEMENT AS TO OPENING OF NEW OFFICES IN TORONTO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, in the daily press of Toronto there has appeared over the week-end an advertisement under the authority of the province of Ontario, announcing the opening of five new employment offices. Would the Minister of Labour be good enough to say whether this is done with the knowledge or approval of his department, or of the unemployment insurance commission?

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour): I am afraid I shall have to let the question stand as a notice. I have no information with respect to it, nor do I know what the commission has done in the matter. I shall be pleased to give the hon. member the information, but it is not available at the moment.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Wednesday, November 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. Brooke Claxton for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Blackmore.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture and National War Services): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I had not returned to Canada when the mover and seconder of the address spoke on Friday last. Therefore I was denied the privilege of listening to two speeches of the highest order, which were well delivered, judging from the reports in Hansard, and the remarks of previous speakers on both sides of the house.

I have had the privilege of listening to the speeches delivered by the leaders of the three groups sitting opposite, and the very excellent speech delivered by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). The Prime Minister, because of his very complete review of the activities of the Department of National War Services, has made it unnecessary for me to say more about our activities at this time. As a matter of fact I do not rise to speak on the main motion, but rather to speak on the amendment which is before the house, moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and supported in certain particulars by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell).

The amendment of the leader of the opposition is in the following words:

That the following be added to the address to His Excellency:

"We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that this house regrets that the government has continued to soothe the Canadian people regarding the war effort of the nation, thereby creating a false sense of security when a clear-cut call to action is desperately needed.

And this house further regrets that despite the serious condition of agriculture no effective action is proposed to alleviate that condition and to ensure to the Canadian farmer a just, fair and reasonable return for his products."

It is my intention to deal first with the reference to agriculture, and if I have time later I shall refer to my recent experiences in Britain in order to refute the suggestions contained in the first part of the amendment.

I would call the attention of the house to the statement that, "no effective action is proposed". The leader of the opposition had no suggestion to make other than a proposal that we should do for the potato grower what we have done already for the wheat grower and the apple grower. I suggest to him that if the application of the policy applied to the condition of the apple grower would satisfy, and if in his opinion we have done all that we should have done for the wheat grower, and if he had no special complaint to make excepting with regard to potatoes, he should have greatly narrowed the terms of his amendment. When he made a speech two hours and a half long and offered no proposals to alleviate the condition of the farmer about which he complained, he might have refrained from criticizing the government on that score.

But the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party did not make that mistake. He stated a grievance, and his long practice in stating grievances has made him an expert. He said:

War has effectively closed our principal markets for farm products.

And again:

Our agricultural problems are, however, not due to war conditions exclusively. Economic nationalism and the increase in production encouraged by the first great war, and made possible by the mechanization and scientific development of agriculture, have combined to increase the difficulties of Canadian agriculture. The lack of any intelligent policy or direction on the part of the government has greatly increased the difficulties.

I take it that he does not blame this government for having brought on the war. We can as a government, therefore, claim that any difficulties arising out of the war are not of our making.

Economic nationalism certainly cannot be laid at the door of this government. When the present Prime Minister accepted the leadership of the Liberal party he condemned narrow nationalism in all its elements. He continued to lead the crusade both inside and outside the House of Commons until to-day he is recognized throughout the empire as the most internationally minded of all the political leaders of the empire. His followers campaigned with him for twenty-one years against the narrow nationalism of the official opposition and the state socialism of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation which is state monopoly of the most nationalistic nature.

The leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation then proceeds to condemn increased production, mechanization of farms and scientific development of agriculture as co-partners with economic nationalism and war in causing the problems of agriculture. He then goes on to state:

The lack of any intelligent policy or direction on the part of the government has greatly increased the difficulties.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I cannot conceive of a less intelligent discussion of the causes of our difficulties as related in criticism of the present government of Canada, and would therefore suggest that the policy pursued by the government to date may be quite as intelligent as could proceed from the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation source.

It is not the practice of a government to be announcing policies. Governments put their ideas into practice. The announcing of policies is the right of oppositions. When we were in opposition we announced a policy through our leader in these terms:

The Liberal party by its policies will continue to further the development of agriculture, lumbering, mining and fisheries by effecting reductions in the costs of production of Canada's basic products and by obtaining wider markets therefor, by encouraging export trade and by state assistance in the marketing of natural products.

We appealed to the country on that policy as opposed to narrow nationalism and state socialism as practised by the government of the day and advocated by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. We were returned by an enormous majority and put those policies into effect for four years. War came.

We again went to the country, outlined our policies, and declared our intention to continue the policies advocated in 1935 and put into effect with beneficial results for four years. What was the result?

Mr. COLDWELL: Unemployment.

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend says "unemployment." There was unemployment for practically all the opposition candidates who opposed us. In proof of that may I recite this. The official opposition elected only three members from agricultural seats west of Winnipeg, and I see on the opposition benches only two members from eastern Canada who by the wildest stretch of the imagination can be called farmers. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation was held to its original representation west of the great lakes and did not elect a single representative from a farming constituency east of the lakes. The Social Credit group had its numbers cut in two.

What about my own position, since I am the minister under discussion? I left a safe seat which I represented in the last house and deliberately challenged the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation on their policies for agriculture, in a seat which was entirely held by the radical opposition in the local house. It was a seat which had been abandoned by the ill-advised official opposition. I campaigned in every province west of Quebec for others, and the people of this western seat returned me by a handsome majority. I may tell my friends of the official opposition that every traditional Conservative poll in the constituency gave me a majority.

Why should this government change its policies on agriculture? The policies are essentially Liberal. The policies were endorsed in peace-time by the farming population of Canada when proposed in 1935. The policies were put into practice for four years and endorsed in war-time no later than March 26 last. Two of the opposition now have the effrontery to pronounce against those policies in the house without waiting to hear the report of our mission to Britain in an effort to make our future practice conform to their needs. We have only two markets left for our farm products. They are Britain and the United States, the two countries whose markets have been cultivated since we took office and in these we have friends because of our actions during the years we have been in office.

After reviewing the position of the wheat farmer, the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation then went on, as an opposition should, to do what the leader of the official opposition did not do, namely, announce an alternative policy. He said:

Since similar conditions face other branches of agriculture, we would make these suggestions:

1. That the marketing of all farm produce by appropriate boards with adequate producer representation be provided for.

We have boards, most of them with very adequate producer representation upon them, marketing wheat, bacon, dairy products, apples, and although with no assistance from this government, tobacco.

The hon. gentleman's second point was:

2. The suppression of gambling and speculation in food products, including of course the closing of the grain exchanges.

I agree that gambling should be removed from the marketing of our products at all times. I do not think, however, that gambling and speculation are synonymous terms. I agree that when the butter market of Canada is protected by a five-cent duty persons should not purchase butter at 21 cents in the summer season and attempt to sell it to the consumers at 30 to 40 cents in the winter months. I am compelled to say, however, that when I, as a representative of producers, am asked by our only customer to maintain an open exchange when under the circumstances there can be neither gambling nor speculation, I am inclined to accede to his wish. That is what we are doing in Canada at the present time in the handling of wheat.

The leader of the Cooperative Commonweath Federation party proceeds through six planks, each one of which could be dealt with to indicate that in so far as they would be helpful the principle has already been complied with. He concludes with a seventh, which reads as follows:

7. The appointment of a full-time minister of agriculture devoting exclusive attention to the industry, and the transfer of all agricultural marketing boards from the Department of Trade and Commerce to the Department of Agriculture.

I presume that when the member for Rosetown-Biggar suggests the appointment of a full-time minister of agriculture he implies what others are stating—that two departments of the nature of Agriculture and War Services are too heavy for one minister. My hon. friend nods his head in assent. Well, that is an arguable position to take. But when in the latter part of the proposal he suggests that all boards having to do with the marketing of farm products be transferred to the Minister of Agriculture he is suggesting that the board of grain commissioners and the wheat board should be transferred to Agriculture.

May I state to the member for Rosetown-Biggar that one of the biggest single jobs confronting the government of Canada to-day is that of dealing with the marketing of wheat and the financing of the farmers who have not been able to market their wheat. That job in itself is bigger and more trying than the work of the whole department of war services, particularly when we were able, through the cooperation of the members of this house, to secure the cooperation of all the people of Canada both for the registration and for the calling of men for the training camps.

If it is only the health or capacity of the minister he is worrying about, then I submit that his proposal does not help the situation. If it is his desire to get me out of the department, then I want to tell him that whether I am Minister of Agriculture, War Services, both, or only a private member, or back on the farm where only one of his group ever made a living—

Mr. COLDWELL: I never heard that the Minister of Agriculture did either.

Mr. GARDINER: —I shall continue to fight the battles of the farmers of Canada. No adding to or taking away from duties or prestige will remove my life-long association with and love for farmers and farming.

I might add that with the government constituted as it is, wheat is under the joint administration of two ministers, one from the greatest wheat producing province in Canada and one from the second greatest. On the theory that two heads are better than one, the work should be lighter and carried out more efficiently as it is.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What if there isn't any head?

Mr. GARDINER: I am certain that I and the Minister of Trade and Commerce can cooperate to the benefit of the industry.

In reply to the suggestion of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) I know of only one group in Canada that is without any head.

The leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation immediately removes any suggestion that he desires a minister to have anything to do, by proposing that a planning commission should be set up which would take on all the duties of a minister of agriculture. He gives as the last duty of this commission that of arranging for the export to Great Britain without profit to Canada of surplus supplies of food now rationed in that country.

What does he mean by "without profit to Canada"? Almost forty per cent of our population live on the farm; easily sixty per cent are engaged in work which is such that they depend upon returns from the farm for their existence.

Mr. COLDWELL: Returns are not profits, and the minister knows it.

Mr. GARDINER: I am coming to that. Canada, in relation to profits, is the people of Canada. His proposal can mean nothing more or less than what is the essence of state socialism, namely, that the whole population, including the farmer, be placed on a bare subsistence basis.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Rubbish.

Mr. COLDWELL: The farmers are on that basis now.

Mr. GARDINER: May I state what this government has done for agriculture?

Before the war, when we found every branch of agriculture floundering in the bogs of narrow nationalism, having had flung to it by the government of the day the rotten planks of state socialism, we offered it trade with a great friendly nation to the south and a mother country forced to prepare for war, with the result that we were returned to office.

When we returned we implemented our pledges, with the further result that the price of every single farm product increased. The volume of the product at increased prices went up. At the end of two years the increased sales to the two important countries had improved in value by more than fifty per cent. This continued in most products right down to the year in which war began. Wheat was the outstanding exception, and crop failure in 1937 largely accounted for that as well as the dropping off in the total farm exports.

No other government at any time has helped the western farmer from the treasury of Canada to the extent that this government has. We have spent millions of dollars to assist farmers without crops. We have spent additional millions in rehabilitating farmers. I was referred to in the last campaign, a campaign carried on after the war began, as the Santa Claus to western Canada and western farmers.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The people do not believe that.

Mr. GARDINER: Look at the last election returns and you will be convinced that they do believe it—and they left half of your group at home.

Before war came we set up cooperative marketing organizations from coast to coast to handle farm products. Every one of them has been a success financially. Our guarantee enabled them to finance at the bank, and they were so soundly established that although they brought the farmer better returns not one of them required to take a cent out of the treasury of Canada. This demonstrated that the farmers of this country can organize and handle the marketing of their own products and make a success of it.

Before the war we paid a premium on good cheese and assisted cheese producers to improve their factories, with the result that quality cheese has been greatly increased both in volume and in price. It is this increase in volume and quality produced by more scientific methods which the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation associates with war and narrow nationalism as the cause of our present farm problems.

Mr. COLDWELL: You know better than that.

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend is quite an expert in a number of things, one of them being composition, which he taught for many years in a school in the city of Regina. If he will read the Hansard report of his speech he will find that what I am stating is exactly correct.

I differ from my hon. friend in his diagnosis of the case. If the peoples of Europe whom Britain has befriended for ages had been able to hold out against the attacks of nazism, every scrap of food Canada prepared against the day of trial would have been required by now and would have been selling at a price which would have partly paid the debts incurred during the days of narrow nationalism. But the war has brought destruction, pillage, rampant death and slavery to the small food-producing countries of Europe, and we, with our food supplies increased to greater surpluses than for years, are able to play a greater part in assisting Britain than we otherwise could have done.

Britain did not want our apples last year. We helped the apple growers as liberally as we ever helped the wheat growers. We entered into an agreement with Britain and set up a board to handle bacon. The price of hogs averaged about three cents a pound higher in Canada than in the United States where there was no agreement. We made an agreement on cheese, and cheese producers were assured of a price much better than the relative price of butter which was left to the tender mercies of our own market. Our farmers could not sell their wheat, and we did what no government ever did under similar circumstances before. We paid them more by way of advance one year than we could get for it, and when the war break came and our storage would not handle it, we helped finance an increase in storage and we distributed the storage available so that all could get some. We pegged the price so that the speculator could not profit, and Britain came to our assistance and paid us more for wheat than she paid any other country in the world.

In the face of these facts I want to say that, before the trip which I made to Britain a few weeks ago, we had been functioning in the interests of agriculture in this country and had been giving considerable direction to production in Canada. We told the farmers, for example, more than a year ago that it would not be wise to increase wheat acreage; but wheat acreage was increased by two million acres. We cannot always be assured of the carrying out of undertakings which we advise people to enter upon on their own behalf. We advised them, it is true, to go on producing bacon. We had some difficulties with that before the end of last year, but those difficulties will be cleared away when I read the arrangements which we made in Britain when I was there in recent weeks.

Perhaps one of the greatest war services provided in Canada has been performed by the farmers. I think the remarks of the different oppositions agree with that. We are inclined to look upon munitions, arms and armies as being indispensable in war time, and they are; but sometimes we forget that the necessities of peace time are the fundamental requirements of war time. Food and clothing are as indispensable in time of war as man-power itself, because without food and clothing there could be no man-power.

The farmers of Canada and the enlisted soldiers from all classes in Canada have been required to make greater economic sacrifices than any others. First it was the apple growers, next the tobacco growers, next the vegetable and small fruit growers; and now the wheat growers have been compelled, because of the turn of the war, to accept much less for their products than they had every right and reason to expect. Farmers suffered as great, if not greater, losses because of war fear before war was declared.

Because of these losses, both before and since the declaration of war, I thought it wise to go to Britain and study the British position first-hand, taking with me, to assist, officials of the department who are entrusted with the task of helping to market farm products. We have just returned and have certain reports to make.

The first is that while the blockade lasts there is only one European authority to which we can direct food supplies, and that is the government of Britain. I have noticed from press reports since returning that certain persons have been suggesting while I was away that we should seek markets in certain quarters. I wish to state, in terms that cannot be misunderstood, that having witnessed the bombardment of London and other parts of Britain I would not remain for one hour in any government of Canada which would seek markets for farm products anywhere in the world if the marketing of them there would in any way tend to weaken the blockade Britain is enforcing upon certain sections of Europe.

Mr. COLDWELL: What about the selling of copper to Spain?

Mr. GARDINER: Well, my hon. friend will find, if he reads this carefully, that the selling of anything to Spain is very well covered by what I have stated.

My observation would lead me to the conclusion that Britain will require to use every legitimate means at her disposal to defeat Hitlerism, and the blockade is the strongest weapon she has until munitions, planes, tanks, trucks, arms and men are pouring into the field of battle.

Britain is enforcing the blockade, and she alone must be in a position to determine where the food products can be placed to do the greatest good. In short, I think it is our duty to place the food supplies available for European consumption at the disposal of the empire through the food and shipping ministries of Britain, to be directed to any market they think advisable. I think we should receive in return from the British government for these supplies sufficient to make it possible for our farmers to carry on producing food supplies which are greatly needed and may be even more essential to ultimate victory.

The second finding we wish to report is that the British food ministry has established a list of essential food products in order of preference. We were not supplied with that list and I presume it is subject to change from time to time, but our discussion would lead us to believe it is at present arranged in about the following order:

1. Wheat and other cereals.

The reason for this is obvious. There is no food product produced anywhere in the world which in its natural state will keep longer than wheat and which at the same time will retain its full value longer than wheat.

2. Dairy products.
3. Fresh meats.
4. Bacon and other cured meats.
5. Fish, canned and frozen.
6. Poultry and eggs.
7. Canned fruits.
8. Canned vegetables.
9. Fresh fruits.

Britain does not want fresh fruits at all.

The only one of these farm products which we are not at present interested in sending to Britain so far as our own economy is concerned is fresh meats. We have a much better market in Canada and the United States for all our fresh meat, including live cattle, than we can secure in Britain or any part of Europe. I should like, Mr. Speaker, to ask this house to whom is due the credit for that? The fact that we have no problem in connection with the marketing of our cattle is due entirely to the agreement which we have with the United States, and which was made by this government. The only farm product which we did not need to discuss in Britain was that of beef and other fresh meats associated in similar trade. I think we should keep that in mind when we are talking about our relationships with some other parts of the world in connection with food products.

We did not, therefore, discuss the sending of fresh meat to Britain other than to make known to them the fact that we have certain surpluses which are being marketed in the United States. We made it very plain to them that if these surpluses were ever required to feed the people of Britain we would be prepared immediately to discuss their problem with them and try to cooperate with them in assisting them to a solution.

We discussed all the other products with them, and bearing in mind the two findings reported above, namely, that the blockade is necessary to victory and that Britain has an essential list of food products set up in order of preference, I wish to report to the house the result of our discussions with the British government.

First, with regard to fish: It was not my duty as Minister of Agriculture to put forward the claims of the fishing industry, but I was pleased to have the officials of the departments of Trade and Commerce and of Fisheries suggest that we include fish in our negotiations. I shall only state in this report, before proceeding with the discussion of agricultural products, that Britain agreed to accept from Canada canned salmon to a value of $5,538,000, other canned fish to a value of $3,145,000 and frozen cod to a value of $3,367,000, or a total in fish of $12,050,000.

Fruit. Britain does not desire to take apples and other fresh fruits at present. She does not say she will not take any but she does not desire to take them. This is due to the fact that she places them at the bottom of the list of essential foods, and even on the basis of empire policy considers that while they are fighting the effort of Hitler to break the blockade, shipping space should not be used for fresh apples and other fruits. We have accepted her representations for this year and intend to encourage our own people to use Canadian fresh fruits in greater quantities than formerly as a means of assisting our fruit growers.

Britain is prepared to take:

Canned tomatoes	to a	value	of	$2,658,000
Dried apples	"	"	"	177,000
Canned apples	"	"	"	664,000
Fruit pulp	"	"	"	266,000
Fruit pectin	"	"	"	222,000
Honey	"	"	"	554,000
Or a total in fruit and honey of				$4,541,000

In regard to poultry and eggs, we were unable to enter into an agreement because the British food ministry were not prepared to bind themselves to take poultry; it is looked upon more or less as a luxury. The food ministry felt that the eggs which we could provide would not be sufficient in volume to affect their ration lists; therefore they prefer to have these products marketed without agreements, and we agreed to assist in every way possible in the marketing of them without agreement.

With fresh meats eliminated there are three products left which we can supply in quantity. They are wheat, dairy products, and bacon. These are on the British list in that order of preference. I wish to discuss them in the reverse order.

First, bacon and other pork products. Last year we had an agreement with Britain to take 291 million pounds of Wiltshire sides at a price which for that quantity would have netted us 52·4 million dollars. Britain actually did take 321 million pounds which netted us 57·6 million dollars.

Bacon is placed fourth on her list of essential products. There is a strong sentiment in government circles and elsewhere—and this is important to the people of Canada—to the effect that bacon is not an essential product, and could be placed much lower in the list. This is supported by two contentions; first, that bacon costs too much for its food value, and second, that the sources of supply have been so reduced that it would be impossible to maintain a ration which would be worth while.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

We presented our position to them, answering the last contention. We estimate that our entire surplus of Wiltshires this year will be 425·6 million pounds, or very close to the amount that Britain used to import from Denmark. We also estimated that we will have a million dollars' worth of offals and a million dollars' worth of bladders and casings which can be sold. We have therefore entered into an agreement under which we will deliver to Britain our entire surplus of Wiltshires, offals, bladders and casings for a total net to Canada of $69,300,000, or almost 17 million dollars more than the agreement of last year provided for, and more than 10 million dollars in excess of what we sold last year. This should clear our own market of all surplus, and maintain the ration in Great Britain at four ounces for this year. This should result in our own market being in a healthy condition, and encourage Britain to maintain either the present or a higher ration of bacon in future years.

May I throw out this warning: that this does not mean that we would be safe in Canada at the present time to go on greatly increasing hog production. We should establish hog production in Canada at the present time, put ourselves in a position to supply this amount throughout the year, and if we are successful in doing so, of good quality and in the quantity required, then next year I think we shall be able to persuade Britain at least to continue the present ration, and probably to increase it.

The terms of the agreement have been so drawn as to permit of the contract being operated this year on a lower cost basis than last year, and the quantity should make it possible to avoid the periodical gluts of last year. These two factors should result in the price level to the producers holding a favourable relationship to last year's average price.

The total number of hogs required to fill last year's agreement would have been 2·5 million. The total number required to fill this year's agreement will be 3·6 million. The total minimum earnings under last year's agreement would have been 52·4 million dollars. If we deliver only the minimum under this year's agreement, the total on Wiltshires will be 67·3 million dollars, and for all pork products, $69,300,000.

With regard to cheese and other dairy products, Britain did not wish to enter into an agreement to purchase butter from us if it would interfere with the quantity of cheese to be delivered.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister be good enough in connection with bacon to name the prices of these commodities?

Mr. GARDINER: The price to the farmer of course cannot be named; it is a price that works out over the period. I have not the price at a Canadian port before me at the moment, but it will be published. I hesitate to try to quote it. I think I know what it is, but I might be a fraction of a cent out.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Is it as high as last year?

Mr. GARDINER: No, not quite as high as last year, but the better arrangements in connection with maintenance, margin for storage and that kind of thing, should result in a price to the farmer which compares very favourably with that of last year. But the price for delivery is not the same; neither are the conditions under which delivery is to be made.

Mr. SENN: Is it a set price and a constant price that is expected?

Mr. GARDINER: It is a set price to the government at the port, and the board determines what the packer is to get from it.

Britain places cheese next to wheat in her preference list. She could not offer as much for butter as our farmers can get in their own market. We therefore decided not to press for an agreement on butter, but to enter into an agreement on cheese. This does not mean that Britain will not take any butter, but if she does it will require to be marketed in the ordinary way, and any influence the government can bring to bear on the marketing will be brought to bear if advisable.

Last year we had an agreement to deliver 78·2 million pounds of cheese at a price which nets us 14 cents a pound at Montreal. We delivered 90 million pounds and received for it 12·6 million dollars. This year we have agreed to deliver 112 million pounds at 14·4 cents at Montreal. This will net us at Montreal 16·1 million dollars. If we can deliver more, Britain will take it. There is no limitation, either in our discussions or in the agreement, on the total amount, but she wanted us to commit ourselves to a minimum amount in order that she might be able to deal with her rations.

In addition to cheese there is an arrangement under which we may deliver condensed milk to the value of at least $3,750,000 or to the amount of 1,000,000 cases. If one totals these figures it will be found that if we deliver only the minimum amounts of food products the contracts call for, we will sell $93,691,000 worth of food products other than wheat and fish. If we include the fish and not the wheat, our export of food products to Britain this year will amount to $105,741,000. This will be the largest return from these products since the latter part of the last war.

Here I should like to place on Hansard the record for the last seven years, including the record under this agreement on the minimum amounts, in order to indicate what that means to the food producers of the Dominion of Canada:

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the minister also say whether he will table those agreements?

Mr. GARDINER: Oh, yes; they will be tabled as soon as they are in shape for tabling.

What about wheat? The position has been stated quite fairly by both the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and the leader of the Social Credit party in so far as crop returns and storage are concerned. I did not go to Britain with authority to make an agreement on wheat. The duty of selling wheat has been entrusted by this house to a wheat board. It is not the duty of any minister to market wheat, but that of the wheat board which under the act reports to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Both the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the chairman of the wheat board asked me to discuss wheat and instructed their representatives in Britain to facilitate the discussions in every way possible. I wish here to state that I and those with me appreciated the assistance received from the very competent staffs of the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of External Affairs, including the high commissioner. In so far as wheat was concerned the assistance of Mr. Biddulph was indispensable. No official could know his job better or carry it out with greater courtesy and efficiency.

To illustrate Canada's wheat position to Britain I used certain figures, as follows:

	Million bushels
Wheat carried forward from previous years into 1940-41 and now in storage	282
Canada's crop in the year 1939-40	561
Stocks in sight to dispose of at August 1st, 1940	843
Canada will probably consume in 1940-41	130
Canada therefore has for sale	713
In the 14 years before the war, Canada sold to the United Kingdom an annual average of	90
Canada exported to the United Kingdom in calendar year 1939	132
Canada exported last year to all countries, except the United Kingdom which it is now open to her to sell	25
Canada exported before the war to countries now blockaded, an annual average of	35

The wheat carried forward from previous years covers the amount in the elevators of Canada at August 1, 1940, because I was dealing with the storage situation.

The United Kingdom imported 230 million bushels of wheat in the year 1938-39. It appeared, therefore, that Canada could meet the entire demands of the United Kingdom for wheat for the next three years out of her present stocks of 843 million bushels. Canada realized, of course— these were the representations made—that the United Kingdom would want to buy wheat also from countries other than Canada. But it appeared that in recent months about seventy per cent of the United Kingdom purchases had been of Canadian origin, and I suggested that the United Kingdom might think it desirable to maintain this percentage. On this basis it appeared that the United Kingdom would want to take about 160 million bushels of wheat a year from Canada.

With regard to the future, I examined the prospects first on the demand and then on the supply side. On the demand side, assuming that the blockade would not be lifted for two more years, Canada expected to be able to dispose of 160 million bushels a year to the United Kingdom, and to raise the consumption within Canada for food and feed from 130 million to 160 million bushels a year. During this two year period it thus would be possible for Canada to dispose of 640 million bushels at home and to the United Kingdom. In addition, Canada expected that after the blockade was lifted it would be possible for her to dispose of 160 million bushels a year to countries now blockaded, or say 480 million bushels over a three year period. Thus during the next five years, assuming two years of blockade and three years of offensive warfare or peace, it should be possible for Canada to dispose of the following quantities of wheat:

	Million bushels
To the United Kingdom: 5 years at 160 million bushels a year	800
By internal consumption: 5 years at 160 million bushels a year	800
To countries now blockaded: 3 years at 160 million bushels a year	480
Total	2,080

On the supply side, Canada could expect to produce on an average 380 million bushels of wheat a year. That is her average for the last fourteen years and more than her average for the last five years, including the last two crops. Her total production in five years thus would amount to 1,900 million bushels. To this should be added the 280 million bushels carried over into 1940-41 from previous years, making a total quantity of 2,180 million bushels which it would be necesary for Canada to dispose of in the five year period.

It appeared, therefore, according to the above figures that Canada would have 2,180 million bushels of wheat to sell in the five year period, and that during the same period she probably would be able to market 2,080 million bushels, leaving a carry-over at the end of that time of only 100 million bushels. Moreover, if Canada continued to be able to sell 30 million bushels a year to those countries outside Europe which were not being blockaded, instead of there being a surplus of 100 million bushels at the end of the five year period the demand for Canadian wheat would be 50 million bushels greater than the supply.

I did not consider, therefore, that Canadian wheat producers need be pessimistic, but may I say again that there is nothing in these figures which should induce Canadian wheat growers to increase their acreage this year. As a matter of fact there is very much in them upon which to ask farmers at least to go back to the acreage they had in the year previous to last year, which was 2,000,000 acres lower than the land sowed to grain last year.

Canada could supply Britain's needs and did not anticipate that unsold stocks would grow to excessive amounts. The difficulty, however, was that of financing the quantities of wheat which would have to be carried. About 800 million bushels of wheat would need to be financed, of which roughly half would be financed for two years at a cost of about 80 cents a bushel and the other half for one year at a cost of some 75 cents a bushel, if the present arrangement is continued. This would mean that the Canadian government would require to put out about $320 million on the two year arrangement and about $300 million on the one year arrangement, making a total of $620 million. The dominion government is obliged to pay the farmer any additional amounts received for the wheat. It is generally admitted that 70 cents advance at Fort William, which nets the farmer about 50 cents a bushel, does not cover his total costs of production and therefore does not maintain him as a contented producer. If he is to receive more money, it must come from the sale price of wheat, or from the taxpayers of Canada, or from both.

Those were the representations made. We made it plain to the British government that we were there not to discuss an agreement but to get their opinions with regard to the wheat situation. I have received those opinions as a result of the representations made through officials of the department concerned, and I have presented them to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) to be given consideration under his direction by the government of Canada. When he is in a position to make the pronouncement he desires to make with regard to the policy to be followed as a result of them, he will make the announcement to the house.

I believe I have more than exhausted my time. I am sorry I had not time to deal with the situation as I saw it in Great Britain.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. SPEAKER: With unanimous consent the hon. member may proceed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that under standing order 37 the minister is entitled to continue, in reply to a motion of want of confidence. He is the first minister who has had an opportunity to reply.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, no, but let him go ahead; I am quite satisfied. I would not for one moment attempt to stop him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My point is that the rule applies not only to one minister, but possibly to two or more ministers replying to the motion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is only quibbling; but let him go on.

Mr. SPEAKER: It might be well to point out that standing order 37 is in these terms:

No member, except the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, or a minister moving a government order and the member speaking in reply immediately after such minister, or a member making a motion of "no confidence" in the government—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is it.

Mr. SPEAKER: "—and a minister replying thereto—"

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is it.

Mr. SPEAKER: "—shall speak for more than forty minutes at a time in any debate." The minister is now replying to that which, in essence, is a motion of no confidence in the government. Therefore he is entitled to speak longer than forty minutes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is stretching it. How many replies are there?

Mr. SPEAKER: This very point was raised in the session of 1931 when the present member for Yukon (Mr. Black) was in the chair. On that occasion a minister was replying to an amendment which was considered to be a vote of no confidence in the government, and it was ruled that in replying the minister was entitled to unlimited time. I take the same position. The minister is now replying to that which in essence is a vote of no confidence, and under standing order 37 he is entitled to speak more than forty minutes.

Mr. GARDINER: I had not intended to continue beyond the point I have now reached, and because of that I did not bring any notes with me to deal with the matter. For that reason I shall discuss it only briefly, in any case—at least, I hope I shall be brief. If I were to tell the whole story I could not be.

In order to follow up the observations I made at the beginning of my speech it will be necessary for me to read the first part of the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson).

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The motion of want of confidence is that of the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore). I submit in his observations the minister is going beyond the rules. However I have no objection; I believe he ought to be allowed to make his speech. If he had not taken so much time with his blitzkrieg at the beginning, he would have had time to complete what he had to say.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Speaker has given his ruling, and I am proceeding on the basis of it. With reference to the "blitzkrieg" I would just like to suggest that when the leader of the opposition can rise in his place and move an amendment which to all intents and purposes is one of want of confidence in the government, and when the leader of another group can get up and make a similar motion, and it is then suggested that no one can reply, I say we have gone a long way from the democratic kind of government.

I do not wonder that the leader of the opposition does not want me to read the amendment again, because the first part of it is in these words:

> We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that this house regrets that the government has continued to soothe the Canadian people regarding the war effort of the nation, thereby creating a false sense of security when a clear-cut call to action is desperately needed.

The clear-cut call to action, Mr. Speaker, came on September 3, 1939. The government of Canada acted even in advance of that date, in order to prepare for that clear call. When the clear call came, the government of this country placed itself side by side with the government of Great Britain to fight the enemies of democracy. So we have remained, down to this day.

During the time I was in Great Britain I had the opportunity of seeing most of what is to be seen. The government of Great Britain did what they always do for representatives of this government who go over there. They placed their officials, they placed themselves and all the organizations set up to take care of the production of munitions and arms and shipping at the disposal of myself and those who went with me. Not only did they do that, but they placed at our disposal facilities to enable us to see everything that was to be seen.

I visited everything that I cared to visit from the port of Dover in the south—incidentally it was being shelled and bombed the day I was there—to Kyle in the north of Scotland. I visited Wales. I visited many of the parts I cannot name. I visited shipping points. I visited plants in which aeroplanes were being constructed. I visited munitions plants and saw all stages of their production. I visited plants that are producing small arms, and other plants that are building the largest guns being produced in Great Britain at the present time. I should add to that something which is perhaps as important as anything I have said up to this point, namely that I spent all of four weeks, but three week-ends in the city of London, where bombing is going on continuously.

After seeing all that I have seen—eleven million people walking the streets of London in day-time and at night, if they had to go out, making their way about in the darkness as best they could—I have come back with the feeling that if I never had pride before in the fact that I am a citizen of the British empire, I could not but be inspired by the endurance of these people and the courageous front they are presenting to the attacks of the kind which are being made—attacks not on armies, but on old men, old women, boys, girls and mothers. Fourteen thousand civilians have been killed in the battle of Britain, and less than three hundred soldiers. Yet the civilian population of Great Britain, and particularly that of London, is standing up to the attack with all the fortitude and endurance of a well-trained army.

When I went to Great Britain I took with me a picture I had seen in a theatre in Ottawa just before leaving the country. It showed the wharves and docks in east London, burning. The landscape as far as one could see was dotted with chimneys standing alone and with walls of buildings partly destroyed. The final scene was that of a group of school boys and girls who were looking at a demolished tenement which had once been their home. I took that picture to Great Britain. I took a picture which I had envisioned from broadcasts I had heard, some of them from Germany. When I left Canada I thought that Great Britain must be fairly well tied up as a result of the attacks which are being made. But when I arrived on the other side I was agreeably surprised to find that in the port at which we landed I had to go round and look for the buildings which had been destroyed. I had to search for damage to wharves. I had to search for damage to shipping. As I went down in daylight from that port on my way to London I had to search for any damage that had been done, either to the artery of transportation upon which I was travelling or to the surrounding country.

When I reached London the picture was a little different. But even though buildings were destroyed here and there, for every one destroyed there were a hundred or a thousand, depending upon the district concerned, still standing. We heard of one store being bombed while we were on our way to Britain, but I was able to buy in that particular store most of the things required while I was in Britain. I walked into it a few hours after I reached London. I saw young girls and clerks who had been working there for years. I saw men and women who, I suppose, had been associated with the business all their lives—standing behind the counters and doing business in the same old way. I walked up and down the streets and saw signs "open as usual" on building after building, and on those of which the windows had been broken, I saw the inscription, "more open than usual." That showed the spirit of the people.

On my second day in London I was walking down Piccadilly and I heard my first bomb when outside. I wondered whether it was landing just on the other side of the building which I was passing, or whether it was a mile or so away. I looked around to see where I might go if the next one hit a little closer, and I was surprised to see young men and women riding up and down the street on bicycles, going to their work as usual and carrying on with a spirit which indicated that Hitler could not scare them. I am reminded of an incident which I think will impress everyone in the house. On the boat going over was a group of Americans on their way to fly in the service of Britain. One of them came back on the ship on which we returned, having to return to the United States on business. He told us that he had been in a certain hotel when one wing of the building was blown away. He came down the next morning and was talking to the lady in charge of the hotel. She said, "You know, Hitler puts those whistles on the bombs to scare us." He replied, "Well, he has made a hundred per cent job of it with me." He then went on to say that Hitler certainly had not succeeded in scaring the proprietress of this hotel, or the girls who were waiting on the tables. He had not succeeded in scaring those who had to go to their different places of business.

This is the spirit of Britain at the present time. Having seen Britain carrying on in that way, having seen London carrrying on in that way, I do not think the people of Canada or the members of this house need have any worry as to the final outcome of the war.

In his speech the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) referred to a remark made by the Prime Minister of England to the effect that England would be ready to take the offensive in 1942. That is the spirit of Britain to-day—that they will be ready to take the offensive in 1942. In the meantime they are carrying on. In order to bear out the contention of the first part of his amendment, a little later on the leader of the opposition referred to the fact that when the members of the United States delegation were in Canada the week before I left they found that Canada was preparing to be in position to take the offensive in 1942. Having regard to those two statements by the leader of the opposition, I can scarcely understand the necessity for his amendment.

Britain is carrying on with the idea that she has sufficient forces, sufficient supplies, sufficient in the way of defence, particularly in her fleet and in what air force she has at the present time, to prevent a landing in Britain. She is confident that if an invasion is attempted by Hitler she will be able to repel it, even though some troops do land on her shores. She is saying to her people and to Canada that the most important task to be performed at the present time, while Britain is holding the channel, while Britain is holding the fort for the democratic nations of the west in order that they may prepare and help her prepare, is to provide the wherewithal to put men in the field. Without quoting anyone on the matter, may I say that the impression I gathered from my discussions in Britain was that it would be a crime on the part of any government in any democratic country to play into the hands of the totalitarian states of Europe by attempting at this time to put on an offensive.

Our task to-day is that of holding the line where the line now is, in the channel, in Britain, and doing everything we can as a country to help Britain out in her herculean effort. At the same time we must keep it in mind that when the day does come to go forward, not only must we have every man fully supplied with guns, with all the machines of war and the means of transportation necessary to take him forward as rapidly as Hitler crossed Europe, but we must have the necessary trained man-power to handle all the instruments of war and put them into operation against Hitler on the continent. It will require the most careful coordination possible to bring these two desired results to completion at the same time. It is only when our armies have driven his armies back to the borders they should occupy that we will have proven to the world that democracy must and will be kept secure.

Britain believes that this continent is going to do more to help her than any other part of the world in the supplying of foodstuffs, such as I have been discussing this afternoon, and in providing the necessary munitions of war and equipment. More than anything else, we can help by providing the ammunition to be put into the guns that are to be used by the army. Britain is in position to-day to defend herself and she will be in position in 1942 to go forward on the offensive. When she is in that position Canada will be marching side by side with her just as she has been ever since September, 1939.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, along with other hon. members I listened with rapt attention and concern to the latter part of the speech of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). I listened with deep interest to the middle part of his speech, and I listened with not a little humour to the first part of his address. I want to say to all who are within range of my voice that what the Minister of Agriculture so aptly said at the end of his speech was something which the Canadian people needed to have said to them. Perhaps the same thing would apply to the middle part of his speech, but I say with all seriousness and concern that the Canadian people in these days did not need the first part of the minister's address.

I doubt if there is a member in the chamber who has a higher regard personally for the Minister of Agriculture than I. I think we all realize his abilities and capacity. I was going to say at the start of my address, had the minister not preceded me, that this house and parliament were meeting in a different atmosphere from that which prevailed last session, but I had to amend my remarks because the minister's speech to-day was very much like the one he made at the opening of the previous session of the house. May I say to him in all kindness and good humour because I do not want him to take any offence—I would rather he take a lesson than take offence—that many people in Canada feel that, however much of a colossus the Minister of Agriculture might be regarded by many other persons in different parts of the dominion, the work of the cabinet should be divided up among the various ministers. If the Department of National War Services is as important a department as we were led to believe when it was first formed, and if one of the most important domestic problems facing the people of this country to-day is that of the farmer, then surely if people are complaining to-day that one man should hold in his own hands these two portfolios, what will they think after his speech this afternoon when he constituted himself the minister of national Liberal defence in the dominion? It almost seemed to me as he was speaking that he was posing as one of the commanding officers of a Liberal Maginot line which had long ceased to exist so far as being an important factor in the public affairs of Canada is concerned.

The atmosphere of the house has changed somewhat since last we met here. It will be recalled vividly by every hon. member how this house met last session in a very sober and serious, almost a militant mood. We were fearful of certain consequences from the events then taking place abroad, and our fears seemed to justify every precaution being taken and every warning which was then being given.

But to-day, because of the very circumstances which the Minister of Agriculture so well explained in the latter part of his address, the people of the Dominion of Canada are convinced that Great Britain is not in the same dangerous position she was in during those days. She has shown by the courage and grim determination of her people from one end of the British isles to the other that Great Britian is prepared and able to take care of herself against the best that the aggressor nations can throw against her. Therefore to-day, while danger still exists, there is much more confidence among our people and the world at large in Britain's chance of success. But that does not mean that there should not be a word of caution given to the Canadian people to-day. I am afraid that throughout the length and breadth of this country there does appear at times to be a certain apathy regarding our war effort. I am not going to lay the blame for that on any particular individual or any one organization or any particular government. But I say that if Canada and its people, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said, must pass through darker and more terrible days before victory is achieved, then if the government does no more than show by its war effort as it is unfolded to us that it is earnest and aggressive in seeing to it that the last ounce of Canada's strength is utilized for the purpose of achieving victory for the empire, it will have done a good job in calling parliament together at this time.

To my fellow members of the opposition I say that our duty as I see it is not to embarrass or unnecessarily to criticize the government in power, which is charged with responsibility for the conduct of our war effort. As I see it, it is not our duty as members of his majesty's loyal opposition to place political barbed wire entanglements in front of the efforts of the government in power, but rather as members of the opposition we should see to it by way of criticism, suggestion and otherwise that the war effort of Canada is increased in its tempo and that the maximum results are obtained by reason of our efforts in that direction.

While I say this to our own members on this side with regard to unnecessary criticism of the government, may I also say that a similar responsibility rests upon the Prime Minister, his colleagues in the cabinet, and the government supporters in this house. I say this seriously, I mean every word of it, and I direct it particularly to the Prime Minister now sitting in his seat, that there has been, I believe, in the past some thought in the minds of the government that everything that those sitting on this side of the house brought forward had some reference to the political fortunes of the party with which the speaker was identified. I hope that that will never be thought of his majesty's loyal opposition, because, Mr. Speaker, the opposition is sincerely anxious that Canada's war effort be prosecuted with the utmost vigour; and when criticisms are made, it is the duty of the government to take those criticisms in that light, as made for the advancement of the welfare of our fighting forces and of our Canadian war effort generally. It is a means whereby public opinion throughout the country can be brought solidly behind our war effort and a means of ensuring that every essential thing is done in the proper prosecution of our war effort. Within the four corners of what I have outlined lies, I believe, the real function of the opposition in this house. I myself have never felt more earnest in my desire to see the government do its best in prosecuting Canada's war effort. Let the Prime Minister and members of the government generally take all the political kudos they like out of that war effort, but let them give us the very best they have. That is what we are asking and we ask for nothing less than that.

I shall make only three or four suggestions to the government, and I believe they all have an important bearing on our national war effort at this time.

May I say first that I believe we are not exercising proper economy in the ordinary expenditures of this country. I may be entirely wrong but I am convinced that the government is not meeting the wishes of the Canadian people so far as ordinary expenditures are concerned, apart altogether from our war effort. People do not mind money being spent on our war effort, although even there they want it spent in a proper way, because all our people realize that their money in the banks, all the money they have invested in property, bonds and in insurance companies will amount to nothing unless Great Britain, Canada and the empire generally win this war. That is why they raise no objection to money being spent properly on our war effort. But may I point out that for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1939, the budgeted ordinary expenditures of the dominion—and I am taking these figures from the estimates themselves—amounted to $430,000,000. That was in time of peace. Those same ordinary expenditures for carrying on the affairs of the country amounted in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1940, to $520,000,000. During part of that year we were at war. But the estimates for this fiscal year ending March 31, 1941, so far as ordinary expenditures are concerned, were cut only to the amount of $448,000,000, which is $18,000,000 more than our expenditures amounted to in a time of peace in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1939. This is not good enough for the people of Canada. They want economy in our ordinary expenditures.

Another thought which has been much in my mind for a number of years is that this government might devote a good deal of attention to the question of the height of the salaries which some men are getting for their participation in our war effort. Let us have a fair deal in this respect. I would not like to be considered a demagogue, but, regarding the salaries which are received by civilians connected with our war effort who take no risk whatsoever, I would plead with the government to review the circumstances and at once remedy the inequalities, wherever they may be found.

We have experienced, in the present stage of our war preparations, a great scarcity of trained men and trained women. There are many who would go back as far as the time before the declaration of war to criticize the government on this account. To my mind, however, that is water under the bridge: I am not going to bring that up because after all it will not assist or advance our war effort. But I suggest that it is not too late for the administration to take a firm grip of the matter and see that, for the strenuous years that no doubt lie ahead, there will be a sufficiency of citizens trained for the necessary activities to which our war effort will lead. Already there are groups of women throughout the country taking the initiative in this matter. I suggest that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) take cognizance of these groups which are in training and see that they are given the necessary encouragement, so that we shall have not only an adequate number of men and women trained for defensive purposes, but also an adequate number of men and women trained for our requirements in connection with the manufacture of munitions of war.

References were made in the able speech of the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White) to the question of soldiers' transportation. Perhaps nothing more need be said than again to draw the matter to the minister's attention. I believe the Minister of National Defence will be well advised to take into sympathetic consideration the merits of this claim, which is being voiced not only by the men of the armed forces, but by their dependents all over Canada who are suffering from the inability of these soldiers, because of their financial obligations, to pay the cost of transportation for long distances while on leave.

Akin to this is another matter which I do not believe has been mentioned. I am sorry that the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), who is a neighbour of mine, is not in his seat. I am one who believes that we cannot do too much for the men who are standing between us and Hitler and Mussolini. Sometimes we forget this. Sometimes, absorbed in our big administrative set-ups, our war boards and the like, we forget that there has to be somebody to stand eventually at the point of the gun between the aggressor nations and ourselves. The men who have enlisted, the men who are in active service for our country, deserve in my opinion very special consideration. The question of transportation is one matter; another is the provision of some arrangement for free postage on parcels and letters going from Canada to our troops overseas and vice versa. It might even go further and include the troops in this dominion and elsewhere. After all, it is not very much to ask of the government. There would not be any great loss of revenue, and it would be one more indication that the people and the government of Canada are anxious to do something for those who in their behalf have taken upon themselves the risk of losing life or limb.

I wish now particularly to draw the attention of the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) to a matter which, although it has already been mentioned in this house, has perhaps not been emphasized to any extent. It is the minister's onerous duty to look after the affairs of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in so far as their relation to the House of Commons is concerned. I am one who has consistently urged, in this chamber and out of it, that we should have some review of the situation at the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, so that what I have to say this afternoon is no new idea of mine. I was amazed to find, in the issue of the Globe and Mail of October 24, 1940, under an Ottawa date mark of October 23, the following news item:

> Alan B. Plaunt, member of CBC's board of governors since 1936, has resigned because he could "not continue to accept responsibility for conditions of organization and management," he revealed last night.

The news item goes on to say:

> Plaunt tendered his resignation on August 30, to Hon. C. D. Howe. Dissatisfaction with conditions in the organization led to his making a confidential survey last summer, Mr. Plaunt said to-night. His report was submitted to the board of governors last autumn and no action has since been taken.
> In his letter of resignation Plaunt stated he was taking the step because, "I feel that as a public trustee I should not accept responsibility for the internal organization and executive direction of the corporation when I have long ceased to have confidence in it."

That is the situation, Mr. Speaker, which, I think the minister himself will agree, should be aired before the country at once. I shall be very much surprised if he will not bring this to a parliamentary committee for review at once. I think I know something about his view in this matter, and I am sure that all that needs to be done is to draw his attention to it. The letter which is alleged to have been sent by Mr. Plaunt to the minister contained these two paragraphs, which are so short that I should like to put them on Hansard:

> I would have taken this step early in the year had not my colleagues given me some reason to hope that the serious defects revealed by the reports prepared at their unanimous request by Mr. J. C. Thompson and myself would be remedied. I have however finally been obliged to conclude that this is not the case.
> It is my considered view that the present conditions seriously hamper the corporation in fulfilling its function in the war emergency and prejudice its survival as an effective instrument of national unity afterward.

I have always been a supporter of the national idea in broadcasting; and for that reason and others, may I suggest that the minister lose no time in, first of all, tabling the correspondence between that member of the board of governors and himself, and any other pertinent letters. This, I see, has already been asked for on the order paper. More than that, I call upon the government now to see that we have a special committee this session to deal with the matters which were raised by Mr. Plaunt in his letter of resignation. Remember that in this country nearly $3,000,000 of the people's money is collected through radio licence fees, and the public have a right to know what is going on. This letter of resignation was tendered in August, and I suggest that the government should lose no further time in dealing with the matter so that the people of Canada can come to a conclusion once for all.

I want now to deal with a matter referred to by the Minister of Agriculture this afternoon. I do not know whether I was one of those to whom he referred who could not by the greatest stretch of imagination be called farmers. Perhaps he is right with regard to that; I would not suggest that I am a farmer. But when I was out west this year I learned that he was not a farmer either, he was a school teacher, so I do not think people who live in glass houses should be throwing too many missiles my way.

Mr. GARDINER: That was about thirty-five years ago.

Mr. GRAYDON: I understood the minister did not claim to be even that old. But what the minister said about agriculture being one of our main problems is correct. I think agriculture should come into its own this session as far as attention in the debates of this house is concerned. While industry in many places has been getting a fair share of war orders, and the labour slack has been partly taken up, the war seems to have meant very little in the way of helping the farmers of Canada in the marketing of their crops. In many instances markets have been cut off. I could not help feeling sorry for and having a deep sympathy with the men and women of western Canada when I paid them a visit for a couple of weeks this fall. I realize to the full, as everyone in Canada must who sees their conditions, that the western farmer, as well as the farmer of eastern Canada, must have a fair break if he is to exist at all in this economy as we have it. There are certain major items which affect the farmer's condition. The war effort has of course produced a scarcity of farm help. There has also been a rise in the prices of many commodities that the farmer buys. Many men in our part of the country have had to pay a good deal more for binder twine and agricultural implements this year, to say nothing of the ordinary expenditure for maintaining their homes and their undertakings. But while all this is going on, let us see whether the bright picture of wider markets painted by the minister this afternoon is as bright as it ought to be. While he went overseas to try to get markets for Canadian producers, he might have barred the back-door before he left so as not to let too much come in; for, after all, it is not much use selling on one side and taking it in on the other.

I have here a few figures which I should like to quote. From January 1 to September 30 of this year—September being the last month for which we have figures—according to the bureau of statistics we allowed into this country over 34 million pounds of United States pork and pork products of a value of $3,405,530.

Mr. GARDINER: Nearly all in the first two months.

Mr. GRAYDON: I will take the minister up on that. He is always very good at figures although he did leave some important ones at home this afternoon. Perhaps these are some figures he has not seen. In the first two months exporters to Canada did pretty well; in January we bought over eight million pounds and in February nearly fifteen million. But we have not dried up the source because in the following months our imports were:

	Pounds
March	2,086,000
April	1,600,000
May	1,827,000
June	1,353,000

Even in September we have over 1,500,000 pounds of pork and pork products coming from the United States.

Mr. GARDINER: It is all in the quota.

Mr. GRAYDON: That brings me to something the minister said this afternoon. Some mention was made of apples and other fresh fruits and vegetables. When the minister talked about the war being the cause of the troubles of our fruit and vegetable growers he went a long way to find a cause, for this is something which has been before this house for a good length of time, as he well knows. He had better make a trip to Washington before he loses the idea of travelling; it would be a good bit of business for him.

Mr. GARDINER: I was just quoting the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation.

Mr. GRAYDON: I understood he was one man the minister never quoted. We have this question of fresh fruits and vegetables in which the minister is so much interested; I wish he had shown more interest earlier. This is the position with regard to fresh fruits and vegetables entering Canada from the United States in 1939, the year in which the war broke out. We brought in from the United States fresh fruits to a value of $13·5 millions, and fresh vegetables to the value of $5·4 millions, and certain other items bring the total close to $21 millions. We shall see what has happened this year.

The worst feature of this is that not only are we taking this market from the fruit and vegetable growers of Canada, but look at our foreign exchange position with regard to purchases of war materials. Everybody in Canada knows that this government needs every dollar it can get its hands on to buy materials to fight this war, and much of those materials come from the United States. Yet up to the end of September, 1940, this government has allowed to come into this country nearly $12·5 millions of fresh fruits and over $5 millions of fresh vegetables—in line with what we imported in the same period of last year or preceding years.

Men who come from fruit and vegetable growing districts have pleaded for years with the government not to let the fruit and vegetable growers bear an unfair burden of the tariff arrangements between these countries. If ever there were a reason for doing something for these men and at the same time doing something vital for Canada, now is the time. I call upon the Minister of Agriculture and the government to help save our exchange position and at the same time remove this detriment to our fruit and vegetable growers. Let them act quickly, because action is long overdue. Whether they are right or wrong, there are among the farming population many people to whom I talk who believe that everything they sell is in a measure pegged in price. I have no objection to the pegging of the price of butter, as indicated in the newspapers yesterday, provided the pegging is going to take some of the profits from speculators in butter in Canada, but I do not think any of the consumers want to take the hide off the farmer in having the price of butter pegged. The farmer now says, "If you are going to peg all my prices you had better start to peg some of the high salaries being paid people in Ottawa in connection with our war effort," and that is only fair.

I only want to add that as far as Canada is concerned we in this country will have to go through a period of blood, sweat, toil and tears, as the Prime Minister of Great Britain once said. I believe we shall have to make greater sacrifices than we have made so far. I am sure the Canadian people will be glad to make those sacrifices, but in these times it is of the utmost importance that in a democracy such as this we have good leadership. I am going to ask the government to review the entire salary set-up, not only with regard to the war effort but in every other connection as well, in an endeavour to show the people that we are really serious in this business of beating Hitler and Mussolini. We in Canada no longer can expect to sit by and maintain the accepted standards of leisure, comfort and convenience. I think that day is hastening to a close. Let me warn the government that the world of yesterday will not be the world of to-morrow, so let us as a government, as a parliament and as a nation prepare for the changes which must come about. As the representatives of the Canadian people, for whom we speak, we pledge their support to the government so long as the government gives the right kind of leadership in carrying out Canada's part in this great empire effort.

I should like to conclude with the suggestion that parliament was called to meet this month principally for one purpose, namely, in order that the story of the government's war effort might be properly given to the Canadian people. There is only one subject in which the people of this country are interested now. They are not interested in whether it happened to be a Liberal, a Conservative, a member of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation or someone else who advanced some particular suggestion years ago. I want to tell the Minister of Agriculture that if he holds that belief he belongs to an antiquated political school.

Mr. GARDINER: Then how does my hon. friend explain an amendment dealing with agriculture?

Mr. GRAYDON: I am sorry the minister has been so busy talking to his neighbours. I thought I had given a complete explanation in that regard, and it may be that even some of the more important subjects with which I have dealt have escaped his attention as well. This war effort is the only thing that counts. I tell the minister it does not make any difference whether one party or another survives in this country, so long as we win this war. That is the main thing. I would like to see the minister, with all his ability, drop his partisanship from now on and continue along the line of the last two parts of his speech. He was wonderful then, and I was glad to be a Canadian with him; but I was not so glad when I listened to the first portion of his speech, and I hope that sort of thing is never repeated in this house.

We were called here to discuss the war effort, and to find out what the government have been doing. We gave the government a blank cheque. Perhaps I should not be carrying out my undertaking if I said anything about blank cheques; the Minister of Agriculture and I have a truce in connection with this matter, so I shall not again in this house bring up anything in that connection. But the government did obtain a blank cheque from parliament and from the people of Canada last year, and from time to time that blank cheque has been extended. There have been conferred upon the governor in council powers such as were not dreamed of in the past, but many people in Canada because of this change are not acquainted with the development and progress of our war effort. For that reason it became important that this session should be devoted to a thorough airing of the entire war effort of this country. I was amazed that the first two or three days of this session were not given over wholly to a complete story of what has been done by the various ministers; that was what I expected and that was what the Canadian people expected. That is what the people want. I should like to serve notice on the government this afternoon, not only on my own behalf but also on behalf of the party to which I belong, that the sooner they bring down full reports of our war effort, the better the people will like it. More than that, Mr. Speaker, anything less than the speediest possible elucidation of the situation will not satisfy Canada.

I leave that thought with the government this afternoon in the sincere and earnest hope that a disclosure of our entire war effort will show that something worth while has been done to help the empire and in particular to help good old England in her hour of trial.

Mr. F. W. GERSHAW (Medicine Hat): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to tell the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that we are glad to see him back in his place. We congratulate him upon his trip and we congratulate him upon his speech this afternoon. His words will bring fresh hope and courage to many of our Canadian producers. We will get good government only when we have a strong cabinet and a watchful opposition; but if the opposition claims the right to criticize every action taken by the government, surely the right of the government to reply should not be questioned.

Something has been said about Canada being soothed into a false sense of security. As I meet people throughout this country I certainly do not get that impression. I believe the Canadian people have done a marvellous job of preparing for the great struggle in which we are engaged; and as the days go by, I am sure the ministers will explain fully what great strides have been made towards turning Canada from a peacetime economy into a warlike camp. I should like to pay tribute to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), because during the many years in which he has led a large party in this country he has had one great aim and ambition, to keep united the various races and interests in this dominion and to maintain good will with our immediate neighbours. Now that the great testing time has come, Canada goes into this war as a united country, and our neighbours are in sympathy with us. Not only is this fact recognized throughout the length and breadth of the dominion; the Prime Minister of Great Britain, than whom there has been no greater, said this in part in a cable to the Prime Minister of Canada:

> I am glad to have this opportunity of thanking you personally for all you have done in the common cause, and especially in promoting harmony of sentiment throughout the new world. This deep understanding will be a great factor in . . . the rescue of Europe from a relapse into the dark ages.

With your gracious permission, Mr. Speaker, since hon. members are allowed wide latitude in this debate I should like to discuss some local problems, and also attempt to give the house some reasons, as I see them, why Canada is engaged in this great conflict.

As has been said here to-day, agriculture is the greatest industry in the country, because it provides our supplies of food. In the west we have 60,850,000 acres of improved farm lands, of which 38,320,000 acres are sown in different cereal crops and 17,850,000 acres are annually under summer-fallow, for moisture conservation and for the control and destruction of weeds. There is also in pasture and unbroken land an area of about 35,000,000 acres, used for the support of 3,900,000 cattle, 1,900,000 horses and 1,300,000 sheep.

Between the years 1929 and 1938, Canada experienced a series of crop failures owing to drought and soil drifting. The area involved corresponds closely with what is known as the Palliser triangle. In 1860 the British government sent to Canada a man named Palliser to make a survey of the western country. He carefully observed the nature of vegetation he found on the land, and marked out an area beginning in the western part of Manitoba, running northward and westward to Saskatoon and Battleford, and then south and westward to the Rocky mountains, at a point just west of Lethbridge. The base of that triangle is the international boundary line. This area, he reported, would not support a farming population.

To-day this area corresponds generally with the area under the control of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. In 1937, one of the worst years, the average yield in the area was only 2·6 bushels an acre. In 1939, which was not so bad, by any means, the 300,000 farmers each received an average income of only $1,605. I am sure hon. members will realize that this small amount would not go far toward paying for machinery and hired help, as well as providing other necessities of farm life.

Doctor Archibald, who has compiled most of the figures I have before me, points out further that various governments, and particularly the one now in office, have done a great deal to help those engaged in agriculture in that district, and throughout western Canada generally. For instance, 200,000,000 trees have been distributed. What has been learned in the light of recent discoveries seems to indicate that different methods of agriculture will bring better results, as climate and soil conditions are better understood. Then, 3,454 stock watering dams have been constructed, to provide water for live stock. In addition, 9,945 dug-outs and 833 irrigation projects have been completed. Marginal lands for some thirty community pastures, with an average acreage of 20,000 acres each, have been procured. Ninety per cent of the land has been covered by recent soil surveys. Development by experimental farms of early ripening wheat, such as marquis wheat, has in many instances saved crops from early frost damage. Reclamation stations and regrassing demonstrations have been established at about 600 points.

Then, in order to help the man who, through no fault of his own had experienced a crop failure, some 58,000 farmers were paid an acreage bonus, because they received such a small yield from their land. These payments have cost the government about $12,000,000, and about $2,000,000 of the amount has been collected by a tax of one per cent on all grains.

In addition, about 204 agricultural improvement associations were formed. I see great possibilities in these organizations, because men from certain districts with similar problems may gather together, pool their experience, work out policies and advise the government about their particular districts. They have rendered a great service in connection with the distribution of seed, and matters of that kind.

The wheat problem will be fully discussed during this session. I can say only that it is fortunate the government has stepped in to buy wheat. Otherwise there would be little or no market for it. While the farmers are receiving a price below the cost of production, yet I say it is a price better than could be obtained in any other way. Great help has been given the live stock industry through the trade treaties which have been made. If there is one policy which has worked out successfully, I would say it has been the trade policy of the government. We now have admission to the great markets in the United States. We have generous quotas, and the rates of duty are about half of what they were in previous days.

Many other things have been done to help the farmer. Yet, every hon. member coming from western Canada must be convinced that, so far as the farming industry is concerned, we are still almost in a state of crisis. If one drives through the country he will see buildings falling in ruin; he will see homes lacking furniture and ordinary comforts. In that country there are women and children who lack the clothing they should have. Reading material, and many of the useful things which tend to make life on the farm less wearisome and lonesome are lacking in those prairie homes. Recently I visited a district consisting of quite a number of people, and yet in that section there was not one radio. Children and adults are not living under those ideal circumstances where one finds equality of opportunity. The children are greatly handicapped because of the distance they have to go to school, and the work they must do. Adults have to endure many hardships to make a living. I say, therefore, that there are things which the people in the west need, and need urgently.

We need more irrigation. There should not be one gallon of water allowed to trickle northward to the Arctic ocean, when it is badly needed in the drought stricken areas of the middle western part of Canada. There is an old Chinese saying that one picture is worth a thousand words. I am sure if some hon. members could see the results of irrigation schemes which have been completed, they would not hesitate to vote money for more schemes of a similar kind. In the spring time streams of water flow down from the sides of the mountains and the hills. But in the summer those streams dry up, and we have nothing left but the dusty, barren soil. In many instances dams can be constructed, and thereby great bodies of water can be saved and released when they are needed. In that way the farmers may keep beef cattle or milch cows for the benefit of their children. They may plant gardens, and produce flowers and things of that sort, which would make their homes more home-like. No investment could give better results.

Then we need good roads. We have not a satisfactory trans-Canada highway at the present time. It is true that it has been gravelled, but in places the gravel is quite thin and the gumbo works up so that the gravel is down and the gumbo is up. The result is large lumps on the road, and the tourist from the United States comes once, but never again. He goes home and tells his neighbours not to come, and the result is that Canada loses considerable revenue. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) loses considerable exchange which he values so highly. I believe expenditures on roads would be money well spent. Good roads would attract more people to this country to help consume our surplus products and bring about a measure of prosperity.

It has been said that markets for our products, particularly wheat, are becoming hard to find. Such being the case, we should divert our efforts to the growing of crops that can be sold. Britain, a thickly populated country, produces something like 22 per cent of the sugar she consumes. The United States produces something like 25 per cent of its consumption, but Canada, a sparsely populated country, produces only 15 per cent. I believe the encouragement of this industry would help to do away with our great surpluses of wheat and bring about more prosperity. There are other things we need, such as social legislation to provide for the aged and the sick. There should be a more equitable relationship between the prices of those commodities we have to buy and what we receive for the products and services which we have to sell. If that is brought about, it will be much easier to balance the budget in the average home.

For the remainder of my time I should like to discuss that great issue which is to the fore in all countries of the world at the present time. Why is Canada fighting? We are fighting for self-preservation. For two hundred and fifty years Great Britain has known that her safety depended upon the sea lanes being kept open and the countries of Europe being prevented from coming under the domination of any one power. The sea lanes must be kept open in order that Great Britain may bring in the foodstuffs necessary for her great population. When Hitler showed by his repeated aggressions that his ambition was conquest, the very existence of Britain was endangered. What did Britain stand to lose? After a long struggle through the centuries, after many trials and errors, her people evolved a civilization based upon a Christian code, based upon honour, a civilization having the freedom of democracy. Why should all this be surrendered for a lower state of civilization? It has cost the people of Britain dearly to gain what they have. Governments have fallen, kings have been dethroned and beheaded, and much blood has been shed. We of the present day, as custodians of what has been won in the past, must not surrender these precious things.

We do not want a civilization under a dictatorship where our citizens would not be allowed to criticize the acts of the government. We do not want a civilization where of freedom there would be none, where opposition would not be tolerated for a moment or be punished by death or internment. The continent of Europe is under the control of dictators. There is not one public speaker on the platform or over the radio, there is not one editor who dares to express opinions different from those held by the dictators. We are fighting for our empire and for our liberties, but we are also fighting for something more. We are fighting to maintain Anglo-Saxon ideals; we are fighting to preserve a country where there is more and more of self-government, where there is a greater abundance of comfort and the good things of this world. We are fighting to preserve a civilization which has less of that monstrous doctrine that might is right.

Defeat means that we shall be a vassal state. We are fighting for our possessions, but that is the least of the things for which we are fighting. Sacrifices are not being made to preserve just our material wealth. We are fighting in the interests of mankind in general. We have a vision of a land fit for heroes. We are fighting for a better world where there will be no unprovoked aggression, where women and children will not be heartlessly bombed. I should like to compare the aspirations of the heads of the two chief combatants in this struggle. Hitler says that Germany will be mistress of the sphere, that she will hold that position by the power of her victorious sword. He says that Germans must show that they are born to be masters. He says that their destiny is to master Europe. He might have said the rest of the world. It will be noticed that he proposes to govern by the sword. There are to be overlords and underlings.

I should like to compare that statement with one made by a British cabinet minister. He said that when the time comes we will liberate the nations of the world and build a new order based on cooperation, tolerance and mutual good-will. Hitler makes everyone his servant; they all must serve his purpose. Mr. Churchill has told us that the public men of Great Britain are proud to be the servants of the people, that they would be ashamed to be their masters. During the last year or so the King and Queen of Great Britain and Canada and our sister nations have endeared themselves to our hearts. Mussolini travels in an armoured train which is heavily guarded. Hitler travels in one even more strongly protected and he hides away in a rock-bound shelter high up in a mountain fortress. The king and queen have visited the bombed areas of London absolutely unguarded in order to encourage and cheer the hearts of their humblest subjects.

The British people high and low are undaunted by the evil that has befallen them. There has been no grander spectacle in history. This has been one of the finest things that has developed in our civilization. We are fighting for an ideal. We are fighting for a way of life. We are fighting for a legacy which we are to hand on to the generations to follow, that we hope, will never experience the terrible things which have been experienced by this generation. The president of the Canadian legion expresses it in this way:

> We must look to the future with ever increasing confidence and hope and faith. The month before us may seem dark but beyond that darkness a light shines. It is the light of freedom, of love of charity. When the hate and lust of our enemies have vanished for all time we shall emerge into a world better and brighter than it has ever been before.

In closing I should like to place on Hansard something that Mr. Churchill has said which I believe will appeal and has appealed to the people of Canada from shore to shore. It expresses something of the undaunted courage of the British people. Mr. Churchill said:

> We shall go on to the end. We shall fight in France, on the seas and oceans. We shall fight with growing confidence and growing strength in the air.
> We shall defend our island whatever the cost may be. We shall fight on the beaches and the landing grounds, in the fields, in the streets and on the hills. We shall never surrender. And even if, which I do not for a moment believe, this island or a large part of it were subjugated and starving, then our empire beyond the seas, armed and guarded by the British fleet, will carry on its struggle until in God's good time the new world with all its power and might steps forth to the liberation and rescue of the old.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. JAMES SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak this evening I must first thank those who made it possible for me to speak so early in this debate. I am quite aware that there are many who are quite senior members to me who would like to speak this evening, and since my leave has expired and I am returning to my post to-night I feel grateful to them for having yielded me this opportunity.

To-night I am speaking not so much as the member for Vancouver North, but as one who has had the good fortune to be accepted in one of the services. I regard it as good fortune because we who are private members have no more rights and no more exemptions than any other citizen of this country. So we can regard it as good fortune to be in an active service unit. It may be that some of my constituents feel that because I am in the service I cannot give to the affairs of my riding the time and consideration which they should have. I can reassure my constituents. Perhaps I have suffered some handicaps, but the minister and my colleagues among the private members have been more than kind in seeing that the affairs of my riding have not been neglected.

I regret exceedingly that I was not in the house last night to hear my hon. friend the member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White) speak. Although we are both in active service I must say that there is little in his speech with which I can agree. That, probably, is a good sign of a democracy—that even in a service where men in the positions we hold may be expected, if they think at all, to think the same, we hold these diverse opinions.

I think I can say, on behalf of other hon. members on our side who are in the service, that we feel strongly about the inference one would draw from the opening paragraph of the hon. member's speech, that he regarded it as a virtue not to have had a commission from this government. I should like to point out to the hon. member that the great majority of the men in the active service of Canada to-day are not professional soldiers; they are ordinary peace-loving citizens during times of peace. When we joined up we did so, not under a Liberal government or any other government, but as citizens entering the Canadian army. I should like to point out, too, that we private members who are fortunate enough to be in the service are not in it because we are in politics. I can assure him, as can many other hon. members, that we are in it despite the fact that we are in politics, because the recruiting officers and the chiefs of staff of the three services have shown a real reluctance to have members of parliament in their ranks—perhaps an understandable reluctance based on a fear that we would take advantage of our position. Other members of this house have tried since the beginning of the war to enlist and would, I believe, have been in the service a long time ago had it not been for the fact that they were in politics.

The hon. member made some mention of "lightning promotions." The only promotion I know of among hon. members who have enlisted is the promotion recently given, and—I can say this from the bottom of my heart—most deservedly given to the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey), who is now at Trenton camp doing a wonderful job. That was no "lightning promotion"; it was to my mind a normal promotion somewhat overdue.

Perhaps I may be allowed in a kind way to say just one more thing to the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough. He said that his was not a political appointment from this government. He was appointed in August, 1930. Hon. members may recall that the government of the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett was elected in July, 1930.

The whole tenor of my speech will be a little different from that of my hon. friend, in that I do not think this house is the proper place in which to bring up a great number of quibbling little matters, for instance as to whether certain units of the non-permanent active militia went to camp with one, or two, army shirts. Surely one who has the rights of a member of parliament should bring these matters directly to the minister concerned—the one man who more than any other wants to see that the army is run as efficiently as possible and who will do everything in his power to that end.

There has been criticism of delay in supplying certain articles, such as socks and shirts, to the non-permanent active militia. But these men were not naked; all of them had clothes and shirts of their own. They, too, realized, I think, that we are in a war. Those who saw the terrible pictures which were shown early last week, by the courtesy of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon), of the German war effort and the way in which the Germans smashed through the Netherlands, will realize that whether or not the non-permanent active militia were all outfitted completely at the start does not matter very much. The thing which matters is, whether our first line, the navy and the air force, is being properly equipped as fast as this country can equip it. Speaking for the only service I know, the air force, I can say in this house to-night that it is.

I do not intend to speak at length on the general plan or the success of the empire air training scheme. The activities of the air force generally have been widely discussed and have received abundant praise from independent military authorities in this country and in the United States, and, what is most important of all, from those authorities in the United Kingdom who are fighting the fight in the air and who should know whether or not this scheme, which is now becoming the back-bone of the defence of Britain, and what we hope will soon be the battle of Germany, is succeeding.

A great deal has been said about the wonderful organization of the air ministry in their development of this empire air training scheme. Sufficient credit will never be given to the minister, the deputy minister and the air staff in the tremendous task they have faced, one phase of which, for example, has been to enlarge a force which numbered a thousand a year ago in the active force to over thirty thousand at the present time.

I do not intend here to enumerate the fields and hangars and planes, or the instructors and the pilots turned out already. That has been done, that will be done by people more competent than I am to speak, but I will say that one thing has been overlooked. This scheme could not have succeeded as it has, and as it will, if it depended only upon the work of the minister, the deputy minister and the air staff. This plan has succeeded mainly because the rank and file of the air force, the aircraftmen, the non-commissioned officers, the warrant officers and the junior officers, have faith and confidence in the staff; and the reason why they have that confidence is that they know that the men heading this effort are no mere brass hats; the heads of the air force are men who fought in the last war, know what war is and will stand for no red tape. That, to my mind, after seeing a little of the force, in a very lowly rank, is the real reason why this government, why the minister and why his excellent organization have functioned so well.

I do not intend to enlarge upon how well the empire air training scheme is progressing. I think it would be as wrong for me to say here to-night, in connection with the first classes that are turned out, how many pilots, how many observers and how many gunners are being sent overseas, as it was for another man in another place to say recently how many British airmen were planning to make the hazardous trip across the submarine-infested ocean. I did not, however, come here to speak praise of the air force organization; it speaks for itself. I do, however, want to speak as a man in the service and as a member trying to represent these great numbers of voters who have left their ridings and are now living in barracks and camps and who deserve an active voice in this house. I am going to bring up two or three little points which to them are important.

The first is the matter of rentals in soldier towns. As hon. members know, in a great number of the air force and soldier camps the wives of the men, especially those without families, have tried to follow and stay near their men as long as possible. In the little villages alongside these encampments this has led to unwarranted profiteering. These women who want to stay with their men are naturally not very well off. The government has begun recently to control these rentals in the larger towns. May I ask them to extend that control as soon as possible to the little towns in the neighbourhood of air force and service camps, because to attempt to profiteer at the expense of these soldiers' families who want to be near their men as long as they can, seems the harshest of all sorts of profiteering.

There is also the matter of rentals in industrial centres which have boomed because of war activities. In these centres also there have been instances of rental profiteering. In North Vancouver and in the town of Powell River activity has increased, there has been a demand for space, and rentals have been rising. I received this morning a letter from a soldier's wife in Powell River who complained of her rent being raised, the inference being that these workers coming in can pay more and therefore she is being squeezed out. I hope the government will as soon as possible extend the rent control to these smaller centres.

Another matter about industrial war activity that I might mention in relation to my own riding is the problem of the shipyards in North Vancouver. These are the best shipyards on the Pacific coast, perhaps the best in Canada. There was considerable trouble a year ago with regard to awarding government contracts there because of the fact that labour costs in British Columbia are higher. We are proud of that in British Columbia, in that we have a higher standard of living than the rest of Canada, but that militated against our getting the contracts. I am glad to say that the minister did place contracts for mine-sweepers and corvettes, but these ships have now been built and the shipyards are laying off their men. We have read rumours that cargo boats are to be built in the United States for the British government, and certain United States yards are getting ready for a shipbuilding programme. As our men are being laid off, there are agents in North Vancouver now attempting to induce our workers to go to Bremerton when their work in North Vancouver is finished. These shipyard workers I believe are just as important to the war activities of this country as are the riggers and fitters in the airport across the harbour, and must be kept employed here.

There is one question in the mind of every soldier, sailor and airman in Canada at the present time. Every night now when they pick up a newspaper they want to see what parliament has done about this matter of transportation on leave. There has been perhaps a good deal of nonsense talked by people who knew little about the matter, but whose hearts cry out for soldiers to get every concession the government can give them before they go overseas. One of the most popular misconceptions is that leave is one of the soldier's rights. The soldiers and airmen understand that leave is not a right, it is a privilege. If their conduct has been good and if the service at the time can spare them, certain leaves may be granted: in the air force, for example, thirty-six hours at the week-ends in which they are not on duty; forty-eight hours once a month, and two weeks once every six months. These leaves are not necessarily for the men to return to their homes; these men joined up to fight a war and certainly they do not expect to get home for every forty-eight hours' leave. Leaves are for relaxation and refreshment and to get away for a little while from army discipline. There is, however, to every man in the service one great attraction, that of home. In the kit box of the airman in the barracks are pictures of those he left behind. When they talk in the barracks, around the hangars, it is of their home towns and the friends there. When they think they are going overseas, it is only natural to desire to go home; that desire is very strong.

It was pointed out last night that the average soldier who has a home and a wife to whom he has assigned pay; in other words, the man who is anxious to go home, has for himself at the most $19 a month. That may be enough for a man at Petawawa whose home is in Ontario to get home, but it will not finance a trip from Vancouver back east or vice versa. I do not suggest for a moment that free transportation should be given to soldiers on the short leaves, but I do think, and I believe the people of Canada think, and certainly the soldiers, sailors and airmen feel that the government might give them the bare cost of transportation on their semi-annual two weeks' leave. In the Royal Air Force, in fact in all the services in the old country, that is done. Of course distances there are shorter, travel does not cost so much as here, with our great distances. But that argument can be used just as truly the other way. The smaller fares for those short distances can be more easily paid by the British soldier than the fares for the long distances that some of our soldiers have to travel. From my conversations with people coming across Canada recently I am convinced that the people feel that this thing should be granted no matter what the cost. We in this house are so used to appealing to the government for money that perhaps we tend to forget that it is not the government's own money, it is the money of the people of Canada which they have entrusted to the government to spend. I believe this is one thing which the people of Canada do wish for their soldiers, and this adds strength to our plea that at least on their long leaves some consideration be given to provide free transportation—not for officers, because they can provide their own, but for the men at $1.30 a day, soldiers, sailors and airmen.

One other question relating to leave which I should like to bring up is the inequality of leave, especially in the air force, as far as this two weeks' leave is concerned. The air force was recruited, not as the army was, by localities; the air force is recruited on a national scale from Victoria to Halifax. The men pour into central pools and are then sent out to stations as they are needed, without regard to the localities from which they come. Yet, when their two weeks' leave is granted, if it can be granted, it is inequitable. For example, we have a number of large training centres in Ontario. The boys from British Columbia who get two weeks' leave have really five or six days' leave, by the time they travel home and back. If a man has the good fortune to be close to his home he gets twelve or fourteen days. I might go further and take the hon. member who spoke last night as an example. The government have ruled that we members are entitled only to the army leave that we get as ordinary soldiers. It may be a little hard on us, but as far as the feeling of the force is concerned it is an excellent thing that we get no special privileges. On the one hand a soldier member who lives in Ontario can get to the house for almost his whole fourteen days' leave, but my colleague the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Chambers) or myself get at the most seven days. I feel that some consideration should be given to this matter by the Department of National Defence. Here again the Royal Air Force have taken this into consideration. In their most recent orders regarding leave they say:

> Personnel proceeding on leave to and from the Orkney and Shetland islands are to be granted sufficient total leave to ensure that they have seven days at home.

I would respectfully suggest to the government that some such provision also be made for the long leaves of those who must travel great distances to get home.

There is one special plea I should like to make to-night for one very special group, the air crews. Under the empire air training scheme these men graduate in classes, and they are given what is called a last leave of ten days in which to return to their homes. I think that expression "last leave" is fitting in this instance, because they know, as we do, that a great number of them will never return, and that is their last chance to see those whom they leave behind. Here again the same situation obtains; the British Columbia boy who has been trained at Trenton, for example, where so many of them finish, will have only two days of his last leave to spend at home. It is true that they receive half fare warrants on the trains. I suggest that this one special group, to which Winston Churchill must have referred when he used the expression that has become immortal that "never in history have so many owed so much to so few"; this special group who will be hurtling through the air in Hurricanes and Spitfires, be given half fare warrants not on the trains but on the trans-Canada planes, so that they may have at least eight of their ten days at home.

The air training scheme has become really an empire scheme within the last two months, with the arrival of the Australians and New Zealanders. We in Vancouver have had the pleasure of seeing these recruits pass through our city, and it can justly be said that they are the cream of the antipodes. They have come a long way; they get here after spending three weeks at sea. We all know that first impressions are the most lasting, yet these men are hurried through our city to their training centres. We all agree that speed is the main essential of this empire air training scheme, but the people of Vancouver would like to do something for these Australians and New Zealanders as they pass through, to show them how Canada feels about their arrival. The last contingent arrived in Vancouver at six o'clock in the evening, after a voyage lasting three weeks, and at seven-fifteen they left for a station on the plains of Saskatchewan. I do not know whether the minister is the proper person to approach, or whether this should be said to the Australian authorities, but I should like to suggest that at least one day and one night be allowed between disembarkation and the trip to the prairies, in order that two things may be accomplished: first, that these men may be given a proper reception in the loveliest city of Canada and, second, that the people of Vancouver may have an opportunity to show these men, who have come so far to fight in the common cause, what they can do for them. Various service organizations in our city are only too willing to undertake in rotation the entertainment of each contingent as it arrives.

In closing I should like to say one thing to the minister and the government on behalf of the rank and file of the air force. They believe in this government; especially they believe in the minister and staff who are running the air force. That is why they do not mind going into camps that may be not quite finished, perhaps without water for a day or so, without public complaint. They grouse privately, but as we all know, soldiers always grouse. These men understand the driving necessity of expanding operations as quickly as possible. They are willing to overlook minor discomforts because they realize that this is a war. On behalf of these men, the riggers, the fitters, the engineers and the air crews, I say to this government and to the minister in particular, "Keep at it the way you are going".

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate this evening I should like first to correct the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who this afternoon in his usual style attempted to define the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation programme as state socialism, although of course he did not bother to define what he meant by state socialism. The minister knows better than that what is the programme of this party. He disagrees with that programme. That is his privilege, but that is no reason for misrepresenting it. As has been stated many times in this house, this party looks to the formation of a cooperative society in Canada under which the economic resources of the country will be used for the welfare of all its people. This is a noble aim, and the desirability of this objective is not to be diminished a bit by the slurs of the minister. As a matter of fact his recent visit to Great Britain proved the correctness of our policy. He did not go as a private individual from Canada to deal with private interests in Great Britain; he went as a responsible government minister to negotiate with responsible government officials in that country, and it was the British government that decided what and how much to buy, and what not to buy. That decision was based not on profit or privilege but on a plan which took into account the needs of the people in their struggle against Hitler. The conditions of the war have persuaded the British government to put into effect the policies and controls advocated by the British labour party, which are the same as the policies advocated by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in Canada.

There are two classes of people who want to win this war, and for two different reasons. One class, the minority, want to win it in order to maintain the present system and the privileges which they enjoy under it. The other class, the majority, want to win this war in order to preserve that measure of democracy we now enjoy, and on this basis to build a better and wider democracy in the economic as well as in the political field. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation belongs to this latter class.

It is my intention, Mr. Speaker, to speak to-night principally on domestic matters, and I hope no hon. member will rise in his place and remind me that there is a war on. We in Saskatchewan realize that fact more, if possible, than the people in any other part of this country. During the last war we had the greatest enlistment, according to population, of any province, and I believe that is the case again to-day. Our main industry, the growing of wheat, is selling its production to the mother country at less than cost, and making a greater sacrifice than is being made by any other industry in Canada. Both capital and industry have stated in no uncertain terms that they will not engage in a one hundred per cent war effort until they receive what they deem to be a just return on their capital investment, and this principle has been acknowledged as fair by the government. Let me quote the words of the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) on this point, as contained in a news-letter issued recently:

> . . . it is not in the public interest in a time of crisis, that a contractor should be out of pocket in fulfilling a national need. Obviously, no good end is served by letting contracts on a financial basis which would cripple the contractor, and so limit the productive facilities of the dominion.

Surely when this principle is recognized by the government as being fair when applied to every other industry, it should obtain also in connection with agriculture. I think it ill becomes either hon. members or the public press to criticize the west or the agricultural industry when all they ask is equal treatment at this or any other time. We in Canada realize that the war is the paramount issue to-day, and we all stand united behind the government in an effort to bring it to a speedy and successful conclusion. Last session we gave the government almost unlimited powers, but now many of us view with alarm the use to which the government is putting those powers, by transferring them to boards and controllers who are responsible only to the government and who have been appointed largely on the recommendation of the industries they control. We are willing to give the government unlimited powers in military matters, but when it comes to civil and domestic affairs we believe that parliament should be supreme. The government pays many of these men a dollar a year and their expenses. Industry supplies them, and after the war is over, industry is going to take care of them again. It is only plain common sense to realize that while nominally they work for the government, it is industry that controls them.

It is largely, however, with the question of wheat that I wish to deal to-night. For the last twelve years or more the government has been dealing with this matter, without as yet having come to any definite long-term policy. They have dealt with it from year to year as emergencies have arisen.

A number of years ago when it was proposed to set up an international committee of wheat experts to study the case, this government was not too enthusiastic. Nevertheless it is only by the setting up of some such committee, and by obtaining some definite relationship between supply and demand that we are ever going to be able permanently to solve our difficulties. We are faced to-day with a huge surplus of wheat. This afternoon the Minister of Agriculture gave us the figures. We have at least two full years' supply on hand. Statistics show that we shall not have this year's crop moved off the farms until next August. What about the next year? Are we again going to leave everything to the last minute, and at the last minute bring in a bill which does not deal with the situation in detail?

The day after I arrived home following the last session, a farmer drove into my yard and told me that on August 7 he had delivered a carload of barley to the elevator. On August 8 the elevator agent received notice that on August 6 a regulation had been passed placing a five-bushel quota on barley. It developed that in receiving the grain the agent had been outside the law, and rendered himself subject to a heavy fine. He immediately drove to the farmer's place and asked him to remove the grain, because he could not obtain a permit for shipping. As a result, the farmer came to see me, and to ask what he ought to do about the matter. I told him he had better wait for a while to see if the government would not do something about it. Finally, a few days after this incident, the regulation was changed and the farmer was permitted to ship his grain.

I delivered a quantity of last year's wheat to an elevator, in order to obtain harvesting expenses. The wheat was accepted, but when I came to get settlement for it I found that because I had already delivered the 5,000-bushel quota last year, the board would not accept it. It had to be sold on the open market. There were thousands more bushels of grain then on the open market than it would absorb. Therefore my year's quota was filled. I could neither deliver any more wheat, nor receive pay for that which I had delivered. Some four weeks later, the board decided to accept all such wheat, and I was paid for it. Yet to-day the board is prosecuting other farmers who delivered over the 5,000-bushel quota last fall. Why the difference?

Why do I relate these instances? I do so simply to show the utter confusion which existed last summer after some of these ill-conceived regulations were issued. We do not want that to happen again next year. I believe at this time the government should appoint a full-time minister of agriculture. It should appoint a special committee or a commission with power to call before it witnesses and marketing experts. The recommendations and suggestions made before such a commission should, if acceptable to the government, be incorporated in a bill passed through this House of Commons before March 15, 1941. This action is necessary, so that the west may know what the government will require of them before seeding operations are begun next spring.

It would appear at the present time that some reduction in the amount of wheat grown next year would be advisable. Any reduction in acreage, however, should be authorized only after consultation with the United Kingdom as to its requirements, and only when we are assured that we have at least two years' supply on hand. If such action is necessary, how best can it be carried out? Some people suggest that it can be done by economic pressure. They urge that if we let the price of wheat go down to 25 cents a bushel, instead of 50 cents as it is to-day, the farmer will stop growing it.

Past experience does not prove this to be so; rather it has proved the contrary. In 1932 and 1933, when wheat was at its lowest level in 400 years, there was no decrease in acreage. This is what often happens: I, as a farmer, may have certain commitments to meet. Let us say that I may have a $400 payment on my land, a $100 payment for taxes, and a $500 payment for machinery. Wheat is my main cash crop. I know that at the present 50-cent price I must raise 2,000 bushels in order to meet those payments. But if wheat were only 25 cents a bushel, those payments would remain the same. Immediately I look round to see whether I can raise 4,000 bushels. It may be that I have some raw land which I could break up; it may be that I have some grass land which could be utilized. In short, I will do anything to raise more wheat so that I may meet my obligations.

That is what has been happening in the west. The lower the price of wheat, the more wheat the farmers are going to raise, so that they may meet their debts. Therefore, any proposed reduction in acreage, if it is to be successful, must be accomplished by a better price for what is grown, or a reduction in farmers' debts. A blanket reduction in acreage would admittedly be unfair. The man who is maintaining his family on a small acreage should not be asked to reduce that acreage to the same extent as the large operator might have to reduce. Some fair plan can and should be worked out, if it is decided that a reduction in acreage is advisable.

We believe that at this time the government should make a full statement respecting the 1939 crop. Last year when we asked what the board had received for the crop, we were told that it was not in the public interest to disclose that information. When we wanted to know the amounts remaining to be sold, we were told again that it was not in the public interest to give out that information. But the only information which was of value to the enemy was disclosed by the government, to save its own face; I refer to the information to the effect that 170,000,000 bushels of wheat which had been purchased still remained in Canada. The disclosure of that information made it clear that the enemy would still have a chance of sinking that amount of wheat. To-day the Germans are not interested in what Great Britain is paying for wheat, or indeed in whether or not she has paid for it. The enemy is interested in the measures taken to ship the wheat. Germany is not fighting this war with dollars and cents; she is fighting it with tanks, aeroplanes, guns and men; and the sooner we realize that fact in Canada, and begin to do likewise, the better for all of us.

There is no legitimate reason why the government should not give a detailed statement of the 1939 crop, to date, and thereby let the west know if it is going to get the ten cents a bushel promised on the eve of the last election by the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Gardiner). Perhaps he is saving that money to pay on the eve of the next election. On what they have handled the pools have made a five-cent payment over the board price. The line elevators have made a smaller payment, and we feel that the government should make a complete statement at as early a date as possible.

We believe that through the wheat board the government should take full control of all grain handling facilities in Canada, and for the duration of the war operate them at cost. There is no doubt that money is going to be made—and plenty of it—in the storage of the grain on hand. Why should private individuals or companies be permitted to make a profit out of a situation which has developed because of the war? Why should they make those profits at the expense of the growers and consumers of grain, or out of the pockets of the taxpayers?

In paying storage to the farmer as well as to the elevator companies, the government took a step in the right direction. In failing, however, to give the farmers an advance on grain so stored, they have again deliberately played into the hands of the grain trade. To-day the companies may construct all the storage space they like. Immediately it is constructed, they notify the board that so much more space is available. The quota is raised and, in order to obtain a little cash, the farmer takes grain out of his own storage and turns it over to the storage operated by a company. The refusal of the government to make an advance on grain stored on the farm is equivalent to a guarantee to the elevator companies that all their available space will be kept filled as long as there is a bushel of wheat left on the farm. On the other hand, an advance would have meant that the farmer could have received enough to meet his immediate obligations. He could have left the grain on the farm until the spring, and received the full benefit of the act.

We contend that the government should change the basis of paying for wheat. Instead of the price being 70 cents a bushel f.o.b. Fort William, the same price should be paid for the same quality wheat, no matter where the farmer resides. It costs as much or more to grow a bushel of wheat in the Peace River district than it does in Winnipeg, and it does not seem fair that the government should bonus the growers in one section of the country more than those in another section. This principle has been established already—Vancouver was made a port of delivery along with Fort William. Growers in certain parts of Alberta receive at the present time more for their grain than growers in Saskatchewan, although their grain is shipped to Fort William. I understand that the board pays the difference out of the general fund. We contend that payments for wheat should be the same to all farmers, that the basis of payment should be f.o.b. the local point.

There is also the matter of domestic freight rates. These have been under discussion at various times during the past few years, and it seems that this would be an opportune time to have something definite done. It costs about 30 cents a bushel for barley and 24 cents a bushel for oats to ship from the average shipping point in the west to the Ottawa valley. This is more than is paid to the farmer in the west for his grain. These rates are almost prohibitive, and a reduction would contribute to the benefit of the shipper as well as of the consumer in eastern Canada. With prices of dairy products being fixed by the government, feeders in eastern Canada cannot afford to pay this tariff. Hog raisers in eastern Canada were scarcely breaking even before, and with the lower prices to be received under the new agreement, it will be even more difficult for them to get along.

When the Minister of Agriculture announced his wheat legislation two years ago, he stated that he was introducing it in order to keep the small farmer on the land and to make the family farm possible. I can assure him that after two years' operation, this legislation is having exactly the opposite effect. The small farmer is going broke to-day with the spread that exists between what he receives for his grain and what he has to pay for what he buys. Only the farmer with a large acreage, with modern equipment and good land, can produce wheat at 50 cents a bushel and live.

In the constituency of Melfort is the Carrot river valley, probably the finest farming area in western Canada. Some of my friends from the Rosetown area or from the Soo line may dispute this statement, but the fact remains that for the last twenty years we have had the most consistent production of good crops of almost any area in Canada. But round the fringe of this area lies an area of marginal land. Under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act the government placed settlers from the dried-out areas upon homesteads in this section. Seventy-five per cent of the farms in it are either quarter or half sections, the family-size farm. Three weeks ago I was in one of these areas in order to hold a meeting and I arrived in a village or hamlet at about seven o'clock. The storekeeper told me he had a case which he wanted to bring to my attention, to see if something could be done about it.

[Mr. Wright.]

He took me down to the edge of the village to a little log shack with a tar-paper roof about twelve feet square. We rapped at the door, but there was no answer. We went in and found an old lantern hanging on the wall. There was a rough board bunk in one corner filled with hay, a rough board table, two blocks of wood serving as chairs, and an old tin heater. In the bunk was an old man rolled up in a gray blanket. We tried to wake him up in order to get some information, but he seemed to be past the point of being able to take care of himself. I asked the storekeeper about him, and he told me that as far as he could find out this man had come to Canada in 1901 and had homesteaded in the district in 1911. In 1920 he had lost his homestead and from then on had worked for lumber companies and different farmers in the district. Some five years before he had become unable to work and had used up what little capital he had in order to keep himself alive. Two years before, the municipality had endeavoured to get him an old age pension, but they were unable to establish his age. The municipality granted him a pension of $5 a month. He had been paying $1 a month as rent for the shack and what wood he required, and had been living on the other $4. About a year ago, he reached the state where he could hardly take care of himself and was finally spending about twenty hours a day in his bunk. He would get up, stagger over to the store to buy a loaf of bread and a piece of bologna, and then go back to his shack.

The storekeeper wanted to know if I could do something about the matter. The next day I reported the case to the mounted police, but they told me that there was nothing they could do, that the responsibility rested upon the municipality. I told them that if I had a dog or a horse which I was starving to death and this was reported by a neighbour, they would have me arrested for cruelty to animals. I told them that someone was responsible for this old man and that it was their duty to see that this responsibility was assumed. They said that the only thing they could do would be to telephone to the municipality, and they got in touch with the reeve, the clerk and the local health officer. Two days later I happened to be back in that municipality and I went to see the reeve. He told me that he had known of this case for some time, but it was not the only one in the municipality. He said that there were twelve other cases, some of them in worse condition.

He told me that the municipality was broke, that there were thousands of dollars of uncollected taxes. This year the crop had been frozen and hardly any taxes are being collected. He told me that they would like to place this man in a hospital, but that they owed the hospital thousands of dollars. The hospital was receiving only emergency cases for immediate operation. Apparently there is no place in Saskatchewan to which such a case can be sent. There are two private homes, but their charge is $1 per day, which the municipality could not pay. Apparently this man will have to freeze to death.

The next week I was in the district between Prince Albert and Nipawin. This district extends for one hundred miles on the north side of the Saskatchewan river, approximately one-half being in the constituency of Prince Albert, represented by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I visited the town of Smeaton, which is about half way between Prince Albert and Nipawin. While there, I met a deputation of citizens who had just been to interview the doctor in an effort to have him remain in the district. He had told them that he had some $3,500 or $3,600 in bills which he had not been able to collect, so he figured he would have to move out. I found that he was the only doctor in the one hundred miles between Prince Albert and Nipawin. In the four towns of Snowden, Smeaton, Shipman and Weirdale there are some 1,100 householders, representing a population of about 5,500. When this doctor pulls out, it will mean that these people will be from forty to fifty miles from medical attention.

I know the Prime Minister is a kind-hearted man. According to a recent newspaper report he takes his dog for a walk every day. While he is doing that, I should like him to remember that this winter there will be hundreds of mothers in his constituency who will have to drive forty to fifty miles in open sleighs in order to get their children to the nearest doctor. There will be other hundreds of mothers who will be giving birth to children without proper medical attention. This is the direct responsibility of this government because it is the economic policies introduced by this government which have brought about the present condition of the people of Saskatchewan. This afternoon the Minister of Agriculture referred to the 50-cent wheat policy, but I submit that the condition of these people is the direct result of that policy. Districts in western Canada of marginal or near-marginal land are broke as a direct result of the action of this government in protecting other industries while the farmer has to take the world price for what he has to sell.

I am not one of those who believe that the government can be Santa Claus to any class of people or any section at the expense of any other section, but I believe that it is the duty of the government to see that the national income is so distributed that all parts of the country and all classes of our people are able to obtain their fair share and enough of the national income to purchase the medical services, educational services and social services to which all self-respecting Canadian citizens are entitled. I urge any member of this house who may think that these conditions obtain to-day to read the report of the Sirois commission or look at the payments of income tax in the Toronto and Montreal districts and compare them with income tax payments in the three western provinces, and he will soon be disillusioned.

Take, for instance, the district extending from Montreal to Windsor. It is a small portion of the whole dominion but enjoys one-half of the national income. Is it any wonder that we in other parts of Canada object? Furthermore, into this area are being crowded over 75 per cent of our new war industries. Why not give the rest of Canada an even break? Are all the private members on the government side of the house satisfied with these conditions? If not, why do they not raise their voices in protest?

One way in which the government could assist the small farmer in the west at this time and establish a more equal distribution of income is by means of the processing tax, and it could be done at no extra cost to the government. We believe that the processing tax should be raised to 50 cents a bushel. Adequate steps should be taken by the war-time prices and trade board to see that no undue rise in the price of flour or bread resulted. The money so collected should be placed in a special fund and paid to the farmer as a bonus on the first 1,000 bushels of wheat raised on each farm. It should be paid to the actual farmer, not the mortgage company, or the absentee landlord such as the present Minister of Agriculture.

Before the adjournment of parliament in August, we asked that the government declare this an emergency year so that areas with a yield of twelve bushels or less to the acre might come under the acreage bonus scheme, and we again urge upon the government the necessity of such action being taken.

I should like to draw the attention of the government to a special condition obtaining in northeastern Saskatchewan, on account of the frost experienced there during every month last summer. Many of the settlers there have no gardens, not even potatoes.

They have a yield of from ten to twenty-five bushels of frozen wheat to the acre. I believe that in this and similar instances where grain is frozen, any township with a yield of less than twenty bushels to the acre of frozen wheat should be included under the acreage bonus scheme; that is, twenty, fifteen and ten bushels to the acre should be the basis of participation instead of, as at present, twelve, eight and four bushels. Twenty bushels of frozen wheat is worth less to the farmer than twelve bushels of No. 1 wheat, and it costs more to harvest.

Finally, I believe that if the government will give all classes of our people and all sections of the country an equal opportunity, it will have no difficulty in floating their war loans, in obtaining recruits, and no difficulty at all in having a body of satisfied labour which will contribute 100 per cent of its energies to our war effort. But if the government fails to give equality of opportunity to all classes of our people and to all sections of this country, we are bound to have trouble.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I should like first of all to compliment the mover of the address (Mr. Claxton) upon his able presentation and the broad national and international viewpoint he expressed. I should like also to compliment the seconder of the address, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras), upon the fine national viewpoint he expressed and his clear conception of conditions in his own riding and in the province of Manitoba from which he comes.

May I also compliment the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) upon the speech of a very high order which he delivered to the house yesterday afternoon.

When the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) commenced his blitzkrieg this afternoon, it reminded me of some things that happened on the floor of this house last session. There came to my mind the strenuous effort that was made by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) to have tanks manufactured in Canada, and I well remember the scorn that was heaped upon his head by the members of the ministry. Scorn was also poured upon the head of the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) when he urged that certain defects in aeroplanes being used by our air force be remedied. But I am happy to say that those defects have been remedied and that tanks are being built in this country. All honour to those two hon. gentlemen for the fight they put up in this house despite the scorn which was heaped upon their heads by the ministers of this government. In this connection I like to think of a passage in a book written by the late Lord Tweedsmuir before this government came into power. He wrote that when a government has such a commanding majority that it intimidates the opposition, democracy fails to function.

Much has happened since the adjournment of parliament on the 7th of August last. Nevertheless we still have a Liberal war conducted by the government of the day in Canada and we still have patronage rampant in many respects. I had hoped that at this session, following the address of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) and other ministers more directly concerned with Canada's war effort would have given the house an account of their stewardship. It seems to me that such an account would have avoided a great deal of unnecessary discussion. I am satisfied that a great deal of the discussion which must now necessarily take place would have been unnecessary if the house had had placed before it in detail an account of the stewardship of the various ministers and their departments. But that is not the order of the day.

The government have seen fit to attach to many departments highly paid propaganda writers who give out news but release only comments and opinions which are favourable to this government, and from what I can gather as to the government's future plans of press control and the release of news by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, I was not surprised to read in this morning's paper that the Minister of Munitions and Supply, who is in control of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, had stated that investigation of the broadcasting corporation was not necessary at this time, despite the fact that such an investigation has already been asked for by several speakers from the floor of the house this session.

Many thousands of people who loyally supported the government are to-day dissatisfied with Canada's present war effort, and they are anxious to know the facts as to what exactly is being done and what has been accomplished. These feelings are very well expressed in a letter appearing in the Toronto Globe and Mail of October 31 last, written by Major-General J. H. Elmsley (retired). Some members, I know, have doubts as to the standing of this eminent soldier and his services in the past, and therefore I quote from an editorial appearing in the Montreal Gazette of November 5, 1940, headed "A Soldier Critic," as it expresses the viewpoint of many thousands of people throughout this country. The editorial states:

Canada has not many finer soldiers than Major-General G. H. Elmsley, C.B., C.M.G., D.S.O., of Toronto. Now retired, General Elmsley has been a soldier all his life. He fought in South Africa and in the world war, holding important commands in the great conflict of 1914-18, and was afterwards D.O.C. of military district No. 10 in Winnipeg. Few men are better qualified to measure the merits or the defects of any military effort or enterprise, or to criticize more impartially. In a recent long letter to the Globe and Mail of Toronto this distinguished officer contrasted the meagre information supplied by the Canadian government in regard to the national war effort with the policy which is being pursued by the government of Britain, where Mr. Churchill and his colleagues "have taken their people wholly into their confidence regarding their hopes and fears, their successes and failures with the result that the people as a whole, irrespective of nationality, party or creed, are behind their government's war policy to the last man and woman."

There is a different situation in Canada, and the Canadian people are not responsible for it.

General Elmsley writes: "As far as can be recalled, on no occasion since the declaration of war has our Prime Minister given the public an appreciation of the general war situation based on the accurate and reliable information undoubtedly in his possession, nor at any time has he defined our war policy based on this information, and explained what measures have been taken or are to be taken to enforce this policy."

This complaint is not new. The fact that it has been reiterated so often renders less and less understandable the extraordinary disinclination of the Prime Minister to meet what has become a widespread and insistent demand. Perhaps he will give the facts to parliament. Parliament should see to it that he does.

This article runs along this same vein to a considerable extent, but I shall not take the time of the house to quote it any further. I might point, however, to one or two of the paragraphs of the letter which the general wrote to the Globe and Mail. He states:

Mr. Churchill and his ministers, without furnishing the enemy with any useful information, have adopted the principle of keeping the people of Great Britain fully informed of their war policies, and the measures taken to put these policies into effect. Their government, through their Prime Minister and his colleagues, have taken their people wholly into their confidence regarding their hopes and fears, their successes and failures, with the result that the people as a whole, and irrespective of nationality, party or creed, are behind their government's war policy to the last man and woman.

Here in Canada, however, as the Montreal Gazette states, the situation is different, and the responsibility for this situation cannot be placed on the Canadian public at this time.

The letter goes on at considerable length.

I should like now to make some reference to the thirty-day training scheme. I know that it has been discussed by previous speakers in this house, and, very well, yesterday by one of my colleagues, the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White), who knows from personal experience conditions existing in the army to-day. It was stated, I believe, by the Minister of National Defence, whether his statement conveyed his exact meaning or not, that these boys, upon finishing their thirty days of training, would receive further training by being attached to non-permanent active units. I think there was some misunderstanding about that statement because, as the situation now is, they are not forced to take more than thirty days' training, and, as was properly pointed out yesterday, they receive less than twenty days' actual training. Moreover, in my own riding this scheme for further training with the non-permanent active militia would be utterly impossible, because there is no such organization in my constituency, which is more than one hundred and twenty miles long by forty miles wide, and many fine youths have returned home without any opportunity for further training. It is stated that the existing scheme costs us fifty to sixty million dollars a year: to my mind it is a most extravagant experiment. The value attached to it by an eminent authority may be judged from the speech, of which I have here a copy, which was delivered to the Canadian Club of Ottawa by the Chief of the General Staff, Major-General H. D. G. Crerar, on October 23 last. I do not intend to read all of that address by any means, but I should like to quote one or two brief extracts. He said on that occasion, indicating that in his view, as chief of the staff, the scheme is unsatisfactory, and that he is not alone in that opinion:

I hold the view, and I am not alone in doing so, that the major issue confronting Canada in particular and North America in general is to win this war in Europe and so to prevent any possibility of this continent finding itself in a definitely isolated and exposed situation.

That statement is in the first part of his address. Further on, he says:

The second lesson is that reliance on static defence and an army of defensive type is inviting defeat, and does not provide the dynamic force required for victory; the failure of the allies in the field has been due to the lack of attacking power. To take the offensive, military forces must be highly trained as well as powerfully armed, and furthermore trained to cooperate closely with the air force. For the British nations training in combined operations with the navy is also essential.

Later in his address he states:

Our present efforts must therefore concentrate on two things. We must utilize to the full all the skill, ingenuity and facilities we now possess to advance the fundamental training of all ranks now in our army in the science and art of their profession. We must also intensify our efforts towards the complete provision of the armament required by those men before they are called upon to meet the enemy in battle.

He also says, referring to the initial training period:

Firstly, the short training period enabled a larger number of young Canadians to gain a proper conception of their national obligations within a given time. Secondly, our limited supply of modern weapons made it impracticable just now to carry the individual training of these young men beyond the basic stage, and a month or six weeks of instruction was sufficient for that limited syllabus. These factors, though important at this time, are not of enduring importance and, as my minister stated the other day, consideration is being given to possible alterations in the training schedule.

It has been suggested by other speakers, and I wish to support the proposal, that the minister should extend the period of training to at least three or four months; thereby we as a nation will receive a great deal more in return for the expenditure which is required for this particular scheme. I want to make it quite plain that I am heartily in favour of the idea of a training period, but that I believe that the thirty-day system does not begin to do the job and that it is most extravagant.

I desire also to add a few remarks to those of several previous speakers concerning this matter of free transportation, especially on the occasions of the Christmas leave and the furlough of our soldiers at this time and in this country. I feel sure there was a misunderstanding yesterday when the minister was understood to have made the statement that we did not receive free transportation during the last war. I believe that the minister misapprehended what was said by a previous speaker, because he will recollect, no doubt, as well as I do, that while we were on service in Great Britain in the last war we were granted free transportation.

I want to point out that, in contrast to the last great war, when the first line of battle was in the countries of France and Belgium and the second or defensive line was in Great Britain, to-day our first line is in the British isles and our secondary line of defence is in this country, which is thus in somewhat the same situation as was Great Britain at that time. In that respect the picture is changed. Moreover, it can be said, without any breach of confidence, that the distribution of our troops in Canada to-day is vastly different from that of the various centres or of the army throughout Canada during the last war. Very many of our young people serving in the forces in various parts of this country to-day are at a great distance from their homes. Figures have been given by previous speakers as to the limited funds which many of these chaps, not commissioned officers, have at their disposal; and I personally know of hundreds of young people who, unless they are granted free transportation along with the Christmas leave to which they are entitled, will not be able to join their families at Christmas this year. Therefore, despite the fact that the Minister of National Defence stated that they would have to pay a one-way fare, I sincerely trust that he will reconsider that statement and will see that these many thousands of young men who have offered their all for this country, under very different conditions from those of the last war, are allowed to return home at Christmas time, or when they receive their furlough, with free transportation. I am sure that with the minister's past experience he will reconsider that matter and that they will be granted that transportation free of cost.

There is another matter which has been mentioned by previous speakers. The Prime Minister announced very suddenly on the opening day that the various provincial governments would be summoned to Ottawa during January to consider the report of the Sirois commission. I would make an appeal, as suggested by my leader, that the Prime Minister go a little further. I well remember that, when this commission was being set up, it was intended to take evidence only from provincial governments. I am glad to say that this was enlarged in the instructions to the commission and that they heard representations from many fine bodies throughout this country; I have in mind particularly municipal unions and other organized bodies that did much toward the upbuilding of this country. I am happy to think that the representations of these bodies have been embodied in that report for the government's consideration, and trust that they will be implemented. I hope that the Prime Minister and the government will consider seriously inviting some of the heads of these other organizations to confer with them at that time. I know it would be a stupendous task; they could not invite all organizations who might want to be heard, but this is a most important undertaking and the consequences will be far-reaching. I am glad that this conference is going to take place, because this matter is most essential in the carrying on of our war effort, and we from western Canada especially are pleased that it is to take effect at this time.

As to the agreement which the Minister of Agriculture brought back from the old land, I must confess that I as a westerner was much disappointed. He told of his success in being elected in western Canada and belittled certain hon. members in connection with his election last March. It might be recalled that during that campaign there appeared a report in the press throughout western Canada to the effect that the Minister of Agriculture, along with this government, was pursuing a "middle-of-the-road" war policy. I know that he has since denied that statement, and I accept the denial, but the report was carried in the press during the election campaign without denial and it probably had some bearing on the result of that election. Moreover, despite his assertion this afternoon, he did not have a majority of electors in his constituency support him. Be that as it may, I should like to see the minister, who has a great deal of driving force, campaign in any rural riding in my province to-day, armed with these agreements which he stated had been made for the benefit of agriculture, and I venture to say that the result would be vastly different from that of March 26 last. I cannot speak so well as to his own province, but I judge the outcome would be the same in any riding in Saskatchewan, or, in fact, anywhere in the prairies at this time. It was stated this afternoon that the producers could not be informed exactly what they would receive for these products at the present time. I am confident, however, that the packers of this country will not be working for nothing, that they will be well taken care of.

We have at present in Canada a situation where fish is going to waste in the Magdalen islands, fruit rotting in British Columbia, and we have on the prairies millions of bushels of wheat which cannot be disposed of. Surely that is not a condition to make our producers so happy as the minister suggested this afternoon they should be. Approximately half the population of this country are directly dependent on the success of agriculture for their living, and agriculture is in a very sad plight at this time.

This evening a previous speaker referred to the methods of handling the wheat crop. I am sure no one will boast of the results of our discussions last summer on the methods of handling wheat, discussions which ran on into the days when harvesting had commenced in western Canada. An advisory committee was finally set up, on which the producers were supposed to have a majority representation. I noticed, in looking over the personnel of that committee, the name of a man for whom I have great respect, Mr. D. G. McKenzie, listed as a producer. I do not have to remind any agriculturist that Mr. McKenzie is vice-president of the United Grain Growers Elevator company. He is a grain trader, and his company is very well looked after, as is the grain trade as a whole in my opinion. The grain trade in this country have never enjoyed better days than they have during the last year or two through the agreement with the wheat board under this government. I might give some examples of the favouritism which has taken place in the handling of this quota business this year.

I know of one shipping point in my riding where there are three different grain companies operating, of which the United Grain Growers is one. When the quota was raised from five to eight bushels, despite the fact that many producers in that community were not able to deliver one bushel of wheat, quite a controversy took place there. Finally an order came through from the wheat board to the United Grain Growers' buyer to ship out immediately 29,000 bushels of wheat, or approximately twenty cars. Two opposition elevator companies were not allowed one car at that time. I do not need to point out what controversy arose following that situation. That is an example of what has taken place this fall. I could give many other examples; the handling of this quota business this fall has been most unsatisfactory, and the producers have not majority representation on that advisory committee as suggested. Mr. McKenzie is human just as you, sir, or I; after all, if we are working for our company, we are going to do our best to see that it produces returns, and he is rightly doing so, but the producer is neglected.

I wish to support the view expressed by other speakers that at this time we are justly entitled to a full-time Minister of Agriculture. As I have said, nearly half the people of Canada are directly dependent upon agriculture for their livelihood, yet they are entirely neglected by this government, because the present incumbent of that office is also acting as Minister of National War Services, and that alone if properly done is a real job for any man, no matter how much previous experience he may have had or how good his qualifications for the job.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He does not do it; Mr. Davis does.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I want to add my voice to those who, on behalf of agriculture, have bespoken the appointment of a full-time Minister of Agriculture. Following that, a plan must be worked out before seeding time next spring for the handling of next year's crop. Let us avoid what happened last summer. I plead with the government as a whole and especially with the new Minister of Agriculture, whoever he may be, and the wheat committee, to bring into being before next seeding time a definite policy, so that the farmers of the west may be guided in their operations. I sincerely trust that this may be done.

I am going to suggest to the government also that earnest thought be given to a plan which might have a far-reaching effect. For some years I have thought that we must work out a soil conservation programme in western Canada. This has been done with success in other countries. I know some will object to the cost involved in any such programme, but let me state in general terms what I have in mind. Supposing you took the total cultivated area of the prairies and paid the producers $5 an acre for summer-fallowing one-third of that area. That may seem to involve a tremendous amount of money, but I suggest that the cost would not be any greater than the amount paid under the acreage bonus and the guaranteed price, and certainly there would be a great improvement in farming methods. When I speak of the acreage bonus scheme, I want it understood that I am whole-heartedly in favour of some system of crop insurance, but the acreage bonus scheme has brought about a tendency towards a poorer system of farming. I do not think there can be any argument as to that; it does not tend to develop up-to-date methods. Under the conservation scheme I suggest, with one-third of the cultivated acreage in wheat, one-third in fodder crops and one-third in summer-fallow at $5 an acre, ultimately farming methods in the west will be placed on a much sounder basis and the cost would be no greater than that of the plans now in effect.

I am sorry the Minister of Agriculture is not in his place. However, I see the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) here. He is vitally concerned in this matter, and I trust that he will give serious consideration to the points I have suggested. I do not wish to take up any more of the time of the house this evening, but I did wish to make an urgent plea that a plan for handling next year's crop be drawn up and made known well in advance of seeding, so that the farmers may make definite plans for the whole season's operations of 1941.

[Mr. J. A. Ross.]

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, as far as possible I intend to follow the example set by the speech from the throne; I shall try to be brief and intelligent. First, I should like to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in his choice of hon. members both last year and this year to move and second the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Last year both the mover and the seconder belonged to this corner of the chamber; this year the seconder sits in this part of the house. So, when the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) speaks of "we on this side of the house," he is speaking of members of at least average intelligence.

I had not intended speaking at this time, and would not have done so but for the references that have been made to the land that gave me birth. I was not born in Canada, but I was born. The country that gave me birth is a great country and I am proud of it, but to me it was not the greatest country on earth or I would have stayed there. When Venerable Archdeacon Scott and the leader of the opposition spoke of Ireland, it made me stop and wonder, but in what they said I could see at least one very fine thought. Both the reverend gentleman, for whom I have profound respect, and the leader of the opposition, who has plenty of sense, must have seen something great in our Prime Minister, or they would not have suggested that he attempt the almost impossible task of causing Mr. de Valera to agree with England.

When I think of Ireland I think of the land that has given the British empire its greatest soldiers: Lord Wellington, General Roberts, Lord Kitchener, General French and many others. So I believe that when everything is weighed in the balance, neither the north nor the south of Ireland will be found wanting. I am sure, however, that the Prime Minister has sense enough not to try to tell Mr. de Valera what is his duty and how he should do it. There are three great "eras" in Ireland, as someone has said: the stone era, the middle era, and de Valera. The first two refer to the whole of Ireland; the last, only to part of it. I would remind hon. members that before conscription was adopted in England, the north of Ireland had enlisted one hundred per cent, and that perhaps the greatest shipyard and dock in the British empire is at Belfast. No part of the British empire is more loyal than that part of Ireland from which I come, and of which I am proud. I expect that before this war is over, all Ireland will be supporting our cause, fighting for freedom for which Ireland has always struggled.

I should also like to congratulate the government on the way in which they put across national registration. I think the leader of the opposition realized the magnitude of that task when he said that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), if he could put it across successfully, would be one of Canada's great men. The hon. gentleman has not stated that the registration was not successful, so by his silence he has agreed that notwithstanding what has been said about him, the Minister of Agriculture is one of Canada's great men. That was a great task. Last session, when we were told by the minister and by Mr. Justice Davis what was to be done, we wondered how it would be possible to put it across. The minister showed his greatness in being able to get other people to cooperate with him. Members of all parties cooperated and put across this national registration in such a splendid way that even in this house we have not heard any criticism of the manner in which that work was done. I am sure most hon. members were volunteer workers in connection with the national registration. I know that some cities in western Canada paid all expenses, even down to expenses for stationery. Again I say these facts show that the man in control of the registration was not lacking in ability to get things done.

I appreciate, too, the government's action in connection with the control of prices and profits. In the city of Fort William we expected to obtain a contract for the manufacture of shells, but we were informed that we could not get it because another contractor had made a lower bid than we could make, that, too, when from the sister city of Port Arthur comes the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe).

We know, too, that rents have been controlled. I join with the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) in saying that the government would do well to look carefully into the question of rentals. Obviously, soldiers like to maintain their homes as long as possible. In Fort William the question of rentals is an important one, and some unfortunate circumstances have been disclosed.

Those of us who have stopped to remember what we had to pay for sugar during the last war, and compare that price with what we have to pay to-day, will immediately say thanks to the government for the board which has been set up to prevent unfair profits.

May I mention, in passing, that I have been most grateful for the press releases which have reached me regularly. I have read them almost as consistently as I read the Old Book, and I believe I have derived a good deal of benefit from my reading. Sometimes I read them twice, because I am a little dull. So long as those press releases are available, it is not necessary for me to listen to cabinet ministers in the house who tell about what is being done.

Since I have come to the house I have heard criticism of the non-permanent force, and the one month's training to which it has been subjected. Again I may have to admit dullness, but I must point out that any man who has been an athlete knows that he can get into training in one month. I visited the camp at Fort William, and I must say that in no more than two days after the boys were called in they had developed to a point which surprised me. I know they took the drill and everything connected with it just as ducks take to water. Those boys are a credit to Canada. Some of the parents of the boys who have gone to the camp have said to me, "You can thank the government for at least the thirty days training."

May I at this point thank the government for increasing the pay of private soldiers from $1.10 to $1.30. I expect, as do other members, to be in a position to thank the government for giving the soldiers in the lower ranks free transportation during the Christmas holidays and during the leaves to which the hon. member for Vancouver North referred.

In Fort William we have some problems of our own. I hope the government will not cancel their housing scheme, and that they have not made plans to curtail it. I say that because one of our greatest problems in Fort William and Port Arthur is that of housing. During the years of depression people could not build houses, and the result is that we now have a great scarcity. Possibly we should not talk about ourselves, but if we do not, nobody else will. I feel, however, that I must take this opportunity to congratulate the Canadian Car and Foundry company of Fort William. Sometimes we gain the impression that a big corporation has not a heart, but I believe that cannot be said about the one of which I am now speaking. The company in question had a factory in Fort William which had been idle for a long time, and on which taxes amounting to about $25,000 were levied each year. I received word that the plant would open its doors, provided the city would for a certain period of time permit a reduction in taxation. It was stated that if the taxation was not reduced, the plant would be demolished.

What happened? Fort William adopted the wise procedure and permitted the reduction of taxation in 1937. That was at a time when there were rumblings of war, of course, but also at a time when money was very scarce. The company experienced the difficulty of not being able to obtain the right to make modern aeroplanes. But they went into business and built forty aeroplanes of the Grumman type, one which is now obsolete. I believe they still have some of those machines. They experienced a difficulty, not through any fault of the dominion government, but because those who controlled the rights to make the later models were pledged either to France or to England. Later, the plant obtained the right to build the Hurricane machine, and we are proud of the way in which the plant is turning out the work. At this time they are employing almost 3,000 men, and one could walk through their plant and not be noticed. We are proud that no notice is taken, because we realize that the men are intent on their work and are not interested in what is taking place around them.

The city of Fort William in Canada is cooperating with a city bearing a similar name in Scotland. I am not Scotch, but because of my name some people think I am. I have one drop of Scotch in me, and one drop is enough. Fort William in Canada is cooperating with Fort William in Scotland for the purchase of an aeroplane of the Spitfire type. The Canadian city is acting in a most unselfish way by permitting the city in Scotland to choose the plane to be presented to the government in England. Of course I should prefer to see it presented to the dominion government, but I realize we are all one family, and if it goes to England it will be just as useful. I make these observations in the hope that they may serve as a cue for some other towns or cities in Canada the names of which have their origin in the old land.

This year I have deeply appreciated the work of the opposition groups. I hope they will tear into the government and attempt to show what has been done. I say that because when they lay open the deeds of this government, it always looks better after than it did before. We realize, of course, that hon. members in the opposition groups are capable men.

This afternoon in listening to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) I felt a sense of pride, and my mind was carried back to the days when we played on the same football team and he was in shape to score on the opponent's goal. I must say he found the goal to-day, so far as I was concerned, because I was delighted with the description he gave of the work his department is doing. Anyone who wishes to assume the office of minister of agriculture in Canada will have to go some, if he intends to excel the efforts of the present minister. His picture of London is first-hand information which comes to us from a man of intelligence, a picture which told a clear story, and we were deeply impressed. We in Canada are apt to feel that we are not at war. We have better times than ever. But we should get at our job in such a way as to say to old England, we are with you and will be with you until the last.

I appreciate the tribute which was paid to the late Mr. Chamberlain by the Prime Minister and the other leaders on this side of the house. It is said that Mr. Chamberlain failed because he practised Christianity. But he did not fail. It is true that he held out one cheek and then held out the other, but we must not forget the words of the great leader who said that there comes a time when you cannot cast your pearls before swine. Another thing we appreciate is the cooperation on the part of our Prime Minister with England and the United States in providing common bases for our ships and aeroplanes.

Hon. members will probably expect me to deal more with the real side of life than with the economic and military, than with the machine guns, aeroplanes and ships. We all heard the broadcast by our king when he asked for a national day of prayer. I am sure that the men and women of Canada were sincere in their petition that the cause of the allies be victorious. We were fighting a cause which was not narrow nationalism, but for the good of the whole world. After that day of prayer had passed, we had the fall of Dunkirk and the miraculous evacuation of our soldiers from France. Why was it that Hitler was blinded and did not see his opportunity to attack England, which no doubt he could have done more easily at that time than at any time afterwards? Then I think of Roumania. What aeroplanes or shells could have caused the recent devastation in Roumania? To me it is nothing short of an act of providence, and we should give thanks.

I appreciated the words of the Prime Minister when he said:

> What is necessary then to win the present conflict? It is to put on the whole armour of God.

I think also of the words of an outstanding statement from the same Old Book which said that we should train the boy in the way he should go and then when he is older he will not depart from that way. I think we all were proud of our Prime Minister when he said in his closing remarks:

> In equal measure, however, we must strive throughout the struggle itself, and more than ever when the evil dragon of nazism is slain, to see that never again, in our own or in any other land, shall the gods of material power, of worldly possessions and of special privilege be permitted to exercise their sway. Never again must we allow any man or any group of men to subjugate by fear and to crush by the power of might the spirit and the lives of honest and humble men.

If we put forth our best efforts, I know we will win this war and then there will be peace and good-will among men.

Mr. H. E. BRUNELLE (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should first like to congratulate the hon. members who moved and seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I particularly want to congratulate the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) upon the kind words he had for the people of my race and the tribute he paid to their loyalty. In a few moments I intend to refer to this particular subject. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) said some nice things about the Irish and the loyalty of the people of Ireland. The other day the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) referred to the loyalty of our people. These references must be contagious, for I intend to say something about the loyalty of the people of my province.

I have listened with great interest to the criticism of hon. members who sit to my left. One who was not aware of what Canada is doing in the present war, one who was being informed only by the speeches of the opposition, could not avoid getting the impression that this country is almost indifferent to the present world situation, or was doing too little in comparison with what it should or could do. The millions of dollars being spent daily, the amazing military activities that we see about us, the men in uniform who are evident wherever we happen to look, the enormous quantities of munitions produced at such a rate and of such a quality that people from other countries cannot avoid being surprised and express their admiration, all seem to be insufficient or unknown to some of our own people. Be that as it may, it is pleasant to know that facts speak louder than words.

The mass of our people are satisfied with our war effort. In this regard my opinion is different from that of the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) who spoke this evening. One reassuring aspect of our war effort is that peace and harmony are being maintained among our people at a time when enormous sacrifices in men and money are being made. Some people seem to think that any war effort to help to settle the world's turmoil should be accompanied by turmoil and trouble at home. Apparently Canada is doing more in the present war than she did from 1914 to 1918, and yet we are enjoying peace. There is general approval of this policy, whereas in 1914 there was dissatisfaction to an extent that threatened the destruction of our national unity. This is a fact which speaks louder than all the loud criticism of the opposition. In my opinion the first duty and responsibility of a government when legislating to meet a great emergency is to maintain harmony among the people. If we consider the composition of our population, the present government and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) deserve the highest praise for piloting the ship of state with so much success during these troubled days.

Let us all refrain from generalities. Let us know exactly what is being done in connection with our various activities. I do not profess to be able to describe the whole accomplishment of the government. In order to be accurate I judge of that accomplishment by a few of our war enterprises of which I know personally.

I refer in particular to the establishment of the elementary flying school in the city of Cap de la Madeleine which lies within my constituency. The contract for the building of the school was let late this summer. The land had to be acquired and levelled and made ready for a flying school. Ten large buildings had to be put up and made comfortable for accommodating instructors, pupils and officers. Yet within two months the whole work had been practically completed and the school has had about fifty pupils in training now for nearly one month. I do not hesitate to say that if the government is proceeding with the same celerity and efficiency in other spheres as it did in the case of the flying school at Cap de la Madeleine, it is doing all that it is humanly possible to do, and the criticism and complaints and charges of inefficiency made by the opposition are unwarranted and unfair. Such charges are not conducive to a good understanding among the Canadian people who are ready and willing to make the greatest of sacrifices.

Preparations for home defence could not have been undertaken more promptly and more effectively in a country like Canada that was unprepared for war. At any rate our country was not supposed to be any better prepared for war than France, Belgium and Great Britain, and yet since the outbreak of war we have proceeded just as fast in our war effort as any of those countries. About 95 per cent of the development work on airports required to train our pilots under the British commonwealth air training plan has been completed in less than half the time it was scheduled to take. Labourers, engineers and contractors are working night and day.

Our military legislation, on the other hand, has been just as wise and effective as our material preparations. To ask more, to ask, for instance, for some form of conscription such as we had in 1917, would be to ask for unnecessary and dangerous legislation of ill repute.

When the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), who I am sorry is not in his seat, stated in a speech at Charlottetown that Canada was not doing her share and that conscription for overseas service alone would show the full measure of our effort, he was mistaken. Those were about his words. In fact, we need material more than men, and above all whatever we do must be compatible with the reasonable disposition of all classes of our people and must be of such a nature as to maintain peace and harmony within our own land. We all want to win this war in order that we may have peace in the world, but I think we must maintain harmony at home first.

And now, sir, I must reluctantly speak of loyalty myself. We are all loyal and anxious to win this war. The leader of the opposition, with his loyalist descent, is as good as but no better than the rest of us. I hope that is not showing him any disrespect. But I think it is time that we should cease to question a person's loyalty, that we should cease to suspect or qualify the loyalty of any portion of our population. We should take it for granted that we are all loyal to the crown, as in fact we all are.

Furthermore, when the leader of the opposition stated at Charlottetown that "the people of Quebec, if properly guided, are just as loyal to the British crown as any other section of our people," he expressed an insult to myself, to my people and to my province. There is no "if" about our loyalty. Under all circumstances, Mr. Speaker, we were, we are and we shall be loyal, and our loyalty is no more subject to a condition than the loyalty of the leader of the opposition or of those who think as he does. Our school children in Quebec sing "God save the King" without any compulsion. They sing it with sincerity, ardour and enthusiasm. When one has done his duty, he should be satisfied and not worry about what others will do, about whether they will do their duty as well as he does his. Those who publicly proclaim their loyalty, sincerity and other virtues, are not in these troublous days much different from those who, as reported in the Holy Book, thanked the Lord that they were better than the rest of the world.

The Prime Minister and his government have shown vision and wisdom in their legislation. Our conscription law, for instance, for home defence, has the hearty approval of all. Every detail of that law is suitable and most acceptable. Our young men are examined by their own family doctor, and that gives them confidence. There are no exemptions, and that adds to their confidence because the rich as well as the poor, the influential as well as the unknown, must all comply equally with the law.

In conclusion, sir, may I say that the electors of my constituency for some time before and during the last great war were represented in this house by a most brilliant nationalist, and they heard from him declamations and declarations as to war legislation. My electors had the unique privilege of hearing both sides of the question expounded to them by that same man, and I say to this house that my electors who have had some experience of war legislation are not complaining to-day that this government is not going fast enough or is not going far enough in its war measures. They highly admire the sincerity, wisdom and pure patriotism of the Prime Minister of Canada.

On motion of Mr. Ralston the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 10 p.m.

Friday, November 15, 1940.

The house met at three o'clock.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

TABLING OF REPLIES BY PREMIERS TO INVITATION TO CONFERENCE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday of last week I tabled a letter which I had written to the premiers of the different provinces with respect to the holding in January of a joint conference between the dominion and the provinces to consider the report of the Rowell-Sirois commission. I have since received replies from all the premiers. I beg leave now to table these replies. In order that hon. members may have the record complete I shall ask the clerk, if it is agreeable to the house, to see that the replies received from the several provinces are printed in the Votes and Proceedings of to-day.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

FREE RAILWAY TRANSPORTATION FOR MEMBERS OF THE MILITARY, NAVAL AND AIR FORCES

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 2, to amend the Railway Act (soldiers' fares).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. CHURCH: During the last war the railways voluntarily carried men for single fare on week-ends. Now they carry them every day at half rate. At the present time the Railway Act does not provide for any special concessions to soldiers during war time, nor has the board of transport commissioners power to deal with the matter. In view of the fact that many men are taken to camps far from their homes, and the distribution of troops for training is spread over all Canada, it is most desirable to give soldiers some form of free transportation. Many of them have been killed on the highways while thumbing rides. To give an example of what I have in mind, there are twenty-six men from my own riding who are now in Newfoundland and who would like to get home. I suggest that after this bill receives second reading it be considered by a special committee of the house.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

RULES OF THE HOUSE

DECISION OF MR. SPEAKER AS TO APPLICATION OF STANDING ORDER 37—READING OF SPEECHES

On the order for motions:

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the orders of the day are proceeded with I should like to amplify my previous ruling in connection with standing order 37.

I have been giving further consideration to the interpretation of this standing order in view of the discussion which took place yesterday. For the purpose of the record I shall read again standing order 37, which is as follows:

No member, except the Prime Minister and Leader of the Opposition, or a minister moving a government order and the member speaking in reply immediately after such minister, or a member making a motion of "no confidence" in the government and a minister replying thereto, shall speak for more than forty minutes at a time in any debate.

It will be recalled that this standing order was adopted on March 22, 1927, but since that date changes have been made in several departments to deal with the exigencies of these days; and where formerly there was only one minister of defence there is now a Minister of National Defence, a Minister of National Defence for Air and a Minister of National Defence for Naval Affairs. There are also two new departments, under the Minister of Munitions and Supply and the Minister of War Services.

I ruled yesterday that the Minister of Agriculture, who is also Minister of War Services, in his reply was not limited to forty minutes. I am of opinion that is a correct interpretation of standing order 37. I am now asked as to that interpretation should other ministers make reply. It will be noticed that the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) is as follows:

That the following be added to the address to His Excellency:

"We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that this house regrets that the government has continued to soothe the Canadian people regarding the war effort of the nation, thereby creating a false sense of security when a clear-cut call to action is desperately needed.

"And this house further regrets that despite the serious condition of agriculture no effective action is proposed to alleviate that condition and to ensure to the Canadian farmer a just, fair and reasonable return for his products."

And the amendment of the leader of the Social Credit group (Mr. Blackmore) is as follows:

That the following be added to the amendment:

"And this house further regrets the failure of the government to adopt a monetary policy that would permit a maximum war effort without either increasing debt or reducing the standards of living below that necessary for maintaining maximum efficiency;

"Furthermore this house is of the opinion that a continuation of the present financial policy will further destroy the precious liberties so essential to, and recognized as being inherent in a true democracy."

Both of these amendments make use of an embracing term, namely, "war effort of the government," and express their dissatisfaction.

I think I am correct in stating that the intention of the standing order was to give wide latitude to the opposition to attack the policy of the government and just as wide latitude for the government to make a full reply.

During the course of the debate the theme of every speech has been directed to the activities of the government in prosecuting the war effort and a request for a full and complete statement of such war efforts to the house. In order that this should be done properly and adequately each minister could only speak for his department and it would be impracticable if not impossible for one minister to reply for all departments.

I am inclined therefore to take the view that I should give as wide and as broad an interpretation of the rule as is possible in order that the very evident desire of the house be satisfied. I believe I will be giving effect to the sense of the house in the manner I have indicated so that in these war days a complete reply, unhampered by time, could be made by the ministers whose departments may be the subject of attack.

This ruling would affect six ministers, namely: The Minister of Agriculture and War Services (Mr. Gardiner), who has already replied; the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), who is now replying; the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power), the Minister of National Defence for Naval Affairs (Mr. Macdonald), the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). These ministers are all directly connected with the amendments which have been made.

While I am dealing with these matters with particular reference to the debate before the house, I would also like to remind the hon. members of the house as to the rule regarding reading of speeches. Last session I made a statement regarding the reading of speeches and I think all will agree that the rule was more closely observed thereafter. I find however that there is a tendency in this debate to read speeches. It would be very obnoxious for the chair to interrupt hon. members who are reading their speeches and I think this is a matter which the hon. members of the house should observe strictly. I therefore request the assistance of hon. members in that regard.

I need hardly state again what I said in the last session regarding important statements made by ministers on government policies which have been and may be read. The same also applies to statements of policy made by leaders of parties or chiefs of groups in the house; but when these statements are not important pronouncements the rule regarding reading speeches should be followed.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I assume the matter to which you have adverted is not debatable, but may I be permitted to make one or two observations with respect to the ruling?

If I gathered correctly what was said, your ruling is based on the principle of expediency and necessity, not on the strict interpretation of the rule. I should like to have it on that basis rather than to have it recorded as a precedent to be followed in the future.

Let me suggest to what point the ruling may lead the house. The Minister of Agriculture, who spoke yesterday, spoke in his capacity as Minister of Agriculture. But the Minister of National War Services is the same gentleman. Is he to have the opportunity to speak twice in the same debate, but in different capacities? It will be seen that if we follow the ruling through to its logical conclusion it might land us in a miasma of difficulty. I should hope it would be the consensus of hon. members that all these gentlemen should be allowed to make statements of length such as may be necessary to permit the government to present its facts. However I should rather put it on the ground of courtesy than on that of a strict ruling from the chair.

With all respect I suggest that we ought not to extend the rule beyond what might be considered a proper interpretation.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, since this is such an important ruling may I be permitted to say a word on the point of order now under discussion?

I should like to remind the house that since 1927 conditions in the house have changed to a very considerable degree. I believe that will be readily admitted. But if these ministers are to be permitted to speak at greater length than the rule now allows it seems to me that some recognition should be given to the change so far as the opposition groups are concerned, and that in the broadening of the rule the leaders of other opposition groups should be accorded more latitude than is now allowed by the rule.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The house will see the danger of opening the door.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I say most respectfully to Mr. Speaker, for whom I have the highest personal regard, that I do not think it was within the province of a Speaker of the house to broaden the rule in any particular. I suggest if an interpretation of such a nature is to be made it should be made in the same manner as the rule was originally made, that is to say, by a committee of the house.

May I make one or two observations on the question of the reading of speeches? I agree with Mr. Speaker when he says that the practice is undesirable. But if six ministers of the crown are to be allowed to read their carefully prepared speeches, then I submit that private members ought to be allowed to prepare carefully their replies and read them.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I am and always have been entirely opposed to the forty-minute rule. I believe all hon. members should be allowed to express their views. I would point out, however, that there is one aspect of the issue which has not been touched upon. In his ruling Mr. Speaker said he felt it his duty to extend the power given to ministers of the crown in respect to a vote of want of confidence in the government. No one appears to have considered what constitutes such a vote.

I seem to recall that during the strenuous time of 1922—it may have been 1924 or 1925—the government of that day did allow an amendment to the address moved by a member of the opposition to go through. It by no means follows that an amendment is necessarily a vote of want of confidence in the government, unless a minister of the crown or the Prime Minister indicates that he shall so regard it, or unless it contains the specific words, "We move a vote of want of confidence in the government."

The amendment moved a few days ago by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), while it may appear to express a lack of confidence in the government, did not specifically state that it was a vote of want of confidence. My point is that that fact should be taken into consideration. Under the circumstances I do not think the ministers in question have any right to exceed the limits allowed under the rule.

Mr. J. T. THORSON (Selkirk): In connection with the actual wording of standing order 37 it seems to me there is one point to which reference might be made. There is a distinction between a member and a minister not being bound by the forty-minute rule. First of all, with regard to private members the rule states:

> No member, except the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, or a minister moving a government order and the member speaking in reply immediately after such minister—

And so on. Those words would seem to indicate that the only private member who is not bound by the forty-minute rule is the private member who speaks in reply immediately after the minister moving a government order. Therefore only one private member would not be bound by the forty-minute rule. But the rule proceeds to say:

> —or a member making a motion of "no confidence" in the government and a minister replying thereto.

It would seem to follow from the wording of the rule that the extension of the forty-minute limit is applicable not only to one minister but to any minister replying to a motion of "no confidence." Further, the extension applies to such minister, no matter whether he follows immediately after the motion of want of confidence or at any time during the course of the debate. Mr. Speaker, I suggest respectfully that your ruling is not based upon any ground of expediency, but rather that it follows as a matter of legal and proper interpretation of the standing order itself.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I find myself in hearty accord with what has been said by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). However, considering that we are not all parliamentary experts, I was wondering if it would be asking too much of you, sir, to reserve your decision on such an important and complicated matter until after this present debate on the address.

I believe that in this particular debate hon. members should be given a reasonable latitude. I think we have been very fair with the government since the commencement of the war in trying to facilitate government business, and have perhaps not said some of the things we would have liked to say. If you, sir, could see your way clear to reserve your decision until after this present debate is concluded, it would be more pleasant to those of us who sit on this side of the house.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I rise not to debate either the rule or the interpretation which Your Honour has placed upon it. If that is necessary, perhaps another time would be better. I rise rather to point out why I think the interpretation which you, Mr. Speaker, have given is one which is eminently wise and wherein it should receive general approval by hon. members of this house. I feel certain that it will be generally approved by the people of Canada.

The purpose of calling this session at the present time was to enable the government to inform the opposition and the country of Canada's war effort. That is why we are here at this time. No one was stronger in urging that parliament should meet in November rather than in January in order that hon. members might be informed of the progress of Canada's war effort than the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell).

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not objecting to the extension being given to the minister; I think it should be done.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad to hear my hon. friend say that, because it accords with what I wish to say. Nor did I understand the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) to be strong in his objection to the interpretation given by the chair. However, my hon. friend did say that he thought the government ought to be allowed this latitude in order to defend itself; he used the word "defend". May I say that we have nothing to defend in regard to our war effort.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The right hon. gentleman ought to have.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The war effort speaks for itself and defends itself.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What has that to do with the ruling?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend's remark had nothing to do with the ruling

We are glad to have the opportunity so far as we may to give hon. gentlemen such information as they may desire to have. For that reason, as I say, I think His Honour has given an interpretation to the rule which is the right one considering the circumstances under which this parliament has been called together.

Mr. NEILL: Why not suspend the rule?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is not necessary to suspend it. Apparently hon. members are now more or less agreed that with respect to the present debate at any rate the interpretation placed upon the rule is a wise one.

May I pass on to a remark which was made in the course of the discussion by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. He suggested that some consideration might be given to changing the rules in order to give greater opportunity for debate to the different leaders on the opposition side. May I say that a considerable change has taken place in the application of the rules, a change which I believe does not accord strictly with the practice generally followed in parliamentary debates under British parliamentary procedure. There is a government and there is an opposition. Those who are for us, are for us, and those who are against us, are against us. Those who are not for us are against us. In this House of Commons there are two sides, the government side and the opposition. Every one has the opportunity to be on one side or on the other, it is for him to choose, but the only parties that are recognized under any law or rule pertaining to the House of Commons that I know of are the government and the opposition.

Ministers of the crown have their obligations and as members of the government they receive salaries in recognition of their obligations and duties. This House of Commons has placed the leader of the opposition in a similar position; it has given him a salary; made him an officer of parliament. Under our parliamentary system he represents the opposition. When it comes to speaking on the address, as in the present debate, my hon. friend the leader of the opposition speaks and then I reply. The practice has grown up of having the two leaders of the other groups speak before anyone else. It seems to me that that is giving more in the way of recognition to an opposition in this House of Commons than was ever intended under a procedure conducted strictly on opposition and government lines. It was never intended there should be two or more leaders of the opposition. I mention this only because my hon. friend has said that we should give greater recognition in the way of opportunity to other groups.

If this House of Commons begins to extend recognition to different groups we will have the number of groups increasing year after year. We will have a condition in this House of Commons in the course of time which will correspond to the condition they had in the chamber of deputies in France. In that country there were at times so many groups that it was almost impossible for any one group to get a majority sufficiently large to carry on the business of the country without all kinds of log-rolling. We know how disastrous that has proven to be.

Exception was taken to the province of the Speaker to interpret the rules. May I say I think His Honour has acted entirely within his jurisdiction in assuming the powers he has, and is rather to be thanked than criticized.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed just one moment? With all due respect to you, sir, and to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) who has just announced officially on behalf of the government that this is to be a session of speeches rather than a session of business, I suggest that we should put aside the rules altogether for the remainder of this part of the session, until the adjournment that will take place before long. There is no business on the order paper except one forlorn bill which has been introduced by a private member. We all want to hear the ministers make their statements as to what the government is doing; we are looking forward with interest to hearing those statements, but this government is going to be hard put to it to keep this house in session more than a few days longer. There are perhaps only six more speeches to be made, so why worry about the rules? Why not expand the rules and let everyone speak as long as he likes and as often as he likes during the remainder of this part of the session?

Mr. SPEAKER: I should like to say to the house that my decision was not based upon expediency, nor was it intended as a courtesy from the house. The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) has referred to the fact that standing order 37 refers to "the member," not to one member, having the right to speak more than forty minutes. I had that in view when coming to the decision that a minister replying to a motion of want of confidence would be permitted to speak longer than forty minutes. In other days there was only one Minister of National Defence, but that has been changed since.

I had that fact in mind when arriving at my decision. The minister whose department is under review in the house must necessarily have the rights accorded under standing order 37.

So far as restricting the debate is concerned or giving some latitude I think the house will appreciate that I have been more than lenient at times in giving that consideration to hon. members, and I can assure the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) that when the debate takes place he will receive, as will other members, proper recognition so long as I am in the chair.

OCEAN TRANSPORT

ALLEGED THREATENING OF OFFICERS BY CANADIAN NATIONAL STEAMSHIPS AUTHORITIES

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Cardin) based on a telegram I have received from an officer of a steamship at an Atlantic coast port. If it is not convenient for the minister to reply to-day I should be glad if my question might stand as a notice of motion in order that I may get the information.

It is represented that officers are being threatened by the Canadian National Steamships authorities if they do not sail. I am going to ask the minister to look into the matter and give a statement to the house as soon as possible as to what the exact position is.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Transport): I understand that the leader of the opposition has already drawn the attention of the officers of the department to the very question which he has just raised, and an investigation has already been ordered to ascertain the facts.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I hope the leader of the opposition will not object if I say to him that both he and I have a special responsibility in matters pertaining to procedure in the house. One of these matters relates to the asking of questions. A habit is growing up of asking questions on the orders of the day not so much for the purpose of seeking information as trying to give information, or to make allegations which should not be given in the form of asking a question. Questions should be asked, if they are for the purpose of seeking information, in the form of a direct question and be confined to that. I hope my hon. friend will join with me in seeking to have hon. members on his side, including himself, follow the rule, and I shall similarly do what I can with hon. members on this side and with myself.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I agree entirely that I have some responsibility in upholding the rules of the house, but I certainly do not accept with equanimity the lecture I have just received from the Prime Minister. I have received a direct appeal from a man who is under threat from the Canadian National Steamships as to what will happen if he does not sail. I applied first to the Deputy Minister of Transport, and he was not able to give me the information. He gave me part of it. If I had got a full answer from him I would not have asked the question in the house. The part I want to know is, are these men under threat by Canadian National Steamships authorities under the Canadian government.

I just do not appreciate the lecture which the Prime Minister has given me, and I do not intend to be lectured by him.

PASSPORTS AND VISAS

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE CHANGES IN THE REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. KARL HOMUTH (Waterloo South): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) if he can inform the house whether there are to be any changes in the passport regulations? I understand a meeting was held this week having to do with the matter, and I have received inquiries in regard to it.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): I have no information now on the matter that I can give to the house.

GREAT LAKES SHIPPING

QUESTION OF INVESTIGATION INTO RECENT DISASTERS AND MEASURES TO BE TAKEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Cardin) a question arising out of disasters to shipping on the upper lakes this week. Under the act the minister must order an inquiry either by the wreck commissioner or by a royal commission under the Inquiries Act. There were two hundred Canadian ships out in this storm on the great lakes, some of them old ships which had been out of commission for years. In the case of the Anna C. Minch twenty-one lives were lost, and nine lives were lost on the Aberdeen, which sank in the St. Lawrence river. The Novadoc, of Fort William, was also lost on the great lakes.

Will the minister, in view of the law, hold an investigation into great lakes shipping in the fall of the year, and include in the investigation an inquiry as to the adequacy of the aids to navigation, safety devices, wireless, the issuing of clearance papers, life-saving stations, and whether on the lost vessels there was adequate provision of life-boats and life-saving equipment? Some of these ships were only river boats.

I would also ask whether some form of compensation or insurance or other aid will be given to the dependents of the men who lost their lives, either by the companies or by the government, or both. The law on the subject is clear.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, an inquiry is to be held in regard to the situation which my hon. friend from Broadview (Mr. Church) has just referred. All the details that he has mentioned will be included in the investigation, except that I cannot of course say that the government will undertake to provide any compensation until responsibility had been established against the government. As to compensation being paid by the insurance companies, that is not a question for the government.

Mr. CHURCH: If Canada is a nation, it should look after the sailors on the great lakes.

Mr. CARDIN: We are doing so.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

INQUIRY AS TO DECLARING 1940 AN EMERGENCY YEAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) whether the year 1940 has been declared an emergency year under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The Prairie Farm Assistance Act provides that a decision shall be made in the month of November. The question has not yet been considered by the government. As soon as it is, an announcement will be made to the house.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Thursday, November 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Brooke Claxton for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Blackmore.

[Mr. Church.]

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, only three and a half short months have elapsed since I gave to the house a summary of our military activities. You will remember that on that occasion I outlined the broad principles of our military policy. The immediate aspect of that policy was to combine with the United Kingdom and the other dominions, as quickly and as fully as possible, to defeat the common enemy. And the long term aspect was to provide for an effective organization of Canada's armed forces so that whatever might befall in the future we should be prepared, to the limit of our strength and resources, to take care of our own responsibilities.

In the "immediate" category I spoke of the strengthening and further organization of our fixed and our mobile defences in the east. I indicated too that we were not overlooking the west coast defences. But I stressed that hand in hand with these measures of north American defence we were concentrating on the training and equipping of the Canadian active service force to serve wherever they might be required either in Canada or overseas. And let me remind my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), who seemed to think that we were attaching too much importance to Canadian defence, that I stressed in July that our front line was the island fortress of the British isles. Let me also tell him that, speaking in Montreal in September, I said, "Canada is in this war at the side of Britain, and Canada's front line is in England." And to-day, in spite of the continuous siege of that fortress by every means and every method which science and vandalism and brutality could devise, our Canadians stand side by side with the men of the British isles and of the empire on that front line which still holds firm. The house heard yesterday the eye-witness story told by the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Gardiner) of the steadfastness, not only of the sailors and soldiers and airmen in and around the British isles, but of those stout-hearted millions of people which make up their citizenship. They have taught their enemies, they have reassured their friends, that man is greater than the machine, that it takes more than engines of war in seemingly overwhelming numbers, more than the savage deluge of high explosives, to overcome the will to freedom. They have proven that disadvantages in equipment may be outweighed by superiority in fortitude and fearlessness.

In July, referring to immediate activities, I spoke of the necessity of providing maximum preliminary training for available man-power, and also of the requirements for internal security. And as our general and long-term objective I said that our task must be never again to lapse into the inadequate position in which the armed forces of Canada—and Canada was not unique in this respect—had been placed for many years prior to the outbreak of war.

I can say to the house that those principles on which we were working then are the principles we are working on to-day. Any change has been only to emphasize more than ever the vital interest we feel in helping to hold and strengthen that front line on the English channel.

The carrying out of these principles, since I spoke to the house in July, has taken this country through a summer and into an autumn of military activity which I think has been unprecedented. I believe that this activity has produced and will produce effective results. My purpose is to review what has been done regarding this activity in relation to the army, and to indicate some of the plans for the future.

May I utter this word of caution: If hon. members expect ears to be tickled or feelings stirred or emotions aroused by dramatic pronouncements or revelations of new and unknown developments I am sure they will be disappointed. During the last three months the press has carried from time to time practically everything to which I am referring, so that there will be very little in the way of novelty. On the other hand a factual presentation regarding military activities dealing with organization, mobilization and training, and without the drama of actual operations, leaves no room for what might be called colourful presentation. I can only hope that what can be only a resumé of activities, drab though it may appear, will be of real interest to the house for the simple reason that it is concerned with Canada's participation in this most momentous of wars.

Canada's task has obviously involved two main activities: first, the procuring and preparation of our man-power with all the details of organization and administration which that involves—accommodation, rations, pay, clothing, medical and dental services, personal equipment, and, what is supremely important, the efficient training of that man-power; second, the procuring of equipment for the units and formations which we organize.

I yield to no one in my appreciation of the importance of equipment and of exhausting every means within our power of procuring it, but equipment can never wholly take the place of discipline and efficiency, resourcefulness and courage. Training and intensive training is more necessary than ever, and the work of raising and training men for an army of the size of the Canadian forces is an indispensable and vital part of our preparation and our contribution to the common cause. With that in mind I must express deep appreciation of the untiring interest and work of the staff, both at headquarters and in the various districts, and particularly of the officers, non-commissioned officers and men of our fighting forces, because their work represents thought and care and enthusiasm and unremitting effort, and above all it signifies a patriotism which, whenever the testing time comes will, I think, prove indomitable.

I ought first to mention a change in the names of the military forces of Canada. When I spoke last I mentioned four different groups, the Canadian active service force, the veterans home guard companies, the non-permanent active militia and the veterans reserve companies. Since then we have integrated all these groups into one structure called the Canadian Army, and we have simply divided the Canadian Army into active and reserve units and formations. The active portion is that which we know as the Canadian active service force, which includes the veterans home guard companies, and the reserve portion is that which we know as the non-permanent active militia and that includes the veterans reserve companies. While this is only a change of name it will I think help to avoid confusion, and it gives the military forces a title which better corresponds with the titles of the other services, the Royal Canadian Navy and the Royal Canadian Air Force. It does not involve any change in the names by which regiments and batteries and units are now commonly known, and does not imply any change in the status of units or in the obligations of individuals. These obligations, whether under voluntary enlistment or under the National Resources Mobilization Act, remain as they were before the change of name.

Another change which I think has been generally approved is the change in the name of the veterans home guard to Veterans Guard of Canada. This again does not affect any change in status of its component parts or of its members.

With that preface, here is the broad picture of the strength of the Canadian Army.

First, regarding the Canadian Army (active) which we have known as the Canadian active service force and the veterans home guard companies: On July 29, I stated that there were 31,607 troops of our active formations and units outside of Canada and 101,965 in Canada, or a total of 133,572. The returns for October 29 show over 50,000 outside Canada and a considerable increase in the numbers in Canada.

Regarding the Canadian Army (reserve) which we have known as the non-permanent active militia and which includes the veterans reserve companies and the recruits called for training under the National Resources Mobilization Act: Recruiting for the reserve or non-permanent active militia units continued to be active until August 15 when it was stopped to allow progress to be made with the training of recruits called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act. On July 29 I stated that the strength of the reserve units was 47,373. This was from the latest figures available at that time. On October 29 the total strength of the reserve units was over double that number, not counting recruits in training centres under the National Resources Mobilization Act. On the same date there were 25,391 of these recruits undergoing training in 39 centres established across Canada. So that on October 29 the total strength of the Canadian army including active units overseas and in Canada, and the reserve units, was over 300,000.

During the period of acceleration in the spring and early summer of this year we set ourselves certain important objectives which included the raising of the third and fourth divisions and ancillary and certain unattached units, the recruiting to full strength of the infantry units of the reserve (non-permanent active militia) the dispatch of large numbers of troops to the United Kingdom and to island posts outside of Canada. We concentrated every effort in achieving the desired results without taking time for matters of reorganization which, though important, could wait. We wanted these things done quickly. Once it became certain that these objectives were within measurable distance of attainment, it was possible to devote more time to matters of organization.

Early in August, in keeping with the general policy of defence measures for Canada, the Atlantic command was formed under the command of Major-General Elkins. This command includes all of the three maritime provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, and the eastern portion of the province of Quebec. It also includes the units of the Canadian army in Newfoundland. The administrative arrangements in this area continue to be the responsibility of the district officers commanding the military districts concerned, but the operational control of all coast defence troops and of the mobile forces stationed within the command is exercised by the general officer commanding-in-chief of the Atlantic command.

More recently, in October, the Pacific command has been formed consisting of the provinces of British Columbia and Alberta, with headquarters at Victoria. The general officer commanding-in-chief, Major-General Alexander, is responsible for all operational matters which affect the Pacific defences. He will control coastal defences through fortress and area commanders and also all mobile land forces which may be detailed for operational purposes in defence of the Pacific coast.

In the case of both Atlantic and Pacific commands the general officer commanding will be working in the closest cooperation with the equivalent commanders of the Royal Canadian Navy and the Royal Canadian Air Force in the respective areas.

The organization of the third Canadian division has been completed by the appointment of the brigade and divisional commanders. Major General Sansom, who was formerly on General McNaughton's staff and later on the staff of Canadian Military headquarters in London, has been appointed general officer commanding this division and has just arrived in Canada. The brigade commanders are Brigadier H. O. N. Brownfield, M.C., commanding the 3rd divisional artillery; Brigadier W. G. Colquhoun, M.C., commanding the 7th infantry brigade; Brigadier J. P. U. Archambault, D.S.O., M.C., commanding the 8th infantry brigade and Brigadier E. W. Haldenby, M.C., V.D., commanding the 9th infantry brigade. This division will be concentrated for the present at certain points in eastern Canada along with certain other unattached units.

The organization of the 4th Canadian division is in progress, and its units and formations are located at the moment at various parts in central and western Canada. It is expected very shortly I shall be able to announce the names of the commanders of brigades of that division.

New active army units have been mobilized, including:

An armoured car regiment;
Two light anti-aircraft regiments with associated signal and workshop sections;
Two army field workshops to provide for the servicing of units of the 3rd and 4th division; and
A motor ambulance convoy.

Twenty companies of the Canadian forestry corps have now been raised and are in training under the command of Brigadier J. B. White, D.S.O., E.D. Seventeen additional reserve companies of the Veterans Guard of Canada have been formed bringing the total number of these reserve companies to 43. These are in addition to the 29 active army companies already authorized in this force, which comprise 6,627 officers and men. The Veterans Guard of Canada is under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel H. R. Alley, O.B.E., L.D.

Special interest, I think, was taken in the announcement of the formation of the Canadian armoured corps, under Colonel F. C. Worthington, M.C., M.M., an officer experienced in armoured fighting vehicles. The corps is to consist of four mobilized regiments which includes two of the already mobilized cavalry regiments of the active army and four reserve army regiments.

One armoured brigade is already being organized and expanded into a complete group by the addition of the necessary artillery, engineer, army service corps, and ordnance units which are now mobilizing. Units to form a nucleus for a second group are available.

In order to facilitate the training, we secured about 200 tanks from the United States. While these tanks are of an old type, they will serve well in training the many specialists and tradesmen required in this sort of formation. As the house probably knows, we had a number of tanks at Borden in addition to this very much larger number which were secured from the United States. Selected personnel are being given special training in the United Kingdom so that when we are ready to expand the initial groups into larger formations capable instructors will be available.

The Canadian provost corps has been organized under the command of Colonel P. A. Piuze. Eleven provost companies have been mobilized and these provide personnel for provost duties in the various military districts and also staff for internment camps and detention barracks. Each military district has at least one company headquarters and a part or whole of a provost company in accordance with requirements. Experience has taught us that an army is not an army unless it has bands. Grants to be used for the purchase of instruments had previously been authorized and authority has been granted for the formation of bands in many active army units from personnel in the present unit establishment.

The house will ask about the activities of these various troops of ours. We naturally think first of our men outside of Canada, on the front line in England and at various strategic points. We have in the United Kingdom the bulk of two divisions and their requisite proportion of corps troops. In addition to these, we have under command of Canadian military headquarters, reinforcements nearly equal in numbers to another division, besides the large numbers of reinforcements still on this side. We get weekly reports which give us in considerable detail the work which is done by our Canadian troops in England and some of the tasks to which they are assigned from time to time. No troops in England are more fit or ready for any task which comes. They know what their job is and are eager and anxious to take their turn in the battle of Britain. Their presence side by side with the troops of the old land, and the reputation they have already made, is a source of pride to Canada and I know too that at the war office no troops rank higher in dependability and efficiency.

Just here, Mr. Speaker, I feel that I should refer to what I regard as a most unfortunate expression or sentiment which was uttered by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) in the course of his speech the other day. He said:

> . . . our contribution to the first battle of Britain has been rather pitiful. In fact it has not been a factor in the defence of Britain at all, so far as I am aware. If I am wrong I hope my hon. friend will illuminate the position.

I do feel that my hon. friend did not do justice either to himself or to those he represents, in the use of that expression. Let me remind the house that upon the invasion of Norway the British government at once decided to dispatch troops to the assistance of that country. There was need for prompt action, and a request was made to whom? It was made to Canadian military headquarters, that part of the first Canadian division should be dispatched with a special British force. There was no hesitation, no red tape; we responded at once and troops were detailed from the first division. Preparations for the dispatch of the troops were completed, and the troops left their camps in England on the day following that upon which the request from the British government was received.

That was one instance where, when the need arose, Canada responded; and I think it may be said that the situation loses none of its significance by reason of the fact that operational plans were later changed and the force did not actually do battle in Norway. And prior to last June, as the house knows, on more than one occasion Canadian troops promptly left their camps and were ready at embarkation points under orders to join the British expeditionary force and the French army in their desperate struggle in northern France and Belgium; and the fact that Canadian troops were not actually dispatched on those occasions was due entirely to decisions which were reached by the higher military command. As a matter of fact the actual movement to France of the first division, with a portion of non-divisional troops, was under way, and we all know how and why it became necessary to call them back. General McNaughton especially emphasized at that time that no Canadian unit withdrew until ordered to do so by senior military authorities.

I see nothing pitiful, Mr. Speaker, about having troops in England in which the war office had such confidence as to call upon them suddenly for extremely important and hazardous tasks; and I see nothing pitiful in having our troops in numbers equal to about three divisions helping to hold the front line and given the responsibility for a definite sector. No, Mr. Speaker, the leader of the opposition does himself less than justice, as, what is much more important, he does our troops and our country less than justice, when he makes use of the expression "pitiful" in reference to the contribution made in the battle of Britain by Canada's army. It was wholly unwarranted. Let me say further that in this respect I am not mentioning the really thrilling contribution which has been made by the Royal Canadian Navy and the Royal Canadian Air Force, which will be dealt with by my hon. friends the Minister of National Defence for Naval Affairs (Mr. Macdonald) and the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power).

As the house knows, we have troops in Iceland, Newfoundland and the Caribbean, and in certain instances additions or redistributions have been or are being made to strengthen the strategic position. We owe a great deal to these troops, who constitute the defence outposts of this continent and who, unseen and unheard of, loyally perform their tasks which help to provide security against emergencies.

In Canada the active units are on coast defence on the Pacific and the Atlantic. They are furnishing guards for vulnerable points and for internment camps. They provide a mobile force for use in or out of Canada as required, and they are training at various camps and training centres throughout the dominion, where our accommodation is taxed to the limit. I have had the satisfaction of visiting a number of these camps and units. I have been immensely pleased with the keenness and interest which they are taking in their jobs, whatever they may be. We need have no fear about their being worthy in every way of the high standard which Canadian soldiers have set. I believe the work of the troops on coast defence and on guard duty deserves a special word. Day in and day out, in all kinds of weather, summer and winter, these men perform unspectacular but most important duties. They must keep constantly on the alert, although at times the incentive for doing so may seem to be lacking. Their faithful service is recognized and appreciated.

With regard to these troops the house might be interested to know that we are endeavouring to give the infantry units who are on coast defence garrison duty at least temporary relief by replacing them with units now at training camps. To make this policy of interchange more feasible it is proposed to organize all coast defence infantry battalions in future on the basis of field war establishments instead of garrison war establishments. As the house will understand, that will enable the infantry units on coast defence to get some change from their present duties and to attain higher standards in training for field duties.

Among these troops in Canada are large numbers of reinforcements which, on account of the very few casualties, have not been called upon. The other day my hon. friend the leader of the opposition asked with regard to our preparation for reinforcements. Let me recall to him what I have just said, that we have large numbers of reinforcements in England and larger numbers in Canada; and on account of the fact that there have been very few casualties these troops have not been called upon. I hope that may answer his query. With regard to reinforcements, it must be remembered that sending a formation overseas does not merely involve the raising of, say fifteen thousand men for a division, with its ancillary troops. It also means that we take on an obligation of reinforcing that division in all its ranks. Under normal war conditions these reinforcements might amount to one hundred per cent in a year. Consequently the capacity of a country to maintain armies in the field depends on the manpower reinforcing ability that lies behind the army and also, of course, on the capacity of industry to turn out not only initial equipment but an adequate and regular flow of equipment to replace wastage.

The establishment of the Atlantic and Pacific commands has meant much more than a mere realignment of senior command. It is a part of the broader policy under which careful consideration has been given to the best disposition of our available troops, with a view to having in readiness mobile and other units in case of emergency. Apart from the concentrations in the Atlantic and Pacific commands, portions of the active army are stationed at points throughout the dominion which are considered the most useful from the strategic point of view consistent with the requirements of accommodation and training.

Then we have the reserve units of the Canadian army (which we know as the non-permanent active militia). Here different factors govern. The men in this part of the army are not full-time soldiers. Whether they joined prior to August 15 or have been called up for training under the National Resources Mobilization Act, the great majority are men in civilian jobs who do their military training in their spare time and at camps or on the thirty-day basis at the training centres. Regimental headquarters of these units remain in their own localities. Training is made as convenient as possible as to both time and place, and with as little interference as can be in the routine of daily life and work.

Just here I should like to refer for a moment to the address made the other night by the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White) who, as the house might not have realized, was dealing with a non-permanent active militia unit.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He said he was.

Mr. RALSTON: I beg my hon. friend's pardon; I did not know that he said so, but in any event I just want to emphasize that. My hon. friend dealt with some of the difficulties of a non-permanent active militia unit. I just want to recall to the house what was undertaken in the spring and summer of 1940. Between June and the time these units went to camp we undertook to raise—and we did raise—an additional 42,611 men in the Canadian active service force and an additional 39,786 in the non-permanent active militia, and we had facing us the camps for practically 30,000 men for the militia training centres under the National Resources Mobilization Act. In other words, clothing and equipment for 111,000 men had to be asked for in those three months of the summer. We went at this work, just as hard as we could.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the minister suggest that the thirty-day training plan was at the beginning of the summer? That was not until a month after the registration was completed. He cannot hook that up.

Mr. RALSTON: I am hooking it up for the purpose of showing what manufacturing had to be done to provide clothing and equipment for the troops in prospect.

The hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough mentioned that his unit went into camp on September 2, I believe it was. He will correct me if I am wrong. September 2 was a long time after the National Resources Mobilization Act was announced, and long after the training plan was announced. We had over 100,000 men to provide for. That is the tax and the strain on industry which was placed upon the shoulders of my colleague, the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). He was to provide the clothing and equipment for all those men.

Nevertheless, the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough says, "The issue consisted of a cap, a blouse tunic, a pair of trousers, a shirt and a pair of boots." I will tell him that if he had been in the non-permanent active militia previously he would not have had boots, because boots were not issued to the non-permanent active militia until this year. They were issued by us in connection with the general change. He complains that socks were not issued to the non-permanent active militia. Men took their own socks and took their own boots. My hon. friend was issued with boots. I visited forty-two non-permanent active militia camps during the summer. I admit the men had not serge dress, but I think a great many of them did not want it. At the same time I do say—and I am not saying this in any complacent spirit, because I want to see units and men equipped to the last item of equipment to which they are entitled, and for which the issue provides—there was remarkable uniformity in those camps. And I say it was splendid, the way in which the men and the officers rustled around to get the things they needed.

I say to the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough, in all kindness, that I happened to be in uniform while I was a member of a legislature—I was not a member of parliament—away back in 1914-15 and 1915-16. I was a member of a unit, and a member of the Canadian expeditionary force, too. That unit was entitled to a good deal of equipment, but there was a lot of it we did not have. First as a platoon commander and afterwards as second commander of a company I considered it my duty to make the life of the quartermaster, and the life of the ordnance branch miserable until I got the items we needed. I did not go to the house of assembly to make a speech about it. Of course the hon. member is perfectly right—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the minister question the right of the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough to make a speech?

Mr. RALSTON: I was just about to say that I do not question the right of my hon. friend, if he thinks it best to make his complaint here; he has his right to do so. He happens to be a member of parliament, and also an officer in the army. He has made his complaint here, and I do not doubt other members will do so. But I do say the way to get what is needed is the way I have indicated. I should say this, that my hon. friend might have indicated to somebody at headquarters that he did not consider his unit was being properly looked after. I would have been glad to hear from him myself, but I never heard anything about it until my hon. friend spoke the other night.

Mr. WHITE: The minister is probably aware, better than anyone else, that no member of the forces is allowed under any circumstances to communicate with national defence headquarters. He knows that all such communications must come through the proper channels.

Mr. RALSTON: I wonder if my hon. friend thinks, seriously, that that is applied to members of parliament. If that rule were applied, how would the hon. member have felt entitled to make his speech?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, oh; this is a democracy.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend knows well that the door of the Department of National Defence is open to any member of parliament, and he may come at any time. I am saying this to my hon. friend only because I have been through the experience which he seems to have been through, and we got through it all right.

Mr. WHITE: May I interrupt the minister? He mentioned something about going to the ordnance branch. That may be all right, but if the ordnance branch had not received these supplies they simply could not pass them along.

Mr. RALSTON: That is correct.

Mr. WHITE: I have been to the ordnance.

Mr. RALSTON: Quite right. But what I want to say to my hon. friend is that the ordnance had a good many demands made upon them, and it seems to me he was not badly off in getting the list which he has put on record, if I may judge from what I have seen in the other camps. I had no complaints from other camps with regard to the same matter.

Let me mention something else. He has mentioned that there was no underwear. There is no issue of underwear to the non-permanent active militia. My hon. friend probably knows that, but he mentioned underwear. Then, he mentioned socks, and the same thing applies. Further, he mentioned aiming rests, and said that there was none available. I wonder whether hon. members know just what aiming rests are. They are made by putting three poles together, and putting a sand bag between them. Generally we regard most units as being able to make them for themselves. It seems to me my hon. friend, in his enumeration of deficiencies, did not miss anything which could be wanting.

He mentioned serge suits. I understand his unit has a full issue of about 800 serge suits; is that correct?

Mr. WHITE: There is quite a large number of men who have not serge suits.

Mr. RALSTON: I understand that 797 serge suits were issued to that unit.

Mr. WHITE: There are eighty men in one company without serge suits.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend's unit must be over-strength, then.

Then, with regard to greatcoats, he mentioned that some of the men were cold. I understand there were 1,000 greatcoats at Petawawa camp for the use of the non-permanent active militia on special guard duty, or anything of that kind. I do not know whether the hon. member discovered that or not, but they were there. Then, he mentioned a lack of machine guns. I am informed that his unit had four Lewis guns. He mentioned, too, the Bren gun, and made some observation about the Bren gun passing through the line.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Briefly.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, passing briefly through the line. Well, here is the order which was issued in that connection:

> Arrangements have been made to have a Bren gun on the training area Monday, September 9. This gun will be in charge of Q.M.S.I. Hegarty who will take it to the units in turn and give a brief demonstration.

That was a Bren gun for a non-permanent active militia unit in camp for fifteen days and, as I understand it, was for a unit which already had four Lewis guns.

My hon. friend understands—we all understand—that we have not very many Bren guns to spare for the non-permanent active militia units, when we have in Canada over 100,000 Canadian active service force troops.

Then, my hon. friend mentioned gas. I understand that my hon. friend's unit was put through a gas chamber, and that a non-commissioned officer and six men were given intensive training in gas protection, so that they might instruct at headquarters. Since then, thirty-five respirators have been issued to his unit for the purpose of continuing that training. I believe hon. members would not expect us to issue gas respirators to every member of the non-permanent active militia units. It is only for the purpose of training.

I am not, as the house knows, blaming my hon. friend, but I assure him that we were under tremendous handicaps this summer. I assure him, too, that the clothing was not piled up in the minister's office, or anything of that kind. On the contrary, it was issued and distributed to the units just as fast as we could get it. My hon. friend as well as every other hon. member must remember the threat of emergencies which existed along the coasts of Canada during this summer.

Let me now proceed to my reference to the non-permanent active militia units—and in this I include my hon. friend's unit. I have said before, and I repeat and emphasize it, that our non-permanent active militia units have been the back-bone of the mobilization of our active army, and I cannot praise too highly the interest, the enthusiasm and hard work which have been given so freely by the officers, the non-commissioned officers and the men who have taken part, in season and out of season, in maintaining the organization of this nucleus of citizen soldiers in centres, in communities and in hamlets all across the dominion. I have had the satisfaction of visiting a number of the non-permanent active militia camps and it gave me a good deal of satisfaction to see the keenness and the enthusiasm and the degree of proficiency with which they were intent on achieving.

I remember in one province—I do not want to make my hon. friend the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) too proud, but it happened to be in British Columbia—the members of one non-permanent active militia unit insisted on meeting after hours. I have no doubt that this was not the only place where this occurred. The sergeants were conducting classes of their own in order that they might be better able to mount guard and go through the exercises. They were trying to achieve that proficiency which was necessary on their part in order to make this the best unit in Canada. This is only a sample of what is going on all over the country.

I found that a platoon in one particular organization had sent its members to the camp in order that they might take a citizen's part in connection with the military training. I found professors from universities working side by side with labourers in the ranks, all anxious to make the best they could of the training which was provided.

This is the broad picture in briefest outline. From the front line in England, through the outlying islands of the Atlantic to our own coast, and from our coasts to the farthest inland point, our troops are at their posts. The early training is elementary and takes place as near home as possible. As the men voluntarily move into the active army units, units are organized and training becomes a full-time job. As the training advances, and equipment is received, these units are given more responsible work until finally they are fitted for the most important work of all, in our coastal commands or overseas.

I know that the house and the country have been particularly interested in the compulsory training scheme. I think I can say with some emphasis that the first thirty-day camp has been a distinct success. There was, of course, the physical difficulty of building and equipping thirty-nine camps across Canada in about two months. There was the problem of instructing thirty-nine staffs regarding an intensive thirty-day training syllabus and in the administration details of an organization which was new and which we felt must not be allowed to go wrong. These physical and preparatory difficulties were effectively overcome and the camps opened on October 9. Drill halls were one facility which were lacking in practically all the camps. I cannot go into the details as to the reasons for that, but I can say now that I expect that drill halls will practically all be completed by the time the next camp opens.

But the solution of problems of accommodation and instruction and administration was of secondary importance to the fact that the plan involved the inauguration across Canada of a new principle. When we stop to think about it, the real success of the undertaking lay in the fact that Canadians accepted this new principle of compulsory training as a necessary part of our activity. It was not anything the government did. Over 25,000 young men made that acceptance a living practical reality by the keenness and the enthusiasm which they displayed at the thirty-nine military training camps in the last four weeks.

Regarding the length of training, obviously no one expected or pretended that you could turn out a trained soldier in thirty days, but I am sure that even those who criticized it did not have in mind either the degree of preparation or the intensity of effort which has been packed into those thirty days. I think that all of us who have visited any of these camps have been most agreeably surprised at the progress which has been made and the interest which has been taken. I want now to express sincere appreciation to all who have contributed to this initial success—the indefatigable efforts of staffs of all branches of the service; the careful preparation by camp staffs, and the interest of communities, members of parliament and of citizens generally in helping to give such an excellent start to this far-reaching plan of national service.

I ought to remind the house that the thirty-day training period was never unchangeable or final. My colleague, the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) made that clear when he was Acting Minister of National Defence in his statement to the house on June 18 last, as reported in Hansard at page 861. He said at that time:

> The length of the period of training will be determined by regulation. Whether this will be for the continuous period of three months or for a lesser time depends: (a) on the advice of the technical officers of the department; (b) on the requirements of industrial and productive man-power as shown by a survey to be immediately undertaken.

The matter has been under repeated review both by myself, the war committee of the cabinet and by the staff. In a statement to the press some time ago I said that there had been representations regarding the increasing need of men in war industries, and that this whole subject was receiving the intensive study of a committee. I mentioned that one of the methods suggested in order to make more men available for industry might be to make the training period longer and thereby to reduce the total number of men to be called for training during any one year, and I indicated that various methods were being studied and that "whether any change might be made in connection with some of the later camps would depend on the result of the study which is now being made of the whole man-power problem and the needs of the munitions industry and of the services." A little later, on October 8, 1940, the chief of general staff, in his address in Ottawa—referred to by the leader of the opposition—referred to my statement and said:

> As my minister stated the other day, consideration is being given to possible alterations in the training schedule in order to adjust the period of compulsory training to changes and improvements in conditions and to the requirements of industry.

There is therefore nothing new in the suggestion of a longer camp period. It depends on such factors as the equipment available, the degree of training desirable and the needs of industry. In the extract which the leader of the opposition quoted, General Crerar indicated quite clearly that the determining factors at the time the scheme was launched were the importance of giving the largest possible number of young Canadians a practical outlook on their obligations with respect to national defence, and the restriction of the training period induced by the limited supply of modern weapons which would be required to continue beyond a short basic syllabus. Those two points are now in process of being met; the response to the first camp has been such that no man can doubt that the sense of obligation of which General Crerar spoke exists and is genuinely aroused. And I am sure that a second and a third camp will deepen and spread that sense of obligation; for it must be remembered that the men in these training centres represent a cross-section of the dominion.

Regarding equipment: we can now see prospects of increases which will make a longer period of training possible a little later on. But we also have to take account of the requirements of industry, particularly as we get into the higher age groups. Rightly or wrongly, industry has felt disturbed by the call of the lower age classes. Frankly, I think that there was no justification for that disturbance. The Minister of National War Services (Mr. Gardiner) had provided that war industries could make applications for postponement of the training of key men, and I have not heard of any cases in which, when bona fide applications were made, postponements were not granted. Nevertheless, it is a fact that the more men we train, the greater will be industry's concern regarding the possibilities of interference with war production. I have said it before, and I say it again, that under present conditions it is essential to the completion of equipment and the completion of training of those large numbers of men we now have in the Canadian army, that the needs of war industry for man-power be not interfered with.

To show our earnestness in this matter, the Department of National Defence has laid down the principle that it is not in competition with, but in cooperation with, war industry. As I indicated in a radio address early in July, nearly fifty per cent of the personnel in the modern army are tradesmen of one sort or other. Long ago we made it the rule that we would not accept tradesmen in the army except when there was a vacancy in the establishment for that particular trade. We have gone farther, and are preparing to undertake the training of the bulk of the tradesmen we will require in the army. We have gone farther, and have indicated to the departments concerned that we are ready to consider, subject of course to proper safeguards, granting extended leave to enlisted men in Canada who can be spared and whose services are requested by their former employers in connection with war-time production.

The war committee of the cabinet has had the matter of the length of the training period under review repeatedly in connection with the man-power problem, and we are now considering the further step of lengthening the training period to four months and reducing the aggregate number of men to be called from civil occupations in the year. This would at the same time give us in the citizenship of Canada a large number of men whose individual training would be complete.

Such an extension of time and reduction in numbers ought to help to prevent undue disturbance in industry. It would, however, involve some system of exemptions or extended postponements in order to meet the necessities of war-time production, and studies have already been made of the most practical methods of working this out.

These matters, both of length of training and of effect on industry and of exemptions, are subjects to which the United Kingdom has given a great deal of attention and we propose, before final authorization of this extension of the training period is given, to examine the situation on the ground when I am in England in consultation with the governmental authorities and staff who are concerned with this phase of the war problem.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will it be a condition precedent that the man himself consent? I know of a case where a man was wanted very badly to go back to an important job, but he absolutely refused to go because he wanted to stay in the army. I think account should be taken of that.

Mr. RALSTON: The house will understand that what I am doing is indicating the attitude of the Department of National Defence vis-à-vis industry. I am not saying what regulations will be put into effect in order to carry out the requirements. What shall be done with the man who is wanted in industry as a machinist, whether he wants to go or not, is a different story.

In the meantime, plans will be completed to facilitate the change if that is finally decided upon.

In any event there will be at least two more thirty-day training camps, that is, the one opening November 22 and another one early in January.

I make no apologies for the time taken in dealing with this matter of compulsory training. It affects man-power, both for the services and for industry. It involves, as I have said, a fundamentally new principle in connection with military training. It has received willing acceptance by those who are called for training and by the citizens of Canada generally. It can, I believe, be made an agency for providing reserves of trained citizens if needed for defence in Canada and at the same time assuring full scope to war production activities.

While I have spoken of the training plan under the National Resources Mobilization Act, perhaps some other features of army training may be of interest.

Our seventeen active army (C.A.S.F.) training centres continue to provide trained reinforcements for units overseas in all arms of the service. The two small arms schools have been converted into small arms training centres. They will conduct certain courses continuously throughout the entire year instead of during the summer months only as has been the case in the past. We have also special courses of instruction for internment camp guards and provost corps personnel.

These various active army training centres throughout Canada have been working to full capacity and at top speed during the favourable training weather in the summer and early autumn months. All available accommodation was in use for the purpose of giving instruction in such forms of training as rifle and light machine gun, anti-gas and elementary demolitions; training for personnel of forestry companies, cookery courses, driving and maintenance, refresher courses for officers, master-gunners courses, training of searchlight personnel and radiography.

Great strides were made in the unit training of active army formations, and during the camp period of the summer extensive field training has been carried out. For the winter, in addition to other training, preparations are being made for training on skis and snowshoes. Certain units have been selected to undergo special training in this connection, and we are issuing training instructions and equipment of appropriate types.

One of the most important questions we have had to consider is how the junior officers for our armies are to be selected and trained. We must bear the following points in mind: (a) We face a long war and must use our man-power resources to the best advantage. (b) We shall meet a highly trained and efficient enemy and must therefore insist that all officers attain a high standard of leadership. I underline the word "leadership".

We have reviewed the qualifications for officers, which have varied considerably, depending on different units and formations. We have determined on measures which will make for more uniformity, and which, we believe, will improve the standard of officer qualification.

Included in these measures is the decision that for the future every candidate for a commission in the Canadian Army must first pass through the ranks. Then, after a certain amount of training in the ranks, if their commanding officer finds them to have the required standing, they will be given the status of officer cadets and will be trained for their commissions at officer training centres, active or reserve. This system has been based on a study of the experiences of the last war and on the present practice in the British army.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister tell us what the practice was up to the time when this decision was made?

Mr. RALSTON: I say this to my hon. friend seriously. I would have to recite to him at least one page and a half of different regulations in order to answer that question. The regulations were three ways in the non-permanent active militia, and two ways in the Canadian active service force and I would not attempt to give the details from memory. But one thing that stuck out was the one-day examination, which I felt was certainly not satisfactory, and the other thing that stuck out was that some people, it seemed to me, got in with very little training. The idea here has been to adopt the system of training in the ranks first, and, second, training at a training centre, and not just training at headquarters.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would not ask the minister to answer my question further.

Mr. RALSTON: I am sorry I could not at the moment. This does not apply to those who already had commissions.

Mr. GREEN: Does this new plan apply to both the active army and the reserve army?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Now I come to accommodation. Consequent on the organization of the two coastal commands, the decision was made to concentrate troops at various centres within the commands. This required the erection of most extensive camps and preparations for winter occupation. This work has progressed rapidly and is reaching completion. Winter accommodation has also been provided at most of the larger permanent camps. I have already spoken of the rapid construction of the accommodation for 30,000 men in the thirty-nine reserve training centres.

Other establishments such as ordnance workshops, storage buildings, magazines and training buildings have been or are being built.

The more important army camps are at Debert and Sussex in the Atlantic command, Valcartier in Quebec, Camp Borden and Petawawa in Ontario, Shilo in Manitoba, Dundurn in Saskatchewan and Nanaimo in the Pacific command. Camps at Aldershot, Barriefield, Niagara and Sarcee have also been actively occupied during the training season.

There are, however, a good many other military establishments. Active army (C.A.S.F.) training centres are at the following places, and I think it is worth while to read them because I do not think the house appreciates the extent and diversity of the training which is being done. These are the training centres—not training by individual units at their headquarters or training in the units, but places to which men may be sent from all the units across Canada in order to receive training in connection with the army:

For infantry (rifle)—Camp Borden, Valcartier, Aldershot, Winnipeg and Calgary.
For infantry (machine gun)—Three Rivers and Dundurn.
For small arms—Kingston and Lethbridge.
For artillery—Winnipeg and Petawawa.
For engineers—Petawawa.
For signals—Barriefield.
For mechanized cavalry, armoured car and tank—Camp Borden.
For army service corps—Camp Borden.
For medicals—Ottawa.
For ordnance—Kingston and Petawawa.

Then we have district depots including staffs and reinforcements at the various headquarters of the military districts, with a number of sub-depots.

During the winter months there will be units stationed at many other points across the country where winter accommodation is obtainable and where there are facilities for training. Some idea of the magnitude of the work that has been done to prepare winter quarters for the troops can be realized from the following table showing the amount in round figures which has been or is being spent in accommodation for men, for vehicles and for administration and training facilities at some of the camps:

At Debert	$6,000,000
At Nanaimo	1,365,000
At Sussex	1,800,000

The figures for Nova Scotia and the Saint John area are since the beginning of the war.

Altogether we now have winter quarters in Canada for approximately 150,000 troops, compared with less than 50,000 in the winter of 1939-40. The use of converted buildings has been largely discontinued, and the great majority of this large number of men is accommodated in hutments designed and constructed specially for this purpose.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the minister suggest that these huts at Fredericton are suitable for winter service? He had better go and take a look at them.

Mr. RALSTON: I should be glad to look at them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Unless something more is done to them, the men will freeze to death.

Mr. RALSTON: Is my hon. friend talking about the militia centres?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The thirty-day training centres.

Mr. RALSTON: Is my hon. friend sure? It is believed that these hutments are fit for winter accommodation in places that are a good deal colder than Fredericton; they have been tried out in such places. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) will admit that it is somewhat colder in Edmonton than in Fredericton and they use that kind of hut there with three stoves. I might mention Quebec also. I am not dogmatic in anything, I only say they are designed for winter accommodation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They should have something done, because they are all open.

Mr. RALSTON: I assure my hon. friend they will be banked.

Mr. MICHAUD: It has been done.

Mr. RALSTON: In most centres where I have been, the banking has already been done, or at least the lumber has been put up underneath.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I was there on November 2.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend mentioned two matters, and while I am dealing with hutments I might as well deal with them. My hon. friend suggested that the hutments which were being built were of British specification. I do not think they would be any the worse for that, but I assure my hon. friend that they are not of British specification; they are Canadian specification, they are an evolution of hutments which have been used year after year in some of the more permanent centres, and the design is thought to be well-suited to Canadian needs. I have no doubt we shall learn something this winter with regard to them. I remember that the designs of the hutments last year had the ablution section of the hut in the end of the sleeping quarters; now the hutments are built in the form of an H with the sleeping quarters as the wings and the ablution section in between as the bar of the H.

With regard to the matter of costs and the cost of building by the engineer service vis-à-vis contractors, I have had that fully in mind as well. There were no less than ten of these camps which were built by contractors because of the fact that it was felt undesirable that the department and contractors who were already on the ground building something else for the services should be in competition in respect of labour. An arrangement was made between my hon. friend the Minister of Munitions and Supply and myself that the huts at these places would be built by contract. I want to assure my hon. friend that I have now as competent an engineer as I think there is in Canada, with an assistant and a representative of the quartermaster-general, visiting most of these camps and looking them over for the purpose of making a comparison of the camps from the point of view of expedition in building, of design and workmanship, and of approximate cost, that is to say the camps which have been built by contractors as compared with others built by the engineer services. I assure him that the matter has not been neglected.

One point that he mentioned was exceedingly technical. I did make inquiry about it. He wanted to know why we had the 2 x 10's planed on four sides. The answer is that it is done because they are spiked together to make the longitudinal floor beams for the sleeping huts and it is found necessary to plane them in order to make them fit closely together and give the best bearing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not objecting to planing the two sides, but why plane the edges? That costs money.

Mr. RALSTON: Well, that is the answer I give my hon. friend.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I tried to argue it out with the engineer and he would not consider my argument.

Mr. RALSTON: The further reason is given that it is to ensure facilities for inspection as to soundness.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It costs about $20 a thousand more—perhaps not $20 but a good deal more—to have 2 x 10's instead of 4 x 6's which would have the same carrying strength.

Mr. RALSTON: I am not in a position even to argue with my hon. friend, but in my ignorance I would have thought that a laminated beam of four 2 x 10's would be better than two 4 x 6's.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, we shall have to agree to disagree.

Mr. RALSTON: Regarding equipment or armaments and ammunition: we still have to face the fact of a serious shortage in equipment and armament, and we shall probably have to face that fact for a good while yet in many instances. Everyone knows the overwhelming demand which has been made on industrial production. Everyone knows the necessity for United Kingdom industry to produce for the services over there. Everyone knows the colossal demands on United States production because of increased United Kingdom demand and of vastly expanded requirements of the United States itself.

Canada has had thrown on it a burden of production of war materials which is unprecedented, in both quantity and variety. This has necessitated not only augmenting existing industries but creating many new ones. The policy has been and must be—I commend this to my hon. friend again—that with the front line in England the needs of that front line have first consideration. We have gone short and we shall not hesitate to go short so long as the material we produce is needed overseas.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Right.

Mr. RALSTON: My colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply will tell the industrial side of our war effort. That department is the one to which the Department of National Defence looks for supplies, and I can assure the house that the most constant touch and the closest collaboration is maintained between our departments.

In the Department of National Defence we have a staff which I think is indefatigable in trying to forecast our needs and endeavouring to fit them in with the possibilities of Canadian production, and all that intensive work and effort and closest consultation can do to supply the defence forces of Canada with the things they need is, I am confident, being done.

There is only one reason in the world that I know of why statistics regarding the rate of production and delivery of various items should not be made public, and that is that we do not propose officially and deliberately to furnish the enemy with information which he might spend millions of dollars by espionage and subversive activity to obtain.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Regarding personal clothing and equipment: we have, as hon. members know, been endeavouring all along to catch up with the heavy burden which was suddenly placed upon industry to supply in a short time uniforms, boots, socks, shirts and personal necessities in enormous quantities. I am glad to say that we have practically overtaken these requirements and we believe that the situation is well in hand with plans made for a year ahead. That is being taken now as a matter of course, but I do not think the house realizes the strain on the administration of the Department of Munitions and Supply and on industry to achieve that accomplishment.

For the reason indicated I do not propose to make more than general statements respecting what we call unit equipment. My colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply will no doubt say something about Canadian war-time activity in manufacture.

With regard to rifles the situation is the same as when I spoke to the house in July. We procured in the United States just a few thousand more rifles than we had furnished to the United Kingdom at the time of the emergency. These rifles have been distributed from time to time, and the position is now that the staff is satisfied that we are for the present able adequately to meet the situation for active service requirements and for training. Steps are being taken to meet future needs until production commences in Canada.

Regarding the manufacture of rifles in Canada; as I told the house in July, the department on its own made plans for the erection of a factory and for production here. The confidence regarding the preparation for and layout of this factory has been fully justified. The completion of the factory and the inauguration of production were handed over to the Department of Munitions and Supply. A company was formed under the direction of leading industrialists and my information is that the factory will be in production by the middle of 1941.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is the minister referring to rifles?

Mr. RALSTON: The rifle factory. My hon. friend asked why Ross rifles were given to trainees. The obvious answer is that we required the Enfield rifles for issue to the active service troops.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You did not have anything else. That is the answer.

Mr. RALSTON: I am not making any apology for it. I say that we required the Enfield rifles for issue to active service troops. The others did not require these rifles for preliminary training and the Ross had been reconditioned and could be used for the purpose. The rifles sent to Europe for United Kingdom use were Ross rifles.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They have been reconditioned.

Mr. RALSTON: If that is going down on the record, I should like to hear what it is.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I said that wooden guns would do just as well as what you gave the soldiers.

Mr. RALSTON: Apparently the leader of the opposition does not know as much about rifles as I thought he did. The production of ·303 small arms and ammunition will, I anticipate, reach the scale which I envisaged in July and careful calculations by the staff officers assure us that our needs will be adequately met.

Regarding Bren guns; I have given my hon. friend the number up to the end of September. I am not giving the number delivered each week, but it is a figure which I must say is most satisfactory having regard to what was planned on when production started at the plant. These weekly deliveries are increasing steadily and by the end of the first year of production we expect to have three times as many guns delivered as were called for by the contract.

My hon. friend spoke of the shortage of machine guns. He asked why there was a shortage. Obviously, the shortage of machine guns is purely relative. There are as a matter of fact several machine-gun battalions—Canadian active service force machine-gun battalions—and a number of non-permanent active militia battalions. The establishment has been changed and the number of machine gun battalions per division has been reduced to one instead of three—not by us but by the British establishment—indicating apparently that the requirement of machine-gun battalions is substantially less. I can assure my hon. friend that we have enough machine guns, and more than enough, to equip every machine-gun battalion which we have in the field, on the basis of present establishment, although not fully on the basis of the establishment which we originally had and which has now been reduced by the war office.

Let me say also, in connection with machine guns, that at the moment we do not propose to convert any machine-gun battalions we have into other battalions even though the place for them in the establishment is gone. We cannot tell what changes may develop, and we propose to keep them on as they are for the present. We have issued a certain number of machine guns for training in each of the machine-gun units.

Regarding field guns; the leader of the opposition spoke about this and referred particularly to two artillery units. Those which he spoke of are of course reserve—non-permanent active militia units. Naturally, with the large number of Canadian active service force troops we have, our first and primary duty is to distribute guns for their training and operations, and this we have done. It is obviously more useful for training to have guns at our artillery training centres, so that the men can have intensive training, rather than to scatter the guns among non-permanent active militia units. Even at that, already equipments are now ready for issue to about one-third of the non-permanent active militia units and will shortly be in their hands, and arrangements will be made so that the great majority even of those non-permanent active militia units will have guns for training.

Since I dictated this I have been informed that in a week's time distribution will commence.

I can say to the house regarding this matter of field guns that we have sufficient at least to equip a third and a fourth division. As I said in July, our supply was augmented by a further substantial complement, with necessary ammunition. All these are being high-speeded and are, in the opinion of the staff officers, quite sufficient for training and for the needs of Canadian defence until 25-pounders are available.

Production of 25-pounders was undertaken in this country for both British and Canadian account, and while the deliveries will not be as early as expected, my colleague, the Minister of Munitions and Supply, anticipates that a considerable number will be forthcoming in 1941.

In connection with signal equipment, I indicated in July that Canadian concerns were rapidly producing training equipment made up from standard commercial parts. These are being augmented by some thousands of sets from the United States, and two of the largest concerns in Canada are working in cooperation on the production of the latest British pattern of service equipment which we expect to receive early in the new year.

In this respect, my hon. friend asks why signal equipment is non-existent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I based that on Mr. Baldwin's statement.

Mr. RALSTON: The answer is that it is not non-existent. We had expected to get signal equipment from the United Kingdom. Because of the necessity for interchangeability we have to use the British pattern; but when it seemed that our supplies could not be obtained from the United Kingdom, we had to get into production in Canada and we arranged with two of the largest Canadian firms to take on the manufacture of this British technical equipment, which consists of wireless sets of different patterns, comprising a most complex variety of supplies. At the same time, we arranged with Canadian firms to give us supplies for training by adapting commercial sets for purposes of the army.

There has been a great deal of interest in tanks. The design and manufacturing problems in this type of weapon are particularly complicated, but, as is known, work has been going on as fast as it could possibly be done at the Angus shops of the Canadian Pacific Railway in Montreal. We also anticipate that other plants will soon be employed on tank manufacture. This is an instance in which there has been particularly close collaboration between the Department of National Defence, the Department of Munitions and Supply and the British and United States technical authorities.

With regard to motor vehicles and tractors, production has been most gratifying, and we have more than once agreed to subordinate our requirements to those of the United Kingdom in order that there should be no lack in the front line.

In this connection I might refer to two or three matters mentioned by the leader of the opposition. He said he had heard that vehicles had been shipped in an incomplete condition, causing a good deal of expense. There was a shipment of vehicles the parts of which were to be assembled in England. In the case of one shipment of about 500 units—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): About a thousand.

Mr. RALSTON: In one shipment of about 500 units, it was found, when they came to assemble the units, that the fan belt for the pulley had been omitted by the shipper. A cable was sent and the missing part was sent two days later and immediately installed, so that there was no delay, nor was there any interference with training on that account. That is what my hon. friend is referring to when he speaks about a shipment having been sent in an incomplete condition.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the minister say that was the only thing lacking?

Mr. RALSTON: I will come to the other matter, the batteries, in a moment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There were six different things lacking.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. RALSTON: I have not heard of six different things.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister could have found out about them.

Mr. RALSTON: I will give my hon. friend what I have here, first in regard to the brake test. Let me quote what my hon. friend said:

> Some hundreds of these cars which arrived in England could not stand a brake test, others were incomplete, and parts had to be secured hurriedly, in England, in Canada and in the United States. I am told that the cost aggregated $80,000.

The facts in connection with the brake test are that after the first few hundred vehicles left Canada, it was decided here, after a test, that the hand brake was not wholly satisfactory, that it was too difficult to get at. So they altered the design here. Some 615 of these vehicles had been sent overseas, and the new brake assembly was sent over for those vehicles. The cost of the materials for the change was $2,460; that is to say, the companies charged nothing whatever for making the change but charged only for the actual material that went into the new brakes, because they had already supplied material for one set of brakes. As I say, the cost was $2,460, and the estimated cost of labour to install the brakes over there would be $1,020. I think we can assume that probably the labour would be done by the ordnance corps over there and that therefore this was not an additional charge, but at the most the cost of the thing which I think my hon. friend had in mind as being $80,000 would be $3,480.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, no. What I meant by the $80,000 was that this amount was required to pay for replacements and parts that did not go over with the vehicles. It had nothing whatever to do with any brake tests or change in brake design.

Mr. RALSTON: All right. I will deal with the only other thing I can find, the matter of tools. I received a telegram from Price Montague that there were not enough tools over there, not because there was anything lacking in the tools which were sent over, because the full complement of tools was sent, but because it was found that they needed additional tools to work with in the shops. The telegram states, in part:

> The need for tools to service Canadian vehicles additional to those provided with the vehicles themselves originated at Canadian military headquarters in London. A meeting was called on May 7, attended by representatives from the Canadian active service force and Canadian military headquarters civilian technical staff, to decide nature and quantity of tools required in addition to standard British army issue. In implementation, orders were placed for such tools as could be obtained in the United Kingdom and national defence headquarters was requested in our cable Q.M.G. 222 of July 2, 1940, to provide the balance. We consider ample provision has been arranged. The main supply (of extras required in addition to standard British army issue) is awaited, most of which is of American and Canadian manufacture.

That may have accounted for the $80,000; I will find that out. I want to point out, however, that this did not arise from any deficiency on our part; it arose from a meeting held at Canadian military headquarters. In setting up and servicing these cars they apparently decided that they required more tools than were supplied with the cars.

There is one other point with which I should deal, to make sure that I have exhausted everything in this line. I found one other matter; that was batteries, to which I thought my hon. friend's general words might refer. In one of the shipments—I think it was the first shipment—in order to make sure that the vehicles could be set up and used immediately upon their arrival, the batteries were shipped charged but drained; that is to say, they remained charged but were drained of liquid. It was found that these batteries deteriorated and were not in shape for immediate use when they reached England. The result was that batteries were purchased over there to be used until these batteries were reconditioned. There was no loss whatever; after being reconditioned the batteries were perfectly good again, and we had the additional batteries as well. As a matter of fact I think now batteries are shipped dry and uncharged. It takes somewhat longer to get them in shape over there, because they have to fill and charge them, but it ensures their arrival in good shape.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It takes two days to do it.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend knows more about it than I do.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should; I have paid often enough for having it done.

Mr. RALSTON: The manufacture of shells which occupied such a predominant position in the last war has taken a comparatively minor place in Canada in this one, but I can reiterate what I said in July, that in addition to the substantial supply of shells on hand, shells are being manufactured in a number of plants in Canada and our arsenal is now in production in a limited way, with prospects of rapid expansion. I should say in passing that in addition to handing over the rifle factory to the administration of the Department of Munitions and Supply, it was thought well to hand over to that department for the duration of the war the administration of the dominion arsenals at Valcartier and at Lindsay, in order that all the manufacturing facilities of the government in connection with munitions should be under one department.

I think the enumeration of the articles which I have mentioned which are being manufactured in Canada—and I have mentioned only a few of them—will confirm what I have said regarding not only the extent but the diversity of Canada's industrial activities for war purposes. Hand in hand with these activities have gone the activities of the research and experimental agencies in many fields and what I might call the planning activities of the service departments and of the Department of Munitions and Supply in working out requirements and priority, having regard to the possibilities of effective production.

To sum up, I think I can again assure the house as I did in July that the most vigorous and effective steps of which we are capable have been and are being taken both by this department and by the Department of Munitions and Supply to make Canada to the maximum extent possible self-supporting and self-sustaining in munitions of war, in addition to rapidly becoming a large exporter of armaments to the United Kingdom. And I can say again that we shall not rest until we have produced or procured every item which is procurable to complete our military requirements in order to carry out effectively the task we have set for ourselves in what now appears to be a war not of months but of years. It is of no use for us to try to delude ourselves that the work in hand is something which will be easily or speedily accomplished. It calls for all the energy, all the loyalty, and equally all the staying power that Canadians can command.

I cannot forbear just a word at this point with regard to a comment made by the leader of the opposition about Australia. With regard to that country, frankly I do not propose to attempt to appraise the Australian war effort as compared with our own. One could spend hours dealing with conditions in Australia, ascertaining the exact point reached in production, and in equipment, and the nature of the functions which their forces are performing. Conditions there are and have been radically different, and I think comparison would be simply misleading and unfair to both countries. I submit that what we have to make sure of is that we in Canada are doing everything humanly possible to forward our own war activities; and if there is any instance in which my hon. friend thinks Australia is outstripping us under comparable conditions, let him tell me about it, and I will take the time necessary to find out all about it. In the meantime I propose to drive on with Canada's war effort as hard as I can, leaving Australia to do the same in her field of endeavour.

Before I close, Mr. Speaker, let me come back to the question of man-power and make one more reference. I should like to say a word regarding services which minister to the well-being of the troops, apart from their strictly military work. One is the dependents' allowance board, which furnishes an important service auxiliary to the Department of National Defence. It has had a steadily increasing task to perform. During recent months the average number of claims considered by the board has been over 4,200 every week, and there are now over 150,000 accounts in payment. The chairman and members of the board and their staff have worked unceasingly to keep up with the demands.

The other auxiliary service which I think is particularly important is the service which is being furnished through the Canadian Legion, the Y.M.C.A., the Knights of Columbus, and the Salvation Army.

These four organizations constitute what we call the auxiliary services, and they are officially recognized as the agencies by which activities for the welfare of the troops when off duty are carried on.

Their task is to give particular attention to the educational and recreational welfare of our soldiers. Officers of the auxiliary services, together with the necessary supervisors, have been appointed to all units in Great Britain.

In Canada special attention has been given to the areas included in the Atlantic and Pacific commands, without, however, neglecting other areas. Moving picture shows form a considerable part of the programme; there are seventy-five now operating and an additional thirty-nine are being arranged. Educational services, library facilities, sports, recreation and social activities, all come within the work being carried on.

The work is characteristically helpful and useful, and I want to express the thanks of the department and of the men of the forces for the fine contribution which those representing these organizations are making in the various camps and at the various military points throughout Canada.

I have taken time to mention this work not only because of its value, but because we ought to take an interest in it. I feel that this work is one which requires the wholehearted support, not only of these organizations, but of the citizens at large. This winter is going to be a testing time, not only for morale, but for character.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Training and equipment must always receive first consideration in a soldier's life, but parallel to these essentials the auxiliary services are carrying on a task that demands the very highest qualities of sympathetic and intelligent administration. In this period of training and waiting, many of our troops are undertaking the hardest job that can be asked of men who are at the stage in life which thrives on activity. They are receptive of all types of influence, and the responsibility that rests on their officers and leaders who are helping them to make the most of the activities of their leisure hours calls for the most searching thought and the most meticulous care.

Wherever there is an opportunity to assist in this work, I would ask for the most unselfish and generous aid from all our citizens. Every agency that can be brought to bear to provide wholesome activities during leisure hours should be regarded as part of a duty which this country owes and which the Department of National Defence, through the auxiliary services, has an obligation to carry out. The results, intangible though they may be, will amply repay the effort.

In the same connection I should like to say a word regarding chaplain services. Additional appointments have been made to the staff of chaplains in the active army and provision has been made for adequate chaplain service at the various reserve training centres. The churches everywhere in Canada have expressed readiness to support and assist the work being done. The chaplains who have been appointed have devoted their energies unsparingly to care for the spiritual welfare of the men in the services.

I should like to close with a very brief reference to what may be ahead of us in the critical days which are to come.

When I last spoke to the house, the so-called "battle of Britain" was in its opening stages. That battle has been decided for this year; the enemy has abandoned the hope of invasion, if he seriously entertained it, and the winter in that particular theatre of operations will be spent in a sort of siege warfare—harassing attacks from the air and the sea which, however much suffering they may cause to the civilian population, can lead to no decision. The danger of invasion is thought to be at an end for the year, but the threat may be renewed in the spring. By that time, however, the army in the United Kingdom will be even better prepared to meet it, and the enemy's chances of success very much less. All eyes are now turned toward the Mediterranean and there we may expect further developments in land operations.

The attempt of the axis powers will be to dominate the eastern Mediterranean, to drive the British from Egypt and Palestine and so finally to obtain the oil supplies of Iraq. Other theatres may open up in northern Africa.

On the whole we may expect that the operations of the empire land forces during the year of 1941 will continue to be largely defensive, while the pressure of the navy and the air force against the economic life of our enemies is being maintained and increased. During this phase we must continue to build up our strength against the day when we shall take the offensive with all arms and services.

We are working to a programme which is as definite as can be made in the lights and shadows of almost unforeseeable eventualities. That programme is based on a joint appreciation of the three services—army, navy and air. In connection with that programme, let me emphasize again that our plans and preparations are and must be made in conjunction with those of our predominating partner, the United Kingdom, and of the other dominions. Since the front line is on the English channel, it is vital that we maintain the closest contact with that crucial sphere of operations. There must be not only unity of purpose but unity of planning and execution. Our strength multiplies by integration. It is team-work which wins. For this reason, I expect before long to visit the United Kingdom, accompanied by some of the headquarters staff, to consult on many matters of common interest. I want to make sure that our own programme will be developed in closest relation to the needs, and I am sure we all desire that plans and preparations will be such that we will be contributing not only all our strength, but our most effective strength, to help defeat and destroy this menace to freedom and to life itself which hangs over the world. It will be a task of years. May we have the courage, the perseverance and the unshakeable resolution to see it through.

Mr. A. J. BROOKS (Royal): Mr. Speaker, it is a difficult matter to speak in this chamber, even under ordinary circumstances; but I find it somewhat more difficult this afternoon following, as I do, the long and interesting statement which has been made by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston).

In the short time at my disposal I shall not undertake to analyse the observations of the minister. He has given the house much information, and I am sure a great deal of it will be of interest not only to hon. members, but to the country in general. Listening to the minister this afternoon, we must realize that in order to get the whole picture of Canada's activities in the war we must have reports, not only from one minister, but from all of them.

As was stated by the minister, the activities of the Department of National Defence depend upon the amount of work done by the Department of Munitions and Supply. He has pointed out that the work of one department, and his in particular, cannot move any faster than the progress of the Department of Munitions and Supply will permit.

It would appear that I am the first member who would be affected by the ruling which was made by Mr. Speaker this afternoon, at the opening of the sitting, to the effect that speeches are not to be read. I wish the ruling had been made at the beginning of the session and, indeed, I suggest it should have been made at that time. Personally, I am in full accord with it, and in the short time at my disposal I shall endeavour as nearly as possible to abide by it.

It is customary for hon. members speaking in the debate on the address in reply to compliment the mover and the seconder. Unfortunately I was not in the house when those hon. members delivered their speeches. I have, however, read them; I have listened to the observations of hon. members who followed them in the debate, and I have read newspaper comments, all of which satisfy me that the congratulations which have been heaped upon those hon. members have been merited.

I agree fully with the observations of my hon. leader who stated, in effect, that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) rather went out of his way to characterize those who advocate more and more assistance to Great Britain as being more English than the English. We of this party have always contended that the fullest possible support should be given to England, not only for the protection of Britain but because our own salvation depends upon England to-day as it has depended upon England in the past.

Before the war some hon. members rather scoffed at this idea; it has been interesting to see the change of heart on their part. I have heard some hon. members advocate strict neutrality; others, nationalism, and others have said that our defence depended upon the United States. We have heard all sorts of half-baked ideas advocated in this house during the last four or five years, but it would be a brave or bold member who would rise in his place to-day and give expression to the same ideas.

I listened with much pleasure to the latter part of the address of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) delivered yesterday. After hearing that part of his speech I am ready to forgive him to some extent for many of the shortcomings of some of his previous speeches. I am sure there is none of us who does not share the feelings expressed by him. I was interested to hear his account of what has been going on in England during the last few months. We are all proud to know that while England is taking this terrific beating, her head is still high. The thought occurs to me, and I am sure it must have occurred to a great many other people, that if it had not been for a few thousand light-hearted and brave British boys in the British air force during the last few months, there might be a different story written for civilization and this empire of ours.

Yesterday I read in the press an article which brings to my mind another matter of which I shall speak in a moment. We all heard the eulogies of Mr. Chamberlain, and we all know how deserving they were. The article in yesterday's paper stated that the ashes of the late Prime Minister of Great Britain had been placed on the south side of Westminster Abbey beside the plain grey stone marking the burial place of Andrew Bonar Law, the Canadian-born Prime Minister of two decades ago. I would point out that from 1914 to 1918, when this empire was passing through one of the most serious times in its history, as it is to-day, it was a Canadian, born in New Brunswick, who stood next to Mr. Lloyd George in his efforts to protect and save the empire. I would point out also that to-day the man of whom we hear the most next to Mr. Churchill, the man who is doing the most to preserve this empire of ours, is another Canadian born in New Brunswick. We all recognize the wonderful work that Lord Beaverbrook is doing for this empire of ours, and I am sure that we of the little province by the sea will be excused for the great pride we feel in this connection.

We are all greatly interested, not only in the raising of troops but in the providing of munitions and supplies. We feel that New Brunswick has not been receiving the same attention in this regard as have other parts of Canada. Week after week we receive reports from the director of public information giving the amount of money being spent in Canada on munitions and supplies. It is seldom that any mention is made of munitions or supplies being provided by New Brunswick. I submit that this is something which should be corrected. That province is particularly well situated for the manufacture of munitions to be sent overseas. We are on the Atlantic seaboard, and instead of munitions and supplies being manufactured in central and western Canada, they could very well be made in New Brunswick, and thus save the expense of a long rail haul.

It is true, as will probably be pointed out, that considerable work has been done upon the airfields of the maritime provinces. But this is for the protection of all of Canada. The government could hardly help avoid spending money upon these airfields. The minister mentioned that considerable money had been spent in my home town of Sussex; I think $1,800,000 was the amount he mentioned as having been expended upon the construction of huts. There have also been considerable expenditures at Debert, Nova Scotia. This is work which has to be done for general protection, and my request now is that more munitions should be manufactured in New Brunswick, thus giving more employment to our people.

I was glad to hear the Minister of Agriculture state that he had arranged a trade agreement with the United Kingdom whereby the farmers of Canada would be able to sell more of their farm products. But this agreement will be of little benefit to the farmers of the province from which I come. Our farmers are principally potato producers and dairymen. The United States trade agreement had an adverse effect upon the potato producers of New Brunswick, and to-day it is almost impossible for a man engaged in this type of agriculture to make a decent living for himself and his family. It is interesting to note that in western Canada the price set on wheat is a minimum one, but the price of dairy products has been pegged; the price set is a maximum one. There is a vast difference between setting a maximum price for one product and setting a minimum price for another.

Then, in connection with bacon, while the farmers of the maritime provinces are not large producers of this product, there is only one reason why they are not. They cannot get feed from western Canada at a reasonable cost because of the high freight rates. Everything seems to work against the prosperity of the people of my province and the other provinces by the sea. It is not because we are not deserving. Is it necessary for me to point out to this house that from 1914 to 1918 there was no more patriotic section in this whole Dominion of Canada than New Brunswick and the maritime provinces generally? The same is true to-day. If you look at enlistments in the overseas forces, you will find that the men of New Brunswick are enlisting in numbers comparable with those of any other part of this dominion, and I repeat that we are not receiving the attention which we deserve and to which we are entitled. It has been intimated that perhaps we do not press sufficiently for these things, so now I address myself to the members from New Brunswick who sit on the government side of the house. I have sat here for five years and I am of opinion that the Liberal members sitting in this House of Commons have not pressed the government hard enough on New Brunswick's behalf. I want to assure them that if they will make a concerted effort to impress our claims upon the government in season and out of season, both inside the house and outside they will have the whole-hearted support of every Conservative member from that province.

It has been rumoured, Mr. Speaker, that my good friend the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) is about to retire from parliament in order to accept an appointment to the bench of our province. It is not merely rumoured but I have seen it stated in the press. I congratulate the minister if such is the fact and I might add that in congratulating him I am doing a great deal more than I think some of his Liberal friends are doing in New Brunswick. If the minister leaves this chamber and the cabinet, it will be necessary for the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), to appoint someone in his stead. I recall that the Prime Minister during the last election, and in speeches in this house since the election, said that he would select the best men he could get in this country for his cabinet. That should be the case. In times like these, the best men in the country are none too good. There are those who sit behind the Prime Minister who have questioned certain recent appointments which he has made, and I would ask the Prime Minister, when he selects a minister from New Brunswick, to select the best man he can possibly get from that province. Of course I know he has precluded himself from selecting anyone who is not of his own party. But we want strong representation in the cabinet from our province. This country needs strong representation, and if the best man is not in the house I ask the Prime Minister to go to the province and select there the very best man that can be obtained.

I wish to say a few words with reference to the training centres. First, let me say that I have had charge of a training centre for the past thirty days. At the beginning of the war, having been in the militia and on the reserve for some years, I volunteered my services either for overseas duty or at home, and just before the close of last session the district officer commanding the district from which I come telegraphed and telephoned me requesting that I take charge of a training centre in New Brunswick. I was glad to do so, and I suppose that as far as practical knowledge is concerned, I have as much knowledge of training centres as any man in this House of Commons.

A training centre was established at Fredericton. I had expected that there would be one training centre for the whole province but two were established. I have no great criticism to make of two training centres being established, one at Fredericton and one at Edmundston. If I had any criticism to make it would be that at a time when we are talking of unity in this country and trying to bring our people together, a splendid opportunity was lost in New Brunswick, where we have many English-speaking and many French-speaking young men, in not establishing only one training centre for the province where French and English-speaking boys could have come together and learned more about each others' opinions. This, however, was not done, and an English centre was established at Fredericton and the French one at Edmundston.

I was impressed by what the minister said as to the duty of our citizens to help entertain our soldiers in all parts of this dominion. I should like to pay tribute to the good people of Fredericton for doing everything they possibly could to help entertain the soldiers. The citizens gave us their bands for church parades; they opened their homes to the soldiers and provided them with entertainment.

I am speaking of training centres to-day from the point of view of the men who trained in them. There has been criticism levelled that the men who attended these training centres were an undisciplined mob. That term might have been applied to the men when they landed in camp the first day, coming from all over the province with their suitcases and civilian clothes, and some of them perhaps not knowing exactly why they were coming, but they could not possibly have been characterized as an undisciplined mob when they left camp thirty days later because they marched out with their chins up, just as fine a body of men as one could find anywhere.

There has been talk about these men being pampered. I think the government propaganda had something to do with that report giving the wrong impression across this country. I say emphatically that these men were not pampered nor did they wish to be pampered. If getting up at six o'clock in the morning, making your own bed, shaving and getting ready for breakfast at seven, and then after breakfast going out at eight o'clock and taking physical training and spending the whole day at drill—if that is being pampered, then these men were pampered. In addition, they had their fatigues to do. They made up their beds, rolled their blankets, cleaned out their huts, helped to wash the dishes and to scrub the floors; in fact, did all the work that men in barracks should do. I doubt whether any Canadian active service force unit in Canada during the first thirty days of their training, and perhaps much longer, made more progress or worked harder than did the men who were in these particular training centres.

I noticed in the Montreal Star a report that some men had come back from the training centres in certain parts of the province of Quebec and complained about the food. The ration in the training centres is the same as that given to the soldiers in every other camp in Canada. It is good, wholesome food, and I heard very little complaint. The fact is that unless a soldier is complaining he does not consider himself a soldier. Most of our wives will tell us that if we do not complain about the food at home they think there is something wrong with us, and if a body of men do not do a little complaining we would probably think there was something wrong with them.

But to give some idea of what benefit training is to the men and how they improve under the strict routine of military life, I had my medical officer, Captain Petrie, weigh and record the weights of men at different periods. The total weight gained from October 10 to November 6, roughly one training period, by 114 recruits examined for weight, was 648·5 pounds. Only one recruit, who had been sick for many days during the training period, lost one pound. The average gain per recruit for the training period was 5·68 pounds; which shows, as I say, that the military life and training are beneficial to the men.

I also have a summary from the medical officer regarding sick parades. The daily percentage of trainees on sick parade was 2·95 per cent. For the training staff it was ·63 per cent, or a total, for all, of 2·44 per cent. The total number of training days for the period for the unit was 25,800. The total hospital days for the unit numbered 239, and the percentage of training time lost on account of hospitalization was ·93 per cent. The medical officer also says that there was only one case of V.D., that is among the staff the first week. There were no cases among the trainees. There were only four cases of drunkenness during the whole time.

[Mr. Brooks.]

I mention these things in order to emphasize the type of young men that we have in these training camps. They are the finest young men that we have in Canada; they represent the very flower of the manhood of this country.

The health of the men in camp might be compared with the health of men who did not get to camp. The great number of men who were turned down in my province and all over Canada for different defects was surprising to me. In the last war we know that tens of thousands of our young men were found not fit for service on account of certain ailments. One might think that from 1918 to 1940 there would have been some improvement in the health of our people, but I am satisfied, from the statistics obtained during this examination, that the state of health of the young men of Canada is just as deplorable now as it was then. Although the men were medically examined by their home doctors before they came to camp, after they arrived at camp, as the Prime Minister pointed out the other day, fifteen per cent of them had to be rejected for medical unfitness. I would call it criminal negligence on the part of the authorities that we have not done more for the health of the greatest asset this country has, its young men. Mark you, these men were not all A-1; they were down to category C. If they had been examined for overseas service, the casualty list, so to speak, would have been much greater.

The minister this afternoon stated that the thirty-day period was not satisfactory. The period is not long enough; no man who knows anything about soldiering would say you can make a soldier in thirty days. One of the hardest things I had to do after training these men for thirty days and feeling that we could do something with them by further advanced training was to send them home feeling that perhaps we should never see them again in uniform and that the benefit of their training was lost. The men like the training, and I am pleased to hear the Minister of National Defence say that they have a plan on foot whereby men coming in for similar training will have the period extended.

As far as equipment is concerned, it was my personal opinion that probably the thirty-day limit had been set on account of lack of equipment, because there is no question that advanced training would have required more extensive equipment. In advanced training these men would need to know something about the Bren gun, and there are no Bren guns for training of this kind; there are not enough for the active service force units. They would need anti-tank guns and more gas masks and mechanical equipment and rifles, and these are not available. We trust that these matters are being attended to by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe); the question we would ask is, "Why was not more done at an earlier date to provide this equipment?"

Although the government has told our young men that they cannot be sent out of Canada for defence, that they can be used only for defence in this country, on their own initiative they are willing and anxious to serve outside Canada because they realize that that is where they should serve in order to defend this dominion. Answering a questionnaire, out of 660 men in my training centre those willing to serve in the Royal Canadian Navy numbered ninety-two, those willing to serve in the Royal Canadian Air Force numbered 266, those willing to serve in the active service force numbered 175, and those unwilling to serve anywhere numbered 127. Of the above, about 125 would like to get into the service right away; the others, as soon as they are required. This was prepared by my adjutant. He says:

> Apparently none of this class was engaged in any industry purely for war. A number worked in plants where government contracts have been let.

That, of course, is characteristic of New Brunswick, as I stated at the beginning of my speech, because we have very few plants producing munitions in that province.

I was interested to hear the Minister of National Defence say this afternoon that our place is side by side with England wherever the fighting is. There is no fighting here in Canada, and therefore it should be impressed upon our young men that their duty lies wherever the fighting may be. I have tried to impress this upon the young men with whom I come in contact because I think it is a patriotic duty which we all should discharge.

I was pleased to hear the Prime Minister say that the policy of his government and the country is to push our war effort to the limit of our capacity. That is a big statement. We have a wonderful capacity in Canada; I do not suppose that there is any other country in the world with a greater. We had a wonderful capacity in the years from 1914 to 1918, and despite everything that may be said about our war effort at that time, I do not think any Canadian need feel ashamed of the part which Canada played from 1914 to 1918. But we are told that we were not a united people in the days from 1914 to 1918; we are told that we did not have the whole-hearted support of every section of the dominion. To-day, on the contrary, we are told that we have this whole-hearted support of our war effort from one end of Canada to the other. Well, if our effort, which did not have the whole-hearted support of every section of the country, as the government would like to make us believe, produced 500,000 volunteers in the period from 1914 to 1918, what must we say of the capacity of Canada to-day to produce an army under conditions such as we have been told now prevail? We are willing to wait and see if what has been told us is true. There are many who have grave doubts.

It is nearly six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, and I do not wish to detain the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am going to move the adjournment of the house at six o'clock, so that my hon. friend may take all the time he needs.

Mr. BROOKS: I thank the Prime Minister. May I say this in closing. We are justly proud to be side by side with Britain in the present defence of civilization and democracy; but listening to the speeches that have been delivered in this house during the last three or four days, I have not heard any mention of a gallant little nation which is also standing side by side with Britain and is to-day fighting for her very existence. I refer to Greece. Greece to-day is the British empire's only ally. She is fighting as fought the Greeks of old, thousands of years ago, at Salamis and Thermopylae. I remember reading as a boy these lines from Byron:

> So fought the Greek of old,
> So will he fight again:
> Will not the self-same mold
> Bring forth the self-same men?

These self-same men we are proud to have as our ally to-day—men who are fighting to save as brave a country as any on earth.

We have been told that this will be a long war. It is hard for us to contemplate the prospect, all the harder when we read, as we do in to-night's newspapers, of such things as the fate that has befallen the historic city of Coventry in England, which has been practically ruined. Mr. Churchill, Britain's Prime Minister, assures us that we will fight on, unconquerable, until the curse of Hitler is lifted from the brows of men. It will no doubt take a long time; but when that curse is lifted, when the flag of freedom and of civilization floats once more proudly over the world, then the proudest boast we in Canada shall be able to make will be that we bore our full share in the defence of civilization, of home, of king and country.

On motion of Mr. Adamson the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at six o'clock.

Monday, November 18, 1940.

The house met at three o'clock.

ALBERTA PROVINCIAL BANK

PROPOSED REFERENCE TO STANDING ORDERS COMMITTEE OF QUESTION OF PROCEDURE

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave of the house to introduce the following motion:

That the standing committee on standing orders be instructed to inquire and report on the advisability of accepting as sufficient for this session the proceedings taken last session in respect of the presentation of a petition, the filing of a bill, and the publication of notice relative to the proposed incorporation of the Alberta Provincial bank.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as perhaps my hon. friend is aware, the committees have not yet been set up. The committee therefore to which his motion refers does not now exist. As soon as the present debate is concluded the committees will be set up. May I say to my hon. friend that I believe there should at that time be no difficulty in meeting his request. I believe however that the matter should stand until that time.

Motion stands.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR OPPORTUNITY TO DEAL WITH QUESTIONS AND MOTIONS FOR PAPERS RELATING TO WAR EFFORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. Having regard to the fact that many of the questions and motions for returns now on the order paper relate to Canada's war effort, will the Prime Minister seek the consent of the house for a temporary suspension of the present debate, in order that questions may be answered and returns made?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend was kind enough to notify me of his question. I have had just a moment to consider it. If the house is in agreement I cannot see why there would be any objection to our proceeding to the order for questions on, let us say, Wednesday, to have such questions answered and such returns brought down as may be ready. Hon. members would thereby have in their possession at an earlier stage than would otherwise be possible much of the information they may wish to secure. If the house is agreeable to receiving answers to questions on Wednesday next, I believe the government will be prepared to give answers at that time.

LABOUR DISPUTE

EMPLOYMENT OF PERSONS CLASSIFIED AS ALIENS IN GLACE BAY MINING OPERATIONS

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to direct to the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty). Has the Department of Labour been notified that the situation at No. 1-B colliery in the Glace Bay area, affecting 122 employees, classified as aliens by the native-born miners, has taken on serious proportions, the native miners refusing to accept the union executive board's decision to agree to the reemployment of foreign miners in that colliery, and threatening to use force to restrain so-called aliens from entering the mine? Is the Department of Labour contemplating any action to avoid what might become a serious situation?

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the matter has been brought to my attention but, I must say, not as completely or fully as has been done by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). It is one that is receiving the active attention of the department at the present time.

COMMONWEALTH AIR TRAINING

QUESTION OF HEATING AND OTHER FACILITIES AT DAFOE BOMBING AND GUNNERY SCHOOL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power). In the Regina Leader of November 15 there is a dispatch from Saskatoon referring to the inadequate heating facilities and the lack of medical services for the guards at the Dafoe bombing and gunnery school. A dispatch from Ottawa, appearing in the same paper, states that the Minister of National Defence for Air had ordered an investigation. Has the minister any information to give the house as to the results of such investigation?

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank my hon. friend for his courtesy in giving me notice of this question and in not pressing for an answer last Friday when the news item first appeared in the paper. As a matter of fact there has been some difficulty in providing heating and water at the bombing and gunnery school at Dafoe, Saskatchewan. This school is not to be opened for several months to come, but in view of the fact that construction has been going on for some weeks and substantial progress made it was thought advisable to place a guard, composed of eighteen men and a non-commissioned officer, as a measure of security against fire and sabotage.

I have two reports from the officers of the department. The first, which is dated November 16, states:

The chief works officer at Winnipeg reports that he gave definite instructions to the senior assistant engineer in charge of the construction of the buildings that he was to secure locally a supply of sufficient stoves for the airmen's building to be used for housing of guard. This was done and the senior assistant engineer in charge reports that this building is comfortably heated and there should be no complaint whatsoever from any of the airmen presently housed in this building, and there is no lack of heating in any way.

The question of water is rather difficult in that water has to be hauled for their use and the guard for washing, cooking and drinking. This, however, does not entail any hardship on any of the men at present stationed there.

The report then goes on to say that the contractors who are building this station have several hundred men on the ground who are provided with water and heat. It would not be very difficult for eighteen men to join these civilians should an emergency occur, such as the blizzard which struck the prairies last week.

I have also a report from the inspector general of the air force, Air Vice-Marshal Croil, who states:

Inspected Dafoe to-day and investigated alleged complaints security guard. Men of guard upset by report and are not complaining. Their accommodation is temporary and during the blizzard of last week was not warm but temperature did not go to freezing. Hiring of car for emergency transport was normal and claim for reimbursement has been made in usual way. No transport is provided to small detachments of this kind as usual thing. Water is very hard and unsuitable for washing but adequate supply of drinking water provided by contractor. Messing arrangements with contractors' men said to be satisfactory. Doctor available in half an hour for emergency.

This is all the information I am able to give my hon. friend.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Friday, November 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Brooke Claxton for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Blackmore.

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): Mr. Speaker, it occurs to me that we should give some reason for the calling of this session of parliament at this time. The government has no legislation to offer; therefore I suggest that the reason for calling this session is twofold. First, we have been called together so that the government can give to the house and the country a report on how it has been carrying on Canada's war effort. Second, we have been called together so that the people, through their opposition, may make criticism and offer suggestions where they feel that they are warranted. I believe that the calling of this session can be of inestimable value to Canada, provided, first, that heated discussions of party politics should be absent from debate and, second, that criticism offered by the opposition should be received by the government without rancour and hate.

It might be well to state briefly what has happened since we met here last June. I do not think the military position in Europe has been stated clearly enough. I believe it is still unwise to discount entirely the possibility of a German invasion of England. Each day for the last few months this possibility has been growing less, but we must not overlook the fact that it is still a possibility. Despite the heavy casualties which have been inflicted we should remember that the German army is still intact, is well equipped and continues to constitute a matchless striking force. It is also dangerous folly to think that German morale has deteriorated seriously. There may be a growing apathy among the people of Germany, but it is doubtful whether that has reached the fighting forces of the third reich. It is probable that friction is growing in the occupied territories, but we all know the ruthlessness of the conqueror. We should not think that outbreaks which occur here and there are a foretaste of revolution in Germany. We know how capable the Germans are of suppressing insurrection particularly by semi-armed or unarmed people.

The position of Russia and Japan must be considered by any government of Canada. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has advised against the making of inflammatory statements in this house, but I hope he speaks from a realistic point of view rather than with any idea of appeasement. We should not forget that the last British note to Moscow has remained unanswered for several weeks. We should remember that in Japan the extreme national party is in command of the army and the Diet. We must be prepared for hostilities in Asia, and we cannot count upon the United States considering herself obligated to send an armed force to take part in these hostilities. We may have to go this thing alone and face the forces of dictatorship and hatred which are present throughout the world.

We must take advantage of what has been learned from the invasion attempt and the aerial warfare which has occurred in England. For an invasion to be successfully carried out by one first-class power on another over water three things are necessary: first, you must have command of the sea; second, you must have command of the air; and third, you must have an overwhelming superiority in the machines on land warfare.

In the present condition of the battle of Britain we find that Britain has command of the seas. This vital asset has unquestionably saved civilization all over the world in this dark hour. It must be realized, however, that the strait of Dover is merely twenty miles across, and the use of vast quantities of smoke ingeniously employed has imposed most serious restrictions on our naval forces.

In the air, parity is rapidly being approached, although we are as yet unable to bring the battle to the enemy with the same intensity as he to us. It is doubtful whether we can be safe in assuming that we have very materially decreased his production of aircraft. A twenty per cent reduction would I believe be optimistic. Owing to our tragic losses of material in the battle of France and Flanders it must be assumed that the enemy has a vast superiority in all branches and types of the machines and instruments of land warfare.

[Mr. Adamson.]

The Prime Minister pointed out in his excellent address that Hitler now controls 42 million tons of steel while we in the British empire control a mere 18 million tons.

The enemy has not been able to effect a landing in England, with all his advantage in land materials, and a partial advantage in air materials, but without the advantage of naval superiority.

It follows I think from the foregoing that before we can carry the battle to the enemy and invade him we must have a triple superiority—by sea, by land and by air. At present we are deficient in the last two components.

Up to the present the aspect of the war in western Europe only has been considered. If we are to accept the dictum of Clausewitz and attack the enemy's weakest point we must consider the Mediterranean theatre of war. Here we have an enemy whose morale may already be said to have reached the first stage of degeneration, namely, the apathy of the civilian population to the success of their armed forces. But before an expeditionary force can be placed in the Mediterranean theatre of war it must be able to operate away from its bases for considerable periods of time. It must have an abundance of the materials and weapons of war. I think we are safe in saying that we can take greater liberties in our warfare against the Italians than we can take with their doughty northern axis partner. But before we can send troops from Canada to the Mediterranean theatre we must see to it not only that they are thoroughly equipped with all the necessary arms but that they have as well a very great reserve.

In view of the foregoing I think we must look carefully at Canada's present position. It appears to me that the importance of the machines of war has not yet been fully appreciated by the government. The old tank slogan, "be lavish with steel and stingy with blood," might in this war be turned to read, "be lavish with steel or perish without." At the present time in Canada we are unable to equip with all its component parts even one infantry rifle battalion, and at the present rate of Canadian production it will be several months before we can. What progress we are making in the production of artillery ordnance, anti-aircraft guns, tanks, fighting and bombing aircraft, as well as all the thousands of other pieces of equipment so necessary to an armed force, remains a secret. The vital question we have to answer is when these weapons are going to be put into the hands of our armed forces so that they may become proficient in their use in order to attack and destroy the enemy. Winston Churchill has stated in a speech, the candidness of which has not depressed but rather aroused the British people, that Britain was unable to supply arms and munitions for troops from overseas as her entire productive capacity was now being utilized for the troops in Britain.

Will the government state specifically the number, the calibre, the quantities and dates when we may expect delivery of these things? Perhaps the Prime Minister has forgotten that we too are British and can take it.

In this connection I should like to point out one of the difficulties and one of the cautions that have to be observed in giving information. A balance must be kept between the danger of giving information to the enemy on the one hand, and the evil of having an uninformed Canadian people on the other. This problem must be solved. It is here I suggest that a military committee of the house would be of great value. They could meet with the general staff and receive explanations of what is being accomplished, production figures, schedules, etcetera. If such a committee were formed it could report to the house on matters which were not secret. On secret matters it could say that the information it had received was secret but satisfactory and that progress was being made. This would save the minister a great deal of work and criticism and no doubt relieve the general staff of a number of headaches. It would be a non-partisan committee and therefore would be most likely to inspire confidence in the country.

I think the house would be interested in knowing the sort of information the Germans would like to get. Let us take a hypothetical case. We are building tanks in Canada with, shall we say, ten centimetre armour. The Germans have in production two anti-tank guns, one of which pierces five centimetre armour and another which will pierce ten centimetre armour. If we gave to this house the information that we were producing tanks with ten centimetre armour the Germans would immediately say, "This gun of ours is of no further use. We will concentrate on the production of a gun which will pierce the tanks the Canadians are making." That is the sort of information it would be dangerous to give. That is the sort of information which, as the minister said, the Germans are spending millions of dollars trying to obtain. I submit that that sort of information should not be given except in the very greatest secrecy.

But here is the sort of information which I think we should have. I know the production of Bren guns and it is excellent. I think the minister should state what the production of Bren guns is, for the good effect it would have on the morale of the people of Canada. It is one of the essential things we should have—that and other information of production which cannot give aid and comfort to the enemy. Too much secrecy, Mr. Speaker, is bad for the morale of the people. If we had this information I feel sure that the next time we went to the country with a war loan the people would rally round much better than they did the last time, and the loan would be oversubscribed in a much shorter time. I leave that suggestion with the government for what it may be worth.

I come now to the question of the carrying out and the carrying on of the war, particularly against the southern member of the axis. In all seriousness I suggest to this house that we, the second greatest enemy of Germany and the greatest Catholic country at war with Germany, should inform the Prime Minister of England that we are prepared to see our air force bomb Rome. I say this as a Christian, as one who has been in Rome; I do not know how many other members of the house have been there. I have seen the service in St. Peter's; I have received the blessing of His Holiness the Vicar of Christ. I have seen the catacombs, where St. Peter and St. Paul carved their names on the sides of the caves that were used as churches, and I have stood in the coliseum where for over four hundred years the Christians were martyred. Nowhere is the long, bitter, violent fight for a Christian civilization better exemplified than in the coliseum at Rome, where to-day stands a simple wooden cross denoting the triumph of Christianity over the forces of barbarism. The symbol of pagan Rome was the fasces. The symbol of Mussolini's Rome is the same fasces. To-day in that city the monument to Victor Emmanuel, with the rampant horses and the pagan symbol of the chariot atop, makes a wonderful target. The Piazza Venezia is right next door, and these are all far removed from the holy city, the Vatican. These make excellent targets. If you can once drive a dictator out of his capital you make it impossible for him to exist. If we can destroy the confidence of the people of Italy in their pagan leader we will have done a great service and struck a great blow for Christianity.

Since the government has asked for suggestions, and since it should be the policy of the opposition to offer constructive criticism, I should like now to make some concrete suggestions to the government.

First, the place to defend Canada is in Europe. To wait and delay until the war is brought to Canada, until our own country becomes the battlefield and our own women and children are bombed, would be criminal folly. We must defend ourselves on the battlefield three thousand miles away, not in Canada. Therefore I suggest that we must be prepared to equip and send overseas a large, well-prepared striking force.

Second, at the present time we cannot equip the forces we now have under arms, nor can we obtain equipment for them elsewhere. So that the production of arms becomes of more immediate importance than man-power. This is our most pressing problem. The Canadian people must be informed accurately and precisely, not merely by way of a recapitulation of the contracts let, as to the true state of our war effort.

Third, the training of military personnel must be so arranged as not to conflict with industry. A comprehensive plan must be prepared by all industries engaged in our war effort, indicating the present and future demands in regard to man-power. To-day we have approximately 50,000 employable unemployed in this country. It is estimated that by July of next year industry will require a further 500,000 technically trained men. These men are as vital to the defence of Canada at the present time as are the soldiers who enlist in our army. Therefore I suggest that the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Gardiner) should go to the registration list and call out for training in our munitions industries all available people between the ages of eighteen and fifty, in order to make up this apparent deficiency.

Let me cite just one instance. The John Inglis company of Toronto now employs 2,500 people. By July it hopes to employ about 6,000 people, but it does not know where to get those additional men. This company is engaged in highly technical, highly skilled work. Men must be trained for this work before they can be employed, and now is the time to train them. Now is the time to call them out from their ordinary civilian occupations and train them for employment in our war industries. This is a total war. Each of us in Canada has a job to do. If we are employed in civilian occupations and the government needs us for war work, whether as a soldier or in making machine guns, we must be prepared to go and do the country's bidding. Therefore I suggest an immediate recapitulation of the national registration scheme, calling out all those who may become useful in our war industries.

I should like to advance three further suggestions of a military nature, because I consider it my duty to do so after having observed existing conditions. First I should like to discuss the much discussed issue of free transportation for soldiers.

[Mr. Adamson.]

Manifestly it is impossible for any government to be expected to provide free transportation every six months from Newfoundland or the West Indies. These troops are on active service. In the last war we did not get leave to Canada except under very exceptional circumstances. I understand the present policy is to rotate the units in the various outposts so that all may get leave whenever the military situation permits. Where you have large concentrations of troops in central Canada, as at Borden or Niagara, a serious problem, however, does present itself. I believe the men get two week-end passes a month from Borden. This means that about 5,000 troops are moved, mostly down Yonge street, every Friday and back on Sunday night. The return fare by train is $1.85, considerably more than the average day's pay of the Canadian soldier. The men naturally hitch-hike, and this causes congestion on the roads and is bound to mean casualties, many more in winter than in summer. I suggest that a troop train be run from Borden to Toronto, and I suggest further that a fare of 50 cents be charged, and also that the train be under the command of the provost corps to ensure discipline en route, and that the train be run every major leave day. If this were done and a provost squad patrolled Yonge street and prohibited hitch-hiking many lives would be saved, the troops would get good, cheap and rapid transportation, and general economy would result.

I am not sure whether the house knows that it costs the country about $6,000 for every soldier killed in an accident, and besides that the country has to look after his dependents. I suggest that for short leaves and short passes a ferry service could be run from Borden to Barrie, for five cents each way, and no hitch-hiking on this road should be allowed. I suggest also that a ferry service be run from Niagara to St. Catharines to look after the Niagara camps. It is only where you get great concentrations of troops that danger exists. The Canadian people are only too willing to give troops a lift on the highways, but where major camps are situated special arrangements must be considered.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member, but last week I had occasion to call attention to the fact that speeches were being read during this debate and I asked hon. members to be good enough to assist the chair in seeing that this practice shall not be followed. If I allow the hon. member to read his speech I must allow every other hon. member the right to do likewise.

Mr. ADAMSON: I quite agree with you, Mr. Speaker, but I was reading this statement in order to get it accurately on the record, because it is of great importance to the military authorities and to the troops at present training in Canada.

It is difficult to forecast the future, but it would seem to me that the peculiar genius of the Canadian soldier for mechanical warfare has not been sufficiently appreciated, and I make this suggestion, that we increase the strength of our armoured brigade to at least an armoured division. It is extremely probable that when our troops are called overseas they will have to fight in mountainous country. I therefore make the further suggestion that instruction in mountain warfare be given our troops or certain parts thereof. This could be done very easily at stations in the Rocky mountains or in the Laurentian hills.

There is one thing more I would suggest to the minister, and that is that when the troops go over in this war it is very unlikely that they will be able to receive a further period of training in the theatre of war. They will have to go from Canada completely trained and completely equipped to participate in warfare immediately. I would suggest that a training ground in, say, northern Ontario or northern Quebec be made where our troops could have experience in cooperation with the other arms of the service—using tanks, mechanized units, artillery and infantry together, as in actual combat, so that they will become familiar with the peculiarities of the arms and with essential methods of unified warfare. At the present time the infantry train very largely with the infantry, the artillery are to a certain extent segregated at Petawawa; and while there are tanks at Borden greater scope should be given to them. We have ample territory in northern Ontario for such a scheme to be worked out.

Further, with regard to internment camps, I suggest that these camps be placed entirely under the jurisdiction of the district officer commanding the military district in which they are situated, and that he be made responsible for the discipline and the entire running of the camps. At present there is a duality of command, which is likely to lead to certain discomfort in the operation of this service. I do not know whether the house realizes that in many instances the German prisoner is rewarded by his government, or at any rate promised reward by his government, of an increase in rank for every attempt he makes to escape. This increases the number of attempts to escape.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend knows, better than most I suppose, the method of administration of the internment camps, and I am sure that if he will look at the orders which have been issued he will be able to satisfy himself that there is no duality of command. The district officer commanding is in control. What my hon. friend refers to is the fact that there is a provost corps and a veterans guard, each of which has a central commander; but the responsibility for the camps is under the district officer commanding. The same situation exists with regard to the ordnance corps. That is a separate corps, with some control from headquarters, but at the same time the ordnance officer is under the district officer commanding.

Mr. ADAMSON: I appreciate that. I was referring to the provost corps and the veterans guard.

Mr. RALSTON: There is no duality of command so far as control of the internment camps is concerned.

Mr. ADAMSON: Under the director of internment operations?

Mr. RALSTON: He reports only to the Secretary of State.

Mr. ADAMSON: The district officer commanding is entirely responsible for all?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON: I am glad to have that information.

I should like to make two or three suggestions in connection with the industrial aspects of our war effort. I suggest these two things to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). There are some technical terms which I should like to have permission to read, because I wish to get them all on the record correctly.

I suggest that steps be taken for the manufacture of starch from wheat and potatoes. My information is that there is no technical difficulty in this process either from potatoes or from wheat; that while several small potato starch concerns do now exist there is no wheat starch plant. I am also informed that wheat starch can to a very large extent replace corn starch and that wheat dextrin could be used instead of corn dextrin, of which Canada imports about 10,000,000 pounds annually. Further, that wheat makes excellent confectioner's glucose, 60,000,000 pounds of which are used per year in Canada. This is now made one hundred per cent from imported corn.

My second suggestion relates to alcohol made from wheat and potatoes. Alcohol for admixture with petroleum-produced gasoline is common in Europe. To-day England is being bombed by the Luftwaffe using a high octane fuel which is a mixture of potato and petroleum refineries. There are no technical difficulties which would prevent the use of a wheat-based alcohol. My information is that a mixture of ten to fifteen per cent alcohol is common. We have to-day in storage 840 million bushels of wheat; next year there may be over a billion bushels in storage. All our petroleum products have to be imported either in the raw or in the refined state, thus using valuable foreign exchange. Surely the government might foster the operation of a plant of this kind as an emergency war measure.

I have a third suggestion to make. My friends the colloidal chemists have repeatedly asked me why no aeroplane frames made of plastics were being turned out. I understand that a year or so ago representations were made to the government to investigate this field. It was pointed out that Canada was a non-ferrous country and that the construction of aeroplane frames would probably be beset with great difficulties because of the lack of trained metal workers. It was also shown that we have an abundance of the ingredients to produce the finest laminated plastics, and that their manufacture even into complicated air-frames does not require great numbers of highly skilled workmen. It is also known that these raw materials are not available to the enemy in anything like our quality or quantity. Surely all possible effort should be given to this work, which may revolutionize the production of aircraft and put Canada right in the van of production. I understand some experiments are being made now, but my criticism of the government is that they should have been made long ago, and either we should now be producing plastic aircraft or we should know that their production is impracticable.

Mr. HOWE: When we were first approached on the subject of plastic air-frames we placed an order with the inventor, who was then in production, for three. At the same time we started experiments of our own in the national research laboratories. Both these approaches have been followed up continuously; no time has been lost.

Mr. ADAMSON: Will the minister give further information on this subject when he speaks?

[Mr. Adamson.]

Mr. HOWE: Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON: I should like to bring up as an example one further subject—bentonite. This substance is used in the manufacture of lubricating oils. It is now imported to the extent of 15,000 tons a year, the value per ton being about $80 in United States funds. We have a deposit of excellent quality in Manitoba. Has this been investigated? If not, why not? I mention this item, which is small, as an example of the development work to be done in Canada and as showing that we must utilize all our natural assets to win the war. Let us learn a lesson from the enemy, whose scientific use of all the natural resources of his country has been one important factor in his success to date.

I also believe it is our duty, as the senior dominion, to recommend the formation of an imperial war cabinet. In the last war we had an imperial war cabinet, and it proved, I think the Prime Minister will agree, of great value. In this war the British empire stands alone; we have no ally. Surely it is even more essential now that we should have an imperial war cabinet to discuss cooperation, mutual assistance and other matters. The position of the high commissioner is not enough; the government should seriously consider the bringing into being of an imperial war cabinet.

Finally let me say to the Prime Minister that we appreciate the difficulties of his government. We appreciate the difficulty of running Canada's war effort. We want to be led, we want to be told, we want to know what he is going to do. We want the leadership, the courageous leadership of Winston Churchill. We want to be told what to do. We know that if the government fails we fail too, all democratic things fall, and that goes for our way of life in Canada. The country is behind the government, but the country demands that the government shall give leadership. I leave that with the Prime Minister. The country will follow, the country will work, the country is with you, but for God's sake give us leadership.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): Mr. Speaker, I confess that in preparing the notes which I thought would be required to make a factual statement of the position of Canada with respect to the development of the air force I was somewhat embarrassed as to the extent of the information which it would be possible for me to give to the house. My hon. friend who has just spoken (Mr. Adamson) has still further increased my embarrassment by asking that the ministers give an account of the numbers, categories and types, dates of delivery of war material and equipment necessary to arm our forces.

Quite frankly, in considering this matter in regard to the air force, I do not know just what reply should be made to my hon. friend. I have in mind particularly the air training scheme; after all what hon. members of this house and the country want to know is not what the schedule is or how far we have advanced it, but how many pilots are going to be sent overseas and when. They also want to know what aircraft we have and of what types; those we actually have on hand and those which are to be delivered, and when. Unfortunately the advice which we receive from overseas—and I have a dispatch under my hand—is to the effect that there is considerable danger in making public detailed information with respect to these very things—that is, the output of the scheme and aircraft production.

Now, I have been long enough a back bencher in this house to look askance at what I might call ministerial alibis, but I ask the house to believe me, and to prove what I say I am quite willing to hand over to my hon. friend the acting leader of the opposition (Mr. Stirling) a copy of the dispatch which I have mentioned, and to give him or any other hon. member a full and complete statement showing the number of pilots, observers and gunners that will be produced from this scheme and the number of aircraft we have on hand and will have on hand for several months. However I hope the house will excuse me from mentioning it during the course of this statement.

Perhaps at this point I ought to give the strength of the Royal Canadian Air Force as of different dates. On September 1, 1939, there were 450 officers and 4,000 airmen. On April 1, 1940, there were 1,223 officers, 9,444 airmen and 1,241 civilians. On November 12, 1940, there were 2,389 officers, 29,096 airmen and 4,586 civilians. There are at the present time, included in the above figures, undergoing training as air crews men numbering 7,227. Last month we enlisted 1,900 air crews men.

For the purpose of giving an exposition of the work of the Royal Canadian Air Force we have usually divided the activities into three parts, namely that of the air force overseas, that of what is known as the home war establishment—the air force in Canada—and that of the joint air training plan.

With respect to the air force overseas I would say this. There are at the present time overseas representing Canada three squadrons—one fighter, one army cooperation, and one which has up to the present been known as a pool or composite squadron, which went over originally as an army cooperation squadron.

No. 110 army cooperation squadron proceeded to England early in the year 1940 under the command of Squadron Leader, now Wing Commander Van Vliet of Winnipeg. The squadron went into intensive training with the Royal Air Force, performing the work allotted to it in training and in reconnaissance. It was placed under the operational control of the Royal Air Force during the months of May and June, and has continued to perform the functions allotted to it by the Royal Air Force. But it is at the same time attached to the army division commanded by Lieutenant General McNaughton.

As the house will remember, No. 1 fighter squadron was dispatched to England during the month of June, at a time when matters appeared to be at their darkest overseas. The house will recollect that two squadrons, namely No. 112 and No. 1 fighter squadron, were dispatched overseas. No. 1 fighter squadron was under the command of Squadron Leader, now Wing Commander Ernest McNab of Saskatchewan. It was immediately placed under the tutelage of the Royal Air Force, for training, and to gain the latest experience in aerial warfare.

Prior to working together as a squadron, squadron leaders, individual pilot officers and others had their turn of duty in actual combat with the Royal Air Force. When it was deemed ready to take its place in active operation as a unit, it was declared to be "acting in combination with" the Royal Air Force and then came under the operational control of the British Royal Air Force. It has been occupied steadily in operational work in the defence of London, since that time, with the exception of a three weeks holiday or rest which was given to it some time ago. It has now returned to its operational duties.

I need not dwell at great length on the magnificent work carried on by that fighter squadron. Members of it have won awards, decorations, and the highest praise and eulogies from their companions in the Royal Air Force and from the press of Great Britain generally, as well as from Britain's most prominent statesmen. They have carried on in the tradition which was created twenty years ago by the Canadian boys who served in the Royal Air Force. They have been in the thick of the fighting. They have been a source of pride and glory to our country.

With respect to No. 112 army cooperation squadron, which, as I said, was converted into a pool reinforcing squadron for No. 110 army cooperation squadron as well as for No. 1 fighter squadron, it has been carrying on its work in training and in reconnaissance. I believe I might say here that a great many of the officers were somewhat unhappy about it. They were somewhat impatient in that they wished to take a more active part in the operations. But the exigencies of the situation did not require that their services should be utilized in the defence of Britain, and up to the present time they have not been. During the last week, however, as a consequence of the supply of trained pilots from the Royal Canadian Air Force in Canada who have been going forward as reinforcements, and owing to the fact that the output from the joint air training plan is beginning to make itself felt, and that that output will continue in a highly satisfactory degree, it is now possible for us to transform No. 112 cooperation squadron into No. 2 Canadian fighter squadron. Very shortly these men will take their place alongside No. 1 fighter squadron in the battle of London and in the defence of Great Britain.

Reports which we have concerning our men overseas generally indicate that their health has been good, that discipline has been exemplary, that morale has been high, that they get along extremely well with their Royal Air Force comrades, that there is the closest cooperation between the Canadian Army and the Canadian air force, and, finally, that there is coordination of effort and cooperation with the authorities of the air ministry.

I cannot leave this brief review of our activities overseas without making mention of the Royal Air Force Canadian squadron. The Canadian squadron of the Royal Air Force is manned almost entirely by boys from Canada, many of whom were trained in the Royal Canadian Air Force and others in the flying schools across the country. Since the break through in Holland and Belgium they have been giving a magnificent example of devotion to duty and of courage in the most active operations and, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said a few days ago, they have earned a very large number of awards and have to their credit a great many victories over the Germans.

The home war establishment to all intents and purposes is the backbone of the Royal Canadian Air Force. It has been denuded of its personnel, first by the dispatch overseas of a great many of its officers and men, and, second, by the necessity of using the men trained in the home establishment for purposes of the joint air training scheme. Nevertheless it has been able to carry out the duties and functions allotted to it with remarkable persistence and success.

Briefly, its duties are the reconnaissance of bays and inlets and ports on the coast in order to ascertain if the enemy is trying to establish himself in these outlying districts; to patrol the harbour entrance of protected seaports to locate any possible undersea enemy craft, and to perform the work of anti-submarine patrol in connection with convoys, both outgoing and incoming, throughout the hours of daylight and to assist surface escorts. On many occassions these patrols extend far out into the Atlantic. It has also the duty of being constantly prepared for bombing and striking duties in support of the naval forces, or when required to attack enemy surface craft, raiders or others located by reconnaissance. It provides air striking force against hostile raiders, submarines and potential landing parties, as well as searching the coast for the enemy. All our aircraft on these duties carry bombs and armament sufficient to attack the enemy on sight.

In addition to the bomber reconnaissance squadrons there are other squadrons whose duty it is to assist the coast artillery in spotting during target practice, and of necessity to be ready for spotting duties should more serious work occur. Since I last addressed the house in June the establishment has been considerably increased. There has been authorized a much greater establishment for both coasts. However, I must say that it has not been found possible to fill up to strength all establishments, either in personnel or aircraft. The training plan and supplementary schools are supplying personnel, and there is an improvement in the aircraft situation. The improvement will be greater as time goes on. On July 29, 1939, I said the following:

> In consequence of the situation in Britain, although our aircraft equipment resources at the moment may not be so great as might be considered desirable, we would not wish to make good our shortages by depriving Great Britain of supplies essential to her immediate needs from sources to which both Canada and the United Kingdom has access.

That was the policy with respect to the strengthening of the home war forces and the defence forces in general, and that policy is still in effect to-day.

A word as to the officers and men who are on duty in Canada. During the recess I had the pleasure and privilege of visiting the air force stations from Newfoundland on the Atlantic coast to Prince Rupert on the Pacific, and I was struck by the high morale, the good discipline and the excellent spirits which prevailed among these men. It is not an easy task that they have to perform. It is not very pleasant to be stationed at the Gander Lake air port in Newfoundland or at Alliford Bay, Bella Bella or Coal Harbour on the Pacific coast. These men are far away from any form of amusement and from anythink like real companionship. They are not near the bright lights of the big cities. In the performance of their duties they have to fly in all kinds of weather, through fog and snow, in season and out of season. Although their work is not so glamorous or thrilling as the work of the men overseas; although they will receive little publicity for performing their duties conscientiously as they do, I believe that we in this house should pay them the tribute of saying that their work is well done.

I come now to the joint air training plan. In connection with this scheme there are three important factors which must be taken into consideration. First, there is the personnel; second, there is the aerodrome development and construction, and, third, there is the supplying and provisioning of aircraft. The whole aim and object of the plan, which is sometimes confused with side issues and supplementary work which is being carried on, is to produce fighting pilots and air crews. There are all kinds of incidentals leading up to this production, but the thing upon which we must set our eye is the fact that the main production of the air training school is pilots, gunners and observers. That is all important. The rest, although necessary, are only incidental and supplementary. At all costs we must produce as soon as we can and as efficiently as we can the greatest possible number of those who will take their place in the fighting line.

In order to indicate the complications incidental to the operation of the joint air training plan, which sometimes confuses the public and even those who are close to the scheme, perhaps it would be better if I gave a concrete illustration. We have in Ottawa, at Uplands, a service flying training school. These schools are probably the most important of all the schools in the scheme. It is in these schools that the pilot receives his instruction in what are known as intermediate and advanced flying. From there he proceeds overseas. All hon. members may not have seen this school, but I am sure that most have heard it at work, particularly in the early hours of the morning when sleep appears to be most blessed.

There are less than two hundred pupils at this school, but the staff necessary to look after the accommodation of the pupils, the maintenance of the aircraft and buildings and the administration of the school number 853. In some respects this school is the opposite to what is to be found in other schools or universities. In order to get together this staff of 853—I am now referring to what I have termed incidentals and supplementaries—we had to train practically all the members. For instance, there are fifty-five officers, 638 airmen and 160 civilians. There are thirty-five flying instructors. These instructors all had to go to a school for instruction at the central flying training school at Trenton, which turns out in varying numbers a certain number of instructors every month.

There are, at Uplands, officers whose duty it is to carry on the work of administration. Most of them, except for a very few who were connected with the permanent force, are men who only two or three months ago held positions in civil life. The work of administration of flying schools is not similar to the work which they were in all probability carrying on in civil life, and it was necessary therefore to send them also to a school for instruction. We opened a school of instruction at Trenton under an experienced air force officer who knew something of the problems of running an air training school, and there we turn out an average of approximately forty administrative officers per month.

There are also connected with Uplands, equipment officers and accounting officers. It was necessary to send these men to an equipment and accounting school. A school was opened at St. Thomas, which up to the present has graduated 160 equipment officers, 707 equipment assistants, 88 accounting officers and 446 accounting clerks. For a while the school was turning out approximately 171 pupils every six weeks but I am happy to say that we have pretty nearly completed the work of training this particular type of officer, and I think the output of this particular school will taper off and in the future come down to nothing.

Again at Uplands there are wireless officers and wireless operators, some of them in the commissioned ranks and some other ranks. Most of these men are graduates of the wireless school at Montreal, where men are trained to take their places in future wireless schools under the joint air training plan or in the home war establishment; and from these schools men have already been sent overseas to take their place alongside the Royal Air Force in the present combat.

We also need engineering officers. All these men I would say have previously occupied positions as engineers in civil life. We have sent them to the school of aeronautical engineering in Montreal, which turns out twenty aeronautical engineers every three months.

Again we had to open as incidental and supplementary schools, schools for armament officers, armament instructors and armourers. Again I repeat, I do not want the house to confuse these men with the eventual output of the flying schools, which is air crews. A school was opened at Trenton, where at regular intervals men are being turned out to be armament instructors, armament officers and armourers.

Back of these schools which train the men who help to maintain the flying schools in operation, there are other units which we must take into consideration. There are, for instance, equipment units, four of them, one located at Montreal, one at Toronto, one at Winnipeg and one at Calgary. These equipment depots are composed of approximately sixty buildings. They have practically everything inside them from a needle to an anchor—barrack room equipment; articles for the upkeep, repair and overhaul of aircraft; articles needed for the comfort and convenience of the men—everything from stationery to the largest type of aircraft. These depots have to be manned, and equipment officers and equipment clerks have been trained to man them.

Then there are repair depots where airframe mechanics and machinists carry on the repair work for the stations or the commands in which these repair depots are located. There are at present three, one each at Trenton, Winnipeg and Calgary. Each one of these repair depots employs from 500 to 600 airmen, mostly mechanics.

There are also schools for training motor boat crewmen, to be used in crash boats on both coasts. There are schools to train aircraft inspectors; there are manning depots and initial training schools.

But by far the most important of the supplementary schools, and that is why I leave it to the last, is the technical training school located at St. Thomas, Ontario. We were fortunate in securing through the Hon. Mr. Hepburn and the government of Ontario an institution the like of which I doubt could have been obtained anywhere else in the British empire. I do not want to dwell upon the magnitude or magnificence of the building except to say that there is located at St. Thomas one of the most modern and best constructed institutions in the world. The government of Ontario very generously placed it at the disposal of the government of Canada shortly after the war broke out. In this institution, which is devoted largely to the training of mechanics, we have been able to house approximately 4,000 pupils. There is a staff of 420. The pupils are trained mostly in air-frame mechanics and aero-engine mechanics. A flow system has been established whereby approximately 150 men come in every week and 150 graduate. The course lasts eighteen weeks. The men are sent to the stations, home establishment or the air training plan. I am not going to say that these men become perfect machinists or mechanics, but they receive a training sufficient to enable them to do the work which we have to ask them to perform when they reach the schools such as the one at Uplands, where at the beginning they are placed probably under the charge of some senior man; and there they do the work of checking, overhauling and repairing the aircraft used by the pilot pupils. This school I think would be a revelation to anyone who cared to look at it. The men are well accommodated; so far as I was able to ascertain they are well treated, comfortable and happy. The work being done is of the utmost importance, and appears to be carried out efficiently.

In passing may I say that something like 253 air-frame mechanics and 120 air engine mechanics are required for a station like Uplands, so that the importance of St. Thomas as a pool from which we can draw the men required is not to be exaggerated.

In order to get pupils for St. Thomas advantage has been taken of the youth training programme; in conjunction with many of the provinces—seven out of nine—men are being sent to technical training schools after having been medically examined by the air force and after having been told that when they pass their examinations at the provincial technical training schools they will have the option of coming into the air force if we require them. From this source last year we obtained 1,500 recruits, and this year we are hoping to obtain 6,000 more. It is confidently hoped that by means of the youth training programme and the facilities offered by the provinces in conjunction with the air force, and through graduations from the technical school at St. Thomas, it will be possible for the air force to obtain almost all its requirements in regard to trained mechanics without in any way robbing industry. It is true that to some extent we will impinge on industry's potential, in that we are taking a great many of the younger men and training them ourselves; but on the other hand I sincerely hope that it will not be necessary for the air force to resort to direct enlistment from industry. By training our men almost from the beginning we will be able to develop men who will be satisfactory in that they will be competent to do the work which will be allotted to them.

Now for a moment or two I should like to discuss some of the other schools whose activities are concerned with the training of air crews, pilots, gunners and observers, with particular reference to elementary flying training schools and air observers' schools.

Of late, if I am to judge by the questions and motions for papers appearing on the order paper, hon. members have begun to take an interest in the elementary training schools and air observers schools. The function of these schools is evident from their names, but what apparently has not been generally appreciated by the members of the house is that schools of these two types are operated by civilian companies. Almost it would appear as though in some way this fact had been kept secret. Personally I had intended mentioning it on several occasions, but did not find it convenient or appropriate to do so.

By way of digression, I may say that I was talking to one of my friends and confidants about the difficulties I would have in making this statement to the house in view of the fact that I could not disclose all particulars of the training scheme. This man, for a long time a member of this house and possessing a caustic wit, said, "Why don't you place it on Hansard? That is the best way to keep a secret, for nobody ever reads Hansard." That observation to some extent is borne out by the fact that last year an hon. member asked for the production of papers with respect to civilian training schools, including the model contract entered into between these schools and the government. I produced that contract and called attention to the fact that certain matters pertaining to it were of a confidential nature. But so confidential did this hon. member keep it that to-day I find on the order paper, in the name of his next-door neighbour in this house, a request for the production of the same document.

At the present time and for some time past in Great Britain elementary flying training has been carried on by civilian organizations. When the scheme first came up for discussion in Canada it was decided to follow the example of Britain, for a good many reasons, most of which I think will appeal to the judgment of the house. It was decided to take advantage of the experience of the flying clubs in Canada. Each club in this country has been offered and will accept the sponsorship of a company to operate an elementary flying training school. The procedure was something like this: Officials of the air force inquired of the Department of Transport the location of the nearest civilian flying club. When they were given that information they approached the members of that club, men who in season and out during the past years, in spite of a great deal of discouragement in many cases, have pioneered and developed flying in Canada. These men were asked to operate flying schools, and were told: "In order to obtain this contract, first you must form a company sponsored by your club." That was in order that there should be no debts left over from the club, and no involvement of any kind with the club's finances.

Each of these flying clubs incorporated an elementary training school. They were asked to furnish a certain capital, from $35,000 to $50,000. The government furnishes the buildings and the aircraft on loan and the companies furnish the management, the instruction, the food and the maintenance of the aircraft. The contract is something like this. There is paid a management fee of $1,400 for every four weeks—it works in four-week periods. That is the period during which the pupils are stationed at the school. Out of the $1,400 the operating company—that is to say, the club transformed into the operating company—must pay their manager's fee, their secretary, treasurer, stenographers, telephone operators and the whole general office staff. Other fees are paid in accordance with the number of hours flown, and generally there is paid the cost of gasoline and oil, and possibly other incidentals.

No company is allowed to pay a dividend of more than five per cent on the subscribed capital of $35,000. The books of the company, which are set up by government accountants and supervised and inspected continuously by government accountants, provide that at the end of thirty-six weeks, that is six accounting periods of forty-two days, there shall be a revision of the contract, and the government steps in and takes away 75 per cent of any profit which may have been made during that time, and fixes a new price on the basis of that profit for the ensuing six months.

No company can distribute more than five per cent; the rest remains in the treasury of the company, to be reviewed every six months, the object of the review being to ensure that the remuneration shall closely approximate the expenditure.

Those most closely in touch with it believe that there will be little or no profit to be made by elementary flying companies out of this venture, but the government must see to it that at least enough profit is made to keep them in operation, because it is considered extremely important that this work should be done by civilian companies; otherwise the hundred or more employees on the staff of these stations would have to be enlisted in the air force and would be a continuing liability to the government in the way of pensions, keep, pay and so on.

Every flying club in Canada will have an opportunity, and has agreed, to undertake to sponsor one of these companies, and we have men in civilian life who are thoroughly familiar with flying under all the conditions that prevail in Canada, men who have supported flying to a greater extent than any other civilians in the country. I may add that in at least two instances and probably more—one instance being Vancouver and the other St. Catharines—these elementary school companies have been incorporated on a non-profit basis, and the charter shows that they do not intend to take any profit whatsoever. In one other instance the promoters and directors have inscribed in the minutes a resolution to the effect that they do not propose to take any profit but that any profit made will be invested in government bonds to be cancelled after the war. In two or three instances I know of, the manager of the club, who would naturally draw a salary of $300 or $400 a month, is turning that salary back to the government either in the form of subscriptions to war charities or by direct contribution.

Mr. STIRLING: Has the minister mentioned how many of these schools there are?

Mr. POWER: There will be twenty-six elementary training schools in Canada when the scheme is completed. Perhaps that is not quite correctly stated; I should say there will be twenty-six units, because three of the schools will be doubled; that is to say, instead of taking in seventy pupils they will take one hundred and forty. In other words, under the same group there will be two schools combined. One of the double schools is at Boundary Bay, another at Oshawa and another at Vernon.

At present there are sixteen schools in operation. I have prepared a list of the schools showing the name of the club sponsoring and the designation of the operating company. I have also a list of directors of each of these operating companies. With the permission of the house I should like to place this information on Hansard:

We feel very strongly in the air force that this system of giving out the work by contract should not be disturbed. It has been successful in the old country, and, so far as we have been able to ascertain in the months in which some of the schools have been operating, it has been successful here. At present fifteen schools are operating and one more will open on November 25, and we have been able from actual experience to ascertain that the work they are doing is efficient. It is saving in many directions, including a saving in respect of further organization. We are already overburdened with the work of organization. It prepares men for the work which they will have to do when they reach the more advanced schools, which are, of course, under the absolute control and management of the air force itself. The schools are supervised by air force officers, they are checked as to finances by air force accountants, and they are checked as to profits by the terms of their agreement with the government.

This contract was entered into before I came into the department, but it appealed to me in the same way as contracts given in many other civilian operating concerns. I am more familiar with the lumber business than with any other, having spent many years of my life in it. In the lumber business it is almost an axiom that it pays the operating company far better to give out certain contracts to jobbers and contractors: the work is done more efficiently, the overhead is less and the supervision is closer. Applying the same principle to the air force I think it will be found that the supervision is closer, the work is done more efficiently, and we do not have to spread ourselves out so thin. The Lord knows we are spread out thinly enough already in most of the activities of the air force, and when we can entrust the work to someone who possibly has equal experience and knowledge it saves further spreading out.

There is another reason, and I think it will appeal to hon. members. It is important in this kind of undertaking and in a scheme of this magnitude that as many people as possible in Canada should have an interest and a stake in it. Here are men who knew about flying, who were developing flying in their own community, who in many instances are the leaders of the community; to my mind it would have been a great misfortune had we not been able to enlist their services in the great work we are doing. I do not believe that we should in this country create too much of a professional class in the army, the navy or the air force. We do not want a nation of fans and rooters; we want more and more that the nation shall be players, and the more we can get in to assist us the better it will be for all concerned. Then they can cheer and applaud us when we are successful and groan and support us when we are not so successful.

Along the same line of thought, there have been brought into the department civilians who are expert in business organizations and in financial control to assist us in obtaining supplies from the Department of Munitions and Supply and in maintaining liaison with that department. These men, a great many of whom are working for no remuneration, have given to the department something of the initiative and capacity which obtains generally in business throughout Canada. Besides that we have in uniform in the air force men who were leaders in their communities and a credit to the business in which they were engaged; men who, sometimes in a very humble capacity, are carrying on and giving us the benefit of their brains and experience. To these civilians we owe a debt of gratitude, and as Minister of National Defence for Air I express it to them.

To continue with respect to the plan itself, under the plan as it was laid down at zero date, April 29, 1940, sixty flying schools of all descriptions—that is, schools in which flying is carried on—were to be constructed and ready for operation by December 31, 1941. In addition to that there were training units to be established to provide staff and personnel for these flying schools: three initial training schools, seven staff schools, twenty recruiting centres, two manning depots, eight equipment and repair depots, and also four training command headquarters—in all, sixty schools for air crew and forty-four other administrative, instructional and maintenance units. I can inform hon. members with certainty that by June 30, 1941, six months before the originally contemplated date, all our constructional programme will enable us to have 103 out of 104 of those units operating, of which 58 out of 60 will be schools for air crews and 45 will be administrative, instructional and maintenance units. This represents a straight acceleration of six months in the construction and provision of training facilities. In addition to that we shall have by that date developed and built aerodromes for the use of air force personnel in Canada to account for an expenditure of $20,000,000.

With respect to aerodromes, on June 10 last I informed the house that commitments had been entered into for the following aerodrome and hangar facilities for the training plan:

Aerodrome sites and ground improvements, through the Department of Transport....	$12,458,339
Buildings and facilities.....	19,745,000
	$32,203,339

The works contemplated on June 10 have all been completed, and we are in process of adding considerably to them. As a matter of fact the expenditures to which we are committed and which we are now undertaking, for the remainder of the fiscal year, will be almost double the 32 millions anticipated in June. It will amount to $62,167,645.22, made up of sites and improvements, contracts let through the Department of Transport, $20,512,328.68—that is, aerodrome sites other than buildings—and buildings and facilities, contracts entered into through the Department of Munitions and Supply, $41,655,316.54, making a total of $62,167,645.22. We have also undertaken to expend on behalf of the home war establishment, as differentiated from the joint air training plan, $12,224,020, of which $1,200,000 will be expended in Newfoundland.

Mr. HOMUTH: Will the minister explain the difference? He said "as differentiated" from the regular training plan.

Mr. POWER: I will tell the hon. member about it in a minute or two, so far as I can. We have undertaken to expend for the Royal Air Force on school facilities $20,000,000. This makes a grand total of $93,210,594 which has been expended or will be spent up to March 31, 1941 in the joint air training plan and for air defence facilities. I must warn the house that we shall have other heavy expenditures during the coming fiscal year.

Now, with respect to aircraft, I informed the house in June that under the agreement certain types of aircraft in certain numbers were to be supplied to the joint air training plan by the United Kingdom, some to be produced in Canada at United Kingdom expense, some to be produced in the United States at United Kingdom expense and some to be produced in Canada and the United States at the expense of the Canadian government. The house is I think familiar with the original financial set-up of something like $600,000,000 for the whole scheme, of which Britain was to pay in kind by way of production of aircraft and other accessories a certain amount, Australia a certain amount, New Zealand a certain amount, and Canada's share of the expenditure was to be $350,000,000. I do not mind saying that both Canada's proportion and the aggregate amount will be greatly exceeded before we are through.

When the house prorogued the number of aircraft in use was comparatively small. We had a comparatively small number of schools in operation. As I said a moment ago, we now have sixteen elementary training schools, three observer schools, five service flying training schools, and within another month we will have eight. So that the requirements for aircraft have been enormously increased.

The aircraft we had in June consisted almost entirely of elementary trainers, of which we had a sufficient quantity and of which, I may say, we still have a sufficient quantity. We are still able to procure all that are required. But other types, more advanced trainers, were required. Some difficulty was experienced in obtaining them, but I am happy to say that at the present time, with all the schools open which will be opened in the immediate future, we have adequate supplies of training aircraft, including advanced twin-engine, single-engine and elementary trainers. By next June we will require for the purposes of the plan three times as many aircraft as we have at the present time. Provisions have been made whereby, if the contractor does not fall down on the job, and if two or three other things do not happen, we will have the aircraft in June. I hope and pray that we will.

As I said at the opening of my observations, I could lay before the house a full statement of every type of aircraft and the number of each which will be required from now until the end of 1942. But I am advised that that is not the right thing to do.

I should like to make some observations concerning the pupils. As the house is well aware, the pupils coming under the plan come from all parts of the empire. Under the United Kingdom's share they come from Newfoundland and the Straits Settlements, and under our own share we have accepted British subjects from the Argentine. Then, they are coming from Australia and from New Zealand. From the experience we have had they have been proven to be the best material which could be found. Compared even with what we expected, the percentage of wastage or failure has been extremely low. The men from Australia and New Zealand, whom we have had with us for some little time, have shown themselves to be the very best material, and have given an example and served as a model for our own young men from Canada.

Fortunately the plan was organized so that we can produce at the same time as the organization is being built. That is, it works under a unit system. Some units may be in operation and producing at the same time as other units are being installed. Without betraying any secret I can say here that in 1941 and, counting in, if you like, the graduates in 1940, twice as many graduate pupils, pilots, gunners and observers will go overseas as was anticipated when the plan was brought into existence.

This is due to many factors. I must confess that it is not entirely to be placed to the credit of the administration in Canada. It is due to the transfer overseas of certain operational training; to the ability of our schools here to take in more pupils, both elementary and service flying training; to the rapid construction of facilities, schools and so on in Canada and, I believe, too, to the good work of administration by the officers of the Royal Canadian Air Force.

And now a word with regard to the British schools which have come here. I have not dealt in detail with the operation of those schools, but I now have permission to mention that they are established here. They are manned and equipped by the United Kingdom. The aerodromes were built and developed by the Canadian government at a cost of nearly $20,000,000 which is, of course, reimbursable to us. For purposes of administration they are attached to the commonwealth air training plan, and therefore for purposes of administration they are under the control of the Royal Canadian Air Force.

I should like to summarize this somewhat long and rambling discourse by saying that the commonwealth air training plan has now passed its half-way mark, that it is producing now and will continue to produce in ever-increasing quantities. Simply because we say that the plan is working and is in operation, it would be altogether unfair to suggest that we are not having difficulties every day of our lives, or that there are not all kinds of impediments and obstacles in the way. But when we give a report on the plan we must say what it looks like in the aggregate, whether it is to be successful or unsuccessful, whether it has or has not been accelerated. I do not want hon. members or the people of Canada to feel that we are trying to feed them with soothing syrup when we say that the plan appears to be far more successful than was at first anticipated. We admit that during its course we have met with innumerable difficulties and obstacles, some of which have not been easy to overcome. I can now say that whereas the original plan was to reach its full operation, that is, to be complete and at its peak, in April of 1942, by September of 1941 all units and schools will be in full operation; and long before that we shall have reached at least three-quarters of the peak capacity of our air crew production.

May I say this further in connection with the air training plan generally? The hon. member who spoke immediately before me touched on the subject, and with that part of his speech I am in entire agreement. Perhaps it is not sufficiently realized by the people of Canada, as I believe it is by members of the government, that in this war and at this particular stage of the conflict Canada has an enormous responsibility to bear. It will be remembered that during the last war Great Britain had as allies Russia, Japan and Italy, and she had associated with her the United States and a host of other countries. To-day Great Britain stands alone, with the nations of the commonwealth. Among those nations of the commonwealth we are proud to boast that we are the foremost and most important.

Mr. MacNICOL: The Greeks are doing a turn too.

Mr. POWER: I am sorry I did not mention the Greeks. They are doing a wonderful work. Their resistance has been nothing short of a miracle. I know all hon. members hope and pray that that nation will be able to continue to carry on as it has for the past three weeks and repel what is probably the most cowardly assault which has been made during the course of a war remarkable for the cowardice of unwarranted attacks upon small nations.

Canada has a responsibility to bear. We are the senior partner in the commonwealth outside Great Britain. We are not, as was the case in the last war, simply making a contribution to the common pot; we are in the war as a partner. In the particular work with which I am associated for the moment it is patent to all the people of the world that eventual success cannot be won until we first achieve air equality and then gain such air supremacy as will permit us to take the offensive without which no war can be won. In this respect the Dominion of Canada has a far greater responsiblity than was ever dreamed of during the last conflict. We are the mainstay and right arm of Great Britain. In so far as the joint air training scheme is concerned we believe that we have reached the point where we can predict the success of the plan and the attainment of our common object. In order to do this, and I say this frankly without any hesitation at all, we need the help, the advice and the support of every hon. member of the house and of all the people of Canada. I do believe that we will receive it.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the presentations of the different members, and particularly of the ministers who have addressed the house during this debate. I appreciate the difficulties of the ministers charged with the responsibility of the different departments connected with our war effort. The presentation of their reports to the house was a job in itself. I am afraid that throughout the country they are not receiving the cooperation that they should. As a member representing a Nova Scotia constituency I am pleased to see on the other side of the house the former premier of Nova Scotia who is now Minister of National Defence for Naval Affairs (Mr. Macdonald). While I know we will disagree on many subjects during the time we are privileged to be here, I believe I am safe in saying that in the matter of seeking a solution for the problems of Nova Scotia we will have no trouble in getting together.

I should like to make a brief reference to two statements which were made in the house by the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). I do not intend to take up the time of the house in discussing controversial matters that may not amount to very much, but I should like to direct attention to the fact that with the situation as it is, both in Europe and in this country, the two hon. members referred to, particularly the hon. member for Cochrane, characterized this group as communists, fascists and nazis. Later on, the Minister of Agriculture referred to the philosophy and programme of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation as being state socialism or the state supreme.

As a member of this group I want to make my position clear. I am as much opposed to state-ism as I am to any other "ism." I have absolutely no intention of accepting a dictatorship in any form. I want to make that clear. My conception of the programme and philosophy of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation is that they are the same as the programme and philosophy of the British Labour party. They conform in practically every detail with those of the present government of New Zealand. I do not think either the British Labour party or the government of New Zealand can be characterized as being communistic or fascist, or as adhering to any other form of "ism." I consider them as being forms of straight democratic government. They are carrying on the prosecution of this war in every way possible and with a view to utilizing the resources of the country in the interest of all people and on the basis of human needs.

If the opinions and ideals of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation can be put into operation in the future, I see Canada as being a country where the government would act merely as a board of administration. In my judgment the most important thing in any order of society is the people, and the people should control at all times. Any government that gets too far away from the people will find itself in hot water in a very short time. I make these remarks just in passing because the remarks of the hon. member and the minister have been carried in the press and now appear on Hansard. As a member of this group I do not want to be classified as being one advocating state-ism, the state supreme or the regimentation of our people. Nothing is further from my mind and nothing is further from the policy and the programme of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation as I understand them.

I listened with considerable interest to the different hon. members who have addressed the house. Without exception they all stress the necessity of winning the war, and rightly so. I was struck with the evident sincerity with which they placed their views before the house, but I would caution hon. members that the winning of the war and the preserving of democracy require something more than lip-service. As I understand it, democracy is not a theory, it is a practical working force that gives all people a voice in the management of the affairs of our country and the right to exercise in economic, political and sectarian fields the rights that are inherent in a democratic system. I feel, too, that in Canada we all should share and share alike, we should share that which is good or evil, enjoying the good things of life where we can and sacrificing where we must. I think the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) stated the case quite clearly when he referred to labour in his "Let's Face the Facts" broadcast on Labour day. I listened to that speech, and I read it. I think it sets out the cause of labour in a very clear manner. I should like to quote two paragraphs as follows:

> In war, no work, no effort, can compare with the sacrifice of the soldier, the sailor and the airman. Their sacrifice is uppermost in the thoughts of this nation; it will live in its memories. But Canadians will remember, too, the debt they owe to labour. In Canada labour has extended its hours, surrendered its holidays and, in its determination to increase and advance production, has taught the young and the inexperienced the intricacies of complicated trades. It will be the duty of the people of Canada, realizing these things now, to remember them in the hour of victory.
> My fellow citizens! A distinguished British journalist who recently visited us, said that he found Canada at war with Hitler and at peace with herself. We are at war, and we shall remain united in will and purpose. But we can only remain at peace with ourselves if shirking no effort, withholding no wealth, and sparing no sacrifice, we prove ourselves worthy of our two great brotherhoods—the brotherhood of the brave who fight for us, and the brotherhood of labour that works for their victory.

As my function in this house is primarily to speak for labour, I question, Mr. Speaker, whether we are proving ourselves worthy of these two great brotherhoods who fight and work for us. Conditions across the country as I have found them certainly cause one to doubt. In the province from which I come, and particularly in the eastern end of it, in Cape Breton island, there is slowly but surely developing among the people a complex that they are not considered a part of Canada. The war has had very little effect on unemployment there and hundreds of young men who have been unable to find employment are trying to get into the army. Petition after petition was read into the records of this house last session, demanding the opening-up of new mines in Nova Scotia. In one section at present there are 127 so-called aliens who have been driven out of employment, and they have 227 dependents. I looked into this question from all angles while the house was in recess, and I found that it was a question not of alienism but of unemployment, the last stand of desperate men to secure employment.

The relief that has been paid to these men is not adequate, and their children are not able to go to school. This question of alienism came up just after Italy entered the war, and while the house was in recess I made it my business to visit that particular colliery to look into this question. I met the miners who were forcing these so-called aliens—they are all Italians—out of that mine. I met the Italians themselves and had a long conference with them. I made it my business to interview the sergeant of the mounted police who had investigated the whole question thoroughly and has a very good grasp of the whole situation. I wanted to find out for myself whether it was really a question of alienism, if the miners were afraid to let these men come into the mines, or whether it was a question of unemployment. My considered opinion is that it is a question of unemployment, and I think 75 per cent of the men would tell you so. Here and there you would meet a man who would say that it was not safe to allow these Italians into the mines.

In that particular section the same thing was tried on two previous occasions. There are approximately 900 men employed in the mine, and a percentage of them are Italians. But there are also in that section hundreds of young men who have never had a job, and the native miners resent the fact that so many foreigners are gainfully employed while their own young men are walking the streets. As I said before, the same thing was tried on two other occasions, but the union upset it. At the present time the union officials say they are helpless.

We all remember the hysteria that was caused when the Italians entered the war, and in Nova Scotia these Italians were pushed out of their employment. During the last few weeks the union officials made an effort to straighten matters out and have these men reemployed, giving them status as Canadian citizens because, as a matter of fact, they are practically all naturalized citizens of this country and members of the union as well, and the constitution provides that they should be employed until such time as charges are brought against them of having engaged in subversive activities. But there comes a time when men become unreasonable, and after this thing had dragged along for about three months, when the union officials endeavoured to get these men back into the mine the native miners said no. The situation there is tense, and a telegram I received this morning prompted me to raise the question with the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty). The minister says that his department is cognizant of the situation and that they are trying to find a solution. My considered opinion is that if an attempt is made at this time to force these men into the mine there are liable to be serious repercussions, something I should not like to see happen. The whole question needs to be carefully arbitrated. But at the bottom of it all, in my opinion, is the question of unemployment.

The miners' union is an organization that is very reasonable. It has carried on collective bargaining in that section for thirty years and has never had much difficulty in the past in signing contracts. But at the present time there is not a contract signed. They have been juggling for two years with the mine operators, trying to arrive at some agreement on the question of wages. That further accentuates the unrest among the miners. They develop a complex that they are not being recognized, that their union is no longer serving its purpose, and as a result discipline suffers. That is not a good situation, particularly in our present set-up. The union officials and the men who take a leading part in its organization are endeavouring to iron these matters out and are making little progress in the matter of signing the contracts.

The people of Nova Scotia, the miners, the farmers and the fishermen—and I have been among them—are developing at the present time a complex of "what is the use?" They argue that nothing has been done, that no progress is being made, and unemployment in that section is much worse to-day than it was when the war broke out. Hundreds of young men are leaving school year after year and adding to the ranks of the unemployed. There has been no employment for them for years, and many of them have tried to get into the army but the units are filled up.

I find that Nova Scotia has gone backwards in the last fifty years industrially, and from the point of view of looking after their own needs. I have discussed this matter with men who have been familiar with the situation there for the past fifty years, and I have here a few statistics which, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to read into the record. Fifty years ago Nova Scotia had: The Merchants Bank; the Bank of Nova Scotia; the Halifax Banking Company; the Bank of Yarmouth; the Commercial Bank of Windsor; the Union Bank of Halifax; all organized, owned and directed by Nova Scotians who loaned money for the doing of Nova Scotia business.

Through mergers all these banks and their assets went west to Toronto; and to-day the money is loaned to Ontario industry. Nova Scotia lost its grip on its cash; and those who profited are living on coupon clipping—not on work-producing effort.

When steam supplanted sails, Nova Scotia had: A cotton mill at Halifax and one at Windsor; a paint works at Halifax; three tobacco factories; four or five shoe factories; two soap factories; several woollen mills (one at Mabou, C.B. won prizes at the Paris and Chicago World's Fairs); a big cheese factory at Antigonish, which won the prize at the Chicago World's Fair; a condensed milk factory at Truro; all merged out of Nova Scotia.

At Sydney, the home of the steel industry, which has been pap-fed from its birth to date, we have seen: A cement works drift into a merger; a fertilizer plant leave for Ontario; a local company organized to make small articles from steel be encouraged to spend a lot of capital, and then stymied by Ontario control.

We had Shaw and Mason build a foundry and employ a number of men to supply the steel company. Then a change of control that brought in an element connected with a similar foundry up north shifted the orders away and closed up the Shaw and Mason plant.

A big tar and chemical plant is gradually drifting to the upper provinces.

In every instance Cape Breton is being bled by capital and winked at by partisan politicians. The island is rich in pasture land and fodder hills for sheep. There is good grazing for cows and wonderful land for potatoes and small crops. Cape Breton can feed herself. Our fisheries are abundant, including lobsters, cod, herring, mackerel and swordfish, an asset hardly contemplated since the days of the French. Our people have been exploited. Cape Breton has wonderful gypsum deposits but does no manufacturing. We have great forests but no pulp or paper mills; the raw material is sold at mean prices and our timberlands are denuded. There are dozens of unworked coal seams on Boulardrie island, while Canada is importing coal. There is a rich coal field untouched at Port Morien, from the Hardwood Hill outcrops, which could contribute several million tons of good coal every year. Many of our best coal measures are proven on the Loch Lomond hill, 800 feet above sea level, which is able to contribute big coal outputs with free drainage and free ventilation, an ideal set-up for a profitable mining venture.

The answer to our problem in Nova Scotia, under our present order of society, is the creation in that section of the country of some of the war industries that are being established in Canada to-day. We have everything necessary for the manufacture of war material; coal, steel and iron ore. We are pleading for the government to recognize that section as part of the dominion.

The situation at the steel plant in Trenton, Nova Scotia, was such that on September 27, 1940, one of the responsible officials of district No. 26, the international board member, telegraphed the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) asking that the minister use his authority under Bill No. 43, now the National Resources Mobilization Act, to take possession of the properties of the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal company and its subsidiaries in that section. There are 500 men idle in the Eastern Car plants, and the international board member charged that the Trenton company was on a sit-down strike, that nothing was being done to relieve conditions of semi-starvation existing there. He also made a direct accusation of sabotage on the part of that company. That statement was made by a responsible union official. I also received demands from the Thorburn area in Nova Scotia to petition the provincial government for the release of the areas on which the Dominion Steel and Coal corporation holds leases, in order that someone might be interested in undertaking some operations there.

Conditions of that kind, it seems to me, are not in accordance with the pronouncement by the Prime Minister that we must recognize the value of labour in its relation to the war. I said that to make democracy work something more than lip-service was necessary. In travelling through the provinces of Nova Scotia, Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick I find conditions among the common people anything but resembling those which should exist among a free and democratic people.

The matters with which I am endeavouring to deal this afternoon are not products of my own imagination. I receive letters, telegrams and resolutions, by virtue of the fact that over a period of years I have been actively engaged in the trade union movement. These organizations send these matters to me, and I am here merely endeavouring to act as spokesman for those who send me this information. From New Waterford in Cape Breton I received a resolution passed by the town council stating that there are over 350 unemployed men in that town, with no prospect of obtaining work in the coal mines or elsewhere in that district. The council finds it impossible to raise funds for contemplated local improvements which would furnish work for a large number of these men. The council has made every effort, without success, to secure work for these idle men in public and private projects in New Waterford and other places adjacent thereto. In a resolution which I understand has been forwarded to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), they also make the accusation that work on the extensive public works programme in municipal district No. 20 was being distributed by petty politicians on a patronage basis in view of the forthcoming municipal elections.

In New Brunswick, where I visited the mining section of Minto, I found conditions at least fifty years behind the times. For a number of years the miners in that section have been endeavouring to exercise their industrial democracy by establishing a union and having it recognized for the purpose of collective bargaining, against the direct opposition of the operators and with very little cooperation on the part of the provincial government.

During the recess I had an opportunity of visiting some sections of Ontario, and I was particularly interested in the metal miners in the northern part of this province, with whom I discussed their problems. I find that conditions in northern Ontario resemble anything but democracy. In that area there are from forty to forty-five thousand miners who are endeavouring to form a union. The question of silicosis was brought very sharply to my attention during my visit. As hon. members know, this is a disease prevalent not only among the metal miners of northern Ontario but also among the miners of Nova Scotia. Last session I discussed briefly with the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), when an appropriation was being put through for research work in his department, the question whether it might not be possible to extend that work to take in this disease of silicosis. That appropriation was small, on account of the war, and the minister did not think there was a possibility of the work being extended, but he did suggest that Ontario had carried on a good deal of research work into this question and that this province had considerable data which might be of some value to us in Nova Scotia. I was glad to get that information, because I also had the opinion that Ontario was well advanced in the prevention and care of silicosis.

As I say, I discussed that matter with the miners in the north, but I found that Ontario was in pretty much the same condition as Nova Scotia. My information is that of some 2,200 persons who have applied for compensation under the Ontario regulation, only twenty-two have had their claims recognized, and I do not believe the facilities in this province for determining whether or not a man is afflicted with that disease are any better than those we have in Nova Scotia. If anything, I think perhaps we are a little ahead of Ontario.

There was brought to my attention one particular case which I think is characteristic of the general trend of the authorities in Ontario who are charged with this responsibility. A man by the name of Steve Kostanyk, who for some considerable time has been suffering from silicosis, has been endeavouring to prove his claim to the compensation board. To date he has been unsuccessful. I have here a copy of the will he made, signing over his body to his friend, a man named Nick Rozok, for the purpose of having an autopsy performed in order to prove that he died from this disease. The compensation laws provide that this disease is compensatable, but in all the years that Ontario has had to deal with this question the authorities have not been able to set up proper boards possessing the necessary facilities for determining whether or not a man is suffering from this disease. I think that is a crime and a shame, and it is merely one case I happened to run into.

We have had the same experience in Nova Scotia. A man named Andrews was afflicted for several years with this disease and just recently it was made compensatable in the province and brought under the act. He had not proved his claim. The matter was discussed by the board but owing to the fact that the trouble had existed prior to the passing of the act this man did not come under it. He died only a few weeks ago. The claim was being handled by the union when I left. An autopsy was performed on his body, and according to a press clipping from the Sydney Post-Record of November 3 it was definitely established after the autopsy that Andrews had died from silicosis. It would appear to me that matters of this kind, if they are not taken care of under the jurisdiction of the provincial authorities, whether this be due to lack of interest or to a want of knowledge on the part of the provinces, should come under the federal department of health. It should be the prerogative of the federal department to see to it that men who, owing to their occupation, are prone to diseases of this sort are safeguarded, and research work should be carried on. There are approximately 45,000 miners in northern Ontario and 12,000 in Nova Scotia. In neither of these provinces is there any competent authority who can say whether a man is or is not afflicted with this disease. According to the evidence he must die, and his body must be cut up, before it can be ascertained whether he had been suffering from the disease.

Mr. HOWDEN: Is there any authority who is competent to say, before death, whether a man is suffering from silicosis?

Mr. GILLIS: I think there is.

Mr. HOWDEN: I doubt that very much.

Mr. GILLIS: I had an experience myself. I remember a controversy that took place with the Department of Pensions and National Health during the time that the present Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) was in charge of that department. We had a dispute over a comrade in the legion who had a chest condition which was diagnosed in five different ways by five different medical authorities. We took him to a chest specialist who advised that he be sent to a sanatorium. Well, that cost a little bit of money. A drug was injected into the bronchial tree and the effect watched by an expert, and that also cost money. When the examination was made and the report written, the doctor—Doctor Sieniewicz of Halifax—definitely diagnosed the case as one of tuberculosis incurred at a certain time and aggravated by coal and stone dust. The department at that time accepted the report and granted a pension. That man received proper treatment and is now alive and in better health.

Mr. HOWDEN: That was tuberculosis, not silicosis—a different thing.

Mr. GILLIS: It was diagnosed as silicosis, pneumomycosis and other things by several different authorities. My hon. friend is a medical man; I am not, and I am not going to argue with him. I merely state this particular experience, and I suggest that if the same rule were followed by the compensation board and a proper test carried out when men apply for compensation, much of the misery and suffering which exist to-day would be avoided.

I do not elaborate on these matters for the purpose of hearing myself talk. It may be said that these are isolated cases, but they are not. As I have said, there are 12,000 miners in Nova Scotia and 45,000 in northern Ontario. These men all go down mines and are subject to the disease. They may contract it sooner or later; something that we regard as an isolated condition is a subject of discussion among the men in their unions, and it builds up an antagonism in their minds and the belief that the responsible authorities are not doing what they should do. It was that complex which helped, I believe, to trip up France and the other countries that fell to Hitler.

Mr. HOWDEN: Would my hon. friend not be inclined to admit that the compensation boards by and large are unbiased and are as anxious for the welfare of the workmen as for that of anyone else?

Mr. GILLIS: I believe they are doing the best they can with the machinery at their disposal, but I submit that that machinery should be improved. I suggest that the department of industrial hygiene should carry on research work under the Department of Pensions and National Health. It would be a valuable contribution to the welfare of men employed in the mining industry.

I find that in the Kirkland Lake section, in addition to the problem I have been discussing, a local police force is being set up. In the Kirkland Lake section alone there are 250 men wearing the uniform of policemen and carrying revolvers and batons, and they are drilled by the local chief of police. No one knows what their function is, but I have heard it said among the men themselves, at a meeting I attended, that they bear a close resemblance to Hitler's storm troopers. No one knows exactly what their function is. The miners say that the uniforms are supplied by the local mining companies. During my time in a union I have had plenty of experience with company-owned police forces, and I submit that it does not make for democracy in any part of the country to have groups of this sort operating, being responsible to no one that we know of, and allowed to wear uniforms and to arm themselves, for what purpose we do not know. In my opinion, that also creates in the minds of the men in that section the feeling that democratic principles are not being observed so far as they are concerned. That complex is being built up there.

In addition to that, complaints come in by telegram and letter from the Chrysler plant to the effect that workers are not being treated democratically. When they endeavour to follow the principles of democracy the tactics of Hitler are employed by the corporation. When a strike vote was being taken recently in the plant, a number of police officers were stationed outside the union hall at the time the vote was to be taken, soldiers paraded through the plant on the day the vote was taken, and everything possible done to intimidate the men.

Mr. McLARTY: To be fair, the hon. member will admit that any soldiers who went through the plant did so in pursuance of a programme that had been laid out before the strike vote had been arranged, a programme that involved the inspection of various industrial plants and not this one alone.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It was an unhappy coincidence.

Mr. McLARTY: The arrangement was made prior to any knowledge of any strike vote.

Mr. GILLIS: I have no doubt the Minister of Labour is correct and I am not questioning what he says. I am, however, not stating my own opinion on these matters; I am simply taking the evidence as I find it. That is the feeling of the men at the Chrysler plant. It was quite a coincidence that on the day on which their vote was being taken, the troops were paraded through. In the opinion of the men everything was done to intimidate them; they felt that it was intimidation. Later on, twenty-four of them were arrested. Some were released, but a few days ago, according to press reports, forty-six more were arrested. If that is the use to which the Defence of Canada regulations are being put, it means that all effective trade union activity in plants engaged in war production will be stopped. If this is the policy of the government, the government must amend its orders so as to safeguard the democratic rights of the workers to organize and carry on their trade union activities.

Only two months ago the two main organized labour congresses in this country held their annual conferences. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) is a member of one congress and attended its conference; I am a member of the other and was a delegate to it. Both congresses passed resolutions complaining of the treatment of labour in this war, of the fact that labour is not represented on any of the war boards with the exception of the labour supply council which, according to my information, is a dead letter in any event. Organized labour has expressed its readiness, indeed its eagerness to assist the country in the winning of the war in every possible way. The Prime Minister in the passage which I quoted has paid tribute to the workers of this country for their sacrifices. The workers have a right to expect that their needs and their rights will be safeguarded. Their sacrifices entitle them to an equal partnership in the affairs of this dominion, which they can get only through trade union organization and collective bargaining.

Here is what the Monetary Times has to say in an editorial in its issue of November 9, and I do not think the Monetary Times can be characterized as a socialist organ:

> The employee, to put it briefly, must first be assured of receiving a square deal; after that government and public opinion may urge fresh sacrifices upon him with a clear conscience.
> In all fairness it must be remembered that industry has already been offered fair treatment. No manufacturer has been expected to work on war contracts at a loss to himself. His profit has been assured. These points have been conceded him in advance without argument. The profit motive has been accepted as his proper criterion of when and how much he shall produce. Labour is also primarily in industry for profits and not for glory. Its claims, then, should not be summarily rejected as improper and out of place. No attitude more inimical to the cause of winning the war could be adopted by anyone.

I agree with that opinion. I say that the government should, without delay, implement the policies which are laid down in an order in council relating to labour relations. Of what value is a statement of principle when in practice the machinery of the state and war regulations are used to thwart labour organization and to arrest trade union members?

Complaints also reach us from General Motors in Oshawa that the plant has been placed under the protection of the defence of Canada regulations by a special order in council. It would appear that everything possible is being done for the protection of those exploiting industry for profit.

It is not my intention in speaking about these things to belittle the efforts of the government. We realize the magnitude of their task in transforming this country from a peace-loving, non-military nation to an effective war-time machine. I fully realize the difficulties, but as one of the men in the street I also recognize the growing danger of allowing the Canadian people to get into the frame of mind that "we have not anything to fight for." At the moment, spokesmen of this country offer the people nothing but a return to the state of affairs which existed before the war. If we continue to do this, the people will not put forward their best war effort.

This generation has been afflicted with two major wars. Before and in between those two wars it has been further tormented by the most complicated economic disorders ever known; actual unemployment or the fear of it have oppressed the spirit of the people during the whole of my lifetime, and its attendant poisons have infected every class in society. No nation has been immune. In short, the social machinery which men have built up since the beginning of the industrial revolution got out of hand and it came to be realized that the most urgent problem of the day was to bring society once more under control. Men therefore longed for order; for only order could bring security, and for security men have often been prepared to give up freedom. It is in this mood and against this background that fascism makes its fatal, seductive appeal. It says to the tortured soul of Europe, "Give up your freedom and in return we will give you security." We say, "Cling to your freedom." Back comes the question, "What of security?" Men love liberty, but to be free they must live. Old world conditions made the two incompatible. All fascism does is to make the divorce absolute.

We must assure the people of this country a future in which they can be both secure and free. We will fight for it and, if needs be, die for it, but it is not good enough to ask us to fight for the restoration of the old world. It was conditions such as I have attempted to describe that made possible the rise of Hitlerism in Germany and fascism in Italy, and which prepared the way in the countries which have fallen under the nazi heel.

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret to have to inform the hon. gentleman that his time has expired.

Mr. GILLIS: I can finish in about a minute.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. GILLIS: I am earnestly requesting those in authority and entrusted with the future of this country to pay attention to the conditions that I have attempted to describe, because the right of the workers to organize, the enforcement of social legislation, the protection of civil liberty, freedom of discussion, are all things that are inherent in democracy. To talk about them is not good enough; they must be put to work as a practical demonstration to those whom we expect to produce the sinews of war and to fight the war.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ALAN CHAMBERS (Nanaimo) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, now that I have the honour to be a very junior member of the Canadian Scottish Regiment I feel no diffidence in addressing this house in the French language. I do not need to remind the French-speaking members of this house of the early history of the province of Quebec and of the part played in the development of their beautiful country by people with Scottish blood in their veins. While I was myself not born in Scotland, I am of Scottish descent and the son of a man who fought throughout the last great war in the garb in which I now stand.

During my few short years in Canadian public life I have developed a great respect, may I say an affection for my fellow members who speak the French tongue. Military circumstances will no doubt prevent me from speaking again at this session of parliament and I take this opportunity, therefore, of speaking to my friends through you, Mr. Speaker, poorly no doubt but sincerely, in their own tongue. No one, least of all a Canadian soldier, can gaze dispassionately on the present plight of France. There are some even in Canada who have felt that the French alliance was a misalliance. I am not one of those. I am one who believes in the Entente Cordiale because I have confidence in the French people.

May I take you back, for a few moments, into French history. To the time of the battle of Sedan in the Franco-Prussian war when, as lately, France succumbed before the Hun. Her armies were beaten and scattered and, after a bitter and desperate struggle, the Boche triumphed. But, when the struggle was over, the spirit of France was reborn. The flame in the hearts of a valiant nation was rekindled. The torch dimmed in that struggle burst out again into the flame of Verdun. Through the bitter years of tribute and German domination

France gathered herself together for the coming fight and when it arrived the people of France conquered.

Let us now, therefore, when we gaze upon the agony of France at this time, remember not that they broke in Luxemburg; remember not that the Maginot line was turned; remember not the incident at Oran; but remember only that history will repeat itself as surely as we are here to-night and that the flame of Verdun will be rekindled when the assault begins.

There are those, too, who have forgotten that France was generous enough to give back the Saar. There are those who say that France should have been more generous. We who live with the oceans on our flanks can never truthfully be the judge of those who live with the enemy as their neighbours. If France has made mistakes let us forgive. Inevitably we, too, have made mistakes. But in the name of the hundreds of thousands of the flower of France who laid down their lives in the last war; in the name too of those scores of thousands of Canadians who lie beside them in the soil of France; let us remember France and let us have faith in the French people.

When I read every day of the deeds of our forces; when I hear from my friends and my relatives in the old land of the civilian defense of our mother country; when I realize from the magnificent figures given to us by those who are charged for the time being with the preparation of our Canadian forces for the assault; I look not backward to the defeat but forward to the struggle and to final victory. I have faith that we shall conquer as we conquered before—shoulder to shoulder with the soldiers of France.

Mr. Speaker, the traveller who visits the ancient capital of the province of Quebec is told the famous legend relating to an inscription found in ruins of the old city. The inscription of the Golden Dog. The spirit of France, humiliated by German domination, can no doubt be compared to this inscription. When the determination to liberate France will replace the shock of defeat, the nation will arise against its conquerors in the manner predicted by this old inscription:

Je suis un chien qui ronge l'os
En le rongeant, je prends mon repos.
Un jour viendra qui n'est pas venu
Où je mordrai qui m'aura mordu.

(Text) Mr. Speaker, as one who since last addressing this chamber has changed in both appearance and status, I should like if I may for a few minutes this evening to discuss some matters of military moment, rather than those affairs which, were I not in the position in which I find myself, I would have discussed.

[Mr. Chambers.]

Yesterday I listened to the magnificent speech of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), a speech delivered with restraint and full of explanations which hon. members had been seeking.

Since the house last met we on the coast of British Columbia had an opportunity of meeting the minister when he visited the coast. I should like to congratulate him not only upon his speech of yesterday but also upon the fine impression he made upon the people of the coast, and particularly those on Vancouver island. As a member serving in an active service unit I was one of those who in common with many others had to stand inspection. All of us were greatly impressed by the fact that no matter where the minister went, he always had a cheery word for everyone, and nothing was too much trouble for him to inquire into or endeavour to put right.

Also during the recess we had a visit from the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power). His was more in the nature of a flying visit. Then, we were visited by the Minister of National Defence for Naval Affairs (Mr. Macdonald), who is now member for the constituency of Kingston City. We on the coast were particularly glad to note that the Royal Canadian Navy and its importance in Canadian military affairs generally have been recognized by the naming of a Minister of National Defence for Naval Affairs. Many of the people on the island are connected with the Royal Canadian Navy in one way or another, and after hearing and seeing the minister we were all glad that he had been appointed.

Some opinions on military affairs have been expressed in this debate, but I do not propose to comment upon the speeches delivered by other hon. members who are in uniform. Two of the hon. gentlemen who sit on this side of the house and who have spoken are men of much greater military experience than I. Perhaps the sole difference in point of view between them and myself is that I belong to an active service unit. We realize that there have been shortages, but these shortages have been overcome to a great extent by people being willing to put up with them cheerfully as it became necessary.

I should like to comment this evening, from the point of view of the active service force, upon several factors in the military situation. These are matters which I believe might well be discussed in this debate. First of all, there is the question of the training of what will, in the end, be the main fighting force. We have had some thirteen months of war and, as has been stated in the house, we have some 150,000 men in the Canadian active service force. During all this period training has been going on. At the outset I should like to say that we are not getting as thorough a training as we should be getting, but we are getting as thorough a training as can possibly be given to us under the circumstances.

I believe that some of these circumstances can be altered. As I said earlier, I have only a limited knowledge of military affairs, but I speak from personal experience and from what I have seen at close quarters. The great need at the present time in the active service force of Canada is that we should be given the benefit of the experience of those who have spent many years in the permanent force of Canada prior to the outbreak of the war. They were learning military ways and making themselves proficient. Many of these men went over with the first or the second division, and a number of them should be brought back to Canada and split up among the active service force battalions in order that the members of those battalions should receive the benefit, not only of what these men have learned during peace time but of what they have undoubtedly experienced in the constant hard training in Great Britain during the time they have been over there. I am not in a position to know whether these things can be done, but if it is possible to arrange to transfer some of these men from the first and second divisions to active service force battalions in Canada, there is no doubt that in a considerably shorter time than has elapsed since the commencement of training of our active service force battalions they would be in a greater state of proficiency than they now are.

Many of the men in our active service force battalions have been in the army for six, eight or ten months. They are now facing another winter in Canada. Because of our climatic conditions it will be more difficult to train these men during the winter than it would be during the summer months. Now is the time when these instructors, as they might be called, or the more experienced members from the first and second divisions should be brought back to Canada in order to give us the benefit of their training. Those of us who followed developments in the French army from the time of the declaration of war until the attack on the lowlands know what happened because of continued inactivity. I do not want to give the impression that the troops on guard duty on the Pacific coast, such as the unit to which I belong, are inactive. We are anything but. On the other hand, there is monotony to be contended with. Many men who have friends and relatives in the forces in England have learned many things; they probably know a great deal more than we do, but what we do know is that the monotony of guard duty which has been carried on for nine or ten months and which is likely to be carried on into the winter is not going to make our troops into better fighting men. There will have to be an infusion of new training blood.

Something has been said about the training of those young men mobilized under the national resources act. There has been some debate and discussion as to the length of the training period, and I want to echo what has been said by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks). There is a training camp on Vancouver island and I can say that so far as the training of those men is concerned, it has been a job well done. I cannot say whether the proposal of a four months training period is a sound one. Personally I feel that a period of six or seven weeks would be more to the point. If men are to be trained for four months, it will mean that much of the work which they receive in the early days of the training period will have to be repeated. It may be that you will take the edge off their training and they will probably not be left with a desire to continue their training, as now seems to be the case.

While speaking of training, I should like to point out something of which I am sure the minister is aware. Because of climatic conditions, British Columbia is much more favourable for winter training than certain other parts of Canada. I think this fact should be given consideration by the minister.

Equipment and training going hand in hand as they do, if we cannot have all the equipment we want right off the bat—and one can very easily understand that these things cannot be done overnight—we feel at least that if there were a wider distribution of training equipment among the Canadian active service force units, if that equipment were moved around more than it is at the present time, it would be more beneficial. I do not want to go into a discussion of the training equipment we have on hand or that we have had in our unit, but certainly I should like to see a little more training equipment than we have seen so far, and we hope that it will not be long before we shall do so.

In the minds of a great many of the men serving in the army at the present time there is one unanswered question and that is, how far do the higher military officers in the Canadian forces recognize the difference between conditions in 1914 and in 1940 under which modern land fighting goes on. I put that only as a question. I do not suggest that the higher military officers are not apprised of that difference or that they have not a complete idea of exactly what they propose to do and how they are going to do it. But there is in the minds of many of our soldiers that unanswered question, and we are waiting to know what the answer is.

May I say a few words about the soldiers themselves? One thing which has struck me about the present day Canadian active service force soldier is what happened the other day in our own unit, where we have had the ordinary wet canteen right along. We put up a dry canteen and a remarkable thing happened. In about a week's time the wet canteen was doing practically no business at all and the dry canteen was doing it all. That is a change from the last war. I do not know that the example was set by any one of us personally, but nevertheless that is what happened.

It would seem to me from what I know of the men—and the first thing one has to do is to try to get to know the men—is that first of all they know why they are fighting. They are all in the army with a determination. They have a great many suggestions to make, and they make them and we hear them. There is nothing of the automaton either in their actions or in their thinking which heretofore I understand has been a sine qua non of military life. These men have left their homes with a clear idea of why they are fighting and a desire to get on with the job.

I understand that the minister is going to England very soon where no doubt discussions will take place as to the immediate role Canada is to play in the next few months. At some risk of being misunderstood, I would suggest to the minister and the government that he give our men back here at home in the Canadian active service force ranks some hope that they may be led out to do something other than the monotonous tasks they have to perform at the present time. When we see the magnificent defence being put up by England, when we realize that women and children are being killed there and soldiers are not, it makes us feel—I do not know whether I can express it exactly—that we would like to be led out, away from our present humdrum duties, to the job that we joined up to do. But these things are in the hands of those much better informed than I am and in whom I have full faith. You cannot, however, keep young Canadians who have joined to fight, constantly training and training and training and not bring them into action.

The question of war aims has been raised from time to time. I do not know, of course, what any official statement of our war aims might be, but I think I know from the brief experience I have had with our troops what their war aims are, if one might use that phrase. They want to get a certain job done as rapidly as possible and get back to normal life. They want to know that while they are doing their job, their homes are protected and their families looked after. They want to know, too, that when they come back from that war, if they do come back, there will be as good or a better standard of living for the great masses of the people of Canada.

We understand that the government at the present time has a committee of experts working on post-war plans. I know that suggestions of value have been made to the Department of National Defence in this very regard. It may seem futile to talk now about demobilization, but, Mr. Speaker, you can lay the groundwork for an efficient and speedy demobilization if you do it during war time. One suggestion, for example, that was recently made to the department I should like to see adopted if it can properly be done, and that is that we should have in one compact dossier the civilian labour record of the soldier before he joined up, a record of the training he has taken in his military capacity and its bearing upon future employment, so that when the time comes for that man to be demobilized, the labour exchanges, which I have no doubt will be set up under the unemployment insurance measure, will be furnished with that information, and in particular the office for the district from which the man comes, so that while a job is being sought for him, he can be maintained in the army. That is only a very general suggestion, but I mention it because that information should be assembled now. It is no good setting up boards and commissions to assemble it just when we are going to demobilize our army.

Another matter about which the soldier—I am speaking of the private soldier, is worrying to a certain extent, is the question of insurance. I believe last session the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) brought forward a suggestion in this regard, and I should like to endorse that proposal. I think at this time the government might approach the leading life insurance companies in Canada and ask them as a group, after conferring together, to present to the government, if they feel able to do so, a three-way scheme under which the government might pay a part, the man pay a part, and the insurance companies take a cut in their rates, thus putting into operation life insurance policies on behalf of all men serving in the active service forces of this dominion. I do not think that should be impossible.

At the present time, if a soldier wants to insure himself against death overseas, he can do so only by taking out an ordinary insurance policy on which he must pay a very high extra premium per $1,000, I believe somewhere in the neighbourhood of $80. The government might say to these insurance companies, "We would be prepared to open negotiations on the basis of 200,000 men. What rate could you strike lower than that extra $80?" If the premium could be brought down to a more reasonable figure and the difference between the ordinary premium and the coverage for overseas death split between the man and the government, then the scheme might be brought into operation as a voluntary one open to any soldier, any member of the air force or any naval man. I do not know whether that is feasible; I have not had time to look into it, but for what it is worth I offer this suggestion to the government.

Speaking still of the troops themselves, I should like to refer to another question which already has been touched upon, namely, the question of leave and transportation. May I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, in this way: Imagine 300 men on a little neck of land, right on an ocean, fifty miles from the nearest settlement, in a district where it rains all the time. I see the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) giving me a side glance when I say it rains all the time, but in this instance it does. Imagine these men serving night after night, standing guard duty from dusk until dawn, in very heavy rain. Can you imagine how they would look forward to leave, particularly at Christmas time, which leave I now understand has been granted? Then how much more would they look forward to it if, as a Christmas gesture, although perhaps it seems strange to speak of peace and good will in these days, the government gave them transportation to their homes.

Before I finish dealing with this part of my remarks there is perhaps one other group I might mention. Before this war broke out, a great many of our young men on Vancouver island, who were not at that time being recruited by the Royal Canadian Air Force or the Royal Canadian Navy, left Canada and joined the Royal Air Force or the Royal Navy in England. We have quite a considerable number of young men, Canadian born and bred, serving and fighting in Britain at the present time, who are not actually members of the Canadian services overseas. I believe these young men are not paid as much for their services as we pay our soldiers, but what I am going to mention comes perhaps a little closer home to the average fighting man. These men of whom I speak do not enjoy the privilege of having cigarettes sent to them duty-free, as is the case with Canadians in the active forces. I understand this matter is now receiving consideration on the part of the government. It may not seem extremely important, and perhaps I should not take time to mention it, but it really is important to a large number of young Canadians in England to-day.

I see that my time is very nearly gone. Before sitting down, I wanted, if possible, to tell the house something of the difference in outlook that occurs when one joins the forces. Our spiritual leaders have told us—and I remember an address in the same vein by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King)—that the fight in which we are now engaged is one, to use the words of St. Paul, against spiritual wickedness in high places. Certainly, when one considers the paganism and complete materialism of those forces against which we are struggling, one agrees that in a sense, as the Prime Minister said, the fight is a crusade. I believe, as Cromwell did when he built his new army, that if we have that spiritual confidence, as we have, and combine with it the most modern equipment and the best possible training, there can be no question as to the result. If I had the words I should like to convey to the house something of what that means to the forces. Perhaps I might express that in the words of Rupert Brooke, who said:

> Blow, bugles, blow! They brought us, for our dearth,
> Holiness, lacked so long, and love, and pain.
> Honour has come back, as a king, to earth,
> And paid his subjects with a royal wage;
> And nobleness walks in our ways again;
> And we have come into our heritage.

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, in looking over the material I thought I might need in speaking this evening, at first I found it a little difficult to decide just which things were of the greatest importance and should be mentioned in the time I have at my disposal. The other evening I listened to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) speak about the problems of agriculture. I listened to him outline what has been done. I also listened to the compliments paid by the Minister of Agriculture to himself. Yet I fail to see what this government is going to do about the wheat situation, especially in Saskatchewan, and it is possible that I should devote some of my time this evening to a discussion of that problem.

With regard to our war effort, it is necessary that this government should take a decided step towards safeguarding the health of our people through the coming years, because every one will agree, I believe, that after the years of suffering which a great number of our people have had to endure, through lack of medical services, through malnutrition and undernourishment, we are going to see a serious loss in working hours if our people do not have some help in that direction on a national scale. Some system of health insurance should be attempted at this time.

There is, however, one subject which is at this time more relevant than any other to the conditions that prevail in Canada, and to this subject I shall give my attention. I refer to the question of democracy itself. We are told that faith without works is of no avail and we also know that ideals, unless they are put into practice, are valueless. Democracy is a way of living, not just an ideal, and so I wish this evening for a while to consider the case for Canadian democracy.

I have listened in this house at various times to tributes that have been paid to the French-speaking people of this nation, tributes in which I have been very much pleased to associate myself, because I know what a great contribution they have made to Canada in the past and I am sure they will make a similar contribution to the history of this country in the future. The other evening I was happy indeed to hear the Minister of Agriculture compliment the English people, particularly since, although Canada is the land of my adoption, England is the land of my birth; and I was more than happy to hear him pay a tribute to the people of London, my old home town. It is in my opinion one of the greatest triumphs of the English people that throughout these last months of terror, throughout this greatest emergency of all times, they have been able to make secure to themselves democracy in England; for no one will deny to-day that the English people have retained the rights and privileges of a democratic people. That has been perhaps their greatest triumph.

It has been said in this house that the first line of our defence is in Britain. I do not remember just which members have said that, but I believe the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) said the same thing only the other day. When I am speaking of the defence of democracy I am inclined to disagree with that opinion, because wherever democracy exists it must be protected and guarded right there. In my opinion the first line of defence of democracy in Canada is here and is now. There is no use in our leaving the first line of defence to the people of Britain when we are thinking of our democracy; the first line of defence of Canadian democracy must be here in Canada.

Democracy in this country has been built up on the ideals of the two great peoples who constitute our nation, the French and English speaking people. It was, I believe, the great Frenchman Voltaire to whom this remark was attributed: "I disapprove of what you say, but I will defend to the death your right to say it." That is in essence the very cornerstone of democracy. It is the freedom of speech which is the inherent right of all peoples living in a democratic country.

Besides freedom of speech there is freedom of the press and of assembly; there is the right of every man to be thought innocent until he is proved guilty by a jury of his peers; there is also the right of labour to organize and peacefully to bargain. These various rights have always been acknowledged to be the very bulwark and foundation upon which democracy is built. It is true that we who have watched the growth of fascism in Europe have seen these very things attacked, one after another, by the forces of reaction which have attempted to defeat, and have so successfully defeated, democracy abroad. In Germany and Italy we have seen freedom of speech, freedom of the press and of assembly, the right of working people to organize, all gradually taken away from the people by the powers of dictatorship. Unfortunately, when we come to consider, we find that under the defence of Canada regulations, which we are told are for the protection of the Canadian people against the activities of enemy aliens, certain rights and privileges of people in a democratic nation are also liable to be taken away.

We are at war, and I know it is perfectly necessary in a time of war to do certain things. No one would deny that in a time of war we have to protect lines of transportation and our coast-lines from the activities of enemy aliens. But to anyone who has studied the defence of Canada regulations—and I wish very much that more of our Canadian people would study them—it becomes increasingly clear that although some of our regulations are decidedly to protect Canadian people from the activities of enemy aliens, there are in the regulations other clauses that are more calculated to defend, from the just criticism of its own people, a government which during the last session took to itself almost dictatorial powers.

It has sometimes been asked, why is it that here in Canada we have not the same freedom of speech which the British people have still kept to themselves? The reply has been that here in Canada we cannot allow the same freedom of speech because we have certain minority groups. It is true that in this dominion we have people of many nationalities, people who have come from various countries in Europe. They have made a contribution to Canada; they have made a contribution to our living standards, to our thought and culture; and having made that contribution, a contribution of which they may justly be proud, they should be given the full privileges of Canadian citizenship.

To-day we are not allowed freedom of speech because there are certain minority groups in this country, and in my opinion that is an unjust and unfair way of dealing with these people. Many of them have come from countries in Europe where freedom never existed or where dictatorship has gradually taken over and democracy is dead. Many of these so-called foreign speaking peoples are more aware than Canadian-born people of the insidious approach which reaction and dictatorship will make towards the bulwarks and fundamentals of democracy. Many of these people would perhaps warn Canadians of the insidious approach towards the destruction of democracy. I wonder whether it is for that reason that we have lost some—I should say nearly all—of our freedom of speech in this country.

It is also true that in this country a large number of arrests have been made recently under the defence of Canada regulations. This is creating in the minds of Canadian people a great fear as to where our own democracy is bound. I think the majority of hon. members are conversant with the magazine called Saturday Night. In its issue of November 9, Mr. B. K. Sandwell, its editor, has an article which he heads "The Growing Sense of Insecurity. Mr. Sandwell is a man whose conservative opinions and fine sense of values have won him a position of regard in this country. He says:

> I doubt whether the government is fully aware of the grave sense of insecurity which is developing among the less influential classes of this country as a result of the workings of the defence of Canada regulations. . . . Canadians have been altogether too lacking in appreciation of the value of the courts and of the prerogative writs as safeguards against arbitrary action, but the present state of affairs is waking them up. Justice, it is true, is never perfect, and liberty can never be absolutely guaranteed to everybody; but the difference between the state of affairs which ordinarily exists in a British country as a result of the ability of the individual to bring his case before an impartial tribunal, and the state of affairs which exists when he is deprived of that ability, is beginning to be appreciated.

According to Mr. Sandwell's report, about 1,500 people have been interned since the defence of Canada regulations came into effect. There are some things I should like to say about the way in which these regulations have been used and the way in which our people are placed in internment camps. Mr. Sandwell in this article has expressed it perhaps far better than I myself could do, so I wish to continue to quote from his article. He says:

> The issue of an internment order which effectually deprives the internee of his liberty even though the confinement to which he is subjected may not be regarded as a punishment, involves no court proceedings, no notice to the person interned, no pleadings of any kind, and no publicity. The police, armed with the order, which has been issued without the knowledge of the person against whom it is directed, simply call for him and take him away. It is often impossible for his family to find out where he is for a considerable time. His neighbours and the press are not encouraged to be inquisitive about him. It has not yet been possible to procure a writ of habeas corpus against the officials who have him in their charge.

Possibly other hon. members have at different times received letters regarding people who have been interned under the defence of Canada regulations. I do not wish to mention many of these cases. One name which I think has received quite an amount of publicity is that of Sullivan, one of the secretaries of the seamen's union; another is a man named Chapman, another named Charles Murray, all union members and working presumably in the interests of the ordinary people. These men have been arrested along with some 1,500 others, according to Mr. Sandwell, under the defence of Canada regulations. I do not know with what these men are charged; I have no more idea than any other person reading of these things of just what the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has decided these men are guilty. But the counsel who has been called in for their defence states that these men have been told that representations have been made that they are communists. That may be true; I have no idea whether it is or not. What I wish to ask at this point is, if there are 1,500 people arrested in Canada under these defence of Canada regulations, have they been told what their offence is? They are held in internment camps without trial. If we are to have democracy in practice and not just as an ideal, any man or woman living under British justice should have the right to know what he or she is charged with and to have a trial by jury. If it can be proved that they are members of an illegal organization, all right, let the jury convict them.

But so far as we know, people to-day are being interned in Canada with no right to a hearing and trial before a court and jury.

There is one thing which I believe is left to them; they have the right to appeal to a reviewing committee. Mr. Sandwell in the same article says with regard to these reviewing committees:

There are only two reviewing committees in all Canada, each of them consisting of one person, an English-speaking person being one committee, and a French-speaking person being the other committee. This is not nearly enough to ensure prompt disposal of all the cases demanding review; and a person detained in error or upon insufficient grounds is entitled to prompt disposal of his claim that he is thus detained.

And here is a point which should be impressed upon everyone:

And further—these committees are themselves the sole judge of the amount of information which shall be communicated to the interned person concerning the charge against him; and the amount of information which they are so communicating in some cases is so infinitesimally small as to make defence literally impossible. In one case—

And I believe Mr. Sandwell is referring here to the case of Pat Sullivan.

—no more definite particulars of the grounds of detention have been obtainable, despite repeated and formal applications by counsel than that "representations have been made that you are a member of the communist party." All that the detained person can possibly do in answer to these "particulars" is to deny that he is a member. He cannot attack the credibility of the witnesses who made the "representations", for he does not know who they are. He cannot offer any alternative explanation of the acts or events which led to the representations, for he does not know what they are. No court would regard this as an adequate statement of particulars for a moment; but no court has any standing in the matter.

It has always been considered the right of a subject under British democratic rule to be considered innocent until he is proved by trial to be guilty. I feel that in allowing the defence of Canada regulations to be enforced in this manner we are allowing one of the fundamentals of democracy itself to be negated. It matters not to me what these men are or who they are, the fact remains that they are British subjects, and as such they should have the protection of the law which democracy and our British justice have always accorded to us. In this connection I should like to quote also from a man who cannot in any sense of the word be called a defender of the communists. This is Colonel Drew, the leader of the Conservative party in the Ontario provincial legislature. Recently Colonel Drew was speaking before the Electric club at its luncheon in the Royal York hotel. On that occasion he spoke in defence of democracy, as I am attempting to do at this time. He also mentioned the fact that under the defence of Canada regulations we people are losing some of the essentials and fundamentals which, if once lost, we do not know can ever be regained. Colonel Drew says:

If we are prepared to shed our blood to preserve democracy, we should try to make it work under stress of war.

He goes on to say:

Nobody can accuse me of being a communist sympathizer or enthusiastic about the C.I.O. But the test of a democracy is not whether the people we like are to be protected, but whether the principles of democracy, including public trial, are to be extended to the very limits.

Then he says this:

All these acts are done under order in council, under dictates. Two weeks ago another order in council was passed saying that any article may be destroyed or retained by a justice of the peace at the discretion of the attorney general, whether a person is accused or not. It is said this referred to bombs. But do we need a law to throw a bomb into a lake? It could refer to books and records and documents. It could take from a man, accused or not, the means by which he could defend himself. This is shocking. It offends every principle of British jurisprudence, and it is time we expressed ourselves about regulations of this kind. It is an 800-year old issue, and the question of the right to discuss it is even older.

Also during these last few months we have found that under the defence of Canada regulations certain people have been arrested merely because they have in their possession literature of a certain kind. Yet freedom of the press is another fundamental of democracy. I know many of us have deplored the burning of books in Germany, and we have said that the German people are going back into the dark ages, when they are no longer allowed freedom to read for themselves and form their own opinions.

It is true that we in Canada have not yet reached the stage where we burn books. But we have already come to the point where under the defence of Canada regulations people have been arrested because they have had in their possession certain literature. Recently in British Columbia a bookstore keeper was arrested under the defence of Canada regulations for having books in his bookstore. I cannot help feeling that any intelligent person in Canada must realize that to form an opinion a person must have access to these various ideologies; he must have access to various schools of thought, because it is only by comparison and by contrast that an intelligent person can come to any decision as to what he himself believes. Yet to-day in Canada, under the defence of Canada regulations, we are having this certain right severely narrowed and limited. This is one other matter which I feel offers a distinct menace to democracy in Canada.

While I am speaking about literature, I should like to mention something else which is perhaps more of a personal nature, but which I feel is something with which every hon. member should be vitally concerned. During the recess reports were brought to me, in my constituency, that the provincial police were going round the country looking for a certain little leaflet I had had printed. It would have been an easy thing for the police, who know me fairly well—I believe I am known to most people in that part of Canada—to come to me and ask for one of those leaflets. I would have given it to them with the greatest pleasure, because it was nothing but an open letter to the Canadian people giving in condensed form what I had said in the debate on the budget. Instead, however, of asking me for a copy, the police travelled miles and miles through the north country, visiting house after house asking for leaflets, and stirring up in the minds of the people fear and apprehension as to what the leaflets contained, and the danger they presented. This is just one example of how the police are operating to-day under the defence of Canada regulations. It is an example of the way in which they are causing fear among our people.

I took great exception to that procedure. On the other hand I saw no reason for undue alarm because, as I have said, the leaflet contained only a condensed version of the speech I had made in the session. I took no action in the matter whatever. It is quite likely that numbers of people, in deference to the wishes of the police, turned in their copies.

I remember that on the first occasion of my speaking in the house I said I would devote my energies and my time, and speak in the interests and on behalf of the life of the Canadian people. I have consistently spoken and written both in and out of this house in the interests of the underprivileged, the inarticulate and the non-influential among our people, and I shall continue to do so. I find that there are others who have said some of the things I have said. I notice that those in charge of the Toronto community chest campaign have published a little leaflet headed with the word "fight." In it they say the same things I have said repeatedly, namely, that we must fight poverty and that we must fight against subversive influences in Canada; that we must fight malnutrition, intolerance, delinquency, distress, despair, unrest, and so on. I note that the governor general of Canada has said, in connection with the community chests drive, that at this time when our thoughts are on the battlegrounds of Britain we must not forget the righteous claims of our fellow citizens in Canada.

In essence that is what I have always maintained. That is what I have always said to the people in Canada. I find that a little pamphlet like that published by the campaign headquarters is allowed free circulation in Canada. No policeman seeks to blot it out. Why? Because we find that this pamphlet asks for charity. I have never asked for charity for the people of Canada, because I say that is not the solution of their problems.

I have in my hand a pamphlet printed by a newspaper and headed "Democracy must live." It contains a number of the speeches I made in the House of Commons, and also the open letter to the people of Canada, which is nothing but a condensed version of the speech I made in the budget debate. In that speech I did not ask for charity. I said:

> We must demand that no person or corporation or institution makes any profit from this war. We must demand that those with great wealth pay the cost of the war and not we who now can only just manage to live.

There is the difference between this pamphlet and the other one. Yet I am informed that the police have been to the offices of the newspaper company which published this pamphlet. I am informed that they have taken the galley-proof and the available copies, and that men in various cities of Canada who have been selling this little pamphlet have been arrested.

An hon. MEMBER: Shame.

Mrs. NIELSEN: I do not speak as an individual. I speak, as do other hon. members, as an elected representative of the people. If democracy is going to live in Canada, then the other members of the House of Commons have the right with me to ask why the voice of one member of the house should be stilled. It becomes increasingly evident that under the defence of Canada regulations anyone may be accused of being subversive if he speaks or acts against the powers that be in this country. If he says anything against the power of finance or against the power of big business, he may be called subversive under the defence of Canada regulations. In Germany, if it were found necessary to discredit anyone or attempt to make everyone take notice, the cry of "Jew, Jew," was raised. In Canada, if certain people feel that they want to discredit anyone, they do not raise the cry of "Jew," they raise the cry of "red, red." Jew-baiting in Germany, red-baiting in Canada! These are the things I want to bring to the attention of this house. If we have democracy in this country, these conditions must no longer exist.

As I said before, although Canada is the land of my adoption, England is the land of my birth. I have no fear of these things. It matters not to me what I am called. If I am called "red", that does not affect me. Only one thing which would perhaps break my heart is if in this effort to preserve democracy the common people of this country ever had occasion to label me "yellow".

Some of the trade union leaders have also been labeled "red". I do not know whether they are, but if we have any democracy at all we should safeguard the citizens of this country from things of this kind. They should be given a chance in our courts to be proved guilty or to be exonerated from these charges. I was not in the house at the time it was delivered, but I read a speech which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made on September 8, 1939. He made some wonderful statements, and I should like to quote him as follows:

> I care not who the individual may be, how respectable in his own eyes or in the eyes of others he may appear, or what position he may hold; if he seeks to profiteer in this crisis he belongs to the underworld and should be treated as one of those who menace all that is sacred in human relations.

If a man seeks to profit in this crisis, he belongs to the underworld, according to the Prime Minister. There are many people who have been interned because they have worked in the interests of the common people of Canada. Yet we have to-day as members of an advisory committee to this government a number of leading industrialists, men who are bound up with the great financial institutions, industries and big business monopolies. They are members of a committee advising the government on its war effort. Through the corporations which they represent these men are making unprecedented profits out of war contracts. Remembering the words of the Prime Minister, I believe it is also well to remember that this government has as members of an advisory committee men who, according to the words of the Prime Minister, belong to the underworld.

There are no provisions in the defence of Canada regulations to take care of such subversive activities. We should not forget the fate of France. There were those who were guilty of the downfall of that country, those who stole her democracy and relinquished it to the dictators, those who imprisoned thousands of French citizens in internment camps and prisons, those who set loose the really guilty ones. I think there is considerable need for the Canadian people to see a parallel of these conditions within our own boundaries.

This evening I want to pay a tribute. Many tributes have been paid in this house to the armed forces, and I have joined in those tributes. But I want to pay a tribute to another army, that army of men and women who are without uniforms, who are without ammunition, who have nothing but the courage of their convictions. They have only the ideals of democracy to which they cling, but they are standing in the front line of the defence of democracy here in Canada. These people are to be found in various walks of life; they hold various political opinions and have various creeds. I hope I may be privileged to stand beside those who are standing in the front line in the defence of democracy. These people have done much to help to keep alive the structure and spirit of democracy, as well as the practice of democracy, which matters more than anything else. In closing I should like to quote a few words from the Globe and Mail of October 12, because I believe that in these words is a truth which every Canadian should realize. They are:

> It is the unpopular people who are the first victims of any gestapo. The turn of the more reputable citizens comes next, when, after having acquiesced in injustices being done to people they dislike, they find that their own shield against injustice has been destroyed.

I know there are many to-day who feel that those in internment camps are just communists or agitators. They may be, but as Canadian citizens they have the right to a trial and British justice. If we as Canadians are willing to let them suffer without having justice, who knows how many of us will suffer in the same way in the future? It is not only that we have to stand to-day in defence of what democracy remains to us; the Canadian people must gather their forces, and all those who believe in and are willing to defend democracy must attack the powers of reaction which are stealing the very bulwarks of our democracy from us. They must go after the democracy which has been taken away from us. There must be freedom of speech, freedom of assembly and the right to a just trial. Through these years there have been people who have been willing to defend and fight for democracy. If they are willing to give their lives for democracy, then I feel convinced that democracy will never die in Canada.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak at this stage of the debate in support of the amendment, I do so because it provides me with the first opportunity of making a few suggestions to the government and drawing to their attention a matter apart from the war but one which is of urgent importance in western Canada. I think we are all agreed, and it is not necessary to restate it, that Canada's part in this war should be a united one. The day has arrived when petty differences should be set aside. This matter should be looked at from a national viewpoint. I think we all realize that Canada's war effort should be a one hundred per cent effort. May I say here that any achievements or speeding up of our war effort during recent months, such as we have heard of from four members of the government, should not blind us to the fact that our front line is in Britain; or as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) put it, our front line is in the English channel, on the coast-line or wherever Britain desires to lead us in this struggle.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), in his statement to the house the other day, gave us his reason for calling parliament together at this time. He said it was for the purpose of giving to the members first-hand information respecting Canada's war effort and an opportunity to make inquiries after we had heard the statements of the government. I think the Prime Minister realized that the press and the public generally were becoming a little restive and wanted to know. Through parliament we are going to let the public know, and after we have had the full story from the government the opposition will be in a position to decide exactly what we should do. I think it is generally agreed that as an opposition we have the right to make constructive criticisms. I think it is also agreed that we cooperated fully with the government during the 1939 session, and we shall cooperate now if the government shows its desire to have our cooperation by giving parliament all the information it should have.

May I say to the private members supporting the government that they have just as much responsibility as we in the opposition have to see that the government gives parliament the facts, and wherever possible to give the government support in its war effort. We should, however, have first heard from all the ministers, instead of having all this in-between stuff. We should have been given a clear-cut statement of what Britain has asked of Canada. Who knows yet what Britain has asked of Canada? What did Britain ask of us in September, 1939? What did they ask Canada to do in July, 1940? What are they asking Canada to do to-day in the matter of men, armaments, munitions and food? When we have received a clear-cut statement of what Britain is asking us to do, we shall be in a position to judge whether Canada's war effort is the very best of which Canada is capable.

The Prime Minister, in his address to the house the other day, quoted statements that had been made to the British house thanking Canada. That was quite all right. But still we do not know what Britain has asked Canada for. We do not know what they desire as our maximum effort, so to speak, and I think we should be told.

The Prime Minister also mentioned the cost of the war. I do not think this is the stage to go into that because there will be an opportunity to discuss the cost on the budget. To illustrate the seriousness of the war and the great responsibility of the government, the Prime Minister related that at a cabinet meeting one day the government passed war contracts to the amount of $200,000,000, which was quite an order. Here is where the Liberal members sitting behind the government could strengthen its hands if they would only join with the opposition more and insist on a non-political, business-like executive body being set up with authority to direct and coordinate Canada's war supply programme. That is their duty just as much as it is ours. We have boards, missions, commissions and committees, and information is being given to the public with respect to all contracts let, but the volume is so large that I for one cannot begin to analyse or check them, nor do I think any member of the house can. Contracts are being let by the thousand, and we know of sub-contracts being let by the thousand, too, so that it is impossible for us, no matter how much we as members of the house would like to check them, to keep track of them all.

We hear at times of favouritism, patronage and waste. I have heard it from the boys in uniform who have gone from western Canada down east and come back home, and I have heard it from men not in uniform who were employed on construction contracts. These men come back home from time to time and tell of waste and a few other things that are going on which I think should be corrected. I am not going to be too critical of the government or of any minister in that regard, because I do not think it is humanly possible for any minister to keep track of all that goes on.

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) and the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) gave us a fair and clear-cut statement of the activities of their departments and showed that they are anxious to be fair and reasonable in meeting criticism and giving us information. I repeat that I am not charging any minister for some of the things we sometimes hear are going on, for all parties are cursed with a certain class of people who are bound to bring in patronage, favouritism and things of that kind.

One request has been made which I should like to support and that is free transportation and Christmas leave for the soldiers. I do hope the government will take into consideration the suggestions that have been made in that regard. Many of the men are far from their homes and the distance across Canada is great, but I hope the government will do the very best they can and give the boys who are a long way from home a chance to get back for Christmas.

We have heard now from four ministers. We are all agreed that the war is the paramount question before parliament to-day; nevertheless there are certain domestic problems that are second only in importance to the war, and of such importance that they should be dealt with by parliament now at this session.

We have heard from the Minister of Agriculture. He was the first to go to bat, and his speech may be divided into three parts—introductory; his achievements with respect to the agreements overseas; and thirdly, an account of his trip. I certainly enjoyed listening to his description of what he saw in Britain and his account of the fine spirit of the British people and their firm resolve that they are going to go on until they have won this war. It was splendid to hear the minister describe the spirit of the people he had seen there. I think we were all a little more British after listening to that part of his address.

But I regret exceedingly that in the first part of his speech he ran true to form, just as we have heard from him on former occasions. I say that the first fifteen minutes of his speech was uncalled for, and not becoming to a cabinet minister or one seeking the leadership of a great party. This has happened before; I believe this was the second occasion on which he pulled off the same thing. I do not think the people of Canada appreciate or are looking for that sort of thing at this time. The minister abused the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell)—

An hon. MEMBER: They looked for it.

Mr. PERLEY: No, they did not look for it. It is their right and privilege to offer constructive criticism. The amendment is constructive, and the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation also offered constructive suggestions; I venture to say that two-thirds of what he advocated will be adopted by this government within the next eighteen months. I do not think hon. members have to stand for that sort of thing.

The minister went on to refer to the election last March, and cited his own case in particular. I can tell him that if the third candidate had dropped out two days before nomination day, Mrs. Lucas would have been sitting over to my left representing the constituency of Melville. It was the Liberal machine, efficient and well-oiled, that helped to win that election; I might mention such things as dug-outs in his own constituency and telegrams circulated promising bonuses which in some instances never were paid. Just to indicate what really brought about that election result, I should like to refer to the auditor general's report for last year, tabled in this house within the last few days. For the information of all hon. members I should like to quote from page 61 of that report, where the auditor general deals with the administration of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. He says:

> Commitments of approximately $1,315,575.20 were incurred in excess of the amount appropriated without certificates of the comptroller of the treasury being secured. . . .

Of that amount the auditor general goes on to say that small projects, such as dug-outs and so on, accounted for $909,553. On the next page he deals with contracts let under this legislation, and says:

> The contract with the Northern Wood Preservers, authorized by P.C. 223 of January 31, 1939, provides for the purchase of not less than 400,000 and not more than 500,000 posts. Payments to the company are, by the agreement, to be made after inspection, three cents per post being withheld to secure the subsequent loading. As of March 31, 1940, payments had been made on 494,883 posts—

That was practically the maximum amount authorized.

—but only 188,600 had been delivered.

Then on page 66 we have the report with regard to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, which is the bill under which the bonuses are paid. I should like hon. members to listen carefully to this statement:

> Several awards were made by the minister covering yields not accepted by the committee. Farmers were not required to make applications for assistance. . . . Awards have been made on summer-fallow acreage where in many cases the summer-fallow exceeds the seeded acreage. A limited test audit showed that of the total cultivated acreage approximately 35 per cent was in summer-fallow.

And again:

Payments have been made in many cases where the cultivated acreage was too small to put persons in the category of farmers.

And again:

Payments have been made to persons who, in no sense, were grain farmers—

That is what has been going on under this branch of the Department of Agriculture. I appeal to hon. members to see to it, when the estimates are under consideration this year, that some direction is given that this sort of thing must stop in Saskatchewan. This is the third auditor general's report to condemn the actions of the minister. I have brought the matter to the attention of the house previously, and I do so again now. This sort of thing should not be permitted, and hon. members are not hon. members if they do not do something to stop it.

The minister stated that the government had spent millions to help the farmers of the west, and mentioned what had been done by way of increasing the storage facilities for grain. I say that assistance should have been given directly to the farmers and not to the grain trade. I should have liked time to recite how the annexes being built to accommodate twenty-five or thirty thousand bushels will be paid for in three months on the basis of the storage charges being collected. I say these storage charges should be readjusted, because this is very different from grain storage in a regular terminal elevator.

The minister's statement contained nothing definite with respect to wheat, nor did it hold any immediate promise of relief for the wheat grower. As reported at page 101 of Hansard the minister told us what wheat we might expect to sell during the next five years, a total of 2,080,000,000 bushels. This includes 160,000,000 bushels a year to the United Kingdom, 160,000,000 bushels a year to other countries provided the war progresses as he hopes or is over, and 160,000,000 bushels annually for domestic consumption. The last figure is a little high, I am afraid; the domestic consumption at present is only about 110,000,000 bushels annually. I would say the minister is an optimist, but I am going to agree with him in very large measure. I have always been an optimist with respect to our large wheat surplus. I never worried very much about it in Mr. Bennett's time, in 1934 and 1935, when the situation was similar to that which exists at present. I can recall, however, the minister and other members of the house going up and down Saskatchewan at that time saying that Mr. Bennett was hoarding wheat and not selling it, and criticizing us for taking money from the treasury to carry this tremendous load. They also said that Mr. Bennett's policy was one which would bring about the control or restriction of production. Well, I think the minister is pretty nearly right in his estimate; I think he will get rid of his wheat, but I would like to see him courageous enough to fix the price, as we did under similar circumstances in 1935, at 87½ cents.

I am not going to say anything with regard to the control of production. I am a little hesitant about offering any suggestions, because any suggestions I have brought forward on the floor of this house during the last two or three years have been ridiculed by the government, although it is some satisfaction to know that almost all of them have been subsequently embodied in the legislation that has been brought down. If the minister is interested in a proposal I made with regard to the control of production, he might look up Hansard for 1934.

The minister comes to the house without anything for the butter producers, although he has something for those producing cheese. What about bacon? Perhaps his statement was a little previous. He spoke of the greater quantity we might ship, but he added, "I cannot divulge the price." Well, it happened that the head of one of the leading Canadian packing plants was in this city, and, I believe, in one of the galleries of this house, the day the minister made his statement, and the price was set the next day. Was that just a coincidence? Why could the minister not have said, "Well, we will have to take a lower price, boys, but you can produce all the pork you like and they will take it." I am afraid there was not very much in his speech for the hog producer. I do not think the minister needed to go to England at all. I believe it would have been sufficient if he had sent the chairman of the bacon board. It seems to me that if the minister's trip cost this country even a dollar, that was one dollar too much, for nothing whatever was accomplished that could not have been accomplished by negotiation with the representatives of the British authorities right here. Let him tell us what he accomplished over there that could not have been achieved by negotiation. He said further that the producers must supply and expect only sufficient to carry on. Let me quote from page 97 of Hansard:

I think it is our duty to place the food supplies available for empire consumption at the disposal of the empire through the food and shipping ministries of Britain, to be directed to any market they think advisable. I think we should receive in return from the British government for these supplies sufficient to make it possible for our farmers to carry on producing food supplies.

The statement is that the farmers are expected to produce as long as they receive sufficient to carry on. May I ask, then, why it is necessary to have the grain exchange remain open? As regards carrying on at cost of production, let me say that our farmers are just as patriotic and are just as much in this war as any other class of industry or any other section of the community, and all we want for them is a fair price, a price comparable with that which industry is receiving for what it produces of the commodities that farmers have to buy.

Take an eight-foot binder. I recall a statement made by the minister last year with regard to the binder used on his own farm. In 1913 it took 260 bushels of wheat to buy that binder; in 1936, since this government took office, an eight-foot binder cost 300 bushels odd; and to-day the same binder costs 630 bushels. What we want is a comparable price, a price that will be fair and equitable, so that all classes will be making about the same sacrifice. Then the farmer will produce at any cost.

Last fall, after the house closed, the minister made a trip to the west. He said that the growers might expect a much better price for the 1939 crop if the war got no worse or if it should end at any time, and he definitely advised the farmers to increase hog production. He made another trip a little after that, and I have the report of the interview that appeared in the Regina Leader-Post. In large headlines, the statement was attributed to him that the wheat policy announcement might not come until November 1. November 1 was the day the farmer paid his threshing accounts; that was the big day he settled his accounts, and that would be the day on which the government would announce their permanent wheat policy. He must have had in mind this trip overseas. However, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) paid us a visit about that time, and a few days later, in the Regina Leader-Post, there appeared a statement in which that hon. gentleman declared that December 1 would be the big day, and he said he had been advised that the general wheat delivery quota could be fixed for the first week in December. December 1, then, was the big day. I suggest that these two ministers should get together on the announcements they make with respect to this one department of government.

It is quite apparent that the Minister of Agriculture is in more than an advisory capacity. He is head of two other departments, agriculture and national war services, and to a great extent he is manager of public works—he steps in there. If we look over the situation we find that he is pretty well running about four departments of government. I agree with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) that it is time the Minister of Agriculture paid special attention to one department and one only. The producers, he says, must not be pessimistic. Let me say this. In western Canada there is an emergency situation that calls for immediate action. It has come about from one or two causes. I am not going to charge the government with responsibility for the first cause, namely, the loss of a certain amount of the European market where we enjoyed an export trade of 100,000,000 bushels. We have lost that and I am not going to charge the government with responsibility for it; nevertheless that has made the situation more serious. It has become a national problem and one that must be considered as such by this government. It is this government's direct responsibility.

When the war broke out, there were certain problems that were unsolved in Canada. There was the problem of scarcity in the midst of plenty, about which we have heard so much from our friends in the corner to my left; there was the problem of a reasonable standard of living for the Canadian people; there was the problem of parity of prices; and there was the problem of production. These questions are all on the government's doorstep and they have not been courageously dealt with. They must be settled immediately. One cause, then, has been the loss of markets; the other cause is the failure of the government to handle the situation in a constructive, courageous way.

Hon. members will recall that on June 27 last I tried to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing this all-important public question of wheat, but my effort was frustrated. It was apparent then, however, what was going to happen, and it did happen. I was ruled out of order and nothing was done. Certain bills were rushed through in the last day or two of the session, but no adequate picture was presented to the house.

I contend that we must have action immediately because an emergent situation does exist, a situation that has come about as a result of lack of cash in circulation in western Canada from the crop as compared with what we had in 1939. There is some misunderstanding with respect to farm conditions in the west. We normally market up to the first of November about 75 per cent of the crop. This year by the first of November we had marketed 205,000,000 bushels, whereas last year, on the first of November, we had marketed 312,000,000 bushels. That means, at the same price—70 cents, netting 50 cents to the farmer —that there was from $50,000,000 to $55,-000,000 less in circulation in western Canada on the first of November than there was at the same time last year. The eight-bushel quota, 50 cents, average, pays only current taxes, cost of harvesting and cost of labour. The merchants have not been paid and their position is desperate. Winter is coming on and the farmer has no surplus money to provide fuel or clothing. Things are at a standstill.

I am going to offer a suggestion, because there have been many complaints since last August, since this situation came about, and suggestions have been offered to the government. But see what has happened in Manitoba. The Hon. Mr. Bracken out there has been calling conferences; he has had representatives from all parts of the west meeting with him, and I think he has made suggestions to this government. Evidently they have not listened, and hon. members know what has happened out there. He is going to be down here in a few days, and we had better adjourn pretty soon or he will be here before we get back west.

I have made certain suggestions; the government, while they did not at the time accept them, generally do in the end. Therefore I am offering this one now in the hope that they will act on it, and do so quickly. It is this: to increase the initial price. I want hon. members from western Canada to think it over. They know the situation out there. What more can the government do to relieve this agricultural situation right now? The winter is here. Increase that price to 87½ cents, or 90 cents would be better—

An hon. MEMBER: Make it a dollar.

Mr. PERLEY: No, I am not one of those who talk bosh; I am saying what is reasonable. What can this government do to relieve the situation? They can increase this price and make it retroactive to August 1, 1940. That would start about $40,000,000 in circulation at once. But it will all come east. Merchants there are cancelling their wholesale orders, refusing their drafts, but this would start money in circulation. If the government do not do this, they will have to do something which will cost just as much in the end.

In making that suggestion I go further. I am going to show how they can get that and how they can save it. First, on the ordinary expenditure in the next fiscal year they can save at least $30,000,000. They can save under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, if they cut out some of the stuff, at least $2,000,000. The minister told us last year he was going to cut out $700,000, but he went beyond his authority, he had to stretch it and overspend to the extent of $1,300,000. The government services could be cut so as to save $5,000,000 all over Canada; the overloaded civil service could be reorganized, and $5,000,-000 saved there. Then the grain exchange could be closed and we could make a saving there of commissions and brokerage fees paid to that organization for which they are not giving a single dollar's worth; at least $1,000,-000 could be saved there. They can save $15,000,000 in storage fees paid on grain now in elevators in western Canada, in these annexes, space offsight as they call it, drawing two-thirds of a cent a bushel a month, and paying for the space in three months. That should be readjusted. Then we should stop paying storage in box cars. And the government should take full charge of the whole grain marketing system in western Canada, including coarse grains and all, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar suggested.

If I had time I could outline how a very great saving could be made to the individual farmer right now. The hon. Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) I venture to say has heard about it; stop this racket that is being perpetrated on the western farmer this year more than ever before in the last thirty years. Hon. members have been sitting here for thirty years trying to devise a scheme whereby the farmer would get a fair deal in marketing his wheat. We spent a month amending the grain act the last year that Hon. Doctor Motherwell sat in this house. After all that, there was perpetrated this year the greatest racket by way of storage fees, dockages, undergrading and the like, that there ever was. I have samples from the constituency of the Minister of Agriculture; I have sent samples to Ottawa and to the grain inspection at Winnipeg, and have had different grading on the Winnipeg ones—"they have not authority to grade it here"—from that they are giving at the interior elevator. I have in my room samples graded No. 3, and No. 3 rejected; I would like the minister to come and look at them. There is a racket being practised there that should be stopped. There is only one way to do it, that is for this government to have the courage to do it. It is an outrage on the farmers of western Canada to permit it to go on.

Let me now deal with the bankers for a moment. The question of advancing money on wheat on the farm has come up and will come up. If the government did what I suggest, increase the price, with the storage paid to the farmer on the farm, then the bankers should be told by this government that it is time for them to get into this picture and do their share to relieve that situation by reasonable loans. If the price were around ninety cents and storage paid on the farm at two-thirds of a cent a bushel a month, the bankers should be told to make reasonable advances to the farmers and if they do not, this government should talk to them. The farmer sells his grain to the elevator and the elevator has the power under the grain act to hypothecate the wheat to the bank and get on the wheat the money that he pays to the farmer for it. I would say to the banks, the farmer can hypothecate his wheat in his bin, and you make these advances, or we will take steps to see that you do, or do something with respect to amending the Canadian Bank Act. The government can do a lot of things if only they have the courage.

Suggestions have been made with respect to stopping the importation into Canada of agricultural products; pork products were instanced by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon).

Then I would refer for a moment to domestic freight rates. The government can do a great deal for the farmers by readjusting those rates; this pork production means that our coarse grains should be coming east in greater quantities, as they would if the freight rates were adjusted.

My time is almost up. I appeal to this government to take action immediately along the lines I have suggested. By doing so they would give a measure of justice to the farmers of western Canada. We are all behind the government in doing anything at all to put this industry in its proper place. The farmers are patriotic; let us deal with them in such a way that they can go hand in hand with us; the effort that Canada is putting forth at the present time will be of such a character that we shall emerge with democracy saved, and liberty and justice preserved, and we shall be first in the great commonwealth of British dominions. The Canadian farmers will do their part.

Mr. F. P. WHITMAN (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, may I at the very outset of my address add my word of congratulation to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) is to be congratulated upon the thoughtful address which he delivered and upon the dignified and able manner in which he delivered it. The electors of St. Lawrence-St. George may well be proud of having sent such an able debater to the House of Commons. He presented a keen and analytical study of the policy of the government and set forth in a clear and precise manner the praiseworthy efforts of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his colleagues at this critical time. The house owes the hon. member a debt of gratitude for so ably presenting to us this policy as it has been unfolded up to the present time.

The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras) in his dignified manner has also proven to this house and the country that youth is no deterrent to a man's capabilities. His clear, concise address and dignified delivery in both French and English must be appreciated by all hon. members and by the people of Canada. It augurs well for the future of our country that we have young men so well qualified to enter our houses of parliament as these two hon. members.

During this debate much has been said which reflects upon the government's war effort. It is frequently pointed out that criticism can easily be avoided. It can be avoided by the man who does nothing. It can be avoided by the man who says nothing; for naturally, if a man does or says nothing, there is nothing to criticize. The consequence would be: Do nothing, say nothing and be nothing.

As I said a moment ago, much has been said by his majesty's loyal opposition which tends to criticize the government's war effort. That criticism in itself, be it vicious or otherwise, indicates that the government has done things. From actual observation, I believe that members of this government can say with pride, that from time immemorial there is not on record in history a single government which, during such a short period of time and with so small a population has executed such a colossal and successful war effort as has this government. I do not believe more could humanly have been accomplished. There has been no indication at any time or by anyone of any single, additional thing that could have been done. The loose and irresponsible suggestions that are put forward by those in responsible positions make us more than thankful that we have a government with such ability, as well as wisdom, foresight and acumen, to be able to separate the wheat from the chaff.

Not only on the floor of the house but at non-political meetings during the recess following the last session I have heard of unjustified criticism not only of this government but of our neighbour to the south. It is dangerous by innuendo or otherwise to reflect upon the actions of a friendly government, and I believe that part of a speech delivered on September 2, Labour day, in Toronto by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) could well have been left unsaid. I regret he is not in his seat to-night.

Mr. HOMUTH: Go right ahead; it is all right.

Mr. WHITMAN: I refer specifically to the statement reported to have been made by the leader of the opposition, in which he said that the Ogdensburg meeting between the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) of Canada and the President of the United States was made in part with the idea of ensuring the president's reelection. If such a speech were made, I believe that the best interests of the British empire were not served. I believe that any speech or word that tends to weaken friendly relations which exist between the British empire and other democracies is dangerous and unpatriotic.

It is further reported that in the same speech the leader of the opposition stated he was not unaware of the attitude in the past of our Prime Minister toward the United States. I am glad the leader of the opposition is aware of the attitude of our Prime Minister toward the people of the United States. I hope that all hon. members are aware of that attitude. I hope that that attitude is made clear to every Canadian citizen from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I will go farther. I wish that attitude could be made clear to all the nations of the world. It has been one of friendliness and cooperation, and had it been followed by the nations of Europe we would not now be embroiled in this most beastly and horrible war. If the attitude of our Prime Minister has resulted in nothing more than a cementing of the friendship between the United States and the British empire, then it is my considered opinion that he has done more than any other living man for the British empire.

Among the criticisms levelled at the government mention has been made of the inefficiency of the government's mobilization act which was passed at the last session of parliament. Criticism of this kind is puerile and discloses a lack of understanding of its purpose and its effect. Allow me by comparison with the Military Service Act of 1917 to indicate the difference in effect of the two acts upon Canada as a nation. The Military Service Act of 1917, adopted by the then union government, actually disunited this country, while the effect of the mobilization act of 1940 is consistent with the government's policy of building and maintaining a united Canada.

The whole country from the Atlantic to the Pacific is responding nobly because of its realization that the mobilization act of 1940 has been passed with one object in view, namely the training and preparation of our man-power. It has been designed for our self-preservation and for the preservation of our democratic institutions.

Mr. HOMUTH: Why have they changed it?

Mr. WHITMAN: By way of further criticism we have heard it said that our factories are not yet producing rifles, ammunition, uniforms, boots and other equipment required by our troops. I would place this unwarranted criticism under the heading of either lack of information or the desire to misinform.

With respect to the production of guns in Canadian factories I received a bulletin on October 17 stating that we in Canada were about to produce some of the largest naval guns produced in the British empire. That statement was reported to have been made by a minister. On October 21 a correction came to me saying that the minister had stated that naval guns were shortly to be produced in Canada in a factory which was one of the largest in the British empire.

I respectfully suggest that a copy of this correction should be mailed to the leader of the opposition, because apparently his copy has gone astray. I recall clearly that during the last world war the training of the third Canadian division artillery in Canada was accomplished without any weapons whatsoever. In fact we did not touch a piece of field artillery until we reached England, and only two and a half months before we landed in France on active service. Our complete training in Canada consisted of adapting ourselves to military discipline and getting ourselves in good physical condition. Notwithstanding this, the division wrote history by their loyalty and valour. Canadian troops seemed to adapt themselves to any position in which they found themselves in the last war, and I have every confidence that that old tradition will be lived up to by the present army. So we see just how unwarranted criticism of the kind I have indicated may be, when we realize that within fourteen months of our entering the war we are operating on a colossal war-producing basis. We are producing practically all the instruments of war, to say nothing of the fact that we are making Canada the hub of the empire's training scheme.

May I respectfully add my plea to that which has been made by other hon. members respecting the proposal that the government supply free transportation to and from their homes, as frequently as possible, to members of our active service force and our non-permanent active militia.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. member about the rule which does not permit the reading of speeches. I have mentioned that rule earlier in the debate. I do wish the hon. member would obey that rule. It is there and it must be observed.

Mr. WHITMAN: I think all hon. members are well aware of the importance of home ties to our men who are proceeding overseas. I feel I would be lacking in my duty if I did not add my voice to those already raised in asking the government to give this matter their earnest attention.

There is another matter which has not been brought up by any previous speaker and which, I believe, is quite praiseworthy. I refer to the evacuees from Europe and the British isles who have been coming to Canada. The humanitarian efforts which have been put forth by the government and the civil service are most praiseworthy, and I should like to add my congratulations to the government upon making this possible. As I go through my riding of Mount Royal daily, I meet many evacuees, and they are all pleased to be in the country and most thankful that they have been given a haven of refuge.

This brings up another matter, the increase in industry which has taken place because of this evacuee movement. I would mention the Bata shoe company which was brought to Canada by men of capital in Czechoslovakia. I cannot give the exact statistics, but I know that several other industries have located in this country and are now giving employment to thousands of Canadians. Industries have been set up where there were no industries before, and all this is the direct result of the splendid efforts put forward by our government to take care of these refugees from Europe. This dominion is growing and it will continue to grow. Never in its history have commercial and industrial strides been so great as those which have occurred in the last twelve months. I think the Prime Minister and the government are to be congratulated upon having facilitated this movement.

We see that things are going along fairly evenly at this critical time. Futile and vicious criticism does not help our war effort, nor does it tend toward unity. At this time unity in Canada is of paramount importance. I know that all members of the opposition will agree that even though it may not serve the best interests of their parties, it would be morally wrong for them not to accept the dictum that unity for Canada should be the watchword to-day. If it would be morally wrong for them not to accept that dictum, then it cannot be politically right. The great Irish statesman Daniel O'Connell said that nothing is politically right that is morally wrong. This is the time of sacrifice, political and otherwise. Unity must prevail. Nothing must be done by any individual or group of individuals that will interfere in the minutest degree with our struggle for self-preservation. Nothing would be more dangerous than unwholesome or thoughtless criticism, or the throwing of questions at the government with the single object of embarrassing them.

Let us all be mindful of the philosophy of the well-known philosopher who said that a few drops of oil will set the political machine in motion, whereas a ton of vinegar will only corrode and canker. Let us keep oiling the machine and see that no one attempts to corrode and canker our war effort. This is the time for extreme trust, collaboration and unity. It is not a time for mistrust, prejudice and disruption. No finer words have been uttered than those uttered on the floor of this house by no less a personage than that great Liberal leader and philosopher, the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who said: "Love is better than hate, truth is better than falsehood, trust is better than suspicion."

On motion of Mr. Macdonald (Kingston City) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Macdonald (Kingston City) the house adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ENROLMENT FORM SIGNED BY RECRUITS UNDER RESOURCES MOBILIZATION ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. MAXIME RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) whether those who have been called up for training under the National Resources Mobilization Act are obliged to sign any document or form, particularly one with the following heading:

Militia Act
National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940
Enrolment
Non-permanent Active Militia of Canada

I hold in my hand a copy of this form, and I shall send it along to the minister. I should like also to know if those who have signed such a form or document are under any obligations in addition to those arising out of the National Resources Mobilization Act. My information is that those who were called for training in October last were asked to sign a form similar to the one I have sent to the minister.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): My hon. friend was good enough to tell me that he was going to ask this question and I have had the regulations looked up. I have prepared an answer which I think will give the information quite fully.

It will be remembered that under the militia (special) regulations, 1940, those who were called for training automatically became members of the non-permanent active militia. There is a provision in the regulations that the recruit shall sign in triplicate a special enrolment form, copy of which is attached to the regulations. It is a copy of this enrolment form which my hon. friend has just sent to me. I would point out that this enrolment form simply contains personal particulars of the man, such as his name; his address; his place of birth; his date of birth; his religion; his next of kin; his physical description such as height, weight, colour of eyes and colour of hair; and his preference, if any, for naval, military or air force service. If the man refuses to sign, it is provided that his commanding officer may fill in the answers in so far as he can get the information, and the form bearing the signature of the commanding officer has the same effect as if the man had signed it himself.

My hon. friend asks whether or not the signing of the form changes in any way the obligations which the recruit has under the National Resources Mobilization Act. I can say to him that the enrolment form, whether signed or not, does not change in any way the obligations of the recruit under the National Resources Mobilization Act. As I have said, he is a member of the non-permanent active militia and the regulations provide expressly that so long as he remains a member he is liable to the performance of such training service or duty—I quote now—"but only within Canada and the territorial waters thereof" as the Minister of National Defence may require from time to time.

In addition to the enrolment form being useful for the purpose of furnishing personal particulars of the man and indicating the type of service which he prefers, it is stamped with a certificate of training. It is expressly provided in the regulations that the first copy shall be sent to the officer in charge of the records, the third copy shall be sent to the militia unit to which he has been posted, and the second copy shall be delivered to the recruit as evidence of his having performed his training.

Let me repeat, first, that the signing of the form does not in any way increase the obligation for training service or duty under the National Resources Mobilization Act, which can be required only within Canada and the territorial waters thereof; and, second, that the form serves only to verify the personal particulars regarding the recruit, the second copy, when stamped with the certificate of training, provides him with evidence of his having performed his training.

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN "CANADIAN BUSINESS" ADVOCATING THE ADOPTION OF COMMUNISM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) if the attention of the government has been drawn to the article entitled "The U.S. and Us" appearing in the October issue of Canadian Business, advocating the adoption of communism in Canada. If so, has the government taken steps under the defence of Canada regulations to prosecute the author and the publisher for the writing and publication of this article? Has the government taken any action to declare the Canadian Chamber of Commerce an illegal organization for supporting the principles advocated in the article?

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I received my hon. friend's notice too late to be able to secure a copy of the publication, but I shall not fail to do so in order that I may be in a position to give him an answer. If the matter comes under the censorship regulations it will be the Secretary of State, of course, who will have the responsibility, not myself. Meanwhile I must say that I should be surprised if the Canadian Chamber of Commerce or the Canadian Manufacturers' Association had turned bolshevist.

KING'S REGULATIONS AND ORDERS

PUBLICATION IN CANADA GAZETTE—AVAILABILITY OF AMENDMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, supplementing the question asked by the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond), I would ask the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) if all the amendments that have been made to the king's regulations and orders since the beginning of the war have been published in the Canada Gazette with the forms relating thereto; and second, if a member of parliament asks for a copy of the amendments to date of the king's regulations and orders will his request be granted or refused?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): In reply to the first question, so far as I am aware all the amendments to the king's regulations and orders have been published in the Canada Gazette, but I shall endeavour to verify that.

Second, with regard to the presentation of a copy of the king's regulations and orders to my hon. friend or to members of the house, I shall have to make inquiries because I am not familiar with the terms under which they are issued. It may be a matter for the king's printer; I do not know. I can assure my hon. friend, however, that steps will be taken to see to it that in whatever way the orders and regulations are made available to members the amendments will be included therein.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Monday, November 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Brooke Claxton for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Blackmore.

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): Mr. Speaker, to-day I shall endeavour to tell the house something of ships and sailor men, of the ships of the Royal Canadian Navy and of those men who go down to the sea in ships and do business in great waters.

Hon. members will recall, I am sure, that in the latter days of the last session, at a time when I had not the honour of a seat in this house, my colleague the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Power) gave to the house an account of the growth and strength and accomplishments of the Royal Canadian Navy. That story was told by my hon. friend about four months ago. I shall endeavour now to continue that exposition and to add to it such new material as the intervening period of time warrants or requires.

I should like first, Mr. Speaker, to deal with the composition of the navy. The personnel of our navy may be classed under three heads. First there are the men of the Royal Canadian Navy itself. This class consists at present of 253 officers and 2,429 men.

Next there is the group known as the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve. This group, as many members know, is made up entirely of seafaring men, drawn from the merchant service and other seagoing pursuits, and it consists now of 486 officers and 2,670 men.

Finally we have the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve, a reserve which for some years has existed in eighteen different centres throughout Canada. It corresponds roughly to the militia of Canada, and it is to a large extent the training ground for officers and men who wish to join our naval forces at this time. The Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve has a strength now of 881 officers and 6,554 men.

That gives a full strength in the Canadian navy, in all its three branches, of 1,620 officers and 11,653 men, or a grand total of 13,273, all ranks.

All these men are on active service. At the beginning of the war the number of men on active service in the Canadian navy was 1,774, so that in fourteen months we have increased the number of men on active service nearly eightfold.

These 13,273 men on active service with the Royal Canadian Navy have been drawn from the three branches of the navy to which I have referred. They are to be found in widely scattered lands and seas, all accepting equal responsibility and danger, whether they are with the Royal Canadian Navy, the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve or the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve, and all striving together in one service for the same great end. Some of these men are on Canadian destroyers, others are on armed merchant cruisers, and still others on patrol vessels, mine-sweepers or in supporting establishments. No fewer than 798 young Canadians are serving in Great Britain or in British ships. This number includes Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve officers training with the British navy, officers lent to the Admiralty for special service, officers and ratings serving on British convoy staffs, Canadian cadets training in England, and the like.

In addition to the number I have given, there are in the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve 81 officers and 1,033 men who are in reserve and not yet called up for active service. When you add these last figures to those that I first gave, you get a total Canadian naval personnel of 14,387, all ranks.

The second element in the composition of the navy is, of course, ships. The number of ships in the Canadian navy now stands at 155. These include various types. We have armed merchant cruisers, we have destroyers, we have corvettes which can be used for general patrol work, for anti-submarine work or for mine sweeping; we have mine sweepers; anti-submarine vessels, motor torpedo boats, together with various other types of auxiliary craft. The figure of 155 vessels now in the Canadian navy represents a tenfold increase over the 15 vessels of various types that we had at the beginning of this war.

I turn now, Mr. Speaker, to the duties of the Royal Canadian Navy. The duties of that navy may, I think, be classed under three heads: First, convoy work and control of the movement of British merchant shipping to and from north America. Second, the patrolling of our own coasts. Third, cooperation with the British navy in European and other waters.

Convoy work is undoubtedly one of the most important duties which the Royal Canadian Navy performs. Under the system now prevailing in our great ports, merchant ships are assembled, grouped together and escorted across the Atlantic in cooperation with the Royal Navy. From our ports in Canada since the outbreak of the war no fewer than 3,500 ships have departed, and in these ships 21,000,000 tons of cargo have been carried over the sea.

In addition to providing escort for cargo or merchant ships, Canadian naval vessels have escorted troop convoys to England and to other areas; and I am glad to be able to say that not a single one of these troops so escorted has been lost at sea as a result of enemy action.

With regard to the escort of cargo ships, I should like to say here that, in spite of enemy claims, which have been particularly exultant and exaggerated in recent weeks, the convoy system is still functioning efficiently and, one might say, without serious interruption. Recently the enemy has increased his efforts to interfere with the passage of goods over the seas of the world to Great Britain, but it may be said with the greatest assurance that these efforts have not approached in their violence or in their success the attacks upon merchant shipping in the last war. I may tell the house, for I see no reason why it should not be told, that in the last week for which I have official figures, a week which falls within the last month, 775 ships in convoy reached British ports, and in that same week only 5 convoyed ships were lost. That is a percentage of about three-quarters of one. In the last week for which I have figures of cargo tonnage, a week which also fell within the last month, 1,129,000 tons of cargo were imported into England—cargo which came over every sea. In spite, therefore, of enemy claims, we may rest assured that the British navy, associated with the navies of the dominions, is still performing vigilantly and valiantly and successfully its time-honoured function of keeping the ocean lanes of the world open, not merely for its own ships and its own supplies, but for the ships and the supplies of neutral countries as well. The white ensign of the British navy is still a pledge of security to all who pass on the seas upon their lawful occasions.

The Canadian navy guards our shores with its destroyers, its armed merchant cruisers, its patrol vessels and mine sweepers, and its various other types of craft. In these matters it works in close cooperation with the Royal Canadian Air Force and the Canadian Army, and its men are constantly on the alert by night and by day, whether the weather be fair or whether it be stormy; whether the temperature be marked by the severe cold of the north Atlantic in winter or by the balmier air of the Pacific. The ships and the men of the Royal Canadian Navy stand, in all circumstances, on guard for Canada.

The third duty of the Royal Canadian Navy—and though I mention it last it is not at all because I regard it as least—is that of cooperating with units of the British navy in European waters or in whatever other part of the world such duties may be assigned to them. These duties may take ships and men of the Royal Canadian Navy across the Atlantic and back again. They may call them to the broad waters of the east coast of Britain, or to the narrower seas which separate Britain from the continent. Our ships and our men may find themselves serving in and with British units in the Caribbean sea, or off the Newfoundland coast, or in the Mediterranean, or on the Pacific. Wherever in the seven seas they have been called upon to serve they have won commendation and approval—the highest and the most authoritative in the world—the approval of officers of the British navy.

And here I come to a stage at which I shall have to draw attention to certain remarks made from the opposite side of the house during the course of this debate.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), in his speech in this house in July last, and again in his remarks last week, made some references to me which I regard as, on the whole, kindly and well meant. It is true that speaking last week he predicted for me a not too lengthy stay in the historic constituency of Kingston City. He would have me homeless shortly, but not nameless; for he paid a high tribute to the name which I bear. For that tribute I forgive him his Cassandra-like references to my political future. The hon. gentleman has made, however, certain references to the quality of Canada's war effort which I cannot pass over lightly. For example, in the amendment which he proposed to the address he used these words:

. . . this house regrets that the government has continued to soothe the Canadian people regarding the war effort of the nation, thereby creating a false sense of security, when a clear-cut call to action is desperately needed.

And again in the course of his speech he used these words:

Our contribution to the first battle of Britain has been rather pitiful. In fact it has not been a factor in the defence of Britain at all, so far as I am aware.

Well, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) has put on record here the story of the Canadian Army, and my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) has told the house of the work of the Royal Canadian Air Force. I ask the house if there is anything pitiful about our contribution of more than 50,000 land soldiers to the defence of Britain. Fifty thousand of our men stand on British soil to-day, and Britain knows, and Hitler knows, that behind them in this country are many times fifty thousand eager to join battle with the enemy.

Is there anything pitiful in the work of the Canadian airmen serving now with the Royal Air Force or with the Royal Canadian Air Force, as described yesterday by the Minister of National Defence for Air? I think there is not. I think, on the contrary, there is every ground for pride in the achievements of these two branches of the service.

I am here, however, to speak for the Royal Canadian Navy, and if hon. members have listened to the account which I have just given of the work of that navy, I am sure they will agree that that work has not constituted a mere pitiful contribution and that it is not a factor to be disregarded in speaking of the defence of Britain.

Take, for example, the assistance of the Canadian navy in convoy work. Is convoy work not important? Take away the convoy system in which we cooperate with the Royal Navy, leave our merchant ships on the oceans of the world unguarded and defenceless, and you strike at the very arteries of British life. Is it to be said that the work of the Royal Canadian Navy in this respect is pitiful and negligible?

[Mr. A. L. Macdonald.]

Take again the casualties that the Canadian navy has suffered in the discharge of its duties, and say that these represent only a pitiful contribution. Two of our destroyers have gone down in the discharge of their duty —the Fraser, in June of this year, and the Margaree a few weeks ago. The mine sweeper Bras d'Or is now nearly a month overdue from a port on the St. Lawrence river to the port of Sydney, Nova Scotia, and she must be presumed lost. As a result of the loss of those three vessels and of other Canadian losses the Canadian naval casualty list now stands at 14 officers and 243 men.

We mourn for those men who have gone, who have given their lives in a great cause, and we hope that those whom they have left behind may be comforted by the reflection that they died as heroes die, in the course of their duty and in the service of their country. They came from every part of Canada, though our eastern coast has suffered most. By the loss of the Margaree alone twenty-five homes in the city of Halifax are bereaved and saddened. It will be idle to say to the wives and mothers of these men that our contribution is pitiful or negligible in this struggle. They will bear their loss bravely, as befits the kindred of heroes; but they, dwelling in that old and gallant city, within daily sight and within constant sound of the sea, will never again look upon the broad Atlantic or listen to the plaintive music of its waves and tides without sorrowing for those who lie forever in its depths.

We do not know exactly what fate befell the Bras d'Or, and we fear now there is no survivor left to tell the tale of her going. But we do know the story of the Fraser and the Margaree, and to lighten the gloom of our sorrow we can say that those who survived behaved with the utmost coolness and gallantry. There was no panic, no fear among them, and everything that men could do to help one another was done. They quitted themselves like men and were strong. In the case of the Fraser the greatest praise must be given to her sister ship, the Canadian destroyer Restigouche, which disregarded great risks to her own safety and to the safety of her crew in order to effect the rescue of many of the Fraser's men. It was a misty night off the coast of France, a night when ships had to run without lights in order to avoid the risk of drawing enemy attack. When the Fraser was struck by another and much larger ship, the Restigouche, without hesitation, turned on her searchlights in order better to carry on her work of rescue. The position was such that the Restigouche had to back toward and alongside the Fraser, a very dangerous operation; but Lieutenant-Commander

Lay of the Restigouche took the risk, and by the exercise of great skill and commendable gallantry he succeeded in bringing off to safety 14 officers and 104 men of the Fraser's crew. I should like to say here that Lieutenant-Commander Lay's Christian names are Horatio Nelson, and that he is a collateral descendant of the great admiral. So that there is something in a name after all. I should also like to add another and more intimate fact about Commander Lay's ancestry. He is a close relative by marriage of the Prime Minister of Canada.

Other noteworthy actions performed by Canadian ships were the rescue by the destroyer St. Laurent of 850 persons from the steamer Arandora Star; the assistance given by the Canadian destroyer Skeena to a Liverpool merchant vessel, for which the Canadian captain received hearty thanks from the Liverpool owner; the assistance which the Canadian destroyer Assiniboine gave to a British cruiser in the capture of the German ship Hanover in the Caribbean sea; the capture of the Italian ship Capo Noli by the mine sweeper Bras d'Or in June last, and finally the spectacular capture by the armed merchant cruiser Prince Robert of the 10,000-ton German express cargo boat the Weser.

It is only natural that the good work of the Royal Canadian Navy, which I have described inadequately here, should have been noted and commended in Britain. Four members of the Canadian naval service have been awarded the Distinguished Service Cross. One petty officer, who I regret to say perished in the Margaree disaster, was awarded the medal of the Order of the British Empire. Nine officers and men have been mentioned in dispatches. The King's Dirk, one of the most coveted of prizes, was won in July last by Cadet Ralph M. Lawrence, a native of the province of New Brunswick, who is training in England. A Canadian naval officer and a Canadian electrical artificer have won cash prizes under the Lott Naval Trust Fund for inventions which they designed or improvements which they made in ship's equipment or armament.

On more than one occasion high British naval authorities have paid unsolicited tribute to the work of our officers and men. The most recent of these tributes—and it comes from a very authoritative source indeed—was pronounced only a few days ago by Commander Reginald Fletcher, a member of the British House of Commons and parliamentary under-secretary to the First Lord of the Admiralty. Speaking over the British Broadcasting Corporation network on Thursday night last Commander Fletcher said:

> We have received invaluable help from the dominions and especially Canada.

Hon. members of this house, who are inclined to make invidious comparisons between Canada's war effort and the war effort of other dominions, should ponder these words, "invaluable help from the dominions and especially Canada." Continuing, Commander Fletcher said:

> The Canadian destroyers have worked alongside our own on equal terms in every way. They have entered fiercely into their work with great zeal and efficiency.

I ask hon. members to note the words "Canadian destroyers have worked alongside our own on equal terms in every way." What higher praise could be given to naval officers and men than to say that they are equal to the officers and men of the British navy? Commander Fletcher went on to pay tribute to the crews of the two Canadian destroyers, the Fraser and the Margaree. Those who were lost, he said, had died in the line of duty, and the survivors had distinguished themselves by their gallantry. Then he continued:

> But more ships carrying the maple leaf on their ensigns will come to join, and be welcomed by, our navy.

More ships will join, more ships will carry the colours of Canada with the white ensign of Britain, and they will carry with them the traditions which officers and men of the Canadian navy are now building so gallantly and so soundly. Commander Fletcher concluded this part of his broadcast by saying that the Hon. A. V. Alexander, First Lord of the Admiralty, had visited the Canadian ships and had been impressed by the bearing of their personnel.

There you have the views of two people in England who are as well qualified as any two people in the world can be to appraise the work and the worth of the Canadian navy.

I should like also to put on record here a paragraph from a letter written by the master of the ship which struck the Margaree, and later rescued some of the destroyer's crew. This letter was written to the commander in chief of the West Indies station, and, speaking of the men of the Margaree who were saved, he makes this remark:

> I should like to take this opportunity of expressing the pleasure it gave us—would that the circumstances had been different—to have these men with us and to get to know and appreciate their fine qualities, and cheerfulness even in such tragic circumstances.

These words, Mr. Speaker, and the other facts to which I have made reference show, I think, beyond all doubt that the Royal Canadian Navy is not making a mere pitiful contribution in this struggle. It is making an important contribution, and it is earning the pride of all Canadians and the approval of British naval officers in the process.

I pass now to some discussion of plans which the naval staff and I have in mind for the future of the Royal Canadian Navy.

We now have, as I said a moment ago, a total strength on active service of some 13,000 officers and men, and of ships we have 155. By the end of the next fiscal year we hope to have added some 100 ships and 10,000 men to our strength. That will give us, if our plans materialize, a Canadian navy of 23,000 men manning 250 ships. When we reach that stage of development we shall, of course, be able to make a contribution much greater than that which we are making to-day.

The rapid growth of the Canadian navy, from the beginning of the war up to the present, and the plans that we have in mind for its enlargement, bring before us certain considerations to which I should like to refer briefly.

Thirty years ago the project of a naval college was advanced in this country, and the college was actually established at Halifax in January, 1911. The great Halifax explosion in 1917 so damaged the building that it was unsuitable for its purpose. Classes were then continued for a year at the Royal Military College, Kingston, and for a few years subsequently in a temporary building at Esquimalt on the Pacific coast. Since 1922, however, Canada has lacked even this meagre training centre, and, in consequence, for eighteen years past we have relied for the training of our officers and higher ratings entirely on British schools. They receive there, of course, an excellent training. In England these young Canadians were in the very heart of the world's naval life. They were surrounded by the great traditions of the British navy; they saw before them every day the proofs and the symbols of that navy's might. I hope that link between Great Britain and Canada will always continue. I hope that for all time Canadians may have recourse to British ports, British ships, British naval skill and British naval tradition.

But yet, recognizing all these things, and eager as I am to retain these things, I believe that something more is required for the full development of the Canadian navy. I have just given to the house some figures which show the estimated size of our navy by the spring of 1942. If I interpret aright the feelings of the Canadian people in this respect, these figures are significant of two things. The first is that we in Canada are determined to put forth on the sea, no less than on land and in the air, our fullest efforts for defence of the British commonwealth, including Canada, and for attack on the common enemy.

That is the first thing. The second significant thing is this. The dignity of Canada demands that we should have a navy worthy of our importance in the world of nations, adequate to the needs of the great trading nation which Canada now is, and which she is bound to become in greater measure after the war; a navy sufficient to meet the obligations which rest upon us as members of the British commonwealth, and as a country in close association with the United States in the matter of the joint defence of this continent.

Under the Ogdensburg agreement, and with the appointment of the joint defence board, representatives of Canada and the United States have undertaken the joint study of measures for the common defence of both countries. These measures involve defence by sea, by land and by air. We in Canada must assume our full share of responsibility in this regard. We have long enjoyed the sheltering protection of the British navy. We stand high on the list of the world's trading nations; yet we have never had a navy whose strength was commensurate with our trading position. The trade routes of the world are kept open for us, as they have been kept open for centuries, and as they will be kept open for centuries to come, mainly by the navy of Britain, assisted by the navies of other friendly and democratic countries.

I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian people wish to indefinitely continue a policy which demands of Britain the sole responsibility of guarding our trade routes, or which, on the other hand, takes shelter behind the existence on this continent of a great and friendly power. I believe that Canadian pride, Canadian dignity, Canadian consciousness of present greatness, Canadian hope for increased stature among the nations of the world, all demand that we should assume our proper share of the burden of naval service hitherto borne so largely by the motherland.

We cannot hope, of course, to have in Canada at this time or in the near future a navy comparable to that of Great Britain, or to that of any one of several of the other great powers I might mention. In all things we must be guided by our means and our capacity; but we can, and, in common sense and in honour, I think we must, build a navy that will be not unworthy of Canada, and that will enable us to play our proper part as a member of the British commonwealth of nations and as a friend and ally of the United States.

The building of such a navy will carry with it the necessity of having trained officers and trained ratings. As I said a moment ago, at one time we had a naval college in Canada, but vicissitudes of one kind or another led to the closing of that institution. I am happy to be able to say in this house to-day, with the concurrence of the Prime Minister and of my colleagues, that we propose to reestablish a Canadian naval college. To this college will resort young men who wish to adopt the naval profession as their life's work. During the war period no other type of work can be attempted at such a college. Indeed, there is high authority for the opinion that a naval college should never concern itself with anything else than the training of men for service in the navy. As yet the whole project is far from being fully developed in my own mind. It may be that the institution will be exclusively a naval institution. On the other hand, it may well be that after the war, it will become a place to which young men who wish to train for the merchant service can go and receive the training necessary to fit them for that important line of seafaring work. It may be, too, that it will be found possible to have in attendance at this college young Canadians who do not contemplate a career in either the navy or the merchant service, but who wish to take advantage of the training which this college will provide as a general preparation for their lives as citizens of Canada. These are all matters to which the naval staff even now is giving its closest attention. One thing is sure. We shall bend our utmost efforts to see that the foundations of the college are laid on sound and broad lines, so that in its conception, in its training, and in its results, it may be a strength and a pride to Canada.

Besides the decision to build, equip and staff a naval college in this country for our Canadian youth, there is another implication which is carried in the decision to enlarge greatly the Canadian navy. It is this. We have built already in Canada some of the smaller ships required by the Canadian navy, and we have built some ships of similar type for the British Admiralty. Just here I should like to pay tribute, in which I am sure my hon. friend the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) will be glad to join, to the work that has been done already by the shipbuilding yards in this country. On the whole, the programme of building ships for the Canadian navy is well ahead of schedule, and this fact reflects the greatest credit on the loyalty, the diligence and the skill of the shipbuilders of Canada, and on the manufacturers of other essential equipment for ships.

But, Mr. Speaker, we intend to go further. It is our hope that in the Canadian yards we shall be able to build destroyers and perhaps cruisers as well. The building of these craft requires a high degree of skill; they have never before been built in this country. In the early stages of this development we shall require the assistance of skilled men from Admiralty dockyards or from private yards in Britain, and we have asked for that assistance.

With the establishment of a Canadian naval college, and the building in Canada of the larger types of ships of war, we shall come to the day, and I think that it will be a proud day for this country, when our Canadian naval effort will be directed by Canadian men, trained in Canada and operating in ships built in this country.

As I survey, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian naval effort, or indeed, the whole Canadian war effort, I see no reason to blush. I find no cause for shame. It is true that we were unprepared for war, but yet our very unreadiness may in the end prove to be one of our greatest assets. The nation that is unprepared does not seek a fight. Before the high court of history we shall take our stand with Britain, and with our other associates in the British commonwealth of nations, in the certain hope that our ground is impregnable, in the sure knowledge that we did not desire war. Before the tribunal of the present, before our own people to whom we are responsible, we say that we went to the very edge and brink of honour in our effort to preserve peace. It was only when discussion, negotiation, and even concession had failed, and when there was left no other alternative, it was only then that we took up arms. We took them up with great reluctance. We shall bear them with even greater firmness. We shall not lay them down until honour walks the earth again, until we and the rest of the democratic world are safe from the menace of nazi attack and the threat of nazi thraldom.

The struggle, as the Prime Minister said in his eloquent speech a week ago, will be longer, harder and more terrible than any of us can believe at this time. Such a struggle will demand sacrifices; it will require, as Mr. Churchill said, its full meed of sweat and toil, blood and tears. But if any of us in this country should falter along the hard road, we shall look to Britain for resolution and inspiration, and we shall see there a whole people at war for the first time in modern history. We shall see the young, the middle aged and the very old, the strong and the weak, the rich and the poor, all ages, all sexes, all classes, equally in danger of enemy attack, and all facing that danger with equal courage and equal coolness, with a humour almost a gaiety, that has challenged and won the admiration of the world and the support of free men in every land. The people of Britain, soldiers and civilians, men, women and children, are adding now the newest and the brightest page to the proud story of the British peoples.

Some two months ago I listened to a radio commentator from London who said that one of the amazing sights in that great city, was the number of flags that could be seen flying there. Most touching of all, I thought, was his statement that in instance after instance these flags could be seen floating over ruined buildings, many of them the humble dwellings of the poor. These people, forced to see their homes destroyed, their personal possessions gone, sometimes members of their families maimed or killed, digged themselves out of the wreckage and at once they planted above it the flag of Britain. That act seems to me symbolic. They plant that great flag there, not only to defy Hitler, not only to encourage the weak and inspire the faltering among themselves, but also as an emblem of hope and of prophecy. And the hope and the prophecy are this: that just as the flag of Britain rises over the physical ruins of some of its homes, so out of the wreck and welter of this war there will arise a greater Britain, a Britain strengthened and stiffened by its heroic struggle, a Britain which will lead the world into better and fairer ways of life, not for one class or group, but for all people.

So long as that spirit remains we need have no doubt as to the ultimate outcome of this war. The whole of Britain is under attack now, but in her own time she and her dominions will take the offensive. They are on the offensive even now; for our gallant airmen are carrying the war to the heart of enemy countries and to the territories which Germany has conquered, and our incomparable fleet still commands the seas. Her soldiers at Dunkirk have proven their quality. We shall see Britain triumphant, and long after the name of Hitler will have become nothing but an unpleasant memory, the same flag which now waves over disordered heaps of crumbled brick and stone and mortar will be flying freely and proudly in the airs of heaven, sheltering liberty and justice and freedom and truth in its benevolent shade. That is the hope and the promise of the British flag flying over the ruins of British homes.

[Mr. A. L. Macdonald.]

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have the honour of being the first to congratulate the former premier of Nova Scotia, the Minister of National Defence for Naval Affairs (Mr. Macdonald) upon the eloquent speech in which he presented his report to the house. Having myself a task to perform, I am sorry that in the brief time at my disposal I shall not be able to refer to what he has said. There come times when hon. members rise in their places feeling unable to deal effectively with the subjects upon which they have chosen to speak. They may be depressed by the utter futility of any hope that their arguments, no matter to what extent they may be backed up by facts and figures, will have any weight. They may be depressed because they know that anything they may say will not prevent what they believe to be a menace to the country.

I refer to the recent agreement between Canada and the United States in connection with certain developments on the St. Lawrence-Great Lakes system, which was tabled on November 12. I want to refer particularly to one item in that agreement, namely, that which refers to the diversion of the waters of two tributaries of the Albany river from a wholly Canadian watershed to the international watershed of the St. Lawrence-Great Lakes system. We are told that the diversion is to be made for war purposes. I personally do not agree with its necessity for war purposes.

In rising to speak against what I am convinced is a tremendous menace to this country I hasten to say first of all that having been partly educated in the United States, and having had for many years business connections with great firms in that country in the same line of business in which I was engaged, I have learned to respect and honour our cousins in the country to the south, and I hope I shall never be in any other frame of mind towards them. We indeed have the best of neighbours of any country in the world. But I cannot consent to the theory that this diversion is a necessity for war purposes. This diversion from northern Ontario of rivers that are wholly within a Canadian watershed and are now under the sole, single and sovereign jurisdiction of Canada, and their transference by diversion to international control with another country, leaving us without full control over our own waters in northern Ontario, is something to which I cannot possibly subscribe.

What is proposed under this agreement so far as the diversion of waters from northern Ontario is concerned? This is a purely Canadian watershed where the rivers now flow on a grand plateau north of the divide between the Hudson bay basin and the international watershed. They have flowed and I hope will continue to flow as God ordained them to flow into the Hudson bay.

The proposal is to divert the Ogoki river and to take from it a flow of 4,000 cubic feet per second. Next it is proposed to divert the Kenogami river, which, together with the Ogoki is a branch of the Albany, and to take from the Kenogami a flow of 1,000 cubic feet per second, pouring it finally into lake Superior, and thus to divert from waters flowing into the Hudson bay 13,000,000,000 cubic feet of water per month at a time of year when, as I shall later show, the water is most necessary, according to one of the greatest navigators this country has ever had, to assist in the opening of navigation in Hudson bay.

What is the proposal with respect to the Ogoki diversion? It is to erect a 35-foot dam at Waboose falls, just east of where the 88th meridian intersects the river, and to raise the water behind that dam to a height of 1,065 feet above sea level. The result of that will be to back up the Ogoki river forty miles west to the west end of Calm lake, submerging an area of approximately 1,000 square miles.

What is the relationship between these waters and the heights above sea level? The elevation rises from Lake Nipigon, which is 852 feet above the sea level, via the little Jackfish river, which starts in South Summit lake, which is 1,062 feet above sea level and just south of the height of land. Immediately over the height of land the country is flat. As far as the eye can reach there is nothing but a flat expanse of territory, except for Waboose mountain, which is some ten miles to the northeast. The first lake over the height of land is the Mojikit, 1,061 feet above sea level. A 35-foot dam at Waboose will submerge that whole territory between the height of land and the Ogoki river some twenty miles north in a direct line, and to some extent north of the Ogoki river, because I found bench marks some distance north.

As to the land southeast of Calm lake, my Indian guides informed me that they were told it would require large dams to prevent the water from flooding over that country. So that there would be a lake there of not less than 800 to 1,000 square miles in area.

We are told that this diversion will cost about $5,000,000. I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that it will cost several times $5,000,000, perhaps $10,000,000 to $15,000,000 at the least.

On the Kenogami river the works are already completed. There is a dam 14 miles north of Long lake the source of the Kenogami, and behind that dam are controlled the waters of Long lake, the Kenogamissis river, and the Burrows river, which have a flow of about 1,000 cubic feet per second. That dam and the control dam south of the international height of land, and the canal through the height of land, were built in open and flagrant defiance of the international treaty of 1909. Had the Canadian government done its duty when these works were begun, they would not have found themselves recently in the mess they were in when they agreed to legalize something that should never have been done in the first place and that took place in open violation of an international agreement.

What is Canada supposed to receive for this vast expenditure and for the loss to northern Ontario of waters which in my judgment will be vital in the future to the settlement and power needs of that country? We are told that we shall receive at Niagara an additional 5,000 cubic feet per second, which conforms to the 4,000 cubic feet per second from the Ogoki and 1,000 cubic feet per second from the Kenogami. From that we are to receive a comparatively small volume of horse-power, from 70,000 to 80,000, supposedly for the purpose of producing war munitions. We are told that on the Nipigon we shall be able to develop perhaps another 100,000 horse-power. I have been up and down the Nipigon river and I know it thoroughly. There are running freely in that river to-day four splendid rapids—Virgin, Flat Rock, Rabbit and White Chute—from which 100,000 horse-power can be developed, so that any development of Ogoki water on the Nipigon river is far remote in the future.

We are told that we shall be able to develop on the St. Lawrence river, from this same 5,000 cubic feet per second of water when it reaches the St. Lawrence, perhaps an additional 70,000 horse-power, but it will be some considerable time before the St. Lawrence waterway is developed, and when it is developed there will be many millions of horse-power available. So that it will be a long time before that supposedly extra 70,000 horse-power will be used.

We are told further that at Sault Ste. Marie we shall be able to develop another 8,000 horse-power. I know the Sault very well, and there is at present a vast volume of undeveloped power there, so that it will be a long time before that additional power is required. Finally, we are told that three inches will be added to the levels of the great lakes. I am of the opinion that instead of the levels of the great lakes being heightened, they will be lowered, as I shall show a little later on.

To place the matter on a proper basis I shall start at fundamentals and trace the origin of what I call this tragedy, this attack on the resources of northern Ontario and of Canada. The origin has nothing to do with the development of power at Niagara Falls; not a bit of it. It can be traced back to 1921 or 1922, when a celebrated reconnaissance engineer enjoyed a holiday, at his own expense and in his own time, south of the height of land and also north and west on each side. This gentleman, Mr. Ralph Keemle, merely as a study, chose to present the results of his discoveries in that country, and offered two pronouncements for examination by engineers and others interested. They were, first, that a canal could be built from lake Superior via lake Nipigon to Little Jackfish, up and over the height of land, up the Ogoki river, across the land between the Ogoki and the Albany, through lake St. Joseph to Lac Suel, down the English river to the Winnipeg river, thence to lake Winnipeg and the Saskatchewan into western Canada. The second was that the development there could be used to replenish the great lakes for the lowering of their levels as the result of loss through the Chicago drainage canal. These two pronouncements were the origin of the tragedy which is now to be inflicted on this country.

Mr. Keemle's deductions were brought to the attention of the late Sir Adam Beck, who looked into the matter as far as power development was concerned and merely filed the information which had been presented to him. Little notice was taken of these discoveries until in 1924 the engineering board of review at Chicago was called together to delve into the causes of the lowering of the water levels of the great lakes and to offer suggestions for their replenishment. The nineteenth suggestion which was presented to this board is this:

> The possible diversion of a large quantity of water into the great lakes from streams now entering the Hudson bay, was brought to the attention of the committee on lake levels, as a remedy for low lake levels, and as means of compensation for the diversion of water from the lakes through the Chicago sanitary canal. This water, now flowing north, was to be turned south into the great lakes by way of lake Nipigon. It was suggested that a quantity of water equal to that now diverted at Chicago could be taken through a canal across the northern divide, from waters of the Albany and Ogoki rivers, which now flow into Hudson bay.

Is it not strange that the amount which is now to be taken from northern Ontario north of the great divide and from the great northern Ontario plateau is the exact amount which a recent bill before the United States congress calls for, namely 5,000 feet per second? I am not saying that there is any relation at the present day between the one and the other, but the real facts behind the proposal might well show that to be the case.

What did the board say in giving its report? Here is the statement with reference to these diversions:

> Since there may be other opportunities for industrial development on north-flowing rivers, the Canadians naturally would be slow to make southward diversions into the great lakes drainage, pending future development of the country.

It is a sad state of affairs at which we have arrived, Mr. Speaker, when we are willing to jeopardize the future requirements of that country by diverting water which has 100,000 potential horse-power.

The premier of Ontario has been very insistent during the last few years in pressing this government to grant his request and permit the diversion of those rivers. If this government has consented to such an outrage on northern Ontario upon the statement of the premier of Ontario as to what that country is like and what the water levels of the great lakes are, it is a sad state of affairs. Here is what he is quoted as having said at London, according to a report in the Star of Windsor, Ontario, on February 2, 1938, in reply to a speech which I had made against these diversions:

> Defending his proposed Ogoki river diversion plan before the Engineering Institute of Canada here last night, Hon. Mitchell F. Hepburn, premier of Ontario, replied to charges of John R. MacNicol, M.P. for Davenport, that back of the plan is a tie-up with the Chicago drainage canal's lobby at Washington.
> "Lake Michigan empties into lake Superior," Mr. Hepburn said. "Certainly water we dumped into lake Superior wouldn't run uphill into lake Michigan."

If this whole tragedy is based on the assumption that the level of lake Michigan is nineteen feet higher than lake Superior while in reality it is that much lower, then the world has been turned upside down since I traversed those lakes, as I have done many times.

Mr. HOWE: It looks that way on the map.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have given what Canada is supposed to obtain, at some time in the distant future, from these diversions, apart from the comparatively small block of power which can be obtained at Niagara Falls? Let me point out what the menace to Canada will be as a consequence of these diversions.

First there is, as I said a moment ago, the loss of 100,000 horse-power, which could be developed and for the benefit of future generations, on the rivers affected.

Then, we shall submerge approximately a thousand square miles of potential pulpwood and mineral land. The Precambrian shield touches that area. Not far southeast are the fine mines at Geraldton, and further east there are mines at Kirkland Lake, Timmins, and elsewhere. The whole country may be a mineral country.

Further, the Indians will be deprived of a large part of their hunting grounds. I am happy to say that when I went up there a few years ago quite a number of Indians, having learned from my outfitter that I was coming into that district, met me at the point at which I was going to enter the river to proceed north. Some of them had come all the way from Fort Hope on the Albany river to cheer me, so they said, in the effort to save their hunting country for them. This diversion will be a very serious business so far as the Indians are concerned. And every one of the outfitters of that country is opposed to it. These outfitters are the means of bringing to Canada every year a large sum in United States money. They take tourists up into that country, which is one of the finest tourist areas in the world, and wholly unexploited except for the tourists who visit it.

These diversions will result in the submergence of the famous Sentinel rock falls. Sentinel rock is a huge rock which resembles the head of a Roman sentinel. Standing in a prominent position alongside the falls, it presents a striking picture. I should not like to think it would have to disappear as a result of this project.

In my judgment these diversions are a sacrilegious interference with the laws of nature. What did Solomon, the wisest man who ever lived, say in chapter 1 of Ecclesiastes, verses 6 and 7? I quote:

> The wind goeth toward the south, and turneth about unto the north; it whirleth about continually, and the wind returneth again according to his circuits.
> All the rivers run into the sea; yet the sea is not full; unto the place from whence the rivers come, thither they return again.

In agreeing to this diversion we are interfering with the laws of nature, and no engineer can tell what the effect will be on the rainfall or the wind or the clouds with regard to the replenishing of the north country once this vast volume of water is diverted from its God-directed course.

Then there is the loss of navigation on the Albany river itself. Recently I conversed with a former bishop of that country who had read that I had been opposing these diversions and he said, "I am praying that you will succeed in your opposition, because I have been up and down that river many times and in the summer, over the pebbly shingles in the lower reaches of the river, navigation is slight enough, so that with a diversion of 5,000 cubic second feet at that time there is bound to ensue a very serious state of affairs so far as navigation is concerned." I am wondering what the Hudson's Bay company will have to say about it, because they have used the river for navigation purposes for two hundred years or more and they may have a claim for damages against this country if their traffic up and down the river is interfered with.

There is also the loss of national control. In my judgment, once the agreement is concluded and has been accepted by the congress of the United States, it cannot be altered without the consent of congress. I am not unmindful of what happened in the last war when, for so-called war purposes, this country permitted the erection, across the south branch of the St. Lawrence river opposite Massena, of a barrage which has prohibited navigation since 1918. That barrage was to have been removed within five years of its erection, or at all events with the cessation of war, but it is still there, causing a diversion of 25,000 second feet out of the St. Lawrence, 12,500 cubic feet of which belongs to Canada and for which we do not receive a cent. Yet we cannot stop it. That was for war purposes in 1918, and the same thing will happen again. Once these diverted waters start flowing out of lake Michigan at Chicago or over Niagara falls they will continue indefinitely and we may not be able to stop the flow south at any time in the future.

What does the United States get out of the agreement? I am not opposed to their getting something out of it, because I am a friend of the United States; but I cannot read into the agreement, tabled on November 12, what the eminent writer of the New York Times read into it. Let me quote from a New York Times editorial of October 16—and they have the best writers in the United States:

> Ontario has long wanted more power from Niagara. Now that Canada is at war and straining every industrial sinew, the need of that additional power is acute. Washington sees the point and consents to the diversion of 5,000 cubic feet of water a second from each side, which is equivalent to about 155,000 horse-power—

That is to say, 77,500 horse-power each. Now our agreement does not say that. The agreement tabled here does not say "each side." If that be the case, then the new diversion at Niagara is to be 10,000 cubic feet per second, and that bears out what I said—that the water levels on the great lakes will go down instead of rising as a result of the agreement. To continue:

—all in accordance with the recommendations made by the special international Niagara board in its report of 1926. Niagara is of negligible importance to the administration—a card to be played. It is the St. Lawrence project that is really to be pushed—a project which involves the digging of a channel for ocean-going steamers and the erection of dams and plants to generate power. The only satisfaction to be derived from this trade lies in the immediacy with which both Ontario and western New York can meet the need of extra hydro-electric power at low cost. Both on the Canadian and the American side of the falls power plants were long ago expanded to use far more than the amount of water which is now to be diverted, so that it is unnecessary to wait months and years before the extra power can be put to work.

Is the New York Times right, or is the agreement tabled in this house on November 12 right?

I wish to refer briefly to a suggested effect on Hudson bay. I do not know personally that there will be any effect on Hudson bay. I am not an engineer qualified to pass on that question, but I went to the bay last summer and talked to old residents there in the hope of ascertaining what I could about navigation on Hudson bay, and I am convinced that if the war continues and the submarine menace gets greater, as it may, it will be necessary for the empire to put forth every effort to minimize that menace by restricting the shipping lanes in which submarines could operate. There is a fairly well protected channel for 750 miles from Churchill to the ocean before submarines could be of any effect and trade might go over the great circle to Great Britain; therefore anything that interferes in any way with the length of navigation period on Hudson bay must be resisted. This country should be the last to tolerate anything of the sort; for we have in Hudson bay one of the greatest treasures of the dominion. It extends south 900 miles into our country, and the port at Churchill is an excellent one.

Shortly before Captain Bernier died I had the pleasure of meeting him. He was a devout Christian. He wrote me a letter which I will read. Captain Bernier was the most eminent marine captain in Canada. He had, I believe, more knowledge of northern waters than any other captain, having been yearly the first to enter those waters. He was an old man and he told me he was going east and did not expect ever to come back, and he did not. I said to him one day, "I want to ask you a question because of your vast experience of navigation on Hudson bay. What would be the effect on Hudson bay if any of the fresh water now flowing into it was diverted?" He wrote me the following letter, which in my opinion should be in the archives in view of what it contains. It is dated at Ottawa, March 16, 1934:

In reference to the questions you asked me on Wednesday morning, relative to the navigation on Hudson bay, I am pleased to set out the information I endeavoured to convey to you personally:

There are twenty-four large rivers flowing into Hudson bay from the territory surrounding it and in between the mouths of these said rivers there are many other rivers which also discharge a large volume of water into the bay. My opinion, based on experience in navigating Hudson bay and from observations made, is that the total volume of all the water entering into Hudson bay from the land substantially raises the level of the bay above the level of the ocean, in the flood season of the rivers, to approximately one foot.

I am not able to say whether or not that is so, but I take Captain Bernier's statement for it. He was in earnest when he made it.

My opinion is that at the time of the flood season of the rivers the outlet of the bay itself is more or less still choked with ice between Bell peninsula, Southampton island and cape Digges on the Ungava mainland. The islands of Coats, Mansel and Nottingham act as anchors of the main sheets of ice. On looking at the map it will be seen that the outlet of Hudson bay is considerably narrowed by the position of the islands at its outlet, jamming ice, which jamming undoubtedly retards the outward flow of the bay's surplus water. The fresh water rises to the top when it enters the Hudson bay and this together with the ice jamming is one other reason why the Hudson bay level in the flood season is above that of the ocean. I am convinced that this very fact—that the level is higher—has a considerable effect on forcing the ice out of Hudson bay into Hudson strait and then to the ocean, thus opening navigation.

In reply to your question as to whether a material reduction in the flow of fresh water into the Hudson bay from the rivers would have any effect on navigation, I am of the opinion that if the flow from the rivers to the bay is materially reduced and all other conditions exactly the same, the reduction in the fresh water entering the bay would shorten the period of navigation at the commencement of the season. Of course, you will realize that there are so many contingencies and variations that enter into an opinion, that I cannot give definite detail. I believe that the route from Churchill to Great Britain will, as time goes on, become more and more important and that if the ships using the northern passage are built along lines suitable to ice conditions and with improved methods of obtaining the data and the radioing of same to the masters of ships, the Hudson bay route will increase in popularity.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if there is even a little fact in that statement; if the opening of navigation in Hudson bay would be delayed one day through the diversion of 13 billion cubic feet of fresh water per month when the ice is breaking up in Hudson bay, in my judgment it would be a very serious thing for this country, and particularly serious if the time comes, as I said, when it may be advisable for our ships to go north over the great circle to Great Britain.

I said at the beginning that I was opposed to these diversions being made on the ground that they are to provide power for war purposes, because I do not believe that it is required for that purpose. The hydro-electric power commission should have a fairly substantial surplus—they would not operate without some surplus—and that surplus can be used until other means are provided. Last year the Beauharnois company appeared before this house and asked a further diversion of 30,000 cubic feet per second from the St. Lawrence, and we granted it. That will result, if it has not done so already, in the production of an additional 225,000 horsepower. They can come again; the river between lake St. Francis and lake St. Louis is rendered unfit for navigation anyway, so that if they require more power for war purposes let them come again and ask for another 30,000 feet, which will produce another 225,000 horsepower. Seventy or eighty thousand horsepower at Niagara Falls will not last very long. If we have to get power in large blocks we can get it from Beauharnois, and we can get it there at once.

Further we can produce a great deal more power at Niagara Falls. At Niagara Falls the United States gets 20,000 of the 56,000 feet diverted under the 1909 treaty. We are supposed to get 36,000 feet; as a matter of fact we use only 22,400 feet. The other 13,600, the remainder of our takings at Niagara Falls, generates power that goes to the United States, so that all we get now in Canada at Niagara is the power produced from 22,400 cubic feet per second. And 16,000 feet of this goes to Queenston, from which we develop, or could develop, approximately 500,000 horse-power. As an engineer my hon. friend knows that if the forebay adjacent to the Queenston power house were enlarged to the extent that has been proposed by engineers, at a cost of $10,000,000 to $15,000,000, another 160,000 horsepower can be produced there with the same 16,000 cubic feet of water. All we have to do is to modernize our development at Niagara Falls. What have we been doing during the last few years? There are several plants there using water, but some get much more power per cubic foot than others. For instance I am told that the 5,000 cubic feet per second to be diverted from northern Ontario is to be developed right near Niagara Falls, and will produce 70,000 to 80,000 horse-power. If this water were taken on to Queenston it would produce approximately twice as much power. The Niagara Falls developments should be modernized. The $10,000,000 to $15,000,000 more or less required to divert northern Ontario's water resources from that great plateau north of the height of land could be spent to much better advantage in modernizing the Niagara Falls plants and developing power down there. Also the other 6,400 cubic feet that now runs through the old plants on our side of the line at Niagara Falls could produce a lot more if they were modernized.

Then we have not far from Ottawa two or more million horse-power running to waste, at Campbell's Bay and Carillon and other sites, in addition to what can be developed on the Madawaska. Any amount of power is now available without robbing water that should go and that God directed to go into Hudson bay when He made this world. I am unalterably opposed to diverting any water that God designed, perhaps, as Captain Bernier so well said, for assisting the opening of navigation in Hudson bay. If the pronouncements of the late Captain Bernier have anything in them—indeed if they have not I would make the same statement, because no one can tell what the effect of the diversion will be on Hudson bay—the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan and Alberta have a vital interest in the navigation of Hudson bay, and if I were living in any one of those provinces or represented one of them in this house I would request that the legislature meet to discuss the effect of these diversions on Hudson bay before this affliction is consented to. This government should have appointed an engineering board of review on which the best engineers in America would be invited to sit with engineers from the three prairie provinces, because their interest in that great port on Hudson bay is vital; it will be in the future a great port. I am satisfied that had engineers for those provinces been consulted about this diversion they would have refused to consent. The legislatures of the provinces affected should meet. A great tragedy is to be inflicted on this country on the basis of a statement by the premier of Ontario, if he is correctly quoted, that the level of lake Michigan is higher than lake Superior and that the water when diverted will not flow into lake Michigan. In that statement the premier of Ontario is wholly in error. I say that nothing can stop that water flowing out at Chicago as well as at Niagara Falls. Lake Huron and lake Michigan are one single lake, having the same level, 581 feet above the sea. It has the two outlets.

Let me conclude by saying that, in spite of what anyone may say, in my judgment the necessities of Chicago, as well as other necessities, are behind these diversions; and when during the coming session of congress they again present bill No. 8327 asking for a diversion of 5,000 c.f.s. from lake Michigan, that request may be granted. Already they are diverting 1,500 c.f.s. for dilution and 2,000 c.f.s. for domestic supply, so that if they obtain for dilution 5,000 c.f.s. it will give them a total of 7,000 c.f.s. Then if the agreement also calls for the diversion of 5,000 c.f.s. on the United States side at Niagara Falls—

Mr. HOWE: I am sure my hon. friend would not like to have the impression go out that this request for an additional 5,000 c.f.s. is definitely going through. What is definite at the moment is that 5,000 c.f.s. are being used on the Canadian side and nothing on the United States side.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister should know; I do not know, but certainly that was the statement made in the New York Times by perhaps one of the best informed writers in the United States, and he would not lightly make an error. The minister knows a great deal more than the average man in this house about engineering, and I would ask him if it would not have been much saner to follow the recommendations of the 1926 board. Apparently all that was necessary, because they wanted it on their side as well, was to say to the United States, "You take 5,000 c.f.s. and we will take 5,000 c.f.s., for the duration of the war." Then both countries would have obtained power immediately and we would not be parties to a tragedy affecting the future of northern Ontario and the navigation of Hudson bay.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): In rising to take part in this debate, Mr. Speaker, I should like first to join with the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. MacNicol) in congratulating the Minister of National Defence for Naval Affairs (Mr. Macdonald) on the ease and eloquence with which he addressed this house in his first speech here. I imagine that possibly, like myself, he is somewhat handicapped in speaking to the house by not being permitted to address it in his mother tongue.

The speech from the throne which was read at the opening of parliament contained these words:

> You have been summoned at this time that opportunity may be afforded for the fullest consideration and discussion of Canada's war effort and of national problems which war has served to intensify or create.

That states very clearly the reasons for calling us here, I think. I for one believe it is highly desirable that at this time we should have a full and free discussion of Canada's war effort and related problems. Though now we have been at war for more than fourteen months there has been very little opportunity for the private member, at least the private member on this side of the house, to obtain a clear picture of what the country has done and is doing in this great emergency. Perhaps it is difficult to give a clear picture without making public information which might be helpful to the enemy. We should keep in mind, however, that too little information may be as harmful to our cause as too much.

Already, since the opening of this session, we have heard a great deal about the military preparations which the country is making to carry the war to a victorious conclusion. If we are going to wage war at all I think we should do so with all the power at our command, if for no other reason than to bring the terrible ordeal to a successful ending as quickly as possible. We should not, however, lose sight of the fact that preparation for war is not a military problem only. It is also an economic problem, a political problem and a psychological problem. If, then, we think only in terms of military preparation, whatever may be the military result we will lose the war. For us I hope that winning the war is not to be an end, but rather the means to an end. If that is the case, as I sincerely hope it is, we must keep that end continually in mind. I think that is what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) must have had in mind when he said, as reported at page 61 of Hansard:

> What is necessary then to win the present conflict: It is to put on the whole armour of God, not the outward material trappings only, the helmet, the sword and the shield, necessary as they may be for purposes of defence and attack.

There is much more in the Prime Minister's peroration to the same effect, but I think I have quoted enough to show that he holds that in this struggle the use of military instruments is not enough to win the war. We must also make use of other, if more intangible, things, such as fair dealing, honour, truth, justice, equity, cooperation, the willingness to sacrifice, and many similar virtues which people of good-will all through the ages have tried to get accepted as the foundations for the society of their day.

If that is what the Prime Minister meant, and I believe it is, then I am in absolute agreement with him; and because I believe as I do I am greatly disturbed about the lack of understanding and of the practice of the truths mentioned by the Prime Minister on the part of most of the people who have to do with the direction of our war industries. Since the war started we have heard a great deal of that much misunderstood word, democracy. In modern warfare the morale and temper of the workers in industry in my opinion is of equal importance to the morale of the soldiers in the army. Relations in industry between employers and workers are not good in Canada to-day, and are daily becoming worse. For this the government must accept responsibility. I think this is more particularly true of our war industries.

Let me outline briefly the position of the worker as he sees it himself. He feels that he is being exploited, that the contractors are making an undue profit out of his labour and out of the distress of the country. Moreover, he feels that he has been ignored by the government. He feels that the government is working hand in hand with the employers to prevent his having a say as to the terms upon which he will sell his labour. He is losing faith in the sincerity of those who are governing this country, not only those in the government itself but the people who have great influence upon the government. Steps should be taken at once to remedy this condition if we are not to have unrest very shortly which will reach greater proportions than the unrest at the end of the last war.

I should like to refer for a moment to my own city of Vancouver. Perhaps this matter is a small one, but it is just one of a number of small things which are likely to increase and make for a bad situation. The Boeing aeroplane company have a plant in Vancouver which has had, and I believe still has, government contracts for the manufacture of aeroplanes and aeroplane parts. According to a recent press statement the government has under consideration the construction of another new aeroplane plant near the city and yet, a few weeks ago about 150 men were laid off at the Boeing plant; the reason given for the lay-off being lack of material. But the men who were laid off are not satisfied that that was the real reason. As a basis for their doubt in the matter they point out that shortly before they were laid off a considerable number of new men had been engaged. They point out that although there has been considerable talk of a scarcity of skilled labour, the employees laid off by the Boeing plant were skilled men who had been in the employ of the company for a long time, some of them for many years.

The men are also suspicious because among those laid off are some of the officers of their union. They inform me that no effort has been made by the company to observe the regulations issued by the government last January as to labour conditions applicable to contracts awarded in western Canada for aircraft manufacture and overhaul. These regulations stipulate that the ratio of apprentices between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one years to trade journeymen shall be five journeymen to one apprentice. These regulations were applicable to a number of trades, but I am informed that, after the lay-off at the Boeing plant, in the machine shop there were one apprentice and one journeyman left on the night shift, two journeymen and one apprentice on the afternoon shift and on the evening shift, three journeymen and one apprentice. In the metal shop, where there was supposed to be not more than one apprentice to five journeymen, there were left three apprentices and three journeymen.

I am told that an analysis of the capacities of the men laid off showed that in most instances, if not in all, it was production workers, journeymen and specialists, whose labour was dispensed with. I am not arguing that changes in the regulations should not be made if conditions warrant, but it seems to me that when such changes are made they should be made according to the rule laid down by the order in council P.C. 2685, passed last June, which provides that such changes shall be made only after consultation with representatives of the employers and of the employees. I submit that employers should be given to understand that war contracts are not the result of their personal initiative and enterprise. They should be told that the people of Canada pay for these contracts; that these contracts are the result of the determination of the people of this country to destroy Hitlerism, but that in doing so we are not going to allow embryo Hitlers to develop among us.

Further with regard to the growing discontent among the working people I should like to remind the house that at the last session I directed attention to the lack of labour representation on the various war boards. At this time I should like to advise the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) again that if he wants the people of this country to continue in the faith that this is a war to destroy Hitlerism and to save democracy he had better review without delay some of the appointments which have been made to these boards since the war began. I do not refer to the armed forces; I refer to the personnel of many of the war boards, particularly to the appointments made to the former munitions and supply board, most of whom have since been taken into the Department of Munitions and Supply. I want to say most emphatically that at this moment there are men in influential positions who should be retired quickly. I am not denying that they may know a great deal about business and industry, but they know nothing at all about democracy. Because they know nothing about democracy there is likely to be trouble in this country before very long. It may be better to have a little dislocation now than a great upheaval later on.

Last June the government issued an order in council, the one to which I referred a moment ago, which set out the principles and conditions which should govern the conduct of employers and workers during the war. In that order in council the government gave its approval to collective bargaining. Collective bargaining presupposes union recognition by the employer; indeed, collective bargaining is impossible without union recognition. I do not know whether this order in council has had any effect upon the attitude of employers toward collective bargaining, but from what I hear and from the evidence I have, I doubt it. I believe that most employers, with a few honourable exceptions, treat it with contempt.

I drew attention last session to a conciliation board which had been set up to investigate a dispute between local 240, Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers' Union at Kirkland Lake, and Teck-Hughes Gold Mines, Limited. As I remember the case now, there were three points in dispute—wage increases, union recognition, and the reinstatement of a number of employees, 47 in number, who had been discharged for alleged union activities. The members of the board were Mr. Justice Martin of Saskatchewan, Mr. J. L. Cohen, a lawyer of Toronto, and Mr. G. C. Bateman, who I understand is at the moment economic adviser to the Minister of Munitions and Supply. Mr. Justice Martin and Mr. Cohen, in a majority report, recommended that the discharged men be taken back before any new men were hired, and that lay-offs and rehiring in future be according to seniority. They also found in favour of union recognition, but found against an increase in wages for the time being. But Mr. Bateman, economic adviser to the Minister of Munitions and Supply, found against all the claims of the men, including union recognition. However, the men agreed to accept the award shortly after it was made. Forty-four days after the men had agreed to accept the award, just a month and a half afterwards, Teck-Hughes Gold Mines, Limited, in a letter signed by the president himself, advised the Department of Labour in these words:

> I beg to inform you that at a recent meeting of our board of directors it was decided that the recommendations made by the board of conciliation and investigation would not be accepted by this company.

Order in council P.C. 2685, which I have already mentioned, reads, in clause 7:

> That employees, through the officers of their trade union or through other representatives chosen by them, should be free to negotiate with employers or the representatives of employers' associations concerning rates of pay, hours of labour and other working conditions with a view to the conclusion of a collective agreement.

With an experience, Mr. Speaker, of over thirty years in the trade union movement, and at least that length of time studying the relations between employer and worker, I am convinced that there is no other way under heaven in which there can be peace and democracy in industry except by collective agreements between employers and employees.

I have quoted this clause from the order in council because many trade unions in their innocence thought this order in council was operative, that it had some legal sanction behind it, like the order in council, for instance, which declares areas around certain industrial plants "protected areas," or like the order in council which, without any notice or consultation, and in contravention of the government's own declared policy, abrogated the Fair Wage and Hours of Labour Act of 1935 in certain works.

The workers are usually simple people. By that I mean they are not accustomed to the subtleties found in high places. Words mean to them just what the words seem to mean, and they accept them at their face value. The workers did not know that the order in council which the government passed in June last was merely window dressing and was accepted by the government as being just that. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) I imagine would call it "eye-wash," but many of the workers have another word for it, which, if I were to use it, would be considered unparliamentary and I should have to withdraw it. It is a compound word made up of the male of the bovine species and a certain kind of fertilizer.

All the nazi-minded people are not in Germany. Many of them can be found at the head of Canadian industries. I am afraid that a few can be found around the Department of Munitions and Supply.

We have, I understand, a bureau of public information. At least I get through the mail a weekly budget of information after most of it is a week old. For obvious reasons—because of their age, I presume—these budgets of information do not carry any date. I have in my hand at the moment one that came not so very long ago from the Canadian office, but which seems to have originated in the British ministry of information. Here is the heading, "Nazis Crush Belgian Trade Unionism." Then follows a short statement by Max Buset, a member of the Belgian Labour party and at one time a Labour member of the Belgian parliament. I shall quote only two or three sentences from this statement. He says:

> One fact emerges quite clearly from all we have heard, and that is the complete destruction of the trade union movement, such as we have known it up to May 10, when the nazi fury descended upon my unhappy country.

The first thing the nazis do when they get control anywhere is to destroy the protective institutions which the workers have built up through the years. Trade unions, labour parties, cooperative movements—all these go. But I want to ask you, Mr. Speaker, what is the difference between the philosophy of the man who crushes the Labour movement and the man who will not allow the Labour movement to come into existence, who will not allow a trade union to be born. What is the difference? No difference whatsoever. The mind of one is the mind of the other. Both minds are totalitarian in every respect; totalitarian in every sense of the word.

I had the opportunity of sitting in at some of the sessions of the recent convention of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada held at Vancouver, and I wish to say that if the temper of the delegates at that convention is any indication of the temper of the rank and file of the workers throughout the country, it is not good. At the convention strong exception was taken to the interference by the Department of Munitions and Supply, through its director of labour relations, in the matter of wages and labour conditions in war industries. It seems to me that if the facts are as stated—and the delegates to the convention were intelligent men and ought to know—then such a condition should cease at once.

I have before me a report which appeared in the Vancouver Province of the discussion on a resolution condemning the Department of Munitions and Supply for interfering with wages and labour conditions. The subheading is:

> Decisions of munitions board called prejudicial to labour.

Then it goes on:

> H. B. Chase, director of labour relations for the board of munitions and supply, came in for fiery criticism Thursday when the Trades and Labour Congress adopted a resolution calling for the restoration of the single authority of the dominion Department of Labour.

One of the delegates said that—

> . . . Chase had violated the entire spirit of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act.

He continued:

> On his visit to Vancouver last year, Chase had opposed the rate of 90 cents per hour suggested by the conciliation board which investigated the situation, and had declared he was "going to see no more shipbuilding contracts came to this coast."

That is, to the Pacific coast. It was also mentioned that no one knew upon whose recommendation Chase was put on the board. I pointed out last year that he was the only Labour representative on the munitions and supply board; yet, as I have said, at the Trades and Labour Congress, where 250 delegates were present, nobody knew by whom their representative on the board had been recommended.

The adjustment of labour-employer relations is a business in itself. It requires the understanding and experience of people who have been trained in that kind of work.

I suggest to the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) that he assert his authority in his own department. It is, perhaps, too much to expect that we shall have a proper understanding between workers and employers in our war industries so long as a man like Mr. Bateman, with his mediaeval ideas of the relations which should exist between employers and workers, is economic adviser to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe).

We should always bear in mind that we are waging a war for freedom; not freedom for the strong and powerful but freedom for the weak and defenceless. We are also fighting a war for democracy, and every victory for democracy at home will harden the will to resist nazism everywhere.

In the few minutes which are left to me, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word with regard to the defence of Canada regulations. I want to support the position taken by the acting leader of this group (Mr. Coldwell) when he spoke some days ago. I was glad also to note that last night the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen) dealt intelligently and comprehensively with the subject. Although it is now nearly fifteen months since these regulations were passed, by order in council, there has not been in this house any adequate discussion of them. I know that a special committee was appointed last year to review the regulations, but it met in camera, so that only the members of the committee have any knowledge of what was placed before it by those who are charged with the enforcement of the regulations, or of representations made by organizations or by individuals. I am not denying the necessity of special regulations in war time for dealing with espionage, sabotage or other activities intended to impede our war effort. But surely it is possible to protect the state and do it in such a way that reasonable men will be satisfied that injustice is not being done to innocent persons. That is a most important thing—that the public mind shall be satisfied that these regulations are so enforced that innocent people are not punished. During the closing days of the last session I brought to the attention of parliament the phase of the regulations to which I am now referring. I pointed out at that time that a number of men who held positions of responsibility in trade union organizations had been interned without the fact having been made public and without having been given any adequate opportunity of meeting the charges against them. Counsel for some of the internees have found the two review committees established under regulation 22 to be almost entirely valueless. I have under my hand a statement of two counsel describing the procedure followed by the review committee. According to the statement, the judge comprising the committee has before him the departmental file, the contents of which are not disclosed to the internee or to his counsel. The judge then proceeds to interrogate the internee, who has no knowledge of the nature of the evidence against him or of the facts on which the evidence is based. Surely this is a most undemocratic and improper review procedure. I am quite willing to agree that in the nature of the case it may not be possible to confront the accused with the witnesses, and that it may also be necessary to hold the review in private. But precisely because the ordinary court procedure of examining and cross-examining witnesses may not be feasible, it is doubly important to take every precaution against error and injustice.

I therefore suggest that two amendments to regulation 22 must immediately be made. First, the review committee should be enlarged, to consist of at least three persons, since in the nature of the case the committee must act as jury as well as judge. Second, the internee and his counsel should be provided with a full statement of the evidence and the facts alleged, in order that they may be in a position to meet them and to establish if possible the innocence of the accused.

I do not want what I am saying to be taken as unfriendly criticism of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). I am quite willing to admit that his position is not an easy one. On the one hand, he is charged with protecting the safety of the state against the actions of subversive individuals—persons who in many instances give their first loyalty to other governments; on the other hand, he is entrusted with safeguarding the life and liberty of every Canadian citizen until he is proved guilty of some crime or action inimical to the welfare of the country. In time of war this is not an easy task.

At the time of the invasion of the low countries and of the Scandinavian countries when the hue and cry went up against fifth columnists, I received many resolutions and telegrams asking that this and that authority be set up to deal with subversive activities. In all cases I refused to give my approval to any such thing. I stated publicly at that time that there was no man in Canada to-day, likely to fill the office of Minister of Justice, whom I would rather have in that office than the present minister. I had hoped that his record of opposition to such undemocratic legislation as section 98 would guarantee that the regulations themselves would be liberalized and would be applied with care, but this hope has not been fulfilled. The internment of trade union officials, the arrest and prosecution of people who say things in private conversation or under the influence of liquor, the use of the regulations for the purpose of arresting people who do peaceful picketing, and the general interference with freedom of speech and association constitute in my opinion as serious a threat to democracy in Canada as the country has ever seen. The least that the minister and the government can do is to provide a proper review procedure for those interned.

I was sorry that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) did not see fit to be more explicit as to the peace aims of the government. He said that if nazi Germany were not defeated, there would be little of freedom, truth and justice left in the world. I admit at once the truth of that statement, but it does not follow that if Germany is defeated, freedom, truth and justice will automatically flourish. We fought for freedom, truth and justice in the last war; millions of young men died in the belief that they were fighting for these things; but we did not get them. After the last war the struggle for wealth and power in this country went on with unabated fierceness, and we have had ever since wealth and poverty, want and abundance, mansion and hovel side by side, even in more glaring contradiction than before 1914-18.

Just as a closing word I would say that in our fight to destroy Hitlerism we must remember those basic things for which we are actually fighting. We must demonstrate, not by words, but by action, that, as J. B. Priestley said a few days ago, "democracy is a creative principle," and that we believe in it. If we are going to win this war we must begin now to break the power which enables a relatively few to appropriate to themselves the value of the labour of our people. Unless we do this we shall lose the war, whatever the result of military operations may be.

Mr. WALTER LITTLE (Timiskaming): I had not intended to speak at this time, but in view of the remarks made yesterday by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), I felt it my duty to set him right on some statements he made. In the first place, I wonder whether the hon. member is in favour of law and order. He states that in Kirkland Lake there are 250 men in uniform, carrying guns and so forth. That is not exactly true. There are 100. In the next place, he said that no one in that town knows what these men are there for. If he had taken proper steps to find out from people who are in a position to inform him, he would have been able to ascertain what these men are there for. They are volunteers who have freely offered to assist the local municipal police in keeping law and order in that town. Every one of them is a citizen of the town and is as good a Canadian citizen as anyone in this house. Some of them are working men; some are doctors; others are clerks, merchants and so on. I am very much displeased at the statements the hon. member has made with regard to these men. He says also that they look like the storm troopers of Hitler. I have never seen Hitler's storm troopers and do not know what they look like, but I may tell the hon. gentleman that if they look anything like these men they are a good looking bunch.

I consider it most unfair for a man to go into a district such as mine, or into any other part of the dominion, and to pick up statements here and there to suit himself, without taking the trouble to get authentic information from the proper source. As I said before, if he had gone to the reeve of the town or to the provincial police or to any of the men in the organization, he would have been correctly informed.

I should like to tell my hon. friend that at least 1,700 have enlisted from Kirkland Lake and district, and if that is not evidence of loyalty from a small town in that section of Canada I do not know what is. I have lived in the township of Teck for twenty-seven years; I know every man on that organization; I could name every one of them by their first names. I believe that the hon. gentleman should retract what he said and let the public know that he was misinformed. I do not know who gave him the information, but I can tell him the individual who gave it did not know what he was talking about.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, the present session of parliament was called principally in order that we might hear of the efforts of the government in connection with our war activities since parliament adjourned last August, and also hear representations regarding other activities as well. Personally I believe it to be the duty of all hon. members, whether on the opposition side or on the government side of the house, to bring to the attention of the government such matters as they consider it advisable and necessary to mention, because I believe that such matters, so long as they are not of a carping or personal nature, will be welcomed by the government, who during these strenuous days of trial must look to the elected representatives of the people for help and guidance.

It is my opinion that the people of Canada are well satisfied both with the efforts of the government and with the government itself. I challenge anyone to name a better qualified personnel than that forming Canada's present war cabinet. It may well be that the opposition do not entirely agree with that statement, but I am confident that the majority of the people of Canada will agree with it, just as I am confident that they have all faith in the integrity and ability of these men. What is most interesting, as well as extremely laudable, is the fact that from the beginning of this war up to the present time there has not been the slightest breath of scandal or suspicion of profiteering.

The other day, Mr. Speaker, you gave a ruling with regard to the reading of speeches, and for a moment I should like to refer to that matter. First I should like to compliment you upon the ruling you gave, but at the same time I should like to sympathize with you in your work of carrying it out. I quite realize the task ahead of you; but I am confident that if it is carried out in a manner fair to all, you will have the support of all hon. members both in spirit and in deed.

There are differences of opinion with regard to the reading of speeches. I know there are those who hold the view that it might be better if speeches were read, and again there are those who do not believe that speeches should be read at all. My view is that if the practice of some hon. members reading their speeches is permitted to continue we might very well have in this parliament what in bygone days was the practice in the parliament of Great Britain; that is, we might have writers and others making a living by writing speeches for members of parliament. In that event we would have to listen to the views of writers and others outside this parliament who are not responsible to the people, such as the members of the house are. There is that danger, and I compliment you, Mr. Speaker, upon your decision, which I have no doubt will be impartially enforced in regard to all hon. members.

So far, as we all realize, the present conflict has been of a highly specialized mechanical nature, with the ingenuity of man having been turned to the production and use of fearful and scientific weapons. I believe, however, that Canada has overlooked up to the present, and is still overlooking, a powerful weapon which could and should be used in this war. I refer to the power of the radio. For some considerable time Germany has been using the radio in such a manner that it has become known as Hitler's secret weapon. At present Germany broadcasts day and night in twenty different languages, sending out propaganda—a great deal of it, if not all, lying propaganda—designed not only to create confusion in the minds of those who hear it but also to foster in the minds of those people sentiments hostile to Great Britain and her allies and favourable to Germany herself.

I believe Canada should commence immediately the construction of a high-powered shortwave broadcasting station so that speeches might be sent from this country to any part of the world it might be thought desirable. A short time ago the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) made a splendid speech over the air to the people of France. That speech, however, which I feel sure was of inestimable value and benefit not only to the people of that distressed but heroic country but also to the people of Great Britain, did not go direct from Canada to France as it should have done; it had to be relayed by way of the British Broadcasting Corporation facilities.

I am going to ask the government to give serious consideration to the erection of such a high-powered shortwave radio station, to which should be attached a foreign languages bureau. German propaganda is going out over the air not only to European countries but particularly now to the people of the United States and South America. Yet Canada is sitting idly by, doing nothing whatever to counteract that dangerous propaganda which is intended by Hitler to react against Great Britain and even ourselves. To illustrate my point I should like to cite one recent instance, the speech of United States ambassador Joseph P. Kennedy, in which—presumably speaking off the record, although some of us doubt it very much—he criticized Great Britain and gave it as his opinion that democracy in that country was finished. Not only was that speech broadcast throughout the United States and Canada by means of the press; it was immediately picked up by Germany and broadcast over the air to the United States, Canada and other countries as well, solely for the purpose of creating confusion in the minds of the people and bringing about an unfavourable reaction towards Great Britain. In my opinion Canada could render a valuable service by explaining to the people of this entire continent both north and south just what we are really fighting for and pointing out what it would mean if it is made possible for Hitler to win.

If I had anything to do with such a shortwave station I would not have these broadcasts made by certain professors from some of our colleges, and there are others I could mention. I would choose practical men, men of understanding and ability. At the moment I have in mind two outstanding men in this country who could render great service in this manner; I have in mind the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the right hon. Minister of Justice. If the services of the Minister of Justice could be utilized to speak in French to the French people, and those of the Prime Minister to speak to the people of the United States and, in fact, the entire American continent, both of these estimable gentlemen would render a wonderful service to Great Britain and to France. Great Britain is endeavouring to the best of its ability to circumvent the propaganda emanating from Germany and directed toward the people of this continent.

There is a further point in connection with the establishment in Canada of a shortwave radio station. As everyone knows, we have lost for the present all our markets on the continent of Europe and no none can tell what the outcome of this war will be or when we shall again have markets on that continent. Therefore, we have been turning our eyes to South America. It is true we have been doing what we can in connection with sending trade commissioners, but had we a shortwave radio station we could aid these commissioners by broadcasts in the languages of the South American countries. A shortwave station would bring other countries closer to us and would enable us to be better understood by their peoples.

I should now like to deal with a matter having to do with enlisted men. I refer particularly to the dismissals or discharges which have taken place of men who enlisted in good faith after being medically examined and declared to be A 1. Many of these men left lucrative positions. They were examined by doctors; some, if not all, were X-rayed, and were accepted by the army as being physically fit. Later on, after a subsequent examination, some were discharged from the army and they now find themselves without jobs or money. I ask the government and the minister to take note of this serious condition. I am not speaking of the odd case; these discharges have been so numerous that to me they indicate that something is wrong with our system of medical examinations.

It was understood that there would be no haste in examining men who offered themselves for enlistment. During the last war there was a cry for men, but such has not been the situation in this war. I urge the government to grant to these men who have been discharged as physically unfit, leave of absence for a reasonable length of time, in order that they may become reestablished. At the same time I would call up on the carpet some of the doctors who have been making these examinations. In my humble view as a layman, if some of them were making the same blunders in private life as they seem to be doing with regard to the army men, they would not be practising medicine very long. The doctors do not suffer for the mistakes made, it is the enlisted or discharged men. I speak only for that part of British Columbia which I have the honour to represent. In my constituency at least a dozen men have been so discharged and they now find themselves without positions or funds with which to keep themselves or their families.

There is another matter I should like to bring to the attention of the government. It may seem a small matter, but as far as the mental attitude of our men is concerned these small matters sometimes mean a great deal. There would seem to be unequal treatment accorded to the members of the three different branches of the service in connection with transportation. On my way to Ottawa to attend this session of parliament I saw a platoon of forty army men on the train who had left Vancouver island to go overseas. I went through to the coach to inspect the conditions under which they were travelling and found that the men had been accommodated in a colonist car without any mattresses or bedding of any kind. One must be fair about it and say that the men were not kicking very strenuously.

The officers in charge, however, wanted to know why their men should be singled out for that kind of treatment when men belonging to the air force and the navy were accommodated in tourist cars and provided with beds. This may seem a small matter, but in my opinion we have not paid as much attention as we should in this war to psychology. All our efforts have been directed to material things. The enemy, however, is thinking of these small matters. It may be interesting to the house to know that prior to the fall of Dunkirk, Hitler gave orders that when men who belonged to Scottish regiments were captured they should be treated somewhat better than those who belonged to English regiments. He did not do this because he had any love for the men of the Scottish regiments—he had reason to feel otherwise—he did it for the simple purpose of sowing dissent among the British troops. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) is not in the chamber at present, but I would ask him to see that the men who come under his department receive the same treatment as the men of the air force and the navy with regard to transportation.

The matter of free transportation has been mentioned, and my views accord with those of many other hon. members. It has been said that it would not be possible to grant free transportation to all. There is, however, one service which I think should be singled out for special treatment. I refer to the boys and seamen who may have been at sea for months and months on end, not coming near to land for weeks, let alone being able to go home. I was glad to hear the Minister of National Defence for Naval Affairs (Mr. Macdonald) say that consideration will be given to this class of the service.

Whilst I have every confidence that the government is doing everything possible in connection with our war effort. I am of opinion that many of our cabinet ministers are overworked. Some of them have far too many responsibilities to give attention to all matters which should receive attention. Not that I have heard any one of them complain, but our war effort is getting so great that even members of parliament find it difficult to know all the boards which have been set up or even to find their telephone numbers. We are getting into a maze of boards. I would remind the government that the only voice the people of this country have is that of their elected representatives, and I ask the government to see that the elected representatives do not become the "forgotten men" of this war. While it may not be the fault of any single member of the government, all kinds of boards have been set up and it might very well happen that at the conclusion of this war some of these boards will be left in charge of important Canadian industries. I view with some alarm this tendency and deem it my duty to draw it to the attention of the government.

I have one other criticism to offer with regard to our war industries. The new factories which have been set up so far have been, generally speaking, centralized in two provinces. I feel that is a most unwise policy, both nationally and for the safety of the nation. Who is there in this house who would dare to say that this country will never be invaded? Nay, I will go further and say that there is a possible danger of invasion. If that is so, are we then going to continue the policy of grouping Ontario and Quebec with all the major industries engaged in our war activities? I say to the government that this is an unwise policy from the point of view of the safety of the nation, and it is just as unwise as a matter of national economics.

I heard one member of the house speak this session about the farmers in his community who, he stated, were closing up their farms because of lack of help. The help was going into war industries at more remunerative wages. That was most interesting to those of us who come from British Columbia because there, for a very different reason, we find farmers closing up their farms or, in other instances, hanging on to them precariously. The farmers in British Columbia are faced with an abundance of produce in their cellars and barns, and at the same time witness large quantities of farm products from across the line brought in by the use of Canadian funds and sold at lower prices. Our farmers see this produce coming in and passing by their doors while their own produce lies at home without a market. I mentioned this matter in my last speech, Mr. Speaker, and I repeat it now, and make the further assertion that if the industrial plants of this country are to continue to receive high protection, so should the farmers.

Before passing from that, I am going to make one further suggestion to the government, and that is with regard to overtime being worked in our war factories at the present time. So long as there is help available and an abundance of it, both skilled and especially unskilled, as there is in British Columbia, no overtime should be allowed. It is not good for the worker himself and it is certainly most unjust to the unemployed.

We have been wondering about the enthusiasm of the people in this war. We have witnessed the splendid spirit which has been exhibited by the British people, and while that spirit is indeed splendid, it is noteworthy that almost everyone in Great Britain who has been able to do any work has been employed in war efforts in one capacity or another. But in this country we have people both able and willing still wondering what it is all about. I would ask the government to take note of the surplus labour we have in some of the provinces and see if something cannot be done about the matter.

A short time ago we heard a wonderful speech by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner).

An hon. MEMBER: Not so wonderful.

Mr. REID: Not so wonderful for some, very true. In that speech he outlined the agreements entered into between Great Britain and Canada for the purchase of $105,741,000 worth of certain commodities produced on Canadian farms, and he outlined to us the order of preference in which Great Britain desired to purchase these commodities for her people. I believe that one of the reasons for the hesitancy with which Great Britain has been making purchases of our farm produce is the lack of sterling available for imports, and I pause here for a moment to remind the members of the house that when we are asking Great Britain to purchase Canadian goods we should at the same time ask ourselves how Great Britain can purchase from us if we refuse to purchase from her. You cannot sell all you have and refuse to purchase anything in return.

If it is correct that British sterling is not readily available for all purposes—and I have every reason to believe that that is so—I would ask the government to consider making a gift to the people of Great Britain of Canadian farm produce and Canadian fish. The Canadian people have always been ready and willing in days gone by to come to the aid of people who have been stricken either by earthquake or by flood. Why then should we not now come to the aid of the stricken people of Great Britain who are holding the fort so valiantly in what is known as the battle of Britain? We have plenty of Canadian farm produce for which we cannot at the moment find a market, and we have also in British Columbia, in our warehouses and cold storage plants, plenty of fish for which no market can be found. Great Britain, I believe, would be glad to take all our food supplies if she did not require sterling exchange for the purchase of war materials. Therefore I ask the government to consider seriously the making of a gift to Great Britain of our surplus farm products and other foodstuffs, including fish.

There are many other matters with which I can deal only briefly because my time is passing. I would draw the attention of the Minister of Agriculture and the government to an article of food which we could very well provide for Great Britain but which we are not providing in as plentiful a quantity as would easily be possible in Canada. Prior to the war Britain was the greatest importer of eggs of any country in the world, and I understand that the people of Great Britain would like to have eggs now. In 1920 Great Britain imported 261 million dozen of eggs, mostly from the countries of Europe which have been conquered and overrun by Germany. In 1938 we supplied Great Britain with only 1½ million dozen eggs, and even though we have supplied Great Britain this year with something over 10 million dozen eggs, that is but a fraction of the great quantity of eggs which she requires and could do with.

As evidence of the small supply of eggs available for export from Canada I point out to hon. members that when the Minister of Agriculture was in Great Britain negotiating these agreements, Great Britain did not consider it worth while to enter into any agreement for Canadian eggs because our supply was too small. Here, Mr. Speaker, is a splendid opportunity for Canada to become the empire's egg basket. We have large quantities of wheat and Great Britain is taking as much of our wheat as she possibly can. But some of our wheat could be turned into another and different valuable food product and supplied to Great Britain in the form of eggs, which she would take in great quantities if we only had them to give. I ask the government to consider this opportunity and to set up a committee of agricultural officials with the object in view of developing our egg production. At the same time I would ask the government to consider the excessively high price which the poultrymen of British Columbia are being called upon to pay for wheat, and we are wondering who is responsible for the high price in face of the fact that no great market can be found for the large quantities of wheat we have on hand in Canada at the present time.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): What price do they pay for wheat?

Mr. REID: It is around $1.40 per 100 pounds, which works out at about $1 a bushel.

Mr. COLDWELL: What grade?

Mr. REID: No. 5, I believe. That price cannot be wholly attributable to freight rates, of which I shall have more to say later in the session. When such a high price obtains, it is evident that something is radically wrong, and I would suggest that the war-time prices and trade board take note of it and ascertain why the people of British Columbia or any other province should have to pay such a high price for wheat when outside of Great Britain we have no market for our Canadian wheat to-day.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), in his speech the other evening, gave it as his opinion that the people of Canada are not taking this war as seriously as he thinks they should. I am rather inclined to that view, and I am frank in saying I cannot give any reason why it is so, because, as every hon. member and all other people in Canada know, conditions are serious indeed. But if such a state of mind does prevail, I believe it is the duty of this parliament to investigate and, if possible remedy it, for we must not let our war efforts or enthusiasm lag. Enthusiasm should be maintained from one end of Canada to the other until we are victorious.

People ask about conditions after the war; and this afternoon one hon. member inquired as to Canada's peace aims. While it is important that we give some thought to the aftermath of the war, all our thoughts and energies must now be directed to the present conflict, to assure that first of all Hitler and his forces shall be defeated. We are not only fighting for democracy, at the present time we are fighting for our very lives, and that is all-important. He would be a bold or wise man who to-day would attempt to predict what will come after this conflict. But, knowing the weaknesses of our own system in the past, and realizing the sorrow and suffering which some of those weaknesses imposed upon many of our citizens, I pray that our fight will be on behalf not of yesterday, but of a to-morrow, and that it will lead to the remedying of those conditions and the bringing about of a more lasting peace and happiness in the lives of untold millions of people.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am in agreement with many of the ideas expressed by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Reid) who has preceded me, and particularly with the concluding words of his address, that while the expression of our peace aims should be kept before us, at this time our duty as a parliament is to do our best to ensure that first things shall come first, and that this empire shall be victorious.

Our main purpose in meeting in this short session is to hear the reports of the various ministers of the crown. As I listened to the comprehensive report of the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) I was thrilled, as other hon. members must have been, at the magnificent record of the Royal Canadian Air Force. Coming as I do from Saskatchewan, it will be understood what pride I have in the fact that the commander of the Royal Canadian Air Force overseas, Squadron Leader McNab, is a native of my own province. During the eloquent address to-day of the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald), in which he told of the vigilance of the Royal Navy and also of our Canadian fleet in protecting our shores and in guarding our convoys, I thought of those young men from the prairies in the Canadian fleet who had never before gone down to the sea in ships, and many of whom until the outbreak of this war had never seen the sea. The record of our air force, the courage and the initiative of our navy, and, above all, the heroic resistance of Britain during the last months, have revived and revitalized our empire.

Someone has said, "Who dies if England live?" I paraphrase those words this evening and say, "Who lives if England die?" The attitude of this empire was epitomized the other day in the words—the immortal words—of Captain Fogarty Fegen of the Jervis Bay, "We are closing in closer to the enemy." Faced as he was with overwhelming odds, he went into action, counting not the cost, and in death he saved the lives of others. Parliament is convened at this time to assure the Canadian people that Canada is closing in on the enemy, by a redoubled and ever-increasing contribution to the empire's war effort. To-day, in consequence particularly of the resistance of the people of London, predictions are freely made of an offensive shortly to come. All of us in this parliament, irrespective of political faith, are agreed that there must be no apathy and that the war effort of this nation shall be relentlessly pursued. That is why we are here—to contribute our individual share to the end that there shall be an ever-widening effort on the part of Canada.

We of the opposition have, as I conceive it, a duty to perform. The last speaker stated and I agree with him, that it is not for us to indulge in carping criticism. It is our duty fearlessly to place our views before this parliament and this country. It is not for us to be overwhelmed by the government's superiority in numbers. If we indulge in unfair criticism, ours is an improper part. In this war, party considerations and prospects should be forgotten in a common endeavour to secure the highest and utmost degree of aid to the empire. In the United Kingdom there is active cooperation by all political parties, with the one reservation that individual members have reserved to themselves the right to criticize. But they cooperate. The Churchills, the Beaverbrooks and the Bevins, irreconcilable in many major matters in time of peace, are united in the hour of the nation's danger. We on the part of this opposition are denied active participation in the affairs of the country at this time, but we do claim the right of cooperation and the right of constructive criticism.

If I understand the vote in the last election, it amounted to this. The people of Canada wanted the party system of government to continue, but they did not want, nor did they vote for, partisanship in the conduct of this war. Democracy can function only when an opposition is prepared fearlessly to spur on the government where it lacks and lags and at the same time to cooperate where it succeeds.

Lord Tweedsmuir, in his book, "Memory Hold-The-Door," has set out that view of democracy in these words:

> Democracy—the essential thing as distinguished from this or that democratic government—was primarily an attitude of mind, a spiritual testament and not an economic structure or a political machine. The testament involved certain basic beliefs—that the personality was sacrosanct, which was the meaning of liberty; that policy should be settled by free discussions; that normally a minority should be ready to yield to a majority which in turn should respect a minority's sacred things.

We on this side of the house, in the interests of an ever-widening war effort, again plead with the government of the day to give us a secret session of parliament, not in order that we may be able to ascertain matters that may be of assistance to the enemy but in order to enable us to ask questions and make suggestions that cannot be submitted in this house without danger of benefiting the enemy.

The spirit in which I approach my responsibilities as a member is this, to offer fair criticism, because it must never be forgotten that during the days of 1914-18 in this house, owing to the criticism of members of the opposition, many millions of dollars were saved Canada in the matter of contracts; and in Great Britain, in consequence of criticism, at first ridiculed and later accepted by the government, the shell shortage which at one time threatened to bring down the empire was ultimately remedied.

There are many who say that democratic rights are being lost to-day, but with that view I do not agree. Some of these rights are being suspended on account of the greater need of national safety. Freedom of speech is one of these rights; it is of the essence of democracy. I admit, however, that in time of war there must be a pronounced degree of censorship. In what way have the people of Canada an opportunity of questioning the administration? If all members on the government side were to follow the example of the last speaker, the government would realize the attitude of the country. To-day the press of the country is in many instances subject to too censorious a censorship. Have the Canadian people an opportunity to express their views over the radio?

The last speaker mentioned the propagandist value of the radio. What about the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation? It is a public body, a creation of parliament. Is it tending to become the creature of this government? Two weeks ago there appeared in Toronto Saturday Night an article entitled, "It is your two and a half bucks." In that article there are set forth in detail certain principles governing the broadcasting corporation, one of which may be summarized thus: that anyone may use the radio in this country so long as he complies with the law, subject to this proviso, that he endangers himself and also the particular station over which he speaks if he indulges in anything of a nature that might undermine the war effort of the dominion. In that article by "Politicus" these words appear:

> Instead of leaving that section alone as the policy of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to-day, plus the provisions of the defence of Canada regulations, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has put responsible groups of parliament on the banned list. And without a public announcement to those parties.

The people of Canada have a right to know whether that statement is correct. They have a right to know whether a ban has been placed on political parties. If it has, by whose authority was it imposed? In my opinion it is the negation of democracy.

We of the opposition can make ourselves heard only over the radio. If that right or privilege, the right of free and untrammelled discusion of public affairs, with a view to the creation of public opinion, has been denied to us, the essence of democracy has been destroyed. The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) is not in his seat at the moment, but I suggest that immediately there be instituted an investigation of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation; for, if the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has become a party vehicle, parliament and the country should know the facts. Why has that investigation been refused by the Minister of Munitions and Supply? Has the day come in this dominion when a publicly owned corporation may become a vehicle for the dissemination of information tinged with partisan bias and yet be above examination by a parliamentary committee?

We have not the numbers on this side of the house to enforce our demand for the setting up of a committee to investigate the matter of radio, but I am asking members on the government side of the house: Will you not support us in our stand that such an investigation take place?

There is one phase of help that we might give to this empire that has not yet been dealt with except by the last speaker. As I apprehend it, this parliament should be concerned with the building up of morale in the empire as well as in Canada. As the last speaker stated, the United Kingdom needs a healthy and increasing export trade to Canada. Her increasing import of war materials requires an increase in exports in order to finance it. Recently in an editorial in the Manchester Guardian the following words appear:

> We can win the war only if we can pay for it by our exports after all our other resources in gold, foreign securities and services have been exhausted. Exports therefore can be counted as munitions of war.

What do we find? British exports to all parts of the world are decreasing. For last July, exports from Great Britain decreased by 22·7 per cent compared with the corresponding month in 1939. The volume of British imports increased during the same period by 11·2 per cent. Britain cannot continue her maximum war effort unless all parts of the empire increase their purchases from her. In an editorial in the Regina Leader-Post these words appear, summarizing the view I am endeavouring to place before hon. members:

> Armies, navies and air fleets are vital in the winning of wars, but the "economic arm" also plays an essential if less spectacular part. Canadians are helping to win the war with the formidable aid they are giving on land, sea and in the skies, but they can also help by buying British goods on as liberal a scale as possible.

My suggestion to the government is, launch a "Buy British" campaign in Canada. This campaign need in no way injure Canadian business or, in particular, Canadian Manufacturers. I have a table here which with the leave of the house I should like to place upon Hansard. In it are set out in detail the exports from Great Britain and Japan of cotton goods during the years 1937, 1938, 1939 and the first nine months of 1940, showing generally that during that period of time Britain's exports to Canada have been continually decreasing, while Japan's exports to Canada have been continually on the increase, phenomenally so. The table is as follows:

Towels—Cotton (in pounds)

Year	United Kingdom	Japan
1937	960,073	74,316

Great Britain during that period of time has been getting the short end. My suggestion is that this condition could be improved by such a campaign as I suggest, thereby giving material aid to Britain.

What of the home front? What of the situation in Canada as a whole? There is no denying the fact that throughout Canada to-day there is a growing feeling of resentment at the failure of the government to cut down controllable expenditures, at the fact that many appointments to high positions are being made that savour of political considerations. In that connection I mention particularly the Department of National War Services, that omnibus department, appointments in which sometimes reveal that political fitness is apparently a prerequisite qualification. Then there is a suspicion that contracts are being awarded in some instances to mushroom companies which have sprung up in recent months, and whose main capital is political fitness.

Mr. CLEAVER: Name them.

Mr. HOMUTH: The hon. member will get them; just let him wait.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I will give him one, a corporation set up in the city of Prince Albert to do construction work, the National Construction Company Limited. It never was in business before; it is composed of six men, unqualified in that work, whose one qualification is political fitness.

Mr. CLEAVER: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. CLEAVER: I know him, I think he would.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, I will permit a question.

Mr. CLEAVER: Would the hon. member suggest that that contract awarded to the National Construction Company was not awarded to the lowest bidder?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not what he is saying at all.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I suggest that if it was, there were sufficient delays that that company finally knew what the lowest tender would be.

An hon. MEMBER: Is that the way you did it when you were in power?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker, I do not claim that there is any monopoly in patriotism on the part of any party. I remember some conditions of 1914-18, but I remember that when there was wrongdoing those who did wrong were punished under the orders of the then Prime Minister, Sir Robert Borden.

The suggestion I want to make is this: There are millions upon millions being spent on war contracts, and we have no information as to the prices paid. Regularly a book is issued by the Minister of Munitions and Supply, setting out the contracts awarded—

Mr. HOMUTH: It tells you nothing.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: —but it gives no particulars of the prices paid and therefore is worthless, except that it shows that the government is spending money.

Mr. CLEAVER: And shows the contract price.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is apparent that the hon. member has not read the reports in question.

Mr. CLEAVER: I have read the reports, and they show the total contract price, not the unit prices.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The annoyance shown by the hon. member is enough to arouse one's suspicion. What I am asking is, in the public interest and in the interest of our war effort give us particulars as to prices. It may take some time. If the prices are reasonable—and I hope they are—the publication will tend to restore confidence. Concealment can only breed suspicion, and suspicion can only breed disunity. Publicity will do no harm with the vast majority of patriotic manufacturers or other suppliers of war requirements, who ask only a fair profit. But it will be an instrument of fear to the minority who would take unfair advantage of the sacrifices of this nation and empire at this time to charge monopolistic prices. I advance this argument in all sincerity, not with a view of political advantage to any party.

Look at the situation in connection with the last war loan. The response was dilatory. Why? Because on every hand people were saying, Is it possible that things are not right and that maximum benefits are not being received from the expenditure of money? Such publication would do away with that suspicion.

I suggest further that there be set up in this parliament a public accounts committee, giving it power to examine contracts, not of a year ago but up to date. There need be no political partisanship in the deliberations of such committee. Have the investigation or examination behind closed doors, if you will. You insist that there be no suggestion of partisanship. I point to the committee that met here last session, composed of members from all parties in this house. We met together for a period of more than three months, and while there may have been some shortcomings, our whole aim was to make sure that this nation should be free from subversive activities. Set up such a committee; no one need have anything to fear so long as reason and judgment prevail. Is there anything out of the way in that suggestion? We must keep up the morale of this nation, and we can do that by having people realize that the money they contribute and the sacrifices they make will not be dissipated.

I should like now to say a word with regard to our soldiers and sailors. We all agree that the morale of our fighting men and their dependents must be maintained. I join in the demand that these men in the service be given free transportation during their official leaves. At the same time I suggest that a regulation be passed assuring these men, who are spread all over Canada, of a minimum length of time at home. To the man on service nothing matters so much as his home. I also commend to the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) the suggestion advanced by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) that free postage be allowed on all mail to and from men in the service. That would not be costly, but it would be a tangible recognition and appreciation of their services.

Again returning to the home front I should mention the magnificent work being done by women in connection with the Red Cross and other charitable works and aids to the soldiers. They did wonderful work in the last war and are doing wonderful work again in this war. I think they merit the highest commendation and, what is more, recognition by the government. I suggest to the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Gardiner) that women be given representation in that department, in order that they may correlate and organize the work of women throughout Canada. According to recent statistics of the Department of Labour there are in Canada to-day 52,500 employable men who are still unemployed. Bearing in mind the development of industry on every hand, I believe the time will come when it will be necessary to utilize the services of women in industry to take the places of men who are on service. To-day voluntary organizations are to be found across Canada, from Vancouver and Victoria on the west coast to Halifax in the east, receiving instruction in first-aid training and home nursing, and in motor mechanics. These organizations should be recognized; and I suggest to the government that in anticipation of the need for women in industry, courses be set up at once in connection with munitions manufacture, aeroplane construction, motor mechanics and gas-mask manufacture. Provision might be made for the enrolment of women along the line of the army auxiliary corps in the last war, in which women were enrolled for the period of the war, not under the war department but under a government department similar to the Department of National War Services.

I shall conclude by referring to agriculture. In common with British Columbia, which was referred to by the last speaker, Saskatchewan has not benefited to any extent as a result of the development of war industries. In fairness to that province I think some of these industries should be established there. The services of many trained mechanics are not being utilized. Small machinery plants, that could turn out munitions as they did in the last war, are not being called into service. I am sure the speech from the throne will be received with deep resentment, certainly with great disappointment, all over western Canada. It contained no announcement of any policy designed to relieve the plight of the wheat farmer. Therefore I have no apology to make for supporting the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), which states:

> And this house further regrets that despite the serious condition of agriculture no effective action is proposed to alleviate that condition and to ensure to the Canadian farmer a just, fair and reasonable return for his products.

I had hoped that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) would have something to offer. He spoke at some length. He made a political speech, to start with; then, instead of enunciating a policy which would be of some immediate benefit to the wheat farmers he expressed a speculative hope that at the end of five years all would be well, or at least that the surplus would have disappeared. It was not a five-year plan; it was a five-year hope. The western farmer wants to know: first, is the government going to do anything to assure him of a fair, just and reasonable return for his wheat; second, is the interim payment that was promised in the election of 1940 going to be paid, and when; third, is the government going to make advances to the farmers on the wheat held in storage? To all those questions no answers were given, no reference was made.

Then the western farmer wants to know whether the government intends to do anything to remove the injustice suffered by him to-day in the matter of grading wheat. The farmer is paid on the basis of 70 cents a bushel for No. 1 northern wheat at Fort William, but wheat that should grade No. 1 is being graded No. 2, No. 3 and, in some instances, No. 4. Is that for the benefit of the Canadian farmer or is it for the benefit of the elevator corporations, who to-day all over western Canada are building large storage facilities which, according to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) will pay for themselves in three months. And what is more, under the arrangement entered into by the government and these companies, the cost of these facilities will be written off as depreciation within two years.

I have one further question to ask. What is going to be done about the payment of the bonus? In my constituency a substantial crop area was destroyed by drought and hail. The farmers want to know why they do not receive the bonus in November instead of in May. How are they to carry on through the coming winter? Is there any justification for the continued postponement of the time when a decision must be made as to whether or not the bonus will be paid? Surely this parliament has the right to know that. The Minister of Agriculture did however, make one admission. On April 5, 1939, he announced in this house that a farmer could produce wheat at from 30 to 40 cents a bushel, but speaking in the house the other day he said, as reported at page 102 of Hansard:

> It is generally admitted that 70 cents advance at Fort William, which nets the farmer about 50 cents a bushel, does not cover his total costs of production and therefore does not maintain him as a contented producer. If he is to receive more money, it must come from the sale price of wheat, or from the taxpayers of Canada, or from both.

Not one thing did he say as to the future, except to express a hope of what might happen five years hence. He did, however, make one statement which I hope does not represent the considered opinion of the government to which he belongs. At page 94 of Hansard the following appears:

> Why should this government change its policies on agriculture? The policies are essentially Liberal. The policies were endorsed in peace-time by the farming population of Canada when proposed in 1935. The policies were put into practice for four years and endorsed in war-time no later than March 26 last.

What does that mean? Apparently he forgot the results in the Saskatoon election which was fought after the farmers of western Canada began to realize that the promises made in the last session were not being put into effect.

An hon. MEMBER: Saskatoon is a city seat.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Saskatoon is a city, but there are 1,500 rural voters and most of them voted against the government. What do those words means? Do they mean this to the western farmer: Why should we do anything for you; why should we change? We secured your votes, you purchased what you are getting and your eyes were open when you voted. Is that the answer of this government to the western farmer? If it is, it means this: This is your dish of crow, Mr. Western Farmer; this is what you bargained for. The western farmer has been told bluntly that he alone of all the producers of the necessities of war must continue to produce at a loss and be the forgotten man in the mobilization of this dominion's war effort. I protest against that attitude. Until the farmer is assured of a fair return for his products, the morale of western Canada will not be maintained.

During the last session of parliament the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) claimed that a policy would be announced as soon as possible. He spoke in Winnipeg on September 12, 1940, and according to the Winnipeg Tribune he stated that the war committee of the cabinet, which consisted of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and himself, had always been ready and willing to advance money against farm stored grain. If they were and are, then make the advance. I quote further from the report in the Winnipeg Tribune.

He disagreed with the claim that the current problem of western agriculture was primarily a dominion responsibility; rather it was one for the provincial governments.

What do those words signify? What is their meaning? Do they mean that the government will do no more than it has done? Do they mean that even though the farmer has wheat in storage on his farm, he will have to depend on relief assistance to carry him through until he is permitted to sell that wheat? All I can do in this regard is to raise my voice in protest against the treatment that is being accorded to the western farmer, as evidenced by the speech from the throne. This protest will be of no avail until members representing western Canada in this house rise in their places, and, irrespective of their party affiliations, demand a fair, reasonable and just return to the western farmer and an advance on the crop at present in storage on his land.

Mr. J. A. BLANCHETTE (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I think the house at large is greatly appreciative of the excellence of the speeches which we have heard since the calling of parliament, especially those of the mover (Mr. Claxton) and the seconder (Mr. Jutras) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. These hon. gentlemen are of different racial extractions, but they each gave to the people of their respective races admirable advice, which, if carried out, cannot do anything but help to solidify all the people of Canada into a true spirit of Canadianism. The moderation of their speeches, the seriousness and sincerity of their remarks, the profound knowledge of their theses and the absence of political insinuations in what they said, I think struck a true keynote for the speeches to follow. The first speaker who followed was the hon. leader of the loyal opposition (Mr. Hanson), but he departed to some extent from the keynote of the speeches of the previous speakers. His first words as reported in Hansard are:

Macdonald! What a name to conjure with. And Macdonald of Kingston! How that takes our memories back seventy-five years; yet what a difference we see. After all:

What's in a name? That which we call a rose,
By any other name would smell as sweet.

Yet one of the greatest assets of the hon. gentleman is his name.

A somewhat similar compliment could be paid to the leader of the opposition, even to the extent of the poetical tribute and annotation. As we all know, the initials of the leader of the opposition are "R.B.". R.B.! What a name to conjure with. R.B. of the loyal opposition! How those initials must take back the memories of the opposition; not so many years. We can say with the poet:

But O for the touch of a vanished hand,
And the sound of a voice that is still!

R.B.! What a name! What a source of inspiration!

All through this debate thus far there has been one point upon which all members have agreed, namely, that every effort should be put forth to win the war. I am sure that this will be the keynote of all discussions from now to the end of the war. There is no dissension on that point. That thought is unanimous on all sides, and in all sections of the house. In this we are but corroborating what an eminent writer of our day has said, namely, "What democracy has to do, and what makes it possible for democracy to continue as a functioning method of government, through the process of discussion, is to find areas of agreement on essentials." But if the end to be attained is agreed upon by all groups in the house, the same cannot be said of the means to be employed in arriving at that end. Here is where there is a parting of the ways among the various groups in the house.

We have first the group of the loyal opposition, which contends that the government's efforts since the declaration of war by Canada have not been sufficient, that more men should have been sent overseas, that more material and equipment should have been available in our military stores, that our efforts were not properly coordinated, and finally it maintains that the government has continued to "soothe the Canadian people regarding the war effort of the nation, thereby creating a false sense of security when a clear-cut call to action is desperately needed."

The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group criticizes the government for not having conscripted our industries, with all that that entails, immediately upon our entry into the war.

Finally the Social Credit group is critical of our war effort because the government has not had recourse to monetary reform.

The leader of the opposition stated in his speech of November 12 last, and rightly so, that it is so easy to criticize. An eminent English writer, in discussing the operation of democracy in England, says:

> We pay the minority to oppose the government, to take the maximum advantage of the government's mistakes, to insist that it is ruining the country, and to flood the electorate with propaganda intended to show that the government is doing the worst possible things in the worst possible ways.

It has also been stated that a strong and free nation comes of strong and free men, and our method of government assumes that the criticism of the opposition works in the long run for the common good of all.

At this stage of the debate it might be advantageous and I think proper for all of us to follow the oft-repeated current admonition, let us face the facts, if we wish to obtain a true perspective of what this government represents and of its achievements during the present war.

First and foremost, in my humble opinion, there is no one who can speak more truly for the majority of the people of Canada than the present government—this, whether we like it or not. The groups representing the various schools of political thought in Canada have just had an opportunity of expounding their principles, theories and programmes to the supreme authority, the electorate of the country, who pronounced themselves in no uncertain manner at the last election. In other words, the Conservative party was weighed in the balance by the electorate and was found wanting. The Co-operative Commonwealth Federation and its programme were also scrutinized, and that group, too, has been found wanting. Finally the Social Credit group was examined by the electorate, which, as shown by the results, decided to reform the composition of the house by decimating the representatives of that group, rather than to reform the monetary policy of the country. So once again, whether we like it or not, the present government stands out as the truest form of expression of the attitude of the Canadian people.

There are groups in this house, and outside who claim to speak for the whole people of Canada or for the majority of the electorate, but by what authority is not known. In 1932, sixty per cent of the United States press opposed Roosevelt as a candidate for the presidency. In 1936, eighty per cent of the United States press again opposed him, and ninety per cent of the United States press opposed him on November 5 last, with results that we all know, thereby revealing that at times the most vociferous are out of step and tempo with the aspirations of the electorate of the country at large.

And now if I may have the liberty, Mr. Speaker, I should like to set out in a brief and cursory way the accomplishments of this government since the declaration of war by Canada in September, 1939, even at the risk of repeating what has already been stated in the house by persons of much greater authority than I, and remembering always the state of our equipment for army, navy and air when this government assumed power in 1935. Practically nothing had been done in the previous five years in the way of expenditure on our military, naval and air forces, but to-day the total strength of the Canadian active service force is 167,417; non-permanent active militia, officers and men, 65,000; navy personnel as of November 7 last, 13,034; recruits under training each month in thirty-nine camps, at least 25,000; air force, total number of officers and men, 30,599; enlistment of air crews as of November 2 last, 6,884; or a total of 307,934.

We have to-day in commission 140 vessels, 17 corvettes, 4 mine-sweepers and 12 destroyers. Contracts for munitions, war supplies and equipment as of November 4 last, total $443,000,000; and capital expenditures for plant construction and extensions, $235,000,000.

Plans have been accepted for the manufacture of 3,000 tanks, and at the end of the first year of the Bren gun contract there should be three times as many guns delivered as were called for by the contract.

The establishment of the war-time prices and trade board and the foreign exchange control board is an achievement of which this government may well be proud owing to the beneficial results derived therefrom by the Canadian people.

Let us not forget, too, that the unity which we find throughout the length and breadth of Canada to-day was not a product of spontaneous generation but was brought about rather by good judgment, able leadership and far-sightedness.

Last but not least, I believe that in large measure the people of Canada and of the whole British empire are greatly appreciative of the Ogdensburg agreement of August 17 last. This agreement may not have been accomplished to the blare of trumpets and the beating of drums or with astronomical figures affecting our economy or the treasury, but often the greatest events in history are predicated upon simplicity, quietude and far-sightedness.

Let us not lull ourselves into the belief that this accomplishment was an inspiration which came to the United States overnight, especially since it was announced during the course of an election campaign. It was brought about through the continued amicable relations and interviews which occurred between the United States and this country under Liberal administrations. One of the greatest acts among the many outstanding to the credit and achievement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is the consummation of the Ogdensburg agreement, a magna charta in the history of democracies. It is patent to us that this is one of the effects of the friendly relations which the Prime Minister has always fostered, nurtured and developed with the great republic to the south. I do not wish to convey the impression that the advantages of this agreement are only unilateral, but I feel that it is of the greatest importance for the aim which all free countries have in view, namely the crushing of bandits and gangsters on the international highways of the world.

These are some accomplishments of the government since the declaration of war by Canada. As has been truly stated, the government does not have to defend or justify its achievements; they defend themselves. That there may have been misgivings or misjudgments here and there may be granted. But what country has not made mistakes in its transition from peace to war activities? For example, in 1937 France manufactured throughout the whole year only thirty-eight aeroplanes, while Germany was making 100 a month, or 1,200 in a year. In the eight months prior to September, 1939, there were working in the Renault arsenal shops in France only 7,000 men out of a force of 30,000 which was the regular peace-time strength; 23,000 of those artisans were doing manual labour in the army.

In January, 1940, apart from the Canadian division no one could show us a corps of troops superior to a battalion. If we take our efforts as a whole and visualize them as such, I believe that no one with an open mind will deny that what we have done shows a really epic effort, a thoroughly united effort. If we grant that this government may have made mistakes, where is the guarantee that the critics of the administration might not have made miscalculations and misjudgments? If we establish a true comparison between the efforts of this government during the first fifteen months of the war and the efforts of the administration which was in power during the last war, this government stands up favourably in all its fields of effort, and the preponderance will not be spurious.

I have clipped from this morning's Montreal Gazette an article headed, "Canadian war costs to date over 1914-18":

> London, November 18.—Hon. Vincent Massey, Canadian High Commissioner, said in a broadcast to-night that Canada has nearly as many men under arms now as at the end of the last war, and that her war expenditures since the outbreak are greater than in the whole four years of the 1914-18 conflict.

As has often been stated in this house by responsible ministers of the crown, corroborated by persons in high command in England, our cooperation with England has been of the fullest, and I feel that the Canadian people are satisfied with the efforts of the present government. In accordance with the true spirit and essence of democracy let us all cooperate, as much as possible, not only by word but by thought and deed, in this our supreme effort in the history of Canada and the British empire.

There are other matters, referring to the agricultural interests of the country, which I should like to bring to the attention of this house before taking my seat. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is to be commended for bringing back to this country the agreement which he did. It is noted, for example, that we shall be able to sell bacon to Great Britain to the extent of $69,000,000.

Mr. NICHOLSON: At what price?

Mr. BLANCHETTE: We shall be able to export cheese in the coming year to the volume of 112,000,000 pounds at 14·4 cents; condensed milk to the extent of some $3,750,000; frozen fish of the value of $12,100,000, and fruit and honey to the amount of some $4,500,000. It is to be hoped that by such a diversion of dairy products the butter market will be enhanced during the producing time of the year. I know that at the present time butter obtains a fair price, but unfortunately the majority of farmers got 20 cents for their butter which is now selling for 30 to 35 cents, the difference going into the hands of those who bought at the low price and stored the product for enhancement. At 20 cents a pound for butter, the farmer is receiving about 72 cents a hundred pounds for his milk which is costing him between $1.69 and $2.04 to produce, depending on the size of the herd, as per data obtained during a recent survey in the county of Deux Montagnes, a survey made under the direction of Professor Toupin of l'Institut d'Oka. These conditions have been prevailing for a number of years in the butter industry, and the attention of the government is drawn to this disparity between the cost of production and the return upon same during the producing time of the year.

If the wheat grower, the apple grower, and the potato grower must receive the attention of the government in order to carry on, surely the same consideration is more necessary for the farmer who is engaged in the production of butter, which needs a farmer's attention 365 days of the year. I trust that the government will devote its most sincere consideration to this branch of the dairy industry. If I may be permitted to offer a suggestion, I would say that a reduction in the transportation cost of feed would be of great assistance to the dairy industry; or again, the providing of storage facilities, with interim government payments to the producer, would enable the butter producer to gather all the profits derived from his production, which he is not at present getting, and this with no increased cost to the consumer.

Another matter which I should like to bring to the attention of the government is heating with wood to aid our war effort. A timely editorial in this regard appeared in the Sherbrooke Daily Record in which it is stated that, where practicable, Canadian householders can achieve the dual objective of aiding in winning the war and at the same time reducing their annual expenditure for fuel by the increased use of wood for domestic heating purposes, according to information gathered by the forest products laboratories of the Department of Mines and Resources.

Each year, for domestic consumption in Canada, quite apart from industrial uses, about 3,400,000 tons of anthracite coal and about 1,800,000 tons of bituminous coal are imported. In addition, homes equipped with oil burners necessitate the importation of a considerable quantity of crude oil from which fuel is derived. Under present conditions, when every effort is being expended to conserve foreign exchange, it is important that Canada's outlay for imported fuels be reduced by drawing on her abundant resources in fuel from low grade wood. At present Canada uses approximately 10,000,000 cords of wood a year for domestic fuel. This is equal in heat value to 6,600,000 tons of anthracite. Effective heat obtained from one and one-quarter cords of good hardwood is equivalent to the heat obtained from one ton of anthracite coal.

While burning wood may entail more work and inconvenience in stoking than some other fuels, in most instances a substantial saving can be made by its use. As a measure of national economy reliance on Canadian fuel resources is important, and places within the reach of every householder a means of furthering our war effort.

I have already made this suggestion to the Department of National Defence as well as to the war supply board, in connection with the 39 training camps throughout the country, when practicable, and trust that the suggestion will be considered, as a means of conserving our foreign exchange, giving more work to our own people in lumber districts, and finally as a tangible proof that the government is carrying out the recommendations of the forest products laboratories which can be done in training centres located near lumber regions.

The war-time prices and trade board has been doing effective work in the protection of the consumer against undue profiteering, and it is to be commended for it. Undue profiteering may be derived either, on the one hand, from a price higher than a fair price, on a produced or manufactured commodity, or, on the other, by paying too low a price for the producing or manufacturing of that commodity. I believe that the war-time prices and trade board, or, if not in its jurisdiction, the departments of labour, both federal and provincial, would be well advised to be on the alert, in the way of survey and inquiry, in connection with corporations which are deriving undue benefits and profits in their handling or manufacturing of certain products and commodities. In doing so it will be rendering a great service to the producers of our basic industries, and to our labourers, both of which classes of the community need our constant attention and care.

To refer in passing to matters of provincial jurisdiction, newspapers of Quebec city, under date of November 16 last, mention a news item to the effect that the Quebec provincial government may establish a fixed price, a minimum price, on pulpwood that settlers and farmers cut on their land, and that a commission may be instituted in that regard, with powers similar to that of the dairy commission. Such a commission would render invaluable services to all concerned and I only trust that this long felt-want will become a reality in the very near future. I understand that it is a rule of thumb with the paper mills to be able to pay for pulpwood at the mill 30 per cent of the current price of newsprint as delivered at New York. This price is not being paid at present. The fact that this commission will be created speaks very well for the efforts of one of our former colleagues, Hon. Paul Emile Coté, who is directing, as minister, the department of lands and forests at Quebec.

Finally, in closing my remarks, may I refer to the frequent mention which is being made in the country at present of encouraging our youths in bilingualism? I have been favouring bilingualism for a number of years and would be remiss in my belief and duty if I did not profit by this occasion to state to our Canadian youth and to our educational institutions that no better preparation could be devised to develop and foster unity in the dominion and to ensure the economic success of the person so equipped. Paul Reynaud once asked, "Jeunesse, quelle France voulez-vous?" The youth of this country have already replied to this question by being in the military camps to-day. If our educational institutions are to be true to preparing our youth for the future, a fostering of bilingualism on a larger scale than has been done before cannot do otherwise than have the most beneficial results in the social, economic and national fabric of Canada.

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): During the course of the past week we have been privileged to listen to a number of addresses which I will classify as follows: First, those addresses delivered by ministers of the crown in an attempt to inform members of the house exactly what the government of the day is doing and has been doing with respect to Canada's war effort. Second, we have had those addresses by members of the house who are genuinely concerned about Canada's war effort and also genuinely concerned about what the outcome is going to be. Third, I believe I am quite safe in saying that there are those who are so surprised at having been elected that they cannot resist the temptation to boast about it. I believe we have just had a typical example of that.

We in this group have had reflections cast upon us from time to time, but it will be noticed that it does not stop us. One such reflection was that we have come back with reduced numbers. May I say this to the members of the house. We went to the country on a definite programme and we are still following it, whereas there are others not far away who went to the country on a definite programme which they deserted at the first opportunity. We have nothing to be ashamed of.

I was deeply interested in the addresses delivered by the ministers; most of them were quite enlightening. Much that we heard gave us courage, but there was much to depress us In dealing with the depressing aspect of a certain speech, may I refer to that one delivered here on November 15 by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston). This is one statement which he made:

> . . . we still have to face the fact of a serious shortage in equipment and armament, and we shall probably have to face that fact for a good while yet in many instances.

First I wish to congratulate the minister upon being very frank. I believe that if there are shortages we the people of Canada should know about them. But I say this further, I believe that if this government five years ago had listened to the suggestions of members of this group they would not have had the same reason for stating that there are still shortages of equipment and armament. Furthermore, in connection with that same matter I say that if they were not prepared to take our advice in 1935, surely by 1937 there was ample reason for doing so, and how much better still was the reason for accepting it in September, 1939. I would make a further assertion, namely, that if the minister's statement is correct, as I have no doubt it is, there can be little good reason for there being any idle factories in this Canada of ours. There can be very little justification for there being any idle men in this country. I was appalled during the last month or two as I travelled by car through western Canada to see the great numbers of young men walking up and down the roads with packs on their backs. I made it a point to pick them up; I ascertained very early in my discussions with them where they were from and why they were out of work. There is absolutely no justification for young men walking up and down our roads in idleness at this stage of this terrific conflict.

May I refer again to the speech of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) delivered in this house on November 14? I turn to his prognostications relative to the wheat situation. I notice his speech was literally filled with the word "assume"; assuming this and assuming that, said the minister, this will be the outcome. What did the Conservatives call it—lulling and soothing us. That, I take it, was a typical example of what they were referring to. He said in effect, assuming that the blockade is lifted, assuming that we increase consumption internally, assuming that we can sell certain quantities to the United Kingdom, assuming that we have so many years of war, and assuming that we can sell certain quantities to those countries which are not blockaded, at the end of the five-year period we shall find that we fall short by fifty million bushels of supplying the world's demand for wheat. When I heard the minister make those statements I almost had to classify him as the master seer, or the very personification of optimism, or an arithmetical genius. But when I observed on another page of Hansard that he referred to the fact that in the last general election our party was cut in two, which meant that half of sixteen is ten, I could place but little faith in the value of his guesses, if I may use that word, with respect to the wheat situation.

It may be a very fine thing to tell the Canadian people that there is hope in five years. I believe the Liberal party is used to things happening in five-year cycles. That is, they are either elected or defeated, and I think they cannot get the idea of elections out of their minds.

The statement of the Minister of Agriculture with respect to wheat did absolutely nothing to satisfy the farmers of western Canada who have at the present time vast surpluses of wheat, in many instances lying out without shelter in the open fields. I say, enough of these prognostications, enough of these lulling and soothing utterances, as our Conservative friends would describe them. I still think we shall have to turn to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) in order really to get an announcement with respect to the government's wheat policy.

If, Mr. Speaker, I abstain from lengthy discourse upon this occasion, it is not because I believe that parliament should abrogate its proper function, that of carrying on a debate to the fullest measure for the purpose of furthering Canada's war effort. Hon. members would be remiss in their duty if they were to leave unsaid those things which ought to be said, simply because Canada is in a state of war.

May I digress for a moment to pass one comment about the constituency which I represent. My constituents in the constituency of Red Deer are blessed in many ways. Within the bounds of that constituency we enjoy a wide diversity of activity. We have grain growing, mixed farming, dairying, mining, lumbering, manufacturing if only to a limited extent, flour milling, and the oil drilling industry even though it, too, may be only in the experimental stage. We are relatively free from the ravages of drought and insect pests, and with a few excepted areas our agricultural productivity is comparatively constant. Located in a parkland area, as we are, I assure you that much of our scenery is unsurpassed. Further, and possibly this is most important, my electors have for a good twenty years been able to reject the wooings and constant advances of all the isms, including Liberalism and Conservatism.

One would naturally assume that we have strong justification for being extremely happy. And we are. But still there are some things which have a tendency to depress us. One thing that I find depresses my constituents a great deal is the outlook for the post-war period which will come upon us just as sure as we are here. I know I may be criticized for dealing with the post-war period at this time, but I have not heard a logical argument against giving consideration to that period now. I believe that to-day is the day to prepare for to-morrow, if we are going to be successful in meeting the conditions which will face us to-morrow.

Most hon. members who have spoken during this debate have laid a great deal of emphasis upon Canada's present objective. I realize as well as anyone does that our foremost objective is to win this war. We are fighting to win; there is no doubt about that. We have undertaken a tremendous task; there is no doubt about that either. We are making a supreme effort to protect our freedom against the dictators who would destroy it. But let us not be deluded. We are not fighting to preserve the state of affairs which has prevailed in this country during the past decade. We are not fighting this war to preserve governments which have brought us poverty, relief, unemployment, squalor, hardship, the bankruptcy of agriculture and the ruin of primary industry. We are not fighting to preserve a government which will tolerate these things. We are not fighting the war to preserve a man-made set of economic rules which would work beautifully if we were living in an age of scarcity but which dismally fail to meet a condition of abundance. Those boys who left the relief lines and who dropped off box cars to enlist are not offering their lives to preserve a demoralizing existence, without hope and without prospects. I think the sooner the government of Canada realizes these facts, the more genuine will be Canada's war effort.

While referring to those boys, I believe I am quite safe in saying that although thousands of them are in uniform, willing to make the supreme sacrifice, there is in their minds an element of doubt. I will have to enlarge upon that statement in order that hon. members may know what I am getting at. I have talked with many of these young men, and they have said to me, "What is to become of us when this war is over?" To further elaborate that point I should like to read a statement appearing in the November 16 issue of the Montreal Standard. This is just a sentence taken from a letter written by a young soldier now in a prison camp in Germany. In writing home he said:

> Shall be returning home when this is all over, and settle down, I think, that is, if there are any positions open or available.

That is a good indication of what that boy is thinking about at the present time. So I say, if we are going to get the maximum effort from these boys, the very least we can do is assure them that when this war is over, they will be guaranteed economic security, such as we know this rich Canada of ours is able to provide.

We know that we must defeat the dictators, because if we do not, they will take from us freedom of speech and freedom of action. But I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that we must also fight against those forces at home which would deprive us and our boys of the fruits of victory. So I say our duty to-day is two-fold: first, to put every ounce of energy into the war and, second, to lay the foundation for a new society at home, a society built upon economic security which, in its new found strength, will be bound to destroy any dictatorial force which may ever face us. We must guarantee to every boy now in uniform that when he returns he will find a way of life worthy of his noble achievements. To-day is the day to prepare, not to-morrow. We must declare openly that there shall be no starvation and no privation in a land where people are accustomed to boast about their vast surpluses of all kinds of commodities. To me, there is nothing more disgraceful and nothing with less justification than to see, in a land such as this, vast quantities of food and of materials for making clothing, and at the same time hungry and ill-clad children on every side. While we in this group have been belittled from time to time for making statements of this kind, I have yet to hear anyone, from his place in this house, or on the public platform, attempt to justify such a condition. I dare say no one would even try to do so.

I turn now to the monthly review of the Bank of Nova Scotia dated September 26, 1940, which contains these words:

> One thing is clear; that the years of the last decade have in reality been years of growing warfare and cannot be regarded as a desirable standard for the future.

I commend these further words to hon. members:

> A sane world has no place for millions of hungry people and great quantities of unsalable foodstuffs.

I am in absolute agreement with that statement. When this war is over, our government must not endeavour to bring about better times simply by trying to stimulate production, as we have done in the past. That has been one great weakness of governments in days gone by; they have tried to gear up production to even greater speed in order to meet every little ill that has cropped up throughout the country. I say, and it has been said here time and again, that when this war is over, the problem we shall face will not be that of stimulating production; it will be that of distributing the abundance which we shall still have here even if this war lasts ten years.

I should now like to quote just two or three paragraphs from an editorial headed, "After the War is Over," appearing in the Globe and Mail of August 9, 1940:

> The problem of this century is one of distribution. The old problem of production to meet the needs and demands of the people has been solved.
> When next the dominion parliament meets, it should begin to consider ways and means of providing change-over from a war-time economy to a peace-time one, bearing in mind that want shall not be necessary, and that unemployment shall not be justified on the grounds that there is no work to do—it can be explained only by the fact that we have not discovered yet how to employ labour to advantage.
> A nation never goes bankrupt in the sense that it is helpless to provide for itself and its people. It can only go bankrupt according to certain financial standards which, because of the very fact that they show it as bankrupt, prove nothing but their own incompetence to reflect reality. No nation is ever bankrupt so long as it has tilled acres, uncut lumber, untapped mineral zones and so great an establishment of plant and equiment that it can produce a volume and variety of goods and services many times greater than its population can profitably utilize at the prevailing standard of life.
> We are a rich people. We shall be even richer after the war. But we must begin to consider how we can best reorient our economy so that our latent capacity to produce wealth will be utilized fully and the resulting output equitably distributed.

I say, and I believe I am correct in saying, that the Toronto Globe and Mail is an orthodox publication. If that is true, then it would appear that even the orthodox thinkers are waking up. When I went before the people during the last general election I stated that the one thing I would press for would be the setting up of a house committee to deal with post-war problems. I was greatly pleased when I noticed in the speech from the throne of last spring the following statement:

> . . . it is desirable, as far as may be possible, to plan for the days that will follow the cessation of hostilities.

I was pleased further to notice that on the Votes and Proceedings of the same date was a notice of a resolution under the name of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to set up a select committee of the house for the purpose of dealing with this matter. I was, however, chagrined when on June 18, as recorded on page 864 of Hansard, the Prime Minister saw fit to withdraw his resolution. When I returned to my constituency after the adjournment, my constituents questioned me about the attitude of the government toward setting up a committee, and I had no alternative than to tell them the truth. They were greatly depressed when they learned of the withdrawal of this resolution by the Prime Minister. When the Prime Minister was speaking on that occasion he stated that if it were considered advisable at a later date again to introduce the resolution, it would be done. Apparently it was not considered advisable to do that during the time the house was in session.

About the time that the house reconvened I noticed that the government had set up a subcommittee of the cabinet, made up largely of civil servants, which was to act as an advisory committee to the government in dealing with post-war problems. The thought came to me: Why was it deemed advisable to set up a committee made up largely of civil servants instead of a committee made up of the elected representatives of the people? No matter what other committees have been set up for the purpose of studying post-war problems, I say in all sincerity that a house committee should be set up forthwith. May I say to this committee, or to any committees that have been set up, that there are certain matters which should be taken into consideration when dealing with this great question.

The first is, what attitude is to be taken with regard to civilian health? Last spring I spoke at some length in this house about civilian health. I was prompted to do so by the fact that after the war broke out, it was discovered beyond all question of doubt that the health of the Canadian people, as reflected by the health of the soldiers who had been examined, was just not good. In this connection I should like to quote from an editorial which appeared in a recent issue of Health. I enjoy quoting from this publication because I find it invariably hits the nail on the head. This is what they say in the autumn issue with respect to this question:

> Soon it will be possible for our authorities to estimate with reasonable accuracy the number of young men in certain age groups who are fit—and by the same token those who are unfit to serve in the army.
> Of course in piping times of peace such things are "impossible". One recalls debates in the House of Commons when at the end of interminable talk following a resolution by a patriotic medical man to the effect that there should be periodic physical examination of our population the conclusion was reached that the thing was utopian and impossible. And yet shortly with the incentive of war we discover that it is possible and that we have done it.

It is surprising what the Canadian people or the Canadian government can do when faced with such a tragedy as war. The editorial continues:

> The percentage of disabilities to be found will doubtless be high. It was high when similar examinations were conducted during the operation of the Military Service Act during the last war. The revelations made then and about to be made now prove conclusively that from the standpoint of health we constantly neglect large sections of our population.
> Thinking people are beginning to wonder what we are going to do about it. Why should we wait until we are faced with a serious war before we begin to take stock of our human assets? Why is the health and welfare of the average young man and woman not an essential objective in peace-time as well as in war-time?
> If one desires to ask a further pertinent if not an impertinent question one may enquire why it is that in spite of the increasing disabilities which may be expected from either a financial depression or a war frequently the first thing a government thinks of under such circumstances is to reduce health expenditures instead of increasing them.

That is something that has always been in my mind, and I believe I expressed my feelings when we were considering the estimates of the health department. The editorial continues:

> When one considers that in war the fit are sacrificed on the altars of Mars and the unfit left at home a situation is discovered which should demand the attention of all political leaders.
> Our statesmen on the whole have given very little consideration to the subject.

I do trust that these committees and the government will see fit to give proper consideration to the question of health. If we are seriously tackling the problem, the first thing for us to do, because a prerequisite to good health is adequate food, clothing and shelter, is to assure the Canadian people that they shall be provided with the necessities of life so long as we are able to provide them, and if the present financial policy of Canada will not enable the government to do that, there is only one thing for the government to do and that is to change the financial policy.

One thing comes to my mind in that connection. In a recent address the president of the Canadian Bankers' Association is reported to have referred once again to "funny money," and it is significant that he referred to "funny money" on the evening of the same day on which the leader of the Social Credit group spoke in this house.

I say to the president of the Canadian Bankers' Association that if he wants to talk about "funny money," all he has to do is to talk about his own bankers' money because in the depression we were using the so-called bankers' money, and it must have been "funny money" indeed to bring upon us such conditions as prevailed then during a period of great abundance. So I say that when the president of the Canadian Bankers' Association talks loosely about "funny money" and cautions the government to have nothing to do with it, he is really giving the government a hint to cast him adrift and start building up a financial policy which will provide for the people of Canada those things which are physically possible and desirable.

I wish now to make reference to one question that came up in the last session of parliament, namely the processing tax as it applied to wheat which is gristed in the local mills, where the miller keeps a part of the wheat to pay for the cost of grinding. On August 3 last the question was asked in this house whether the miller would have to pay the processing tax if he took part of the farmer's grain as payment for grinding the balance into flour. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) gave it as his opinion at the time that the miller would have to pay the processing tax. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) then stated that his opinion was that this was no ordinary transaction and therefore he did not think the tax would apply. May I add that the Minister of Trade and Commerce in giving his opinion said that the tax was designed to help the producer.

I have been giving this matter a great deal of consideration especially in view of the fact that the wheat board in its circular of August 16 stated that the processing tax would apply. The farmers take their wheat to the local mills to be ground into flour. How, then, can a processing tax which is charged against that farmer be said to be designed to help the farmer? I have in my constituency at least one privately-owned mill which has been a boon to the farmers of that district for a great many years, and I find upon investigation that the processing tax is a handicap to the farmer. It is an extra charge upon the farmer. How can it be designed to help him if in the final analysis it does him a great deal of harm? So I say to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, do not leave this matter where it now stands, but let us go into it more fully and when the minister has all the evidence before him I believe he will agree with me that the processing tax should not be applied in the case of the local mill where the farmer leaves a part of his grain with the miller to pay for the wheat he has had ground into flour.

It was announced during the last session that the processing tax would have to be borne by the miller, and I believe hon. members generally were agreed that that was quite proper. I am speaking from memory but I believe early in August we were advised that the large mills could not stand the 15 cent processing tax. That seems strange, I would say to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I do not know upon what basis he came to that conclusion or exactly what factors were taken into consideration, but I do know that very soon after the application of the processing tax, which is passed on to the consumer, the large milling companies of this country entered into a price-cutting war and they knocked their prices down and down and down. That is fine for the consumer. Prices went down nearly to where they should be. But it does not substantiate the argument that the large mills were unable to bear the weight of the processing tax.

It is significant, too, that even with the processing tax, and even after it was passed on plus the price war, the five largest milling concerns in Canada recently declared the second highest dividend in five years, a total sum of $2,040,000, approximately, to be distributed in dividends among the shareholders of these concerns.

I have in my constituency near the village of Penhold one of the service flying training schools. I have been given to understand that when sites were being selected for the establishment of these schools the engineers were the ones who determined the location and that a field would not be established in a certain constituency just because a Liberal member of parliament happened to reside there. I am satisfied that the practice of having the engineers determine the location is the proper one, and if that is so I would say to the government, for goodness sake send a letter to the defeated candidate in my constituency and to certain newspapers who are building him up for the next election, telling them that it is the engineers who determine the location, for apparently they do not know it. The people of my district are very happy that that school is being established there. We know that it has had a beneficial effect in reducing local unemployment and that it has stimulated business in the vicinity. But I have had disturbing reports about the part being played in the hiring of men by a certain member of the executive of the Edmonton Liberal Association. I am not making any charges and therefore I mention no names, but these disturbing reports have come to me from many quarters, and believe me, if it is at all possible I shall run them down.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Go ahead.

Mr. HANSELL: Agreed.

Mr. SHAW: Thank you, I shall take just a moment, Mr. Speaker. In the city of Red Deer, in my constituency, we have one of the thirty-day training schools—I know of no better name—and I may say that we are happy to have it there. I had occasion to be in Red Deer on the morning of October 9, when several hundred of these boys detrained at that point, and I was amused to see them march down the avenue; I wondered just how long it would be before they would appear like real soldiers. I happened to be in Red Deer two or three weeks later, and I was particularly pleased to see what grand work had been done in the training of these boys. A good deal of credit is due the officers in charge for their accomplishments. On two occasions I went into the camp. I found among the boys no general resentment at having had to go to camp, but rather they took it like good sports. I had, however, a number of complaints. But I know that the scheme is only in its infancy, and that everything had to be rushed just prior to the opening of the camp. So may I say, Mr. Speaker, this final word, that while I am not lodging any criticism of the camp at the present time, I reserve the right to criticize whenever I believe that criticism is due.

Mr. J. E. S. EMMANUEL D'ANJOU (Rimouski): (Translation) Mr. Speaker, it is not without deep emotion that I rise to address the house after an absence of sixteen years. Indeed, I was fortunate enough to be elected in 1917 to represent the electoral division of Rimouski in this house where I sat until 1924. In 1940 the electors of the same county of Rimouski did me the honour of choosing me as their candidate in circumstances almost identical with those of 1917. At that time Canada was at war and conscription was in force. In 1940 Canada is taking part in the war, but, thank God, there is no conscription for overseas service. I came forward as a candidate in Rimouski with the same programme that I had in 1917. I was the candidate of the Liberal party led by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), and it is as such that I conducted my campaign. I told my electors that I was the official candidate of the King-Lapointe Liberal party. I have come to this house to give my full support to the government in its free and voluntary war effort.

In 1917 I stated to my electors of Rimouski that I was opposed to compulsory military service overseas, and I told them the same thing this year. I declared on many occasions, however, that should circumstances require it I would be the first to shed my blood for the defence of Canada, but that I should refuse to do so outside the country. My views have not changed. I have pledged myself to oppose in this house any move to impose conscription for service overseas, and that promise I will keep. The following words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier represent my views:

> Canada first, Canada always, Canada only.

However, when the mobilization act was placed before parliament I did not hesitate to support it. Section 3 of this act is quite clear:

> The powers conferred by the next preceding section may not be exercised for the purpose of requiring persons to serve in the military, naval or air forces outside of Canada and the territorial waters thereof.

My constituents have recognized with me the timeliness of that mobilization act providing solely for the defence in Canada. Those who live in my constituency are justly proud to number among their own people two gallant soldiers, Jean Brillant and Joseph Kable, who, during the last war, had the honour of winning the highest military decoration, the Victoria Cross. How many constituencies in Canada can boast of men to whom such honours have been awarded? I am proud of representing in this house a constituency where national registration has given such splendid results. Every one heeded the call and the registration was complete. Such a wonderful result was largely due to the wise and enlightened directions given by the priests of my constituency, to whom I tender my respectful and sincere thanks. Since the beginning of the session, much has been said about our participation in the war and our war effort but although Canada is at war, we must not overlook the problem of agriculture which is of vital concern to all parts of our dominion. Many hon. members who have preceded me have dealt with agriculture and, I, for one, represent a constituency where agriculture is very progressive, and I should consider myself unfaithful to my duty if I did not deal with this subject to-night. Last year, I requested the Minister of Agriculture to grant, as had been done previously, a sum of $2,500 to the local exhibition in the county of Rimouski.

The grant was refused on account of the heavy expenses which the war entailed. Therefore the exhibition was cancelled. As a rule this exhibition is held in the centre of the county of Rimouski and all the farmers cooperate in sending their various products. Notwithstanding the wide character which the war has assumed, I would request the Minister of Agriculture to grant that amount as he formerly did. He would thus do something useful. While our soldiers are the nation's defenders, the tillers of the soil are not without importance. In order to enable our soldiers to fight, we must feed them and the farmers have to supply them with the necessary foodstuffs. Land is the great provider and it seems to me that without lessening our war effort we should, as far as possible, help the farmers and encourage them as we have done in the past.

Like all those who have preceded me, I must offer my congratulations to the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada for having met the President of the United States and concluded with him an agreement regarding the joint defence of the two countries, since we Canadians are also, after a fashion, Americans. Canada is an American country and it seems to my mind only fair and logical that such an agreement should have been signed. I am convinced that all Canadians, whatever their racial origin, were extremely pleased at the meeting of these two statesmen and heartily approve the agreement arrived at.

I also wish to congratulate and thank the government for having established in Rimouski county a training camp and flying field. I am very grateful to the Minister of National Defence for Air, thanks to whose good offices we were able to obtain these facilities. The establishment of a training camp and flying field in Rimouski county has enormously helped the training of our young men, and has been welcomed by the whole population.

I listened the other night to the excellent speech given in French by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Chambers). In my opinion, the hon. member thereby gave a lesson to a great many members from the province of Quebec who, either through snobbery or for other reasons unknown to me, rarely speak French in this house. When one wishes to preserve a right, it has always been my belief that he must exercise it. Some may consider the matter unimportant; yet I remember an occasion in 1924, the Hon. Mr. Lemieux was speaker at the time, when I arose to make some statement in the house and, turning my eyes towards the clerk's desk, I saw on it a calendar printed in English only. I then asked the Hon. Mr. Lemieux to be kind enough to give us the bilingual calendar. Two days later we had it. After an absence of sixteen years I returned to the house and, upon entering this chamber, my first impulse was to look at this same calendar to see if it was still bilingual. I am pleased to observe that it is. While visiting the senate chamber the other day, I noticed that their calendar is not bilingual. I trust that some senator from the province of Quebec will be found to request a new one similar to that of the House of Commons.

I also wish to congratulate the government for the excellent appointments it has made in recent weeks. There is always a great deal of eagerness to criticize the government, yet its accomplishmnts are rarely mentioned. There is nothing like comparison to establish which side has been more beneficial to the country. A close study of the different parties that have held power in Canada and of the various governments which have administered the country since confederation will convince us, and I refer especially to all French-Canadians residing in the province of Quebec, that we have enjoyed under Liberal administrations wider recognition of our rights than under Conservative regimes.

Therefore I say that when the government show their willingness to recognize our rights, we should at least have the decency to congratulate them instead of forever criticizing them. As I said, our government have recently made a few commendable appointments. They have appointed Mr. Sirois to the Unemployment Insurance commission. They have appointed Mr. Edmond Cloutier to the position of King's Printer. They have appointed Mr. Leduc to the Supreme Court. And there are many more appointments that I might mention. While admitting that we do not fully enjoy our rights in this country, we should never fail, when the occasion arises, to express our gratitude to the government for whatever they do along that line.

I take this opportunity to congratulate the right hon. the Prime Minister of this country for the splendid speech he delivered the other day and especially for what he said about France. He said that the French-Canadians, and more particularly those who live in the province of Quebec, now have the honour of perpetuating French culture not only in Canada but in the world. On that occasion, the Prime Minister spoke as a great Canadian. But, after all, blood will tell. The right hon. the Prime Minister of this country is the grandson of William Lyon Mackenzie, the patriot who in 1837 fought alongside Papineau for the defence of our most cherished rights. I am sure that French-

Canadians from the province of Quebec and from all Canada will be grateful to the right hon. Prime Minister for the stirring words he spoke on behalf of France. No, Mr. Speaker, France is not dead and will not die. The France of the martyrs, and the missionaries—France, the eldest daughter of the church, cannot die. She will arise, radiant as before. The France who brought to Canada not only the torch of civilization but also the cross of Christ, will arise again in all her glory, for, I repeat, France cannot die.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, we French-Canadians are not free from defects. The defects of our qualities, perhaps. As I was just saying, we do not always recognize merit where there is merit. The statesman who is the Prime Minister's chief lieutenant—I refer to the right hon. the Minister of Justice—is the subject of considerable attack, not only in certain sections of Canada but also in the province of Quebec. Political failures unworthy of unloosening his shoe-strings are constantly attacking this man who, as he stated in his radio addresses, is our defender. When congratulating the government on their recent appointments from the French-Canadian point of view, I saw in these appointments the hand of the Minister of Justice. Instead of doing justice to our public men while they are living, we always wait till they are dead. To-day we render justice to Chapleau, Mercier and Laurier. I suppose justice will be done to the Minister of Justice after his death. He will occupy a high place in the history of our country. Monuments have been erected to the memory of Laurier and Mercier. Lapointe will have his monument, carved in the granite of the Rocky mountains. That monument will remind our grandchildren and great grandchildren that the Minister of Justice was a great Canadian, a benefactor of his race. If we always kept in mind the motto of the province of Quebec "I remember", we should not forget those who have shed lustre upon our race and who have fought for our rights. I pray the Lord to give long life to the right hon. Minister of Justice, who has inherited Laurier's unblemished mantle, so that he may remain for many years at the helm of our country, not only in the best interests of Canadians of all nationalities, but to ensure that our rights, the rights of French-Canadians of the province of Quebec shall be respected.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I have been happy to do justice to the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada and especially to a man who is denied justice, but whose name shall be written in gold in the history of our country, the right hon. Minister of Justice.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUSPENSION OF SPECIAL ORDER, TO PROCEED TO QUESTIONS AND MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on Monday I intimated that if the house would give its unanimous consent the government would be prepared to-day to have a motion presented which would enable us to proceed to the orders respecting questions and notices of motions for the production of papers before continuing the debate on the address. I therefore move:

That consideration of the special order relative to the debate on the address to His Excellency be suspended until the house has proceeded to the orders respecting questions and notices of motions for the production of papers standing on the order paper.

Motion agreed to.

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF MAIN ESTIMATES, 1941-42

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) if he will bring down, as soon as this debate is over, the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1942. I need scarcely say that it would be a great convenience to members if they could have them before the Christmas holidays.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Perhaps I had better answer that question. The house will have to wait until we have concluded the debate on the address to see whether or not the estimates can be brought down before we adjourn. I am not in a position to give an answer to my hon. friend at the moment, but the matter is receiving consideration.

WAR-TIME REQUIREMENTS BOARD

INQUIRY AS TO CREATION OF NEW BODY TO SUPERVISE WAR PRODUCTION

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister if at a later date, possibly not to-day, he will be good enough to give to the house and the country a statement with respect to the new war board which has been or is about to be created, headed by Mr. MacMillan, to which I made reference last week.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am not sure that the question my hon. friend has asked does not refer to a matter with which the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) will deal to-day.

2. Were they granted an entry allowing them to settle in Canada indefinitely?

3. Were they allowed into Canada with the view of their going into business or with the view of obtaining a position or positions comparable to their previous training or experience?

4. What country were they nationals of, previous to their entry?

5. Did any person or persons act as sponsors for them, and, if so, who were they?

6. Before being allowed legal entry, were the Canadian authorities aware of their connections in Germany with any financial institutions in that country?

7. What was the exact date of their arrival to Canada?

8. Was one Erich Grunebaum employed by the foreign exchange control board? If so, what was the exact date of his employment, and the name of the person or persons recommending him for such employment?

Erich Grunebaum has not been employed by the foreign exchange control board at any time but Kurt Grunebaum, his brother, was on the staff of the board serving in a routine capacity from October 5, 1939, to May 22, 1940. He had been added to the staff of the board only after a searching examination of his antecedents and credentials which had revealed that he had left Germany because of the anti-Semitic measures of the German government. He applied directly to the board and offered his services without salary in gratitude to and appreciation of the country which had offered him a home.

9. In his capacity as a partner in a well-known banking house, Simon Hirschland, Essen, Germany, Kurt Grunebaum had acquired a knowledge of foreign banking and foreign exchange control which was of service to the board while the Canadian staff was being organized. His services to the board were quite satisfactory during the short period of his employment. He has not been associated with the board in any way since leaving the board on May 22, 1940.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT—STATISTICS

Mr. ESLING:

What is the estimated aggregate revenue from employers and the estimated aggregate revenue from employees annually under the operation of the Unemployment Insurance Act?

Mr. McLARTY:

On page 6 of the actuarial report relating to the Unemployment Insurance Act, the following statement is made:

"On the basis of a contributory population in 1941 of 2,100,000, and of an average number of weeks of employment per person equal to that assumed for the purposes of estimating contributions, the total contributions for the year would be approximately $58,500,000 being approximately $9,700,000 by the government and approximately $24,400,000 each by employers and employed persons. The tentative nature of these estimates will be apparent; they relate to an average year only, and few years are average in the matter of employment and unemployment."

With the increase in the number of persons employed in industry and the annual amount of employment obtained for each of those persons, it is probable that these estimates may have to be increased during the early operation of the act.

Mr. JACKMAN:

1. How large a personnel is now contemplated under the Unemployment Insurance Act?

2. How many of these will be taken over from existing provincial employment agencies?

3. How many of these will be taken over from other dominion government departments whose ordinary peace time activities have been curtailed or are temporarily in abeyance?

4. How many of this personnel will be located at the place of the head administrative office?

5. At what other centres will the remainder of the personnel be located, and approximately how many at each?

6. Initially, at what points will labour exchanges be established, and at what points will training centres be established?

Mr. McLARTY:

1. On page 5 of the evidence before the special committee on the unemployment insurance bill, it was stated: "It is impossible to make an exact estimate of the staff, but our feeling has been that it would not run much more than three thousand, even with the increased coverage that I have spoken of from one million six hundred thousand to two million one hundred thousand." In view of the increase in the number of persons likely to come under the act, there might have to be some adjustment in this figure.

2. This matter is at present being negotiated with the provinces.

3. The civil service commission is at present advertising some of the staff positions but no appointments have yet been made.

4. Unable to determine at present.

5. On page 5 of the evidence before the special committee on the unemployment insurance bill, the following statement is made: "We have estimated that there will be some eighty-three principal offices scattered throughout the country. In some of the larger cities more than one will be in the same centre. But we have estimated some eighty-three principal local offices and some fifteen hundred sub offices for the handling of the employment service and of the unemployment insurance aspects of the legislation together, because these matters will be taken care of in the same offices." It is anticipated that industrial areas with over 10,000 population will have a full-time office.

6. Covered by answer to previous question. No training centres will be operated by the unemployment insurance commission itself, but they will make use of existing facilities.

[Mr. McLarty.]

Mr. BENCE:

1. How many appointments have been made to positions under the Unemployment Insurance Act?

2. What are the names of such appointees?

3. What are the salaries and allowances of each such appointee?

Mr. McLARTY:

1. Three. No other permanent appointments have been made. In order to expedite the work the services of certain employees of the labour department have been utilized.

2. Dr. Joseph Sirois, chairman; Allan M. Mitchell, commissioner; R. J. Tallon, commissioner.

3. Salaries: Dr. Sirois, $12,000 per annum; Mr. Tallon, $8,000 per annum; Mr. Mitchell, $8,000 per annum; together with reasonable travelling expenses.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY—CONTRACTS

Mr. HAZEN:

1. What is the total value of the contracts let by the Department of Munitions and Supply and its predecessor purchasing bodies since war was declared to date for (a) war material and supplies of all kinds; (b) construction contracts?

2. What is the total value of the contracts let by the Department of Munitions and Supply and its predecessor purchasing bodies since war broke out to date in the province of New Brunswick to persons or companies for (a) war materials and supplies of all kinds; (b) construction contracts?

3. What are the names of the persons or companies to whom these contracts have been let in New Brunswick by the Department of Munitions and Supply and its predecessor purchasing bodies since war was declared, what was the nature of the goods or services contracted for in each case, when was the contract entered into, and what was the price of each contract?

Mr. HOWE: I desire to call the attention of the house to section 3 of this question. I have the answer in these closely typed pages under that number. In order to put that in a form to give my hon. friend, each page must be typed and decoded. These are in a code which we use for departmental records, and it will take weeks of stenographic work to prepare this information; I am sure that after my hon. friend has it he will have no information which is not contained in the monthly reports of contracts.

As far as sections 1 and 2 of this question are concerned, I hope to give the information when I speak later on; and in view of the impossibility of answering section 3, I would ask that the question be dropped.

Question dropped.

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

Will the government grant free transportation to all troops other than commissioned officers of the army, air force and navy entitled to Christmas leave or furlough in Canada?

Mr. SPEAKER: Answered.

FUR SEAL CONVENTION, 1911

Mr. REID:

1. Has the Canadian government received any information or notification from either Great Britain or Japan, of Japan's intention to terminate that country's agreement to the fur seal treaty affecting fur seals in the north Pacific waters?

2. If so, when would any such proposed termination take effect, and further, what reasons are being given by Japan for her proposed withdrawal from the treaty?

3. When was the treaty first signed or effected, and what countries are signatories to the treaty?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. The Canadian government received information, both from the charge d'affaires of the Canadian legation at Tokyo and from the government of the United Kingdom, through the High Commissioner for Canada, that the Japanese government were considering the termination of the fur seal convention, 1911.

2. Formal announcement of abrogation of this convention was made by the Japanese foreign office on the 23rd October, 1940, the abrogation to be effective on the 23rd October, 1941. The reason given for Japanese withdrawal from the convention was the wish to prevent further inroads made on the fishing industry by the rapidly increasing seal herds.

3. The convention for the preservation and protection of the fur seals in the north Pacific ocean was signed at Washington, D.C., on the 7th of July, 1911. Ratifications were deposited at Washington on the 12th December, 1911. The convention was signed on behalf of His Majesty the King and also on behalf of the United States, Russia and Japan.

I do not see in the note of the report that his suggestion involves any change in the present practice. I will, however, consider the matter.

Mr. BOUCHER:

What action is proposed by the government to meet the objection taken by the auditor general in his report for the year ending March 31, 1940, at page 288, to a payment of $4,995 for the excavation of rock at the customs house site at the Thousand Islands bridge?

Mr. GIBSON:

1. No further action is deemed necessary.

2. The Thousand Islands bridge authority has constructed entirely at their own expense all customs and immigration buildings required by charter or order in council at the Canadian terminal, including a warehouse with a special division for the handling of bus passengers.

3. The Department of National Revenue has not contributed in any way whatever to the cost of these structures, but acting jointly with the provincial highway authorities, we have improved the northern entrance to the customs detention yard.

4. This improvement was carried out for the following reasons:

(a) Elimination of existing danger of a "blind curve" at the entrance to the customs detention yard; including safety factor for customs officers examining cars in customs detention yard;

(b) Improved accessibility to existing and proposed customs facilities;

(c) Improved visibility essential to control of traffic by customs officers.

5. The rock removed under contract was not located on premises of the Thousand Islands bridge authority, but on the public highway, and this land stands in the name of His Majesty the King, in the right of the province of Ontario.

3. These payments consist mainly of commissions earned by postmasters at rural post offices on their stamp sales, etc. As the commissions fluctuate at each individual point no accurate estimate can be given in advance as to the amount required. Mr. HAZEN:

1. How many persons were registered in each constituency in Canada on August 19th, 20th and 21st last?
2. Of the number registered in each constituency, how many were males and how many females?
3. What was the cost in each constituency of the registration?

SALT FISH BOARD—DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS

Mr. ROY:

1. What were the names of the recipients of deficiency payments made by the salt fish board for the fiscal year 1939-40, to fishermen of Sainte-Madeleine, Mont-Louis, St-Joachim, Ste-Anne-des-Monts, Cap-Chat, Capucins and Méchins, Gaspé county, and how much was paid to each?
2. What was the total amount paid under this heading in the county of Gaspé in 1939-40?
3. What fish dealers or agents recommended or testified as to the quantities for which such payments were made to the fishermen?
4. What was the total amount paid upon recommendation of each of these individuals?

FISHING GEAR AND SUPPLIES TO NEEDY FISHERMEN

Mr. ROY:

1. What are the names of the needy fishermen who received fishing gear and supplies, and for what amount each, out of the total of $2,750 paid to D. Bouchard Ltée, of Ste-Anne-des-Monts, Gaspé county, during the fiscal year 1939-40, as shown in sessional paper No. 114, tabled Thursday, November 14, 1940, and what did such gear and supplies consist of?
2. What are the names of the needy fishermen who received fishing gear and supplies, and for what amount each, out of the total of $1,316 paid to M. A. Beaulieu, and $781 paid to Anicet Létourneau, both of Mont-Louis, Gaspé county, in the said year, as shown in the same sessional paper, and what did such gear and supplies consist of?

MAGDALEN ISLANDS FISHERMEN

Mr. ROY:

1. Has the government received any request for help from the needy people of the Magdalen islands?
2. If so, has the government replied, and in what way?

[Mr. Graydon.]

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

WHEAT COOPERATIVE MARKETING ACT—VOLUNTARY POOLS

Mr. COLDWELL:

For a return showing: the number of voluntary pools formed under the provisions of the Wheat Cooperative Marketing Act, 1939, together with the names and addresses of such pools and the names of elevator companies forming each of the pools;

Also a statement for each pool showing: (a) gross sales price per bushel, basis Fort William; (b) sales expense and operating expenses per bushel; (c) net sales prices per bushel; (d) initial payment per bushel to farmer; (e) interim payment per bushel to farmer; (f) net final payment per bushel to farmer.

Mr. GARDINER: Some of this information may be confidential and the order will be complied with except in so far as it involves such information.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried with that proviso.

NATIONAL WAR SERVICES—WINNIPEG ORGANIZATION

Mr. MAYBANK:

For a return showing: the name, address, age, sex and marital condition of every employee in the office of the divisional registrar under the national war services organization at Winnipeg, Manitoba;

Also a statement showing whether there are any married women so employed, and whether any such have husbands gainfully employed, and, if so, their names;

Also a statement showing whether any of such employees are in receipt of any government annuity, either dominion, provincial or municipal, and, if so, the name of such person or persons, the nature of such payment and the amount thereof;

And also a statement showing whether any of the said employees are returned soldiers, and, if so, what are their names.

NATIONAL RESOURCES MOBILIZATION ACT—RULES AND REGULATIONS

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all rules and regulations issued by order in council or otherwise under the War-time Service Act, 1940.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is no such act as the war-time service act, 1940. I imagine the hon. member meant the National Resources Mobilization Act. If so, the minister informs me that most of the orders and regulations have already been tabled but there are probably some that may have been passed recently, and in that event the minister will have them tabled forthwith.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Could the motion stand until we ascertain just what the hon. member means? I was myself rather puzzled by it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It can stand.

Motion stands.

HINCHCLIFFE, SASK., POST OFFICE

Mr. NICHOLSON:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, petitions, recommendations and other documents in the possession of the Post Office Department, dated during the past year, in connection with the change of postmaster at Hinchcliffe, Saskatchewan.

NON-INTEREST WAR LOAN SUBSCRIPTIONS

Mr. COLDWELL:

For a return showing: (1) number of subscriptions to interest-free war loans; (2) average amount of such subscriptions; (3) a list of such subscriptions with the amounts subscribed by each subscriber; (4) what steps the minister has taken to popularize voluntary non-interest war loan subscriptions.

Mr. ILSLEY: The first two parts of this motion are all right so far as I am concerned, but I do not think the third and fourth can properly be moved for in the house. The list of subscriptions, with the amount subscribed by each subscriber, could not be given. We asked subscribers whether they would like to have their names published, whether they were willing to have the government give such publicity, and some of them did not wish to have that done. As regards the fourth part of the motion, as to what steps the minister has taken to popularize voluntary non-interest war loan subscriptions, that is a question which is hardly susceptible of precise answer in a return, nor is it usual to ask such questions in motions for returns. I suggest that the motion pass as regards clauses 1 and 2.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—ALAN B. PLAUNT

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

For a copy of all correspondence, reports, memoranda and other documents passing between Alan B. Plaunt, formerly a member of the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and any official of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation or the Minister of Transport or any other minister, since January 1, 1939.

Mr. COLDWELL:

For a copy of the order in council accepting the resignation of Alan B. Plaunt, formerly a member of the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Commission, which, according to a statement made by the Honourable C. D. Howe at Quebec, on October 25, 1940, was accepted about three weeks prior to that date.

Mr. HOWE: Return tabled.

ATTITUDE OF CANADA IN THE EVENT OF WAR BETWEEN HIS MAJESTY AND ANY OTHER POWER

Mr. HAZEN:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, cables and other documents exchanged between His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom and His Majesty's government in Canada from September 1, 1938, to September 15, 1939, relating to the attitude of Canada in the event of an outbreak of hostilities between His Majesty and any other power.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I must point out, with respect to this motion, in the first place that it would be necessary to obtain the consent of his majesty's government in the United Kingdom for the production of any of the documents or correspondence requested but altogether apart from that I do not think that either his majesty's government in the United Kingdom or his majesty's government in Canada would at the present time deem it advisable to make public any correspondence relating to the attitude of Canada in the event of an outbreak of hostilities between his majesty and any other power. Obviously correspondence which would deal with such a matter would include references to many phases of the question, a part of which would certainly be likely to occasion many difficulties, if such correspondence were made public. The order will have to be denied.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is there correspondence, and are there other documents?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot say. I would say to my hon. friend that I doubt very much whether it would be advisable for me to say either yes or no to that particular question.

CUSTOMS ACT—VALUES FOR DUTY UNDER SECTION 43

Mr. McGREGOR:

For a copy of all orders in council passed since October 23, 1935, authorizing the Minister of National Revenue to fix values for duty under Section 43 of the Customs Act, together with any orders made by the Minister of National Revenue pursuant to such orders in council.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAYS

Mr. CASSELMAN (Grenville-Dundas):

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the government of Canada and province of Ontario or between any officials of the said governments from January 1, 1938, up to this present date in connection with the St. Lawrence waterways.

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the government of Canada and that of the United States or between any officials of said governments either through the departments or commissioners from January 1, 1938, up to this present date, in connection with the St. Lawrence waterways.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The first motion refers more particularly to correspondence between the province of Ontario and the dominion government with respect to the St. Lawrence waterway since January 1, 1938. The next motion is almost identical except that it refers to correspondence between the United States government and the government of Canada with respect to St. Lawrence waterway. Perhaps I should say that such discussions as there have been on this matter thus far have been largely provisional. The discussions are not concluded. Such part of the transactions as have been concluded have been recorded and the records in reference thereto have already been tabled. Such discussion as has taken place has been oral in the nature of conferences and there is no further correspondence that it would be possible to table at this time.

Mr. HOMUTH: Is there no definite agreement yet?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The papers I tabled a day or two ago indicate the nature of the agreement that has been reached.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And that is the only agreement up to date?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

DIPLOMATIC PRIVILEGES OR IMMUNITIES

Mr. COLDWELL:

For a return showing the names, addresses and nationalities of all persons or representatives of foreign states and powers who enjoy diplomatic privileges or immunities in Canada at the present time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Return tabled.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S WARRANTS

Mr. CASSELMAN (Grenville-Dundas):

For a copy of all orders in council authorizing issuance of governor general's warrants since August 1, 1939, together with a statement showing the amount expended under each warrant issued.

[Mr. McGregor.]

DOLLAR-A-YEAR MEN ON GOVERNMENT WORK

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

For a return showing: (a) the names of all persons who are or have at any time been engaged in government work as so-called "dollar-a-year men"; (b) the nature of the duties performed by each such person; (c) the ordinary peace-time occupation of each such person; (d) the amount of travelling expenses and living allowances paid to each such person from the date of their appointment until the present, and the daily rate of such allowances.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT—ACREAGE BONUS IN TOWNSHIP 39, RANGE 16, WEST OF FOURTH MERIDIAN

Mr. MARSHALL:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, affidavits and other documents in the possession of the government, dated from November 1, 1939, to October 31, 1940, regarding the application for the acreage bonus in township 39, range 16, W. 4th M.

Mr. GARDINER: It was agreed by the house last session that it would not be wise to produce affidavits made by individuals in connection with the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I would suggest that the order be amended to leave out the word "affidavits".

COMMONWEALTH AIR TRAINING PLAN—ELEMENTARY FLYING SCHOOLS

Mr. MacINNIS:

For a copy of the contract or contracts entered into by the Department of National Defence for Air, or any other department, with any private concern or association relative to the training in and the control and operation of the elementary flying schools established under the empire air training plan.

Mr. POWER: Return tabled.

MILITARY TRAINING OF UNIVERSITY STUDENTS

Mr. COLDWELL:

For a copy of all correspondence, reports, memoranda and other documents exchanged between the government or any of its departments and the universities, regarding an agreement respecting military training of university students.

RELEASE OF INTERNED ALIENS

Mr. BOUCHER:

For a return showing the number of persons in each of the following categories: Germans, Italians, Communists, National Unity Party, who have been released from internment since July 27, 1940.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I would like this motion to stand. Last year the parliamentary committee reported that among other requirements the Minister of Justice should make a report to parliament as to (a) the number of persons detained under orders made pursuant to this regulation; and (b) the number of cases, if any, in which the minister declined to follow the advice of any advisory committee which may be appointed under the next parliamentary regulation. This has been done. This motion asks for other information as to the classification of the various internees with regard to their race, political opinions and similar matters. I should like to consult with my advisers as to whether it is in the public interest to give or withhold this information.

I may also say that it is the intention to reappoint at this session the parliamentary committee which sat on the defence of Canada regulations, and to consider whether some changes are advisable. That committee might be asked to pass upon the advisability of having a more complete report. I should, however, like to consider this motion before it is passed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I point out that this motion does not ask for names, it asks only for numbers. It seems to me it would be illogical to give the numbers of those interned in the various categories and refuse to give the numbers let out.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): But it asks for racial classification and whether they are communists or members of the Arcand party and matters of that kind.

Motion stands.

CAP-DE-LA-MADELEINE ELEMENTARY FLYING SCHOOL

Mr. ROY:

For a copy of contract or contracts between the Department of National Defence for Air and Quebec Airways Training Limited for construction of an elementary flying school at Cap-de-la-Madeleine.

Mr. POWER: Return tabled.

DAYLIGHT SAVING TIME—EXTENSION

Mr. STOKES:

For a copy of all orders in council relating to the extension of daylight saving time, together with any regulations made thereunder by the power controller; and for a copy of all letters, memoranda, and other documents, since August 1, 1940 to date, passing between the power controller and/or the chairman or secretary of the wartime industries control board and any member or official of the dominion government or any member or official of a provincial government or of a provincial hydro-electric system, relating to the extension of daylight saving time.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

INQUIRY AS TO DECLARING 1940-41 AN EMERGENCY YEAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). Has the government yet considered the advisability of bringing into effect section 3 of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1940, by declaring 1940 an emergency year?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The government have decided to declare the year 1940-41 an emergency year as provided for under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

Mr. PERLEY: Pursuant to the minister's statement that this will be declared an emergency year, will he state that the payments provided for in this act will be made in December instead of some time next year?

Mr. GARDINER: The payments under the act will be made in accordance with the terms of the act.

Mr. PERLEY: That is good news; it never has been so in the past.

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): In view of the fact that the western provinces grew 550,000,000 bushels of wheat last year, just what constitutes an emergency year?

LABOUR DISPUTE

CHRYSLER PLANT AT WINDSOR—EFFECT UPON PICKETING OF DECLARING PREMISES A PROTECTED AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Is the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) now in a position to reply to the question I asked last Thursday with regard to the application of the defence of Canada regulations to people picketing in protected areas?

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour): The hon. member was kind enough to notify me of his intention of asking this question.

It is primarily, of course, a matter of legal interpretation, and is at present before the courts. I understand a decision was given in connection with it yesterday in Windsor, but I have not been advised as to the basis of the decision or the reasons for it. Until that information is available and until I have had the advantage of an opinion from the Department of Justice, I believe it would be most inadvisable for me to express any opinion.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): May I ask a supplementary question? Did the government intend or contemplate that this regulation should be or could be used to prevent peaceful picketing by organized labour?

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): From section 27 of the defence of Canada regulations I should like to quote these words:

> Provided that a person shall not be guilty of an offence under this regulation by reason only of his taking part in, or peacefully persuading any other person to take part in, a strike.

I cannot say more than that, because I really do not know the facts with regard to this case.

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN "CANADIAN BUSINESS" ADVOCATING THE ADOPTION OF COMMUNISM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): May I ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) if he is in a position now to answer the question I asked yesterday?

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The article referred to appeared in the magazine of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. That article has been considered, and it does not appear to advocate the adoption of communism in Canada. The answers to the second and third questions are in the negative.

WHEAT

ADDITIONAL PAYMENT TO WESTERN FARMERS ON 1939 CROP CERTIFICATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): On Thursday last the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) stated that the wheat growers of Ontario would receive an added payment on the 1939 wheat certificates. Would the minister tell the house when the western wheat growers may expect an added payment on their 1939 crop certificates?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I think the only reply I can give at the present time is, when there is money available for distribution.

[Mr. McLarty.]

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Tuesday, November 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Brooke Claxton for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Blackmore.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, in attempting to prepare a statement that will convey to hon. members an appreciation of the work of the Department of Munitions and Supply, my difficulty is to determine what can be said and what cannot be said. My desire is, of course, to give hon. members the fullest possible account of what is being manufactured and the position of each separate project. We must appreciate, however, that anything said here will represent an official report to enemy countries, and for that reason definite production statements are unwise. A recent cable from the dominions office in Great Britain stresses the importance of carefully guarding production figures for munitions and aeroplanes. With this handicap, all that I can hope to do is to give hon. members a general idea of the work in hand, the methods being followed and the barest possible outline of the state of production.

The general broad plan or plans guiding the operations of the Department of Munitions and Supply is set forth in the Munitions and Supply Act and, with the addition of certain amendments of last year, I am happy to say that the plans and policies therein outlined have proved to be adequate to meet the situation as it has developed.

We have been most fortunate in the type of business men and technical experts who now direct the different branches of the department. Our staff is necessarily large, and the work with which it is engaged is highly technical. I think it is amazing that so competent a personnel could have been built up in so short a time. As weak spots develop we endeavour to find the person to strengthen the particular department, and we are always glad of offers of assistance.

For the past year we in Canada have been converting as rapidly as possible our peacetime economy into an economy of war. We have been striving to direct the total resources of the nation into channels which will enable us to accomplish this objective, and we have striven and are striving to divert an ever-increasing proportion of our production into channels which will promote a war-time economy. We are gradually attempting to divert goods from civil to military uses.

It must be clear to all hon. members that before a plant can be built you must have plans, and these must be carefully drawn. Some time has been necessarily consumed in the obtaining of these plans. The construction period follows, and I am glad to say that we are gradually emerging from that construction period. We have actually some new plants now in production and many more will be in production within the next two or three months.

The problem of obtaining trained personnel to operate these plants is and has been giving us a good deal of concern. Our technical schools in all parts of Canada are giving special courses adapted to the needs of a variety of industries and have proven one of our main sources of recruits for skilled trades. Production teams have been sent to the United Kingdom to study operating technique, while others have been sent to the United States for the same purpose. Continuous studies are being made of the supply of skilled and unskilled labour in all parts of Canada to the end that the movement of labour may be localized as much as possible. The entry of women into certain types of munitions industries is expanding, and it has been found that in operations where deftness rather than strength is required women are often more efficient than men. As time goes on there must necessarily be a movement of employment from luxury or semi-luxury industries to war industries. The Canadian workman readily adapts himself to new types of employment, and we are confident that the plants we are building can and will be adequately manned even though the work in hand is of an entirely new type.

The matter of employment and the relationship between employer and employee has been under constant study by the officers of this department and the Department of Labour. Indeed, as a result of such study the Department of Labour has recently created the interdepartmental committee on labour coordination, and as a further step a war-time requirements board has been set up to formulate such plan or plans as may be necessary to ensure that war needs in the order of their importance shall have priority over all other needs.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is that the board of which Mr. MacMillan is chairman?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. It has been the purpose of the department to mobilize industry from maximum production of war materials. When munitions plants now under construction or being tooled up reach full production, it is my opinion that our productive capacity will have been tested to its practical limit. We are still undertaking new projects, but the location of such projects must now be confined to selected areas that still offer surplus power and labour possibilities. Large concentrations of employment in new projects are no longer possible.

Having in mind the limitations that must be imposed on production figures, it may be worth while to give hon. members a brief general view of the industrial situation in Canada, before discussing particular production programmes.

1. General review. In the last statement which I made in this house with respect to Canada's war effort, toward the close of the last session, I explained that the nature of our problems was changing. I pointed out that, in the first period of the war, the United Kingdom appeared to believe that she would be in a position largely to depend on her own munitions industry. The successive overrunning of Denmark, Norway, Holland, and Belgium, and the collapse of France changed the entire situation. Britain was now left alone in Europe and besieged. All her production was immediately necessary at home. The earlier plans for our joint effort, therefore, had to be revised. Where originally these plans called for special equipment to be supplied to Canada from Great Britain, now alternative sources had to be found in Canada and the United States. Britain's need for supplies from overseas jumped, and Canada was requested to go full speed ahead.

The work which had already been done in Canada greatly facilitated the placing of new orders, and the rapid increase of production. Contracts were awarded with increasing speed. In the first quarter of this year, the number of contracts averaged approximately 1,910 per month; in the second quarter, approximately 4,070 per month; and, in the third quarter, nearly 7,500 per month. During the month of September, contracts were awarded at the average rate of 325 per working day, as compared with 170 per working day in June. As of November 11, the total of orders placed for Canadian account totalled 540 million dollars, and for British account a total of 309 million dollars. Thus, the grand total of orders placed by the Department of Munitions and Supply has reached 849 million dollars. We were not engaged, however, merely in awarding contracts. As a result of the contracts awarded, the tempo of Canadian industry has risen to record heights.

The following comparison of economic indicators, for the month of September, 1940, as compared with September, 1939, is a measure of the increased industrial activity of Canada, resulting directly or indirectly from war orders and of the output of our factories for war purposes:

Indices of Economic Activity
(1926 = 100)

	September, 1939	September, 1940	Percent increase
Physical volume of business	125·8	155·4	24
Industrial production	128·3	167·0	30
Manufacturing production	121·3	159·7	32
Iron and steel production	98·2	242·9	148
Textile production	150·0	182·9	22
Construction	48·6	127·0	161

The increased economic activity is measured further by the following statistics:

Volume of Output

	September, 1939	September, 1940	Per cent increase
Pig iron production ..... tons	65,954	111,020	84
Steel ingots and castings ..... tons	124,384	164,400	32
British Columbia timber ..... board feet	229,000,000	339,000,000	49
Cars and trucks	3,922	15,475	294

Construction contracts for the nine months ending September 30, 1940, amounted to $195,490,000, as compared with $150,781,000 for the corresponding period of 1939—an increase of 30 per cent.

Mr. HOMUTH: Does that include all construction contracts?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. HOMUTH: Air, and all?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. The month of September, 1940, alone showed an increase in construction contracts of 161 per cent over September, 1939.

The acceleration of the air training, militia and other construction programmes incident to our war efforts necessitated the absorption, for war purposes, of a substantial proportion of Canada's construction capacity—equal to about 60 per cent of the capacity used for all purposes in 1938.

Another measure of our war effort, apart from the enormous increase in production of implements of war, is the increase in the exports of Canadian products, particularly to the United Kingdom. Consisting as they do of foods, raw materials and manufactured goods, these exports to Great Britain are an indication of our increasing contributions to the war effort overseas. The aggregate value of exports to the United Kingdom for the nine months ending September, 1940, was $380,817,000, as compared with $242,725,000 in the first nine months of 1939. This shows a very gratifying increase of 56 per cent.

2. The war programme. I now want to turn from the general picture to the more specific features of our war programme, and to present to this house a report on the progress of our programme of expansion of industrial facilities, and production of munitions and war supplies. A great variety of items which we have asked Canadian industry to produce have never before been produced in Canada. Added to the problem of organizing existing productive capacity for maximum output, has been that of constructing and tooling up the plants to produce the diversified equipment of modern warfare, and the bringing of these new plants into production in the shortest possible time.

In so far as possible, it has been the policy of the government to rely upon existing plants for securing adequate supplies of munitions and their components. In many cases, however, the necessary plants did not exist, or, if they existed, their capacities were inadequate, and extensions of existing plants, or the construction of wholly new plants, has been necessary. The policy of the government, in giving financial assistance to expand existing plants, or to build new plants, has been based on the fact that the government is itself the sole purchaser of the production from these plants and, therefore, would itself pay any sums set aside as depreciation in the war period. We have, therefore, in cases where facilities cannot be financed privately, adopted the policy that new construction, or expansion of manufacturing equipment, should be paid for by the government, and ownership retained by the government. In the case of new buildings, we have required that the land be deeded to the government, or leased to the government on satisfactory terms. Where machinery has been placed in an existing building, the machines have been stamped as the property of the government, so that government property can be recovered when its usefulness ceases for the production of munitions.

I should qualify the foregoing statement by saying that circumstances do not always permit us to follow the pattern I have described. We have on occasion found it necessary to expand plants along lines which do not permit the segregation of private property and government property. In such cases it has been our practice to place the operation of the plant in the hands of trustees, whose duty it is to protect the respective interests of private and public investment. Great care has been taken to see that every investment of public funds in plant expansion has been safeguarded as fully as possible, with the purpose that, at the end of the war, public investment will be represented by physical assets that can be segregated and disposed of as may then seem wise. Incidentally, the course we have followed will make it possible immediately to withdraw from industry plants built at public expense, and thus prevent disorganization when purchases must be contracted down to peace-time needs.

The locations of new plants have been chosen for strategic reasons, and with due regard to the availability of raw materials, power and labour.

Mr. GREEN: At this point could the minister tell us roughly the number of plants in each of the geographical divisions of Canada —in the maritimes, central Canada, the prairies and British Columbia—or can he tell us the amounts to be invested in these areas?

Mr. HOWE: I was prepared to give the house that information and I am just coming to that point.

In all, our programme of capital assistance covers 146 projects, aggregating about $255,000,000, with title to the projects vested in the crown. A substantial number of these plants have already been completed and are in production, and work on the remainder is being rushed to completion.

The before-mentioned projects have been financed jointly by Britain and Canada, roughly in proportion to the division of the production. The Canadian proportion of the total is a little over 30 per cent. In these plants, Canadian industry is producing all the chemicals that are used in the manufacture of explosives, and is producing or will be producing some chemicals which have hitherto not been produced in the British empire; it is producing or will be producing almost every type of shell in use in the present war; it is producing or will be producing field guns and gun carriages, naval guns, aircraft and tank machine guns, anti-tank guns, tanks, universal carriers, mechanized transport, training and fighting aeroplanes, and practically all other items of essential equipment to meet the needs of modern mechanized warfare.

Included in the list of new projects are two plants for the manufacture of brass required for the munitions programme, the aggregate capacity of which is more than five times the previously existing capacity in Canada.

Hon. members have shown an interest in the distribution of war orders by provinces, and I am glad to give such information as I can on this, even though I consider that the matter of distribution is secondary to that of obtaining efficient production. It must be borne in mind that hydro-electric power is an essential of low cost production, and that large blocks of surplus power are obtainable only in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. This fact has had much to do with the location of new plants in these two provinces. Studies have been made of the possibilities of every province, and in every case, lack of power has been the obstacle to establishing large industries outside the areas I have mentioned. We have attempted to distribute our orders as widely as possible, and distribution charts are laid on my desk each month with the purpose of ensuring that a reasonable balance is maintained.

I have here a chart which I shall ask to have printed in Hansard, covering the war period up to September 30 last, which shows the distribution of the orders placed by the Department of Munitions and Supply for Canadian account only, divided by provinces. I should point out that the chart does not include British purchases of munitions, aluminum, aeroplanes, steel, steel alloys, lumber, including pit props, aeroplane spruce and dimension timber, and does not include foodstuffs for Britain. The figures I give do not include expenditures made directly through the service departments, including projects built by day labour. Therefore the figures do not represent in any way the full incidence of war-buying in different parts of Canada, but merely show how orders for Canadian account placed by the Department of Munitions and Supply are distributed.

Three sets of figures are given: first, the dollar value of purchases; second, purchases per unit of population; and, third, purchases per $1,000 invested in manufacturing facilities prior to the war.

By investment in manufacturing facilities I mean the value of the factories as compiled by the bureau of statistics. I should say also that the figures do not include sums spent in capital assistance for the building of new plants or expansion of existing plants.

I think it will be of more service to hon. members if I ask to have this chart printed in Hansard rather than attempt to read it in the house:

Under the heading of construction, let me refer now to the joint air training plan.

My colleague the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) has outlined to you the scope of the construction projects associated with the air training plan. Excellent progress has been made in constructing the 100 separate aerodromes required for this plan. While the schedule called for a two-year construction programme, the end of this year will see the whole programme about seven-eighths completed. All airports will have been completed well in advance of the date of opening of the air school, on the accelerated schedule. During the year these airports have been selected, surveyed and built. Practically every unit of dirt-moving equipment, and every asphalt plant, in Canada has been in use throughout the past season. Two hundred sites were reported on, and 150 detailed surveys made, before the 100 airports could be selected. Twenty million yards of earth have been moved; about 170 miles of hard-surfaced runways have been completed, which, if converted into a roadway twenty feet wide, would be 850 miles in length, equivalent to the distance from Moncton to Toronto.

Buildings have been built for the students and personnel, hangars have been constructed, and all the appurtenances to the schools have been provided. To date 36 schools have been completed and are in operation, and buildings for the entire programme will have been completed by next midsummmer.

In addition to the joint air training plan, 37 Royal Canadian Air Force permanent stations have been under construction, 18 of which have now been completed. All these service aerodromes and permanent stations will be completed by the end of March next.

Of the 51 militia projects undertaken, including coast defence batteries, arsenals, magazines, military training centres, conversion of buildings, storehouses and temporary accommodation, 29 have been completed. The remainder, it is expected will be completed by March 31 next. This does not include 29 projects undertaken by the Department of National Defence by day labour, the material for which was purchased by the Department of Munitions and Supply.

Of the 21 naval projects undertaken, including anti-submarine booms, torpedo nets, blocking of channel, barrack buildings, boathouses, storehouses, magazines and fire alarm systems, 15 have been completed, and the remainder will be completed by June, 1941.

Under the heading of other projects, our construction division is also supervising 11 projects involving plant extensions for the manufacture of arms and ammunition, and new plants for the manufacture and repair of aircraft, precision and optical instruments.

The aggregate value of the aforementioned construction programme is approximately $89,000,000.

This does not include projects under the supervision of Allied War Supplies Corporation, nor does it include the plants extended by many private companies under subvention from the government.

With regard to aircraft production, our aircraft industry is expanding rapidly and is producing planes to meet the requirements of the joint air training plan, and is also building operational aeroplanes for Great Britain and Canada. The output of planes is expanding each week in this new Canadian industry. Existing plants have been extended and new plants have been, and are being, constructed. The industry is in process of being reorganized on a production line basis. Canada is now building complete aeroplanes except for the engines, and, for the present, engines are being purchased either in the United States or in Great Britain. Production covers practically every type of training plane in use in Canada and several types of operational planes.

Hon. members will wish to have an explanation of why Canada has not as yet undertaken the manufacture of aeroplane engines. I must accept sole responsibility for the situation as it is to-day. I think that I cannot fairly be accused of reluctance to undertake large expenditures for war purposes, but I do wish to be sure that any of our undertakings can be brought to a successful conclusion and meet the need for which it is intended. The manufacture of areoplane engines involves an enormous capital expenditure, a very heavy drain on available supplies of machine tools, and a very large number of highly skilled workmen. Production cannot be obtained in less than a period of eighteen months, and, when production is obtained, it will be for only one size and type of engine, whereas Canada uses some ten sizes of engine and two different types. It had seemed to me that in the present state of our industrial production we would be well advised to purchase aeroplane engines outside Canada, rather than to attempt to build them. I am now making a fresh study of the situation in the light of recent developments in the United States. My new attitude has been influenced by the fact that Canada is now in position to produce certain essential components that formerly would have had to be imported, and further by the fact that our machine tool situation is becoming less difficult. Whether we can now undertake to build aeroplane engines in Canada will depend on whether the necessary machine tools can be made available from United States sources.

With regard to shipbuilding, I am glad to report that our programme is well ahead of schedule. You will recall that in my last report to the house the shipbuilding programme involved the construction of 54 corvettes on Canadian account and 10 corvettes on British account, and 28 minesweepers on Canadian account, all to be delivered in 1940 and 1941. All scheduled deliveries for 1940 will be maintained, and work on boats scheduled for delivery in 1941 is well advanced.

Since I last addressed the house, contracts for 10 additional mine sweepers, diesel driven, have been awarded for delivery in 1941. In addition to the above, 181 smaller vessels of various types have been delivered, including refuelling gasoline scows, aircraft tenders, bomb-loading tenders, salvage boats, scows and supply boats. In addition, we have acquired and converted a number of merchant ships, yachts and miscellaneous boats. I may remind the house that one of these converted vessels recently took a very valuable enemy prize.

We have recently completed negotiations for the construction in Canada of 18 large merchant vessels for British government account, and contracts are in process of being awarded. These boats will be built in our larger shipyards on the St. Lawrence river and Pacific coast.

An additional programme of corvettes and mine sweepers is under consideration.

Sixteen shipyards on the east and west coasts, the St. Lawrence river and great lakes, are engaged in our larger shipbuilding programme, and 25 smaller shipyards are working on the small boat programme. It is estimated that some 14,000 men are empolyed in shipyards and industries associated with the shipbuilding programme.

To deal now with automobile equipment, the mechanization of modern military establishments and the movement of troops and equipment require large numbers of army vehicles of many types. Canada is particularly fortunate in having a well organized and efficient automotive industry. Steps have been taken to tool up that industry for the production of the various types of automotive equipment necessary for mechanized warfare to a productive capacity of about 600 units per day. Some 30,000 military units have been delivered, and orders now on hand will keep the industry employed to capacity until the end of September, 1941.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) stated that I said in Toronto that the industry was then producing 600 units per day of military equipment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I said, you were reported to have said.

Mr. HOWE: My notes indicate that I stated that the production was then about 400 units per day, which was true at that time. To-day production is considerably in excess of 400 units per day, although it has not fully reached its ultimate capacity of 600 units per day.

Reports from Great Britain indicate that Canadian transport equipment is superior to production from any source of supply.

The automotive equipment required for military purposes has involved the construction of two types of special heavy service tires. Canadian industry is being tooled up to produce such tires at the rate of 2,000 tires and tubes per day.

Tanks and Universal Carriers

As to tanks and universal carriers, production of tanks is well advanced and we expect to be in substantial production early in the new year. A Canadian source of armour plate has been developed and we will now produce all the components of the tank except the engines. Arrangements have been made to go into production on the new Anglo-American tank in a very substantial way.

We have also arranged for a very substantial production of universal carriers, and deliveries will begin before the end of the present month. These will be an all-Canadian product.

Munitions

Coming now to munitions, eight plants are actually producing shells, and nineteen are producing shell components. Thirteen other plants are being tooled up for the production of shells and five plants for the production of components. The present producing plants are also being tooled up for increased capacity. Shells now being produced in Canada include the following sizes:

40 millimetre
18-pounder
25-pounder
3·7-inch
4·5 howitzer
4·5 quick-firing
4·5-inch 60-pounder
4-inch
6-inch howitzer
9·2-inch

The results of this tooling up will be to increase the productive capacity to a rate of at least 2,000,000 shells per month.

Canada has not engaged in the manufacture of munitions since the last war, and, therefore, did not have readily available the necessary machine tools or equipment for the production of shells and ammunition, except that produced at dominion arsenals. It has been necessary to provide and tool up the manufacturing capacity that we now have. As the machine tool capacity of Canada is limited, it has been necessary to order large quantities of machine tools in the United States, most of which had to be manufactured.

A round of ammunition includes all the component parts which make up the final product, including shell, cartridge, fuse, base plates, primers, gaines, tracers, driving band, and other components, each of which requires special plant and equipment, as well as skilled labour, for its production.

The first of three shell-filling plants will be in operation before the end of this month, at which time all shell components and the explosives will be available from Canadian manufacture. Canadian shell filling capacity will balance Canadian production of shells.

Plants are also being equipped for the production of aerial bombs, depth charges, smoke floats and pyrotechnics.

In considering the present Canadian programme in the manufacture of guns, it is well to bear in mind that Canada has in the past never manufactured a gun of any type other than the Ross rifle. Prior to the outbreak of war, contracts had been awarded for the Bren gun, 7,000 on Canadian account and 5,000 on British account. Actual production on that contract started last April and substantial quantities of guns and extra barrel assemblies have been delivered. Arrangements have been made to increase the production of Bren guns very largely, and added production is coming in each week.

No other guns are actually being produced as yet, although 40 millimeter Bofors loose barrels are in production. Arrangements have been made for the manufacture of guns and gun carriages in Canada, on Canadian account and British account, of the following types:

40 mm. Bofors anti-aircraft guns
3·7-inch anti-aircraft guns
25-pounder guns and carriages
Colt-Browning aircraft machine guns
Colt-Browning tank machine guns
6-pounder guns for tanks
2-pounder anti-tank guns and carriages
4-inch guns and mountings
12-pounder guns and mountings
4-inch naval guns
6-inch naval guns
Lee-Enfield rifles

Further arrangements have been made for additional types of naval guns and mountings. The result is that Canada will shortly be making practically every type of gun in use in the present war.

The leader of the opposition has asked the question—why Canada is not producing Lewis guns. The answer is that we are producing Colt-Browning machine guns, which are the equivalent of the Lewis gun and considered preferable for modern warfare.

This programme for the manufacture of guns has involved plant construction and rearrangement on a very large scale, and the provision of large quantities of special machine tools, many of which have had to be purchased in the United States. Our gun programme is well advanced, and very substantial production will be obtained by April of next year. Our infant industry is a very healthy child.

Modern warfare requires a great variety of chemicals and explosives not ordinarily required for peace-time uses, or required only in small quantities. These chemicals and explosives are essential raw materials for any munitions programme.

As indicated in my last statement to this house, Canada is undertaking a large explosive and chemical programme, on both British and Canadian account. Fifteen of such projects are under way, each of which to a greater or less degree has required the design and construction of entirely new plants, or the expansion in some cases of already existing plants. One of such plants designed for the production of explosives has already been put in operation, and the remainder are progressing satisfactorily and are scheduled to be in operation by April, 1941.

Arrangements are being made for a further expansion of Canada's productive capacity for explosives and shell filling, so as to synchronize productive capacity for explosives with the capacity for the production of shells of various types, and in addition to provide a surplus of explosives for shipment to Great Britain.

Raw materials for the manufacture of explosives include ammonia, ammonium nitrate, toluol, carbamite, solvents, acetone, picrite, hexachlorethane, activated carbon, phosphorus, chlorates and perchlorates and monoethylaniline.

The chemical and explosives projects are all being supervised by Allied War Supplies Corporation, which is a wholly-owned government company.

Speaking of the explosives programme, I should perhaps say a word about the unfortunate explosion which occurred at our first explosives plant a night or two ago. Unfortunately three lives were lost in the explosion. In view of the fact that explosions in munitions plants are almost inevitable from time to time, it seems to me that the employees in plants of that type deserve the same kind of recognition as is given to armed forces in the combat area. I should like to express the sympathy of the government to the relatives of the three men who were killed and to express the hope that these unfortunate explosions can be kept to the minimum throughout the production period.

Deliveries of clothing and personal equipment are now ample to meet the needs of the Canadian armed forces. Since it is still being suggested that there is lack of such equipment, I will, with the permission of the house, place on Hansard a list showing deliveries of principal items that we have been called upon to supply. I doubt if anyone who reads this list will be further concerned about shortages of clothing.

In the woollen industry there are 62 mills making military cloths and blankets on contracts received directly from the government. Present production on these orders is estimated at 60 per cent of the capacity of the woollen weaving industry.

In the cotton industry, there are 23 mills working on orders received directly from the suppliers, and orders received directly from the Canadian government and British government.

Khaki drills Nos. 1 and 3, which are the cloths that we order in the largest quantities, are taking about 80 per cent of the mills' production of this type.

Let us refer now to the government-owned companies. As you have been informed on previous occasions, various wholly-owned government companies have been incorporated, the shares of which are held by the Minister of Munitions and Supply. All of these companies are subject to treasury control, and the Auditor General of Canada is the auditor of each one.

The reasons for the formation of these companies were:

1. The opportunity it gave of getting men of known organizing, construction and production ability to assist us in our war effort.

2. The opportunity it gave of decentralizing, with all the attending advantages that accrue from decentralization in an operation such as this.

3. It has been proven that the corporate method of administration has been successful in the management of industries, and business men understand such administration.

There are eight of these companies. As an example, I might mention Allied War Supplies Corporation. This company has seventeen projects under its supervision and administration, with a total investment of $100,000,000, which will require 175,000 horse-power to operate, and has at this moment 13,684 men engaged either in construction or in operation. One of these projects is now in operation. The second one will be in operation in a few days. The president of this company, in his latest monthly report, informs me that he is building an organization which will carry out these projects with the greatest efficiency, and that every effort is being made to see that these projects come into operation with the utmost speed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is that the one of which Mr. Crabtree is president?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Citadel Merchandising Company Limited has continued to anticipate and facilitate requirements for acquisition and production of machine tools urgently needed for the munitions and gun programme, and I believe that the various contractors who have come in contact with his company will agree that it has rendered valuable service to them. This company has supervised all orders placed by the Department of Munitions and Supply which require machine tools, machinery, and equipment of all descriptions for the production of war orders.

Mr. MacNICOL: I might interject that I have heard a good deal of complaint about that company interfering with present industries.

Mr. HOWE: The export of machine tools from the United States is under rigid control, and it is only by centring orders from private manufacturers on the war programme through that company and clearing the export licences with Washington that we have been able to prevent the entire industry from falling into chaos.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have reference to Canadian companies being interfered with.

Mr. HOWE: Well, that is a matter of opinion. We do think that that company has increased the Canadian production of tools very materially. It purchases, or supervises and finances the purchase of, machine tools. It procures export licences for equipment purchased in the United States, and performs engineering services for various plants, and as well, has been responsible for the procurement of machine tools for well over 125 projects. The company has purchased machinery and machine tools aggregating some $37,000,000.

We also have three manufacturing companies:

Research Enterprises Limited, which is a new industry in Canada. This company, with the assistance of the national research council, is to manufacture optical glass and a number of special precision instruments. The plant is in course of construction.

Federal Aircraft Limited, as the name suggests, will supervise the production of certain aircraft required for the joint air training plan.

Small Arms Limited, as the name implies, will be producing small arms. It might be of interest to comment that since the British have reviewed our small arms programme, they have asked us to increase this plant fourfold for their account.

Then there are the commodity companies: Plateau Company Limited, Melbourne Merchandising Limited, and Fairmont Company Limited.

By way of illustration, Fairmont Company Limited has purchased large stocks of rubber, under agreement with our rubber manufacturers and with the rubber controller of the United Kingdom. It is essential that we preserve a stock of rubber in this country. Hon. members will appreciate that rubber is essential for modern mechanized transport, of which large quantities are required; the source of supply is several thousand miles from Canada, and the producing territory is in a part of the world that cannot be regarded as immune from enemy attack. I think it will be agreed that rubber can be classified as a strategic material. Other essential commodities, imported from countries in war areas, are being protected similarly.

These commodity companies operate on a self-sustaining basis, the cost of operating being added to the selling price of the product.

Speaking of the control of industry, one of the obligations imposed upon the Minister of Munitions and Supply is to examine into, organize, mobilize and conserve the resources of Canada contributory to munitions of war, and the sources of their supply; to explore, estimate and provide for the fulfilment of the needs, present and prospective, of the government and community in respect thereto; and to take steps to mobilize, conserve and coordinate all economic and industrial facilities in respect of munitions of war and supplies and defence projects.

To assist in the carrying out of these responsibilities six controllers have been appointed, as follows:

Timber—H. R. MacMillan
Steel—H. D. Scully
Oil—G. R. Cottrelle
Metals—G. C. Bateman
Machine Tools—T. Arnold
Power—H. J. Symington

These controllers are, in effect, general managers of the respective industries over which they exercise control. The powers which have been vested in them are set out in the respective orders in council under which they were appointed and are necessarily comprehensive in character. The principle of control of industry under war conditions is generally accepted as reasonable and necessary, and is actually in effect under the war-time prices and trade board as well as under the Department of Munitions and Supply.

I should like to advise the house what the various controllers who have been appointed have actually accomplished since their appointment.

The oil controller first of all addressed himself to the problem of ascertaining the exact position of the petroleum industry in Canada, with a view to assuring an adequate supply of petroleum products for military purposes, and also to determine the productive capacity of Canadian sources of supply, which are largely confined to the province of Alberta. In this latter connection I am pleased to say that the oil controller has succeeded in determining within reasonable limits the productive capacity of the known and proven oil resources in the Alberta district, and has made arrangements for the provision of storage capacity so as to permit of more economical production in the existing fields. The investigations made by the oil controller indicated that the requirements of the three prairie provinces could not be met by the productive capacity of the present producing field, and prorating of the available crude from this source became necessary.

The oil controller has issued two orders: the first designed to curtail the installation of additional service stations and gasoline pumps, so that material and labour would be available for other purposes, it being felt that those service stations and gasoline pumps in existence at the time the order was issued would be sufficient to meet normal requirements of the public, and that no further extension of such facilities would be justified.

The oil controller also deemed it expedient to prohibit the sale or distribution of oil for the fueling of boilers, furnaces or other oil-consuming equipment not so fuelled at the date of the second order. This order did not apply to users of four thousand gallons of oil or less per annum, and was made as part of a plan to conserve the resources of Canada for war purposes.

I am pleased to say that the oil controller has been in touch with the governments of most of the provinces, and will shortly make contact with those not already approached, and they have all expressed their willingness to cooperate to the fullest possible extent.

The metals controller's chief concern has been to prevent any shortage of metals and industrial minerals required in the war-time manufacturing programme. Amongst other things he has arranged, as metals controller, for the curtailment of the use of aluminum for domestic purposes, so as to release as large a proportion as possible of this essential metal for military purposes. In cooperation with the power controller an arrangement was speedily made, without difficulty or complaint, for the substitution of copper for aluminum conductors by hydro-electric power companies in Canada, thereby releasing a very substantial quantity of aluminum for war purposes.

The metals controller has also arranged for the supply of a number of essential metals and industrial minerals.

The duties of the timber controller have been to assist the British timber controller in securing supplies in Canada, and to organize and administer the Canadian timber trade to meet war-time demands. The timber controller took steps to assist Great Britain in the purchase of aeroplane spruce, box shooks, pit props, birch logs and lumber. In meeting Canadian timber problems, the following principles were followed by the timber controller:

To secure the Canadian government's timber requirements, at lower cost wherever possible, and without increasing the general Canadian price level. Steps to accomplish this were:

(a) Rewrite specifications so that goods were not purchased above the grade necessary. This was done for the large building programme of the joint air training plan, the militia training centres, and other building projects at government cost, and also for many wooden articles for the defence departments.

(b) Have all deliveries to government building projects inspected at irregular intervals, during course of construction, by competent lumber inspectors, to protect the government against improper deliveries as to quantity and quality. This practice has produced valuable results.

(c) The necessary dry lumber for the entire government building programme, over 150 million feet, was purchased before the building programme was announced. The principles adopted were:

(i) The price level fixed was that in effect in June, 1940, before the government came heavily into the market. The situation was discussed with representative lumber manufacturers throughout Canada, nearly all of whom agreed that the government should not be penalized for creating a new market.

(ii) Except in emergencies lumber should be purchased only from the manufacturers and owners of large stocks and at wholesale prices. All such persons should enjoy equal opportunities.

(iii) Transportation costs should be avoided by using up all stocks available at competitive prices in the region of the building projects before bringing lumber in from more distant points.

(iv) All lumber should be dry so as to produce serviceable weatherproof permanent buildings.

The steel controller, immediately upon his appointment, made a complete statistical inquiry into the productive capacity of the steel industry in Canada, with a view to measuring against such capacity the steel requirements for war purposes, based upon war contracts already placed or in contemplation. It has been found that the Canadian capacity is short of meeting the requirements in certain directions, and steps have been taken to alleviate this shortage, through internal organization in the mills and the provision of new production capacity, as well as by curtailing the use of steel for both military and commercial purposes, in cases where substitute materials can readily be used. The extensive gun programme which has been undertaken, requiring the use of special alloy steels, has caused the steel controller to recommend the provision of additional alloy steel capacity and, upon his recommendation, such provision is being made. As a result of the efforts of the steel controller, steel prices have been maintained.

The power controller, immediately upon his appointment, undertook a study of the power capacities and power loads in the various provinces and sections of provinces and the forecast of all probable loads in 1941-42. Such studies were made in collaboration with the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario and the Public Service Commission of the province of Quebec, both of which bodies have special control powers within their respective provinces, and with the power companies throughout the Dominion of Canada. One of the results of these studies was that a substantial reduction in peak power capacity would be made if daylight saving time were extended in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, such reductions being estimated at 114,000 horse-power in Ontario and 75,000 horse-power in Quebec. After consultation with the appropriate authorities in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and with their consent and concurrence, the power controller recommended to the minister that steps be taken to extend daylight saving time in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec by order in council, which action has been taken.

The power controller is keeping the government constantly advised of prospective power demands, in relation to power supply, and is cooperating with a view to obtaining the most effective use of available supplies.

Machine tools controller. Machine tool requirements, to permit of the effective consummation of the large munitions and gun programme which has been undertaken, are very large and greatly exceed the Canadian capacity to produce such machine tools. It was accordingly considered desirable and necessary that the available machine tool capacity in the Dominion of Canada be primarily directed to war purposes and, therefore, a machine tools controller was appointed with appropriate powers to control the machine tool industry in Canada. The machine tools controller has already taken steps to bring about the more effective use of machine tools in presently existing manufacturing plants not engaged in the production of munitions of war, and to cause machine tools available in non-essential services to be made available for use in essential services.

On the recommendation of the machine tools controller action has been taken to prohibit, except under licence, the manufacture of new models of any type of appliance or equipment which, directly or indirectly, involve in their manufacturing processes the use of any machine tools, dies, jigs, gauges, moulds, patterns or templates. The purposes of this action is to augment the supply of tools essential to the war effort, and at the same time to provide sufficient skilled and trained men for our rapidly expanding war industries. The "new model" order covers vehicles, railway rolling stock, bicycles, refrigerators, cooking and heating equipment, sewing and washing machines, radio sets, vacuum cleaners, humidifiers, typewriters, glass and other containers, and virtually all appliances and equipment in use in Canada. Existing models in current use in Canada will thus be "frozen." No changes will be permitted except for good and sufficient reasons, and then only under permit from the machine tools controller, who may authorize minor changes or betterments in existing designs which do not involve too great a use of machine tools or skilled labour.

By thus avoiding the economic wastage of machines and men, which mere whims, fads and fancies of fashion often produce, the ingenuity of a number of skilled artisans and highly trained men will be directed toward the work of winning the war.

My hon. friend the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party has objected to the type of restriction being imposed by these controllers. I share his desire that this might be a comfortable war in which farmers, labour and our citizens generally might better their scale of living and industry prosper. Unfortunately, it is not that kind of war, provided we wish to throw our whole effort into it. It seems to me that the demands of this war must bear down on every citizen in Canada, to a much greater extent than in the last war. I have no doubt whatever that added restrictions must be imposed as time goes on. The appointment of controllers is an insurance that such restrictions will be applied intelligently, with a maximum benefit to the war effort and a minimum disturbance to our daily life. It is the duty of each controller to get the best out of the industry for which he is responsible. Much has been accomplished in this direction already and much more will be required.

[Mr. Howe.]

Before closing, I should perhaps reply to some of the points that have been raised in the debate affecting the Department of Munitions and Supply. The visit of Sir Walter Layton has been mentioned. Sir Walter came to the United States in connection with the work of the British ministry of supply in that country. He paid a visit to Canada, which was very helpful to the work of the ministry of munitions and supply, in that we were able to discuss with him the present and prospective requirements of the British ministry of supply in this country, and the degree of urgency with which each item was required. A secret memorandum was left with myself bearing on this subject, which is being followed in planning our production programme. Sir Walter is still in the United States, where I have had occasion to consult with him by personal visit or by telephone. I can think of nothing mysterious about his contact with my department.

There has also been an inquiry about the war-time requirements board, membership of which is made up of:

H. R. MacMillan (chairman)
Dr. W. C. Clark
Graham F. Towers
Dr. Bryce M. Stewart
R. A. C. Henry
Major-General L. R. LaFlèche
Colonel G. S. Currie
Lieutenant-Colonel K. S. Maclachlan
H. G. Colebrooke
Mr. Carl Goldenberg (secretary).

This board was appointed on Friday last, the 15th instant, which explains why the Prime Minister had no knowledge of it when the question was asked.

The purpose of the board is to plan the most productive and direct use for war purposes of available supplies of materials, power, manufacturing plant, and facilities, and transportation facilities, in order to ensure that war needs, in the order of their importance, shall have priority over all other needs, and that there shall be a minimum of disturbance to Canadian export trade in particular and Canadian economy in general. The members of the board hold key positions in the war effort, and by conferring together will be able to coordinate all available information in the departments of government that they represent, and recommend such action as may be necessary to anticipate bottlenecks in production.

The leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party mentioned the location of the Winnipeg cordite plant. In order to remove all mystery from this transaction, I will read a letter, dated November 14, 1940, addressed to myself, from Mr. Harold Crabtree, president of Allied War Supplies Corporation, which corporation is responsible for the location of the plant. The letter is as follows:

Dear Mr. Howe:

Referring to our interview of yesterday afternoon in which the site for the Winnipeg cordite plant was discussed, two sites were considered for this plant—one on the south side of the main C.N.R. tracks, and the second north of the main line of the C.N.R. which could be served by both the C.P.R. and the C.N.R.

The two sites were equally suitable from the construction point of view, but the north site was approximately two miles farther from the aqueduct, and would require a longer pipeline to take water to the plant. The cost of this extension to the water line was estimated by Defence Industries Limited at about $50,000 to $60,000, and while it was considered desirable to have the plant served by both railways I did not feel that we were justified in going to this expense.

The Canadian Pacific Railway were anxious to serve this plant and offered to absorb the additional cost. Considering the advantages of having it accessible to both lines and the fact that the sites were equally suitable in other respects, a decision was reached to use the north site.

A further point bearing on this matter was that the city of Winnipeg stipulated that the plant, buildings and premises should not be located nearer to the aqueduct of the district than one mile, and it is doubtful if this would have been possible in respect of the site to the south side of the C.N.R. tracks.

Mr. COLDWELL: Did not the city of Winnipeg, through its mayor, say that the south side was preferable?

Mr. HOWE: I cannot say as to that. But after all, when we are buying a site I think we have to make our own decision on that point. I wish to point out only that the suggestion was made that the government had gone to great additional expense to use the site more remote from the aqueduct.

Mr. COLDWELL: Apparently the minister learned this only a day or two ago.

Mr. HOWE: I did not know at the time. I found that out.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was not this decision made by Mr. Crabtree and the board of directors?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Independent of the company.

Mr. HOWE: Yes. I am reading the letter of Mr. Crabtree now. I did not have the explanation until I asked for it. I hope I have given the information required.

I think that my hon. friend will admit that this letter gives good and sufficient reason for the choice of the location finally adopted. I would urge that all hon. members obtain the full facts of any transaction before spreading rumour that may lack foundation. I shall always be glad to answer promptly any reasonable question that is placed on the order paper. I shall also be glad to give full particulars of any individual transaction. If there is any irregularity, there is no one more desirous of being informed about it than I am myself. A number of alleged irregularities have been called to my attention, and so far all of them have proven to be without foundation.

I commend that particularly to the attention of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) who insinuated last night—in fact, he not only insinuated but made the direct statement—that prices had been obtained, held and disclosed to a contractor beforehand.

In the report that I have given to hon. members, only the secondary industries have been mentioned. It has, of course, been necessary to step up production in our primary industries. The balance between primary and secondary industries is constantly under study, and, as a result of these studies, we have considerably expanded the production of steel, alloys and certain metals. The production of aluminum has been more than doubled since the outbreak of war, and new production is now being undertaken to meet the needs of 1943. I think that provision has been made to keep our production reasonably in balance. Our bureau of economics is proving most valuable in helping us to maintain this balance.

We have enjoyed splendid cooperation from industry and labour. Margins of profit have been maintained at levels much lower than in peace time. I feel confident that there will be no new millionaires emerging from this war. In my efforts to prevent undue profits on the part of industry, I have the enthusiastic cooperation of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson). Organized labour has cooperated in extending working hours and in bringing incipient labour disputes to arbitration.

I might interject at this point that we have received extraordinary cooperation from organized labour. Almost every week union leaders have written in and have asked if certain actions on their part would be beneficial. If we are in a position to write back to the effect that such actions would be beneficial to the war effort, I believe there has been no instance in which such action has not been taken by the organization affected.

There has been as little profiteering on the part of labour as on the part of capital. There seems to be a general appreciation that an increase in wages and the cost of living, and consequent increased cost of production, will in the long run be harmful, and that a balance between wages and the cost of living can best be maintained by seeking stability in both.

The next eight months will witness a rapid expansion of employment and constantly increasing industrial activity. At the end of that period Canada should be producing the practical maximum of war materials of which Canada is capable. The next eight months will be a testing time for the morale of the Canadian people. I have no doubt that our industry, and our men and women, will justify our confidence in the productive capacity of this great dominion.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended taking part in the debate this afternoon. However the treatises which have been read in the house in the past two days leads me to the belief that the government of the day looks on the House of Commons as the family vault, the doors of which are to be opened only once in a while. Last year on January 25 the doors were opened, and closed immediately upon the calling of an election. The vault opened again on May 16, and closed on August 7. At this time it has again been opened, and we have been privileged to hear the last wills and testaments of many cabinet ministers.

While I do not wish to be critical of any of them, there are some observations I should like to make. I know the ministers are working hard. The one who has just completed his speech has done a great deal of work in connection with the re-arming of Canada and the general cleaning up of the situation. For such work he deserves a great deal of credit. My point is this, that if the forty minute rule, which you, Mr. Speaker, so fairly interpreted the other day, is not to apply to ministers we might as well adopt the practice at Washington where members of congress simply hand in, without reading them, pamphlets running to three and four hundred pages, and they are printed in the record.

I think I was the victim who perhaps led to the adoption of the forty minute rule. Away back when a great many members now here were not in this house, four or five notorious bills came up. One was the Sun Life bill, which the privy council declared illegal. Another was the Bell Telephone bill, to cut a melon of $75,000,000 at the expense of the taxpayers of Ontario. Another bill proposed to give away all the power in the Ottawa valley to the Sifton interests, and another was the Beauharnois bill. I opposed all these bills and they were talked out by the opposition on this side of the house, and our action saved the country hundreds of millions of dollars. The old rule was good enough from confederation down to the time when the rules were amended. It was hardly ever abused.

The first point I want to make here to-day is this: Why have we not national government in this country, a government representative of all the people? This is just a Liberal war. We come here and hear these statements read by one minister after the other, seeking to soothe the people into a false sense of security when we are not secure. I did not wait until the war broke out to preach rearmament. I preached it right along from the opposition benches during the whole time I was a member of the house. The more we have of these speeches by the ministers the more we realize that the government believe the pen is mightier than the sword. That was the view the isolationists took in the United States and the pacifists in Great Britain, and this government evidently believes in that same doctrine. When war broke out the British government sent six million leaflets to be dropped over Germany, thinking that by propaganda they could convert the German people to the British government's view, and the third day after war was declared ten million leaflets were dropped over Germany. They believed then that the pen was mightier than the sword. What the people of this country want to know is whether we are secure or not, instead of having all these speeches. Security is better than opulence. We know we are not secure.

I believe there is a call to-day for national government in Canada. I think it would be in the interests of the government itself and in the interests of our war effort. In a real democracy the opposition necessarily shares responsibility with the government. It is the alternative government.

Some hon. gentlemen opposite criticized the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White), but that gentleman has already shown his zeal in this war by wearing the king's uniform and serving as a company commander training the young recruits. The House of Commons is the only place where a soldier or a citizen can have his grievance remedied or where the man on the street can learn what the facts are and what are the policies of the government and those who oppose it.

The Minister of Munitions and Supply is a very able minister with a fine record in private business. I think I have known him as long as anybody in the house. He is a sincere and hard-working man. I knew him as an engineer when I was chairman of the Toronto harbour board, and I have been acquainted with the good work he has done. He has worked hard and well and I know his heart is in his work. I believe he has tried to do his duty. I do not know the whole story but I believe he has done his bit to the best of his ability, even though he supports the policies of the government and the way they administer the affairs of the country.

In Great Britain the Labour party under Mr. Lansbury opposed all measures of rearmament. From 1931 to 1935 the opposition was committed to pacifism, and pacifism was sweeping the country. In a by-election at East Fulham, in 1933, the issue was the pacifist issue, and the "peace and disarmament" candidate, Mr. J. C. Wilmot, turned a Conservative majority of 14,521 into a Labour majority of 4,840. Mr. Baldwin, commenting in 1936 with appalling candour on this colossal turnover, said:

> Now supposing I had gone to the country (in 1935) and had said "Germany is rearming; we must rearm." Does anyone think that this pacific democracy of ours would have rallied to that cry? Not at that moment. I cannot think of anything which would have made the loss of the election, from my point of view, more certain.

Mr. Lansbury had long been the head of the Labour party, and you all know his pacifism—"not a dollar, not a man," and all that kind of thing. Then he lost the leadership of the party and Mr. Bevin and Mr. Morrison and Sir Stafford Cripps came to the forefront. Then there was the peace ballot in Great Britain and the general strike, the Independent Labour party under Mr. Keir Hardie, and the socialist league, all warning the government in no circumstances to go to war. Sir Stafford Cripps was a pure pacifist. In 1933, at Bristol, he said:

> I think we ought to warn the government that in no circumstances will we go to war. There is only one way in which we can make that threat effective, and that is to call a general strike.

Last but not least there was the League of Nations Union, which has done more damage and done more to cause this war than almost any other agency.

What do we find to-day? We find the British government has formed a cabinet of all parties and taken in a lot of pacifists. Mr. Herbert Morrison is a very energetic Minister of Supply, whose work is universally admitted to have been very valuable. He and Mr. Bevin have been more successful than any preceding minister in pursuading trade unionists to suspend their regulations and in securing an increased output of munitions. Nevertheless, until he was admitted to the ranks of the ministry, Mr. Morrison in the London county council, for instance, or its committees under his direction, abolished the celebration of empire day in the schools, decided not to sanction the maintenance of cadet corps or officers' training corps, refused to assist in military pageants or tattooes, declined the use of the schools for purposes of recruiting or drill, withdrew grants for scholarships to enable boys to become officers in the Royal Navy, denied permission to children in schools to attend lectures on the navy, banned in 1936 circulation in the schools of Earl Beatty's empire day message. Mr. Morrison himself said at Islington on March 22, 1935:

> The Labour majority had to take into account that a large number of parents, and a growing body of public opinion, had a deep objection to the military training of the young.

The League of Nations Union was started in 1920 as a non-party organization to make the work of the league known and win popular support for it, but it gradually passed under the control of pacifists, cranks, socialists, cosmopolitans, with the result that from 1931 onward it became increasingly anti-government, deprecated recruiting, took a leading part in organizing the peace ballot of 1934-35, changed the mind of the Baldwin-MacDonald government and led the dictators to believe no matter what they did Britain would be neutral.

My point is this. Notwithstanding that France, when war broke out, had a socialist government, the United States a new deal government, Great Britain a Conservative government, and Canada a Liberal government; and notwithstanding the fact that in all these countries isolationism, pacifism and all that sort of thing had held sway for years, the British government stopped all that in Great Britain by forming a national government representative of all parties that rearmed after Munich and since the war united the nation. I am a strong supporter of the trade unionist movement and always have been, but I believe the government of the day in Great Britain did the right thing with respect to the trade unionists by calling in all parties —labour element and opposition, many of whom had helped cause the war—in order to present a united front to the enemy.

Why does not this government do the same thing? That is the first point I raise in this debate. Why does not this government take the same action that the British government took, instead of having in office in Canada a purely Liberal party government run on party lines? Let us rather have a government representative of all the people from Halifax to Vancouver and put politics in cold storage until after the war. Such a government would have the united and loyal support of the whole country.

Secondly, I would ask where are we now in this war? We have now had almost fifteen months of war. We have seen Hitler capture, by diplomacy and fraud and the ferocity of his attacks, practically the whole of Europe except Russia and two little islands at the edge of Europe—Great Britain and Ireland. Where are we now? Are we secure? Are we secure enough? No, we are not. We are not going to be able to fight Hitler by books and pamphlets and orders in council and the reading of treatises and all that kind of thing. The defence of Canada will never be decided at Vancouver or Quebec or Halifax or Saint John; it is going to be decided in the battle of Britain. The battle of Britain is now on in the Mediterranean and other fronts, and if they fail over there all our home defence is at an end, and so is that of the United States.

I am very much dissatisfied in a great many ways with the work the government has done. First, they have given the House of Commons no information. I referred to that in 1938 and 1939 and in the two sessions this year. Mr. Chamberlain said in 1938 and 1939 that if the people are not given the facts, if they are given only so much as their rulers allow them to know, they are embarked on a course which is fraught with grave consequences for the future. That was proven to be true. Criticism is a tonic. It is good for the individual, it is good for the government. It stirs governments to action. If the criticism is founded on fact and not based on partisan objects it can do nothing but help; it can save the government from many pitfalls and mistakes, grave perils and dangers.

Now, the criticism regarding this war effort is justified. The opposition has a responsibility to the soldier and to the country to perform its duty when information is lacking. In such statements as we have had during the last three or four days there is a lack of information. There is also too much Hollywood ballyhoo about our publicity. In my opinion the bureau of public information should be wiped out altogether—it has been a centre of mischief ever since it was started—and the press instead should be given this responsibility and these functions. How does it come about that to a very large extent only United States citizens—some of them newspaper correspondents—have been chosen to do this work? The bureau has a broadcast which they call "Facing the Facts." They are not facts at all. A great many of them are only half-truths. The speakers deal largely with opinions and are in the realm of doubt all the time. They forget all about Britain that has given the United States all the peace it has had so far.

In a democracy the opposition shares responsibility with the government. Its business is to criticize the government's policy, and if its views make a popular appeal the government is generally compelled to make revisions, by concessions, compromises, and so forth. Reading the handwriting on the wall often saves a government from its own friends.

The collapse of France was caused because the people were not given the facts, but were kept in the dark. But for the isolationism of Canada, long before the war began the dominions would have been invited to participate in a war plan. Canada should have been delighted to do so, but Canada was lukewarm and drifted. Canada was one of the chief objectors and isolationists before the war. At the outbreak of the war she was not prepared. As in 1812, she had to depend on Britain, on land and sea and in the air, for defence.

What the House of Commons and the people want to get is real information and the real picture. The picture which the minister has just disclosed is a very rosy one, but you cannot fight Hitler by explaining what you are going to do in 1943, 1944 and 1945. The government's attitude reminds me of the United States, where congress was shocked by the chairman of the war committee, Mr. Willam Knudsen, when he said that it would be 1944 before the United States could mobilize, train and equip an army or get a proper rearmament programme. We are in the same position.

In debate on March 24, 1938, when the government of the day put up member after member from Quebec and other centres to tell the country that not a dollar was to be spent ex-territorially, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said we would never send another expeditionary force overseas, that the danger to Canada was minor in degree and secondary in origin, and all that kind of thing, I took the position that we should have a survey made of all the large and small plants in Canada and that there should be a national register and national service. About the time of the Ethiopian campaign, in 1936 and 1937, I proposed an air scheme linked up with the Department of Labour, whereby the young people from our schools and high schools who were out of work and looking for jobs could enter the aeroplane industry, learn a trade, learn something about air training, take some drill, receive pocket money, food, clothing and lodging, so that at the end of from three to five years they would be available either as pilots or in those branches of industry which are now doing from coast to coast the key work which the minister has so ably set forth.

What the country wants to know is when we shall have deliveries of shells and bombers and aeroplanes and aeroplane engines and guns and rifles,—all that sort of thing. I have seen soldiers out on parade along the streets, and they have not got any of this equipment. In the debate last year I put forward the constructive idea that Canada should find a way of making possible the impossible. In other words, where there are no barracks or implements of war we should do as we did before, namely, take other public buildings. If men have no uniforms, let them train without uniforms. If they have no rifles, machine guns or other modern implements of warfare, then they should do what has been done in France and Great Britain, namely use dummies until the real weapons can be obtained. Instead of allowing these men to drift around with nothing to do, they should be given the proper training immediately. Toronto is the main recruiting district in Canada, and I do not know what is going to be done there, or elsewhere. The men want to get overseas. This is not the way to fight Hitler. The government should wake up. We shall never beat Hitler and win this war if we go on the way we are going now. As I said in 1938, it takes two years to train a man, and two years to get munitions, and then six months afterwards for the soldier to learn how to use the armaments with which he is then provided.

As I have said, France fell because she was denied the simple truth about the way things were going. After all the items of news which we have had, I doubt if we could produce a white book or paper about our relations with the continent and with the United States or with Britain since the war began. I have seen nothing of the kind. The house has not been given the facts. Sir Robert Borden used to say that when he had a secret he wanted to keep he should tell it to his cabinet. When the present Prime Minister has a secret he wants to keep, he seems to tell it to a do-nothing Canada-United States defence committee, or to fifty United States newspaper editors who come over here and then go back to their own country and publish these secrets in United States newspapers, over the head of the House of Commons, the members of which do not know the secrets, and over the heads of the people who have the right to know what is going on and how their money is being spent. The dictators knew all these so-called secrets long ago.

The revelations of the strength and skill of the German army and the way they smashed through the low countries and Scandinavia have shocked this country and awakened the United States. But where are we now? In the olden days battles lasted only a day or two. With the increase of population and the advent of mechanized equipment, battles nowadays go on for one, two, three and four years. Germany to-day is headed by a chancellor whom the people worship and idolize. We thought that he could be easily defeated and that, for that reason, war would never come. But what has actually happened? In the last great war Germany kept the whole civilized world at bay for four and a half years, notwithstanding that at that time we had on our side Italy, Russia, the United States and Japan. Now Italy and Japan at any rate are against us—one is fighting against us and the other is a potential enemy—all on account of the appeasement policy that had been pursued. We have lost Japan, our old and faithful ally who looked after the Pacific, Australia, New Zealand and the empire in the east. She was driven out of the Anglo-Japanese alliance to appease America. The same with Italy. These two countries should never have gone against us. It was a fatal mistake to lose two old friends and loyal allies.

You cannot beat Hitler with any tower of babel such as we have, as represented in so many agencies including our information bureau, the typewriter and quires of foolscap, and the radio, and government by order in council. History is being gloriously rewritten by our men on land and sea and in the air and we should see to it that they are given proper equipment. Let me refer the house to the stirring words of Mr. Churchill, after the collapse of France, on the duty to inform the public and tell them the truth, no matter how bad.

During this time of war great powers are entrusted to executive governments. Nevertheless we exercise them under the constant supervision of parliament and with a wide measure of free debate. We have a stern and resolute House of Commons which is not likely at all to flag or weaken in the conflict upon which we entered unanimously. And I do not doubt that it is the House of Commons which will not hesitate if emergency requires it to approve and enforce all measures necessary for the safety of the state.

During the last 250 years the British parliament has fought several great and long European wars with unwearied zeal and tenacity, and carried them all to a successful conclusion. In this war they are fighting not only for themselves but for parliamentary institutions wherever they have been set up. In our country public men are proud to be the servants of the people. They would be ashamed to be their masters. The ministers of the crown feel themselves strengthened by having at their side this House of Commons and House of Lords, sitting with great regularity and active as a continual stimulus to their activities.

Of course it is quite true that there is often severe criticism of the government in the two houses. We do not resent well-meant criticism from any man who wishes to win the war; we do not even shrink from unfair criticism, though that is most dangerous. On the contrary, we take it constantly to heart and seek to profit by it.

Criticism in the body politic is like pain in the human body. It is unpleasant, but where would the body be without it? No health or sensibility would be possible without the continued correctives and warnings of pain.

It is in this fear of criticism that the nazi and bolshevik dictators run their greatest risk. They silence all criticism by the concentration camp, the rubber truncheon or the firing party. The men at the top must very often be fed only with facts which are palatable to them. Scandals, corruption and shortcomings are not exposed, because there are no independent voices. Instead of being exposed, they continue to fester behind the pompous frontage of the state.

The men at the top may be very fierce and powerful, but their ears are deaf. Their fingers are numb. They cannot feel their feet as they move forward in the fog and darkness of the immeasurable and the unknown.

One of the things that this war is going to prove is whether in modern times the full strength of nations can be realized under totalitarian systems working through an ogpu or a gestapo.

I believe the time has come when the press censorship in Canada should be abolished entirely and we should go back to the good old British system, leaving the responsibility for censorship as largely as possible to the voluntary effort of the press. This is what Britain is doing. There are one or two press censors there who supervise things but the press is left largely alone. In my opinion it would be far better for the Canadian people, and it would make for the dissemination of more reliable information, if that policy were followed in this country. After all, the press has certain duties to the public. It is the medium through which the government of the day can impart information to the people, and I submit that it should not be trammelled, but should be let tell the truth. Truth is the first victim of this war, and self-respect is the victim of neutrality.

[Mr. Church.]

In my opinion the National Resources Mobilization Act should be repealed altogether. It has proved a failure. If the same amount of money that has been expended under it had been devoted to a voluntary system of recruiting there would be nearly one million men under arms in Canada to-day instead of the comparatively small force which we have under this complicated and useless method, headed by civilians who know nothing of war. The system now in force has been weighed in the balance and found wanting. It is headed by civilians and there is altogether too much red tape, delay and cumbersome procedure about it. They seem to think that we can fight Hitler in that way, but they will have a rude awakening. In the last war we did not have so many ministers directing our defences as we have to-day. We have good men for militia, air, and the navy. At the present time there is no system of check and balance and in consequence there is continuous friction among the services, and waste and duplication. The system should be abolished and we should go back to the old method. There is something of the Alice in Wonderland way in the conducting of our war effort. They seem to think that what they have done is simply wonderful, but it is not getting men over to fight Hitler and help in the battle of Britain.

May I say a word now with regard to the Rowell commission—I say Rowell commission because in my opinion it should be so designated. Chief Justice Rowell was the original chairman of the commission, and the other members have not the learning and ability or the wide knowledge of constitutional questions, or the judgment, that the original chairman had. However, the question I should like to ask is this: Why is the report of the commission to be considered at this stage? The report was relegated to the archives last session—earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust, in sure hope that it would not be resurrected. Why is it being revived now in the darkest hour of the war? Why not postpone consideration of it until after the war? It is a red herring dragged across the track now to hinder our war effort.

It seems to me that the report of the Rowell commission does not tackle the main question that confronts the people of Canada to-day, namely, overgovernment and overtaxation. We should never have had any provincial legislatures; they are duplicate municipal systems. They were created by the fathers of confederation for political and not for economic purposes. We want a British North America Act for the living and not for the dead. The report, I repeat, does not deal with the main question as to the elimination of provincial legislatures. If the provisions of the report are adopted it will simply mean that the province of Ontario will become the hewer of wood and the drawer of water for the rest of the confederation.

We have four ministers from the province of Ontario and not one of them is in the house this afternoon. We have heard from a young minister representing an Ontario constituency. He spoke yesterday. I have not the pleasure of his acquaintance, though I have no doubt he is very much respected in the maritime provinces. He now represents the city of Kingston in this house. I would impress upon these ministers representing the province of Ontario that the province is being overtaxed, and is the forgotten province of confederation. Under the Municipal Assistance Act the province of Quebec has been given many concessions in relief legislation and votes. Many institutions have been provided, parks and sidewalks and other purely municipal services, out of federal funds, while Ontario has received nothing, and no such favours in relief votes. It seems to me that the report, while undoubtedly satisfactory from the point of view of the prairie provinces, will shake the very foundations of confederation if it is carried into effect. From the very start I have strenuously opposed the way in which the dominion and provinces have encroached upon the rights of the municipalities and robbed them of their revenues. Federal power now is at its lowest ebb since confederation. One has only to mention income tax. There are some good features in the report, but I submit that it can be laid over until after the war is won, because if Hitler wins it will not matter whether the report is adopted or not. After the war the wreckage will be so great there will be nothing to salvage in Canada.

There are many matters that one might discuss in this debate. It seems to me that the time has come when we should get rid of the dummy for the nazi ventriloquist, the Petain French embassy in Canada. A great British newspaper said recently:

We publish a note of Lord Milner's on the war crisis of March, 1918. In it will be seen how Marshal Petain had to be pushed and pulled along by Clemenceau and Foch, and in the latter's war book it is described how, later in 1918, Petain proposed surrender. It does not appear that he actually used the word at Doullens in the presence of the British, but speaking to the French he predicted the surrender of Marshal Haig within a month of the Doullens gathering. Surrender would appear to be part of his make-up. Another side of his character is seen in his seeking to throw blame on others. He and General Weygand were in charge of the French army until 1935, for Marshal Petain was inspector-general of the French military forces from 1922 to 1931, and he was war minister in 1934. General Weygand was the head of the French general staff, that is head of the army, from 1931 to 1935. These generals, therefore, must not take the line that they have no responsibility for French military plans and training or for the failure of both. Between them they had control from the vital year 1922 to 1935, the lessons of modern mechanization had been learned by others. General de Gaulle published his great book, Vers l'Armes de Metier, in 1934. General Weygand and Marshal Petain paid no attention to it, but Hitler reorganized his whole army in accordance with its precepts, and his generals derived their plans for the battle of France very largely from the principles there laid down. One more point. In his radio apologia to the French for his surrender to Germany, Marshal Petain said that France had too few allies and too few children. The marshal's treatment of French allies will certainly not add to the number of those seeking alliance with France, and in regard to too few children, Marshal Petain himself only married when he was sixty-four and has none at all. He probably forgot this when he spoke, as indeed he now forgets everything. Most of his day is spent asleep, and while his interlocutors are actually talking to him he forgets who they are and asks their names. A perfect tool for the enemies of his country; a piteous end for a brave soldier.

I am sorry for the great tragedy to glorious France, our immortal ally of old. I am sorry for the way in which Petain acted; he was a great general. I am very sorry for the glorious French people because we all recognize their bravery, devotion and love of freedom. They are now under the heel of the invader and with the cold of winter coming on we see the result of their work. We should close up the Petain mission and like England recognize the French provincial government.

We should also have some understanding regarding some of the other nations.

When Mr. Churchill speaks in the House of Commons he is listened to by the wide world. One reason why he stands above others is that he has no "ghost" or anonymous helper writing out his utterances for him, as is the case with so many public men in other countries. Mr. Churchill's speeches are his own, and they rank high in the annals of British oratory, like the one in which he told the House of Commons two or three weeks ago:

It has come to us to stand alone at the breach and face the worst that the tyrant's might and enmity can do. Bearing ourselves humbly before God, but conscious that we serve an unfolding purpose, we are ready to defend our native land against the invasion by which it is threatened. We are fighting by ourselves alone. But we are not fighting for ourselves alone . . .

I moved for an order on May 20 for all the orders in council in regard to recruiting. It has been a matter of on again, off again, and so on. No wonder there is no recruiting at the present time. We could have had nearly a million men now under arms if they had not been discouraged. We were told they were not needed in England; but they will be needed when Britain takes the offensive. The same trouble was caused in Australia and New Zealand when the war started. The recruiting stations were so crowded that men could not get in; the same blunder was made.

I wish to pay tribute to-day to Ulster. Consider what Ulster has done; she is with the mother country to the end; she is getting stronger all the time; she has over one hundred thousand volunteers, many of whom have been killed and maimed; she turns out munitions and equipment and ships at great speed night and day; every man, woman and child has his or her place; she has given over £6,000,000 to Britain and £30,000 in post office certificates; she has given Spitfire equipment. In case of invasion England is there on her borders and she is on the spot to defend the back-door, which was such a great danger in the war with Napoleon. That great country stands by the side of England and is not going to be driven out by anybody. She is protecting the bases on the north and east and off the coasts of Ireland where the Germans have been doing great damage to our trade and shipping.

In conclusion I wish to refer to two or three small matters with regard to soldiers which have come up. There is great dissatisfaction among the returned men from Vancouver to Halifax. I have letters from all over the country; I have not time to go into them, but I believe the time has come when we must have a proper and adequate system of insurance for our soldiers, free fares, and camps closer to their homes and not spread all over Canada.

Then take Camp Borden, on which $4,500,000 has been spent, money absolutely wasted, when they could have had the Toronto exhibition grounds, High Park and all that vacant land on the Toronto-Hamilton highway free and suited for manoeuvres. At that camp there was a riot among the soldiers in the great war when the then minister was present; it is not, in my opinion, fit for winter use, let alone summer. Then here is a bankrupt railway, the Canadian National, into which this country has poured millions of dollars, and they cannot carry a few soldiers free.

Something will have to be done about home leave for Christmas for all soldiers in Canada, if recruiting is not going to be hurt. I conclude by urging the government to do something for the soldiers in this connection. If they do, it will commend itself to the wisdom and judgment of the country.

The Minister of National War Services (Mr. Gardiner) returned recently from the old country. He talks about food for England. Two years ago in this house I urged him to establish food reservoirs in England, send over there a year's crop of grain, and bacon, canned goods and all that kind of thing. That was not done. I pointed out to him and to the house four or five times the tremendous danger of the submarine menace in the great war and how it would be ten times worse in this war by reason of air raids on merchant shipping. But nothing was done.

There should be a civilian inquiry into the death of every person killed in Canada while on active service. I asked this question:

1. How many airmen have been killed in Canada while in training since this war started, and where?

2. Were any civilian coroner's inquests held into the causes thereof, or only military inquests? Will the reports be tabled?

3. How many soldiers were killed on troop or other trains while serving in Canada, (a) Canadian National, (b) Canadian Pacific?

4. What inquest was held into the causes, civilian or military, or by the board of transport commissioners? Will any reports be tabled?

It is the duty of the federal, provincial and municipal authorities to see that these civilian inquests are properly conducted. These men are citizens and the country should be given the information.

The whole thing boils down to one issue: Do the people of Canada think they are secure as a result of the policy of the government? I say they are not. One of the main reasons why they are not is the policy of secrecy of the government in conducting a Liberal war, because that is all it is, instead of having a proper and adequate war policy and taking the people and the parliament of Canada into their confidence.

Mr. W. F. RICKARD (Durham): Mr. Speaker, after having listened to this debate for the past several days I feel it my duty, as the representative of a rural constituency, to say a few words with regard to the problem which we face in Ontario, and more particularly in that part of the province from which I come.

Before doing so, however, I should like to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Both these hon. gentlemen did credit to themselves as well as to the constituencies they represent. I should like also to add a word of appreciation for the clear manner in which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) presented Canada's war effort to this house and told us what would be expected of us as Canadians. I should like also to congratulate the various ministers who have spoken, upon the way in which they have handled the situation and the work they have done. They have shown that they know their jobs and understand what it is all about. To my mind they have presented to the house and to the country a clear picture of what is being done in connection with our part in this war.

Some criticism has come from the press and other sources because the government has not divulged all the secrets of this war effort. Those of us who read the Globe and Mail are perhaps more familiar with these statements, because there from time to time we have seen comments that nothing has been done, that we have not been told half the story, and so on. I am one of those who believe that agitations of this kind do more harm than good as far as our war effort is concerned. We all know that certain matters cannot be made public. We also know that the empire is engaged in a mortal struggle, and we are convinced that we are fighting for the right. Because of this the Canadian people are prepared to make unlimited sacrifices. What is more, they want to do anything they can to help win this war. Victory will come only after a long, bitter struggle, and there will be a time and place for all to help.

My purpose in taking part in this debate is not particularly to discuss Canada's war effort, which already has been debated at some length, but rather to give this house in my humble way some idea of the conditions facing the man on the land in this province of Ontario. The other evening the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) lamented the condition of the western wheat grower. He criticized some portions of the government's policy, and offered certain suggestions which he thought would remedy the situation as far as the west was concerned. But he did not give the government any praise for anything the government had done in connection with markets, which I thought he might have done if he had desired to be fair.

Mr. PERLEY: Tell us what they have done.

Mr. RICKARD: Just a moment. As a farmer I know I have received more for my produce since this government came to office than I received under the previous government. After 1930 I well remember selling hogs for 3½ cents a pound and less, and cattle at 4 and 4½ cents a pound; cheese went down to 10 cents a pound, and so on. I am not arguing that we are getting enough for our produce to-day, but I do say that since this government came into power and made a trade treaty with the United States, which permitted us to ship our surplus cattle to that market, many thousands of dollars have been placed in the pockets of the Canadian farmers. More than that, I believe that same trade treaty has had a good effect in bringing about a closer relationship between Canada and the United States which is proving very helpful as far as our war effort is concerned.

To-day governments, both provincial and federal, are spending thousands of dollars in trying to educate our young men and women to stay on the farms. Only recently, there were held in every province of the dominion judging competitions, the winners of which were given free trips to Ottawa in order to see the highlights of this capital city; they were here only a week or so ago. Boys from Durham county won two dominion-wide contests, in seed judging and potato judging, and were only six points from winning a third. Ours was the only county in the country to win two prizes. But now, after we have done a great deal to keep our young people on the farms, industry comes along and takes every available man. It seems to be well recognized that farm boys make the very best men in industry; of course they are good men anywhere. As I say, I am not arguing that the farmer is getting his fair share, or that the prices of the commodities which he has to sell are nearly high enough, but I do say that we are better off now than we were under the previous administration.

There is no class of people under the sun more willing to do what they can for Canada's war effort than the farmers. Wherever possible they have contributed to the war loans. Without complaint they have allowed their sons to leave the farms for their thirty-day training. They and their wives and families have interested themselves in the work of the Red Cross and other organizations which will help win this war, but they expect a fair and decent return for their labour, just as industry, just as the business man and just as the labouring man expect a fair return.

That brings me to the labour problem, which is a very important question in Ontario. With present prices of farm commodities it is impossible for the farmers to compete with industry as far as wages are concerned. I am not opposed to labour getting everything it can, because I believe that labour has been kept down too long.

But to-day hundreds of farmers in Ontario are leaving their farms and going to work in the shops because in two weeks they can earn more money there than they can make on a farm in three or four months. Perhaps we have overproduced. It is said that we have a surplus of eight hundred million bushels of wheat; we have been persuading Great Britain to take more of our pork, and we may have too much butter for home consumption. I should like, however, to sound a warning. I believe that if the war continues for another two or three years we may find that we have not enough of these commodities to meet the demand.

As I said before, many farmers are leaving the land to work in the factories. Many others told me they were just going to plough what land they could sow, take off and sell the crop and let the rest go. Other farmers to my knowledge are getting up early in the morning, doing their chores before daylight, driving to town and working in factories all day, then coming back and doing their chores again at night. In my opinion this sort of thing cannot continue. If anything can be done for the farmer in Ontario or in any other part of eastern Canada, or for the farmer in western Canada, it should be done now, before our whole system is upset.

In his speech delivered a few days ago the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) told us what we could sell to Great Britain in the coming year, and described in detail the agreement between Great Britain and Canada. He said that we may sell wheat and dairy products. In the latter group we must include cheese, and of that commodity we are to sell all we can produce, at a price of 14.4 cents a pound to the producer. We are to sell bacon and other cured meats, canned and fresh fish, poultry, eggs, canned fruits and vegetables—but practically no fresh fruits. As a fruit grower it is natural that I should be disappointed in Great Britain's decision not to take our apples. If, however, that decision has been made, we shall have to make the best of our home market.

Great Britain is willing to take some $12,000,000 worth of fish from the maritime provinces, and with that provision I am pleased. As farmers we are not satisfied with the price of bacon set by the British government, but if it is a price which permits the farmer to know exactly what he is going to get the year round, the situation may not be too bad. To-day the farmer in Ontario should receive at least $8.50 per hundredweight, live weight, at his barn, if he is going to get any return on his expenditure. The price of farm produce to-day is altogether too low, when compared with what the farmer has to pay. All kinds of implements of production have increased in price. Lumber, building materials, wire fencing, hardware of all kinds, boots and shoes and practically all the necessities of life have advanced in price at least to some degree. Some have not advanced very much, but have done so sufficiently to make the difference between profit and loss to the farmer. Hundreds of farmers are to-day making only a bare living on the land, and every assistance is necessary if they are to keep going, and do their best to help in Canada's war effort.

I do impress upon the government the necessity of seriously considering the condition in which the farmers of eastern Canada as well as those in the west find themselves. Let us all try to work together, and do something to help the farmer in his war effort. Let us work toward the building of a greater Canada.

On motion of Mr. Ilsley the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

The house met at three o'clock.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Wednesday, November 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Brooke Claxton for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Blackmore.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, some members of the house are intensely interested in government finance, some only mildly so, and some, I fear, not very much at all. But all are entitled to a clear presentation of whatever the government may wish to say on the subject and I have therefore given some thought to the arrangement of my remarks.

These will fall naturally under four heads—principles, developments, criticisms and prospects. And it will be my object to present under these heads, and with all possible brevity, the facts and observations relating to government finance which I believe deserve the attention of this house.

The principles of our war finance policy have been stated before but will bear repetition. Briefly summarized these principles are:

1. That in real terms, that is to say in terms of the loss to the nation of the production required for war purposes, the war is paid for substantially while it is in progress.

2. That the limits of what we can devote to war purposes are not financial but, as previously stated in this house, are physical, mental and moral, that is to say, the physical limits of our resources and the mental and moral capacity of Canadians to bear burdens and make sacrifices.

3. That the task of finance is not only to provide the funds which are used to pay for the war services but more fundamentally is, by taxing and borrowing, to restrict the civilian demand for economic resources in order that they will be available to the defence or supply departments when required.

4. That in discharging this function, finance must keep in step with the defence and supply programme.

5. That for this purpose, taxation, as far as practicable, is a better method than borrowing because it is fairer and final.

6. That taxation should be imposed upon a basis of equality of sacrifice, having regard to ability to pay.

7. That there are practical limits beyond which taxation cannot be carried, so that the government must also do some borrowing, which should be as far as possible out of voluntary public savings.

8. That the third method of war finance, namely, inflation, is the most unfair, the most uneconomical and the most dangerous of all methods of financing a war.

9. That in the early stages of a war, some expansion of credit is often possible without inflation.

10. That later, as the resources of the country become fully employed, monetary or credit expansion necessarily brings about inflation unless offset by strict counter-measures, such as severe taxation.

These principles have been laid down repeatedly in this house by spokesmen for the government, particularly in the budget speeches of September, 1939, and June, 1940. Every step of a financial character which the government has taken has been based upon these principles and it is the policy of the government to continue to follow them.

I may add that as far as I can judge or ascertain, these principles have met with widespread approval in the country. In so far as there can be said to be a public opinion on principles of war finance, the principles I have outlined are in accord with the overwhelming preponderance of Canadian public opinion.

May I now review the main events or developments relating to government finance which have taken place since the end of July, when I last spoke on this subject in the house.

First, I should mention the very rapid acceleration in war expenditures which has taken place during the last few months. War expenditures in June and July had been in the neighbourhood of $40,000,000. For August they amounted to $59,000,000; for September to $67,000,000, and for October to about $82,000,000, which is at a rate of very nearly one billion dollars a year.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not wish to interrupt the minister, but would he be good enough to say whether these expenditures were actual payments, or commitments?

Mr. ILSLEY: Payments.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Thank you.

Mr. ILSLEY: So far as I have been able to ascertain, war expenditures will continue to rise as our military, naval and air programmes develop. I do not know whether hon. members fully realize what it means for this country to be spending at the rate of one billion dollars a year on war purposes, the rate which we have already reached. That is nearly twice our normal peace-time rate of expenditure of all kinds. It is about one-fifth, probably more than one-fifth, of our national income.

Non-war expenditures during the first six months of this fiscal year have been about $29,000,000 less than in the similar period last year. The reductions to be achieved in the second half year will be larger in the case of most items than those in the first, particularly in the major items of public works and relief: in the first because the fiscal year had already begun before the new policy was fully operative, and in the second because the winter relief load is larger than the summer and there is more room for saving.

On the side of revenue, receipts during the fiscal year up to yesterday were about $145,000,000 more than at the same date last year and have been well in line with the budget forecasts, bearing in mind the normal and anticipated variations through the year. If anything, the budget estimates are apt to prove slightly conservative as regards revenue. The first returns from the national defence tax are proving to be somewhat better than the necessarily approximate estimates that were made without previous experience of this kind of tax. It is worth noting, moreover, that the increases in taxes made in the June budget were largely in the form of income and excess profits taxes to be collected next year so that the amounts of taxes accruing on this year's incomes are greater than the revenues now being received.

In this connection, I wish to call your attention to the announcement which was made in September about the monthly instalment plan for payment of income tax due next year. I said I would introduce an amendment to the act which would provide that if anyone paid one-third of his income tax in four equal monthly instalments before April 30th, he would be permitted to pay the balance in four equal monthly instalments in May, June, July and August without having to pay interest as in the normal way. I trust that as many taxpayers as possible will take advantage of this plan, and begin to save now for their income tax payments. Otherwise, there may be a rude awakening when the magnitude of the tax payable becomes recognized.

In addition to our own war expenditures British war expenditures in Canada have been accelerating greatly in recent months, and we have assisted Great Britain in providing Canadian dollars to enable them to make these larger purchases. You will recall that during the summer it was announced that another large repatriation of Canadian securities from Britain had been arranged, in the form of the redemption of the dominion 4 per cent stock 1940-60 of which the amount outstanding in the hands of the public was about 17 million pounds sterling. At the end of last month another similar transaction was announced in the repatriation of the Grand Trunk 4 per cent perpetual consolidated debenture stock, payment of interest on which is guaranteed by the dominion. This operation should eventually result in the transfer of about $109 millions to British account in Canada. Moreover, arrangements have been made with the British authorities under which their agents will market directly in Canada certain other British holdings of dominion guaranteed and corporate securities. Needless to say, it has been agreed that these sales will be carried out from time to time in an orderly way so as not to disturb our markets.

I might add by way of explanation that between these various major repatriation transactions, we provide Canadian dollars to the British authorities on a temporary basis through the accumulation on our part of sterling balances which are then liquidated in the larger transactions. While I am not free to disclose to you in advance the probable amounts of dollars to be provided to the British government from time to time—they depend on various circumstances—I think I may safely say they have recently been running at an annual rate of substantially more than the two hundred million figure mentioned by my predecessor in his budget address of last June.

Another financial requirement which is frequently overlooked in assessing our total financial problem is the amount of money which must be tied up in the purchase and holding of wheat by the wheat board. The fact that these large sums are not obtained directly from the treasury but by commercial type loans, guaranteed by the dominion, should not blind us to the drain which they make upon the nation's savings, quite apart from any losses which the treasury will ultimately be called upon to bear. If it were not necessary to obtain funds from the banks for this purpose these funds would be available for other purposes, including war expenditure. The large crop which has been harvested in the months since my last review of our financial position will mean that we must anticipate the tying up of a large sum in financing the enormous carry-over of wheat that we shall almost certainly have next year. From the immediate financial point of view the financing of these wheat supplies raises the same problems as the financing of any other form of expenditure.

Our borrowing operations since July have taken three forms—the sale of non-interest bearing certificates, the war savings certificates campaign, and the second war loan. We have continued to receive a substantial number of interest-free loans from public-spirited citizens. Up to November 18 the total number of such non-interest bearing loans was 466, and their total amount was $2,843,297.07.

The war savings campaign has been carried forward continuously, and I want to express my thanks for the enthusiastic voluntary cooperation which we have received from the many people all across the country who are helping us with this work. Up to yesterday we have raised a total amount of $22,493,236 by the sale of war savings certificates and about $1½ millions more by the sale of war savings stamps that have not yet been turned in for the purchase of certificates. Systems of regular savings out of wages and salaries have been established in several thousand firms throughout the country. A good start has been made, but we must do very much more. Sales of certificates in recent months have been running about two and a half million dollars a month, which is far short of the amount we must sell in order that this savings campaign may take its proper place in financing the enormous war expenditures that are now being made each month. A meeting was held in Ottawa last month of the chairmen of the various provincial war savings committees, and a new and much larger objective was set and a reorganization and intensification of the whole campaign begun. The objective of this campaign for 1941 is $120 millions—ten million a month. This is going to require that far more of our people shall make regular war savings out of their incomes.

The most important financial event of the past few months was, of course, the second war loan, issued in September. This issue was in the form of 12-year three per cent bonds offered to the public at 98¾ to yield 3⅛ per cent to maturity. We asked for cash subscriptions of $300,000,000 and, in addition, invited holders of dominion bonds which matured on September 1 to convert their holdings of this issue into the new war loan bonds. Subscription books for the loan opened on Monday, September 9, and remained open for two weeks. Total cash subscriptions amounted to $342,248,300 or about $42,000,000 more than was offered and allotted. Conversion subscriptions received and accepted amounted to $24,946,200.

There has been a good deal of criticism in regard to this issue and the way in which it was handled. Many of these criticisms cancel each other out: for instance, some contended that the issue went slowly because the interest yield was too low and others because the interest yield was too high. Other criticisms, although made I am sure in good faith, were based on misunderstanding, and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) has gone so far as to call the issue "a flop." I think it will be possible for me to clear up some of these misunderstandings and to demonstrate that the contention of my hon. friend has no justification.

In regard to the general organization of the campaign, which was perhaps subject to most criticism and misunderstanding, let me explain that there are two general types of loan campaign which it is possible to use. The first is the so-called professional type, which places chief reliance upon the professional machinery of investment dealers, banks and brokers, which has been developed over a period of years to handle the marketing of securities, and only secondary reliance upon the voluntary assistance of public-spirited citizens organized into national and provincial committees. The second, or so-called cooperative plan of campaign, is the type that was used in connection with the victory loans of the last war and the community chest drives of peace time. It involves the most comprehensive organization of the whole community with a vast army of amateur volunteer workers assisting the professionals in the canvass of their allotted districts, and, as well, a tremendous amount of advertising and publicity.

Last fall we gave the most careful consideration to the method of organizing for the first war loan. We studied the methods used in the successful campaigns of the closing years of the last war and, while realizing that there would come a time when they would again be necessary in the course of this war, we decided against using them for our first issue because they are more expensive, give rise to many difficulties—as, for instance, in the allotment of territory—and particularly in the early stages of the war would give the impression, unwarranted in this case, that we were under the necessity of calling up the last reserves.

The first war loan, organized on the so-called professional basis, was so outstanding a success that it would have been difficult to justify changing immediately the basis of organization and resorting in the case of the second war loan to the far more elaborate and more expensive type of organization.

Indeed, in my own opinion, the greatest difficulty which we had to overcome in our second campaign was a degree of over-confidence that had been developed in the minds of investors by the too rapid success of the first war loan. Particularly the small investors apparently felt that the loan would be subscribed almost overnight and that therefore there was no need for their assistance. That was why the loan appeared to lag in the first few days of the campaign, and it was only after we had brought home to the small investor that his help was desired and needed that we secured the splendid response which resulted in the oversubscription to which I have referred.

That oversubscription is only one indication of the success of the loan. Another is found in the number of individual subscriptions and the response of the small investor. The number of individual subscriptions amounted to the substantial total of 150,890, and, what is more important, we received no fewer than 100,746 subscriptions of $500 and less, with an average of $273 each. In view of these figures I regard the success of the loan as satisfactory, although not outstanding. The loan would have been an outstanding success if ten or fifteen per cent more had been taken by small investors and ten or fifteen per cent less by large buyers.

Furthermore, the number of small subscriptions should be considered in the light of the fact that bonds of this second war loan were not offered in $50 denominations. The fifty-dollar denomination was dropped because it was felt that persons who could afford to subscribe only for amounts of $50 or less could more appropriately purchase war savings certificates, which have been continuously on sale since May 27, and which are issued in the registered form with interest accumulating on a compound interest basis until maturity. While the special advantages of this type of security for the small investor will be readily apparent, it does seem to me that in future war loan issues we should again issue the fifty-dollar denomination in order to allow every investor, small and large, to participate in the tremendous patriotic effort of our war loan campaigns.

Someone has suggested that because it took two weeks to sell the second war loan it was not a success. That view implies a complete misunderstanding of the desiderata involved in the sound distribution of securities. If we wish to depend on large corporations and large financial institutions to buy our bonds, perhaps a campaign of two or three days would be all that would be necessary, but no one with experience in the security business would regard this as sound or satisfactory distribution. We believe that in the interests of the public as well as of the treasury, dominion securities should be as widely distributed as possible among individual investors who intend to hold their bonds as a permanent investment. It is ridiculous to believe that this distribution can be obtained in a few days in a country like Canada where the population is scattered over so large an area. The victory loan campaigns of the last war lasted for at least two weeks, and personally I shall endeavour to see that in our future loan campaigns the books of the loan are kept open for at least this long a period in order to give an opportunity for everyone to subscribe.

There is one further point I should like to mention. In thinking of our September loan it is necessary to remember that it was the second of two public loans issued during 1940, or rather during the first nine months of 1940. From these two loans and from the sale of war savings certificates, war savings stamps and non-interest-bearing certificates we have raised during the calendar year to date a total of approximately $524,000,000 in cash from private and institutional investors other than banks. That is a record of which Canada has every reason to be proud, particularly when we remember the interest rates at which the funds have been raised and the extent to which taxes have been increased to pay for this war. To my mind there is no comparison between this record and the record of financing during the last war when 5 per cent or 5½ per cent bonds on a tax-free basis were sold, sometimes at a discount, in an era of inflationary expansion of incomes.

I come now to some of the criticisms which have been made of our financial policies and administration.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

These have been of two types: criticism of details and criticism of principle. To the first type belong the observations of the leader of the opposition, who took no exception to our policies on grounds of principle, if I understood him correctly, but took exception to their application in certain respects.

I have already replied, I think, to his criticism of the second war loan.

His next point was a more serious one. He said:

> I lay at the feet of the administration the charge of having imposed tremendously heavy and oppressive taxation by the 1940 budget.

And later:

> We are taxing the well-disposed to the limit. There is no equality of sacrifice in the 1940 budget. I place the responsibility for this squarely upon the administration.

As the additional taxes imposed by the last budget were steeply graduated and as the taxes imposed under the Excess Profits Tax Act are generally, I think universally, regarded as severe, it would almost appear that the leader of the opposition, in speaking about the "well-disposed" means the well-to-do, and that when he says there is "no equality of sacrifice," he means that the rich are called upon to sacrifice more on a percentage basis than the poor.

These charges are well founded. The well-to-do are being taxed very heavily and at higher percentage rates than those in the lower income brackets. But when we announced the principle of equality of sacrifice we made it clear that it was equality of sacrifice having regard to ability to pay.

It is interesting to find the leader of the Conservative party, which has been demanding a greater and ever greater war effort, already complaining about the tax burden which that effort involves. Make no mistake about this. If we are really honest in demanding a war effort to the utmost we all must expect to be taxed until it hurts. Taxes that can comfortably be paid are not enough.

Next, the leader of the opposition says that there has been great extravagance in government expenditures and that the treasury must step in and put a brake on foolish and extravagant expenditure. The hon. gentleman would hardly contend that he proved his case by the examples cited. However, I have no doubt that in the extensive and complicated organization that has been set up for the prosecution of our war effort all over this dominion there will be some instances where full value is not obtained for the money expended. All I can say is that my colleagues and I realize our responsibility in that regard. I agree with the opposition that nothing could be more unfortunate than to have the impression go out among the people that the money they place in our hands, in trust, for a high cause, is not being prudently, carefully and responsibly expended. But, Mr. Speaker, as far as the Department of Finance is concerned we are eternally vigilant in that regard; and I feel sure that the same observation applies to my colleagues and to their responsible officials.

I would say to the leader of the opposition, and to every other hon. member of this house, that if he knows of any instance of misuse or overexpenditure or extravagant expenditure of public money I should be glad if he would bring it to my attention or to the attention of the head of the department concerned, because we do not intend to permit that to take place. If there have been incidents—and the ones cited by my hon. friend were of a very minor character—I think they could properly be regarded as isolated instances which must be taken as accidents, incidental to a huge undertaking carried on at the speed necessary in war time.

The leader of the opposition also suggested that in every field of war endeavour this country is far behind our sister dominion, Australia; and he asked for a comparison of our war effort with theirs. I need hardly say that I do not wish to make any invidious comparisons, particularly in view of all the different circumstances; but I might tell the hon. member that the latest information I have been able to obtain shows that Australian war expenditures for their current fiscal year, which ends June 30 next, are estimated at 177 million Australian pounds, or at current exchange rates, about $630,000,000. This is almost exactly two-thirds of the estimate I gave the house in August for our own war expenditure for the year ending March 31 next; and as the hon. gentleman himself pointed out, this is about the ratio of the population of the two countries. On this basis it would appear that the efforts of the two countries are of the same general order of magnitude. But the leader of the opposition has overlooked the very substantial assistance which Canada's greater wealth enables her to render to the United Kingdom by means of our repatriation programme, which has no counterpart in the case of Australia.

These, I think, were the main criticisms offered by the leader of the opposition. He did me the honour of addressing me rather directly in the debate and therefore I have answered him with some care, though it was not my intention to make what in any sense could be regarded as a debating speech. It is significant, I think, that the principles of our war finance policy have not been challenged by the official opposition but that criticism has been confined to detail.

With regard to the opposition led in the house by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), it has not been possible for me to be in the house throughout the entire debate; but, so far as I know, no member of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation has attacked our financial policy in principle. Of course the general position of that party is that the whole organization of industry in Canada is wrongly conceived and that war production should be on a socialistic basis. Probably this is not the time to debate this question. I think it is obvious, however, that a rapid increase in production and the utmost efficiency of production are necessary in time of war; and apart from all other and far more important considerations, to attempt to reorganize our commercial, industrial and financial institutions upon a principle thoroughly disliked and disapproved of by the overwhelming majority of the Canadian public would of itself have been most prejudicial to production. The dislocation of industry which would be involved in the adoption of the proposals of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation; the dissolution of the structure of industry which is implicit in the position of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, certainly should be avoided at a time when we are seeking and must seek the cooperation of all Canadians in our war effort. I need hardly add that should this cooperation not be forthcoming from those in control of any plant or industry, the government has ample power to take appropriate action and will not hesitate to use it.

I now come to the criticism offered by the leader of the Social Credit group, the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore). Here our principles are challenged, and I think it may be necessary for me to say something about the challenge and the arguments advanced in support of it.

The leader of the Social Credit group, after moving a subamendment reflecting on the monetary policy of the government, proceeded to say:

> Social credit proposes to use the national credit to provide money without additional debt, without additional taxation.

By the providing of money I assume he means the creation of money. Indeed, later in his speech he says:

> Let us consider the matter of created money. What an all-wise attitude was taken by some people when reference was made to the creation of money!

Thus he made it clear that for the raising of money by taxing and borrowing he would substitute the provision or creation of money by the government. I have stated already that our war expenditures are now running at the rate of almost a billion dollars a year. I ask members of the house, any hon. member, this question: Does anyone think that the creation of something like a billion dollars a year in money by the government for war purposes would not result in wild inflation? There can be only one answer to that question, unless indeed some extremely severe and comprehensive counteracting measures were taken at the same time. In his speech the hon. gentleman seemed to recognize this, because he goes into the question of counter-measures.

In his speeches in this house, of which I have listened to a good many, I think the hon. gentleman has consistently admitted the evils of inflation. There is no doubt that Canadians could be made to curtail their civilian demands and free economic resources for war demands by inflation. If prices were to be doubled to-morrow there would be no doubt about the curtailment of civilian demand that would ensue. But, as I stated in the beginning of my remarks, this would be the most unfair, the most uneconomical and the most dangerous method of war financing that could possibly be adopted. In countries where there has been a period of serious inflation the people look upon inflation as a national calamity. Fortunately we in this country have not passed through such a period and our people are in no position from experience to form an opinion of the evils of inflation. If they had suffered those evils they would dread them as they would a great plague.

The leader of the Social Credit group apparently realizes those evils and therefore enumerates counter-measures. What are they? First, he says inflation can be controlled by employing credit restriction. Needless to say he does not mention this method with approval; as a matter of fact that is what he criticizes. Next, he says another way is by taxing the people until they have no money to spend. He makes it clear that he is not in favour of taxation as a method of combating inflation. Next, he seems to advocate a sort of universal bonus to consumers, and, later in his speech, he advocates that bonuses be also paid to many, if not all, classes of producers.

Now, with respect to this matter of universal bonusing: If the government, for the purpose of keeping prices down to consumers, pays them bonuses, or, in other words, assumes and pays part of the prices they are paying for the goods they buy, this will require large expenditures on the part of the government out of the newly-created money and will increase the evil which it is designed to abate.

The more these prices rise, due to the issue of these large sums of money, the larger will be the proportion of these prices the government will have to pay, and the greater will be the amount of newly-created money the government will have to issue. The more they issue, the more prices will rise, and so on.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wonder if the minister is making allowance for the fact I emphasized particularly, that there would be no rise in prices, provided production was adequate.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall come to the matter of production, and our capacity to produce.

Then, the hon. gentleman mentions the method of counteracting inflation which is, in my opinion, the only alternative to taxation or borrowing out of savings which is really worthy of consideration. This is price fixing on a universal scale, which, of course, would have to be accompanied by rationing and regimentation, also on a universal scale; because it is obvious that to fix prices without limiting the amount any one person can buy will mean that only the first comers will be served. So that there would have to be rationing, along with price fixing.

Price fixing of a few commodities, indeed rationing of a few commodities, is possible and need not have a very serious effect, but price fixing and rationing on a general scale have at least two disadvantages.

In the first place, this would call for bureaucratic interference in the private affairs of all Canadian citizens. Perhaps I am speaking a little bit figuratively here, but generally speaking there would have to be a government spy in every grocery store. The Germans did this with some success, but the Germans are experts as spies.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. ILSLEY: Let me proceed, please.

The second objection is that to issue quantities of money and then sterilize a large part of it by rendering it useless for buying purposes so that it will not come into competition with the money used by the government in its buying and thereby cause prices to rise, leaves the holder of the money no better off than if he did not have it. This is equivalent to taxation or a forced loan.

The whole habit of thought of the Canadian people, the dislike of intensive and general government intervention in their personal transactions and private affairs, would make a universal system of price fixing and rationing, even if it were practicable in Canada, far more odious, I am satisfied, than a system of taxation and borrowing out of savings, which is the policy of this government.

Every detail of our economic life would have to be controlled by someone sitting here in Ottawa.

It is true that the nazis in Germany have gone nearly as far as this with their price fixing and rationing. But even they, with a dictatorship and with years of experience before the war, have had to combine this price fixing with very heavy war taxation and with borrowing enormous sums at interest rates higher than we pay in Canada.

Mr. BLACKMORE: But we are fixing the price of milk.

Mr. ILSLEY: I said that to a limited extent it was possible, but certainly not to the extent which would be necessary if we created money from year to year with which to carry on the war.

Furthermore, if we did succeed, by price fixing, in preventing inflation resulting from the financing of the war by creating new money, we would in the end only reach the same result that we shall reach by sounder methods; for if war production is to be the same in each case there will only be the same remainder of resources left over for civilian purposes. The new money dammed up in the public's pockets would be useless to it during the war, and after the war it would come bursting forth in a flood that would create inflation as soon as the rigid war-time price controls were once relaxed.

There is another, and, from a war point of view, more fundamental point. It is suggested that we should finance by issuing new money so that we can bring all useful resources into production and avoid curtailing civilian demand. But if we are really to put forth a maximum effort in the war we must not only bring all our resources into use but, in addition, restrict as far as possible civilian use of all those resources which can be used for war. As I emphasized in the budget speech in the first week of war, it is necessary to increase employment and production to the maximum; but that is only part of our task; we must also divert all we can from civilian to war use. We should certainly not be doing that if we refrained from borrowing and taxing.

In fact very great increases in employment and production have been achieved since the war began. The index of industrial production in September was at 167 compared with 127 immediately before the outbreak of war. The index of employment at the beginning of October was at a new record—136·2. It indicated a total increase of wage earners in employment, as compared with the month preceding the outbreak of war, of about 350,000 persons. This does not include about 200,000 men added to our armed forces since war began.

Consequently, the total number of persons in employment and in the services has increased by something like 550,000 since the outbreak of war. In very few industries has there been any decrease of employment; highway construction is the only significant item to show a decrease and that is due mainly to the disappearance of what was really a relief work.

From an examination of these and other figures it seems clear that so far our war activities, both in the services and in production, have not required any significant reduction of civilian activity or expenditure, though, of course, many individuals have had to restrict their consumption. In fact the figures for retail sales, and production and imports of consumers' goods, indicate that total civilian consumption, particularly of luxury goods, has increased significantly during the war, even when allowance is made for somewhat higher prices. This remarkable economic expansion which we have had in the last fifteen months has not been accompanied by any significant general increase in prices, except the increase which occurred in the early weeks of the war consequent upon the changes in exchange rates and ocean freights and insurance.

This brings me to a consideration of the prospects which we now face in the financial and economic sphere. As the military and supply programmes develop they will require an increasing number of men and amount of materials. Analyses are at present being made of the various elements in these programmes in order to see just what they do require in terms of labour and materials; for those, and not money, are the limiting factors. In fact, one of the principal reasons for setting up the war-time requirements board, which the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) described to you yesterday, was to assist in the analysis of these physical requirements and the implications which they involve for civilian consumption. It is on the basis of such information that we must decide what we can accomplish.

It is certain, however, that the programmes upon which we have already embarked will create many scarcities and, before many months have passed, carry us to the stage of full employment of our labour power and full utilization of most of our economic resources.

We still have some unemployed labour despite the great increase in employment which I have just mentioned. We still have some excess capacity in a number of our industries. Furthermore, we have many people employed in industries not essential to the war programme and we can, if necessary, shift many tens of thousands of people from agriculture and trade into war industries, or into other industries to replace people needed in war industries. In other words, we are now at a stage where we can still expand total production by a careful use of those resources which are unemployed or poorly employed. War production can and will be expanded even more than this by transferring resources from civilian purposes to war use. But all this expansion and transfer requires careful management and takes time. In particular, it requires the training of labour to fit it for new tasks, and the most efficient use of skilled labour. Measures have been and are being taken to ensure that this necessary training and efficient use of labour are carried out.

Facing the prospect of substantially increased requirements for war production under these conditions, I think it is higly essential that all of us should economize all we can and not spend our incomes on things which compete for labour and materials with war production. We must save and invest our savings either immediately in war savings certificates or later in next year's war loan.

I quite realize that the view is held that it is not wise to ask people to reduce their expenditures while there is still any unemployment or any room for expansion of production. But, as I have already stated, we are now running into shortages more and more frequently. The expanding war demand will continue to absorb the existing unemployed. The civilian demand will also be growing because of increased employment and earnings in war industries. Therefore, even if we do increase our savings, employment and production will continue to increase rapidly.

We have recently been giving consideration to our programme of financing for the next twelve months. Two decisions have had to be reached. The first relates to the character of the organization which should be set up on the next occasion when a large war loan is being sold to the public. The second decision relates to the time of issue of such a loan. It is our belief that the time has now arrived when we must resort to the cooperative type of organization to which I have already referred. The amount which we will need to raise will require the creation of a broad national organization to ensure that all persons who are financially able to subscribe for war bonds shall be directly approached. As a people, we must develop a full understanding of our joint responsibility for the results we wish to obtain. I can say that the government will do its utmost to ensure that the organization built up will be equal to its task. I am certain that we shall receive from all quarters the cooperation and generous assistance without which success cannot be obtained.

Turning now to the question of the timing of the next loan, I believe that there is a great deal to be said for not undertaking a public appeal until the summer of 1941. By that time the budget will have been brought down, the great bulk of 1940 income tax payments will have been made, and individuals as well as institutions will be in a good position to know how 1941 will turn out for them from a financial point of view. If we were to come to the public with a loan in the early part of 1941, potential investors would still be faced with a number of difficulties and uncertainties. Furthermore, the type of comprehensive community organization which it is proposed to use is of such a character as to make it undesirable and indeed practically impossible to have two such campaigns following closely upon each other. This type of organization is cumbersome and requires a great deal of preliminary preparation and planning, and from the point of view of cost it is more easy to justify if the size of the loan is substantial.

Our decision not to issue the third war loan until next summer will make it necessary to undertake some short-term financing shortly after the beginning of the new year. It will be recalled that in the budget speech delivered on September 12, 1939, I said that our first borrowing operation would be of a short-term character and would be accompanied by a small and carefully regulated amount of credit expansion. I stated that expansion of credit, while appropriate during the early stages of war, should not be continued when employment and production were approaching their limits. I have not had occasion to change my basic views on this subject, but I believe that the tax programme of the government has been and will continue to be such that some additional financing of a short-term character, accompanied by some increase in total bank deposits, will not under the circumstances have inflationary results, and will, I believe, avoid undue stringency in the monetary field at a time when the working capital requirements of industry are increasing because of expanding business activity due to war orders. In forming these views, I have given some weight to the fact that uncertainties bred of war and the necessity of building up substantial balances in anticipation of tax payments have made many people somewhat reluctant to deplete their bank balances, and anxious to keep in a good liquid position.

In deciding to undertake some additional short-term financing, the government also had in mind the fact that the major portion of the new money which will have to be borrowed prior to next summer will be required for the activities of the foreign exchange control board. It has been decided that the board will finance the repatriation programme to a greater extent than it has in the past, and additional funds will be necessary for this purpose. You will recall that the process of repatriation involves the temporary accumulation of sterling balances by the foreign exchange control board, and these balances are later used to acquire Canadian securities held in the United Kingdom.

I believe that these decisions in regard to our financing programme will commend themselves to the financial public as well as the general public, and will enable the government and our people to make adequate preparations for assuring that the third war loan will be a resounding success. It has been stated by several ministers in this house in recent months that, in the words of the Prime Minister:

> The only limits the government is prepared to place upon Canada's war effort are those imposed by the extent of our resources both human and material and by our capacity for sacrifice.

And that:

> We will make financially possible the utmost effort the people of Canada are physically and morally capable of making.

This does not mean, however, that we shall have no financial problems to face. In fact it means quite the reverse—that we are going ahead no matter what financial problems may be created by the need to finance the enormous military and supply expenditures. It is going to require the most careful attention to both the physical and the financial aspects of the programme. On the one hand we must determine what is physically possible and we must make sure that all our physical resources, our man-power, capital facilities and materials, are used to the fullest extent possible and as quickly as possible. On the other hand, it requires the most skilful and thorough financial management in order to assure that these physical resources are made available for carrying out the war programme quickly and efficiently.

This policy implies that our financial problem will be one of tremendous magnitude—that we must be prepared to raise very large sums of money in one way or another and divert ever-increasing amounts of our national income into the treasury. It will be no easy task. It will require the utmost skill, the most energetic direction and hard, unremitting work on the part of the government and people alike, but I believe that we can do by voluntary action as much as the enemy is doing by the most rigid compulsion. I have faith in our ability to match and surpass their effort once our people are aroused.

When we came together here in May last, Great Britain was meeting with reverses in Norway, the low countries were being overrun by the enemy, and our ally France was on the brink of the disaster which overtook her shortly afterwards. The Canadian people were willing to go to any length to aid Britain. Their private interests had second place. They were ready for any sacrifice. An invasion of England was believed to be imminent. The existence of the empire was in peril. Sectionalism and selfishness, the bane of democracy, perhaps of every form of government, were subordinated to patriotism. Burdens, whether tax burdens or others, were accepted with little complaint. Our main, if not our sole desire, was to help to win the war.

To-day, only a few months later, we are reassured, too much so. We feel, vaguely, that the important things in our lives are at stake, but we are not so sure that they are in jeopardy. Instead of a consciousness every waking moment of the deadly peril of a powerful enemy, many of us have a feeling that the battle of Britain is won, and that all is well. This optimism is excessive and dangerous. The war is not won. A far closer engagement with the enemy will be necessary long before we achieve victory. Not only must our fighting forces engage his, we must engage him in our civilian activities—by the making of sacrifices, the forgoing of pleasures, the devotion of our substance to the common cause—in these ways must all of us engage the enemy.

To-day there is heroism in the air, on the sea, in the deserts of Africa—and there is heroism among the common people of the motherland. Let their example be our inspiration. Civilian Canada has its responsibilities, easier to assume but no less important than those of civilian Britain. Let us assume those responsibilities with the same unselfishness and courage and determination.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, at the outset may I offer a word of encouragement to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) who has just taken his seat. Although he is one of the youngest members of the ministry, perhaps no member of the cabinet except the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is bearing a heavier burden at this time, and I think I may speak with the endorsation of the whole house when I say to him that he has our admiration, our respect and our best wishes in carrying on his very arduous work.

When we private members left Ottawa early in August, the battle of France had been lost and the battle of Britain had not yet begun. Every member felt grave concern. I think that the war has greatly reduced partisanship in this house; it has made each one of us a greater patriot. We all felt grave concern at that time about the outcome of the battle of Britain. We felt that the survival of Canada as a nation, in fact the survival of our Christian civilization, depended on that battle. To-day, only three and a half months later, there is a different feeling in the corridors of this house and across the country, because, while the battle of Britain may not have been won, the first stages of that battle have been won, and won by a few thousand young empire knights of the air, by the sturdiness of our empire sailors, and above all, won by the courage and the determination and—to sum it up—by the character of the ordinary men, women and children of Great Britain.

What an inspiration that is to us! What pride we feel at being their fellow-citizens of the British commonwealth! And yet, what a challenge to Canadians to throw our all into this struggle! I believe that the Canadian people are not only willing but are eager to do just that. But they look to the Canadian government for leadership, and they look to parliament, to the private members of this house, to make dead sure that the government carries out the promise contained in the speech from the throne, that this war will be prosecuted to the utmost of Canada's strength. The private member can do his part only by making suggestions and by pointing out errors. That is what I propose to do to-day, to the end that our war effort may be improved.

First of all may I suggest that the ministry adopt the attitude of welcoming criticisms and suggestions. The Prime Minister did that a year ago at the war session: he said, "I ask you all to give us suggestions and constructive criticism." But my impression of this session is that the ministry are now inclined to be resentful of suggestions. Perhaps that is also their attitude towards their own supporters. Perhaps there is reason for it in the fact that they are under terrific pressure, working long hours. They are tired out; I do not blame them for being a little quick on the trigger. But I urge them to remember that they as the leaders of Canada must never be satisfied that all is being done which can be done, that they must always try to do more. As the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras) said so fitly some days ago, they must attempt the impossible; because in this crisis everything we hold dear is at stake,—our freedom, our religion, the future of our children, and our very lives. How I wish that every German bomb which falls on Great Britain could din into our ears and imprint on our minds the words, "Hurry, Canada, hurry!"

Secondly, I suggest that the ministry emphasize to the Canadian people the difficulties and the dangers of the situation rather than the accomplishments of the government. Ask for help from our people. If you ask for that help you will get it. But it seems to me, although I may be influenced by the bias from which few of us can escape, that the ministry have been at great pains throughout this war period to justify their every move and to justify their every failure to move. They have continually talked about our war effort being "ahead of schedule," when the whole country knows that the schedule was totally inadequate. Government information bureaux have poured out printed matter to the same effect, and even in the interesting essays which have been read by ministers at the present session that note has been uppermost. The result has been, and I say this from many observations in western Canada, that the people are adopting the attitude: "Oh well, everything is being done that can be done; why should we worry?"

Our chief of staff said recently in an address that the thirty-day training plan had been a great help in arousing young Canadians to a sense of national obligation. Such would not have been necessary if the ministry had adopted another attitude. Their attitude constitutes a grave menace to Canada, because our people do not realize the dangers of the situation. For that reason I would ask ministers to think very deeply over the proposed amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne, and particularly the first paragraph, which says:

. . . this house regrets that the government has continued to soothe the Canadian people

I emphasize that word, "soothe."

—regarding the war effort of the nation, thereby creating a false sense of security when a clear-cut call to action is desperately needed.

The Right Hon. Winston Churchill has followed the opposite course. He said, among other things, in his first speech as Prime Minister to the British House of Commons, on May 13 of this year:

I have nothing to offer but blood, toil, tears and sweat. We have before us an ordeal of the most grievous kind. We have before us many, many months of struggle and suffering. You ask, what is our aim? I can answer in one word: It is victory. Victory at all costs, victory in spite of all terrors, victory, however long and hard the road may be, for without victory there is no survival! Let that be realized—no survival for the British empire, no survival for all that the British empire has stood for, no survival for the urge, the impulse of the ages, that mankind shall move forward towards his goal.

He knows his people. He knows that they can "take" bad news, that they will rise to the challenge of the difficult and seemingly impossible task. The Canadian people, Mr. Speaker, will do the same. But so far this government has given them little chance to do so.

The Minister of Finance has just explained clearly the necessity for the government to do certain things in which it will obviously require great help from the Canadian people. For example, our people are being asked not to purchase so many luxuries. There will probably be restrictions, perhaps on gasoline or some other such commodity, perhaps on liquor—and, incidentally, I do not think the Canadian people can drink their way to victory in this war; I believe a great deal of money could be saved and a great deal of human energy conserved if restrictions were placed on liquor. The government is also faced with the raising of war loans, selling war savings certificates, recruiting defence forces, finding men and women for industry, and organizing air raid precautions. These are some of the problems facing the ministry. Let them appreciate the fact that Canada is really organized on a community basis, divided into municipal or metropolitan areas in which there are highly organized and highly efficient municipal governments, service clubs, lodges, unions, religious associations, cooperatives, professional and business associations, sports clubs and many others made up of the leaders in the everyday life of our people. Incidentally may I here contrast the strength of this type of organization with which we are blest in Canada with the nazi party in Germany or the fascist party in Italy, the only organizations allowed in their respective countries. There is no comparison; and in that difference there lies one very good reason why the democracies are going to win this war.

I suggest to the ministry that they go to these organizations direct. Tell them what is wanted and ask them to help, and the organizations will respond. They will prevent hysteria and will get action. But what is the situation now? They are spectators against their wish. Many of them have made offers of help. Those offers are on file in Ottawa but nothing has been done about them. These people are waiting for directions from the government, and surely it is the duty of the Department of National War Services to see that organizations of this type are used.

May I quote from the order in council setting up the divisions of that new department. Paragraph (c) provides for a division to be known as:

. . . the division of voluntary services to administer the War Charities Act, to coordinate, organize and utilize the voluntary effort of the Canadian people, to organize and assist organizations engaged in supporting the war effort of the nation.

These are the powers that are given. This was printed on September 18, but, so far as I know, nothing further has been done. I hear an hon. member mentioning that I left out the women's associations. They are very important and I hasten to add them to the list.

Further, the government should decide upon and announce some definite policy on recruiting. They have never done so. Recruiting has been by fits and starts from the outset. Last fall on the outbreak of war the plan was to recruit for home service only, but this was afterwards changed and there was recruiting for overseas. A certain number of men were taken on the strength, and then recruiting was shut down. This spring came the crisis, the fall of France, and again recruiting was thrown open, but on August 15 of this year again it was stopped. In the meanwhile the National Resources Mobilization Act had been passed and we were told that thousands of young men, trainees, were to be given training. We understood that these young men would be encouraged to volunteer for the Canadian active service force at the completion of their training. In other words, here would be the means whereby Canada would build up a full-time fighting force. Mind you, these young men are the very men whom this government deemed to be best able to serve the country, men of the ages called up at this time; yet that plan was not carried out. Recruiting is still closed. The first group of trainees finished their course and instead of being given a chance to go into the forces, which they were only too anxious to do, they were sent back home to civilian life.

This uncertainty, this indecision, this failure to recruit cannot be because no more men will be required. I have only to quote again from a statement of the chief of staff, Major-General Crerar. He is reported in a press dispatch from Ottawa on October 23 as having said, in effect:

Canada will be sending more army divisions overseas next year when Great Britain takes the offensive against German land forces in continental Europe. This is the implication of the speech here this afternoon by Major-General Crerar, chief of the general staff. General Crerar is both in a position to know and also to speak with a note of exceptional authority.

This was confirmed by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), who, speaking in the house last Friday, said:

During this phase—

That is, during the year 1941.

—we must continue to build up our strength against the day when we shall take the offensive with all arms and services.

And the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Gardiner) made this statement on Thursday last:

We must have the necessary trained man-power to handle all the instruments of war and put them into operation against Hitler on the continent.

According to press reports, on November 18 he said in a broadcast:

Remember that in one year from now a man will be needed to use every gun, operate every plane and drive every truck made, and in the front line of battle. There is no reason for making these machines unless we provide for their being operated.

This failure to recruit cannot be because we already have adequate troops to defend Canada; we have not. We have one division on the Atlantic coast and it is hoped that there will be one division on the Pacific, but the latter division, according to the Minister of National Defence, is only now in the process of organization.

Certainly young Canadians who are to be called on to go overseas or to serve in Canada should be taken in quickly. The time for training is none too long if this great offensive is to come, as we have been warned, and adequate time for training means better soldiers, which means that the soldiers will have a better chance for their lives.

The ministry should remember that unlike Britain they are relying upon volunteers to build our full-time fighting forces. Before the average man will volunteer he must see the need. And he must have a certain amount of enthusiasm. He must have time to arrange his affairs and time to arrange for the persons who are dependent on him. In their recruiting plans it seems to me the ministry do not consider the human element at all. I suggest that they announce the approximate number of troops that are to be raised say within the next year. Australia and New Zealand do that; Great Britain lets her people know the number of men that are to be taken on, why cannot Canada do the same? Then let us take on a certain number of recruits, say weekly, and certainly let us give every trainee a chance to enlist on the completion of his training.

There are now women's corps established in several centres in Canada. We have two in Vancouver, training for many months, and most efficient. Why can they not be recognized and made part of the forces? I cannot praise too highly their initiative and spirit, their determination and their efficiency. They are training to take on clerical work, the driving of ambulances and motor vehicles of various kinds; for first aid, air raid protection, nursing and dietetic work. Why can they not be used in the forces of Canada? It seems to me there must be antiques or old fogies in our defence headquarters even yet, or there may even be some in the cabinet, when consistently these women are refused recognition.

May I further ask the government to decide upon and announce a policy on the use of man-power? To-day there seems to be a tug of war between the fighting forces on the one side and industry on the other. And that tug of war seems also to be in the cabinet. I may be wrong, but I have visions of the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Gardiner) as the anchor man on the side of the fighting forces, and the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) or the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) as the anchor man on the side of industry. While the Minister of National War Services may not be very bulky I think the majority of members would put their money on him in this tug of war. From the national registration the ministry have a survey of the man-power and woman-power of Canada. What does it show? Why can they not tell the house what it shows? Why do they not use that survey? Why have they no plans for using the man-power and woman-power of Canada?

Steps should be taken to recondition and use the older men, men who were laid off during the depression. I have here a letter from an ex-railway mechanic in Vancouver, in which he says that in that city alone there are many men who have served as machinists on one or other of the two railways; when the depression came they were let out, and since then they have been on part time only. Why cannot men of this type be put back to work to release some of the younger men for war service? There is a great field among the middle-aged people in Canada. Then there is a great field among the unemployed. The Minister of Labour himself was quoted on October 30 as using these words:

> Every unemployed man in Canada must be trained to take a place in industry. . . . There are 26,000 a year now being trained. We can increase that figure and we will.

Those are fine sentiments; that is a splendid plan. But what are the facts? Just a week ago in Vancouver we had newspaper reports to the effect that there are 500 single unemployed back in that city for the winter. Many of these men have appeared in the police court charged with vagrancy, and numbers of them have been sent to gaol because they have no means of support. Here is the impression of the young newspaper reporter sitting in at those trials:

> There were all sorts and conditions of men in those two lines and all they owned were the clothes they stood up in. One who said he had a job to go to and four who said they could look after themselves for another night were allowed to go. The rest were herded back to the cells.

That kind of thing is inexcusable in Canada under present conditions. Men of that type should be given a chance to be reconditioned and placed in a job. That should be done by the Department of Labour here at Ottawa.

Then there are the ex-soldiers discharged from the present Canadian army. I was surprised to learn the other day that over 15,000 men had been discharged from the Canadian forces. Surely those men could be reconditioned and placed at work. It seems to me that one of the most important statements that should be placed before the house at this time is a statement by the Minister of Labour as to what he proposes to do about using the man-power of this country.

I have a suggestion also for the Minister of Munitions and Supply. He told this house yesterday that hundreds of millions of dollars were being invested in new plants and plant extensions. He was allowed to place certain figures on Hansard, which I thought were going to show in which provinces those plants were situated; however the figures turned out to be something else. But there can be no dispute that practically all those plants and plant extensions are in Ontario and Quebec, the reason given being that there is hydro-electric power available in those provinces. This means an unfair and unhealthy concentration of wealth in the central provinces of Canada. It means a great increase in employment in these provinces; it means that the young men and young women of the other provinces will in many instances have to migrate to central Canada to get jobs. That is already happening. It means that families will be broken up, and it means lopsided development of industry. Many of these plants will continue in operation after the war, so that that process will carry on. I plead with the government to change that policy at once, to scatter these plants across Canada. There may not be much trouble now while the war is on; it may be overshadowed by more important issues, but hon. members from the other seven provinces know that if this thing goes on it will mean grave trouble in Canada for the next fifty or a hundred years.

Then as to the treatment of the fighting forces: I said a few moments ago that 15,000 men have been discharged. I believe they are discharged without any gratuity; in some cases they are given a small clothing allowance. A very few will get pensions. They are struck off the strength just as quickly as possible. Some of these men are on relief today. No rehabilitation plan has been put into effect by this government. The Prime Minister was quoted in the press two days ago as saying:

> Plans for the "adequate" rehabilitation of soldiers, sailors and airmen discharged from overseas service are being formulated by the dominion government.

Apparently nothing is ready yet. Rehabilitation plans should be in effect now. We could be experimenting, we could be improving, building up efficient schemes for getting these men back on their feet. It must not be delayed until after the war. Here we have almost the equivalent of an army division discharged from the Canadian active service force already. These men should be looked after without further delay. If they cannot be absorbed in industry, why cannot the government go ahead with the trans-Canada highway and other projects of that type, in which many of them could find employment?

Also I think the time has come, Mr. Speaker, when a man enlisting in the forces should receive an allowance for each child. At the present time, as I understand it, a man with more than two children receives no allowance for any beyond that number. The government is quite willing that these men should enlist; therefore it should see that they receive an allowance for each of their children.

The question of transportation on leave has been dealt with by many hon. members, and I would urge upon the government that some action be taken to meet this situation. Public opinion in Canada is in favour of giving these men some form of free transportation.

of making it possible for them to get home for their leaves, certainly their embarkation leave and I think, also, for their six months' leave. Why, we had units sent down to Nova Scotia from the Pacific coast. Some of the men in those units had not had embarkation leave, and they were moved out of our province on twenty-four hours' notice. Others are now entitled to their six months' leave, but it will be absolutely impossible for them to get back home if they have to pay even single fare. The same condition applies to the men in Newfoundland. Some of them now have the promise of leave in order to come back to central Canada, but that costs a great deal of money. These men will have to stay in Newfoundland unless some provision is made for them. I should like to quote briefly from a letter received from half a dozen of these men now in Newfoundland:

> This furlough is particularly important to us as we are not entitled to another one until December 1941 and just where we shall be then no one knows.

The Minister of Finance might very well soften his heart and agree to some provision being made to pay the transportation costs of these men.

Further I should like to say a word about winter accommodation. The other day the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) said that Canada had winter accommodation for 150,000 men. Yet in the public press, in newspapers supporting this government, such as the Vancouver Sun, we see reports denouncing conditions in the camp at Nanaimo. I quote the headlines only:

> Needless Suffering at Nanaimo Camp.
> Construction of Huts Delayed While Men Exist in Damp and Soggy Bell Tents—Excellent Site but Rains Create Misery.

That is from the Vancouver Sun of November 14, 1940. This condition was drawn to the attention of the Minister of National Defence, who, to his credit, took immediate steps to have it rectified. But it shows that somewhere on the staff there is a lack of interest in the welfare of these men, and because of that lack of interest men become sick, they are not fit and do not make as efficient soldiers as otherwise they would be. There is no excuse for putting hundreds of men into tents at this time of year, as was done at Nanaimo.

I might draw to the attention of the government many other things in connection with the army, but I hesitate to bring up a great many small matters. However, I should like to mention the plight of the Canadian people who are living on the ragged edge, such as the old age pensioners and the recipients of the war veterans' allowance. The cost of living is rising; according to the latest figures it is going up steadily. In September of last year, under the new index, it stood at 100.8. As of October 1, 1940 it stood at 107, and I believe it has been rising steadily since then. Relief allowances are being increased in some of our cities, but the people who are on very small fixed incomes are caught in a trap, and some provision must be made for them. The situation is very well set out in a letter I received this week from a recipient of the war veterans' allowance in Vancouver. He says:

> —there are hardly any of the necessities that have not been hopped up 15 to 20 per cent in the past two months.

Then he goes on:

> This is a poor time for anyone to ask for an addition to the strain that the country is undergoing but it is necessary that we ask . . . sufficient for a bare existence. The suggestion is that the government without amending any existing laws grant us a field allowance of 10 cents per day to be discontinued when conditions warrant . . . and we regret very much the necessity of asking for it.

That is a reasonable plea, and I submit to the Prime Minister that something must be done to meet this condition.

The Canadian people are looking to the ministry and to parliament for leadership in improving conditions here at home. They want the methods of carrying on the life of Canada changed to such an extent that far more value will be placed on people; that there will be a chance for everyone to work who is willing to work, and that there will be reasonable security for our people. Whenever I expressed those sentiments in Vancouver during the recess they were most heartily approved, no matter what the type of audience, and I believe that is the will of the Canadian people at this time. We find the same thoughts expressed in Great Britain. Yesterday Mr. Bevin, who has given such wonderful leadership there, was quoted in the press as having said that his aim is social security, and that something should be done about it even during the war. The report continues:

> "Begin now," he urged. "That doesn't mean that all profit and surpluses must be wiped out, but it means that the whole economic life shall be devoted to give security, not to a small middle class but to the comunity as a whole."

I quote also from an editorial appearing in the Illustrated London News of September 7, 1940. These people are being bombed night and day, yet they are trying to figure out ways to improve the general conditions of life in their country. This editorial states:

> . . . the ordinary Englishman (of all classes) wants a home which he can call his own and which no other man or men can take from him, security in his employment, pride in his work, a decent chance for his children to do better than himself, and, in at any rate a very large number of cases, a bit of land to sweat and ruminate over and in which to grow flowers and vegetables. He also wants the right, again within reason, to criticize his employers and his rulers and to change his job and his political allegiance as he thinks fit.

I think the average Canadian wants the same thing; in fact I hope many Canadians wish to change their political allegiance. But this new world, which many seem to think will begin after the war, really began in September of last year. The ministry should arrange that the house give consideration to just what is to be done about it, when we meet after the new year.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that we in this nineteenth parliament are privileged to lead a young nation, strong and brave; standing firmly in a just cause; a young nation blessed with the best friends any nation could have, her sister nations of the British commonwealth and our great and friendly neighbour the United States; a young nation that is steadily growing in importance in world affairs and steadily assuming more and more responsibility. It is true that never before have the Canadian people had to face such challenging problems, but it is also true that never before have they had such an opportunity to revise their national plans, to remedy defects and to adopt far-reaching policies. In this nineteenth parliament we have an opportunity to mould a nation—our own nation, Canada. I believe if the ministry will only put this parliament to work, the spirit of hon. members is such that we can leave a record of service which will prove to have been unequalled in the history of Canada.

Mr. L. PHILIPPE PICARD (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this debate. But some of my friends, and particularly my English-speaking friends, have asked me why more members from the province of Quebec have not expressed their views respecting the problems of the day. In fact I believe the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) said that somebody should speak on behalf of the eastern farmers. I admit I am not yet qualified to speak for farmers. I will tell my hon. friend, however, that before this parliament has run its course I shall have done my very best to learn the eastern farmers' problems, and I hope by that time to be able to express the views held by farmers, particularly in the light of the fact that I represent an entirely rural constituency adjoining the city of Quebec.

I suppose my first and most important duty would be to congratulate those to whom I believe congratulations should go. May I begin by extending my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Claxton) and the seconder (Mr. Jutras) of the address in reply, each of whom performed his task perfectly. Both have shown, by their understanding of national problems, that Canada can be made into a great country, a country where both the east and the west, the people of both French and English descent, may meet on common ground to work for the greatness and unity of Canada.

As a French-speaking member I believe my congratulations should go, next, to the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson), the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) and the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Chambers), who, in the course of their speeches, showed they understood the views of the French-speaking people. They demonstrated that they understand our mentality, and were good enough to place their views before the house.

Above all, however, I believe our congratulations should go to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). First I would congratulate him upon the forceful manner in which he answered the critics of his administration, and for the splendid mastery of the situation he has always maintained. Then he is to be congratulated upon the part he has played in connection with the formation of the joint defence board, an organization for which he worked diligently and which, to the great advantage not only of Canada but of Great Britain, he obtained.

In this connection I would like to echo the words of the hon. member for Selkirk who spoke to the house a few days ago. On that occasion he said:

> . . . but no one will deny him his fair measure of praise for the splendid part that he has played in promoting friendly relations between Canada and our great neighbour. We are deeply grateful to the United States for the assistance that it has given and for the assistance that it is still to give, and we are thankful—

I repeat the words of the hon. member for Selkirk, and make them my own.

> —I think I can say this in the name of the whole Canadian people—that we have in the present Prime Minister a leader who can be relied upon to preserve and promote the strong and growing feeling of friendliness and common purpose which exists between our country and our great neighbour.

I believe, too, that the Prime Minister might well be congratulated upon the speech from the throne, which is in effect his responsibility. He is to be commended because of its conciseness, and yet by the way in which it has implied all that would be done by the country, under the guidance of the government, in the pursuit of the war.

He is to be congratulated, too, upon his action in connection with the report of the commission on dominion-provincial relations, commonly known as the Sirois report. I believe his promptness in announcing to the house the summoning of a provincial conference will please the whole country, and is evidence of the fact that when he decided upon the formation of the commission he had it in mind to take action on their findings and to study carefully any suggestions which might come from it and which would improve the administration of the country's affairs. I believe congratulations might be extended to the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Gardiner) upon his report respecting his mission to England, the description of his trip in general and his report as to conditions in the old country.

We might make special note, too, of the speeches delivered by the ministers who have taken part in the debate. I refer to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power), the Minister of National Defence for Naval Affairs (Mr. Macdonald), the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). They are to be complimented upon the splendid exposé they have given of Canada's war effort, and the way in which they have dispelled any doubt which might have existed in the minds of some people—doubts which have developed through false and alarming pronouncements of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and his own Tory press.

During the last week-end, Mr. Speaker, I visited my constituency. While there I met an old farmer friend, one who has always been a friend of the party, but whose acquaintance I have enjoyed for only a little more than a year. He is a witty old man, and has always kept himself well informed on public matters. He has reared many children, who work on his farm, and he now lives more or less retired. In a way which I thought was clever he expressed to me his wonder, and that of his friends, as to why the leader of the opposition had wanted a session at this time—a time when everything seemed to be going well concerning our war effort. As he expressed it to me, everybody seemed to be satisfied with the possible exception of the Montreal Gazette and the leader of the opposition. "At first," he said, "we wondered why he wanted a session of parliament, but, now that he has spoken, we believe we understand why. The hon. gentleman wanted to show himself a true patriot; apparently he wanted to cooperate with the government, and indeed he has done so quite handsomely. He showed by his speech that he had very little to say, and very little constructive criticism to offer. He has helped to prove that the people of this country had placed their confidence in the right place when they elected the present Prime Minister and sent a Liberal government to Ottawa, rather than one formed by the opposition party; indeed, that they had made a proper choice."

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member has based his argument on the wrong premises.

Mr. PICARD: No; I believe the old man was wise in his comment that the absence of constructive criticism in the speech of the leader of the opposition indicates that the country has not made a mistake in electing the present Prime Minister.

Some few days ago the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) said that the war was being waged as a Liberal war, and that patronage was rampant. I am convinced that the war is not a Liberal war. Rather it is a Canadian war, and the people of Canada have so decided. They made their decision at an election which took place after, not before, the war began. Had the election been held before the war, and had the government appealed to the people on something other than the war issue, the allegation of the hon. member for Souris might have had some weight. The truth is, however, that when the government went to the country the war had been in progress for six months, and the people of Canada were given the opportunity to choose between the Liberal party and the best brains Mr. Manion could offer. They have chosen the best brains—but not those of Mr. Manion. They have chosen a Liberal government, a government which is showing now that it has the best brains available to carry on a war and at the same time to maintain unity within the country. The only ones who seem to object are those who make up that remnant of the Conservative party in this house, members who are all dignified and most charming to meet. There are also some members of the ultra-imperialistic press, like the Montreal Gazette, and a few others.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the hon. member opposed to imperialism?

Mr. PICARD: I am opposed to that imperialism which places the empire above Canada. I am for Canada first; I place Canada above all. Canada should play her part in the empire, but we should not lose sight of the interests of Canada.

The hon. member for Souris referred to patronage. I think patronage can be judged by the way the public contracts are awarded and by the way in which employment is given in connection with government contracts and government enterprises. Speaking of that part of the country that I know best, Quebec, I must state that my hon. friend seems to know very little of what has happened there. As a Liberal member of parliament I am rather ashamed, but I must admit that half, if not more government contracts have gone to Conservative firms. This is due to the fact that the government follows a policy of granting contracts to the lowest bidders. I know that some of my friends are far from satisfied with this state of affairs, but I think it answers the objections of the hon. member. If he could be present in the office of a Liberal member in the city of Quebec on Saturday morning he would hear quite a different story. He would hear Liberal supporters complaining that they cannot get work in the arsenal at Quebec or elsewhere. It is easy to make complaints, but I think if we examine closely the way in which these contracts have been dealt with we will find that it is quite different from what the hon. member stated.

Some hon. members have referred to the scarcity of trained men and women for munitions work. I do not want to deal with the matter at any length, but I contend that the blame for this condition might be laid at the door of Canadian industry. They have never bothered to form technicians and never properly planned their work in order to avoid periods of slackness and periods of overtime work in order to make available a continuous supply of skilled and trained people. They have never followed the practice adopted by many large United States corporations to have schools to prepare skilled labourers. We are suffering now from the lack of prevision of the captains of industry. In 1929 we were shown the imprevision of the financiers, but throughout crisis has continued the imprevision of great industrialists. Those who sometimes object to the control which the government is taking over industry would not have rendered it necessary had they seen fit to act differently in the past.

This matter of trained men brings up a point of concern to my own district. The rural electors in the districts around Quebec have been left out when employment has been given at Valcartier and the Quebec arsenal. Many of the rural people have worked in factories and quite often they are more skilled than the unemployed of the cities who have been given work. This may be a good policy in order to deal with unemployment, but I contend that those who bear an equal burden of the taxation should be given a chance to work. I submit this to the ministers at large of the Department of National Defence and ask them to look into the matter and reconsider their first decision.

Some members have referred to the necessity for economy in the ordinary expenditures of the government. I agree that this should be done, but on the other hand there is a point below which we should not go. For some time I was connected with one of the departments of the government and I can remember how the heads of the different branches used to prepare their estimates. Those estimates were generally cut by ten to fifteen per cent by the treasury board, and yet the original amounts were considered as being necessary to carry on the administration of the department. It is easy to understand that the Department of Justice and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police should have their estimates increased rather than lowered due to the special work that is being carried on. The same thing applies to the Department of Agriculture. I have received many letters from my constituents complaining that demonstration farms have been closed. This has been done because of the policy of retrenchment and economy. I wonder if we are serving the country as it should be served when we do not give our farmers the help they used to get, the help they are entitled to get in bettering their production and their efforts in agriculture. I do not think that the estimates of this department should be lowered.

The same thing applies to the Department of Trade and Commerce. Not all our factories are turning out war supplies. Many of our foreign markets are closed, and they certainly are becoming fewer. Through its intelligence service this department can do much to help us find new markets. I think the estimates should be kept where they are because it is to the advantage of the country to carry on. We should not ruin our national economy by lowering expenditures to a point where it becomes dangerous. This war can be waged successfully if things go well in Canada, if everything is administered to the satisfaction of the majority and in an efficient manner to continue the national well-being.

The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) made one suggestion with which I agree absolutely. It was that letters to members of the Canadian army should be sent free of charge. I do not know whether the Postmaster-General (Mr. Mulock) will agree that letters from a man's parents and friends and so on should be sent free of charge, but I think parcels which bring cheer to a man should be sent without costs to the sender. There are many enlisted men whose families have very little personal means. While it may be fairly easy for them to send a piece of cake or some other small gift, when it comes to paying forty or fifty cents postage on a parcel it cuts into their budget quite deeply and they hesitate to send it. The man overseas wonders if his friends have forgotten him. Perhaps it could be arranged to have parcels of a certain size sent free of charge, either through the different units of the army or otherwise. If the government wants to include letters in this scheme, I am all for it. Many of these men have been away from home a long time and they deserve every encouragement they can get from those of us who are in comparative safety in this land across the sea.

Perhaps I may be permitted to take up a few matters which are of interest to my own constituency. I notice many hon. members have done this. I should like to refer first to the taxation imposed last year which was of particular interest to my people. Although taxes in general were increased, they were accepted with true patriotism by everybody throughout the country. However, I must mention three of them which did not seem to please everybody. The first one, and in this respect I think even my western friends will agree with me, is the tax on flour. In eastern Canada, including my own constituency, many complaints have been received about this tax, which is on a necessity. Against taxes on a great many luxuries we could not have a good argument, but everybody needs flour. Western farmers want to sell their wheat, and we in the east want to eat bread. The minister might consider whether something cannot be done about that.

Another point I should like to bring out in connection with taxation concerns the way in which the tax on electricity is collected. At present it is collected on the cost of the electricity, which is far from being a fair system of collection. I understand that national taxation has as its basis the greatest possible degree of equality and justice. Well, if this tax is to be judged upon that principle we are far from acting with justice, because some provinces, amongst them my own, pay more for electricity than others do. The basis of taxation might be on consumption, on the kilowatt hour, as was mentioned, I think, last year by the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Brunelle), who did not quite agree with the remark of the then Minister of Finance (Mr. Ralston) that if such a change were made, those who pay less, because the price of electricity was lower in their provinces, might object. That is an argument, but it is not an argument of justice, because consumption is the basis upon which a tax should be collected.

Another tax which may not be so strongly objected to by others as it is among my people, is that on raw leaf tobacco. Raw leaf is smoked mostly in the province of Quebec, and before the imposition of the tax that tobacco was sold at about fifteen cents a pound. The tax of ten cents a pound which was imposed on it nearly doubled the price. I do not suppose I shall get so much sympathy from hon. members from other provinces, because they are not interested in the matter, but so far as we are concerned that tax has been quite a burden on the farmer who uses only raw leaf tobacco. When he heard that this tax was being imposed he provided himself with a few months' supply, but that supply is getting lower and lower, and he will soon be coming to us with complaints about the levying of this tax. If we base taxation on broad national lines, this tax on raw tobacco does not quite comply with that principle of taxation, because I am told by statisticians that the greater part of this tobacco is consumed in the province of Quebec.

Another point with which I want to deal briefly at the moment is that of the period of training under the mobilization scheme. Complaints have been voiced that one month is not enough. However, I have met many officers who were more than satisfied with the progress made. Some of my constituents have been called; they have answered willingly, and I am proud to say here that in my own constituency not one man has come to me to ask for any sort of exemption. All of them went cheerfully, because they knew they were going for Canada and they knew they were going to train for the defence of their country. But the talk has been that one month is not enough. It may be so. I would only suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the scheme should be carried on for a year until the men who are liable to this service—I believe, from twenty-one to thirty-five years—have each undergone one month of training. That would carry the scheme along until, probably, September of 1941. If it should appear to be inadequate, those who were called up first could be recalled for a second period of either two or three months, if necessary; but I share the view of one hon. member who was in the Canadian active service force, the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Chambers), that one and a half months would be sufficient. However, I am not a judge of such matters. But I think the scheme should be carried on as it is until the unmarried man reaches the age of thirty-five years. If we rely upon what has been stated by the Prime Minister of Great Britain, 1942-43 is the year when we shall need men for the battle. Our men might have time to be trained by then, and if they are now trained for one month and given a taste for the army, more might enlist than if they were kept there for four months and become tired and fed up with it.

Before I turn to other matters, may I mention something which was said here the other night, which did not quite please me. It was stated by one of my own friends, the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. d'Anjou). He said:

> I listened the other night to the excellent speech given in French by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Chambers). In my opinion, the hon. member thereby gave a lesson to a great many members from the province of Quebec who, either through snobbery or for other reasons unknown to me, rarely speak French in this house. When one wishes to preserve a right, it has always been my belief that he must exercise it.

I do not think I am much of a snob, and I do not believe that speaking either English or French is any kind of snobbery one way or the other. It is just a way of expressing one's thoughts, and when we feel that to speak in one particular language would enable us to reach more persons, it is logical to use it when we are able to do so. If it were a question of right, I would be the first one to fight to the limit to have that right respected and granted to me. But once I have the right, must I use it all the time; may I not use my right to speak in another language? I do not believe that the hon. member for Rimouski understood the lesson to be drawn from the speech of the hon. member for Nanaimo. He should realize that if an English-speaking member makes an effort to speak in this house in French, it indicates that he wants to show his good-will. One peculiar characteristic of English-speaking people is that usually they do not care to show that they are not perfect in anything. I know quite a number of people, friends of mine, who can carry on quite competently in French, but because they cannot speak perfectly in that language they do not care to speak it in public at all. So it seems to me that the hon. member for Nanaimo was quite brave when he went ahead and spoke in French; and rather than blame French-speaking members for speaking in English, my hon. friend from Rimouski should draw a totally different lesson from the excellent speech of my deskmate.

Since my arrival in Ottawa for the present session I have been asked by many people what were the reactions in French Canada concerning the collapse of France and the incident of Oran. In dealing briefly with this question I shall bear in mind what the Prime Minister said in his speech on the address:

> I do not think we can be too careful in this House of Commons about what any of us say with regard to other countries and their position at this time in the matter of war.

Later in his speech he stated:

> I appeal to hon. members in the house and I appeal to my fellow-countrymen in all parts of the dominion to bear always in mind the task which Canada alone can perform in keeping hope alive in the hearts of the grief-stricken people of France. Let no word from Canadian lips add to the agony of her open wounds. Let us inflict no new pain, and let us be ever watchful to exercise the healer's art.

I will do my best, in the few minutes I want to speak on this question, not to forget the advice of the Prime Minister.

The people of Quebec remember with joy the appeal which was made to them a few days after the collapse of France by the Prime Minister, when he asked them to keep alive French love for liberty and for freedom and French culture, and to help prevent the widening of the gap between France and Britain. The way the Prime Minister treated this question in his speech on the address has won for him further admiration in Quebec.

The tragedy of France, as it has been called, can be studied from many angles. But from whatever angle we look at it, it is advisable to avoid extremes. Trying to pin the responsibilities on one political group or another is a silly game that can lead only to bitterness, and I can hardly hide my contempt for those French writers of the right who try to convince us that the leftists led the country to its downfall, and my contempt for the French writers of the left, who explain to us the negotiations of the rightists with the enemies of the state. Many of these writers might be more persuasive if they were less abusive.

It is childish to talk of the unworthiness of French statesmen. Anybody who has been in touch with European politics will vouch for the fact that they were as good, often better, and never any worse than those of other continental countries.

It is naive to talk of deserved punishment for the sins of France. France has always been the land of true proportions and of moderation: "le pays de la mesure," as we say in French. It was the home of highly developed individualism, which was the product of a vast general culture in all fields of intellectual endeavour. An analysis of the French collapse is too complicated a matter to be made curtly and sharply as it is by some ill-informed people, and moreover it cannot be done within the scope of my remarks.

For us, June 16 was a sad day, when France failed in her word to Britain. We felt badly about it and felt it was a mistake on the part of those who influenced the decisions of Bordeaux. I was of opinion that M. Reynaud, M. Herriot, President Lebrun and all those who shared their views were in the right in wishing to continue the fight from Africa. Personally I think that those who influenced the decision to abandon the British alliance will have an extremely heavy responsibility thrown upon them when history is written. We must remember, however, that it is difficult to judge of the situation from the comparative safety of our shores. We must remember that on June 16 France was alone in the defence of her soil, and also that she did not have the English channel between herself and the motorized war machine of Hitler. No matter how severely we may judge that man Laval, we must believe that France's great hero who is now her leader acted with sincerity. He is now a prisoner of his first mistakes, but his patriotism is a guarantee that he cannot be blinded to the true interests of France. We should therefore reserve our judgment on any moves of Vichy as reported in the press until they are confirmed by positive facts and we can know their full meaning. We must rely, sir, on the fact that the sentiment of the majority of France will prevail in the mind of its leader and that ways will be found to prevent a clash with Britain. But even should matters come to the worst, no one need fear anything about the sentiments of French-Canadians. They will be more than ever on the side of democracy and its valiant defender, Britain.

I was told a few days ago that there was in Montreal a self-styled "man of good-will" going round interviewing people with regard to the incident of Oran, and I understand that he expressed the view that French-Canadians had been terribly offended by that incident. I suggest that he did not meet the proper people, because, no matter how much we may dislike the publicity given to this matter, we admit the necessity for it and we would still say, "Go ahead and do it again," if it had to be done again. We consider that it was in the interest of Canada because it was in the interest of Britain. French-Canadian loyalty has been tested many times in the past. If I remember rightly, it was in 1776 when the American revolution was in progress that Lafayette and d'Estaing came over to America and sent emissaries to the French-Canadians with an appeal for help to the colonists in revolt. It was only seventeen years after the fall of Quebec, and yet French-Canadians turned a deaf ear to that appeal and stood by Britain. They did not participate in the struggle against the crown at that time. In 1812, French-Canadians again proved their loyalty to the crown, and at Chateauguay, there was a battalion of Voltigeurs led by de Salaberry on the side of the English.

Many ill-informed references have been made to the incidents of 1837. That was not a revolt against the crown; it was not a movement in favour of the enemy; it was merely a fight for the recognition of constitutional principles in Canada, in which Upper and Lower Canada participated.

Even in our day, Mr. Speaker, there have been stronger provocations than the necessary incident of Oran which have tested the patience of French-Canadians. They do not have to moan about that African incident when in their own land, in their own province, my compatriots have been hurt. A long and sad story could be written of the lack of fair play shown by certain elements of the majority. Mind you, sir, I am not referring to this house, where the most satisfactory atmosphere exists. I am not referring to the government, who have shown more understanding and good-will than any administration that has preceded them. I am referring to the civil service of Canada, here in Ottawa, and more so in the federal service in the province of Quebec. I am pointing to the great public service companies like the Bell Telephone company, the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway in relation to their services and their employees in that province. I am pointing to all other agencies or companies of a public nature who derive their revenues from services to the French-speaking population and fail to recognize that population in the allotment of their favours and in the performance of certain of their services. Take the war effort of the country. We call for equality of sacrifice. Do we have equality in the benefits that accrue from war contracts and the direction of the industrial effort of the nation? Some of these daily occurrences are meat for the extremists and a few agitators and are more important than the incident of Oran.

We have a long way to go and there is much to be done to bring about a satisfactory situation. But, Mr. Speaker, never have these just grievances affected French-Canadian loyalty in the past, and happily it is still time to bring about remedies. We are sure that in the end everyone will realize that our country can be made great only by the unity of its component races, and that unity is never reached by one-sided advantages. Unity can be reached, not by coercion but by good-will and understanding, and I have been preaching the necessity for cooperation whenever I have had occasion, in my short public life, to address the people whom I represent. I say to you to-day, sir, let us all work to this end.

It has been a consolation to us, throughout our history, to have, in the other race which constitutes the majority, friends who understood us and shared in some of our views. It has been a pleasure to see the gradual growth of conciliatory sentiment in the political life of the country and in our universities. There is no more reason for Canadians of pure French descent to have what we call love in the true sense of the word for England than there is for English-speaking Canadians to have a love for France; but there is a common ground on which we can meet, it is our love for Canada our country which our forefathers have built, for which they fought in the past, for which we are ready to fight now. This is the common ground on which we all should meet.

French-Canadians have always respected Britain, and they have been grateful for the political institutions that have been bestowed upon them by Britain, based on freedom, self-government and justice.

In conclusion I wish to state that since the battle of Britain started, the splendid behaviour, the determined and stubborn courage, the heroism of the civilian population of Britain, the magnificent performance of the Royal Air Force and the Royal Navy, have provoked throughout the province of Quebec the deepest and most profound admiration for Britain and the most sincere affection for our sovereigns.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): I wish to associate myself with other hon. members who have expressed appreciation of the speeches of the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. To the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras) and the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Picard), I say that I envy them their ability to speak so fluently in the English and French languages. I regret exceedingly that my education in modern languages has not enabled me even to attempt to speak in the French language this afternoon.

The mover of this address placed the debate on a very high plane at the very outset of his speech when he said:

> I feel I correctly interpret the interests and views of St. Lawrence-St. George when I say that we seek no local interest, we want no personal advantage, we are not interested in partisan politics. Every true Canadian feels the same to-day. We seek the welfare of Canada and of every part of it.

Those are honourable words. They set, as I said, a very high plane for the discussion. I think all hon. members who have spoken have tried to maintain the spirit there outlined. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) apologized for not having heard this speech. Had he heard it, perhaps he would have omitted the first part of his address the other day, which brought us back to the hustings and election time.

One part of the address of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George I think requires amplification. He said:

> Few of us have yet begun to give up things we like, still less things we think we need. Unless we also tighten our belts our effort will fall short of what is necessary to stop the nazis. We must consume less, save more and steadily invest in war savings certificates and war loans.

I hope that hon. members will not judge the people whom I represent in parliament by the amount of money they are subscribing to government loans or by their purchases of war savings certificates. I should like them to judge my people by the sentiments expressed by the editor of the paper in the little town where I have lived for the past ten years. This editor has locked up his printing press, said farewell to his wife and four children after joining the 20th company of the forestry corps. This is what he said in his farewell message to the readers of his weekly paper:

> We regret the need that calls us to serve our country. We are proud that we are capable of serving in even the humblest capacity. We regret leaving wife and family, but we are proud they have the faith and courage to send us on our way with a smile and a cheering word. We regret leaving friends at home but we are proud to join with the finest men of our country in protecting those things which we hold dear.

These are the sentiments of many who cannot give even a cent to purchase war savings certificates, but who are making a much greater sacrifice, who are prepared to give even life itself.

The hon. member asks us to consume less and save more. I wish he would be more specific. I wish some members of the government would tell us exactly what they mean when they ask us to consume less. I have in my hands a copy of Maclean's magazine of October 15. The back page is devoted to an advertisement urging us to buy International de luxe delivery trucks; the second last page urges us to buy Canada's first choice automobile for 1941, the Studebaker Champion. Two whole pages are devoted to advertising the best car in America, the 1941 De Soto; a full page to Fargo trucks; two pages to the 1941 Dodge luxury liner special; two pages to the Chrysler; two pages to what is supposed to be the best of all, the new Plymouth; and right out in front of course you find the leader, the Chevrolet. It seems to me that the publishers of this magazine need to be told whether those who buy these commodities are helping or hindering our war effort. I am sure the International Harvester company does not want to urge people to purchase de luxe trucks if by so doing they are using money that should be saved to buy government bonds or war savings stamps. It is high time some spokesman of the government told us what is meant when we are asked to save more and consume less.

I should like to be told whether we are to consume less wheat, less bacon, less butter, less apples. Or are we to consume less fish? A great deal of confusion is being caused by loose talk of the kind I have mentioned.

I was glad to hear the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) announce yesterday that we are not going to have any more luxury liners in the way of new automobiles or frigidaires or radios. The announcement is timely; in fact it should have been made a year ago. But if it is wrong to buy these things, it is equally wrong to manufacture them. I believe the people of Canada are anxiously awaiting a lead from this government as to what commodities should be conserved and what commodities should not.

My desk mate (Mr. Gillis) referred in his speech the other day to the excellent utterance of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in his Labour day address when he referred to the brotherhood of the brave who fight for us and the brotherhood of labour who work for victory. I endorse everything that has been said in this house with respect to the splendid contribution being made by the members of the military and air forces and of the navy. I echo what has been said on many occasions as to the need for free transportation for those who are prepared to give their lives for their country. Further, I wish to express appreciation of the work being done by the brave women of Canada, for I think we all agree that in war the greatest sacrifices of all are made by the women.

I should like to devote most of my time this afternoon to a discussion of the second brotherhood mentioned by the Prime Minister, the brotherhood of those who labour for victory. I read in the Hansard of the British House of Commons the other day a speech by the hon. member for Llanelly. Speaking on October 10, he said:

> The past few years in Europe have shown very clearly that totalitarian wars, modern wars, are won or lost by the spirit of the population. One of the most remarkable things in recent years is that wars have been lost in countries while their armies are still in being because the civilian populations have cracked.

There is a great deal of truth in that. Hon. members are anxious that the civilian contribution of Canada should be the maximum contribution.

I should now like to say just a few words about our effort in the industrial field. Two of my colleagues have made a splendid contribution to the debate in dealing with the problems in connection with industry. I was interested to read another comment by the same member of parliament in the British house. He stated that in his constituency they had made over ten thousand Anderson shelters, but at that time they did not have a single shelter for their own use. He pointed out that large quantities of steel were necessary for the construction of those shelters and that there was a serious shortage of steel in Great Britain. My desk mate advises me that the production of steel in Canada is not at the maximum. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that as long as people in Great Britain are unable, because of a lack of steel, to obtain these Anderson shelters, we should be supplying every pound of steel that it is possible for this dominion to produce.

I should like to congratulate the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) upon the work that has been done under the dominion-provincial youth training projects. I have in my hand some information in connection with the short courses provided for young men in welding and sheet-metal work, machine-shop work and aircraft mechanics. More work of this sort should be done; but so far as I know, the training school at Galt, Ontario, is the only one that undertakes to train large numbers of young men under this scheme. These men must be between the ages of sixteen and twenty-nine, and each must have a letter from some responsible employer to the effect that he will be given employment on completion of the particular course which he is taking. This, of course, to a certain extent limits the number of those who otherwise might be able to take advantage of this opportunity. I should like to urge upon the Minister of Labour that, in addition to training young men in work of this kind, provision be made for the retraining of mechanics who were originally trained either in the old country, in the United States or in Canada. In western Canada particularly we have a large number of men on farms who received their training in the large industrial areas of Great Britain, the United States and Canada, but who gave up industrial work to go farming in the good old days when fortunes were to be made on the prairies. This year many of these men find that they will be compelled to ask for relief if they do not get an opportunity to work. I have in my constituency well qualified men, who served seven or eight years as apprentices in the old country, whose relatives are being bombed every night by Hitler's planes, who are not satisfied to be sitting down accepting relief in Canada when they should be doing some constructive work, as long as there is in this dominion a single factory that is not running at capacity. I submit that without further delay schools should be set up to provide refresher courses for men trained in industry some years ago, who are going to be needed in industry again in the very near future if Canada is to make its greatest possible contribution in the supplying of war material to Great Britain.

I now come to a discussion of a subject that is of vital concern to the people whom I represent and the people of western Canada, the question of agriculture. I think all hon members will agree with the statement made the other night by the Minister of Agriculture that the production of food is going to be one of the valuable contributions that Canada will make. I am not at all satisfied with the arrangements that are being made in this country with respect to the production of foodstuffs. I want to thank the Minister of Agriculture for the announcement he made yesterday, in response to the question I asked on Friday as to whether 1940 would be declared an emergency year under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. His announcement will be welcomed all across western Canada. In speaking the other night, the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) referred to the following statement by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), as contained in a news letter issued by the director of public information:

> We do not know of any construction contract let since the outbreak of war that has netted the contractor what, by any stretch of the imagination, could be considered an excessive profit.

The minister went on to say:

> . . . it is not in the public interest, in a time of crisis, that a contractor should be out of pocket in fulfilling a national need. Obviously, no good end is served by letting contracts on a financial basis which would cripple a contractor, and so limit the productive facilities of the dominion.

If that is the policy of the Minister of Munitions and Supply with respect to the letting of contracts, it is high time it also became the policy of the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon); for, as I said before in this house, the production of wheat, butter, bacon and so on is every bit as important as the making of machine guns, bombing planes, bullets and other forms of equipment. I am not minimizing the contribution made by industry, but I am saying that if Canada can give the manufacturers all their costs plus a profit, we should not ask our farmers to go bankrupt in producing foodstuffs for Canada and the mother country.

I was one of the perhaps few members of the house who could not develop one particle of enthusiasm as we listened to the Minister of Agriculture the other night. I want to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that this was not because the preliminary remarks of the minister annoyed me. Frankly, in normal times I enjoy hearing the Minister of Agriculture on the hustings, fighting as he fought the other day. But what did disturb me was the fact that the picture he presented for agriculture was as full of holes as a sieve. I am not going to discuss all the commodities he mentioned; I am going to confine myself to two products that concern the people of my constituency and of western Canada more than any others.

I want to discuss what the minister has in view with regard to bacon and wheat. He talks in terms of millions of dollars and millions of pounds, with the greatest of ease. But what the farmers of Canada want to know is, how many cents a pound? It is not going to be any comfort to the farmers who are producing bacon to be told that they will have to produce that bacon for a price which will mean bankruptcy, but that they should be comforted because there are thousands of other farmers in exactly the same boat. When I asked the minister the other day just what the price was going to be, he did not answer. I asked if the price would be as high as it was last year. His reply was that it would not be quite as high as last year but that better arrangements in connection with maintenance, margin for storage and so on should result in a price to the farmer which would compare favourably with that of last year. The minister did not give us the information, but that was not because he did not have it. The farmers of Canada knew what the new deal meant, but they did not learn it from the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): A dirty deal.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The farmers learned about it through the packers. When the farmers took their hogs to market last week, the packers knew all about the matter; the price had dropped 70 cents. Somehow or other the packers knew that the new deal was not a very good deal.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The sides are smaller.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The price is down 70 cents a hundredweight. Since the minister made his speech the other day, there has been a further drop of 50 cents.

Mr. JACKMAN: He should stop making speeches.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I notice the suggestion of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) that we should have a full-time Minister of Agriculture is receiving consideration. The name of the minister of agriculture of Saskatchewan has been suggested.

I was glad to see that there is at least one minister of agriculture in Canada who does not think very much of this bacon deal. I see in the Winnipeg Tribune of November 19 the following dispatch from Toronto, where the Hon. P. M. Dewan, Minister of Agriculture of Ontario, is quoted as follows:

> The bacon quota announced a few days ago was gratifying as to quantity. The price now announced is truly disappointing. Already I understand purchase prices to the farmer are down from top prices $1.50 per hundredweight for dressed hogs. This is bad medicine for the farmer to take, particularly when everything he must purchase is increasing in value.

I agree with the Ontario minister; this bacon deal is bad business for the farmer. The Winnipeg Free Press had something to say about the deal, stating that it did not believe the Canadian farmer would want to hold up the price of bacon to Great Britain.

I find that in other respects we are asking Great Britain to pay the piper. In a return to my question respecting German prisoners of war I find that the total yearly rentals paid for land in which prisoners of war are located amount to $35,278 annually, all of which is recoverable from the government of the United Kingdom. For food for prisoners of war I am told we are spending $2,517 daily, of which $2,114 is recoverable from the government of the United Kingdom. These figures would seem to show that at least in respect of some matters the government of Canada is not so generous when it deals with the British government. I dislike very much this policy of half charity and half business. It is something like taking a guest to the parliamentary dining-room this evening and saying to him, "This dinner will cost 75 cents; I will pay 65 cents and you may give me 10 cents."

We are saying to our customers across the sea, "We are going to sell you bacon at less than the cost of production. We do not want you to pay the full price. You give us so much, and the farmer will take the rap." The old price was $18.01 per Wiltshire side, at Canadian seaboard. The new price is $15.82. That is not good enough, and as the representative of a rural constituency, whether or not I ever made my living on a farm, I want to protest with all the power I can muster that this sort of deal is not good enough for agriculture, in the present crisis.

I want now to say something about wheat, and in that connection would draw the attention of hon. members to a statement made in the British House of Commons by the secretary to the Minister of Agriculture. Here are his words, as reported at page 1422 of Hansard for the British House of Commons on August 22, 1940:

> After the outbreak of war it was known that there had been increases in the farmers' costs and the standard price was increased from 8 shillings per hundredweight to 9 shillings per hundredweight. Since December last year farmers' costs have increased very materially largely because of the increase in wages. There have been other increases in their costs but wages are perhaps the main cause. The government therefore have decided to increase the standard price of oats from 9 shillings to 11 shillings six pence. This merely puts a bottom in the market. Farmers will not be faced with a rapid fall and unless the price actually falls below 11s. 6d. no subsidy will be paid. This guarantee ought to give ample confidence to farmers to produce the maximum quantity of oats since they are no longer exposed to the possibility of a slump.

I say that what Great Britain has done for the British farmer, the Canadian government can do for the Canadian farmer.

I was pleased to hear that at last the Minister of Agriculture had repudiated a statement which had caused a great deal of misunderstanding, namely that wheat could be produced at from 30 cents to 40 cents a bushel. As reported at page 102 of Hansard he has gone on record as follows:

> It is generally admitted that 70 cents advance at Fort William, which nets the farmer about 50 cents a bushel, does not cover his total costs of production and therefore does not maintain him as a contented producer.

If not, then what about it? If wheat cannot be produced profitably at 50 cents a bushel, what is the government doing about it? If we are going to give the manufacturers of munitions of war not only all their costs but an additional profit, why not give the farmer a price for his product which will enable him to have that decent standard of living which the minister frankly admitted he cannot have at the present time.

I believe the minister in his observations was very optimistic when it suited him and very pessimistic when it suited him. When he looks forward to our consumption in the next ten years he is most optimistic. He estimates that we are going to have an internal consumption of 160,000,000 bushels a year during the next five years. How much have we consumed in the last ten years?

I have before me some figures supplied by the bureau of statistics which show wheat consumption in the last ten years as follows:

Year	No. of bushels
1940	133,870,000
1939	121,774,000
1938	123,083,000
1937	103,562,000
1936	99,542,000
1935	121,702,000
1934	101,583,000
1933	104,518,000
1932	99,123,000
1931	117,560,000
Total	1,126,317,000

These figures give an average consumption of 112,631,700 bushels a year. Yet the minister estimates an internal consumption of 160,000,000 bushels, or an increase of 42 per cent in the next five years. I agree with the Minister of Agriculture that we could increase our internal consumption to this extent, but not under the policies prevailing in Canada at the present time. With the amount of purchasing power available to the majority of the low-paid workers and farmers, it is quite impossible to increase consumption to that extent.

A short time ago I met in the city of Winnipeg a fruit grower from British Columbia. I talked to him about his problems, and after he went home he sent me some information respecting his receipts for fruit sold in British Columbia. These are his words:

> For this variety and Gravensteins we were offered 55 cents per box on the car. As the box and packing costs amount to about 35 cents, the grower would receive about 13 cents net after Associated Growers sales charges are added. For this 13 cents the grower has to produce the apples and deliver them to the packing house. While in Winnipeg I saw this variety and grade in several stores marked $1.65 a box and in one case $1.75. At the present time No. 6 wheat is selling in this district for $32 a ton cash. I have just obtained the price from the local feed store.

The point is this: Here is a fruit grower selling his apples in British Columbia who, when he wishes to buy No. 6 wheat produced in Saskatchewan, must pay with the receipts from seven or eight boxes of apples. He must give that many apples to pay for a bushel of No. 6 wheat. When the Saskatchewan farmer wants to buy a box of British Columbia apples he finds that, after taking out expenses for threshing and twine, he has to give the value of six or seven bushels of wheat. It is quite obvious, therefore, that when we have a condition whereby a farmer has to give six or seven boxes of fruit to buy one bushel of wheat, and a wheat grower has to give six or seven bushels of wheat to buy one box of apples, there is no possibility in the world of increasing internal consumption to the extent mentioned the other night by the minister.

Then the minister made some estimates with regard to our export. In this respect he is generous. He made estimates in connection with our production, and I believe in that regard he is pessimistic. He placed before us facts respecting the last fourteen years, and stated that if we produce as much in the next five years as we did in those fourteen we shall have such-and-such a condition. I trust that we may never again have a period of ten years in which large areas in western Canada did not all through the period get back their seed.

This year has been declared an emergency year, and we have a crop amounting to some 561,000,000 bushels. Just the other day I received from the bureau of statistics a chart showing the production in western Canada for the present year. I was amazed at the small area where the yield was over twenty bushels to the acre, and at the large area where the yield was under twenty bushels. I think my guess is just as good as that of the Minister of Agriculture. If he estimated 500,000,000 bushels a year he would be much closer to the total than he was when he made his estimate of 380,000,000 bushels of wheat a year.

I am going to make a few concrete proposals to the government and the Minister of Agriculture. In the first place I would ask the government to carry out the election promise of an interim payment on the 1939 wheat crop, which was accepted in good faith in western Canada. I know the Minister of Agriculture denies promising an interim payment of from 10 to 12 cents a bushel. Last year the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) said it was strange that so many reporters should get the minister wrong. If I remember correctly, the hon. member quoted from several western papers to the effect that the minister had promised definitely that there would be an interim payment of from 10 to 12 cents.

Mr. COLDWELL: Including Saskatchewan Liberal papers.

Mr. NICHOLSON: In the second place, I urge that there be an increase in the initial payment for the present year. I have received from municipalities in my constituency petitions asking that the price be $1.50 a bushel for the first thousand bushels, the balance to be sold at the market price. I was amazed to find that the Saskatchewan association of rural municipalities, a powerful organization which has gone out of its way to refrain from embarrassing the government, has gone on record as asking for $1.50 a bushel for the first 1,000 bushels, the balance to be sold at the market price. I can support that recommendation provided the market price does not go below the present price of 70 cents a bushel.

In the third place I urge the closing of the Winnipeg grain exchange. Fourth, I urge the marketing of agricultural products by appropriate food boards at parity prices. Fifth, I urge government assistance to the farmer by providing suitable granaries, similar to the plan adopted in the United States, with a view to storing one billion bushels in Canada. People talk about a carry-over of half a billion bushels, but I submit that the time is coming when one billion bushels of wheat in Canada will be an important factor in getting the peace we are looking for in Europe. As the minister points out, wheat can be stored and kept for long periods. Then there should be a cash advance of 75 per cent of the value of the wheat stored on the farms. The question may be asked, "where will the money come from?" I am glad to have had an answer from three well known authorities, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the former Minister of Finance, now Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), and the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). The Prime Minister is reported on page 53 of Hansard, as follows:

> Before turning to another aspect of my subject, I should like to remind the house that the only limits the government is prepared to place upon Canada's war effort are those imposed by the extent of our resources, both human and material, and by our capacity for sacrifice. We will make financially possible the utmost effort the people of Canada are physically and morally capable of making.

I was going to point out in considerable detail a market which the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) might very well consider, but the time at my disposal is becoming short. I refer to the home market. I cannot state definitely how extensive this market is, but there is a large group in Canada in the lower income brackets who are not getting enough to eat. I have on my desk the results of a study which was carried out in the United States, and which I recommend to the minister. This shows that a large percentage of those in the lower income brackets increased their food consumption 100 per cent when their incomes were stepped up from $65 to $100 a month.

I have in my hand a little booklet entitled "Food for Health" prepared by the Canadian Medical Association. I recommend this publication to all hon. members. The only criticisms I have heard of it are that it provides for a minimum diet, and our relief authorities say that they cannot supply our people with the amounts recommended. This booklet sets out that a family of five should have $11.40 a week for food alone. A number of carefully prepared diets are set out, every one of which is considered a minimum diet. I wish the people in my constituency who are on relief could have the diets set out in this booklet.

I have a letter from the superintendent of the mothers' allowance bureau pointing out that the maximum allowance for a mother with a family of eight children is $36 a month, or $432 a year. This family would have to provide clothing, rent, coal oil and other necessities out of this income. For a family of two adults with five children the Canadian Medical Association recommend a minimum allowance of $13.85 a week, or $720.20 a year, for food alone. When a reliable publication of this sort states that the minimum amount for food should be $720 and when we know that there are many large families living on much less, there cannot be any doubt that there is a large field for consumption here.

I am sorry the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) is not in his place at the moment, because I wanted to express my thanks for the careful consideration he gave to a number of relief problems which I brought to his attention last session. I have the report of an investigation which the minister was kind enough to have carried out. It is marked "confidential," but in view of the fact that the result of the investigation has been made public by a former member of this house who is editing a paper in North Battleford, I think it is only fair that I should take advantage of the privilege the minister has given me of referring to the report. I shall not mention any names given in the report.

Hon. members will recall that I described conditions in my constituency which were shocking to many members. An investigation was made, and this is the report. I shall refer only to two cases. I was fortunate in having a member of the Saskatchewan legislature, who is a returned soldier, accompany these inspectors. I do not say he is not telling the truth in his report, and there is a vast difference between the truth and the whole truth. One family was investigated where the man was getting $8 a month, and the inspector states:

At the time of my visit on July 5, 1940, there was food in the house sufficient for immediate requirements.

Here again I am sorry the English language is not as explicit as it should be. I should like to tell hon. members exactly what was in the house the day upon which this inspector considered there was sufficient food there for immediate requirements. On that day this family had 75 pounds of flour, 20 pounds of porridge meal, one-quarter pound each of tea and coffee, two pounds of salt, a few ounces of baking powder and some milk, butter and eggs. But this is what they did not have. They had no meat, no sugar, no lard, no preserved fruit, no dried fruit, no jam, no syrup or honey. This family was in debt to the storekeeper to the extent of $70. The man has no chance of getting work to retire this debt and in order to prevent the family from going hungry, the storekeeper had given him credit to the extent of $70.

The next case is that of a returned soldier, and here the inspector points out that these people should consider themselves fortunate. His report states:

Since going on the homestead the branch has supplied them with building materials for a good house, stoves, tools of all kinds, two cows, a team of horses, harness, feed, sleighs, wagon, plough, harrows, and has broken around ten acres of new land. When one considers that a year ago this family had absolutely nothing and now they have a very good start on a new home, we believe that they should consider themselves fortunate. It is true that we reduced the monthly food order slightly this spring, but that is due to the cows freshening and gardens coming in. This is a case where we have no excuses to offer whatsoever.

I realize that the government has given this family a good deal of assistance, but the fact that an old rake and some harness are out in your barn does not satisfy your appetite. What did this family have in the house on the day of inspection? The report states they had 25 pounds of flour, four pounds of sugar, two pounds of lard, a few ounces of tea and coffee, and some milk. They had no meat, potatoes, eggs, butter, fruit, syrup or honey. They were short of clothing. Their bedding consisted of two blankets, three sheets, one quilt and one overcoat. They did not have a mattress. A returned soldier who gave his best during the last war is in this condition, and the inspector who goes in cannot see these things. I am told that he saw the beautiful trees—and the trees are beautiful—and he saw the gorgeous scenery—and there is no finer scenery anywhere in my constituency. But I repeat what I have already said in this house, that men, women and children are going hungry; and I feel sure that if the Minister of Labour were here he would agree with me that it is not his intention to have people living under these conditions in this day and age.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. A. G. SLAGHT (Parry Sound): Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct the attention of parliament and the people of Canada to one of the national problems which "war has served to intensify or create,"—to use the language of the speech from the throne—a problem which heretofore has not been discussed in this debate.

Before doing so, I desire to pay tribute to the full and detailed accounts which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and those ministers charged with special war portfolios have given to parliament and to the country. One who has followed these amazing recitals of the past few days must, I suggest, be proud indeed of Canada and of our war effort. Particularly do I desire to convey an expression of thanks on behalf of the people of the constituency of Parry Sound to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), who yesterday, in his kind and sympathetic way, paid tribute to those who lost their lives or who were injured in the unfortunate explosion at Nobel. His way of putting it prompts me to say that we in Canada owe a debt to the labour organizations for their fine cooperation in our efforts, without which cooperation it would be impossible to have done and to continue to do our part in this conflict.

The particular problem on which I want to spend a few minutes to-night is that of the enemy within, otherwise known as the fifth column. To combat the enemy within we have in Canada a special service which, although smaller numerically, has no less importance in my view, so far as the defence of this dominion and aid to the mother country are concerned, than the army, the navy and the air force. I refer to the protective service which combats espionage, sabotage and subversive enemy activities, and whose special task has been and still is to fight and suppress the fifth column and the enemy within our gates. This duty falls, as hon. members know, upon the secret service of Canada, which in turn is a branch of that magnificent force, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

This subject is one to which I have given special attention for the past two years. On May 13, 1939, eighteen months ago and four months before the outbreak of war, I addressed this house upon this particular subject. I have been accused of being an alarmist, of endeavouring to create hysteria with reference to the seriousness of this problem in our country. But the recent history of Europe shows that the warnings which I undertook to give the Canadian people have, so far as certain countries there are concerned, been converted into grim, stark reality. It is in the hope that we can draw a lesson from what has happened there that I want to call the attention of the house to some matters to-night.

First, let me state in brief what Germany did on this continent in the last war. In doing so, I suggest that we may not expect from her present high command any less cruel and ruthless treatment on this continent than we received in the war of 1914.

Shortly after the outbreak of war in 1914, Germany instigated and equipped from Berlin through Zimmerman a campaign of sabotage, dynamiting, destruction and international murder, by placing a large sum of money in the hands of her diplomatic representatives in the United States. Count von Bernstorff was ambassador at Washington. Captain Franz von Papen, Captain Boy-Ed and Doctor Albert established offices in New York city; and $150,000,000—as was established by the British secret service and proved also by Doctor Albert's later admission—was sent to the United States for use in destroying life and property in Canada and the United States in order to cripple the war effort of the allies. On the surface these men were there to foster friendly relations between Germany and the United States, which latter country, as the house will recall, was not then at war. Surreptitiously they were there to conduct a campaign of destruction of life and property. On Tuesdays and Saturdays they dined at the White House, accepting hospitality from the president, and on Wednesdays and Fridays they went to their cellars and met their tools and agents whom they instructed and equipped with money to carry out the purposes in which they were engaged.

All that I tell you, Mr. Speaker, to-night in this regard is a matter of record in confessions, in court proceedings, and in part in the files of the British secret service. I gave more details to the house on May 13, 1939, as reported at page 4045 of Hansard, and if anyone should be interested in tracing the details of what happened, that reference might be useful. I am going to remind hon. members to-night of only some of the activities of these German agents against Canada:

The plot to blow up the international bridge at Vanceboro, Maine.

The dynamiting of the Peabody Overalls company at Walkerville.

The attempt to dynamite the Windsor armouries, in which our troops were then billeted.

The attempt to blow up the tunnel on the Canadian Pacific railway between Revelstoke and Vancouver.

The attempt to blow up the Welland canal.

The attempt to destroy the Canadian Pacific railway by dynamiting bridges and tunnels.

And numerous other similar affairs. Japan, at that time our ally, was then transporting troops across Canada towards Europe.

So much for their efforts against Canada. A further amazing list of destruction in the United States, and of explosions on vessels departing from United States ports with supplies for the allies, would take too long to relate. The list of their successful operations is almost unbelievable. Let me remind the house of only a few:

January 1, 1915—Incendiary fire at the John A. Roebling Company plant at Trenton.

March 15, 1915—Explosion at DuPont plant at Haskell, N.J.

April 1, 1915—Explosion of Equitable powder plant at Allon, Illinois.

May 3, 1915—Explosion at the Anderson Chemical Company at Wallington, N.J., costing three lives.

June 26, 1915—Incendiary fire at the Aetna powder plant at Pittsburgh.

July 7, 1915—Incendiary explosion at the DuPont plant at Pompton Lakes.

July 16, 1915—Incendiary explosion and fire at the Aetna plant at Sinnemahoning, Pa., costing five lives.

August 11, 1915—Incendiary fire at Westinghouse electric plant, Turtle Creek, Pa.

May 10, 1916—The Atlas powder mixing plant was destroyed.

Hon. members will find ninety-six more enumerated in Hansard of May 13, 1939. I conclude with a very interesting one:

July 22, 1916—Explosion in Hercules powder works.

Just the other day the Hercules works received their second bath of blood, this time much more serious, because 40 workmen lost their lives.

It has been said that lightning does not strike twice in the same place, but that expression, obviously, has never been extended to the German gangsters. Let me here and now—and this is part of my purpose in speaking in this debate—pay the highest tribute possible to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police of Canada. They constitute our secret service. I bespeak from this government, from every member of the house, the strongest support for that great force, and I implore the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and the government to increase the grant substantially this session and provide a large sum of money, first, in order that the personnel of the force may be materially increased and, second, in order that the men on the force may be paid at rates commensurate with the dangerous and all-important protection which they are according to this country and to our war effort.

There is not intended one word of destructive criticism in what I ask the government to do. For twenty-five years all political parties have permitted this force to remain underpaid. The standard of requirement to enter the force, and the schooling and training which these men undergo, are rigid and high, and the men in the force have to serve six years on very small pay. This force, in efficiency—and I know something of its work in the past year—is not second even to Scotland Yard. The personnel is too limited to perform the terrific task now imposed upon the force by the war. We have two extensive coast-lines which they must guard particularly in order to protect vessels departing from Canada with cargoes for war purposes. The Minister of National Defence for Naval Affairs (Mr. Macdonald), in a wonderful address in which he disclosed the work of his department, told us that 3,500 vessels carrying cargoes amounting to twenty-one million tons had left Canadian shores since the outbreak of war. The old enemy tactics of planting time bombs on supply vessels bound for Europe must be watched as a cat watches a mouse, and that is only one aspect of the work of the force. They have counter-espionage and internment duties which require close and constant attention from one end of the country to the other.

We have been given figures showing the tremendous increase in factories and plants for war services. We are obtaining some $800,000,000 in production, and the greatest insurance we can have is to see that this force is equipped and increased so that a fair measure of protection shall be accorded to these industries once they are under way.

May I say just a word about the defence of Canada regulations, because they are closely allied with the subject I have been discussing. I endorse to the full the well earned tribute paid to the Minister of Justice by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), and I wish to add to it by saying that this country owes the Minister of Justice a great debt of gratitude for the onerous, difficult and unpleasant duty which devolves upon him in the administration of these regulations, a duty which demands from him never-ceasing vigilance and courage. We have in him a man who possesses those two outstanding qualities to a great degree.

In my view the hon. member for Vancouver East with whom I am not always found in agreement, yesterday offered two valuable suggestions as to possible amendments to regulation 22. I think they might well be given careful consideration. With other criticisms of the defence of Canada regulations I am entirely out of accord. We hear these regulations attacked, sometimes with much vigour, on the ground that they are not in accordance with British justice—great stress is laid upon that phrase. They are attacked in the press and elsewhere, and I wonder whether those who attack the regulations on that ground are aware that, so far as the internment of subversive elements is concerned, our regulations are patterned precisely upon the British regulations as they exist to-day.

In my view it would be dangerous to relax our regulations, except to the extent suggested by the hon. member to whom I have referred, because Britain has found them of great benefit and we have also found them beneficial in dealing with subversive activities in this country. I would point out that Norway had no defence of Norway regulations, Belgium had no defence of Belgium regulations, nor had Holland any, and when Hitler determined to invade these countries they were honeycombed with subversive elements running wild without check in any way. In my judgment the rapid defeat of Norway, Belgium and Holland was due in large measure to treachery from within. History so records.

The defence of Canada regulations are such that I would definitely oppose them if this were a time of peace, but Canada is at war and that makes all the difference with regard to them. I suggest that anyone who seeks the repeal of these regulations should first ask Winston Churchill for his view of the subject.

Let me ask you, Mr. Speaker, to turn to Europe for a short time and review what has happened there, apropos of my subject; and then I want to apply the knowledge we have gained there so as to make sure that Canada and the United States shall not repeat the mistakes for which European countries are now paying so terrible a price. Over a period of years Hitler has built up a terrific and efficient war machine. He has produced the strongest array of mechanized slaughter machines ever gathered together for murder in the history of the world. He has armed and trained an enormous army of men brought to the highest state of man-power efficiency. But granting all that, I say to you, sir, that without two satanic weapons which he devised he could never have had the startling successes in Europe which he has achieved during the past few months. Those two weapons are ruthlessness and treachery.

First, there was ruthlessness, deliberately planned to create fear and to turn the blood of strong men into water. Cast your mind back, Mr. Speaker, to what he did in his own country, the cruel persecution of the Jews in Germany, the persecution and devastation of the Catholic church and all its orders and institutions, the murder of Dollfus, the purge or "blood bath" as it was called on June 30, 1934, when he murdered 1,200 of his former friends through his gestapo, one of them being Roehm, his chief of staff, the man who had built up the force of storm troopers and put him in power; another was Karl Ernst, his loyal Berlin troop leader, who had become too popular for Hitler's liking. It is interesting to note that both these men, just before Hitler murdered them, were decorated by him with the iron cross. We in Canada are not impressed with the iron cross as a token of esteem between friends; we think it stands for everything that is foul and evil. We think the cross signifies the quality of mercy, and if I may be permitted to paraphrase Shakespeare, I would say that the iron cross is twice cursed; it curseth him that gives and him that takes.

Outside Germany the slaughter picture is terrific. There was the burning of Rotterdam with the massacre of 100,000 defenceless women and children; the slaughter on the roads of France when Hitler's machines zoomed up and down, spilling death and destroying old men and women carrying bundles over their shoulders, and little children, so that their bodies might be stoplogs in the path of the French army. Now we have the bombing of London present to all our minds, where women and children, hospitals and schools, are the chief prey of the night raiders. Then there was the torpedoing of the City of Benares. None of these wicked acts are ordinary incidents of war; they are planned deliberately to instil fear and as a policy of ruthlessness. I am going to quote his own language from Rauschning's sensational book, "Hitler Speaks," where this statement made by Hitler is quoted verbatim:

> We must be ruthless. We must regain our clear conscience as to ruthlessness.

Treachery, as I mentioned, is his second weapon, and that is directly applicable to what I am talking about. Norway was overrun in record time, and the Quislings within were responsible. Holland, Belgium and France itself were overrun in thirty-three days. An army of eight million trained men, including the flower of the British army to the extent of 350,000, was defeated and routed, and these countries subjugated and captured in, as I say, thirty-three days. I suggest that all of that was the result of treachery, treachery from within, and could not possibly have been accomplished in any other way. In the last war in one battle which continued for eight days the French alone lost 600,000 men. The courage of the men of France is no less to-day than it was then, but we find that this insidious, terrific treachery from within has changed the whole picture of warfare.

May I point out that there is no accident about this. Hitler planned it in 1934. He called his agents from all countries where they were posted, including the United States and Canada, to a convention at Berlin where he addressed them in this language which I shall quote, and afterwards they dispersed and went back to the respective countries from which they came. Those who came from this continent returned here. I quote his language:

> As the front line of our German fighting movement you will make it possible for us to complete the occupation of our positions and open fire. You are the army's outposts. You will have to prepare definite enterprises for an advance of the front. You will have to mask our own preparations for attack. To-day you are perhaps the most important section of the German nation.

That is impressive language. Then he sent them on their way with this admonition:

> It is a good idea to have at least two German societies in every country. One of them can always call attention to its loyalty to the country in question and will have the function of fostering social and economic action. The other one will be radical and revolutionary. It will have to be prepared to be frequently repudiated by myself and other German authorities.

And again:

> We shall have friends who will help us in all the enemy countries. . . . When the enemy is demoralized from within, when he stands on the brink of revolution, when social unrest threatens—that is the moment, a single blow must destroy him.

And again:

We shall soon have an S.A. in America.

"S.A." meaning storm section.

We shall train our youth, and we shall have men whom degenerate Yankeedom will not be able to challenge.

Canada, sir, and the United States are direct objects of his ambition. Let none of us in either country make any mistake about that. In support of that statement I quote again from Rauschning's book, Hitler's own language:

Our struggle against Versailles and our struggle for a new world order is one and the same, we cannot set limits.

Nothing will be easier than to produce a bloody revolution in North America.

I guarantee, gentlemen, that at the right moment a new America will exist as our strongest supporter when we are ready to take the stride into overseas space.

Every state could by suitable methods be so split from within that little strength was required to break it down.

And as for money, for this purpose there will always be money. It is true that these conspiracy methods will grow costlier as one moves further westward, but that is the only difference. They will succeed everywhere. I guarantee that.

I have related this story to indicate why I so persistently warn against sabotage and fifth-column activity. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police, corresponding with Mr. Hoover's Federal Bureau of Investigation in Washington, and Scotland Yard in England, is our safeguard in this respect. We have, as the house knows, declared many subversive societies, some with innocent sounding names, to be unlawful; we have made it a crime to retain membership in them. We have under the defence of Canada regulations picked up and interned hundreds of Germans and Italians whose activities were shadowed and watched by our secret service police, not just since the war began but during the past three years; our secret service were ready, and within twenty-four hours of the declaration of war with Germany, and later against Italy in June last, raids were carried out; the police swooped down, and the worst of these bad men, except those who escaped in time to the United States, were interned and are behind the palisades to-day.

We have now a new military ally, the United States, and the great peril in the United States to-day is the enemy within. Hon. members need not take my word for it; let me quote Mr. Edgar Hoover's statement made in August, a few weeks ago. This is what he said:

Make no mistake about it, the saboteur, or "sab cat", as he was known in world war days, has come back in force. Many of our vital factories are vulnerable to the menace of professional destroyers. We are now in almost exactly the same position as we were shortly before our entrance into the world war. If we are to be spared the repetition of such disasters as the Black Tom munitions explosion and other catastrophes which punctuated the activities of saboteurs twenty-odd years ago we should build our fences now, while undercover enemies can still be kept out.

And again:

There have been many mysterious efforts at incendiarism, injury to working parts of warcraft, and other activities of the "sab cat" to cause destruction. There will be more of this unless thousands of factories in America, upon which so much of our population depends for a living, realize that we are caught in a world torn with strife between violently opposing forces.

Next to Edgar Hoover perhaps no man in the United States is more familiar with the situation than Martin Dies, chairman of the Dies committee of the House of Representatives, who for the past two years with his committee has been investigating un-American activities. On August 26 he issued a public statement, in which he said:

There are to-day 6,000,000 sympathizers of communist, fascist and nazi organizations in the United States.

He concluded with these words:

The fifth column in the United States is better organized and financed than in any country overrun by Hitler.

I suggest, sir, that a great step has been taken, both in the United States and in Canada, to place industry in North America on a commonsense basis of production, so that the job of the saboteur will be made more difficult. The federal bureau of investigation, under J. Edgar Hoover, is doing a wonderful job in the United States. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police, under Commissioner Stuart Wood, at Ottawa, are doing a wonderful job in Canada. These two major agencies exchange information and work in close, friendly, international cooperation. If Mr. Hoover wants to know something from Ottawa he puts an agent on a plane and he comes here and gets it, and the same thing applies if we require information from Washington. No treaties are required for that.

But government agencies can do only so much in this way; they cannot perform miracles. Both these forces have a limited personnel, having regard to the enormous areas they cover. Part of my message I should like to put in this way, that if business men in Canada fold their arms and say, "We leave this problem to our secret service police," that is just like putting a beauty patch on a cancer and expecting to get a cure. The federal bureau and the mounted police can give leadership and direction to industry as to how vulnerable spots may be made invulnerable, but the real defence in this regard rests on the shoulders of industry itself, from the high plant executives who sit round the board table right down through the key men, the mechanics, the doorkeepers and the waterboys. All down the line we have to assure ourselves of the closest cooperation in order to protect ourselves against sabotage.

I have not much time left at my disposal, but I should like to make a suggestion or two. First it seems to me that Canada has been a bit spoiled, from an international point of view, for a great many years. For a hundred years we have had the protection of the British navy on the seven seas, for which protection we never contributed and never were asked to contribute a dollar. For a long time we have had the friendship of the United States of America, and round our shoulders the sheltering arm of what is known as the Monroe doctrine. So as a young country we have been encouraged to remain in swaddling clothes, so to speak, in an international sense, so far as war and preparation for war are concerned. But we went into the last great war and did our bit, as we have gone into this war and are doing our bit again, as I believe the debate of the last few days has made abundantly clear.

We met here in September of last year and in four days declared war against Germany. It appeared to me that we saw the mother country, after exhausting every honourable means to bring about peace, with her back to the wall having to fight for her very existence. But we saw a good deal more than that. We believed that Hitler, Goering, Goebells, Himmler and all the rest of those bloodthirsty bandits were bent upon world conquest, and we felt that the quicker Canada did her bit to stop them before they could reach our shores, the better it would be for Canada. The first step towards defeating nazi poison is to realize that it exists, and the second step is to realize that it can be defeated. The nazis are not supermen. Gangsters have never been supermen, and we can carry that thought in our minds as we go forward with this struggle.

The Canadian people have responded nobly to the call. The recital by our ministers during the last week is amazing in its cumulative effect. There are just two incidents, so far as I know not yet touched upon, of which I should like to remind the house in reviewing Canada's war activities. The first is the work of young Davies and his Canadian pals of the London suicide squad. They have written the name of Canada across the horizon of the world in letters of flame. The second is the fact that the mothers and fathers of Canada, with loving, outstretched arms, have sought to receive little children from the dangers of the motherland. That has given a great deal of comfort to the British people and has shown that we in this country have not forgotten the teaching of two thousand years ago, to suffer little children to come and forbid them not.

I suggest, sir, that the destiny of Canada in the future outruns the imagination. Perhaps it will be our destiny to be the very spearhead of ultimate victory. We may look forward to paying a heavy price, as has been so constantly and, I think, properly emphasized, but in the end we will rejoice with Britain and the commonwealth nations that we were able to play a noble part.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would give you the masterful words of Winston Churchill, when he said:

> We have great reason for vigilance and concern—but no room for despair.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, while I realize that the question of first importance confronting us at this time is the effective prosecution of the war, nevertheless I offer no excuse for stressing the serious plight of agriculture in western Canada. I say that because if we are to make our maximum contribution in this war it is essential that every industry be maintained at its highest point of efficiency. No one in his sane senses could possibly suggest that agriculture is in a position to function efficiently as long as agricultural produce is being sold at the present disastrously low levels and, moreover, as long as the policy of the government remains so obscure.

Before I proceed to deal with the question of agriculture I should like to touch upon one or two speeches that have been made during the course of this debate. First of all I wish to comment on the speech delivered in this house this afternoon by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). In essence his speech was the same as the budget speeches of last June and the previous September; and if I were to deal with it in detail, especially as it had to do with this group, I would be merely threshing a lot of old straw. I feel, however, that if, when dealing with this group, the minister had been prepared to answer a few questions he might have been in a sounder position, although on the other hand I might say he would have been in a more unsound position, because when you are engaged in the unprofitable task of building up straw men for the purpose of knocking them down you are not in a very good position to answer questions.

Therefore I should like to remind the house of one or two important points. For instance, both inside and outside the house for the past five years we have continually stressed one point which we have considered absolutely fundamental, namely, that industry does not and cannot create an effective demand for its own production, except in times of abnormal capital goods production. And of course in war time there is a tremendous expansion of capital goods, in the form of armaments.

Consequently we realize that when maximum production is reached, if it is still necessary to make more goods available for war purposes, and if it is still necessary to divert more production from consumers to war purposes, then it will be necessary to increase taxation. We have always appreciated that fact, and if the minister had studied the amendment a little more closely he would not have fallen into the error he made when he said that at this time we are opposing taxation.

The amendment to the amendment is in these words:

> And this house further regrets the failure of the government to adopt a monetary policy that would permit a maximum war effort, without either increasing the debt or reducing the standards of living below that necessary for maintaining maximum efficiency.

That is to say, after the government has obtained all the money it can obtain by taxation, without reducing the maximum efficiency, then we maintain that any additional money that is required should be issued through the Bank of Canada, without debt. The minister stresses the fact that one of the main aims of taxation and bond sales at this time is to curtail the purchasing of non-essentials. I think the minister will agree that it would not be wise to curtail the purchases of goods essential, for instance, to health, because we have an abundance of such things. It would not be wise to curtail the purchase of primary products, such as fruit and fish; and yet, as a result of government policy, that is actually occurring at the present time.

I would strongly urge upon the government the necessity of telling the people just what are the goods we should refrain from buying. I find there is a tremendous amount of confusion in that regard. People are asking, "What is it we should stop buying?" They know very well that they should not stop buying primary products. They do not realize exactly what it is the government is trying to get them to do when it tells them to stop buying and to increase their savings.

I maintain that the government in adopting its present policy of drastically reducing the spending power of the people has overlooked two points of great importance. The first of these, namely, the drastic reduction in the people's purchasing power by taxation and bond sales could be justified only if we had already reached or were rapidly approaching a period of maximum production. I do not think that is the situation in this country to-day. Therefore we feel that instead of still further reducing demand, we should expand production and its distribution.

For instance, there are still thousands of unemployed in Canada to-day. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) stressed the fact that in Nova Scotia there are many unemployed. Then, in the Financial Post of November 16 we find this, respecting unemployment:

> Failure to place several thousands of young men and women trained since last June for war industry, about 25 per cent of those put through the youth training programme, is imperilling the expansion of the scheme. It is abating the enthusiasm of some of the provincial governments, and without the cooperation of the provinces, the entire scheme of youth training would have to be recast.

In addition to that, there are many thousands of girls in their own homes throughout the country who would be only too willing and anxious to participate in any way possible in the war effort, but they do not know what to do.

Agriculture could be expanded along many lines, provided the farmer is guaranteed a price which would at least return the cost of production. I would point out, too, the absurdity of the present policy of the government in another respect. They are pleading with the people to save; saving is being stressed as a patriotic duty. At the same time there is a large body of highly specialized experts who are urging the people to spend. In the mornings I walk down from my room to the parliament buildings, and I pass a number of hoardings which have recently been built up. On these hoardings I am hold that I need a new car—"Eye it; try it; buy it." I see advertisements advertising new coats, and others telling me that I am ruining my eyesight, and that I should have extra lights in buildings. Then I may go down to a cafe to have breakfast. While there I may pick up a newspaper or periodical, either of which would be filled with advertisements. Thousands of those advertisements say to women, for instance, that if they are going to get their men they will have to maintain that school-girl complexion. Others are directed to fat people, telling them that if they wish to become stream-lined they should buy reducing appliances. Others are directed to bald men stating that in order to make a thousand hairs grow where one grows to-day they should use a special kind of lotion.

One may read thousands of advertisements each of which is attempting to induce the public to spend more money on certain commodities. Then one may turn on the radio, and likely he will be deluged with soap. It is at once evident that if this type of advertising did not pay, it would not be continued. Evidently the companies interested are obtaining results. They are increasing spending, because of the campaigns they put on.

And so we have the battle between spending and anti-spending. On the one side we have the government urging the people to do everything in their power not to spend, and on the other we have the highly specialized business advertiser urging the people to spend. One is reminded of the picture of the two donkeys tied together, both straining in opposite directions. It is time we got together and worked out the matter on a proper basis.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Eliminate both donkeys.

Mr. QUELCH: If it is essential that we curtail spending for the successful prosecution of the war, then what possible justification can there be for the employment of thousands of people all of whom are trying to make us spend? What justification can there be for thousands upon thousands of pounds of materials being used in this apparently subversive action?

So, Mr. Speaker, I would say this: Let us utilize the services of all the unemployed, in order to expand our production to the maximum. Let us pay the primary producer a price which will make it possible for him to meet the cost of production, so that he may expand his production in any direction considered advisable. Then let us stop all forms of unnecessary advertising. That is as far as I shall go in discussing the speech of the Minister of Finance. After it has been printed one will be in a better position to analyse it.

I should now like to say a few words regarding the speech of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). I always find his speeches interesting. Nevertheless I do deplore the first part of the speech he delivered on this occasion. I do not think he did himself any credit, nor did he do credit to his party, or add anything constructive to the debates of the house. In other words, it was the typical sort of political bilge water which flows so freely at election time.

There was one statement which I believe should be challenged immediately. He intimated that the election results were an endorsation of the government's farm policy. In my opinion nothing could be further from the truth. I shall deal briefly with what I believe were the four main reasons why the government was elected—and certainly it was not through the agricultural vote.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made the main issue one of national unity and Canada's participation at the side of Great Britain. I believe he was right in making that the national issue. It was stressed to such a degree that many people felt that a vote against the government would be considered abroad as a vote against participation with the British empire. If any hon. members read newspapers from abroad after the election they would know that was exactly how it was considered. The foreign papers stated that Canada had shown by the election that she was solidly behind Britain.

The next was what one might term a piece of political trickery in calling the election in the month of March. March is probably one of the worst months for the rural voters to get out to vote. As a rule in that month the roads are either blocked with snow or just opening up. I understand that in many rural constituencies it was practically impossible for the voters to get to the polls. In my own constituency two polls never even opened because the returning officers could not get through. In a number of other polls there were only four or five people who were able to vote. The agricultural vote in my constituency averaged less than thirty per cent, while the town vote was over seventy per cent. I think in that regard it is shown that the election was not an endorsation of the government's agricultural policy because in the majority of instances the farmer never had a chance to vote.

The third point to which I should like to refer is the splitting of the progressive vote. I am not blaming the Liberals for this, although they might be blamed in some respects. Until such time as the progressives throughout the country, whether they call themselves Social Crediters, Cooperative Commonwealth Federation or any other name, have sufficient sense to get together, work together and cooperate they will not deserve much representation in this house, and just so long will the forces of reaction continue in power at Ottawa.

The next point with which I want to deal is the vicious misrepresentation carried on during the election. It will be remembered that in September last this group took a definite stand and advocated the mobilization of the resources of Canada in order to make as great a contribution as possible to the war effort. We advocated the mobilization of the financial resources, the mobilization of the industrial resources, and, lastly, the mobilization of man-power. During the election campaign we were attacked in the press, over the radio and on the platform as advocating the conscription of man-power, no mention being made of the fact that we had advocated, first, the conscription of our financial resources; second, the conscription of our industrial resources, and then the conscription of man-power. Just the one thing was mentioned. Time and again we were attacked by Liberals who stated that if they were put into power there would be no conscription. Yet within a few months after the Liberal party was elected the mobilization bill was brought down and now we have conscription. I am not attacking conscription; I am attacking the Liberal party for being willing during a time of national crisis to try to obtain votes by taking a stand which they knew was contrary to the welfare of this country. I would not have raised this question if the Minister of Agriculture had not in his political harangue tried to create a false impression of a most mischievous character and one which, if believed, in eastern Canada might prove of great harm to western Canada.

Coming down to the subject of agriculture, at the outset I want to make it clear that my criticism is not levelled against the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon). We realize that the wheat marketing problem did not arise yesterday, did not arise since the declaration of war; it has been growing steadily in magnitude ever since 1922 when the European nations first increased their production and decreased their imports. From 1922 to 1939 the wheat acreage of the world was expanded by somewhere in the neighbourhood of 52,000,000 acres. After the war the problem was greatly accentuated and to-day it has obtained major proportions.

It is true that this problem has been dropped into the lap of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but we feel that in reality it is the responsibility of the Minister of Agriculture. I say this because it is largely as a result of the policies advocated by the Minister of Agriculture that the problem has reached its present proportions. On many occasions in the past the Minister of Agriculture has stated in this house that his policy was to make it possible for the small farmer in western Canada to make a living. He stated that he was interested in building up a prosperous rural community. Furthermore he stated that he was not interested in helping the large farmer further to expand his operations. I think we are all agreed that that is a sound stand to take. I would point out, however, that unfortunately the results of the minister's policy have been just the opposite—there has been a gradual elimination of the small farmer. I am able to use the word "gradual", because provincial debt legislation has made it possible to guarantee the farmer security of tenure, even though his position might be one of financial bankruptcy.

The inevitable result in the grain belt of western Canada of a continuation of the present wheat policy will be that it will become an area of large mechanized units. The small farmer will be driven from the land and our rural communities will disappear. Many towns will become ghost towns, and depots will be moved out wholesale by the railways. Does the Minister of Agriculture consider that to be a satisfactory picture? Whether he does or not, the point is that this is actually what is happening to-day in the west. A very good article was written by Mr. Nesbitt, the publicity agent of the wheat pool, showing how this was happening, how it was the logical consequence of certain policies which have been pursued during the past few years.

Why do I say that this will be the inevitable outcome of the government's policy? I say it because we all know that it costs the half-section farmer considerably more to produce wheat than it does the man with the large mechanized farm. Figures have been quoted on many occasions, and many hon. members have referred to the evidence of Professor Hope given before the Bracken commission. He pointed out that a half-section farmer, raising twenty bushels of wheat to the acre, would need 72 cents a bushel in order to meet his costs of production and debt charges. The section farmer would require 61 cents; and the two-section farmer, 51 cents. These figures are based on a yield of twenty bushels to the acre, whereas for the past ten years the average yield in Canada has been only fourteen bushels to the acre. I would remind the house that the acreage bonus is paid only when the average yield is twelve bushels to the acre on a township basis. Under these circumstances the farmer would have to receive considerably more than the amounts quoted by Professor Hope. In all probability the average price this year will be 45 or 47 cents a bushel, or even lower. Not only will the small farmer receive nothing for his labour, but he will be forced considerably deeper into debt. That is why I say the small farmer will be eliminated, while the large farmer will be forced to expand his operations in order to reduce his overhead.

If the policy of this government is to try to build up prosperous rural communities we feel that instead of having a guaranteed price for wheat based upon the cost of production on the large units for all the wheat a farmer raises, we should have a guaranteed price based upon the cost of production on the smaller units for a limited quota per farmer. This would not entail a restriction of acreage. The government could continue with their policy of taking marginal land out of production. For a limited amount of his production the farmer would receive more than he is now receiving for his total crop. Any wheat in excess of the amount of the quota would have to be stored by the farmer, and it would mean that in a crop failure year he would be able to sell his surplus on the quota. In other words, it would act as a form of crop insurance.

Throughout the west and in other parts of Canada at the present time the government are being attacked for their lack of a sound wheat policy. They have been charged with bungling, but to me the bungling seems to be so flagrant that I doubt very much whether it is a matter of bungling at all. I am more inclined to believe that the situation exists as a result of a deliberately planned policy, for the following purposes: first, of putting into effect the proclaimed Liberal policy of expanding foreign markets and the maintenance of a favourable balance of trade; second, dealing now with the immediate situation, a plan of enforced saving.

To come back to the first of these two: in order to expand foreign markets and maintain a favourable balance of trade, under the usual orthodox policy the general practice is to maintain, on the one hand, as we have done for the past six years, a low standard of living, in order to reduce the demand against imports, thereby maintaining a favourable balance of trade, and, on the other, a low price for agricultural products, in order to make it possible to undersell our foreign competitors.

The result of this policy internally has been a great deal of unnecessary suffering. I say that because it would have been possible, by increasing our production, to maintain a favourable balance of payments and at the same time to maintain a higher standard of living. During the past six years the production in secondary industry has been less than thirty per cent of its capacity. The result externally has been a condition of international friction, because when you refuse to accept the imports of other countries in payment for your exports you are making it impossible for those nations to acquire the raw materials they need, unless they are prepared to go into debt. I know that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has always complimented himself upon working for peace, but I would point out that any government which has a policy depending upon international competition instead of international cooperation is not working for peace. It is bound to result in international friction, and international friction leads to war.

Coming back to the second point, that of compulsory saving, we find in western Canada many farmers in a serious plight, owing to the fact that they have threshed a large crop and have been able to sell, perhaps, only a small proportion of it; or if the grain was tough, they were not able to sell any of it. Unfortunately, in many instances ten to twenty per cent of the crop, on account of its not having been threshed, still remains under the snow. The reason for this was that the elevators were refusing to accept tough grain, and the farmers held back hoping that the weather would clear in order to make it possible to thresh the grain dry. Those farmers who had sold only a small proportion of their crop were depending upon obtaining from the government an advance on the wheat that they had in farm storage, and they were justified in that expectation because of certain statements which have been made by cabinet ministers in this house and in interviews. But now, apparently, the government, in their insane desire to reduce the spending power of the people, have given up all idea of making an advance. If I am wrong in that assumption I hope the minister will correct me.

So, as a result of this policy, many farmers, in spite of the fact that they have threshed a large crop, find themselves practically destitute. It will be necessary for them either to seek relief or to get an advance of credit from the local storekeeper. Unfortunately, generally speaking the storekeeper in the rural communities is in no better position to finance the farmer than is the farmer himself. It is true that, according to the wheat policy, a storekeeper may accept wheat as collateral against a debt. On the other hand, few storekeepers have the storage facilities available to handle this wheat. Even if they do take it they are not able to pass it on to the wholesaler, who, of course, demands cash and will not accept wheat. Therefore, although being able to accept wheat as collateral against a debt may make it possible for a storekeeper to collect an old debt, it does not help to solve the question of financing current expenditures.

Speaking in this chamber on August first, the Minister of Trade and Commerce made this statement:

> Unless something is done to make available to the farmer more money than, owing to elevator capacity conditions, he can obtain from his first deliveries, there will be widespread suffering, and there would be widespread necessity for relief.

Later on, in an interview printed in the Western Producer of September 26, he points out that the government is working towards ways and means by which these advances can be made, and he ends up with the statement:

> The wheat committee was ready to go ahead with that plan, and still is ready to do so.

In spite of that fact, as the house is aware, no advance has been made, and the reason given is that the banks have refused to finance the operation. It seems to me a rather humiliating position for any government to find itself in, that after a government has decided that advances should be made it has to back up on its proposals on account of the fact that the banks will not make available the credit necessary for these advances. I admit that I find it hard to realize that the leader of the Liberal party to-day is the same man who in 1935 appealed to the people of Canada for election on a programme of monetary reform. I believe hon. members will remember the statement he made at that time, that if the Liberal party were elected to power there would be a great battle in this country between parliament, representing the people, and the money power, for the purpose of regaining to the nation that which had been lost, the control of the issue of currency and of credit in order to make that currency and credit available in terms of public need to meet the industrial, social and domestic requirements of the Canadian people. Has anybody seen any evidence of that battle during the last six years?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The banks won.

Mr. QUELCH: The only sign I have seen of any battle is a battle on behalf of the banks.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): A sham battle.

Mr. QUELCH: Yes, just a battle to fool the people.

I do not think anybody will dispute my statement that the wheat problem in western Canada to-day is a national one. Have we not the right to expect that the banks will be willing to monetize the farmers' wheat? Surely it is well worth monetizing. It is not perishable. It is a rather servile position for a government to be in, after investigating the problem and deciding that some action should be taken, to be told by the banking interests that they will not make this credit available.

Some of us in this house may in the past have been fooled as to what exactly was the true relationship between the Bank of Canada and this government. We were told, for instance, that the Bank of Canada was the instrument of the government. Two years ago we were very quickly disillusioned on that point, because Mr. Osborne, the deputy governor of the Bank of Canada, speaking to the board of trade at Ottawa, told them that no self-respecting central bank would accept from its government a policy with which it did not agree. I suppose the Bank of Canada is a self-respecting central bank. So, apparently, the tail wags the dog; the Bank of Canada decides the policies for this government. Who, I wonder, decides the policy of the Bank of Canada?

We in this corner have always believed that the policy of the Bank of Canada is dominated by the Bank of England. That is why we called for the tabling of the correspondence between the Bank of Canada and the Bank of England. We were refused access to that correspondence. Who controls the policy of the Bank of England? Members of parliament in Great Britain have asked for the names of the shareholders of the Bank of England and that was likewise refused them. All I have to say is this, that whoever are the controllers of financial policy in Britain and whoever are the controllers of financial policy in Canada, they have not for the past six years shown any real interest in the welfare of the Canadian people. In many ways one may charge that by their actions they have shown themselves to be good friends of Germany.

Before leaving the wheat question I would briefly summarize what in our opinion would be a sound wheat policy for the dominion. First of all there should be international co-operation instead of international competition. We feel that the four major wheat exporting nations—Australia, the Argentine, the United States and Canada, providing over 80 per cent of the world's exports of wheat—should get together and decide on a fair price for wheat, and then they should decide upon an equitable export quota for each of them.

Further, I suggest that Canada should maintain a 100 per cent wheat board, discarding the grain exchange and taking over all grain-handling facilities. I know that the Minister of Agriculture would approve that, because in April, 1939, speaking in this house, he said that if we continued to market wheat through the wheat board, then the only logical thing was to take over all grain handling facilities.

We feel that the government should be prepared to provide storage and take delivery of at least a stipulated quota per individual farmer, these quotas, in the aggregate, to be based upon the following considerations: (1) export requirements; (2) home consumption; (3) at least two years' reserve supply. Moreover, we are of opinion that the government should guarantee a price for the individual quota of the farmer, of at least $1 a bushel at point of shipment. There would be no restriction on production. The government would continue to take marginal lands out of production and the only restriction would be on deliveries. The farmer would have to provide storage for his surplus. This would constitute a form of crop insurance, so that in good years the farmer would have to hold a certain amount of wheat on the farm, and if he had a crop failure he would then turn in towards the quota what he had held in good years. The point is that on the limited amount sold he would obtain more than he receives for the total crop to-day. The farmer's quota would be based on average production of the former years, with a minimum quota to the small farmer. We are of opinion that a policy based upon such proposals would help to maintain agriculture on a sound basis and promote a friendly relationship with foreign nations.

Mr. H. R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): May I first congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, namely, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) and the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras). Not only were their speeches of a high order, but they contained references to many items, even of major policies, which might well have found a place in the speech from the throne itself. What I am concerned with, however, is the feeling of lack of confidence on the part of many Canadians in the present Liberal administration, and the cause and removal of that lack of confidence.

I accept the verdict of March 26—as of March 26. It was not, however, the result of absolute or unqualified confidence in the present Liberal administration. Even at the best, approximately one-third of the people voted for the policies for which my party stands, and I should like to take this occasion to say that, contrary to the amusement which some of the Liberal administration seem to derive from a false conception, I—like many of my fellow members—ran and was elected as a straight Conservative supporting the policy of national government, a policy which as a war measure I believe to be the only sound policy. Those supporting our party, together with those who supported the other two opposition groups, constituted nearly half the people of Canada. The representation in this house might not indicate it, but nearly half the people showed their lack of confidence in the Liberal administration.

That administration, in the eyes of many, carries on what can be described only as a partisan war effort, for only the inner group of Liberals know what is going on and what, if any, the government's long range policies are. Thus Canada has the invidious distinction of being the only British dominion where the government in power remains political in character and has not considered it worth while to gain the confidence of all the people, to say nothing of adding to its strength.

We have heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) play with words and ascribe to his government the term "national," possibly because its members have their homes in every province of Canada or possibly because with one exception they are all either lawyers or school-teachers. A truly national government must have in it representatives of all substantial bodies of political thought, including labour, having one common objective—to win a speedy victory overseas. As members of a true democracy, we accept the situation, but the case of those who have never had confidence in the administration, and those who have lost it since March 26, is deserving of the attention of this house.

I do not intend to try to rekindle party strife but rather, on the contrary, I should like to rekindle the spirit of national unity. May I assure the house that one's only interest can be the winning of this war and, perforce, making the present ill-suited political administration work so that the greatest contribution may be forthcoming from all. This government must give all the people, irrespective of party affiliation, confidence in its administration. That is a tall order for a party government. Would that our Prime Minister could say, in the words of the great Churchill, uttered in July of this year:

I stand at the head of a government representing all parties in the state, all creeds, all classes, every recognizable section of opinion. We are ranged beneath the crown of our ancient monarchy. We are supported by a free parliament and a free press.

We in Canada must likewise present a united and confident front to a threatening dictator. Lack of confidence is due not only to the fact that we are not told, the fact that the people were misled as to the nature of the country's effort during the first nine months of the war, the fact that there has been failure to form a national government. There has even been failure to appoint to the cabinet men who were first of all outstanding Canadians before they were outstanding Liberals. For example, the greatest industrial and mining centre in Canada and the greatest taxpaying community, contributing approximately one-third of the total income tax, the city in which lies the constituency I have the honour to serve, is without representation in the cabinet of this government.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): They elected you; that is enough.

Mr. JACKMAN: I said that city is without representation in the cabinet of this government that is carrying on the war effort. When the Prime Minister tells us that he cannot find great Canadians, be they Liberal or Conservative, who will accept office in his administration, there must be a reason. Perhaps it is because of an insistance on personal loyalty. Perhaps the positions offered were not of a sufficiently high order to command the services of the men approached, or perhaps those positions had encumbrances attached or were otherwise unsatisfactory. Can the Prime Minister in time of national crisis, having in his gift the greatest honour this country is capable of conferring, not attract to the privy council men who are outstanding Canadians and who may be of non-partisan political views?

If I had to limit the explanation of that lack of confidence to one sentence I would say, We are not told. With good reason, many of us do not attribute to that government virtues or accomplishments which are not self-evident.

In September, 1939, when Canada declared war, the English-speaking element in our population were given to understand that it would be a full-out effort, that Canada was to become the arsenal of the empire. On June 18, 1940, when the Emergency Powers Act was being discussed we learned on the authority of hon. members that this government gave one section of the country to understand that our participation in the war was to be a full-out effort, and another section to understand that our participation in the war was to be "free, voluntary and moderate."

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): On a point of order, has the hon. gentleman now reading his speech prepared it himself, or has someone else written it for him?

Mr. JACKMAN: I am speaking for myself. Nine months after the declaration of war the Canadian Manufacturers' Association at its convention in Winnipeg drew up a resolution which was forwarded to this government and which stated that Canadian manufacturers had not been called upon to render assistance in the making of war materials to any appreciable extent. If we are sceptical now when we receive information from this government, it is because the veriest simpleton knows that "once bitten, twice shy." If the action of the government in failing to carry on a vigorous war effort belies its announced policy, is it a sufficient answer to the Canadian people that the government took its cue from the British government who at that time still believed in the success of the policy of economic strangulation? I understand it was not so in Australia. Surely if there is one element which would give us a colonial status it is having a colonial mind. Let us think for ourselves and strive for mental autonomy as the first requisite and attribute of political autonomy. Perhaps nothing could better exemplify a need, if not the need, of an imperial war cabinet. In a democracy it is the duty of the government on a question of major policy such as our part in the war to acquaint the people with what the policy of the government is.

Consider the fact that in Great Britain parliament has been in virtually constant session. In the first fifteen months of this war we have been in session for scarcely one hundred days. Could anything be more obvious than that the cabinet, either or both, (1) considers the membership of this house useless or unrepresentative of or not responsible to the people of Canada; or (2) prefers to carry on as a dictatorship through orders in council having the force of legislation, of which 6,500 have been issued since the first of this year?

This house has heard from several ministers some factual accounts of what the government has been doing. I might say that I do not recall the hon. member who interrupted me a moment ago rising to interject his question when the ministers were making their statements, and I doubt very much whether they could have given the same answer as I gave.

Another department, of the doings of which we have not yet heard, and which is a key department in the carrying on of our war effort, is the Department of Labour.

My chagrin was never greater than when the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) told this house that he was not going to tell us anything new; that it had all appeared in the papers, but that it might serve a useful purpose to have it formally placed on the record. As promised, his was a dry speech which told us nothing new except that after the next two training periods the period would be extended from one month to four months. Everyone knows that a period of six months would be a minimum. In the United States they consider a year little enough.

What did we learn about the policy of his department? From the senior Minister of National Defence surely this house has the right to know how and why he proposes to raise a large sized army, and why only one dollar should be spent on the Royal Canadian Air Force for every two dollars spent on the land forces; what proportion is being spent on the navy; are destroyers, corvettes or freighters likely to be the crying need; what do present plans call for? We heard something of future plans from the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) and the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald); but why are they doing that much, and why only that much? Of course it is understood that schedules are subject to change by reason of subsequent events; but how large an army does Canada contemplate, how large a navy, how large an air force; how much money is to be spent on each; how much is to be spent on home defence preparations, and why; how much is to be spent on the first line of defence, which to-day is in Great Britain and Egypt? How is the war effort being coordinated? What uses are the pieces of a jigsaw puzzle if you have not the picture before you?

These are questions of policy about which the Canadian people have a right to know. Perhaps this house can contribute something to the brain trust—many of whose members are drawn from outside the membership of this house—which is now carrying on the business of government of this country. Is it to be the policy to spend every available effort and every possible dollar in creating a greater Royal Canadian Air Force, as some believe should be done? Only last week the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Gardiner) was reported in the press as saying that aeroplanes serve chiefly to demoralize the enemy, that we must have vast mechanized land forces to ensure victory. If the principle of cabinet responsibility still applies—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Cabinet solidarity.

Mr. JACKMAN: Cabinet solidarity, then—are we to take that as the considered opinion of this government, or are we to regard it as the care-free expression of a man who is happy to be safe once more on the shores of Canada? One thing which no British people have ever done since democratic principles prevailed has been to leave the deciding of general war policy to those who in the popular mind are known as brass hats. It is their function to carry out the policy; it is the duty of parliament to lay down that policy.

Is this country fully cooperating with the British war purchasing board in the United States and the war department in Washington in the purchase of supplies; and if so, since when? Or do we still demand United States steel, to be paid for in United States exchange, for the construction of the railway station in Montreal? The answer is yes. The same effort cannot be spent in two places. This country has only so much of human and material resources to throw into the war effort. The direction which we give to those resources and to that effort is all-important and may decide the issue. In his speech the Prime Minister pointed out that the enemy now exceeds us in the production of iron, steel and aluminium; and unfortunately, owing to the victories which the enemy has achieved to date, he has greatly increased his capacity, so that his margin over us is greater still. We in Canada can contribute only so much. It is important that we contribute that effort where it will do the maximum good. To ensure victory we must be skilful in direction, great in production and unsparing in sacrifice. Realizing that we are the second most important nation fighting against Germany, it behooves us to remember that often much good work is spoiled for want of a little more.

The members of this house and the people of Canada cannot measure the activities and results of this government by explanations as to why, after nine months of war, some units had rifles with which to train and others had not; why some had Bren guns and the officers were allowed five rounds each, while some had the guns only "briefly"; why boots and socks were not part of the regulation issue to non-permanent units in war time, when they should have been. Is the minister going to take refuge in the moribund peace-time regulations governing a starved militia? We cannot judge the war effort of the government solely by explanations as to why tanks did not exist and were not ordered in Canada; why signalling equipment, even though the order had not been placed, was not forthcoming from England until long after the proper army authority had requisitioned the equipment; by innumerable contracts let but unfinished; by a maze of detailed information; by paeans of self-adulation and the dulcet tones of the Canadian Broadcasting Corportion, which invariably ends each government broadcast with the ringing words, "I am happy to say we are ahead of schedule." In a struggle for life and freedom we can never be ahead of schedule. What is that schedule, and why?

Is this house to receive reports for its guidance—and when—from the advisory committee on economic policy, the wartime prices and trade board, the national labour supply council, the United Kingdom air liaison mission, the newly formed wartime requirements or priorities board and the many other organizations that have been set up? These are the boards that are running the business of government, which to-day is by far the greatest business in the country. What are the reasons for the findings of these boards, which the ministers may or may not accept in determining the policies of their departments? This house will appreciate the difficulty of playing even a game of euchre with a mirror behind one and a stacked deck.

Full publicity is a prime requisite to an informed public, and the radio is probably one of the most effective means of publicity. Therefore it would seem to be of great importance that public confidence in the government-owned radio should not be impaired. In view of the charges made by one of the directors, who has been with the organization since its inception, who was one of the protagonists of a publicly owned radio, and who previously had made several reports on this organization, I urge the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) to call together during this session a parliamentary committee in order that these charges may be considered and changes made or confidence restored.

Members of parliament, Conservative, Liberal, Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, and Social Credit, representing the people of Canada, are interested in learning something of the nature of the complicated problems which this government is facing or is about to face. What is now being done to prepare the Canadian people to make the inevitable sacrifices which will have to be made in their standards of living if we are to win this war?

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) touched upon the great problem of agriculture. His five-year plan does not solve the distressing situation with which the western wheat farmer is confronted in the winter of 1940. I do not claim first-hand information on western conditions; but if there is as much generality as there is truth in the accounts of conditions on some western farms, then more must be done for the western farmer than this government appears willing to undertake. When I heard the Minister of Agriculture outline the supply of Canadian wheat and our possible sales over a five-year period, ending with a perfect carry-over of 100,000,000 bushels, I knew that if the minister was a good teacher forty years ago he must have been an even better pupil fifty years ago, for when he came to arithmetic he must have first looked up the answers in the back of the book. Whatever the long-term solution of the western wheat problem may be, it is the duty of this parliament to see that no human suffering results, particularly in those sections of the country where there are cases of extreme hardship.

To inspire confidence in the government, what else must be told, if the government has any policy to tell? What are we to believe about the need for harnessing industrial manpower and woman-power to the war effort of Canada? It is recognized by all that increased industrial output is as necessary to the fighting forces as food is necessary to a starving man. When we consider the five-year start which the enemy has in the production of armaments we realize that we and our allies cannot produce too many of the instruments of war. Even in 1938 Germany's expenditures on armaments amounted to $4,400,000,000. Between 1935 and 1939 her own industrial capacity increased by fifty per cent; and now, if rumour be true, further sources of supply are being made accessible to our enemy.

If there is not an acute shortage of labour in Canada after more than a year of war, then I say it is a striking condemnation of this government. I would ask the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Gardiner) if in Great Britain the government permits the enlistment of workers in certain reserved occupations. Only last Friday the Minister of National Defence told this house that his department was not in competition with war industry but in cooperation with it, and he also spoke of methods whereby that co-operation might be made more effective. The less publicized but sometimes more informative bureau of well-informed rumour has it that the Minister of Munitions and Supply

(Mr. Howe), who is responsible for the industrial war production, does not see eye to eye with the Minister of National War Services with regard to the impact of military training on certain needed workers on war orders. What is the policy of the government, and is there any uniformity among the various departments? How is the coordination effected, and who is the coordinator? It is common knowledge that the real bottleneck of our industrial war effort is the lack of highly skilled workers, even though they may comprise as little as five per cent of the total, as stated by the Minister of National War Services who, like a peace-time tourist, spends two weeks in a country and then writes a book about it. The bottleneck is like the weak link in a chain; it is the gauge of its strength.

What has the government done in preparation for the need in connection with the upgrading—to use the term current in the old country—and the training of mechanics for the highly skilled jobs of toolmakers, patternmakers, precision workers and expert machinists? Time is too short to turn out fully qualified experts, but men can be trained to be proficient in particular trades, and specific branches of those skilled trades. There are still good workmen in my constituency who have not regular employment, because they have not the expert skill required for some particular job in connection with war orders.

I understand, as has already been mentioned this evening, that there has also been failure to place approximately 25 per cent of those trained since last June for war industries, under the youth training plan.

Mr. McLARTY: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but I know he would like to state the facts correctly. In making that statement I have no hesitation in telling him he is incorrect.

Mr. JACKMAN: Then I think in fairness I should ask the minister what the percentage is. These figures are taken from the Financial Post of a few weeks ago, and there may be a discrepancy of 4 or 5 per cent. It is only fair that the minister should answer the question.

Mr. McLARTY: I believe the occasion may come when I shall answer it. I will say that I believe 25 per cent is too high a percentage of those not absorbed in industry, and who have taken a basic training in our vocational schools.

Mr. JACKMAN: If the minister has not the figures I could hardly be expected to have them myself. It does seem too bad that these men trained under the youth training plan should not be able to find work in times such as these.

What means does the government have of making known the needs of industry in one town to workers in another town? May I say that this question is very much in point. Labour is just as important as uniformed men, and it is a singular omission on the part of the government that this house has not yet heard from the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty). Will he tell us something of the work of the national labour supply council? I may tell the minister who, we all know, is extremely good-natured, and perhaps takes these things in the manner in which we would wish him to take them, that his portfolio is as important as any in the government.

Will the minister tell us about the work of the national labour supply council with its membership of twenty-two leading Canadians? Will he tell us why on November 7 a new labour board was announced, consisting of six departmental heads? When was the need for that committee first discovered, and is it charged with promoting coordination? I shall read the description of the duties of the board, as they are set out in a newspaper:

> . . . charged with promoting coordination, anticipating man-power requirements, considering the need for training special groups of workers, maintaining contact with war industries, obtaining the "considered opinions" of employers and employees, eliminating war industry competition, and formulating plans for the transfer of employers and employees from non-essential to essential war industries with the least disruption.

Who or what has been doing that work in the last nine months—in fact, in the last year? If no one has been doing it, why not?

As I said in the house last June:

> The first thing in order to put forth our full war effort industrially and make of Canada, as the Prime Minister stated last September, the "arsenal of empire", is training for our workers and multiplication of the lower grades of workers by intensive mass instruction, and to bring in a regiment of women and other workers from non-essential trades. The second thing in the planning of this much needed task is a proper distribution of the workers in the proper industries.

Time does not permit elaboration of other points, but opportunity will no doubt shortly be accorded to discuss at greater length those factors which the government knows the people of this country must face, but about which it prefers to maintain a political silence. From a certain point of view the Prime Minister has an extremely happy faculty of timing his policies. If it is admitted that one cannot act in advance of public opinion, surely in a time of crisis the Prime Minister will do something to inform that opinion as to what inevitably lies ahead.

The war must be won. Canada's contribution is limited only by her human and material resources. The measure of our war effort is but the sum total of the war effort of the individual. What more can the individual do? What more must he do? In one word —sacrifice. The great majority of the population—and I except only those whose standard is already too low—must be willing to experience a lowered standard for the sake of keeping our country free from foreign domination. We may be thankful that in some commodities we already produce far more than we require.

If a single soldier, sailor or airman is prepared to sacrifice his life, then we at home are prepared and willing to sacrifice our comforts and our necessities, if it will help to win this war—and it will. There are no longer any half-way measures, and speed of preparation is vital. He who serves now serves twice. The civilian population, under a full-out plan, must give up purchasing those articles which compete with war production. I refer to those articles requiring the use of iron, steel, aluminium and certain other essential war materials. More specifically, I urge the government to tell the people of Canada that the purchase of a whole list of articles containing such materials should be avoided or postponed. This is doubly difficult in the face of rising family incomes, after a period when families have had to do without many of the things we have come to look upon as little less than necessities.

In turn the money represented by those increased incomes must be saved and invested in war savings certificates and war loans in order to pay for this war from day to day, so that there will be money for payrolls at the end of the week. The happy day will come when that saved money will be just as welcome as it is now, if not more so. In the meantime the government is giving interest on the savings.

The consumption of articles which must be imported from the United States should be restricted. Gasoline is one. There are many others. The advertisements of our department stores urging the purchase of empire products is to the point, but more should be done. To-day Canada can pay for United States products only with the proceeds of goods and services which she sells to the United States. On balance we have always bought more merchandise from the United States than we have sold to them, and the balance is running heavier against us every day because of our tremendous purchases of aeroplanes and war supplies in that friendly country. There is nothing unfriendly to our great, good neighbour in this attitude. We shall spend in that country every United States dollar we have available for essential war supplies, and if they will lend us United States dollars we shall no doubt spend those also. In the meantime we have only so many United States dollars, the only kind we can use, to spend in that country and the problem is what United States goods are most important to us to-day. We cannot spend the same dollar twice. We must subordinate our comforts to the need of equipment for our fighting forces. There is no alternative.

Why does the government not tell the people what we are up against? Is there anything in the argument that we are fighting for democratic principles and that too much interference with the individual's right of living his own life and spending his money as he chooses savours of regimentation? Democracy has never stood for licence, but has always stood for liberty. When a democracy is fighting against a power which wages total war and the destruction of women and children, then some of the attributes of peacetime liberty become nothing but wild licence. Our willing acceptance of the duties and responsibilities of our citizenship at the present time is nothing more or less than the acceptance of that spirit of sacrifice which is at the same time the key and the strength of our Christian faith. When it comes to sacrifice for that which we believe to be right, there is no pagan religion of nazism which can hold a candle to the sacrifice and fortitude of those who fight under the banner of Christianity. Nothing makes a people feel its common brotherhood like fighting for the great cause of freedom, and where there is equality of sacrifice, who minds the extent? If, for example, we should have to resort to gasolineless days, who will mind walking if cabinet ministers also have to walk? Such a sight would be a source of strength as well as pleasure to all the people.

We have in Canada the most magnificent people in the world to whom to appeal. When the need is shown to them, their response is not exceeded even by that of the people of Great Britain. This spirit was shown by their magnificent response to the second war loan when it was obvious to all that its failure would be a reflection on our country, likewise by the spontaneous offering of their services by 200,000 volunteer workers in carrying out the national registration. The best results will come from an informed and understanding people. Never underestimate that spirit. The results obtained by the spontaneous cooperation of an understanding people far transcends that which can be obtained by coercion. This parliament must give the lead in education and understanding. Let the members and the press be the means of conveying that understanding.

The king's ministers, forming the executive of this government, are responsible to this parliament. I have no doubt that because of the sheer force of numbers the opinion of the government party will prevail; nevertheless it is the duty of this parliament to decide in open debate what shall be the policy of this country. Otherwise what would be the purpose of bringing us here? Is the government to be permitted to assemble the representatives of all the people for the sole purpose of stating that which has been told already, and after the Prime Minister has shown to the world that the institution of parliament has been observed by due perfunctoriness and adequate lip-service, to send us all home like a lot of schoolboys, while he retires to his sanctum with a wily smile and an irrepressible chuckle?

The people of Canada know the character of the enemy. We know that Hitler stands for doing away with personal freedom and for submission to the nazi overlords. We are prepared to work, to sacrifice, if necessary to die, in order that we and our children may continue to live as free men. Woe betide the leaders who do not lead. We are not told. We must be told. We are prepared.

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie): Mr. Speaker, Canada is a democracy and parliament is the very bulwark of that institution. I think all hon. members appreciate the great privilege of being sent to this House of Commons by the different districts of this great dominion in order that we may voice the opinions of the people we represent as well as our own. I come from a farming district in which is situated a fair-sized city. I was born on a farm and I have never lived anywhere else. Therefore I think it is perfectly natural that I should have something to say for agriculture. When I speak for agriculture I know that my electors in the city of Portage la Prairie know that I speak for them, because the prosperity of that city is entirely dependent upon the prosperity of the surrounding country. I think sometimes the people of the larger cities forget that they owe much of their prosperity to the initiative and hard work of the agriculturists.

I want to pay a tribute to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I want to pay it at this time because of his work in fostering friendship with our great neighbour to the south. I am sure that there is not another man in Canada who has done more to bring this about. When history is recorded, I believe that he will be given premier honours. I am thinking particularly of the trade arrangements which he made with the United States. I am thinking of what they mean, not only to Canada but to all concerned. I have always taken the stand that a trade arrangement in order to be lasting must be mutually satisfactory to all those whom it affects. I believe that this was always in the mind of the Prime Minister when he was dealing not only with the United States but also with the mother country, Great Britain.

I am happy to be able to recall that when, in 1936, I took occasion to speak on these trade treaties, I said that the treaty was more than a trade treaty, it was the hand of friendship stretched out to a nation that was our kin. Then, in 1939, when this treaty was renewed for another three years, I took the attitude that the most important thing about it was that it had at last brought the mother country, our cousins to the south and ourselves around a table, and that we had negotiated a treaty beneficial to all concerned. In my view a great deal was done through these treaties to cement the friendship which stands us in such good stead to-day.

Hon. members know that the exchange of fifty destroyers for naval and air bases in the western hemisphere was a direct result of the friendship which Canada always exhibited towards the United States. I say that is absolutely true; and I believe that the joint defence scheme of the three democracies, in which we can include all of the British empire, will be the means of defeating the evil forces of nazism which oppose us in Europe.

Our war effort, of course, engages the attention of everyone in this house and outside. Speaking as a farmer, I want to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the farming population of this country is behind the government in their war effort. To use an expression which I have heard on some occasions, they are behind them to the last man and the last dollar—and, sir, they will soon have our last dollar. We realize that the wheat grower is actually the first casualty of this war. We farmers are willing to accept our share of the responsibility, its inconveniences, and an even lower standard of living, in order to fight this war to a successful conclusion.

Let me now return to my agricultural topic, that wheat question which is affecting western Canada more than anything else. The other day the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. MacKenzie), asked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), whether the fact that we had 561,000,000 bushels of wheat in western Canada was any reason why this year should be declared an emergency year. Strange as it may seem, it is an emergency, and an emergency of such proportions that it may destroy the whole economic life of western Canada, in which event the people of the east will feel it also.

Last year the emergency existed, and the government were slow in announcing a policy with regard to our wheat problem. One cannot blame them so much. The wheat was there; they knew they did not have the storage capacity to take care of it, and they knew we had a restricted market. We cannot, I say, blame them so very much. But I am afraid that some supporters of the government may say that everything is well in western Canada and that the policy which was announced worked out satisfactorily all round. It would be comforting if that were true, but it is not. I do not want to dwell at any great length on this matter, nor do I ask hon. members to take my word for it. I will read an extract from a letter, written in answer to one I wrote, by a man who, as they say, knew his onions—I mean the wheat problem. He stated:

> There are also many other things to consider under the present legislation now before the house, and the members have a big responsibility. We shall naturally be very much relieved when the amendments to the wheat board act are definitely brought down as there is nothing but confusion at the present time. However, I expect we shall be receiving definite word within the next few days.

This letter, I believe, was written about August 2, at a time when considerable threshing had been done in western Canada. Then it was announced that there was a five-bushel quota on, and the farmers had to scramble round and build granaries, or sweep out their driving sheds or horse stables to find some place to store their grain. All this, I think, could have been avoided had the government announced their policy a little sooner. But that is past. No doubt they did the very best they could under the circumstances. But, with that experience behind them, there is no excuse for the government not to announce in good time this year their policy with regard to the wheat problem. They know we have 561,000,000 bushels of wheat in store, and it may be assumed that there will be another 560,000,000 bushels from the next crop to be stored. I say they know that that is, in general, the situation, and I urge them to-night, with the knowledge they have, to give western Canadian people an announcement of their policy in time for them to make provision to take care of some of this wheat. I shall have something to say a little later with regard to the storage question.

At the present time wild rumours are floating round with regard to government action for this year. I have some newspaper clippings here. I am not going to read them, but I notice a summary of a report issued by the United States department of agriculture, whose figures show that they have a good knowledge of the situation in this country, and there is reference to different schemes which Canada might adopt with regard to the storage and the sale of our wheat. In the last issue of the Winnipeg Free Press which has reached us, I believe Tuesday's paper, it is said that the government are much exercised with regard to our wheat problem, and one or two solutions are mentioned. Well, one cannot control the newspapers, and after all, rumours do not amount to so much. But all this keeps the farmers in a continuous state of indecision; they do not know what is going to happen. I hope that the government, looking at the situation as I know they must do, will decide upon and announce a policy just as soon as they possibly can.

Perhaps I have been rather critical. It is not that I intend my remarks to be regarded in that way, but I am trying to declare to the house the situation as I see it. Living with the farmers as I do from year to year, knowing their problems and sharing their confidence, I know they feel pretty much the same as I do about this matter.

I am now going to offer some suggestions to the government. Whether they would be helpful I do not know, but I believe they would tend to strengthen our morale. I would suggest—and the government might make this announcement immediately—that they pay $1 a bushel. I do not hear any comments.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LEADER: Perhaps hon. gentlemen will not cheer so loudly when I get through. This $1 a bushel, I suggest, should be paid on the first 1,500 or 2,000 bushels from each farmer in western Canada. I suggest 1,500 or 2,000 bushels as the minimum, but perhaps some people would want to raise it. But if you want to cut down production you cannot encourage it by paying this price on too many bushels. I would pay this $1 a bushel to every farmer who had wheat to sell. There are many farmers in the west who sow only 5, 10, 15 and 25 acres of wheat a year, according to the records we have from the bureau of statistics. Of course these are men who produce other commodities besides wheat. But the man with 200, or 400 or 500 bushels would get from this $1 a bushel the means of sustenance for himself and his family during the year, and it would enable him to remain on the farm, where we believe such men belong. But the bigger farmers should not be encouraged to produce more wheat.

I would not have any compulsory system, because in my opinion a compulsory system would entail compensation. If the farmers were warned that they would be able to deliver only 1,500 or 2,000 bushels to the wheat board, they could go ahead and grow more wheat if they so desired, but they would have to take their chances in the markets of the world. In my opinion this method would result in a great reduction in the wheat acreage next year.

All we need is the sympathy of the government, with a little advice, if you like. Most of all we want cooperation with the farmers themselves, because they know best. In this connection may I refer to certain policies that we have had. We have had some bonuses, and I must say that the bonus is something which is repugnant to the nature of the farmer, because he likes to stand on his own feet. Looking back, however, we find that some years ago there was the Bennett bonus, which was a payment of five cents a bushel for every bushel of wheat grown. That was certainly appreciated by the farmers, but the trouble was that the farmer who had the greatest number of bushels received the greatest amount of bonus, while the farmer who had been dried out or hailed out and did not have any wheat received nothing. At the present time we have the acreage bonus and it works out the same way, except that there is a restriction on the number of acres on which payment can be made, which is better. The limit is 200 acres to any one farmer. The payment of $1 a bushel to the little chap with only two or three hundred bushels would take care of him as well as the other fellow who had a big crop, but the mass producer would not be able to cash in on a large bonus as he did in previous years.

I submit that we must curtail acreage in the interests of the nation, because in western Canada there is developing a situation which will react on the country as a whole. We must curtail our acreage; for if we continue growing wheat, whether there is a war or no war, there will be a situation in which we shall find ourselves with millions of bushels for which we shall not have any outlet. I know from my own experience as a farmer that it does not matter so much the number of bushels you have, whereas it is a vital matter what you get per bushel.

I have here a table secured from the bureau of statistics, and with the permission of the house I should like to have it put on Hansard. I know there are many hon. members who would like to make some comparisons on the basis of these figures. The table gives the number of farmers reporting spring wheat acreages, and it takes in farmers with as small a quantity as five acres and those with 200 acres and over. These figures were taken from the last census. In 1935 there were 231,697 grain farmers in the three prairie provinces and less than 8 per cent of that total seeded at that date over 200 acres of wheat. The great majority of these farmers are small producers who are trying to make a living on the land, and the $1 that I suggest would take care of the situation so far as they are concerned. The 8 per cent who seeded over 200 acres and some perhaps thousands—one man in Alberta two or three years ago produced 80,000 bushels—would have to take their chances in the open market. Personally I should like to see all farmers get $1 a bushel, but the time when that was possible is past.

If we reduce our wheat acreage, something must be done to take its place; if farmers do not grow wheat, they must turn to some other form of agriculture. It has been said that we might go in for diversified farming. I believe the nation would become richer and the farmers more independent if we adopted more generally a system of diversified farming, growing less wheat and more agricultural products generally. And now I should like to put this table on Hansard:

Number of Farms Reporting Spring Wheat Acreages by Size Groups in the Prairie Provinces, 1935

Wheat acreage sown	Manitoba	Saskatchewan	Alberta	Prairie provinces
All farms reporting	38,593	117,427	75,677	231,697

200 acres and over	2,006	20,090	9,091	31,187

As an alternative to wheat growing, I am of opinion that if it were properly cultivated we could extend the beef-cattle industry enormously in several countries to whose markets we now have access. I have here a brief extract from a newspaper article entitled "Big Meat Deal." It is stated here that Great Britain has made arrangements with the Argentine to take nearly $100,000,000 worth of beef this year. There is a reason for their buying this beef from the Argentine and I will refer to it later on. It seems to me that we should cultivate the British market. I will give this government as well as the previous one credit for trying to develop the market for fresh-killed beef in the old country. From the experience of the last two years we have demonstrated three things: First, that we could put fresh-killed beef on the British market to advantage; second, that we could supply as good beef as the people of Great Britain have ever eaten; and, third, that the manner in which this beef had been shipped was not the proper method of processing it.

On previous occasions I have taken the opportunity to express the view that this beef should be processed at seaboard in the maritimes. In my opinion this industry belongs to the maritime provinces. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, you will not accuse me of being sectional. I do not know why what I suggest is not done, but it will have to be done before we are successful in putting our fresh-killed meat on the British market in competition with our strong competitor, Argentina. If we can build up our beef industry, it is going to require more coarse grain to take the place of this wheat acreage which I advocate that we reduce. It is going to open a market in the maritimes for these coarse grains. When the maritimes have these abattoirs at the seaboard, and when they know the dividends that the feeding of beef cattle will give them, they are going to take advantage of the beef industry and fatten these cattle in the east and buy these coarse grains from the west. That I am sure is one solution of our wheat problem.

I have a little clipping here from a newspaper which I clipped two or three months ago. I shall not read it, but it says that it was a history-making cargo of grain that was shipped from Fort William by water all the way to Port Williams in Nova Scotia; 2,600 bags of coarse grain were shipped to that district. It was shipped by water because the railroad rate was too high. I suggest in all kindness but in all seriousness to the government that they might try to reduce the domestic rate on feed grain in this country, not only to the east but to the west. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) I know holds the same view, and year after year he has expounded in this house the necessity of lowering the domestic freight rate on grain going to the western coast. That would be one way of reducing our wheat acreage and would, I believe, have the effect of making our farmers throughout the dominion more prosperous.

I am now going to touch on that old question of tariff reform. I am going to deal with a reduction in the tariff on British goods which is so desirable, especially at this time. Tariff reduction is a good Liberal policy, and I have expounded it in this house—or tried to do so—on many occasions. I should like to quote a couple of lines from a recent editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press, which has also advocated this in the past and has at present taken up the struggle once more. The Free Press said:

> The Free Press for many months now has been advocating the complete abolition of the existing tariff against British goods.

I have always entertained that idea. Again referring, if I may, to a speech which I made in this house I think two years ago, I pointed out what I thought was the height of folly—and I believe it is tragic—to think that we still imposed a duty of from 20 to 30 per cent on British textiles. It appears to me that if we would reduce that tariff and admit these goods, Britain would buy more of our products and that would be another way of helping the situation with regard to our surplus of wheat. Well, the Free Press is coming out boldly for this doctrine, and it is refreshing that we have at least one paper in eastern Canada which has made a declaration to the same effect. I have a little clipping from an editorial in the Ottawa Citizen of a few days ago. It said:

> Parliament could well give early consideration to possible measures to allow an additional $105,741,000 worth of British goods into this country without having to hurdle so many barriers.

To find this view held by an eastern paper is encouraging. While it is a good many years since I first learned the doctrine of lower tariffs, and while I have been disillusioned on many occasions, it may be that if the Liberal government stays in power long enough, we shall have a substantial reduction in the tariff as it affects British-made goods.

Mr. COLDWELL: How long would "long enough" be?

Mr. LEADER: Well, I direct that observation especially to the Liberal party because I know the Conservative party do not hold that view.

An hon. MEMBER: The Liberals do not either.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is getting higher all the time.

Mr. LEADER: I wish now to refer to another matter along the same lines, with which the Acting Speaker (Mr. Macdonald, Brantford City) is more or less familiar, with the emphasis on the "mower". I think the government, in order to help the farmers out of the extremity in which they find themselves at the present time, might make the implements of production a little cheaper by reducing the tariff on farm machinery. It is a sad reflection on Liberal principles and the party which I support that I must say that never was the tariff higher than it is at the present time. I heard that accusation made in the house the other night by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson).

Mr. COLDWELL: It is true.

Mr. LEADER: It is true on account of inescapable circumstances, on account of the high rate of exchange on our money and this new ten per cent exchange tax, which, after all, is a tariff. So I recommend to the government that they at least take off this ten per cent exchange tax which was imposed last year.

I have here a little pamphlet, and on it there is a graphic picture. I am not going to speak of this at any length, but I received this pamphlet at a meeting held at Regina this summer. The meeting was called by Canadian Cooperative Implements Limited, a company of farmers who got tired of waiting for government action, and so decided to see what they themselves could do in regard to reducing prices of farm machinery. I went to that convention because I thought it might help me in my work here as well as at home. No one knew my identity, I just dropped in and kept my ears open, and there I found this pamphlet. It shows that the cost of a binder in 1913 was $167, and the number of bushels of wheat which it took to purchase that binder at that time was 261. Then it tells us that the same binder, or a similar one—they tell us it is improved, and it certainly is, but I do not think the cost of production is any higher—in 1940, is $340 and we have to trade 637 bushels of wheat for the binder, or about two and a half times as much as the binder cost in 1913 in terms of wheat. That convention was interesting, and if time permitted I would like to tell the house about it.

Mr. McGREGOR: What was the price of that binder in 1930?

Mr. LEADER: I have not the figures; it would be a guess—

Mr. McGREGOR: It was a little higher, was it not?

Mr. LEADER: It might be, yes. I was very much impressed with the speech made by a man representing the government of Alberta, the province from which some of my hon. friends opposite me come. It seems that the government of Alberta have taken the bit in their teeth and are doing something for themselves, because this is a government measure, and while they asked for the cooperation of Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and were promised it, it was so long in coming that they went on by themselves.

They thought they could save by cooperative buying on the cost of repairs to binders and other farm machinery, so they came to eastern Canada and asked the Canadian implement companies if they would make contracts with the cooperative for the distribution and sale of repairs to farm implements. The Canadian companies refused to make any such arrangement. Then the cooperative went to the United States—can one blame them?—and made arrangements with United States companies. Distributing houses were set up at seven different points in Alberta. I should have liked to know how much they saved the farmers, but when the question was asked the reply was, "We have saved the farmers a good many dollars in the cost of repairs to their implements." As a matter of fact the scheme has been so successful that instead of seven distributing centres in Alberta they intend next year to have thirty.

I have tried to point out that if you lowered the cost of farm implements you would help the farmer reduce his costs of production. I want now to say something about the charges we have to pay for the handling of our grain. Storage charges were reduced last year from one cent to three-quarters of a cent a bushel a month. I did not think that reduction was sufficient under existing circumstances, and I know many hon. members on both sides felt the same way. We believed the reduction should have been to at least one-half cent. I am still of that opinion, and I believe if the government were wise they would reduce the storage rate to one-half cent this year, thereby saving the farmer another one-quarter cent a bushel.

But I have another criticism to offer with regard to the payment of storage. As I understand it, as soon as you dump a load of grain into an elevator the storage charges begin. So I think if we wish to be fair to these farmers who have put up their own granaries at home, their storage also should start immediately. Let me give a personal example; I am engaged in the business, so I know I will be excused for these personal references.

We were allowed this year a quota of five bushels to the acre, so we got it out first and put it in the elevator. Then we went on threshing and filled our granaries. The grain was taken to the elevator about the middle of August, and of course the storage charges began at once. It was a pool elevator, but that does not matter; it was an elevator, and the storage began the day the wheat was delivered. But on the wheat I put in my own granary the storage did not start until six weeks later. If you are going to pay the farmers storage at the same rate you pay the elevator companies you should begin to pay that storage when the grain is delivered to the granaries, just as you do when it is delivered to the elevators. I think that would be only fair. Some people have told me the trouble is that further west they are later with their threshing, and there has to be one general date. I do not think that is so at all; certainly it is not the case with the elevators. If we in Manitoba are threshing two or three weeks ahead of the farmers of Alberta, why should we have to wait for our storage to begin because Alberta happens to be a little later than we are? No; we must pay the farmers on the same basis that we pay the elevator companies. That is the only fair thing to do.

The suggestions I have offered to the government to-night more or less have to do with a long-range programme; they need not be scrapped when the war is over. I feel satisfied that once the farmers get into the way of diversified farming, as many of them are doing even now—and especially the bigger farmers further west—they will continue with it long after the war is over .

I should now like to refer to a matter that has been mentioned by many other hon. members on all sides of this house. I am in favour of the government issuing passes to our soldiers who want to go home at Christmas time. Some of the boys from Portage la Prairie are down here in Ottawa, and I have been told that they will not be able to eat their Christmas dinners with their loved ones unless they are given passes on the railways. What is true of my district no doubt is true of every district in this country, and I think that request is only reasonable. I do not consider it a privilege; I think it is a right that belongs to these soldier boys of ours.

I have five minutes left, Mr. Speaker, and in that time I should like to refer to an article which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press of last Tuesday. This article attacks Mr. H. H. Hannam, president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. The Free Press admits that this gentleman occupies a high position, but they ascribe a sinister motive to his comments with regard to the reduction in the price of Canadian bacon. I think I should read this article, which is very short, in order to be fair to the Free Press. It is as follows:

> Mr. H. H. Hannam, president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, is indignant and declares that the Canadian farmers will also be indignant over the reduced price for bacon fixed in the new bacon agreement.
> Indignant against whom? Not against Great Britain, Mr. Hannam hastens to explain. Then the indignation must be directed against the Canadian government. On what grounds? Obviously on the ground that the Canadian government did not say to the government of Great Britain: Pay the price that our distinguished and patriotic Canadian, Mr. Hannam, president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, demands, or go without bacon.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Macdonald, Brantford): Order. I must inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. LEADER: I should like to finish this article.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. LEADER: The article continues:

> No doubt Mr. Hannam will resent having the matter put thus crudely; but is it not pretty much to this that it boils down? A man big enough to hold his position ought to be able to look at this transaction in its entirety, instead of from a narrow angle. Thus examined, it might be found to have a great many good points.

And listen to this:

> But Mr. Hannam is in the business, in which he is not alone, of trying to stir up grievances in the hope of being able to capitalize on them later on. It is a discreditable business. Also dangerous.

The only comment I have to make is that the author of this article is discredited and that its publication is dangerous. That is what I want to say to the house most definitely. I am glad to have the privilege of putting this article on Hansard, where people can read it for themselves. I cannot understand what motive would prompt the Free Press, one of our great newspapers, to print such an editorial, but there it is; and I believe, as the Free Press says, that the situation may be dangerous.

I wish to thank hon. members for permitting me to continue beyond my allotted time.

Mr. COLDWELL: If I may ask a question, was it understood that the table to which the hon. member referred was being placed upon Hansard with the consent of the house?

Mr. LEADER: There was no objection.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I understand the hon. gentleman had leave to place the table on Hansard.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. WILFRID LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I deem it my duty to say a few words about the war effort, and the recent speech of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston). May I first on behalf of my electors thank the government for having helped the eel fishermen of the isle of Orleans, situated in my constituency, to dispose completely of their catch which had accumulated in cold storage for several years. These fishermen were in a pitiful condition, the Italian and German markets which had absorbed the major part of their production having been completely closed to them since the outbreak of the war. Without the government's intervention they would have entirely lost the fruit of their labour for the past two years. I tender my sincere thanks to the government.

May I also thank the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) for having recommended to the Minister of National Defence the removal of an injustice which, to my mind, served only to protect and enrich the meat monopolies of this country, reviving painful recollections of the last war when great fortunes were built up thanks to a monopoly organized to the detriment of the citizens of Canada in general.

In this connection, I shall quote a letter which I wrote to the Minister of Agriculture:

Quebec, October 2, 1940

Honourable James Gardiner, Minister of Agriculture,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir:

The war purchasing board ruled a few months ago that only slaughtering establishments operating under the inspection of your department would be asked to tender for meat supplies required by the Department of National Defence.

This ruling is unjust and vexatious for producers and small dealers who can make use of abattoirs subject to federal inspection to slaughter the cattle they wish to sell to the army, in full compliance with your inspection regulations, and to submit tenders on the same footing as others.

Everyone is participating in the war effort and should therefore receive the same treatment. The fact of eliminating the producer and small dealer creates a monopoly in favour of 40 or 45 large companies owning abattoirs.

Why not make it possible for small dealers and producers who wish to have their cattle slaughtered in these recognized abattoirs, where they would undergo the required inspection, to sell their meat directly to the Department of National Defence.

I strongly protest against this ruling and, appealing to your spirit of justice, Mr. Minister, I ask you to take the necessary measures to change this situation which is creating among the public a state of mind unfavourable to the government.

I am under the impression that the war purchasing board made this ruling without knowing that the producers and small dealers, though having no slaughter houses of their own, are able to have their cattle slaughtered in a public abattoir where there is permanent inspection and thus supply a product equal in quality to that of the abattoir-owning companies.

Should this policy not be changed, I shall regretfully be compelled, because of the protests made to me, to submit the whole question to the attention of the House of Commons at the next session.

Awaiting your reply, I beg you to accept, Mr. Minister, the expression of my best sentiments and to believe me,

Yours very truly,

Wilfrid LaCroix,
M.P. for Quebec-Montmorency.

On November 6, I had the pleasure of receiving the following letter which will undoubtedly please all those who are in a position to supply meat bearing the stamp of dominion inspection:

Ottawa, November 6, 1940

Mr. Wilfrid LaCroix, M.P.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. LaCroix:

Your additional letter respecting the basis on which the Department of National Defence calls for tenders for the meat required for the troops stationed in Canada clarifies this question which so greatly interests you.

I am fully in agreement with you regarding the desirability of widening the field from which tenders may be accepted, in order to include all individuals or companies in a position to supply meat bearing the dominion inspection stamp, whether or not they are owners of the establishment in which the slaughtering has been done. This would make it possible to supply meat slaughtered on order in an inspected establishment, as you suggest.

I am making a formal recommendation on that point to the Minister of National Defence. In the light of unofficial conversations which have occurred this week between officials of both departments, I am confident that the question will shortly be settled to your satisfaction.

Yours very truly,

H. Barton,
Deputy Minister.

A first step has thus been taken by the Minister of Agriculture. Let us hope that the Minister of National Defence will hasten to agree to the formal recommendation of the Department of Agriculture, for it is the latter which is responsible for the inspection of the meat supplied to the army.

Everyone is sharing in the war; everyone should share in the patronage resulting therefrom.

I listened attentively to the speech delivered last week by the Minister of National Defence. I wish to underline the following words which he uttered regarding the possible lengthening of the training period to four months:

> We propose, before final authorization of this extension of the training period is given, to examine the situation on the ground when I am in England in consultation with the governmental authorities and staff who are concerned with this phase of the war effort.

In this connection I should like to quote from an editorial published on November 16 in the organ of the Liberal party in Quebec, Le Soleil, under the caption "Military Service in Canada."

> It has been suggested that the British system of military training would probably give the same results in Canada as in Great Britain. It must be remembered that conditions are entirely different in England. Over there, industry has not yet employed all the workers available and the government has not been able to give military training with full equipment to all its conscripted soldiers. Here in Canada it is expected that unemployment will soon be restricted to the winter season, and, quite naturally, it has been thought of taking advantage of this climatic condition to call up farmers' sons for training during the period usually called the "slack season." But this season is extremely rigorous in the Laurentian country, at Valcartier for example, where stormy weather will mean considerable loss of time to the recruits who will be there next month and afterwards. This drawback could easily be overcome by the construction of barracks and drill-halls in the main centres of each district of Quebec. The soldiers would be made more comfortable and their training more effective.
> Would it not be wise to adopt for Canada a system of military service particularly adapted to the exceptional conditions of Canadian life?

Last session I voted against the National Resources Mobilization Act because section 64 remains in the Militia Act. Nevertheless it was passed by parliament. Respectful of the laws of the country I submitted to it like all my compatriots who, even if a law is not to their liking, know that the first duty of a citizen is to submit to the laws passed by the civil authorities.

We have, however, been so often told and retold that the mobilization act concerned only Canada and was intended solely for the defence of Canada that it seems to me that at least we should follow the advice given in the article which I have just quoted from Le Soleil, the organ of our party at Quebec.

Furthermore, in this speech the Minister of National Defence recognizes for the first time that our first line of defence is in Europe. I must admit that it is with apprehension for the interests of Canada that I look forward to the results of the trip to Europe which the minister intends to make next month.

As to the extension of training from one month to four months, I cannot do better than quote from an article published in L'Action Catholique on November 15, 1940, under the heading "Harmful and Ill-advised Zeal." This is what it says:

> Mr. Hanson's suggestions are somewhat reckless. To compel our recruits to do four months of training would be disastrous for industry and trade, as it would necessitate a periodic replacement of experienced workers by newcomers without experience. As to placing our young men in the army reserve after they have undergone their training, that is simply a trick the purpose of which is to have them at hand in case of conscription.

This view expressed by L'Action Catholique, and which I share, accurately reflects, I believe, public opinion on the matter. As to the harmful and ill-advised zeal of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), I must say I am not surprised at it, for he has dared to utter in this house the following words:

> For us, aid in the defence of Britain should be our first objective; the defence of our beloved country will follow.

The words "will follow" are words which no Canadian who loved his country would dare to utter; yet they faithfully depict the man who at present leads the opposition. No one has worked harder than he since the outbreak of the war to disrupt national unity. If the present session is to have no other result than to allow our conscriptionists and imperialists to continue their work of disintegration, parliament cannot prorogue too soon. If the French-Canadians have accepted a policy of compromise, be assured that they will never depart from it. Why blame us when the United States are doing still much less than this country, since they have not declared war and are not sending a single soldier to Europe?

Our economic and military participation is already on a grand scale and even beyond the limits of our capacity. In my opinion the effect of this will be to make it impossible for us to solve the problems which the after-war period will bring. We desire the triumph of England which is fighting with admirable courage for the preservation of her empire and of the social and political ideals represented by her institutions; but, for heaven's sake, let us not forget that we are part of America and that we should have at least some thought for Canada which, whatever may be said, is still our country.

I take this occasion to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) upon the military agreement which he has succeeded in concluding between Canada and the United States. Such an agreement should have been made long ago. Thanks to the long-standing friendship between our Prime Minister and the President of the United States, we have made an important step in our political history through this definite statement that our geographical interests are bound up with those of the United States. I conclude by voicing my ardent desire that these common interests will guide us in the examination of the demands which England may make upon us. Let us not, following the example of an elderly senator seemingly little interested in the rising generation, state in advance our intention to yield to all her demands.

On motion of Mr. MacKinnon (Edmonton West) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Friday, November 22, 1940.

The house met at three o'clock.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre) moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

POWERS OF COMMITTEES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the standing committees of this house shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the house and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Motion agreed to.

MILITIA ACT

AMENDMENT OF PROVISIONS RESPECTING EXEMPTION FROM LIABILITY TO SERVICE

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 3, to amend the Militia Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. CHURCH: The explanatory note sets out the reasons for the proposed amendment. It deals with conscientious objectors and others who under the act as it stands at present are exempt from military service.

I may add that in connection with the proposed amendments there will have to be another bill to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act with respect to exemptions covered by that act. That bill I propose to introduce on Tuesday next.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

RADIO BROADCASTING

TRANSRADIO PRESS SERVICE—FINDING OF DIES COMMITTEE OF UNITED STATES CONGRESS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the white paper issued by the Dies committee of the United States congress, which purports to establish that the Transocean news service is a combined German propaganda and espionage service, and that the Transradio press service is its transmitting and receiving agency, will the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), who has under his wing Canadian broadcasting, take the necessary steps to deal with the use of broadcasting facilities in Canada by the Transradio press service?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): My hon. friend was kind enough to give me notice of this question. The governors of the broadcasting corporation are meeting in Ottawa next week, and will no doubt give consideration to the situation as developed by the Dies committee report.

I called the attention of the house as long ago as last June to the fact that we were not sure of the sources of certain information that was being broadcast. I think I went as far at that time as the situation warranted. Steps were taken to ban Transradio from the air. A storm of protest was aroused, and I think my hon. friend was one of those who protested in this house against the action we were taking.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not recall it.

Mr. HOWE: There was a storm of protest in the press; it was suggested that we were trying to muzzle news. The result was that it was felt that a comprehensive rearrangement of news over the air should be worked out. The broadcasting corporation has been working on that problem since then and has laid definite plans for a new type of news service beginning January 1 next.

In the meantime I may say that our censors have carefully watched the news put out by the forty or fifty broadcasting stations in Canada that have handled Transradio news, and they have found nothing whatever to complain about in the type of news put out.

I think the broadcasting stations that handle Transradio news will each have a problem of their own in the matter of deciding whether they wish to continue that news. I think they will have to decide a problem in public relations. Every one of those stations violently protested when the government suggested it was unwise for them to carry that type of news, and I think perhaps we can leave them to work out their problem in their own way, until the broadcasting corporation decide what steps are to be taken in the matter.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

QUESTION AS TO DISCUSSION OF ROWELL-SIROIS REPORT FOLLOWING DEBATE ON ADDRESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): May I ask the Prime Minister if we shall take up the Sirois report after the vote is taken on the address?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): We shall have to wait until the debate on the address is concluded before it will be possible to say what will then be taken up.

INTEREST RATES AND RENTS

APARTMENT HOUSES IN TORONTO AND DISTRICT—SUGGESTED ACTION ON HIGH INTEREST CHARGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I wish to ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) a question. During the discussion of his estimates on August 6 last I asked him if he would look into the question of rent control and high rates of interest. He said he would be glad to do so. Since that time he has given some measure of rent control. But I would call his attention to the high rents being charged by some apartment house owners in Toronto and district.

The second part of my question is this: Can something not be done about the exorbitant rates of interest charged by loan companies, loan sharks and others, dealt with last year by parliament? Will the minister look into this point and see whether the War Measures Act could not be broadened out as I suggested last August, to include not only the national moratorium referred to in that debate but some order in council dealing with high interest rates?

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour): The question of the hon. member is somewhat of a double-barrelled one. In the first place, as he says, steps have been taken to have some regulation of rentals in areas where the war situation has created congestion bringing about an abnormal rise in rents. That of course comes under the regulations of the war-time prices and trade board, and a rentals administrator has been appointed. I shall be glad to call his attention to the matter of high rentals being charged in certain apartment houses in Toronto.

As to the second part of the hon. member's question, relating to interest rates being charged on mortgages, as I understood him to say, and possibly on other contracts, that is hardly a matter that comes within the purview of the Labour department. I suggest that the hon. member consider directing this part of the question to the Minister of Finance or to the minister whose department would be more directly concerned.

Mr. CHURCH: The War Measures Act, I understand, takes precedence over existing legislation. There is no more difficulty about dealing with interest than with rents. It is the same point.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

QUESTION OF DISCLOSING UNIT PRICES OF MATERIALS SUPPLIED TO MILITARY DISTRICTS—GARBAGE CANS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): In a return brought down on Wednesday last, sessional paper No. 121, moved for by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Hatfield) with respect to the purchase of 26,000 garbage cans for use in military camps, the Department of National Defence refuses to answer the inquiry with respect to the price paid, taking the attitude that it is not in the public interest to give unit prices on any commodity.

Mr. HOMUTH: Nonsense.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I desire to call attention to this portion of the return and to ask if this is to be the considered policy of the government. Surely this house has the right to know the cost to the country of even such a prosaic item as garbage cans.

Furthermore, I desire to make this statement, that a portion of the return is incorrect, to my own knowledge and to the knowledge of the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton.

Mr. POULIOT: Your knowledge might be incorrect.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It states that all these garbage cans were put into immediate use. To my own knowledge and to the knowledge of the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton those which were assigned to military district No. 7—929—were not put into immediate use but were stored in a warehouse in the city of Saint John under storage expense. They were delivered there in March last at a time when there were no military camps in existence in New Brunswick and when, so far as I know, none were even announced.

I call the attention of the government to this because some official has made a statement which is—I shall not say untruthful, but incorrect. The minister is away and he certainly is not responsible. But I do desire to know if we are to be given in returns or in answers to questions information with respect to commodities used for military purposes and with respect to storage. If there is no one here who can answer now I should like to have the question stand as a notice so that the matter can be looked into. It is a very small thing, but there is a matter of principle at stake.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Associate Minister of National Defence): I am inclined to agree with my hon. friend both as to the importance of the matter involved and as to the principle.

[Mr. Church.]

I shall be very glad to ask the appropriate officers of the department to inquire thoroughly into all matters relating to the garbage cans.

NAVAL SERVICES

REPORTED DECISION TO ESTABLISH PROPOSED NEW NAVAL COLLEGE NEAR VICTORIA, B.C.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald). In a Canadian Press dispatch from Halifax, appearing in newspapers over Canada under date of the twenty-first instant, it is stated that the city council of Halifax has asked the federal government to establish Canada's proposed new naval college at Halifax. In the dispatch it is stated that Mr. R. W. Mayhew, Liberal member of the House of Commons for Victoria—for whom I have every respect—had stated in Ottawa on the same day that he was authorized—"authorized," Mr. Speaker,—to state that the academy would be located near Victoria.

Will the minister state whether the hon. member for Victoria was authorized to make that statement; is it correct; if so, what reason does the minister give for not relocating the naval college at Halifax; and, why should not the minister himself, and not a private member, make such a statement?

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): Apparently there has been some confusion in the mind of the newspaper man who gave to his paper a dispatch purporting to come from the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Mayhew). There are really two things involved here: first, the question of the site of the naval college; second, the additional training for short periods, three or four months, which is necessary now under the stress of war to prepare officers for their commands.

In connection with the short training period it is true that we are seeking some additional quarters on the west coast; and on the east coast we have erected some buildings for the purpose which I have already mentioned, namely giving officers a short term course.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): There will be only one naval college?

Mr. McGEER: Why should there not be two?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): It is true that we acquired a site in western Canada for use in the same way as we have provided accommodation at Halifax, and for the same purpose—a short period of training for officers. That, I think, is what my hon. friend the member for Victoria, B.C., had in mind when he spoke to the press men. They have construed that to mean that a site for a naval college has been selected. That is not the case; a site has not yet been selected for the college.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): May I ask the minister, first, if in the future he would give to the house, before it is disclosed to the newspapers, over the head and against the regular practice of this parliament, statements as to matters of this kind involving expenditures running into hundreds of millions? Second, has the British Admiralty been consulted about this? Third, why is it that the proposed college is to be located far away from the principal naval recruiting districts?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I regret to say that I did not hear my hon. friend's question. If he will set it forth in writing I shall be glad to consider it and answer it the next day. I found it difficult to hear him at this distance.

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Victoria, B.C.): I am rather sorry that in this far corner I was unable to hear distinctly what the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services said. I think that as a matter of privilege I should be entitled to repeat what actually happened.

While negotiations were going on for the property in question, I was familiar with certain circumstances and received permission, not from the minister but from other departments, to tell the people at home that that property had been bought for the purposes of the navy. The Canadian Press asked me yesterday to make a further statement, and I requested their representative to go to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services for the information. I assure the house that the minister did not authorize me to make any statement beyond the statement which was made in Victoria—that that property had been acquired, at about five per cent of its actual value, for naval affairs.

Mr. HAZEN: Is it the intention of the government to select in the near future the site of this new naval college?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I am not able to answer my hon. friend as to how soon this site will be selected. It will depend on various factors. As was stated the other day, the government has decided to proceed with the erection and maintenance of a naval college. When the site is made available and the other preliminaries are settled, a further announcement will be made.

Mr. CHURCH: I suppose the minister will announce the appointment of Lieutenant Farrow as commandant of the college.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Thursday, November 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Brooke Claxton for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Blackmore.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I propose to follow the lead of my colleagues and confine my remarks to the activities of my department which more intimately touch our war activities. Ordinarily there would be the war work of the national research council. My difficulty here is that, in spite of the magnificent work which is being done by that body, it is necessarily hedged around with the utmost secrecy. This interesting story will have to be told at another time. To-day I plan to confine my remarks to wheat.

May I just briefly express my appreciation of the remarks which have been made on this subject during the course of this debate by hon. members opposite. They have approached the subject in a fair, helpful and constructive manner. We all know that if we were faced with a very serious wheat problem when we were here last session, the gravity of the 1941 wheat outlook is many times more serious. Before touching on 1941 I propose to review the 1940 situation.

I desire to give to the house as detailed a statement as possible of the situation in regard to wheat since the house rose in August.

At the last session of the house I asked for certain amendments to the wheat board act as it then stood. These amendments were particularly important because they dealt with the appointment of an advisory committee to the wheat board, provision for regulation of deliveries, a new section dealing with the processing levy, and the inclusion of Vancouver with Fort William and Montreal as a delivery point on which the advance payment is made.

Before proceeding to deal with action which has been taken under the amendments to the act I desire to give to the house a statement of the position in which we found ourselves as the harvesting season approached and during that time.

With the close of the crop year at July 31 last, we had on hand 273,086,845 bushels of wheat in Canada and we had, in prospect, the harvesting of a wheat crop far in excess of the normal expectations of the agricultural industry. As the crop matured, it was seen that provision would have to be made for a crop of at least 500 million bushels and the final result in the west now approximates 520 million bushels. Immediate consideration had to be given to the question how this crop was to be handled.

Because we realized that, unless storage facilities were available, a very difficult financial situation would arise for wheat producers, our aim was to provide for the handling of an amount of grain equal, at least, to that delivered by producers from a normal crop. The average wheat crop of western Canada over a period of the last ten years is 307,012,800 bushels out of which there was an average marketing of 262,390,535 bushels. But we went higher than this, and took as a basis for our plans an abnormal crop of 400 million bushels, about 100 million higher, and we reasoned that, if the government, through the wheat board, was able to take delivery of 335 million bushels, which would represent the deliverable part of a 400 million bushel crop, we would have placed the prairie farmer and western business interests in a position approximately coinciding with the normal expenditure of both these factors in the western economy.

Normally, of course, not more than 80 per cent of this 335 million bushels would be marketed in the first four months of the crop year to December first, and 20 per cent from December 1 to July 31 of the following year. Therefore, we set ourselves the task of arranging to take at least 268 million bushels by December 1.

To ensure that the farmers who threshed earliest, and that those who lived in close proximity to the elevators would not be able to deliver all their grain and thus shut out other farmers, the wheat board exercised the authority given to them at the last session and issued permit books. These books contained an affidavit to be signed by the farmer setting out the total seeded acreage that he had, the location of this acreage and the point at which he desired to deliver his grain. A statutory declaration covering these points was made in duplicate, one copy to be left in the permit book and the other returned to the wheat board at Winnipeg. As the farmer delivered his grain the exact amount was entered in the permit book.

In passing I may say that the wheat board have received nearly 300,000 of these statutory declarations, and they provide us with a fund of information in regard to seeded acreages which will be extremely valuable in connection with arrangements which may be made during the next crop year.

[Mr. J. A. MacKinnon.]

The purpose of the permit book was to provide an equitable sharing of the available elevator space. It was difficult, at the start, to know just what this share would be, but on the basis of preliminary calculations the wheat board first announced a quota of five bushels each of wheat, oats and barley per seeded acre. We immediately got hundreds of requests that the three quotas be made interchangeable, but it was originally calculated by the wheat board that, on this basis, not over three or three and one-half bushels of wheat could be taken. The wheat board knew from actual experience that the full quota of five bushels each of oats and barley would not be delivered by all the farmers as the greater quantity of these grains are held on the farms for feed purposes.

Because deliveries were inadequate to meet the demand for barley, the quota was increased from five bushels to ten bushels per acre on August 24, and on September 4 this quota was removed entirely. It was found that the bulk of barley was held for feed, deliveries would not exceed the demand, and would not interfere with storage. The action in removing the barley quota entirely has been fully justified by the result.

Because of a similar situation the quota on oats was removed entirely on September 9. Actually, the demand for oats has kept pace with the deliveries.

The first increase in the wheat quota came on September 9 and a large number of points were increased to 8, 10, 12 and 15 bushels per acre. With the gradual clarification of the situation, the general quota all over western Canada was increased on September 13 from five bushels per acre to eight.

The five bushel per acre quota would have provided for delivery of 139 million bushels. The eight bushel quota provided for delivery of 222 million bushels.

To clarify the situation, Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the house I would like to place on Hansard a statement showing the acreage in the three western provinces, the yield per acre, the production, the marketable surplus, the amount provided by the quotas and the quotas in percentage of marketable surplus, and also a statement showing the actual deliveries which have been made in the three provinces, and the percentage of deliveries to quota.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Up to what date?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Up to November 17, a few days ago, I believe it is. The statement is as follows:

Wheat quotas established and marketable surpluses as at November 19, 1940

Province	Area (acres)	Yield per acre (bus. per acre)	Production (bushels)	Estimated marketable surplus (bushels)	8-bushel quota (bushels)	Estimated[1] additional quotas (bushels)	Estimated total quotas established (bushels)	Quotas in per cent of marketable surplus (per cent)
Man...	3,512,000	19·9	70,000,000	60,180,750	28,096,000	10,000,000	38,096,000	63·3
Sask..	15,571,000	16·7	260,000,000	225,726,350	124,568,000	43,000,000	167,568,000	74·2

[1] To November 19, 1940.

The general 8-bushel quota provides for the delivery of 222,000,000 bushels. In addition, the board has authorized quotas of 10, 12, 15 and 20 bushels per acre at a large number of points, and these additional quotas provide for the delivery of approximately 76,000,000 bushels. Total quotas authorized by the board now aggregate about 298,000,000 bushels, or 66 per cent of the estimated marketable surplus from the 1940 crop.

Under the quotas now established by the board, 63·3 per cent of the Manitoba surplus, 74·2 per cent of the Saskatchewan surplus, and 55·7 per cent of the Alberta surplus comes within the established quotas.

Number of Stations in Prairie Provinces having 8- 10- 12- 15- and 20-bushel wheat quotas as at November 16, 1940

Province	*Total No. elevator points	8	10	12	15	20
		Bushels per seeded acre

* Elevator shipping points only.

Estimated Quotas and Marketings

The following table shows deliveries of wheat to country elevators in each of the three prairie provinces from August 1 to November 15, along with the quotas established for each province and the percentage of wheat delivered under these quotas.

Province	Delivered[1] (bushels)	Quotas established[2] (bushels)	Percentage delivery of quotas (percentage)
Manitoba	30,354,529	38,096,000	79·7
Saskatchewan	123,981,200	167,568,000	74·0
Alberta	66,719,604	92,939,000	71·8
	221,055,333	298,603,000	74·0

The above table shows that 74 per cent of the established quotas in the prairie provinces have been filled.

In Manitoba, 80 per cent of delivery quotas have been filled up to November 15. The corresponding percentage figure for Saskatchewan is 74 per cent and for Alberta 72 per cent.

[1] Includes country elevator receipts and platform loadings up to November 15 and excludes primary receipts at interior private and mill elevators, amounting to 2,647,797 bushels.

[2] Quotas as at November 19.

I am not going to take the time of the house to give these figures in detail now but I would summarize them by saying the total wheat area was 27,750,000 acres; the average yield per acre in the three provinces was 18.7 bushels, giving a total production of 520 million bushels, the figure mentioned a moment ago.

It will be noted that the actual yields were as follows: Saskatchewan, 16.7 bushels per acre, Manitoba, 19.9, and Alberta, 21.9. Allowing approximately 68½ million bushels for feed, seed, etc., this left a marketable surplus estimated at approximately 451,500,000 bushels. The eight bushel quota provided for 222 million bushels. As at November 19, just the other day, additional quotas have been authorized at different points to an amount of 76,000,000 bushels, making total possible deliveries under the quotas 298,603,000 bushels or 66 per cent of the total marketable surplus. Actually as at November 15—just a week ago—223,819,660 bushels had been delivered, or a total of 74 per cent of the established quotas, as at the 19th. Please note that quotas have been provided for 298,603,000 bushels, although for one reason or another deliveries to the extent of 223,819,660 bushels only have actually been received.

At the present time 70 per cent of the shipping points in western Canada have a quota of over eight bushels, some of these running as high as twenty bushels where exceptional storage space is available or where very exceptional conditions have to be met, and I am now informed that the general quota will be raised from eight bushels to ten bushels next week. There will be further quotas established from time to time during the crop year as wheat is moved into export and consumption channels.

You will see from these figures, Mr. Speaker, that the board have been successful through the splendid cooperation of the elevator companies in providing storage, sufficient to look after the marketable surplus from a much greater than average crop, as mentioned by me a few minutes ago.

It is interesting also to compare the deliveries this year to date with the deliveries in previous years. The actual marketings from August 1 to November 15 have averaged during the last ten years 183,098,831 bushels. In the last three years, the average marketings have been 218,229,357 bushels, so that the actual marketings so far this year have exceeded both the three-year and the ten-year average and, as a matter of fact, have been exceeded only in four previous years—1928, 1932, 1938 and 1939. The latter year, you will remember, Mr. Speaker, was not only a very heavy crop year, but a year in which the grain was marketed at an exceptionally rapid rate.

It is also interesting to note that the value of the crop marketed to November 15 is almost $10,000,000 over the average for the past ten years and is only $21,800,000 less than the average for the last three years up to that date. What is most important, however, is that the farmers will still have wheat undelivered to the value of over 120 million dollars, which is 70 to 80 million dollars more than the value of the grain in their hands at this date during any time in the last ten years. This is a large reserve of payment or purchasing power.

I would like to point out, Mr. Speaker, something of the problem that the government has had to face in the last two years. We set a price of 70 cents per bushel for No. 1 wheat in store at Fort William and Vancouver, and for eastern Canada at Montreal, for both the 1939 and 1940 crops. The 1939 crop in the prairie provinces amounted to 493 million bushels. The 1940 crop, as I have said, is estimated at 520 million bushels. This means that in addition to the enormous expenditure on Canada's war effort, the dominion government has extended a guaranteed price on production totalling over one billion bushels of wheat, of which amount we expect approximately 900 million bushels will be delivered by the farmers.

We did this in the full knowledge of the effect that the war was having upon markets for wheat. The war itself and particularly Hitler's aggressions have greatly restricted the range of our markets. For example, in July, 1939, Canada shipped wheat to eleven countries in Europe, and in August, 1940, Canada shipped wheat to three countries only in Europe, the United Kingdom, Eire and Portugal, approximately 600,000 bushels in all to the latter two countries. Through its maintenance of a guaranteed price, and through the activities of the Canadian wheat board, the government prevented the effects of this narrowing of markets from falling upon the Canadian wheat producers, particularly of the prairie provinces and upon the western economy as a whole.

With the approach of the harvest season there was general fear throughout the west that with only a five bushel quota there would be widespread financial difficulties because of the inability of the farmers to obtain enough money from the grain they were allowed to market to provide for their necessary expenses. Quite frankly I also shared that view and so stated in this house at the close of the last session. The situation, however, improved much more rapidly than we had anticipated and the general quota increase from five bushels to eight bushels, together with the further increases in the quotas at so many points, materially changed the picture.

There are those who say that still more should have been done. In addition to guaranteeing a price we should, they claim, either directly or through the chartered banks, undertake to advance up to 75 per cent of the value of all wheat remaining on farms, which would actually mean that we would have to extend our immediate obligations in respect to wheat by at least 75 million dollars.

Advances on this scale would have meant adequate arrangements not only for provision of weather-proof and theft-proof storage facilities but also for the setting up of local organizations throughout the west to look after the inspection, measurement and sealing of the wheat. No one, I think, could rightly ask the federal government to launch a loan programme of this sort without having the wheat properly stored, and subject to proper inspection. Our first object then was to increase to the greatest possible extent the elevator storage facilities so that the farmers could secure the full price for more of their grain.

We had in all a rated storage capacity of slightly more than 442 million bushels including annexes. After allowing for working space this gave us an estimated 420 million bushels of actual storage capacity. As at July 31, there were 243 million bushels already in storage, leaving the available space at approximately 177 million bushels. I am dealing here, of course, only with Canadian storage. Steps were taken to encourage the construction of additional storage facilities throughout the prairies, and an agreement was made with elevator companies that the cost of temporary storage could be written off by them over a period of two years in reporting for income tax purposes. As a result of this action additional storage capacity to the extent of 60 million bushels has been built by elevator companies throughout the west.

With regard to loans against farm-stored wheat, the government approached the banks and elevator companies to act as principals in a loan programme. Because of the lack of adequate safe storage on the farms no private agency would assume the risk in making loans. These agencies, the banks and elevator companies, were in a better position to discriminate between good and bad risks than was the government, had the latter attempted to direct a lending programme. The very fact that private agencies would not interest themselves in this business suggested that a loan programme under the conditions of open storage on farms might be subject to wide abuses if undertaken by the government. The government had no alternative except to make as extensive provision as possible for deliveries from the farms and, as I have pointed out, this has to my mind been successfully accomplished.

We realize, of course, that even if we were able to accept normal deliveries, there would still be a large amount of grain which would have to be carried over on the farms for some months at least, and we adopted the principle of paying farmers the same rate of storage for grain held on the farm as was being paid to elevator companies, namely, two-thirds of a cent per bushel per month. This provision induced many farmers to provide extra storage for themselves, they preferring to store their own wheat and get the enhanced prices available thereby.

With the permission of the house, Mr. Speaker, I should like to place on Hansard the schedule of payments which will be made for farm storage.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it very long?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It is not very long, but it contains a number of fractions. It is as follows:

Schedule of Payments for Stored Wheat

Time of delivery to the board (dates inclusive)	Board's fixed price No. 1 Northern basis Fort William and Vancouver (cents per bus.)	Farm storage payable (cents per bus.)	Board's fixed price plus farm storage (cents per bus.)
November 1 to November 22	70	½	70½
November 23 to December 15	70	1	71
December 16 to January 7	70	1½	71½
January 8 to January 30	70	2	72
January 31 to February 22	70	2½	72½
February 23 to March 17	70	3	73
March 18 to April 9	70	3½	73½
April 10 to May 1	70	4	74
May 2 to May 24	70	4½	74½
May 25 to June 16	70	5	75
June 17 to July 8	70	5½	75½
July 9 to July 31	70	6	76

This schedule has been made up in broken periods so as to show increases at the rate of one-half cent for those particular periods rather than awkward fractions. A farmer delivering his wheat after November 1 will receive, in addition to the guaranteed price, the extra amount for the period during which he holds the wheat. If, therefore, a farmer holds his wheat until the end of the crop year, he can receive an additional six cents a bushel over the initial price.

I would like to say also, Mr. Speaker, that arrangements are being made so that all of the wheat deliverable from the 1940 crop will be accepted by the wheat board prior to the end of the present crop year. Any storage that has to do with the 1941 crop will probably involve increased storage in elevators and farm storage.

The wheat board, however, cannot hold quotas open indefinitely. If farmers are holding back their wheat at certain points and elevator space is lying unused, then the board, after a reasonable time, reserves the right to increase the quotas at that point to enable those who have no storage or who desire to do so, to deliver sufficient wheat to fill the available storage.

The arrangements that have so far been carried out, Mr. Speaker, have not, of course, operated without difficulties. In so far as creditors are concerned, the increase in quotas has relieved the situation to a very great extent, because the great majority of the farmers desire to clear their liabilities as rapidly as they can obtain the money to do so.

A suggested arrangement which has worked out very satisfactorily has been for farmers to deliver grain to creditors, who act as warehousemen for the farmers, and as quotas are increased the grain so held is being delivered on the farmer's permit, the cash grain ticket being turned over to the creditor without any change in the participation certificate to which the farmer is entitled.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would not that be in contravention of the act?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I do not think so. Under these circumstances the ownership does not change. The merchant or other person accepting wheat from the farmer in that way simply holds it as trustee for the farmer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is stretching the definition of "producer" pretty far, is it not?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I do not think so. In any event, it is working out fairly satisfactorily.

There have been some cases of hardship where landlords who have been seriously in need of finances have not been able to make arrangements with their tenants for a share of the deliveries, but these cases have not been many and it is hoped that with further increases in quotas and deliveries there will be a satisfactory division among all parties.

As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, the amendments to the wheat board act provided for a processing levy against all wheat milled for human consumption in Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I ask the minister whether that was intended to cover domestic wheat supplied by farmers to a little mill in New Brunswick for gristing? It is a grievance down there.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I shall refer to that in a moment. In fact that matter is at the moment and has recently been receiving very earnest consideration by the wheat board.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think it ought to be abandoned.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It may be recalled that in my statement to the house at the last session I referred to the very considerable drop which had occurred in the price of wheat just at seeding time, due to the developments in Europe. The result of these developments was that instead of the farmers having a market of at least 90 cents a bushel, the actual price at Fort William was 71 and a fraction cents. It was felt that some arrangements should be made to assist the farmers, if at all possible, and the arrangement of the processing levy was decided upon. The amount of this levy was to be fixed by order in council but was not to exceed 15 cents per bushel according to the amendment. By order in council dated the 24th of July a levy of 15 cents per bushel was provided for, and it was realized that 15 cents a bushel would be the equivalent of 70 cents per barrel of flour.

When I announced the processing levy in the house, I stated that it was to be remembered that this levy should not result in an increase in the price of bread. Immediately the levy was announced, however, considerable agitation in regard to possible increases in bread prices commenced, and at Vancouver the price of bread was actually increased.

The war-time prices and trade board immediately took action, and on the 6th of August issued an order limiting the amount which could be passed on to consumers by the flour millers to one-half the levy.

A full investigation was held by the war-time prices and trade board of the representations made by the milling companies that they could not absorb one-half the levy in accordance with the board's order. The position of the millers in this matter was substantiated after investigation by independent auditors, and the board on September 6 rescinded their previous order of the 6th of August and since that date the full levy has been passed on by the processors.

I have been represented in this debate as having stated that this processing levy would not be passed on to the consumer, but my only statement in this regard was the one to which I referred a few minutes ago when I said that it was not anticipated that the processing levy need result in an increase in the price of bread. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, there have been no increases in the price of bread, certain adjustments having been made by the bakers so as to absorb the processing levy.

Some farmers gristing their own wheat objected strenuously to paying this levy, but it has been our opinion to date that as the processing levy was intended for the benefit of the farmer he should not object to paying the comparatively small share which he was called upon to pay on wheat gristed for his own consumption.

Representations have been made of hardship in connection with this levy in certain parts of the maritime provinces and this is a matter that is giving us concern at the present time.

In the maritime provinces—Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick at least—a number of mills have been established to serve local communities. These mills have been started, I believe, by the provincial government, and I am told that they are just barely able to keep going and that this processing tax is bearing heavily upon them. It is not really a heavy tax, but in their present position they find it difficult to handle the levy. This is, as I have said, under consideration.

I have mentioned the amendment which provides for a larger advisory committee to the wheat board. This committee consists of eleven members, of whom six more particularly represent wheat producers, appointed to assist the board. The members were appointed by order in council dated August 27. I would ask permission to place on Hansard the committee membership. It is as follows:

I would like to express my apreciation of the very great interest which has been shown by every member of this committee. Three meetings have been held, the first on August 26 and 27, the second on September 30 and October 1, and the third on Monday and Tuesday of this week. Another meeting will be held in about two weeks' time.

At the meeting this week the committee considered, with the wheat board, possible plans for 1941 and ensuing years. A subcommittee consisting of Messrs. Farnalls, Reece, Reid, Wesson and Campbell is now working on the whole problem and this subcommittee will report to a meeting of the whole advisory committee early in December. All members of the committee have shown a real desire to be of every possible assistance to the wheat board in working out the problems which have confronted them. Full reports have been made to me as directed by the act.

There have been many representations made this year to both the board of grain commissioners and to myself personally, and I am sure to my colleagues and to members of the house generally, in connection with grading of this year's crop. I suppose there is never a year when there are not complaints from some quarters in regard to the grades, but I would point out that under the board of grain commissioners we have built up an inspection and grading service which is recognized as second to none in the world. The result has been that a certificate issued by the grain board is accepted at face value in any part of the world to-day. It is important to our whole wheat export business that there be no lowering of the standard of our grades.

The most insistent complaint in connection with grading this year came as the result of the prevalence of cracked wheat in the deliveries. This, we are advised, was largely due to the fulness of the kernels, the dryness of the wheat and the fact that farmers were not properly adjusting their combines and their threshing machines. Ordinarily a certain amount of cracked wheat can be permitted, but the situation became so widely prevalent that action had to be taken. The board of grain commissioners issued a statement, and followed that up with a broadcast by Mr. J. Ansel Anderson of the grain research laboratory. Once the matter was called to the attention of the farmers and remedies suggested, the prevalence of the occurrence of this cracked wheat immediately became less pronounced and comparatively few complaints were made in the last few weeks of the threshing season.

Another matter, Mr. Speaker, that has given us considerable concern was the situation that arose in Alberta due to a very large quantity of tough and damp wheat, the consequence of bad weather which occurred during harvest time in a portion of Alberta which ordinarily enjoys a dry harvesting season. It was at first estimated that a total of not more than 25 million bushels was in this category. Recent surveys would indicate that the figure will be very considerably less. Because there was no certainty at first that the elevator companies would be able to ship this wheat out before it began to deteriorate in their elevators, deliveries for a while were impossible. The wheat board took prompt action. Chief Commissioner Mr. George McIvor and some of his staff made a special trip to Alberta to check personally on the situation. As a result immediate arrangements were made for additional cars to be placed at the particular stations affected, and this car movement is now working satisfactorily so that deliveries from farmers of tough and damp grain will be moved to terminal elevators for drying purposes. This will relieve what otherwise might have developed into a serious situation, with producers suffering loss on account of deterioration of their wheat.

Mr. QUELCH: Could the minister give the amount of the spread in the price of tough and damp wheat?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I cannot say offhand.

It is essential that all farmers who have tough or damp wheat in danger of deterioration should deliver at once in order that steps may be taken to have it properly housed.

In speaking of grading, Mr. Speaker, I might say on the basis of the first three months' inspection this crop has graded higher than any previous crop and has a higher percentage of No. 1 northern than in any previous year.

Before going on to deal with the situation in the coming crop year, I would like to touch briefly on one matter which is frequently brought to our attention. This is the possibility of finding new uses for wheat.

[Mr. J. A. MacKinnon.]

Every probable avenue has been tentatively, if not exhaustively, explored by our national research council for years. The most popular idea is the development of power alcohol from wheat, but our experiments to date show that this is not economically practical. To make it so, according to our experiments, wheat would have to be purchased for about thirty cents a bushel. Experiments and investigations are continuing.

At the present time, Mr. Speaker, those of us particularly charged with the responsibility for wheat are endeavouring to arrange for the construction of additional wheat storage. This we believe is needed to enable us to carry out our intention to accept from the producers all of the 1940 wheat crop in this crop year.

None of us is unmindful of the situation which we shall have to face, in dealing with the 1941 crop. We here, and those vitally interested in wheat production and in wheat handling, are and have been giving intense study to this problem. There can be great changes in the situation in a few months' time, but we all fully recognize that a wheat policy covering the 1941-42 crop year must be announced some time in February, well in advance of the seeding season. From the standpoint of the wheat board and my Department of Trade and Commerce, unless there are radical and unexpected developments overseas, the 1941 wheat policy will have to be decided upon with a knowledge that apart from domestic consumption only between possibly 140 and 175 million bushels can be exported in the crop year ending July 31, 1942.

I would remind the house that as Minister of Trade and Commerce, it is the marketing facilities through the board of grain commissioners and the wheat board which are under my jurisdiction. In other words, my department's responsibility begins with the delivery of the wheat to us. Any matters relating to operations on the farm lie within the jurisdiction of my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), and with the provincial departments of agriculture.

I have endeavoured, Mr. Speaker, to cover all the points which have been brought to my attention since the house rose in August and to give to the house as much information as possible. I would like to say to the hon. members of this house that we stand ready at all times to give as complete and full information to them, respecting the wheat situation, as can properly be given. It is obviously impossible, however, for me to disclose the situation of the wheat board in regard to actual sales or actual prices at which sales have been made. I say also quite sincerely that we will welcome constructive criticism.

I would like to express my sincere appreciation to the members of this house representing constituencies other than those in western Canada for the sympathetic consideration which we have received from them in dealing with the problems of the prairie wheat producer. The majority of the members realize the difficulties which the western farmers are facing, and it has been a matter of considerable gratification to me to know that we have the generous support of these members in connection with the actions which have been taken dealing with the wheat problem.

The problems which have been faced by the wheat board in the last few months have been tremendously difficult. I believe that the members of the board are to be congratulated on having so capably handled the problem. They have had to evolve and put into practice new methods and new ideas. That has been done successfully and with the minimum of friction. I wish to assure every member of this house, and particularly those representing agriculture, that this government stands squarely behind a policy of giving the utmost protection to the farmer. That, I think, has been proven by the burden which we have already assumed. We all understand that our primary purpose at this time must be so to organize our whole economic life in Canada that our success in the war will not be jeopardized in any degree. I believe the great majority of farmers are reasonably satisfied with what has been done and will be done by this government.

I hope that what I have said this afternoon will not be construed as an argument that all the wheat growers are in a happy position to-day and that little need be done for them. They are not unmindful of the responsibilities that Canada is assuming, and although the 70 cent per bushel advance payment may not give many farmers even a meagre profit over cost of production they are accepting this as part of their contribution to the war effort. We are undertaking to see that they do not bear an unfair share of the burden.

Mr. PERLEY: Can the minister say whether any arrangements have been made, or are under consideration, with the British government for the export to that country of wheat milled here in considerable quantities and shipped in the form of flour?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): If I understand the question correctly, the hon. member wishes to know whether I have any information about arrangements that have been made.

Mr. PERLEY: Or under consideration.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I have heard nothing of any such arrangement, and I do not believe any such arrangement has been discussed. I do not think, however, that I need hesitate to say that recently very much more than normal quantities of wheat have been shipped to the old country in the form of flour, and for obvious reasons.

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): I desire for a moment to call the attention of the government and of the house to the acute shortage of housing in Canada. The United States have recently decided to build 300,000 pre-fabricated houses to take care of the situation which they expect to develop there during the coming year, and I think Canada, because of our great timber resources, is in a particularly fortunate position to undertake the building of pre-fabricated houses. I do not intend to go into the subject fully to-day because, after the recess, a better opportunity will be accorded. I should like, however, to say a word in commendation of the branch which the Department of Finance has set up for the purpose, namely, the national housing administration. This is under the direction of Mr. F. W. Nicolls, R.A.I.C., a prominent architect and a most capable officer. He has done extraordinarily good work during the last five years in connection with housing. I should like to see his department enlarged so that he could have more opportunity for research, particularly with regard to building material and methods of construction.

Anyone who knows anything about the housing problem will realize the great importance of town planning in connection with housing, and before we go any further in the building of houses which are so urgently needed in Canada, I urge upon the government the necessity of establishing a separate bureau of experts in town planning attached to the housing administration. To do so, it will be necessary to have an amendment to the housing act to give authority for town planning.

Another matter which I had thought of discussing at this time but which perhaps will also be better deferred until after the Christmas recess is the question of national health insurance. When the national Unemployment Insurance Act was put on the statute books last session, nothing was done with regard to the problem of health. When the British House of Commons passed their national Unemployment Insurance Act in 1911, the first part, and I think the most important part of that act, dealt with health insurance, comprising not only insurance against ill health which necessitates the loss of employment but also the prevention and cure of sickness. I was in England when that act was introduced in the British House of Commons and I remember very well the many protests from the medical profession. As members of this house and members of the government, most of whom are professional men, know, there is always a degree of suspicion and fear lest some new enactment may interfere with the prerogatives of members of a profession. Although that fear was expressed loudly throughout England at the time, I am happy to be able to say that in the course of ten or fifteen years the men who were loudest in their protests against the enactment of health insurance in England admitted that it was a good thing not only for the British people but also for the medical practitioners as well; and to-day I think the profession in the mother country will be found to be unanimous in their support of the national health act. Hon. members may know that Germany introduced a similar act fifty years ago, and I believe it has operated successfully in that country.

I mention this now because the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has told us that in January he is calling the premiers of the provinces together to consider the Rowell-Sirois report, and I hope that at that time this question will be brought to the fore, and that perhaps, if the provinces will give their consent, an amendment to the national Unemployment Insurance Act will be undertaken during the next session to include this important matter of health.

I have twice been deeply shocked during this session. Last Thursday a minister of the crown, back after about four weeks in heroic Britain, rose in his place and boasted to this house that he had made millions for Canadians by his shrewd bargaining with the defenders of everything we hold dear. I could scarcely believe that the time could ever come when anyone would be triumphant over bargains arising out of the motherland's necessity in her hour of direst need. Surely if there ever was a time—

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I did not boast that we made millions as a matter of bargaining with Great Britain. We accepted, with no bargaining, the prices that Great Britain offered us.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no privilege in that; that is merely a matter of opinion.

Mr. GARDINER: It is a statement of fact.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman who had the floor said that the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) a few days ago had boasted of having made a shrewd bargain with Great Britain. The Minister of Agriculture is within his rights and within the rules of the house in stating that he did not make such a statement.

Mr. BRUCE: Mr. Speaker, I refer to Hansard of November 14, which contains the report of the speech of the Minister of Agriculture. On page 100 is given a statement of the value of exports of certain Canadian agricultural products and fish to the United Kingdom for the years 1935 to 1940, with estimated figures for 1941. The value of those exports in 1935 was $34,133,394; the value for 1941 it is estimated will be $105,741,000. For nine months of this year the value was $63,343,411.

Mr. GARDINER: Largely without increasing prices and, in some instances, even with decreasing prices.

Mr. BRUCE: Well, that may be so—

Mr. GARDINER: It is so.

Mr. BRUCE: —but I do not think it alters the situation; and if the minister has anything further to say, perhaps he will be good enough to wait until I have concluded my few remarks.

Mr. HOMUTH: Let him make another speech afterwards.

Mr. GARDINER: I can do that if necessary; I have two more rights.

Mr. BRUCE: I was about to say that surely if there ever were a time when we should make a thank-offering, it is now. Let us open our bursting granaries to Britain and give her our wheat. Now is not the time to drive bargains or seek higher prices than are prevailing right at home. Certainly we must pay the farmer, and pay him a fair price, but let our dealings with Britain be on a basis of a thank-offering out of our abundance.

Last Sunday night the second shock came. The Minister of Agriculture in his dual capacity as Minister of National War Services, said on a nation-wide radio hook-up:

> Factory managers who contend they cannot produce to capacity without interfering with the training of men may have to be told by someone, just as they are being in Britain, that they as factory managers are not good enough for war time.

The inference from those words is plain: Do what I tell you—or else. He was addressing the patriotic industrialists of Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: Again I rise to a question of privilege. The hon. gentleman is reading into my statement in the house and into my statement last Sunday night something which was not said. The statement which I made was based upon correspondence which I have from factories, and one factory in particular, which refused to send any men to the camp. I am prepared to back up my statement.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member for Parkdale is putting his interpretation on the minister's statement. That is done in this house every day and is a legitimate practice. Are we to be muzzled?

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member let me have the floor to correct it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But given an inch you take the whole ell.

Mr. BRUCE: I have quoted, Mr. Speaker, from a press release from the office of the director of public information. My quotation will be found on page 9.

Mr. GARDINER: And, speaking for the two papers which have done most of the talking to which I referred.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, now, that is most uncalled for.

Mr. GARDINER: It is not uncalled for.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Let the hon. gentleman proceed. I implore you, Mr. Speaker, to ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to be courteous to the hon. member who is now addressing the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Parkdale has the floor and will proceed without interruption.

Mr. BRUCE: The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) said the other day that the army and the men in the factories were partners, that they realized how essential each other's services were. With that I heartily concur. Here, however, is the view the Minister of National War Services has of the importance of labour. I quote from the same radio speech:

> My observations in Britain lead me to conclude that we can put too much emphasis upon the need for skilled labour. I inquired in factories and shipbuilding yards everywhere and was told in every line of industry that not more than five per cent required any skill before coming in to do the job, and in a very short time they could operate the machines and tools in the plant.

Mr. GARDINER: Correct.

Mr. BRUCE: The Minister of National Defence said that he would see industrialists in England before trying to work out a new system of training recruits on a widespread system of granting exemptions. His colleague blew into England like a Saskatchewan dust storm, bargained for millions of dollars' worth of bacon, cheese, apple juice, tomato juice, and saw everything there was to see in the factories. Exemptions are not needed, he says. Only five per cent of the workers need to be skilled, he tells us. It does not matter what experts have been telling us for months. It does not matter what the Minister of National Defence says or finds out. The one-man cyclone from the prairies has been there first. He talked to the workers. He watched the workers. From his long experience—

Mr. HOMUTH: In industry.

Mr. BRUCE: —he tells us, and I again quote from the radio speech:

> One girl running a rather important machine said she lived in the country. . . . I have seen similar girls milking cows, and I am sure it took much more nerve, ingenuity and skill to sit on a stool and pull teats than it did to operate this inanimate creation.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the government: We wish to cooperate with you and assist you in every way possible in your war effort, but in turn we expect you to be frank with us and let us know the facts. After listening to the statements of the ministers, one would conclude that everything they had done was one hundred per cent perfect. We would be more likely to believe them if they admitted sometimes that they had made mistakes. They could not do better than follow in this respect the example of British ministers. I will conclude by quoting a few words from Mr. Churchill's speech of yesterday, in which he says:

> I have never concealed from the nation or the house the darker side of our dangers and burdens, but it is in adversity that British qualities shine brightest.

I hope and believe that the same may be said of Canadians.

Mr. R. T. GRAHAM (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, I wish first of all to join with the many other members who have addressed this house at this particular session, in expressing my pleasure at the high character of the addresses of the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I sometimes think that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and others long experienced in this House of Commons must feel a certain degree of pleasure in seeing the influx of young men into our parliamentary life, and I am inclined to suppose, from talking to some of these older members, that this particular parliament is distinguished in that regard. It seemed to me a happy circumstance that both the mover and the seconder were comparatively young men, and that they have elevated, by making such fine presentations to this house on that occasion, the high esteem which the country as a whole has for our young people.

As is quite proper, almost every hon. member who has addressed this house has dealt first with Canada's war effort. That undoubtedly is as it should be, because of course we are a unit in placing the war effort first in our minds and our hearts. There is no problem confronting this country that is not closely associated with the successful carrying on of that effort which we as a nation must make our foremost aim—as speedy a victory as possible in the war in which we are engaged. I for one desire to express to the Prime Minister and the members of his government my high appreciation of the leadership that he and his cabinet are giving to the country and to parliament. I have listened to a number of criticisms directed at the government, but I admit that I am not so much concerned whether a particular unit is short a few shirts or a few boots if I am satisfied that the ministers in charge of our war effort are men of high integrity and lofty character, animated by the purpose with which we wish them to be animated, that is to say to give Canada the most efficient, effective and worth-while effort in the present war. Having listened to these accounts of stewardship given by the different ministers, may I say that to me, and I am sure to Canadians in general, the character, the working capacity and the high purpose of our ministers are a matter of great pride.

I have just finished reading a new life of the elder Pitt, Earl of Chatham, and when we think back to the political conditions which existed in those days we are inclined to wonder how there comes to be still an England. So again I wish to express my pride that, in the record which has been laid before this parliament and in the discussions that have followed, never by innuendo, by insinuation or by direct statement, having in mind the hundreds of millions of dollars which are being expended by this country in its war effort, has there been the slightest suggestion that the conduct of the government is not honest, that the men who are in charge of the war effort are not above possible reproach. It is no small thing that we as a country have men of such high character and integrity.

In connection with our war effort there are one or two matters of which I would like particularly to speak. One must again compliment the government upon having taken, at the outbreak of war, such speedy action in attempting to control what might easily have been a course as disastrous as the one followed in the last war. I have in mind the matter of price control in respect of certain necessary commodities. That action must not have been taken without deliberation beforehand, and I believe the ministry is to be complimented upon having gained something from the lessons which were learned in such a costly manner during the last war, and upon applying the experience gained at that time to see that so far as humanly possible the same results may not flow again.

Yesterday I listened with keen interest indeed to the speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). With all essentials in that presentation I find myself in agreement. I suggest to him that in carrying out the financial policies of Canada the government must be careful to see to it that that equality of sacrifice based on ability to pay, as he described it, is fairly distributed among the different economic classes which make up our population. I know he has in mind that high purpose, but I would suggest to him that, despite all the efforts of the government there are certain results which spring, not from inflation but from the rapid expansion of the business life of the country. Naturally, labour becomes in greater demand.

I noticed a short time ago a request from the government that the practice of one industry of attempting to induce workmen to leave another industry, through the inducement of higher rates of pay, ought to be discouraged as something not in the interests of the whole. I believe the government realizes, however, that, despite the ability of the members on the price control board, it is an impossible task completely to eliminate a gradual rise in the cost of living during the great struggle in which we are engaged. It seems to me, therefore, that the government must be extremely careful to see to it that the primary producers in Canada are not unfairly dealt with as a result of the expansionist movement which must come.

One or two of the speeches of hon. members in the official opposition have suggested to me a point which I believe ought to be discussed. I am a veteran of the last war, and I do not believe any veteran of that war would disagree with me when I say that on that occasion we had a definite path to follow. We had a certain number of months' training in Canada, and at that time our object was to reach England. After we arrived in England we received a few months more training, after which we were sent to France. The purpose we had set out to accomplish was then before our eyes, and we had a path we knew we were about to follow.

It seems to me that in the present war the commissioned and non-commissioned officers and men who enlist in our army, air force or navy have a particularly high duty to perform in the service of their country. Human beings have not changed in some respects. When we are young we like to go places; when we are young we are full of energy and like to do things. It seems to me that one of the tasks we must perform in connection with this type of warfare is so to train the officers and non-commissioned officers in their leadership that there will grow up in the ranks of our services a high respect for his majesty's uniform, and a high sense of the duty which devolves upon them. They are being confronted with a severe trial of patience, one of the hardest trials to bear. Because of their inability to reach the front line and meet the enemy, they have a sense of frustration, and it seems to me that those who are their leaders must in some way inspire them to that high degree of character and patience which will help them to perform the task allotted to them in a manner of which not only will we be proud but which will reward them when they leave army life.

I like to think that hon. members, and particularly those who are veterans of the last war, have the duty of attempting to instil in the minds of the officer class with whom we come in contact the necessity for such direction. I believe the syllabus, the lectures on discipline, and a certain amount of the educational material being distributed among the men in the services should be designed with the idea of inspiring them, no matter what their ranks, with the duty that is cast upon them. They must be kept aware of the nature of their task, and of our hopes that they will discharge their duty with that high degree of credit attained by the men who served in the last war.

While listening to the debate I noticed the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) repeated what had been said at the last session by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), namely, that private members on this side of the house have a duty to perform in their relationship to the government, in much the same way as have private members in the opposition groups. I believe no one will disagree with that observation. I suggest, however, that that duty can be performed in many ways, and I would assure both those hon. gentlemen that members on this side of the house are performing their duty in many ways.

Sometimes I believe that the government must be confused with regard to the attitude taken by members of opposition groups. As they point out, while it is their duty to oppose, to offer constructive criticism and to make suggestions, yet of necessity there must be a reasonable degree of consistency in those presentations. I could not help noting the paradox of the oft-repeated demand upon the government that they give more and more information, and greater detail as to what is being done, and the suggestion made yesterday by the hon. member for Vancouver South that the government was spending too much time in that particular task. He suggested it should be engaged in giving attention to the education of the people in Canada, so that their efforts might be harnessed to our tremendous war effort.

Mr. GREEN: I did not say that; I think the hon. member has misunderstood what I said.

Mr. GRAHAM: I accept the correction.

Mr. GREEN: I was complaining about the type of information being released.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do know, however, that the hon. members to whom I have referred have in mind exactly the same idea as other hon. members have, namely, that the government of the day must conduct the war effort with the greatest degree of efficiency, and attempt to do all that is required. I suggest to the house that that is exactly what the government is doing—always bearing in mind the type of country in which we live, the people who live in it and the difficulties which must present themselves to any government of any political stripe which may have assumed the duty of conducting our war effort.

While it is true that as private members on this side of the house it is our duty to offer constructive criticism, I sometimes wonder whether we have not a somewhat heavier duty cast upon us than is placed upon the shoulders of members of opposition groups. Sometimes we envy the freedom with which the member in an opposition group may express himself. We on this side of the house are on a team, if I may so describe it, and we are charged with the duty of assisting the government in performing a task. On the other hand, members of the opposition may spray this side of the house with a machine-gun barrage of criticism, and they may direct their fire in any direction they see fit. Let me assure hon. members opposite that if they will conduct themselves in the traditional manner of a good opposition we, in turn, on this side of the house, will perform our duty in the manner we deem fit and proper.

There are only two domestic matters upon which I should like to touch. One has been dealt with at considerable length to-day by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon). I refer, of course, to what is known as the wheat problem. In discussing this particular problem I should like to take it out of that category of problems with which western Canada only is concerned. If ever there were a national problem, in both size and the effect it has upon the country, it is surely this wheat problem. Of course, it is part and parcel of the problem of agriculture, and I want to say to hon. members from Ontario and the other eastern provinces that we from the west recognize it as such. When any problem affecting agriculture in the eastern provinces arises, they will find us ready and willing to assist them in securing measures of relief. In turn, we hope that they will help us when this huge problem confronts us.

I need not remind the house that many hon. members from western Canada were born in Ontario and the other eastern provinces. Many of us grew up in the east. We are, therefore, in a dual position and are able to appreciate, to some extent at least, the attitude of mind of the Ontario people, for example, and the attitude of mind of the people of western Canada. It is only by a joint and common effort in tackling all these problems that we can hope to find a solution.

I listened with more than usual interest to the address of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle when he dealt quite fully with this problem. It will be recalled that he suggested that last year in western Canada—I think he had Saskatchewan particularly in mind—there had occurred what he described as a racket in connection with the grading and handling of wheat by the elevator system. I know the hon. member is the owner of an elevator. He is a member of this house and obviously he has taken a great interest in this particular question. He is also the operator of a large farm. I am sure he made that statement, having fully in mind his responsibility as a member of parliament.

I agree with him that if any such condition exists, it should be remedied immediately, but I must confess that I am a little surprised that such a charge could be made against the elevators in the particular province from which I come. We have a great cooperative elevator system known as the Saskatchewan wheat pool, and I can hardly credit that that organization, which dominates the elevator situation in that province, would lend itself to what might easily be described as a racket. I sincerely hope that this will be the final conclusion that we reach after all the information has been received. I feel sure that the wheat pool, by its example and fairness in handling the farmers' wheat, will have shown that there is no opportunity in my province for the carrying on of any such racket as that described by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle.

The matter is one that seemingly could easily be checked. As I understand it, all wheat goes through the wheat board and there is a record, not only of the number of bushels but of the different grades of wheat which have passed through the country elevators. We know the amounts that were in the elevators prior to the marketing of this year's wheat, and it seems to me that it would be easy to determine whether the elevator systems had profited to any extent, great or small, at the expense of the producers.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle seemed to have little but criticism of the policy adopted by the government last year in connection with wheat. My experience has been somewhat different. Leaving aside for the moment the initial price paid to the farmer, I would say that the quota system adopted by the government has given the farmer an opportunity to market his crop in instalments. I suggest to the hon. member that that is not an unmixed evil. A great many benefits have been derived as a result of the farmer being given that opportunity. It will be remembered that the hon. member compared the amount of wheat delivered on a certain day in 1939 with the amount delivered on the same date in 1940, and estimated that some $50,000,000 less was in circulation in 1940 as compared with 1939. But any one who has lived in Saskatchewan will know that had that $50,000,000 been paid out, it would not have reached the hands of the producing farmers. In all likelihood it would have gone into the hands of the so-called creditor class. While we may have a certain measure of sympathy for some of the creditor class, our first concern in this wheat crisis is for the farmer.

So we find that the farmer who was blessed with a crop, despite the fact that he could market only his quota, has a certain sense of security from looking at his well filled granaries. They are filled with a commodity which we all believe has an actual worth and will continue to be an actual asset to him for the coming year until deliveries are completed. Of course, all this is conditioned upon the agencies of the government being able to give an opportunity to the individual farmer actually to deliver his quota. In addition, it is based upon the assumption, as clearly indicated by the government policy, that before the end of the present crop year the farmer will be enabled to market practically all his crop.

Those of us who have lived long in the west know that there is a certain amount of value in the fact that throughout the year the income of the farmer will be spread out, so that on no occasion will he be presented with an emergency or crisis in his family household. But I say to the government, and particularly to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that if an individual farmer in a certain district has not been able to deliver his quota of grain, the government should take notice of that and realize that it will be impossible for such a man to get along without some method of converting into cash the only commodity he has, that is, wheat.

All things considered, I find myself viewing with considerable satisfaction the application and the working out of the quota system as applied by the government last year under its wheat policy. Like other hon. members, I realize that it would have been of greater value to the farmer had it been announced at an earlier date, but I realize also that there is considerable justification for the government not announcing its policy before it did.

We must remember also that at that time weather conditions made uncertain the type of crop yield in the west, and remember again the position of our usual markets. We all know that France unfortunately was in the midst of a break-down and that that market was disappearing. In addition, we did not know and we do not yet know the attitude of Russia. The same applies to Japan. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that we never do expect the superhuman from the government, and when we remember the uncertainty as to the amount of crop we would have to deal with, and the uncertainty as to available markets, it is not, to me at least, a matter of wonderment that the government waited as long as time would permit for these important factors to become as clear as they could.

But, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce has properly pointed out, in this crop year 1941 a wholly different situation presents itself. We now know fairly well the markets available to us. It is true we do not know the amount of the 1941 crop, but we do know the extent of the nationally-owned storage space available in the crop year 1941, and so I was highly pleased to hear the minister state to the house to-day that it was the intention of the government to pursue its study of this problem and in February, when the house reconvenes, to make an announcement of its policy for 1941.

What are some of the problems? I propose briefly to outline them without at the moment suggesting a solution.

Obviously the storage problem is one which will have to be solved. We now know that we shall likely enter the next crop year with all the present storage capacity filled. If that is the situation, it seems to me that the government must do one of two things, or both. One is to adopt a policy of increasing the present storage owned by the elevator systems or by the government. That, it will be noted, would permit the continuation of the quota system, if sufficient space were available, without having to advance money on the wheat in the farmer's hands. On the other hand the government might encourage the farmer more than it did last year to build granaries or storage facilities on his own farm sufficient to handle a larger portion of his crop. It seems to me a necessary corollary of the adoption of that policy or of both policies—the extension of our national storage facilities and encouraging the farmer to increase his own storage facilities on the farm—that the government must in this crop year consider the necessity of having to finance in some way the farmer who is holding his wheat on the farm.

There are in western Canada areas in which the mixed farming type of agriculture could, of course, be greatly increased, but there are other districts, my own among them, in which that would be found impossible, not because the farmers there do not desire to do so, but because climate, type of soil and other fixed conditions make it absolutely essential for them to continue the growing of wheat as the only possible method of staying in the farming business. For many of these farmers there is no possibility of changing from wheat to a mixed type of farming unless, I suggest, the government carries out a vigorous policy of broadening and making a greater use of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

In my particular district I had, during the recess, the pleasure of visiting the Maple Creek project, and it seemed to me that I could have done the prairie farm rehabilitation scheme and the eastern members of this house a great service if I could have taken them on that trip with me. The hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Evans) was kind enough to take me over that sixteen-mile project and nothing, I think, could be more astounding than to see how an otherwise barren district had been converted by the use of conservation of water into an oasis flowing, metaphorically speaking, with milk and honey. That project is a wise and worth-while idea. It will enable feed and fodder to be available to districts south and west of the project which have suffered from a visitation of grasshoppers. So if, perchance, the government intends to pursue a policy which will encourage the farmer to change his methods of farming and to go into a more mixed type of farming, I should like to see joined with that a generous appropriation for Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act purposes, so that those districts which could be served by the provisions of that act would be given that opportunity.

Having dealt with the question of storage, I should like to discuss the question of price, which must be considered again this year. I know that representations were made by almost all the western members with regard to the price for last year's crop. The decision of the government was announced. But it seems to me that even if the government adopt the same line of reasoning this year as last year, they may have to recognize the rising cost of living and the necessity of putting the farmer in a position of equality with that of the year 1939. That is a subject which, I am aware, will require a great deal of consideration. The quota system itself has worked out fairly well; but if it is our desire not to encourage the growing of any greater quantity of wheat than is necessary this crop year, we must remember that there is in that quota system itself a certain encouragement to increased wheat acreage, and as the United Grain Growers' Grain Company of Winnipeg has pointed out, the government might well consider, in this whole problem of voluntary reduction of wheat acreage, changing the basis from that of acreage to that of bushels. I think that point deserves consideration.

The question of storage charges which was raised by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle raises the question whether, in the light of the experience that we have had during the past year, it might not be wise to take over all of the elevator storage capacity in Canada. We all recall that last year the elevator companies were quite pleased to offer to the government the taking over of their plant, provided that the government would compensate them with a return of some 6 per cent on the capital invested. I know that this is not something which would be done in normal times, but because of the nature of the problem, and because particularly of this constant and reiterated demand that storage and other service charges be reduced, it may be the policy of wisdom for the government to take over the elevator system and the storage facilities of this country.

I have already referred to the question of crop acreage. I think it is the consensus of opinion of those who live in western Canada that the only way in which we can wisely and effectively accomplish any crop reduction would be, not by any compulsory method but by encouraging a reduction in the wheat acreage and by the improvement of farming methods. I know that in my own district this year peculiar weather conditions resulted in a fairly good crop on summer-fallow and practically none on stubble. That in itself will be an encouragement to the average farmer who is not already doing so, to summer-fallow more of his land and to discontinue the sowing of grain on stubble.

The use of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, together with encouragement to the farmers to take up some other method of marketing coarse grain and wheat, or any other product they may go into, is the only means whereby we can reasonably hope to achieve success in the endeavour to reduce crop acreage.

Then there is the relationship between Britain and Canada in the marketing of wheat. The other night I listened with a good deal of pleasure to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). I have followed closely everything he has said on this subject, not only in this house but elsewhere, and I was interested to hear him recount his experience and the knowledge gained in England. One of the points that emerged from his discussion is the fact that there is a certain barrier to the purchase by Britain of more of our agricultural produce, owing to the exchange relationship between the English pound and the Canadian dollar, and I for one would heartily welcome a declaration on the part of this government that, if for no other reason than to assist the motherland in her moment of trial, we are prepared to give her free access to the markets of this country and, moreover, are ready to absorb any differential that might result from exchange, so far as commodities with which we can furnish her are concerned. This would not only emphasize the relationship that exists between the mother country and ourselves, but assist in the marketing of products other than wheat in the old land, and it would allow our farmers to go in for diversified farming, discontinuing the production to so large an extent of commodities of which at present we produce so much and which we find it difficult to market.

My purpose in bringing up this question and in outlining some of the problems that will face the government and the people of Canada is not to offer any immediate solution or any definite, planned solution. My opinion is that it would be difficult indeed, without some technical information which one would necessarily require, to determine exactly how all these problems that I have suggested could best be solved. I have, however, a good deal of commendation for the suggestion of the United Grain Growers Company Limited of Winnipeg, that the whole question of marketing wheat be turned over during the recess to a committee for study and report. I care not what sort of committee it may be, so long as the personnel are properly equipped for the task. It might be a committee of this house.

The minister has indicated that he is himself giving this matter great attention. That is obvious. The wheat board, the advisory council and the wheat committee of the cabinet, I have no doubt, are all bending their efforts towards a solution of the problem. It is not insuperable. The statement made by the Minister of Agriculture the other night, whether it was optimistic or pessimistic, in its evaluation of the factors relating to this great commodity, shows clearly that the problem can be solved. If it is properly studied, I have no doubt that the government can find a solution for it.

The various agencies which the government itself has set up will no doubt have a great deal of information on the subject; but I rather think it would be wise, during the recess, to give an opportunity, to representatives of different groups who are vitally interested in finding a solution of the problem, to appear before a committee and submit such information as they may have. That committee could call to its assistance any or all of the agencies of government which have been busy collecting information. Perhaps the advisory council to the wheat board might be sufficiently representative to perform that task on behalf of the country. In addition to the information which it would give to those charged with the study of the problem, it would be a splendid service to the farmers, who are suffering from a sense of misunderstanding. Nothing would make me happier than if the federal government could see fit to have the subject investigated in this way, so that we in the west and the farmers in the east would feel that ample opportunity had been given for the presentation of views. It would show that the matter was being sympathetically considered. The farmers and all others concerned would gain an appreciation of the problem, and when the solution came there would be a sense of partnership in the conclusions reached, which would greatly benefit the country.

At the present time agriculture is restless because it senses it is not keeping its proper place in the economic life of Canada, that it is not being treated as are other sections of the nation's activities. Every hon. member, no matter whether he represents a rural riding or comes from a city, realizes what it would mean to this dominion if those engaged in this great basic industry were allowed to remain permanently in a state of depression.

This problem calls for the best in each of us. I am sure that there is no fundamental difference of opinion among the members of this house as to its being desirable that the government should find a proper solution.

I had intended to touch upon one other matter, the report of the Rowell-Sirois commission on dominion-provincial relations. May I say simply this, and I think it will sum up my views on the question: I wish to emphasize the position taken by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) the other night, and I suggest to those representing Ontario and Quebec particularly, the two great central pillars of confederation, that they come to the conference as Canadians rather than as residents of a particular province. As we look back over Canadian history, so well outlined in the first volume of the report, is it not well for us to ask ourselves this question: What would Macdonald and Blake, what would our own beloved Laurier and, let me add, Sir Robert Borden do if they could attend such a conference? These wise leaders of the people, regardless of political affiliations, gave leadership at the time of confederation and afterwards in an effort to bring harmony into the dominion.

I will not recite, as I had intended to do, certain excerpts from the report in relation to Saskatchewan. There is a standing challenge there to have something done to meet the situation that exists to-day. We remember the words of Lincoln, that a nation cannot exist half slave and half free, and that is true to-day of Canada. The worst thing possible that could befall Ontario and Quebec—and we have a right to expect the highest leadership from those provinces—would be to leave any part of this dominion in the unfortunate position in which Saskatchewan finds itself to-day. And the finding with regard to Saskatchewan is made by a commission on which there was no representative from that province. The personnel was drawn from the two central provinces, the maritimes, Manitoba and British Columbia, and no one from Saskatchewan need be afraid of anything that might be said is suggestive of bias in favour of Saskatchewan.

Here we have the completed report of a detached and independent royal commission charged with the duty of examining that very question. So I leave that by again appealing to the private members of this house who come from the central provinces—yes, and other provinces—and to the provincial leaders of the provinces, that when they come to that conference, while in some respects the recommendations may be questioned, while all the recommendations are not necessarily to be accepted, and while the figures in the report are to a large extent only estimates, they come firm in the purpose to find a solution of a problem for which a solution must be found.

In conclusion, I think the contribution which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has made to the public life of this country is such that his cup must be filled to the brim with pride even on the record he now has, but what a happy conclusion to a life so filled with accomplishment would it be if he could do two things: one, to lead this country to victory in this terrible war and preserve for us the measure of democracy upon which we can again build our way of life, and, second, to set our own house in order through the report made by that royal commission.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): This debate has been marked by sincere and honest expressions of opinion. I hope the house will credit me with a like sincerity. It has been said that Canada is fighting to preserve itself, and that its first line of defence is in Great Britain. That may be so, but the Canadian people realize that the people of England to-day are fighting for their lives and for the preservation of their homes. I cannot forget my native land; although it is forty years since I left I still have many relatives and many friends there, and I feel that they would wish me to express on their behalf their profound gratitude for the efforts and sacrifices which the Canadian people are making in their war effort.

I should like to associate myself with those who have asked that the government grant free transportation to soldiers on leave. I am sure that would be the wish of the vast majority of the Canadian people.

I should like also to say a word on behalf of a great many widows of soldiers who fought in the last war, whose lives were prematurely cut short on account of their war experiences. I am told that many thousands of these widows are destitute. Again I say that if the government would look after these widows and at least grant them the necessities of life, it would meet the wishes of the vast majority of the Canadian people.

I should now like to remind the house, in case my remarks may be misunderstood, as ours in this group often are by the press, that the basic philosophy of social credit is individual freedom, and that we detest dictatorship in any shape or form. It is said that democracy is government according to the will of the people. If that is so, and we have had a democratic government—or so it is said—why is it that in the last twenty-five years we have had two major wars and, in between, a series of depressions, unemployment, poverty and destitution? Surely those conditions have not existed as a result of the will of the people. Since they have been prevalent, I can only conclude that we have had government according to the will, not of the people but of other interested parties.

There are two political philosophies: one, centralization or totalitarianism, and the other, decentralization or democracy. Social crediters stand for decentralization, and therefore democracy.

Twenty-two years ago the world was, we were told, made safe for democracy. For a time there was a period of great prosperity. But soon after the peace was concluded we ran into a time of great depression, which continued more or less up to the start of this war. In fact it is not too much to say that the cause of this war was the depression, which had lasted more or less for fifteen years. It is easy to blame Hitler, but there was a gap of fifteen years between the end of the last war and the rise of Hitler, and had the people of Europe and of the world not been subject to the conditions to which they were subjected, I am sure that Hitler never would have been heard of.

I have said it is obvious that we must have had government according to the will of parties opposed to the interests of the people. I do not think there is any doubt that these interests were financial. As the biggest banker in the British empire said:

> Bankers control the policies of governments and hold in their hands the destinies of the people.

The world has been money mad. Only the bankers, the money lenders, have been listened to, and anybody who dared to criticize what the bankers said was either laughed at and discredited or treated to a conspiracy of silence. I remember that in September of last year, when the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) brought down the first war budget, he said, as he said yesterday, that the real cost of war must come out of current production; and I remember saying at that time in reply that that was true, that the real costs of war were blood and sweat and tears, and that therefore any debt which was left after the war was over was not real. Yet we have been paying the debts of the last war right up to the present one, without reducing the amount in the least; in fact it is bigger now than it was. When we add the debt of this war to that of the last, I cannot imagine what conditions will be like.

I believe the bankers already have an idea of those conditions; they have said that we shall have hard times for generations. Moreover, this time is not like that of the last war. Then, the people accepted those conditions as being inevitable, but this time there are very many who do not believe that it is necessary to suffer privation as a reward for winning a war. Hence it is that we hear proposals such as federal union and "union now." The proposals are that each country shall surrender its sovereignty over finance, armaments, fiscal policy and the judicature. I should like to ask what would be left. The authority of parliament would be reduced to less than that of a provincial government, and the provincial legislatures would be reduced to the status of parish councils. Further, if we are to have no sovereignty, how can we have a sovereign? If we surrender our sovereignty we surrender our sovereign. Yet these proposals are publicized in the press; and just before I left Alberta, a Mr. Streit was given the facilities of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on a nation-wide hook-up to put those proposals before the Canadian people. If that is not treason, I should like to know what it can be called.

As a proof, just one proof, that governments have not the control of finance, I would refer to the description, in Viscount Snowden's "Memoirs" of an incident in 1931 where England had a financial crisis. He relates that he telephoned certain financiers in Wall street, New York, and asked them whether, if the British government were to reduce the standard of living of the unemployed and the scale of social services in general, that would be acceptable to these financiers. Think of it,—the British government going hat-in-hand to international financiers and asking them if they would agree to furnish a little money provided the government reduced the standards of living of its own people! And what was the consequence? The navy mutinied.

To my mind the object of those international financiers was to make it impossible for Great Britain and the empire adequately to finance rearmament in order to face the German threat. How else can one account for the fact that, in the face of certain aggression by Germany, the allied countries refused to prepare themselves to meet it? I heard a Minister of National Defence say in this house that the Canadian flying corps had ceased to fly. Could he say that there was no room in the air? Could he say that there was no gasoline when Alberta has so much that pipelines are needed to get it out of the country? Could he say that there were no young men willing and anxious for the job? No. There was only one reason: we had no money; and we had no money because neither this government nor the government of any other democratic country is sovereign to-day. One and all are, and have been, controlled by international finance.

As I said before, we in this corner and our followers throughout the British empire detest dictatorship in any shape or form. Certainly we were never confused as to the difference between Germany, Italy and Russia. I remember that when, on many platforms, I have lumped those three countries together, people have objected; they said, "There is all the difference in the world between Russia and Germany." Then I would say, "Well, there are three eggs on this table. Here we have a hard-boiled egg—you can call that Germany. Here is a scrambled egg—you can call that Russia. And here is a poached egg—you can call that Italy. They look a little different. Some people like them fried, some like them poached, but they are all eggs, and nothing but eggs."

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Germany is a bad egg.

Mr. JAQUES: I was coming to that. But there is another kind of egg—a rotten egg; and that is dictatorship by finance. Last summer I asked perhaps the greatest financial authority in Canada why it was that the French left off building the Maginot line precisely where the Germans broke through in 1914. We were told that France had the finest army in Europe. We were told that its Maginot line was impregnable, and that it had the finest flying corps in Europe. But the Maginot line was not even finished. It was like a bridge which went three parts of the way across the stream.

I asked that man if he could tell me why it was that the Maginot line had not been built past that certain point, and he said to me, "Well, they had a financial crisis, and they had to economize." Will anyone say that that crisis was accidental? I say it was deliberately brought about, and the result of their economy has been the loss of France—a real economy, indeed!

I remember trying for some hours in the committee on banking and commerce to persuade its members that saving money caused a shortage of purchasing power. Of course I was reminded of the proverbial rainy day. Then, a report of a royal commission in Australia was put into the evidence to rebut the ideas I had advanced. That royal commission was appointed by the government of Australia, and its findings were that saving money did not cause a shortage of purchasing power.

We were, however, told yesterday by the Minister of Finance, and we now are told repeatedly by the orthodox professors that the very object of selling war bonds is not to raise money to finance the war, but rather to cause a shortage of purchasing power. And so the orthodox have had to eat their own words. As I have said before, the canons of sound finance are silenced in war time by the cannons of the enemy.

If I may I should like to read a short quotation from the September issue of The Banker, a magazine published in London, England. In part it is as follows:

> Are we to suppose that if these Spitfire funds had not been raised, the production of Spitfires would have been any the less? Clearly not. The factories would have been producing to the limit of their capacity in any case. Money to buy Spitfires has no more connection with the production of Spitfires than have the spring flowers.

And it goes on to say:

> When the savings appeals argue that "every pound that flows in from the sale of defence bonds increases the flow of molten steel from the crucibles and blast furnaces" this is a plain misstatement of fact.

That is not the statement of a member of the social credit party. It is the statement of a banker, as it appears in The Banker of London. If it does not correspond exactly with the statement of the president of the Canadian Bankers Association in Canada, then I would say the difference may be explained by the fact that in England no one is sure whether he will be on this earth from one day to the next. In face of that fact, perhaps the man who wrote that article thought that confession would be good for his soul.

Then, in connection with any suggestion hon. members in this corner of the house make, we hear remarks about "funny money." Mr. Jaffray, president of the Canadian Bankers' Association, was quite eloquent on that subject last week, and left the suggestion that money created by any government and not by bankers must be "funny money." So far as it is possible to deny anything, it has been denied that there is such a thing as the creation of money. Yet it is obvious that it would be impossible to finance our war effort without money creation. Otherwise, what would have been the point of saying, as has always been said in this chamber, and in any other parliament, that it would be impossible to do this or that because it was not known where the money would come from.

Of course, money to finance a war is created. Let there be no mistake about that. I am not criticizing this government in particular. I am, however, criticizing the principle it upholds, one which has been upheld by every democratic government in the world. That is the reason why democracy is in the danger in which it finds itself to-day. Everywhere and in all countries parliaments have surrendered their sovereign rights over the issue and creation of money, and have delegated that power to private corporations responsible to nobody other than themselves. Those corporations are not even national. It is an international arrangement. And so they have played one country off against another.

After the last war a policy of deflation was forced on Great Britain. Mr. Jaffray may talk about "funny money," if he wishes; but speaking in the House of Commons in England in 1922, the Right Hon. Bonar Law, some time Prime Minister of England, said this, as reported in Hansard for the month of May in that year:

> We borrowed 8,000 million pounds. As a result of deflation we shall be required to repay 16,000 million.

"As a result of deflation"—no wonder the bankers always warn us about the dangers of inflation. But they never mention deflation. That debt was doubled—and if Mr. Jaffray says that our ideas about money are funny, I will say to him that that money was hot, and very hot. It was stolen—deliberately and absolutely stolen.

I well remember that away out on the prairies of Alberta I had kept cattle through what was the longest winter in the history of western Canada, a winter which had lasted seven months. I thought I would be rewarded for my efforts, but when I came to sell those cattle I got only one cent a pound, as a result of that deflation. My debts were doubled and trebled; yet that is called sound money. It is the biggest racket the world has ever known. It is the cause of the terrible conditions that we have at the present time. There will never be peace, there will never be prosperity, there will never be true democracy until parliaments assume their responsibilities and control the creation and issue of money.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is what they were going to do, but they forgot about it.

Mr. JAQUES: Many people advocate federal union or the surrender of our sovereign powers as the only way to peace. They say that we must disarm and hand over our sovereignty to an international police force. The only way to ensure peace is to remove the causes of war. To disarm would be just the same as tying behind his back the hands of a victim of the seven years' itch. It would not remove the cause. To say that you are going to cure national problems by making them international is the same as saying that you are going to cure the inmates of a hospital by tearing down the partitions.

The Minister of Finance had this to say:

That in real terms, that is to say in terms of the loss to the nation of the production required for war purposes, the war is paid for substantially while it is in progress.

That is true. In other words, the real costs come out of current production. Therefore, when the war is over, the real costs will have been paid. Why, then, should there be a debt at the end of the war? If the real costs have been paid, then the debt cannot be real. I cannot see any flaw in that argument. As a matter of fact, there is no need for debt at the end of war. The minister continued:

That the task of finance is not only to provide the funds which are used to pay for the war services but more fundamentally is, by taxing and borrowing, to restrict the civilian demand for economic resources in order that they will be available to the defence or supply departments when required.

That is reasonable; but if the war is financed, as it certainly is, by the costless creation of money, why should anyone expect to be rewarded for lending his money? Why should a man who has more money than he needs hold the country in his debt forever simply because he lends it to the nation? If it is not necessary, why borrow it? All the necessary money can be obtained by costless creation of credit. A London banker says that this is undoubtedly what is happening. Why should those people who do something which is quite unnecessary be rewarded by having the rest of the people in their debt for all time?

I can remember when the Minister of Finance was putting over the first war loan. He said he wanted the bonds distributed as widely and as evenly as possible. If we had taken him at his word and had done just that, what would have been the value of the bonds? Every one would have had the same number of bonds and we might just as well tear them up because every one would be paying his neighbour's interest. But as the minister went on to say, some of the people—I would say the vast majority—are too poor to buy bonds. The soldiers are too poor to buy bonds, and it is these people who are too poor to buy bonds who will be taxed to pay the interest on the bonds belonging to those who happened to have enough money to buy them. These bonds were offered as a safe and profitable investment, but it is our soldiers who make them safe and profitable. If we are beaten, these bonds will not be worth the paper they are printed upon. When our soldiers come back from war they will be taxed to pay the interest on the bonds belonging to people who have taken no risks. That is not equality of sacrifice.

May I say a word about the farmer. Just before I left home to come to Ottawa I was asked to address a meeting of the executive of the united farmers of Alberta. I told them that I had not attended the meeting to make a speech, that I had come to listen and to learn their wishes, which I would lay before parliament. I told them that we had done our best at the last session, but I did not hold out much hope. I told them that if the Alberta farmers and other farmers in western Canada were in a depressed condition, that must be agreeable to this government because it was part of their fundamental policy; if a class of people have no money to spare, that is all to the good because the government will be spared the trouble of extracting it from them. A Liberal who was present rose and said he was sorry that I had introduced politics into the discussion. I said that I had not introduced anything of the kind, that I was not criticizing the government; that I was merely stating facts.

How many of these war bonds will be held by the farmers of western Canada? Next to none. Yet when the war is over, they will be taxed to pay the interest on bonds which they never had an opportunity of acquiring. I know of what I speak. I have farmed all my life and I know these people. If they are able to exist, that is as much as they can do. They cannot buy bonds; yet after the war they will have to pay. If the war lasts for years and years, as we have been told it may, what will be the state of debt in this country? As I said before, those people who have not been able to buy bonds will have to pay interest to those who have been able to buy them.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said at the end of his speech:

Never again must we allow any man or any group of men to subjugate by fear and to crush by the power of might the spirit and the lives of honest and humble men.

There is only one way to make that possible. The government must assert its sovereign right over the creation and issue of money. So long as governments—I am not blaming this one more than any other—allow money lenders, because that is all that bankers are, good servants but impossible masters, the worst kind that you could get, to dictate the policy of governments, how is democracy possible? We believe that a strong, free and prosperous British empire is the best guarantee for the peace and sanity of the world; and instead of surrendering the sovereignty of the empire or of any part of it to any international force, which of course would be international finance, those sovereign powers should be strengthened by restoring to the crown in trust for the people absolute control of the issue of currency and credit.

On motion of Mr. Stirling the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 5.55 p.m.

Monday, November 25, 1940.

The house met at three o'clock.

ALBERTA PROVINCIAL BANK

PROPOSED REFERENCE TO STANDING ORDERS COMMITTEE OF QUESTION OF PROCEDURE

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the standing committee on standing orders be instructed to inquire and report on the advisability of accepting as sufficient for this session the proceedings taken last session in respect of the presentation of a petition, the filing of a bill, and the publication of notice relative to the proposed incorporation of the Alberta Provincial Bank.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): This motion is the one I referred to the other day when my hon. friend first presented it. I then mentioned that the committees had not at that time been constituted. They have since been constituted. I said then that I saw no objection to the motion carrying once the committees were constituted. I repeat that now.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Friday, November 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Brooke Claxton for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Blackmore.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): Mr. Speaker, the 1940 session was prorogued and the 1941 session opened two days later because of a demand by public opinion for information. The demand was somewhat insistent, particularly from that portion of public opinion which has been looking on with admiration at the effort which Britain has been putting forward, on our behalf as well as her own, and there was some apprehension—that portion of public opinion which is aware that the first division of the Canadian corps received its equipment for its training in Great Britain; which has some doubt in its mind yet, whether the second division has yet received all its equipment in Great Britain for its training, and knows that the third division and the fourth division in this country have not yet been fully equipped; that portion of public opinion which has heard of the shortage which exists in equipment for the reserve units of the Canadian army, shortage of motor cycles for motor cycle units, tanks for tank units, anti-tank guns, anti-aircraft guns, instruments for the signallers, the requirements of training for all those specialized units which to-day form a part of a modern corps, without which equipment they cannot train; and without training they are not only useless but a positive menace to those corps to which they are attached.

The house has now had read to it rather voluminous statements by the various ministers whom we know as the war ministers, with an historical preface by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). It has received a mass of information; it has been led through the ramifications of the boards and committees which are directing this work, and the process of digestion is going on.

Certain things, however, emerge. The plans outlined of course have not yet reached their full measure of production.

But the battle is now. Oh, the pity of it, that the government did not realize the intensity of the need months ago! The low countries had to be invaded before it was realized that Canada's utmost effort would not be too great. Had that been realized, as I maintain it should have been realized, the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) would not have had to tell us the other day that the peak of production was yet eight months distant.

Hon. members may be inclined to say that this is being wise after the event, but is it? So far as the general public is concerned, probably it is. So far as the ordinary member of this house is concerned, probably it is. But I maintain that so far as the government is concerned, it is not. The government is the director of this effort. The government has been looking on at Great Britain directing the effort, the magnificent effort, of the people of the United Kingdom. Cables have been passing all the time; and you cannot make me believe that the government of the United Kingdom failed to keep this government aware in minute detail of what they foresaw, of the information with regard to the enemy that they had received, of what they were doing and were proposing to do, and as to those measures of cooperation in which the partners in this effort must share. It is not the custom of a government to impart the contents of secret cables. It would be hardly proper for them to do so; but these cables are passing all the time, and it is on the contents of these secret cables that governmental policy is laid.

Last session the Prime Minister, replying to me with regard to a certain matter, said that Canada had not refused any request made by Great Britain. Of course she had not. But Great Britain does not make requests of the dominions until the ground has been thoroughly sounded and it has been made pretty certain that the request, if made, will be granted. But the cables are passing week in and week out, day in and day out. Envoys are discussing; ministers are visiting; communications are being exchanged, yet eight months had to elapse before this government really got into its stride and started Canada pushing. The inevitable result was perfectly evident, that if Britain could not hold its defence Canada was doomed. The measure of Canada's effort last winter was the measure of the government's policy at that time. Now we are told that Canada is making everything. If Canada under direction to-day can make everything, Mr. Speaker, under similar direction she could have made everything last winter, or begun to do so. Canadian industry has not been backward. Canadian industry has been only too anxious to get really busy. Aeroplane manufacturers were clamorous for work. The Department of National Defence had combed Canadian industry to such an extent that they had a card index containing a couple of thousand names of firms listing what they were capable of doing and perhaps what they were anxious to begin doing. Canadian labour is not backward. We have the word of their spokesmen, and we have the evidence of our eyes. We need only look at what labour has accomplished in the erection of the buildings for the commonwealth air training plan, and on top of that the provision of the establishments required for the training of the Royal Air Force.

No, Canadian labour has not been backward, but only recently has the tempo of Canadian effort been quickened. The only thing that is changed is the government's policy on which that tempo was based and the realization, I say once more, that Canada's utmost effort will not be too great.

I am not going to attempt to deal in detail with the statements which have been made by the ministers; the process of digestion is still going on. They paint broad pictures; they withhold certain figures. With that I do not make complaint. The ministers must have the decision as to what is wise to give out in the way of figures, and what is not. But there can be only one reason for official reticence, and that is the danger that information may reach the enemy. Official reticence must not be used for any other purpose. Sometimes it appears to me that official reticence is being carried rather far. Let me give an example.

During the last session of this house we were most anxious to obtain a progress report on Bren gun production. We could not get it. The minister dealt in generalities; he told us the situation was satisfactory and that production was ahead of schedule. Again in the statement he made in this house ten days ago he used the same soothing language, and again we were not given the figures. Then three days later he handed them to the Canadian Press. I look upon that, Mr. Speaker, as somewhat of an affront to this house. The minister, giving what appeared to be a full description of Canada's effort in this matter, in which he knew the public was interested, did not give the figures on that occasion, but he handed them to the press three days later. There is no doubt whatever in my mind that a certain number of people, I do not know how many, have known those figures for some time past. Indeed last session I was told that certain members of this house had been informed as to those figures. I was not. But if there are enemy agents in our midst, as I have little doubt there are, it is pretty evident that Herr Hitler knew the figures of our Bren gun production before we members of the house knew them, and I do not think that is a satisfactory way to keep the ordinary member of this house informed when, individually and through the various parties, he has informed the government not once but many times that his desire to get on with and help in this effort was as great as that of the government. Why give the public the opportunity to wonder? Is it not better to give out information such as that, which surely cannot do any harm and which tends to keep up the interest of those who are endeavouring to examine such matters?

About a month ago I had the opportunity to take a parade at Vernon, British Columbia, through the courtesy of the officer commanding the camp there, on the fourteenth day of that period of training. I was greatly impressed with what I saw. I was greatly impressed with the fact that some 1,200 young men, as fine a bunch of youngsters as you could possibly wish to see, were before me revealing what they had learned in the short period of approximately eighty hours of training. It is due to the excellence of the work done by Colonel Sutton, D.S.O., and the officers and non-commissioned officers associated with him that that high degree of training in such a short time has been attained. They were a remarkable set of men, those teachers. They had been connected with many famous units—the Royal Marines, the Indian Army, the British Army and the Canadian Army; and so well had they made contact with those recruits, and so well had they imparted knowledge to them, that the atmosphere was good, the bearing of the men was good, and the way they had learned the rudiments of drill and of marching was excellent. I formed a very high opinion of that effort.

I am not going to enter into a discussion as to whether the thirty-day training plan is a good one, or could be bettered. Certainly I do not consider that any sensible man could possibly imagine that soldiers could be trained in thirty days. But there are one or two factors to which I am persuaded considerable weight must have been given, when the thirty-day training period was decided upon. One of those factors is the desirability of drawing together at thirty or forty places across the country young men of a certain age and from every province in Canada so that they may be looked at, so that they may rub shoulders one with the other, so that they may receive the rudiments of training and discipline and thereby place themselves in a somewhat better position to receive that training which would be necessary if the day should come when far larger numbers of land troops are required.

The second thought which occurs to me in connection with the making of that decision is that because the equipment for the reserve units of the Canadian Army was known to be short, it was impossible to believe that there would be equipment available for the new recruits which would make it possible for them to receive the advanced stages of training at the present time.

What further results have there been from the national registration? The idea of a national registration was put before the house by hon. members from this side of the house. It was suggested on more than one occasion before the government adopted it as a desirable procedure. Certainly it was not put forward with the idea of its being only a channel for military training. The purpose of the registration, this numbering of the people, was that of giving a great deal of information. It was to enable the segregation of potential labour, male and female, young and old, trained and untrained. It was to afford opportunities for the provision of training schemes for those who were not trained. We have not heard of any result arising from national registration other than that which has already arisen in connection with the training camps. I am sure the people of Canada would like to know what if any progress has been made in other directions.

When Great Britain was arming and Canada was not, a great many of our trained mechanics, both young and middle-aged, were sliding off to Great Britain to work which attracted them. Have we done anything deliberately to make up that shortage? I ask the question, because the correction of that shortage is seriously required to-day, and the need will increase as the months go by.

Not long ago a suggestion was made to me that a scheme which would make use of the machine shops and larger garages to be found in every city or town of Canada might well be developed. It was pointed out that, in those machine shops and garages, training could be given to those youngsters, of which there are so many, who have a mechanical bent. It was pointed out, further, that as training developed it might be possible in those shops to undertake sub-contract work, as parts of a greater whole. The man who made the suggestion to me was one well trained in mechanics, one who had served as a combatant in the Canadian Army but whose age and condition of life precluded his serving again. He is only one of that large number of men who have the necessary knowledge, premises at their disposal and the intense desire to use their talents, who could be used in Canada's war effort. If this suggestion has not yet received consideration, I put it to the government as one which in my opinion merits their attention.

We are told that Hitler's smaller submarines are being made bit by bit in just such shops scattered throughout Germany. After the work has been done in those shops the parts are assembled near water, and when the assembling has taken place they are sent out to do their deadly work. If Hitler's shops can be utilized in his war effort, then Canadian shops can most certainly be used by Canadian youths for our effort.

The voluntary service registration bureau was set up by the government to operate as a clearing house to which the thousands of applicants, desiring to take some part in our war effort, might send their names. I do not know what happened to them. I do not know how many thousands so applied. I do not know whether the government, when requiring labour of a certain kind, approached the bureau and succeeded in obtaining the necessary supply of help. I do not know whether the civil service commission made use of the bureau when vacancies occurred in the service. I believe however that the public of Canada would like to have a report on the efficacy of the registration bureau, because many persons I have met look upon it as merely a cemetery of hopes.

I should like, too, to draw the government's attention to the voluntary work which has been going on under the direction of the British Columbia Women's Service Club. I believe it was last June that Mrs. Kennedy, the controller, and Mrs. McGusty, the commandant of the Vernon Branch, came to Ottawa. After obtaining the support of hon. members from British Columbia they interviewed the late Hon. Norman Rogers who listened to the objects of their work and their desires, and appeared to be most interested in what they were endeavouring to do. I am not aware that any kind words worthy of note have been spoken to them. I am not aware that any of the services which they have been so assiduously training themselves to perform have been in any sense made use of. But it is quite evident that from week to week we approach more closely the time when industry and other activities will have to avail themselves of women's labour. I should think it would be most desirable that the government reconsider the recognition of units such as the one to which I have just referred, because at the back of each of these organizations is the intense desire to help.

In the neighbourhood of Princeton, an important mining section of British Columbia, the population of which is drawn from many countries of Europe, some of which are now under the nazi boot heel, a Spitfire fund was set up. Contributions both large and small have been flowing into it. No sooner had they commenced to collect than a discouraging reference to Spitfire funds appeared in the press. Is the government wise to discourage efforts of that sort? It is this sort of effort which provides a safety valve for the enthusiasm of certain Canadians. I am not in the least surprised to hear that the minister would much rather have the money go into the war loan.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not say that, nor have I discouraged these funds.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister says that he has not discouraged them, but my information is that the discouragement came from somewhere. I remember reading a paragraph or two in the press—I have not the article before me so I shall not elaborate—which gave me the impression that the government was inclined to discourage the collection of Spitfire funds. If the minister says that he has not, then I am mistaken and the people of Princeton have been mistaken. When they started collecting for this fund from that rather scattered and cosmopolitan population they were met with the announcement that the government was discouraging such funds. If the government have not been discouraging these funds, or even if they have, would they be good enough to explain their views further to the Canadian people?

I come now to the response by the public to the second war loan. Shortly after the loan campaign opened I received a letter from a man of standing in his community who told me that he and a number of his acquaintances had been deterred from investing in the war loan because of the waste and political partisanship in connection with the building of the camp at Vernon. I passed that letter on to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), who, in thanking me, said that he was going to take it up with the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), and that he would also speak to him about it. Some three weeks later I received another letter from another man written in the same strain. I know this gentleman quite well and I have considerable confidence in his judgment. I replied immediately asking that he give me some details, whereupon I would lay them before the proper minister. He furnished me with the details and I am passing them on to the minister who is carrying on the work of the Minister of National Defence in his absence, in the hope that the matter will be run to earth.

I know how easy it is to make charges of this description, and I know how hard it is to obtain the facts to substantiate them. People do not want to talk; people are afraid of losing their jobs. But it would appear that these things are prevalent. I regret to say that my own experience has been that they are quite prevalent. It is the duty of the government, by investigation or by any other means in their power, not only to set such charges at rest but to disprove them. The government, from the Prime Minister down, have assured this house that it is not their personal desire that partisanship should enter into this effort. I must accept their statements, and of course I do. But theirs is the brain that is directing this effort. To what extent has that brain taken active control of the hands and fingers that direct and control the details? That is the question. It is very easy for a minister to say, "I will not have anything to do with partisanship," but as soon as he has said that he attaches to himself the second duty of seeing that those who are responsible to him are honourably carrying out that undertaking.

As I have indicated already, the national registration was instituted, not only for the purposes of military training but to provide one of the instruments with which the National Resources Mobilization Act could be put into operation. That act gave the government very wide powers, and they have been using them. One of the things the government have done has been to set up an exchange control board. When a Canadian desires to go to the United States he must satisfy the exchange control board that his visit is reasonably necessary before he can obtain the exchange with which to carry out his trip. As I pointed out last session, there has been a steady stream of Canadian money going to the United States to pay for fruits, vegetables and many other things which, in my opinion, not only are not necessary at this time but constitute a positive waste of money which we need so badly for the purchase of things that are really required. Our exchange situation is becoming no easier. I read with great interest in the paper this morning a statement to the effect that the Minister of Finance had decided to publish a list of fruits and vegetables and was going to request licensed importers to refrain from importing them until further notice.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is my hon. friend referring to a news item which appeared in the Gazette?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: On a question of privilege, and for the purpose of setting my hon. friend right, I should like to say that that news story is entirely incorrect if it is taken as meaning that I authorized the circularizing of the wholesalers by the wholesalers' association. The news story itself does not say that, but I am afraid it may have led other persons to the same conclusion as that reached by the hon. gentleman. The representatives of the wholesalers came to see me some days ago, but there was no suggestion, either on my part or on theirs, that there should be any request made by their organization or otherwise to wholesalers in Canada not to import certain fruits and vegetables. I was considerably surprised to see the notice in the press to which the hon. gentleman has just referred. At this interview the wholesalers suggested that if steps were in contemplation by the government for the restriction of the importation of fruits and vegetables, care should be taken to avoid undue hardship. They suggested also that they should be consulted before any steps were taken. I suggested that they should put their views in writing, which they have not done as yet. Apart from that there were no suggestions or requests or arrangement made at that interview.

Mr. STIRLING: I am grateful to the minister for his explanation, and with that I shall have no further remarks to make with regard to this news item which I read in the manner he indicated. Evidently it does not correctly explain the situation at the present time. But I can continue with this thought. We have only a certain amount of money to use for necessities and it is utterly wrong for us to use it for things which can be dispensed with. In one week of June of last year $50,000 worth of tomatoes entered the Montreal market and $40,000 worth the Toronto market. I do not say that importations to that extent are still going on. But what I say is that if the Canadian consumer is using his money in that way—the Canadian consumer may be the thoughtless consumer—he should have impressed upon him the necessity that there is one better way of using that money, and that is to exercise the spirit of self-sacrifice so that we can attain an equality of sacrifice. That is the only way in which every Canadian dollar can be put to proper use.

And how the situation has been aggravated by an incident that occurred a few weeks ago in the west! Trade in the United States found itself short of certain varieties of apples of certain sizes. Finding that Canada could supply them it ordered them, and two or three hundred carloads of these apples were shipped from British Columbia to the United States at their request. Such a shout went up amongst United States producers that the reverberations reached Washington, and I am given to understand that further shipments have been somewhat discouraged. Now, what does this mean? For years United States produce has been streaming into this country, in earlier days without let or hindrance but with some preventive methods in later days, and when such a condition as I have described arises, with trade in the United States requiring something that Canada has, and asking for it, this roar goes up. Such a noise was made about it that an official of the Department of Agriculture in Washington, D.C., went out to the west, and this is what he is reported to have said, as quoted from the Wenatchee World of November 1:

As British Columbia growers possess popular sizes, American buyers have taken them. All supplies have been sold firm, and there has been no speculation and no consignment shipments. None have been dumped on our market.

In that transaction hon. members will realize that instead of Canadians wasting their money in buying something they did not need they have just been endeavouring, by this little piece of trade, to build up Canadian exchange so that money would be available for our war effort.

It is a most unsatisfactory thing that our money should not be put to its proper use, and if that treatment to which I have already referred is not the treatment which the government has decided to make use of I suggest to the government that the time has come when, if the Canadian people are not using in the best possible way one of Canada's resources, the money Canadians have to spend, the government should make use of other legitimate devices to impress upon the Canadian people that there is only one way to use their spending money, and that is the best way. I do not know why the government has been so long in taking action with regard to this matter, drawn to its attention as it has been for six months. I cannot imagine that it fears the Canada-United States agreement because in that agreement the two signatories put their names to a war clause which would enable action to be taken by either country in case either or both were involved in war.

But the fruit and vegetable end of this great question is but one portion of it, and I am hopeful that the government will tackle the question from the point of view of impressing on the Canadian people that anything in the nature of luxuries which can be done without must be done without at this time in a spirit of equality of sacrifice. I believe that there is still in this country far too large a number of people who do not realize the necessity for self-sacrifice. We must have drummed into our ears at all times equality of sacrifice so that a public opinion may be created which will frown on anything which is opposed to it, and that equality of sacrifice must not be alone among the people in this Canada of ours but must extend outside into the ranks of all who fight with us the battle of Britain.

Canada as long as she has been Canada has relied on the Royal Navy for her protection, and the Canadian people, many of them, have hung their heads because of it. True, in later years we provided ourselves with a most efficient little navy in no sense commensurate with our wealth, or with our trade, or with our necessities for protection. There was no equality of sacrifice there because it was the taxpayer of the United Kingdom who maintained the Royal Navy. We did not contribute but we greatly benefited by the existence of that formidable police force.

I was pleased indeed to listen to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Affairs the other day when he recognized that disparity and spoke with hope of a considerable expansion of our Royal Canadian Navy. But let the government leave no stone unturned in impressing on the Canadian people the necessity of sacrifice, that the results of the national registration be used to the full, and above all let the very words National Resources Mobilization Act become an actuality. Let the services of the thousands of men and women who want to help be utilized. Let every effort be made to speed up and increase the tempo of Canada's war effort so that another occasion may not arise when Canadian heads have to hang because when the battle of liberty was on, the contribution which Canada made was too late.

> Liberty is not a word,
> But is a substantial thing,
> A precious jewel, purchased
> At the dear rate of life itself,
> And so to be defended.

Those words were written three hundred years ago by two English dramatists, and they bear the stamp of eternal truth.

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to follow in general or in any detail the remarks of the gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Stirling). I should like however to say this, that no person could cavil or complain in any way of the speech which the hon. gentleman has just made. I feel that I am in a privileged position to be able immediately to congratulate him upon a temperate, kindly and thoroughly gentlemanly speech such as, of course, one would expect and has a right to expect from the front benches of the opposition party.

There is perhaps a particular reason for not taking up in detail the remarks of the hon. gentleman. The reason is that his remarks were by no means a severe criticism of the government. Indeed it seems to me that the fact that so prominent a member of the Conservative party spoke in the manner in which he did just now, indicates that this government has been doing a mighty fine job of work in leading this country in its war effort. Such criticisms as the hon. gentleman offered were on comparatively minor points, and there cannot be much wrong when one of his calibre can find practically nothing to criticize. The government, in other words, is somewhat in the position of the chap who gave the name of the chief of police as a character reference. The chief of police when asked about the man, said that he did not even know him. Referring to the chief's comment, the man retorted, "Having lived thirty years in the city, and the chief of police not even knowing me, I must be all right."

There is, however, one remark made by the hon. gentleman to which I should like to draw attention. He said, as I recall it, that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) made certain statements in the house with reference to Bren gun production, and that these statements were of a very general nature; but that a few days later, speaking to the press, he elaborated upon them and gave to the press information which he held back from this house. With all respect, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman is in error. If you will turn to page 149 of Hansard you will note what the minister said at that time with reference to Bren guns. I think the hon. gentleman will find upon inquiry that what was later reported in the newspapers was merely a different rendering of the same information which the minister gave the house, and that the minister did not withhold information from us and then, going outside and meeting the gentlemen of the press, give them more details. What was said on page 149 runs this way:

> Regarding Bren guns; I have given my hon. friend the number up to the end of September. I am not giving the number delivered each week, but it is a figure which I must say is most satisfactory having regard to what was planned on when production started at the plant. These weekly deliveries are increasing steadily and by the end of the first year of production we expect to have three times as many guns delivered as were called for by the contract.

From there on, you see, it is a matter of arithmetic. The note I have indicates that the contract called for about 1,000 from April first this year to March 31 of the next year. It will be seen, therefore, that the minister, in giving his statement to the house in the fashion that he did, simply left it to the press to apply arithmetic to the problem and then the reporters could give a very definite statement to the country. It may well appear that the minister was more definite with the press than he was with the house, but that, I think was not the case, and I suggest that the hon. member was mistaken in his criticism in this regard.

So far as the general effort of this government is concerned, I have read somewhere that it might be described as a series of brilliant improvisations, and that incredible results have been achieved. I do not know whether that is an accurate statement, having regard to the use of the word "improvisations"; perhaps it is not properly used. We were not prepared at the time of the break through in the low countries and the collapse of France, and I do not see very well how any country, in all the circumstances of democratic life, could have been prepared. The speeding of plans was necessary, and in that sense we can, I think, appropriately say that there has been a series of brilliant improvisations. So far as I am concerned, and chiefly because I am not a person who is very easily satisfied, I wish to offer my meed of praise for the work of the government in leading this country, particularly during this last six or seven months since the debacle to which I have just referred. I do not intend simply to chant a paean of praise, yet since I am not, as I have said, a person easily satisfied, I do not wish to let the opportunity pass of expressing praise of the government, because I believe it is justified. I do this in the same straightforward manner that, as this house knows very well, I would quickly express criticism if I thought that it was what the government, or any other organization, deserved.

To-day I wish to speak mainly about problems and points of interest concerned with labour matters in the country generally, but before doing so there are some non-labour matters which I should like to mention.

In the first place I desire to add my voice to the voices of others who have spoken in favour of free transportation for the troops at Christmas time. It does not seem to me that half fare or fare one way for the man on furlough is sufficient. When something is offered which does not accomplish the result aimed at, it is just the same as offering nothing at all. Men who are distant from their homes cannot, because of lack of funds, go home and back during the Christmas furlough. There is no use offering them half fares. I suppose they could go home and then be brought back as deserters, but none of them wants to do that. It seems to me that there has been already enough expression of opinion along this line; practically ninety per cent of the house must be in favour of free transportation for soldiers, and I urge the government to see that justice is done and joy is given at Christmas time.

There is one other non-labour matter which I wish to draw to the attention of the house and, more particularly, to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald). The minister was here a few minutes ago, but had to leave to attend to some departmental duties; I know that what I am saying will have his attention later. It is, it seems to me, an odd situation of which I wish to speak. It appears that the rules with reference to a wife's allowance are quite different in the navy from what they are either in the air force or in the army. When a man in either of the last two mentioned services gets married, automatically his wife receives $35 per month allowance. Not so, apparently, in the navy. It seems there is a rule that the allowance will not be paid to any officer or rating married on or after November 1, 1928, unless and until he has attained the age of twenty-two years. An informant writes me:

> Is it not an irony to ask the boys of Canada to fight for freedom and justice when we refuse them that at home? What difference does the age make? If a man of nineteen is old enough to fight for Canada, should his wife be left to starve while he is doing it?

I must say I heartily agree with my correspondent's point of view. My informant also tells me of a man under twenty-two years of age who received permission of his superior officer to marry; he believed that the allowance would go to his wife, but her allowance has not been paid and will not be paid.

The rule, as I have explained, is that if a man gets married when he is under twenty-two years of age the wife gets no allowance. The rule was passed in 1928, and it occurs to me that perhaps the navy is endeavouring to carry on the old tradition that a sailor boy should have a girl in every port. That might be interfered with if Jack were encouraged to marry. I do not know whether that is the reason for the rule but I can think of no other. The rule that the wife of a young man under twenty-two who marries with permission is to get no allowance ought to be changed at once. The wives of men in one force should get the same treatment as wives of men in the other forces. If it is not desired to have naval officers and ratings marry under twenty-two that could be the subject of a regulation, but if they are to be permitted to marry then this government should take the responsibility that it ordinarily takes for the wife of the enlisted man.

I now wish to touch upon some labour problems that have come to my attention. Frankly I am presenting one or two cases that are in the nature of grievances. I make no apology for doing so; nor do I present the grievances in any spirit of captious criticism or complaint. But if the friends of a government will not tell it of the things that are wrong there is little chance of the government correcting them, and abuses will continue, to the detriment finally of the whole country.

Some of the instances I desire to mention relate to the government as an employer. I recall the oft-used expression that the government should be a model employer and so be an example to other employers. We like consistency. We passed an act popularly known as the Lemieux act and put into effect a labour charter which is set forth in an order in council of last June. The principles of this type of labour legislation should be the guiding star of the government itself as an employer. But we have people working in the government service at salaries that are certainly less than fair. We have some, indeed, working for niggardly salaries and starvation wages. I do not say that the percentage is large, but in government employment, where the total number employed is so great, a large number are working for what is not by any means a fair wage. One man I know of, a married man with a family of three or four, has been regularly employed at a man's job—not a boy's job—for the last four or five years, and his net wage is $56 a month. His is not just an isolated case but is one of a class, and that is the wage that is being paid. This sort of thing is not fair. When we are at war there is all the more reason for seeing that injustices of this kind are not allowed to continue.

Again we have persons employed by the government on what is termed the seven-day week basis rather than the six-day week. For years we have seen nearly all the world on a six-day week basis, but we have, and have had for years, at Fort Osborne barracks, firemen and other men working in high-pressure plants on a seven-day week basis and getting less money for seven days than the ordinary wage paid elsewhere for six days. I tried to get the matter straightened out some time ago. I had at that time the support of the late Hon. Mr. Rogers, who as Minister of Labour realized it to be a concern of his. I had the support, I believe, of the then Minister of National Defence, the present Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie). Everything seemed to be going along all right until our attempts bogged down or were broken down in the treasury board. Now it seems to me that that sort of thing is, as Mr. Rogers recognized, a proper matter of concern for the Department of Labour. It seems to me to be the business of the Department of Labour to inquire into labour abuses; and they should look at labour conditions that are close at home as well as those far afield.

We still have our unemployment problem. I have spoken about the war effort of Canada, and I had in mind the Department of Munitions and Supply; I might just say a word with reference to that department. I have been in entire agreement with the policy followed so far by the Minister of Munitions. I realize that in the placing of contracts he had to consider practically just one thing—speed of performance. The need was urgent; the pressing need was to get deliveries, even though it resulted in centralization of industrial work in these central provinces, chiefly Ontario. Even though the policy resulted in very little war work going out to the prairies and other parts of Canada I am in entire agreement with what has been done, and I think that the minister of that department and all concerned with it are to be congratulated. But the situation has now reached the point where certain other principles can be taken into consideration.

The social aspect of these contract placements should be recognized. In my own district we have all manner of industries that could be put to use in war work. Some of them are being used, but they could be used a great deal more. It is not economic to be paying out money for unemployment relief and at the same time placing contracts without reference to the social needs of the country. This is the time to attack what has been called the "hard core" of unemployment. Nobody knows just what the hard core of unemployment is; someone coined that bright phrase, it seemed clever and many people took it up and used it as though they were saying something. Then people began to define the hard core of unemployment, and it turned out that whenever unemployment had been reduced to a point that the particular individual considered satisfactory, the hard core of unemployment had been reached and there was nothing further to be done. But we can dissolve the hard core of unemployment if we turn our attention to it, if we face up to the problem and devote to it the necessary time and money and energy, and, above all, imagination. There is no reason for any unemployment in this country to-day. I know there are many persons on relief whom it is difficult to absorb into industry, but something can be done for all. I have known workmen's compensation boards to spend money upon people who appeared to be totally incapacitated through injuries, and who were therefore unemployed. This, these boards did for financial reasons, to avoid further drain on their funds. They endeavoured to rehabilitate these apparent unemployables and restore to them their ability to earn a living. And most important of all, though perhaps this was incidental as far as the boards were concerned, they restored to these people the dignity which is possible only in conjunction with an earned living, which cannot exist when there is involuntary idleness coupled with a subsistence allowance.

I wish to speak now of another very critical labour problem of a different sort. The hon. member who preceded me touched upon this problem but did not enlarge upon it to any great extent. From what little he said, however, I am inclined to think that we are in entire agreement on the matter. I am definitely worried, Mr. Speaker, over the possibility of a labour crisis in this country in spite of the fact that we have an unemployment problem at this moment. Indeed it would be possible to have a labour crisis, by way of a shortage, and at the same time have an unemployment problem. It seems paradoxical, but theoretically it is possible. At any rate I do not think any person can observe what is going on in the midlands of England without becoming fearful in regard to the labour situation in Canada. Just after the bombing of Coventry, for example, I noticed in the New York Times that certain United States industries were expecting special calls to be made upon them in reference to either Rolls-Royce engines, which apparently they were manufacturing, or perhaps similar aeroplane engines which might be substituted for the Rolls-Royce engines. The inference is clear. Evidently that engine plant in Coventry had been damaged.

For the last year or so the Winnipeg Free Press has had an excellent reporter in England. This reporter, Mr. Francis Stevens, recently returned to Canada. Within the last few days I read one of his stories, from which I culled this paragraph:

> After what happened to Coventry and the horror heaped upon a midlands city last night by the nazi air force, we know without being told that Britain must turn to Canada as never before for sustaining strength in her lonely struggle to save civilization.

Of course what Mr. Stevens means is that in all probability Britain will have to turn to Canada to a greater extent than ever before for her supplies of munitions of war. In the past we have sometimes spoken of ourselves as the empire's bread basket. I fancy we are becoming, and shortly will become even more fully, the arsenal of the empire. I know, as I think we all know, that Great Britain has been facing difficulties in regard to labour shortages, and it is inevitable that we shall have the same difficulties unless we make the necessary preparations.

For example, if we inquire into the employment trend in this country it becomes clear that there must be a labour crisis. When we see the employment trend we are forced to realize that we are marching straight into the jaws of such a crisis. In the Financial Post of three or four weeks ago the development was shown. It was set forth that as of last September there were 2,717,000 persons gainfully employed in Canada. That was the peak employment up to that time. The figure for the previous September was about 26 per cent less. The monthly average for 1939 was 2,344,000, very much less; and for the previous year the monthly average was 2,297,000. If you were to indicate that labour trend by means of a graph you would draw a line not merely upward but sharply upward, with no variations, no dips or jumps or anything of the sort; it would be very nearly a straight upward line.

I know that recently the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) spoke as though there were no difficulties, though a short time previously it had been indicated in the house that the government was taking steps in regard to the matter. Some persons jumped to the conclusion that there was a difference of opinion. Some people feel that this is a time for sharp retorts to the Minister of Agriculture, in the hope of being able to register a blow in verbal combat. Well, there is no need for anything of that sort. It is very silly to behave in that fashion. The fact of the matter is that we can be facing this crisis and at the same time have difficulties presented by employers of labour such as the minister mentioned. Everyone knows the tendency of the employer to object to any interference with his personnel, and no doubt many employers cry before they are hurt and make all kinds of trouble. I do not mean to say that is the general rule, but there are persons like that in every walk of life. There is no need to get over-argumentative about a thing of this sort.

A few moments ago I mentioned certain figures suggesting the trend. If you look at the enlistment figures you come to the same conclusion. We might say that just before the war our forces numbered perhaps 4,500. I have not the exact figures showing the number of men in our forces at the end of the first year of war, as I was able to give them in dealing with the number of persons gainfully employed, but I take it that at the present time there are about 170,000 men in the army, 30,000 in the air force—these figures may not be exact, but I think they are approximate, and after all I am only indicating a trend—and a few days ago it was said that in the navy there were something like 15,000 men. To these figures must be added about 30,000 trainees. This last is a changing personnel, but that is about the number. This gives a total of about 245,000 persons who have been taken out of the possible employment pool. So you might say that since the war started, in the neighbourhood of half a million people either have been put to work or have been taken away from the pool of men from which workers come. Of course if that sort of thing goes on and we do nothing about it we shall have to refrain from setting up industries that otherwise we might desire to set up.

It is not only the matter of a general labour shortage that we must consider; it is the shortage of particular kinds of labour. Perhaps we have not been as wise as we might have been since September, 1939. We should have paid more attention to what General McNaughton said the day after war broke out. He declared then that the war would be one of machines, and that it was vitally important not to deprive industry of certain skilled types of man-power on whom the rapid expansion of production depended. He wanted to set up a list of essential industries, and also a list of reserve occupations. Anyone can understand not a great deal being done in this respect during the hectic days we have gone through, but it would be folly of the worst imaginable kind if we were to continue in error.

As the house probably knows, Great Britain has been having considerable trouble of this sort. The Right Hon. Ernest Bevin some time ago warned employers against living in a fool's paradise. He said he was reluctant to make training obligatory, but that it might be necessary. Under his direction, as long ago as last February, organizations were set up for the training of men. There were 15,000 being trained at that time. The Economist reported that a longer time was needed to train a munitions worker than to train a soldier, and claimed that the government would turn out about 40,000 in the year. Just at that time, however, it appeared that the Germans were carrying on a similar training, and that they had already trained a half million workers for war industry. Mr. Churchill declared there was need for about a million women to go into industry. Great Britain now realizes she made a late and inadequate start. We are still later, and we must give the problem our most serious attention.

As I see it, we should begin at once with comprehensive and intensive training of people for industry. The best way to do this is to have people employed while they are learning. In that way we will get better learners and better results. National registration cards offer an excellent basis for this effort. Then, there are many people employed at the present time in non-essential industries who could be employed elsewhere. They could be employed in more essential walks of life. For example there are some who are driving trucks. I am not suggesting that the driving of trucks is not essential, but many who are so employed could do work which is more essential. There are many thousands who could fill their places.

It is my recollection that at the time of the last war a great deal of the automobile driving was done by women.

It seems to me, too, that there are industries now operating which need not continue to operate, and whose workers might be better employed, from the national viewpoint, in a war industry. The easiest way to effect that transfer is to carry out the sound Liberal policy which many of us have advocated for years, namely, to let in goods from Great Britain. Now is the time when the advocate of low tariffs has all the force of the war on his side—the first time it has ever happened. I suggest that those who are making in Canada goods which could be obtained from Great Britain could be released for other more essential work.

Furthermore—although this is somewhat aside from the point I am making—the great need in Great Britain to-day is that of obtaining foreign exchange. She must sell her goods, and she could sell large quantities of them in Canada if we would only let them in more easily. If we freely admit British goods, Great Britain will then be able to pay for many things obtainable in Canada, and it seems to me possible that she would thus create a credit which could be used in the United States. That she needs this financial aid is clear. The press of yesterday reports that Lord Lothian has returned to the United States stating that in 1941 Great Britain is going to face a severe financial crisis. He is asserting to the people of the United States that Great Britain needs financial help. The very best thing we can do for Great Britain is to permit her to send her goods to Canada, and in that way while helping her we will help ourselves to solve our labour problem.

I do not wish to leave the suggestion that nothing is being done about this problem, because I know very well that a good committee has been set up by the government to look into the matter. My only reason for emphasizing the point is to urge upon the government that it, through that committee, and in every other way prosecute its inquiry to a point where it may with all speed and all energy take the necessary steps.

The government is to be commended for what it has done, and I just hope that there may be no slackening—I do not expect any—in its effort.

It is perfectly true to say that we have not been ready for several things which have happened, and we were in good company in that state of unreadiness. Probably it was impossible for any democracy to be ready. But the situation now is different. We can see our problem looming up in front of us. Here is something for which we can be ready; here is something we can do. When the time comes for us to answer the call of Great Britain for more industrial assistance, we can be ready to give it.

It will be remembered that during the last war Lloyd George went about the country organizing industry. I can well remember his stating that he feared Britain might have to write over the doors of factories the words "Too late; too late." We must not be found in that position.

For about twenty years I worked on railroads in one capacity or another. During that time I performed a variety of jobs. Sometimes I have tried to decide just what it was that was most desired in a railroader, and I have come to the conclusion that a good railroader is one who is in the right place at the right time. "In the right place at the right time"—that might very well be our motto in connection with the problem I have been dealing with. Let us hope that, representing the people of Canada, the government will be in the right place at the right time in connection with our industrial help to Great Britain, and if this is so, we shall never be too late.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am sure every hon. member realizes that this is a grave time through which we are passing. We in Canada should be as well aware of that fact as any other people in the world.

I believe some of the criticisms and suggestions offered by the two hon. members who have immediately preceded me in the debate are worthy of consideration by the government, but I was struck by the implication of the statement of the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) that the people of Canada are only too anxious to do what they can in connection with the war effort. Then I recall what the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) said a few days ago—that there was a feeling of dissatisfaction and uncertainty throughout Canada. Perhaps "uncertainty" would be the most correct word to use. I am quite in accord with that opinion. As I said last year, you cannot force people into patriotism. I think we are beginning to realize that. The sooner we get down to basic facts, the sooner we ask ourselves why there is such a lack of patriotism, the better it will be for all. Let us not pat ourselves on the back. We must face this thing sooner or later.

The answer is that the people do not know what to do. They do not know what the government wants them to do. There is no leadership. I do not mean that in any offensive way; I would not offend hon. members for the world. But I ask them to listen to reason. I can remember the laugh that went up from the other side of the house when I suggested two or three years ago that we should have one of the best equipped air forces in the world. But I defy those hon. members to stand up in their places to-day and laugh at that—or say it is a joke.

The people do not know what the government want them to do. The other day the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) told us that we should save. Everyone is advocating a belt-tightening process, just like the hon. member for Yale. What does he mean by belt-tightening? There is no policy laid down. The people are given no guidance. If you say to the people, "We do not want you to buy cars," I venture to say that there will not be a new car sold. But if you do not want them to buy cars the proper thing to do is to say to the manufacturers, "Do not make any more cars; we want your machine shops to produce war materials." Why attempt to advocate these things by a process of undue taxation and then have new cars in the show windows advertised at reduced prices or with the slogan, "Buy a car before Christmas to satisfy your wife."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I hope my wife does not read that. But the thing is so ridiculous. On the one hand we have the manufacturers trying to encourage people to buy; the people are told to "buy before Christmas, fifty cents down and a dollar when we catch you." Anything to get them to buy before Christmas. On the other hand, we have the government stealing in with their taxation and taking the money away from the people. Will such a course lead to unity and satisfaction? Certainly not. If you do not want our women to buy new fur coats, the thing to do is to stop the manufacture of fur coats. If these manufacturing facilities are needed for war purposes, why not be man enough to say so? If you want more aeroplanes, be man enough to say so. Come out and face the facts; do not try to hide behind political seclusion.

See what happened to France. It was the financial policy that ruined France. France was sold out not by those whom we generally refer to as fifth columnists in the rank and file of the people, but by those in higher places. We must guard against this, or we shall have trouble in Canada. I am sure the people are only too anxious to do what they can, if they only knew what was needed. The government must give guidance to the people. If that is done, I am sure they will respond.

I do not intend to dwell at any great length this afternoon on our war effort; I shall deal with it at a later time. I desire to speak more particularly about our farmers. The hon. member for New Westminster said that he did not know what was causing dissatisfaction among our people, but if he looks in our agricultural field he will find plenty of cause for dissatisfaction. There are no more patriotic people in the world than our agriculturists. As the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) said the other day—he is gone again; he is not in his seat; he is the busiest man I ever saw; he flutters around and does not do a thing; our farmers have been contributing a great deal to the war effort. Yet there is no industry in Canada which has been treated so unfairly. Is it expected that that will be a basis for unity? You cannot get unity with that type of treatment.

Our farmers are at a loss to know what to do. Again the government is lacking in providing the necessary guidance. About a year ago the Minister of Agriculture advocated the increased production of bacon, and immediately the farmers gave it to him because he had asked for something definite. They said: If it is bacon the British empire wants, we will give it to them. Then what happened? There was an influx of bacon from the United States; the price dropped and the farmers got stung. The country wanted wheat and the farmers went ahead and produced wheat. What has happened? They are starving to death on the farms. Again there has been a lack of guidance.

Either the government do not know what they want, or they are deceiving the people. In either case they have no right to be leading this country during war time unless they have something better than that to offer. If the government will decide what they want, I am convinced that the farming people of this country will be only too ready to share the burden. It seems to me that every time the Minister of Agriculture gets in a jam, if he cannot pass it on to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) he looks ahead to the future. He seems to be most optimistic about the future. He can look ahead and say that in five years we will be short 50,000,000 bushels of wheat.

Mr. MacNICOL: He is counting on a couple of years of drought.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): He is waiting for Santa Claus. If we are going to be short 50,000,000 bushels of wheat in five years, which is not very long, then we should not be greatly concerned over our wheat problem. The only thing lacking is the money. The other day the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said that whatever was physically possible would be made financially possible. I do not know whether he meant that; the government have said so many things they did not mean. It is hard to tell just what they want. I do not think there is any danger to us in our present large supply of wheat. In fact, I think it is one of the most beneficial things we could have at the present time. We have no assurance that we are not going to have a drought in the west next year, or the year after. If that were to happen, then what would be the position of the British empire? It might prove to be one the greatest calamities for this country or the empire.

I should like to refer briefly to a pamphlet entitled "Wheat and War," and containing an address by George S. Mathieson, president of the Winnipeg grain exchange. Here is what this experienced grain man has to say in regard to our supplies of wheat:

> The maintenance of this substantial reserve of wheat can well be one of Canada's contributions to the empire war requirements.

There is definite guidance for the farmer. He is being encouraged by an experienced grain man to raise wheat. Mr. Mathieson continues:

> The price ultimately to be paid for it is a matter to be determined by world conditions when the demand comes. The picture, which envisages Canada with so much wheat that she does not know what to do with it, ignores the necessity of abundant reserves against contingencies. The wheat board, fully aware of this situation, need not be expected to offer for sale any more wheat than is actually wanted.

That is good advice. I think we are unduly concerned about the vast amount of wheat that we have on hand. We should be tickled to death with it. But the fact that we happen to have an abundance of wheat is no reason why we should force our farmers to starve to death. There is one thing which neither this nor any other government can control, and that is the future climatic conditions. The big cry goes up from the government, where shall we find the money? But there has never been any question about money when it comes to the war industries. The war industries get what profit they want. I recall that we passed legislation limiting profits to five per cent, but that legislation was rescinded and you do not know what profit is allowed now. They are getting what they want. The farmer, however, is definitely making no profit, and when you come to the point where you are making no profit but are going behind on every bushel of wheat you raise, it is time to take stock of things. I think a little consideration should be given to this subject.

[Mr. C. E. Johnston.]

As I said a moment ago, the Minister of Agriculture can always find some nice excuse out, and sometimes a fine speech is about all he has to offer. I have a clipping here from the Albertan of September 10, 1940. The Minister of Agriculture was speaking at Toronto, and these were his words of encouragement to the farmers:

> Giving his address at the live stock day luncheon at the Canadian National Exhibition, Mr. Gardiner addressed his preliminary remarks to farmers and said he had "unpopular" statements to make.
> The first was that "this is not the time for the farmer to increase his expenditures and hence not the time for business to be booming in agricultural areas."

If he was seeking to imply that business was booming in agricultural areas he does not know his agriculture, although he may have had a farm given to him by the Saskatchewan government and may go out there for his vacations. If business is booming for the farmer the minister certainly does not know agriculture, because business has never been booming for the farmer. But the minister went on to say this, which appears under the heading "Sees tough winter ahead"—and here again he is a prophet:

> Experience had shown that farmers never enjoyed prosperity in the first two years of a war and "this winter and possibly the next will be the toughest the farmers are likely to experience during this war period."

That is not a pleasant prospect. Farmers all over the west found it pretty hard this year to make ends meet, let alone pay their debts, and the only consolation the Minister of Agriculture has to give them is that next winter is going to be still worse. More of the belt-tightening process, and he expects by that to develop unity across Canada!

But the minister had a little more advice to give to the farmers. I have here a clipping from the Albertan of September 14, 1940, in which the minister is reported as follows:

> World wheat marketing conditions may change between now and November 1, Agriculture Minister J. G. Gardiner to-day told a press conference—

November is come and gone and conditions are still the same, but the minister hoped they would be better before November 1. The report goes on:

> —and it is possible the government may delay until the end of October—

So he put it off again!

> —its decision on how to help the wheat farmer who cannot turn his crop into cash because of lack of elevator space.

He finds himself in a difficulty and so he tries to wriggle out of it by putting the onus on the provinces, thereby satisfying his own conscience. So he brings up this obstacle, and I thought this was rather good. Under the heading "Laws a barrier", the report goes on:

Provincial laws, Mr. Gardiner explained to-day, regulate the deductions when loans are made on wheat on farms. The threshing bill, the year's taxes, the accounts for repairs and for necessities of life must all be taken care of.

In this article the Minister of Agriculture complains that because of these obstacles the government cannot make loans to the farmers on wheat stored on the farms. I looked at the article again and I thought, what more would he want in there? There is provision in the provincial laws with respect to the threshing bill, the year's taxes, the accounts to be paid for repairs, and the necessities of life. The only things missings are the machine companies and the banks. The only objection the minister can have is that the banks and the mortgage companies were not protected by provincial legislation, and so provincial legislation should be changed. Well, Mr. Speaker, when we take the attitude that the farmer is not entitled to a decent standard of living I think the Minister of Agriculture who implies such a thing should be taken from agriculture and put into another office. He goes on and says:

I was told the law was so and so, and I replied that some laws could be changed by calling legislatures.

Why would you want to call the legislatures together to change such a law? Legislatures would not be worthy of the name if they assembled in the different provinces and took away from the farmers that measure of protection which is so necessary.

But the Minister of Agriculture has a rather soft spot in his heart, I was pleased to see. I was reading Hansard the other day and what he said was so touching that, knowing him as I do, I think I should read it to the house. He said, as reported at page 95 of Hansard:

I shall continue to fight the battles of the farmers of Canada. No adding to or taking away from duties or prestige will remove my life-long association with and love for farmers and farming.

That love for the farmers was so very touching, Mr. Speaker, that I thought then we should advise the Prime Minister to relieve the Minister of Agriculture of his many portfolios and give him another one entitling him to be called the minister of romance, because he has such a loving heart.

Mr. BRADETTE: That is not even witty.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It does not seem witty to the farmers who are living out there in poverty and starvation to have that sort of stuff put up to them as a policy. I agree one hundred per cent that that certainly would not appeal to the farmers in the situation they are faced with now. Is it any wonder that—

Mr. BRADETTE: I mean that you are not witty.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): You do not need to put yourself up as a wit.

Mr. BRADETTE: How about the social credit dividend?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The government will have to come to the social credit policy before very long. Make no mistake about that.

Then we have another beautiful picture with reference to the storage problem. I bring this question up, not for the purpose of saying something which has already been said, but because I believe we are going to have a more acute storage problem on our hands next year than we have now. I can see quite clearly from the government's handling of the storage problem this year that we are heading into a very dangerous situation.

This problem of storage came up in the house last session. The whole question was thoroughly threshed over, but the government had no policy to offer, no solution to propose. They went blindly on until they came up against the situation we now face. The farmers were promised storage. Assurance was given that some sort of storage would be given to the farmers. The farmer himself was asked, probably indirectly, to provide some storage for his grain and the farmers in my own community deserve a great deal of credit for the way in which they attempted to provide as best they could their own storage facilities. Some of them even used parts of their homes as granaries. Others went out and constructed a rude type of granary with wire and sheaves, and others just had to pile it on the ground, it was left there and the rains came and a great deal of it was spoiled. But they did their share, anyway.

To add to the difficulties of the farmers in regard to storage of the 1939 crop, the price of lumber—most unfairly, I think—went up considerably. I admit that there was a scarcity of lumber because the government needed it for their war effort, but there was no need or justification for the increase in the price. If an article is scarce, the obvious thing to do is set the price; but that was not done, and the farmer was put to a greater expense in order to meet the requirements of the government, because it was the government that asked the farmers to provide storage.

Another unfair aspect of the thing was that, while the elevator companies were given their storage right away, the farmers did not receive their storage until three weeks afterwards. One would almost be tempted to think that this government was working for the interests of the elevator companies and the big concerns and disregarding the farmers. I read not so long ago an article in which it was stated that the elevators were guaranteed storage for eighteen months. The farmer never has been guaranteed his storage on the 1939 crop; in fact he is not going to be allowed to get very much storage, because no advance payment is to be made on the wheat. So that if he wants cash—and he is very badly in need of cash—he has to take his grain to the elevator. By this process the elevator companies will keep their elevators filled to the roof, and they are guaranteed the storage for the length of time mentioned. We all know that last year they made something like $15,000,000 from storage. Some of that $15,000,000 would have been a fine contribution to the farmers if it could have come to them this year.

Remember, too, that though the farmer was not given storage, the elevator companies are guaranteed storage, so they are going to keep their elevators filled and they will make as much money out of storage this year as they did last year.

I was looking the other day at the issue of Monetary Times for October 26, 1940, and I ran across this:

> On the other hand, there is a large grain crop and carryover which the banks have been financing. From August to November, 1939, current loans were up $147,000,000 mainly on this account.

I want you to notice the next statement:

> As long as the elevators remain full, this branch of the banks' business will not suffer.

So that there are two reasons why the elevators will be kept filled: first, that the banks shall make a profit; second that the elevator companies shall get again this year profits of $15,000,000. That is no way to treat the farming community, and it is no way to assure unity in this country. You play directly into the hands of the big concerns and let the little fellow go.

What will be the situation so far as next year's crop is concerned? I can quite well see that when the elevators are filled next year and there is another crop coming on, this government will appeal to the farmers to build granaries, though they will have lost the storage for 1939 and a share of the 1940 crop. Is that fair dealing? The elevators will have been filled by that time; they will remain full right through the period of the war, and the obligation will again be thrown upon the farmer to provide the storage, although he will have no guarantee that he is going to make anything out of it. If that is conducive to unity and patriotism, I cannot see it.

Last year there was some talk here about advancing payment to the farmer for his crop held in storage, but nothing was done about it. It was not an oversight; the Minister of Trade and Commerce knew at that time that this situation was going to arise; for he said this, as reported in Hansard, 1940, page 2252:

> Unless something is done to make available to the farmer more money than, owing to elevator capacity conditions, he can obtain from his first deliveries, there will be widespread suffering, and there would be widespread necessity for relief.

The minister is to be commended at least for his foresight. He knew that that condition was coming. So did the rest of the cabinet know; they could not help but know it. Yet what was done? Always procrastination; always leaving until tomorrow what should be done to-day; no policy; no direction. Here was the situation, quite clearly known to at least one cabinet minister last year, but nothing was done. Apparently the whole thing fell down because there was no money.

Quite amusing things happen when one speaks of this question of money. I recall when the wheat committee of the cabinet was sitting here last year after the house closed, the government called in the experts to handle this wheat situation. Among the experts whom they called were bankers, and quite properly so. If you want grain raised you go to the farmers. If you want lumber you go to the lumbermen. If you want money you go to the bankers. They claim they are controlling money; they should be the ones to provide it. On this point I want to read an extract from the address of Mr. G. S. Mathieson, president of the grain exchange:

> The problem of providing funds, where necessary, for the erection of storage buildings on the farm and to make loans against grain stored on the farm, would appear primarily to be a responsibility of the Canadian banks, whose business it is, under certain limitations, to lend money.

So the government did right in calling in the bankers. But what did the bankers tell them? They said, "Well now, listen; you fellows have got us all wrong. We did not come here to give you money; we came to give you only advice." So they were turned away and again the farmer was left to shift for himself.

We come now, Mr. Speaker, to the matter of next year's crop. I think we should be given guidance by this government as to their policy in relation to the coming crop. This is necessary, it seems to me, if for nothing more than to attempt to ensure unity throughout the country. The prospects of the farmer are very poor indeed. The Minister of Agriculture's great love for the people is not going to get them food to eat next year, nor will it put clothes on the children's backs; and I am sure that the minister has no intention of doing either of those things.

We have suggested that the government take over the storage; in fact we have on the order paper a resolution which reads:

Whereas the system of wheat storage on the farms is quite inadequate and will not prove efficient in the years to come;

And whereas it is quite inequitable to ask the farmers to build or provide their own storage facilities:

Therefore be it resolved,—That, in the opinion of this house, the federal government itself be urged to make provision by the erection and/or purchase of storage facilities and accept delivery of wheat when tendered.

Now is the time when the government should be concerning themselves about storage for next year's crop. If they do not they are going to have the same difficulty they are finding this year, and there will not be any more satisfactory solution, because they will not be ready. What is the use of waiting until next year to start this enterprise of building up storage? Are we going to wait and pay the elevator companies another $15,000,000? Why not use that money to construct storage facilities? I can well remember the Minister of Agriculture making the remark a year or so ago that if the government were going into the wheat business and the wheat board were going to handle all the wheat, they would have to take over the storage facilities, and I think he was right. Then why does he not do something about the matter? There is no use in making these statements and then doing nothing about it.

The question of price has been raised. We have on the order paper another resolution dealing with the price of wheat. I want to put it on Hansard at this point in order to show what our attitude is. It reads:

Whereas the prices of farm machinery, all costs of living and farm wages have increased due to the war:

Therefore be it resolved,—that, in the opinion of this house, parliament should immediately take such steps as are necessary to ensure the farmers of Canada a fixed price of not less than one dollar per bushel for number one (1) northern wheat at their local elevator, on at least the first 2,000 bushels of the 1941 crop.

There is quite a variety of opinion on this question of price. I am glad to see that, as each session goes by, the government comes to the conclusion that the resolutions which we have put on the order paper have been almost right as to price. At the 1938 session we had a resolution at that time asking for a price of 95 cents a bushel at the local elevator, and the Minister of Agriculture made a great oration—he is wonderful at that anyway—pointing out that farmers should not get 95 cents a bushel for their wheat because the cost of production was 30 to 40 cents. On page 2623 of Hansard for April 5, 1939, the Minister of Agriculture had this to say with regard to price:

It has been proven over and over again that twenty bushels to the acre of wheat can be produced at a cost of from 30 to 40 cents a bushel.

Then I asked him:

What is the basis of that estimate of from 30 to 40 cents a bushel as the cost of production?

Mr. Gardiner: Estimates have been made by authorities in Saskatchewan university, and there are also the figures submitted by the Saskatchewan government to the Rowell commission.

So the minister was quite convinced at that time that 30 to 40 cents was the right price. But he had to change his mind. On page 102 of Hansard for November 14, 1940, he is reported as saying, and I should like the house to note this particularly:

It is generally admitted that 70 cents advance at Fort William, which nets the farmer about 50 cents a bushel, does not cover his total costs of production and therefore does not maintain him as a contented producer.

That is, a return of fifty cents a bushel on the farm does not cover the cost of production, yet in 1939 the minister said that 30 to 40 cents was adequate.

Why then does the minister not do something about the matter? Surely he does not expect farmers to raise wheat at 50 cents a bushel at their local elevators when there is no profit in doing so. Manufacturers of war supplies do not work on that basis; members of parliament do not; no one else in the country does, yet he is asking the farmer to raise wheat at less than the cost of production. First it was 30 cents, then 50 cents; would it not be a grand thing if the Minister of Agriculture would make up his mind?

This question has been discussed on many occasions and the government have frankly admitted that they are at a loss to know how to settle it. They have travelled all over the country trying to get suggestions. But they never got an answer to their difficulty until they went to Alberta. When they were in Alberta the provincial cabinet met the committee and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) when he was there with regard to this question, and gave him a written submission setting out how to handle the wheat problem. I have it here; it was reported in To-day and To-morrow in its issue of September 19 last. I read the last paragraph to show that one government at least has offered to help this government, but that offer was rejected:

> In persistently pressing for early action the Alberta government wishes to express once again its complete readiness to cooperate with the federal government in every possible way in dealing with the situation. Also, once more, the Alberta government reiterates its willingness to deal with the situation—

That is the wheat situation.

> —in this province along effective lines if the federal government, for its part, will undertake not to interfere with such action and, where it is necessary to invoke federal powers, to extend full facilities and cooperation to the Alberta government.

That is to say, the Alberta government has said to this government: We will handle the wheat situation ourselves if you will just give us the necessary cooperation. It is not an impossible situation, although the Minister of Agriculture may think it is. As he has handled it, it would appear so.

Just consider the difference in attitude between the Alberta government and the bankers when they met with the wheat committee in Ottawa. The bankers said to the government: We will give you nothing but advice. But this government out in Alberta, that has been so greatly criticized and run down, especially by this federal government say: We will take this wheat right off your hands if you will give the necessary cooperation. One would think that at a time like this, with the government faced with this wheat problem, this offer of cooperation for maximum war effort by the Alberta government would have been welcomed. But what did the federal government answer? Nothing. The farmers are not getting any money; the government have no policy for next year's crop; what a pleasant outlook! People are asking, "What do you want us to do? Tell us and we will do it."

The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) said the other day that in his province they are paying a dollar a bushel for No. 5 wheat for chicken feed. Yet the people in Alberta cannot sell their wheat, or when they do they get less than fifty cents a bushel for No. 1. Obviously there is something wrong. The people in British Columbia have apples; we in Alberta and Saskatchewan have no apples. How willingly we would trade wheat for apples. Yet we cannot do it. This is war time; people are starving; in Alberta and Saskatchewan people are suffering.

If we cannot settle these interprovincial troubles, how can we expect to settle the world problem? Let us start at home, rectify these wrongs, set our own house in order, and then it will be time to look for something bigger to solve. This problem can be solved if the government will only look to the basic cause of all their difficulties, namely, the financial trouble. But that is the one thing they overlook. I do hope the government will take this question seriously and see that this condition does not exist next year. I am sure it can be disposed of if they just make up their minds to do so.

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Victoria, B.C.): Mr. Speaker, since coming to this house I have tried to listen with an open mind to the arguments of our social credit friends. I have even gone so far as to read their literature, including the book written by their leader in this house, but this afternoon I have come to the conclusion that I have listened and read with a mind too open, simply drifting along. I am going to adopt the same attitude with regard to the anti-Gardiner speech to which we have just listened. I think most of the people of Canada recognize the value to this country of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), and will take the same position.

For two and a half weeks now we have been telling the world what we have been doing in connection with our war effort. I do not believe I would add to the discussion but for the fact that there never was a time in our history when there was so much to do and so little time in which to do it.

First, I wish to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne upon their fine speeches, because they set an example to the rest of us by keeping the discussion on a high plane. I believe that their example has been followed and that, for the most part, members on both sides of the house have tried to be constructive in what they have had to say.

I should like to refer particularly to the hon. gentleman who seconded the address (Mr. Jutras), and his appeal for understanding in dealing with the situation of the farmers in western Canada. I am interested, as all westerners are, in the success of western Canada. I have watched the growth of the west probably for longer than most members in this house; I have seen many of the sites now occupied by towns and cities, when they were bald-headed prairie. I know the people; I know something of what they have to put up with in carrying on farming, and I know that their success means the success of the rest of Canada. But, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that the wheat problem can be solved, or that the situation of agriculture generally can be improved, by any bonusing proposition. If you bonus wheat and raise the price, you only make it more difficult to produce some of the other commodities that should be raised from the wheat.

I think we can best assist the farmer, and in doing so assist ourselves as well, by doing what any business man does; that is, by deciding how much we need for ourselves and to meet the requirements of our best customers. To-day Canada has only one customer left—Great Britain. Her requirements, together with our own consumption, are estimated at approximately 275,000,000 bushels. Therefore I think Canada should buy, at a good price, and store the 275,000,000 bushels necessary to look after herself and her best customer. We have at the present time an obligation to look after the people of Great Britain. But I think it is the obligation of the farmer to look after the remainder of the wheat. I have always found that the safest man to trust for assistance is yourself. Neither the government nor your neighbour will look after you as well as you can look after yourself. I was born and brought up on a farm, and I think it would be good business and good farming practice to keep your own grain in your own granaries under your own control. Then you would be greatly tempted to feed some of that surplus grain to your own stock and thus convert your wheat into butter, eggs, bacon and live stock, thereby greatly increasing our own consumption.

If I may refer for a moment to a local matter, I should like to express our appreciation of the visits of four members of the cabinet to our riding during the recess. The invasion was led by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston). We never lacked confidence in him or in his ability, but that confidence was greatly increased after his short visit. Then we had a visit by the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power). That was really too much of a flying visit, but we have heard him speak and have seen him before, and our memories in that regard are still fresh. Then we had a visit from the newly appointed Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald), who wins confidence and friends wherever he goes. I believe it was only his second visit to the Pacific coast, but it was a timely and much appreciated visit. The fourth minister to visit us was our own Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), who comes and goes quite frequently.

I should like now to extend to another member of the cabinet, the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) an invitation to visit our city. The people of Victoria feel that they owe the minister a great debt because of the way in which he has kept Canada a unit. He interprets our viewpoint to the people of Quebec and interprets to us the viewpoint of that province, and only through a visit by him can we really show our appreciation of his great efforts.

Recently the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) paid a visit to eastern Canada. We hope he will be kind enough to visit western Canada and the city of Victoria. I think he will be surprised at what his ministers have accomplished for him and for Canada in the way of protection on the western coast. While he is there we may point out some possible improvements, because there are always improvements that may be made; but I assure you, Mr. Speaker, we are proud of the many things that have been done.

I should like to refer briefly, if I may, to the speech made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson). While my parliamentary experience may not be equal to his, possibly he will not object if I make reference to his observations because, after all, I do not believe there is much difference in the number of years we have served Canada. My observations, however, will not be critical; on the contrary I wish to compliment him on a statement which I suggest is to his credit and one with which I believe the people of Canada have been greatly pleased. He reached the high light in his address when he rededicated himself and his party to the support of the government's war effort. If there ever was a time when the people of Canada have been looking for those who were willing to forget party lines, to forget criticism and to offer constructive suggestions, surely that time is the present. My only regret is that he did not continue in his observations with an outline of his own programme for the prosecution of the war, so that we might have contrasted his suggestions with the effort which the government is now making. No doubt he will avail himself of an opportunity at some later time to present his suggestions.

May I refer to the speech, or possibly I should say the report of the Minister of Agriculture respecting his trip to the old country. We were greatly heartened when listening to what he had to say with regard to what is happening in Great Britain, and we were encouraged by his description of how the people in England are standing up under the terrific strain they are now being forced to endure. We were particularly interested in his attitude. He did not go to England with a price tag on our commodities—our wheat, our bacon, our cheese or our butter. Had he gone there with price tags he would have failed to appreciate the sentiments of the people of Canada. He did, however, go with a determination to find out how much of certain commodities the people of Great Britain wanted from Canada, and he left it for them to say what they were willing to pay. If that money is not sufficient to pay the farmer a reasonable price for his products, then I suggest that the difference should be made up by the general taxpayers throughout the country.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has a heavy burden indeed. The time is not yet ripe to say whether he is making a real success of his undertaking, but I should say he has made a splendid start, and would seem to be on the road to success. I should like to compliment him upon one action he has taken, namely, that of making it possible for people to pay their income tax over a period of eight months. He has instituted an arrangement whereby one-third of the income tax may be paid in the first four months, and the remaining two-thirds in the last four. That is an arrangement which I hope may be repeated on future occasions.

The government and the people should remember that profits are not always liquid. They are liquid only in an industry or a business that is in a state of semi-decay. If a business is progressive it can pay only out of it profits. As the profits are made they are placed back in the business. I am sure the Minister of Finance does not want to harm the development of industry, nor is he willing to accept in lieu of cash the products of any business. He must therefore exercise great care so as to avoid destroying entirely the goose that is laying the golden egg.

I know that the minister is going to look for more money, and that he must have it. I believe there are ways by which he can get it. I would suggest to him that he adopt a more vigorous campaign in connection with the sale of war savings stamps. In the purchase of war savings stamps we have in essence a programme of superannuation. We now have a plan whereby one may buy a superannuation certificate, but the handling of that plan costs a great deal of money. I suggest that through the purchase of war savings stamps there would be no unnecessary expense. May I suggest to the minister that instead of having the whole sum mature at the end of a seven-year period, he give the option of having the date of maturity set at the end of five, ten, fifteen or twenty years. Under such circumstances one might buy a superannuation certificate to suit his own requirements. I believe that a little encouragement, promotion and persuasion would induce many employers to purchase the first stamp, and possibly the last one, in order to help their employees.

With the exception of the necessity of running errands for our constituents, hon. members have not had very much of a practical nature to do in connection with the war effort. Here is a job, however, which might be undertaken by them. I believe that in our respective districts we might organize so as to produce much more than is now being derived from the sale of war savings stamps, and at the same time we might promote the idea of superannuation funds for everybody.

I have a further suggestion to make, that the minister continue the home improvement plan. While that plan has not obliterated the slums from our cities, I think it has prevented other districts from becoming slums. It has given our people an opportunity to own their own homes. After all, our home life is the corner-stone of our country. There are also rumours that he may discontinue the national housing scheme, but I hope they are not true. I hope he will make an announcement at an early date that this scheme will be continued, either in its present form or in some modified way which will be acceptable to the people. In the belief that this scheme is to be discontinued the people of Canada, particularly of western Canada, have been rushing to get their homes built in order to come under the plan. This has created in many districts a shortage of labour which is wholly unnecessary.

I have one other suggestion to make to the Minister of Finance. He seems to have an abundance of auditors going through the country. An auditor is a fine man to check on what has been done, but it is generally too late. I suggest that the minister adopt a policy of having more inspectors going round to prevent things from happening, rather than of having the details put down on paper after they have happened. I do not offer these suggestions in a critical way; I offer them from the observations I have made in my travels.

I consider that the address delivered the other day by the Prime Minister was a masterpiece. While he was at times optimistic, I read into his remarks a definite warning to the people of Canada that there was a terrific struggle ahead. He pictured the territory in the enemy's hands, all the shore line from the northern tip of Norway to Spain. He described what was back of that shore line, the resources of practically all of Europe with its generations of experience in engineering and manufacturing, all ready to attempt to wipe Great Britain off the map. Surely such a statement is not likely to lull one into a sense of false security; it was a definite warning to the people that they must bend themselves to greater effort.

I believe that the people of Canada should be told the truth at all times, no matter how black it may be. They should be told the truth without varnish. Only by being told the truth can we adjust our minds to the problem and our shoulders to the task and carry it through to completion. Canadians are not cowards. Canadians have faced difficult tasks in days gone by, and they are ready to face difficult tasks in the future. But they must know where they have to go.

During the recent election and during this session we have been told by our Prime Minister and other members of the government on more than one occasion that Canada's effort would be the utmost in human and material resources. I wonder whether we have reached that point? I compliment most sincerely the ministers of the different departments upon what they have accomplished. Recently I travelled from Victoria to Halifax; I visited many of the camps and the aeroplane fields; I saw both naval yards, and I inspected some of our industrial plants. With all that the ministers have told us, they have not yet conveyed to the people of Canada the complete picture of what has been accomplished. I shall not attempt in my feeble way to do what they have not done. I feel that the accomplishments are beyond the ability of any one to picture, but we have still a road to travel before we have put the utmost of our human and material resources into the defence of Great Britain.

So long as there are idle people in our communities; so long as there are idle machines in any part of Canada; so long as there are shipbuilding ways which are wholly or partly idle, we in Canada cannot say that we have thrown our utmost into this struggle. It was the most natural thing for the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), when he was in a hurry to get what he wanted, to go to the centre of industry to ask them for what he needed. I do not think anyone can find any fault with that, nor do I think anyone can find fault with the length of time it has taken the minister to tell industry what he wanted. I am satisfied that when the picture is put before us more clearly than it has been up to the present time, we shall be most proud of him. But the back-bone of the immediate need has been broken, and rather than have these activities centralized they should be spread through the whole country in order to give everyone an opportunity to express his patriotism in action.

As I speak, I think of the 75,000 tons of scrapiron now lying in the yards of British Columbia at a time when Beverley Baxter can describe in an article in a magazine how they came along and took the iron fence from in front of his place. Surely there ought to be some way of turning that scrapiron, and the 50,000 tons which will be produced annually in years to come, into steel to help in the prosecution of this war.

Speaking in this house last year, I said that I thought Canada should build at least fifty merchant ships in order that we might be able to take the products of this country to any part of the world. That suggestion did not raise even a ruffle in the house, but I am glad that it raised a little ruffle outside. I understand that Great Britain to-day is buying or having built in Canada eighteen such boats. We read that Lord Lothian when he landed in New York the other day said that Britain was drawing on all her resources and that her financial standing was becoming weak. But Canada, Mr. Speaker, has no debt owing to the United States; we are not in default. We can borrow money from the United States; we can lend it to Great Britain if we wish to, and we can produce the boats. The United States legislation does not apply to Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Their neutrality act prohibits it.

Mr. MAYHEW: I was referring to the Johnson act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is one act, but there is the neutrality act.

Mr. MAYHEW: Where there's a will there's a way.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree with that.

Mr. MAYHEW: I say that we in Canada should immediately take steps to build not only the eighteen boats Britain is asking us to build, but another thirty-two along with them, making the fifty originally mentioned in this house. Then we should be in quite a different position. To-day we are like a wheelbarrow without a wheel. We cannot transport our goods across the ocean. We grow our grain and make our munitions, and then we leave them on our doorstep and ask Britain to come and get them. That is not good enough. It is time that Canada stood on her own feet. Surely we have enough resources to do this. Only when we are doing our utmost can we truthfully say to our people that we have gone the limit.

This has been a comfortable war so far for us. Labour is better off, working longer hours and for better wages. Our merchants have never in years had as good a turn-over as they have had this year, and our manufacturers have never had a better year for keeping their plants going. It is the farmers and those who have lost their sons and daughters who have been doing most of the suffering. But our day will come, and it should come very shortly.

I speak now for the people of my own constituency, people who are predominantly British, people who belong to the oldest cities in Canada. Those who are Canadian-born may speak of the people in the homeland with a certain amount of sentiment, but when the people in my riding speak of the homeland they are thinking of their sons and their daughters and probably their fathers and mothers who are in Britain now suffering under the daily bombardment, and it is hard for the people in my riding to stand idly by and not be able to express their feelings in action.

I want to say just a word or two about our troops. I think the only thing is to treat our boys as humanely as possible. The best that you can spend on help is not merely the wages that you pay a man. It is the small things that you do afterwards which bring you and the man together as human beings. These are the things that produce results. So I say, to put it on the lowest possible basis, we should, if only for the sake of a better morale in our Canadian forces, see to it, if it is at all possible, that our soldiers are given at least one trip home before they embark for overseas.

I see that my time is about up, and I shall take the few minutes left to refer briefly to the forthcoming conference of premiers of the provinces to consider the Sirois report. I do not believe that these men who hold the confidence of the people of Canada are going to come to Ottawa with the case prejudged, having decided that they are not going to do this and that they are not going to do that. I think that as men of experience in public life they will sit down and consider on what points they agree, and that upon the points on which they cannot agree they will try to straighten out their differences in order to give us something definite, because on that report hangs a long-term policy for Canada, and it is time that we had a policy that was longer than any policy that has been given to us yet for the development of this country.

[Mr. Mayhew.]

I should like to see sitting, at the same time as the conference or before, another committee of reliable citizens of Canada to study what we can do for the rehabilitation of the boys who come back from the war and for the rehabilitation of those who have not been to the war and are unable to find employment. We must first of all have a clear understanding of what we can do and what we cannot do, and I think it is time that serious consideration be given to this question and that definite steps be taken so that the people will know just what is being done to meet the situation which is bound to arise. I know what it is, Mr. Speaker, to work in the lumber camps of Ontario. I know what it is to drive logs down the river. I know what it is to work on the railways. I know what it is to be without a job and without a nickel; and while, as I said before, and say again, the first one to depend on is yourself, I think it is time that we should now have a definite programme for the development of Canada.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ANTHONY HLYNKA (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, since the outbreak of the present war the problem of Canadian unity has been a subject of many discussions, but in my opinion it still remains a topic which warrants further consideration on our part at this time.

The mover of the address in reply to the speech from the throne (Mr. Claxton), the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson), and more particularly the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard), have made brief references to the part which Canadians of non-Anglo-Saxon origin play in our national life. I propose to discuss, further, other important phases of this subject which so far have hardly been mentioned.

There are two prevalent views on this subject of Canadian unity. There are those who feel that there is greater unity in Canada to-day than there has ever been before, and there are also those who view the whole situation with suspicion and doubt. I am inclined to agree, at least in part, with the former, that the present war has unified our people more than ever before. Nevertheless there are some prevalent viewpoints which in my opinion deserve the immediate attention of this house, and the sooner the situation is remedied, the better it shall be for all concerned.

Sir Norman Angell, world-renowned analyst of national and international affairs, has recently discussed, in his two articles published in the Financial Post, some of the reasons why he thinks Hitler has been successful in overrunning several European countries. He maintains that Hitler has used the age-old weapon of "divide and conquer" in the most masterly and subtle way. In the first place, he used this weapon to get control of Germany. He then proceeded to unify his own forces at home, and at the same time set out to create disunity and distrust among the democratic countries of the world. Having done that, he concentrated upon dividing the people internally, in countries he set out to conquer, by cleverly scheming and creating class and racial disharmony. One has little choice but to agree with Sir Norman's analysis in the light of what has happened in Europe. Alas, the unscrupulous fifth-column tactics are too well known as an integral part of the blitzkrieg machine which is threatening to destroy the very existence of our democratic institutions in the world. Let us make sure, then, Mr. Speaker, that there is no room in Canada for those who would seek to create disunity among our people by playing upon racial differences or racial superiority in our midst.

It is a well-recognized fact that there exists a greater unity to-day among all the peoples of the British commonwealth of nations than there has ever existed in the entire history of the British people. Since 1931, when by the statute of Westminster all the British dominions were granted equal sovereign rights, united only by their common allegiance to the crown, and each functioning as an independent unit, the bonds of unity have strengthened among all the dominions. They are now united on a voluntary basis. The British commonwealth of nations to-day is the greatest democratic unit in existence. This has been made possible only by the wise and tolerant British colonial policy towards its people of many racial origins and creeds. The British people to-day constitute, chiefly for this reason, one of the greatest powers the world has ever seen.

But our responsibility lies specifically here within Canada—we are assembled here for that purpose. The question before us is, how can we give maximum aid to Britain and at the same time be well prepared for our own home defence? At the moment I shall not discuss the material side of the question, because that has well been done by others on previous occasions. My chief purpose to-night is to discuss the question of our Canadian unity.

I believe we are all of opinion that Canada must be united to the utmost if she is to be effective in her aid to Britain and if she is to be prepared for her own home defence. The people within the borders of Canada must assume equal responsibilities as well as share equal rights and privileges. We must have only one purpose in mind; that is victory. In answer to all agents of disunity, let me say that we must eradicate all possibilities of disharmony and check all those influences which tend to cause disunion and build racial barriers within Canada. Then, and only then, will Canada be looked upon as a powerful nation.

But to our regret, Mr. Speaker, we find that certain individuals who hold responsible positions in our public life make loose and ill-advised statements which may easily be misconstrued and made use of as the basis or cause for disunity.

In the first place, let me make a passing reference to a rather loose statement made by the Conservative leader in the British Columbia legislature. While speaking in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne he said, as reported in the Edmonton Journal of November 1:

> Planning for the period of readjustment which will follow the war and a vigorous stand against the "furtherance of foreign language or foreign creed in this country" were urged in the provincial legislature Thursday by R. L. Maitland, K.C., leader of the Conservative opposition.

And further it reads:

> Mr. Maitland deplored the existence of foreign language schools in Canada. . . .

There may be several interpretations of what the hon. gentleman had in mind, but my chief objection is to the fact that utterances of this kind throw an unfair suspicion upon our loyal Canadian citizens who happen not to be of Anglo-Saxon extraction. This may and does create disunity at a time when unity is most imperative.

Secondly, I should like to refer to an item appearing in the Edmonton Bulletin, in its issue of November 4. I quote:

> With the stress of war causing a widening of activities in the force, 500 new constables are being enrolled by the R.C.M.P. throughout the dominion.
>
> Because of rigid requirements in the way of both mental and physical qualifications, few as yet have been accepted.
> Applicants must be single of British racial origin.

Here again, the meaning of the words "of British racial origin" is vague. When interpreted broadly, it would appear to mean that any person born in any British dominion is eligible for enrolment, be he of Anglo-Saxon or any other racial extraction. But interpreted in a narrower sense, it would simply rule out the eligibility of all those not of Anglo-Saxon origin. Unfortunately, this narrower interpretation is being used by minor officials for the purpose of racial discrimination. I suggest that in future when the government is putting out circulars of this type, that a more specific choice of words be made.

Lastly, I should like to draw the attention of the house to a much more serious statement which appeared in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of October 8. Mr. G. W. Parker, relief officer of Saskatoon, commenting on the administration of relief, is reported to have made this assertion. I quote in part:

> There should be two scales of relief, one for central Europeans and one for "white people."

This, I submit, Mr. Speaker, is a vile form of racial discrimination. I challenge the authority upon which Mr. Parker bases his classification of people, in saying that central Europeans do not belong to the white race. I also question the mentality of those who would propose a higher scale of relief for one group of our citizens and a lower scale for another.

Probably the most notorious example of this same attitude of racial discrimination as well as higher and lower rations is exemplified in Hitlerian philosophy. We all know what that attitude of mind has brought upon us; let us, then, not have anything to do with it in Canada. No one who takes the attitude that this man does is fit to hold public office. In our country, where approximately half the population is of non-Anglo-Saxon extraction, ideas of this kind and at this time of national crisis should not be tolerated. It is about time some of our public men realized that they are nothing more than public servants hired to serve the people. I suggest that the defence of Canada regulations should also be made to apply to individuals who deliberately make malicious statements which cause dissension among our people.

I am happy, however, to be able to reply to the above and other would-be critics, on the authority of some of our eminent public men. Fortunately the great majority of our public men are much more broad-minded. It is gratifying to find that sincere efforts are being made by this government to bring about among all our people, of whatever racial origin they may be, a better understanding and singleness of purpose.

Some members on this side of the house have criticized the bureau of public information for being too partisan. I think that criticism is well founded. But so far as unity of our people of different racial origins is concerned, I believe that this bureau is rendering an invaluable service by publishing from time to time translations of articles appearing in the non-English press in Canada. I do not know of a better way of passing on to our Canadian public material which appears in Ukrainian, Czech, German and other publications. It helps to clear up a great deal of misunderstanding which may exist with regard to the stand these groups have taken in connection with the war. It is to be hoped that in future the press will take a greater advantage of this fine service.

I have not the time to quote many of these translations; let it suffice to give the house one short extract. But before doing so, let me quote the head-note by the director of public information, Mr. G. H. Lash, introducing one of these articles:

> Note to editors: In view of the misunderstanding which seems to exist in some parts of Canada respecting the attitude of the foreign-speaking sections of our population towards Canada's war effort and our war aims, the following translation of an editorial which appeared . . . in the German language newspaper Der Nordwesten is interesting. Nobody recognizes better than myself how precious newspaper space is these days, but if you could find room to reprint or to comment upon this editorial and others which I hope to send you from time to time from other foreign-language newspapers of Canada I think you would be making a fine contribution towards the development of national unity.

The following quotation from the above-mentioned newspaper was translated and reprinted in the circular of public information in the issue of October 10:

> The war has created the spirit of unity among Canadians of every race and creed such as this country has not known. The full meaning of our Canadian citizenship is better understood, and if there be the few who do not value its privileges, it must be apparent to them that this land has no place for them.
> The people of Canada of whatever racial origin have one supreme duty—the winning of the war, and to that end there must be a complete unity in our land, and a determination to give and to sacrifice. And from the grave situation which has been thrust upon us by those who would destroy our way of life, we shall emerge a better people and a greater Canada.

That, Mr. Speaker, is a sample of material which is being translated and reprinted in these circulars. From that I would judge that there is a good-will on the part of all our Canadian citizens, regardless of racial origin, towards a common understanding and national unity.

While discussing the subject of Canadian unity, I feel that I would not be doing justice to the topic if I did not refer to Doctor Watson Kirkconnell, who is undoubtely Canada's greatest authority on our population of non-Anglo-Saxon extraction. Doctor Kirkconnell has been for many years a keen student of all our racial groups. It is only to be regretted that this government has not, as far as I know, used Doctor Kirkconnell's exceptional talent in the interest of our national unity. I would recommend to hon. members to read, for example, Doctor Kirkconnell's recent booklet, entitled "The Canadian Ukrainians and the War". It is well worth reading.

Here is an interesting extract from the London Free Press reprinted in the Ottawa Citizen of October 31, regarding Doctor Kirkconnell's contribution. To me it is an encouraging bit of information.

> According to Doctor Watson Kirkconnell of McMaster university, who is Canada's greatest authority on our foreign population, Herr Hitler has done more than any other man to draw Canada together and to unite the dominion. Despite intensive propaganda which was carried on in Canada by Berlin, Moscow and Rome, Doctor Kirkconnell says that more than ninety-eight per cent of the peoples of alien birth are loyal to Canada to-day, and are enthusiastically lined up behind the British effort. . . .
> In most cases the nazis overran their home countries, while they realize that the freedom and liberty which they came to this country to seek will be lost if Hitler wins. Doctor Kirkconnell gave as one example the Ukrainians. He pointed out that in Saskatchewan they form ten per cent of the population, yet over ten per cent of the enlistments in that province are from peoples of Ukrainian stock. The war has brought English and French closer together, and it is optimistic to learn that it is making for national unity among those who are not of French or Anglo-Saxon origin.

In closing, may I sum up the whole problem of our national unity by quoting from one of Canada's greatest statesmen, who was a friend of all the Canadian people. He worked hard for Canadian unity and was a man who understood even the simplest soul in our land. I speak of Lord Tweedsmuir.

While addressing a large Ukrainian gathering of 1,500 people on September 21, 1936, at Fraserwood, Manitoba, Lord Tweedsmuir spoke in such a way that even to this day those who heard him hold sacred the ideas he expressed. On that happy occasion the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) was present. I crave the indulgence of hon. members while I read a part of that great statesman's short message. I would suggest that they follow this masterpiece. Many hon. members find themselves at a loss at times, when they have to address a gathering of people of some other racial extraction. This is a wonderful example of an address to such a gathering, and is one of the most interesting short speeches I have ever read. These were the words uttered by Lord Tweedsmuir:

> I thank you most warmly for the way you have received me to-day. I do not think that anywhere I have gone in Canada I have been welcomed with a more beautiful ceremony; your escort, your national ceremony of presenting me with bread and salt, and if I may be allowed to say so the beautiful and well chosen words of your address.
> I realize that my welcome is due to the fact that I represent your king, and it will be my pleasure to convey to the king the cordial greetings of the Ukrainian people in Canada.
>
> I am very happy to be among you to-day. I am among people who have behind them a long historical tradition, for it was your race which for centuries held the south eastern gate of Europe against the attacks from the east. I can well imagine that this country is home to you, for these wide prairies are very like the great plains of south eastern Europe from which you came. During my tour of the prairies I have come across many of your people, and I am glad to see that in a short time you have come to be a vital element in the Canadian nation. You played your part in the great war. To-day I find your sons in the permanent and non-permanent militia.
>
> Wherever I go I hear high praise of your industry and hardihood and enterprise even under the most difficult conditions. You have become good Canadians.
> Every Briton and especially every Scotsman must believe that the strongest nations are those that are made up of different racial elements. The Ukrainian element is a very valuable element to our new Canada. I wish to say one thing to you. You have accepted the duties and loyalties as you have acquired the privileges of Canadian citizens, but I want you also to remember your old Ukrainian traditions—your beautiful handicrafts, your folk songs and your folk legends. I do not believe that any people can be strong unless they remember and keep in touch with all their past. Your traditions are all valuable contributions toward our Canadian culture which cannot be a copy of any old thing—it must be a new thing created by the contribution of all the elements that make up a nation.

That was the outlook of a great man who understood the people. I think it would be worth while to compare utterances such as I quoted in the first part of my address with the sentiments to which I have just referred.

Let me say, then, that in this crucial and historic moment every Canadian, whatever may be his racial origin, must hold dear the principles for which the British flag stands, namely liberty, without which there is no true life; justice, so essential to all people, and fair play, which makes life worth living. In the name of all these things, Mr. Speaker, let us unite and work in harmony for the good of Canada and a brighter future for all our Canadian people, regardless of racial origin.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to extend my congratulations to the young member (Mr. Hlynka) who has just taken his seat. As a Canadian of British origin I should like to express my support and appreciation of what he has just said and what he represents to Canadian life to-day. I have been told by people who accompanied their majesties across Canada that the most moving episode of the whole trip was the welcome they received at Melville, where practically everyone was of other than French or English-speaking origin. I suppose those of Polish, Ukrainian and German origin predominated, and I am told that there the outpouring of affection for the head of our country and our commonwealth was such that it moved even the most staid and cynical newspaperman. Many people had come there, after a journey of perhaps a day, to look at their sovereign, and it was said that there was such an evident spirit of affection that among those humble people many had tears in their eyes that they should have the privilege of meeting their king and queen.

Then we hear of such utterances of racial hatred and discrimination as were quoted by the hon. member for Vegreville. We try to think those who are guilty of these things are endeavouring to be good citizens. The gentleman, Mr. Parker, mentioned by the hon. member is a returned soldier who served in the last war. I am certain he wants to be a good citizen and do his best for Canada, but I am at a loss to understand the psychology of such a man. Here are people who have left their own country, who glory in the freedom they find here, who intend to live and die in Canada, who expect to bring up their children to be good Canadian citizens, who to-day in Saskatchewan are enlisting for the defence of their country to a greater extent than might be expected from the portion of the population they represent.

In fact, of the first two young men from my constituency to give their lives in this war in the service of their country, in the sinking of the Fraser, one was of Ukrainian origin. Then, in almost the same issue of the newspaper that announced his death, we had the statement referring to these people of Ukrainian origin as not being "white". That Ukrainian mother laid her most precious possession upon the altar of freedom; then, after making that sacrifice she had to hear that statement made by a fellow-Canadian of British origin. It was cruel. So with all my heart I support what the hon. member for Vegreville has said to-night; that sort of thing should have no place in Canadian public life.

As I have said, I have no doubt that this gentleman, Mr. Parker, meant well. He served his country in the last war. To him and to all other Canadians of English and French origin who want to serve their country, as I know every returned soldier does, I say that he should consider whether he is really serving his country in giving utterance to such ideas. In the constituency of Rosthern, as I have said before, there is a large number of people of the Mennonite faith. They are partly of Swiss and German origin, but predominantly of Dutch extraction. There is a tendency on the part of a few returned soldiers to suggest that these people should be barred from the normal life of this country.

When people were being named to look after the national registration, a protest was made to Ottawa that too many Mennonites were being made registrars at a place called Aberdeen, where the people are entirely of that persuasion. I had the matter looked into, and this is what I found. I found that in that whole Mennonite district where the recommendations were made by Mennonite people they respected the claims of returned soldiers. Wherever there was a returned soldier in the district able or willing to do the work, he got the job. But there was one district in which there was no returned soldier who could be procured to get the work, and so a fine Mennonite citizen was named to do the work there. He was the only Mennonite in the whole district named to act as a registrar; his oldest son is serving in the Canadian active service force. I say: Who are these patriots who think they best serve their country by pointing the finger at a man who is appointed to take charge of this work, a man whose eldest son is in the fighting services? He was the only Mennonite in that district actually named to act as a registrar, and yet one or two thought they were doing right by attacking me because I believed that all people, regardless of racial origin, should be treated on the same basis.

I took the attitude that a mistake was made at the time of the last war when Canada said to these people that they should not have the vote, and thereby were not treated as citizens. As a result they naturally did not feel under the same obligation to serve their country. The attitude I have taken at this time is that every Canadian, every man, no matter what his racial origin may be, shall be regarded as a good Canadian and shall be expected to make his contribution to the country's great cause.

The question respecting Mennonites serving in the armed forces of their country is one with which I probably should deal at this time. As we know, it is against their religion to bear arms. I do not believe there is one member in the house who would say that we should interfere with people's religion. In the regulations it has been stipulated that the training of Mennonites and Doukhobors shall be indefinitely postponed. But there was no suggestion that they should be deprived of the vote; they were to be treated as full-fledged citizens.

What do we find to-day? We find that within the last ten days representatives of the Mennonites of western Canada, the Mennonites of Ontario, the Quakers in Canada and the Tunkers came to Ottawa to interview the ministry of national war services to say to that department that while they do not believe in bearing arms, they are prepared to go into any branch of the service of their country where they could help to save life, where they could help the wounded, and for other services of that kind. It did not matter to them whether it was dangerous work or otherwise. All they ask is that they shall not be asked to bear arms; and they have asked, too, that their operations should be under civilian auspices. So long, however, as they serve humanity, they do not care whether their work be dangerous or otherwise.

They appreciate the rights of citizenship in Canada. They wanted to show their appreciation, and they were not trying to get out of doing their full share. All this was done after the government had exempted them from military service. The people represented by this delegation do not want to be exempted from doing their share. Here we have a group of non-English-speaking and non-French-speaking origin, a group which wishes to act as a group of good citizens. They are ready to serve their country, even to the extent of risking their lives. Is it not wise statesmanship, and good business, if nothing else, to let those people know and feel that they are accepted as full-fledged citizens?

I have in mind, for example, those people in western Canada who are of German origin. I claim—I am absolutely satisfied—that the overwhelming majority of those people are absolutely loyal to Canada and the British empire. But if people are going to suggest continually that they should be deprived of their rights, that they should be discriminated against and treated as if they are something less than citizens, what will the effect be?

Hitler teaches to the German people that they never will be accepted as full-fledged citizens in any country not under the German reich, and that the only way whereby in America or elsewhere they may be treated as full-fledged citizens is by their backing of his government, so that Germany may rule every country. He points out that it is only by that method that they may become full-fledged citizens. Well, if by mistreatment and discrimination we bring about a condition whereby, even if they have lived in this country for one, two or three generations, the fact that they happen to have German names will preclude them from obtaining full citizenship, I suggest that we are playing right into the hands of Hitler, and substantiating his teachings and propaganda. So I say to my returned soldier friends and colleagues, Realize that if you attack a people who want to be loyal, a people who are loyal, just because they have German-sounding names or names of non-French or non-English origin, you are tending to make an enemy of those who want desperately to be friends. And to-day in this crisis of the world we need every friend we can get. You are not strengthening our cause by trying to treat as enemies those who want to be friends and loyal citizens.

These observations bring up another point with which I believe I should deal at this time. I am afraid I shall not be able to touch on all the matters with which I had intended to deal, but I shall proceed to discuss this one because it is along similar lines. It has to do with our fellow Canadians, our French-speaking Canadians. I have noticed a tendency on the part of many English-speaking Canadians to admit only grudgingly outside of Quebec the rights of French-speaking Canadians.

By the pact of confederation it was laid down that there should be two official languages in Canada—not only in Quebec, but throughout the country. This is a bilingual country, and I am satisfied that we will not get real unity if we, after making a deal, as we did at the time of confederation, try to whittle it down and to back out of it. Sometimes I have marvelled at the toleration and the willingness of French-speaking Canadians to forgive and forget the continual attempt on the part of some English-speaking Canadians to whittle down the rights the former obtained under the pact of confederation. I suggest it is of the very genius of the British people that, having first of all made a deal, they should live up to it one hundred per cent, and that above all they tolerate and respect the wishes and just rights of minorities—especially when those minorities, through fair days and foul, have shown themselves to be loyal, to their hearts' cores.

Why is Canada British to-day? That is a question which has been asked on the floor of this chamber. When the Marquis de Lafayette came over to assist in the fight for independence of the United States, and sent his delegate to see the French-Canadians who only recently had passed under British rule, he was told that they were well content to remain under British rule, and had no desire whatever to join the revolting colonies to the south. Had they been disloyal at that time and had they regarded lightly their allegiance to their sovereign, they had their chance then to show their lack of allegiance; but they did not take it.

Again in 1812 had they gone against the British crown, this country would have been lost to the British empire. We then come to the revolution of 1837. That was a fight for responsible government, and there was no more desire in lower Canada to get away from the British crown than there was in upper Canada. Then we come down to the days of the great war, when, in spite of provocation French Canada stood behind the war effort of this country, and sent some of her best sons to give their blood for Canada on the soil of France; and there they lie to-day.

In this war there has been unity such as has gladdened the heart of every true Canadian. Bearing all that in mind, let us show these fellow citizens of ours who speak a Canadian language just as we do, that we do not want to take away from them some of their rights, that we respect them fully and that we are prepared to go half way to meet them in carrying out fairly the pact of confederation.

In this connection I should like to deal for a moment with the question of radio broadcasting. When a suggestion is made, many of us are apt to say that we agree with it, but when it comes down to actually agreeing to carry out the proposal, there is often a tendency to hang back. It is with that tendency that I wish to deal to-night. One of the things I should like to see accomplished is the setting up in Canada of one of the most powerful shortwave radio broadcasting stations in the world. Over one of the wave-lengths controlled by that station I should like to see broadcast the best programmes from Quebec so that they could be heard by our French-speaking fellow citizens in western Canada. They are entitled to hear programmes in their own language. These programmes would also be heard in occupied and unoccupied France.

Not long ago I had the privilege of listening to a speech delivered over the radio by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). I was thrilled and proud to think that he was a fellow citizen of mine. But that speech was broadcast only once. We all know the dangers faced by the citizens of France when they try to listen to foreign broadcasts. Naturally the nazis knew that this speech was being broadcast, and it would have been particularly dangerous for any French citizen to have listened to it. If we had had a powerful shortwave station, this speech could have been broadcast nine or ten times in order to be sure that every Frenchman on the continent of Europe could have an opportunity to hear this call to fight for freedom. What would be spent on such a shortwave station would be of far more value than ten times the amount spent upon arms.

Let us face the fact that Hitler has gained his victories largely by the use of propaganda. We should be able to send appeals from the French-Canadians on north American soil to Frenchmen in Europe. No one will ever know but what the appeal of the Minister of Justice to Marshal Petain may have had something to do with the breaking down of the scheme to get France under the control of Germany. If that is so, then that speech was worth almost a whole army corps. I ask the government to consider this, to realize the power we would have of heartening the French people, of calling on them to be of good cheer, of telling them that we know that France will yet rise again in all the glory of freedom, that it is not her destiny to languish forever under the nazi heel.

There was another speech delivered not long ago which I wish every Frenchman could have heard. This was delivered by that great Canadian statesman, the premier of Quebec. How his words would have thrilled the French people and heartened them against the dark days yet to come! He said:

> To France, French-Canadians would say: "Mother, thou art not dead. You live in our blood and in our minds. And you live in the minds of those who understand you. We all know that the hordes of Hitler and Mussolini have not been able to tear out your soul and that you but await our victory, the victory of the British nations and their allies, to again take your place amongst the nations who are bearers of light."

Would it not have been a fine thing to have broadcast that speech several times each day for two or three days so that every Frenchman in France might have had an opportunity of hearing it and knowing that here in Canada were people who intended to stand by France until once more she was free?

Such a radio station would help our foreign exchange position. It is intended to send people to South America in order to encourage the people of those countries to come to Canada for a visit—to trade with Canada. For every man that such delegates will meet, a shortwave station would reach thousands. Over such a station it could be broadcast that although we are at war there are no difficulties about travelling in this country. In the past many of these people have spent their money upon travel in Europe, but we should endeavour to encourage them to come to see Canada. We should be able to build up a tremendous tourist trade, and I have no doubt that the money made from such a trade would pay for the shortwave broadcasting station in one year.

There is the question of trade with the United States and the tourist traffic from that country. We know that last year Germany tried to destroy our tourist trade. We fought against this as best we could, but we should have been telling the people of the United States over a shortwave station all about the attempts that were being made to sabotage our war effort by destroying our tourist trade. I see my time is passing and I have used nearly all my allotment in dealing with this one subject. I think, however, its importance justifies my doing so.

For a moment I should like to refer to station CBK, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation transmitter for western Canada. This station broadcasts a total of 115 hours a week. The length of the bilingual programmes is three and one-sixth hours, while the French part of the bilingual programmes occupy only one-third of an hour, or twenty minutes. The time spent in broadcasting French programmes for the whole week is only three hours, out of the 115 hours, or 2·6 per cent. If there are English-speaking people who do not want to listen to more French than this, if more were put over, they can tune in on some other station like CKCK. They should not contend that there should not be more French broadcasts over CBK, because they do not have to listen if they do not want to. This would give our French-speaking fellow citizens a chance to hear a little bit more, a fairer amount of broadcasting in their own language.

Here is something which is most important. The time spent daily in broadcasting news in English over CBK is 158 minutes, whereas the time spent in broadcasting the news in French is only five minutes. The English news is broadcast seven days in the week while the French news is broadcast only five days in the week. An increased use of the French language over this station should be made to meet the wish of our French-speaking fellow citizens. I think the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should be asked to look into the situation. I do not think they are treating our French-speaking citizens in western Canada quite fairly when they give them only that proportion of the total time on CBK.

There is another matter. While a shortwave broadcasting station would be a good thing, there are in western Canada a good many people who cannot afford a radio of any kind whatsoever, and even less a shortwave receiving set. This means that if you are going to reach many of our people you have to put the programme over from the ordinary broadcasting station. I think the work that has been done in enlightening our English-speaking people on matters connected with the war and how we are carrying out our part in the war has been exceptionally good. But there are many people in western Canada who do not understand English very well. Yet they are good citizens, anxious to help in the war. They have been subjected, the people, for example, of German-speaking origin, to consistent nazi propaganda before the war.

The Deutsches Zeitung fuer Kanada, subsidized directly from Germany, was sent out from Winnipeg to mailing lists all over western Canada, and our people there, not being very well off and not being able to afford very much in the way of reading material, were subjected to this lying propaganda week after week, and yet they did not succumb to it. Here we are putting over to the English speaking people of the west the story of our war effort and the justice of our cause, but there seems to be the feeling in the minds of some of those in charge of the broadcasting corporation that if you put over a broadcast in German, somehow it is going to do some harm. Because of that, great chances to enlighten some of our people have been missed.

We had German refugees from Czechoslovakia, German refugees from Austria and from Germany itself who should have been put on the radio and permitted to tell their story in German to people of German origin in western Canada—the whole story of nazi oppression in Europe in all its horror. Would that not have been worth while? Would that not have been reaching people that it is important to reach? They are fellow-citizens and it is important that they should see the justice of the cause in which we are engaged. I submit that while we should, of course, carry on our programme of reaching our English-speaking citizens, we should take some steps to do a measure of justice to our French-speaking citizens, and then for the sake of promoting unity in Canada we should put over broadcasts in other than French or English to explain to those who are not French- or English-speaking citizens of Canada what is happening over in Europe.

There are people in the town of Rosthern who have not been very long in this country and who do not understand English very well. The only way in which they can hear German over the radio is if they manage to tune in on a German programme from London or Berlin. I venture to say that there are probably ten times as many people of German-speaking origin in Canada as there are in England, yet in England they do not think it is going to harm the British empire to put over the air speeches in German from the British broadcasting headquarters. How much more important for the unity of Canada that we should realize that it would be in the interests of Canadian unity to put over from time to time some speeches from good Canadians in German, Polish, Ukrainian and so on!

There is one matter which perhaps I did not make plain and which I should like to make very plain at this time with respect to what I have said about people like Mr. Parker and other returned soldiers. I am always ready to realize that they, like all of us at times since the war started, have been so worried about the very existence of our country and about the existence of the British empire in this time of peril, that, not understanding the true loyalty of our people who are not of English or French origin, they have been inclined to suspect them. I know that these gentlemen are acting with the best of intentions, and that is one of the reasons why I have spoken as I have to-night, to beg and beseech them not to play into the hands of Hitler, but to recognize these people as good Canadian citizens and to hold out the hand of friendship to them rather than throw suspicion on them.

There were many subjects with which I wished to deal to-night, but perhaps in this time of stress the question of Canadian unity is more important than almost any other. There is, however, one further matter with which being a pseudo-financial expert, I shall take a minute or two to deal.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) dealt with two things in particular, to which I should like to refer. I should like to read what he said:

> I believe that the tax programme of the government has been and will continue to be such that some additional financing of a short-term character, accompanied by some increase in total bank deposits, will not under the circumstances have inflationary results, and will, I believe, avoid undue stringency in the monetary field at a time when the working capital requirements of industry are increasing because of expanding business activity due to war orders.

That bears out what I and what many other Canadians have been contending for ever since the war started, that there should not be too stringent taxation or too stringent borrowing until we get our economic machinery running at full blast, and then it can more easily carry the burden of taxation necessary to finance the war. I think it was for this reason also that the last war loan did not go over as well as it might have done. It was because we did not permit our whole economic machine to expand to full capacity before we began to crack down on it. It is not going to increase our strength as a nation to close up, for example, our automobile industry if we are not prepared to put all those people at work making munitions of war; in fact it is going to hurt our economic machine by throwing thousands out of work. The matter must be so handled that we build up our economic activity to its full height and then gradually, as needed, turn over our industrial machine to the task of making munitions of war.

I am glad to see that it is proposed to embark on a policy of some credit inflation in order to enable this nation better to bear the war burden.

There is another point in the address of the Minister of Finance with which I wish to deal briefly. I shall read what the Minister of Finance said about it because it is a matter of grave importance. He said:

> In deciding to undertake some additional short-term financing, the government also had in mind the fact that the major portion of the new money which will have to be borrowed prior to next summer will be required for the activities of the foreign exchange control board. It has been decided that the board will finance the repatriation programme to a greater extent than it has in the past, and additional funds will be necessary for this purpose. You will recall that the process of repatriation involves the temporary accumulation of sterling balances by the foreign exchange control board, and these balances are later used to acquire Canadian securities held in the United Kingdom.

As I understand what is proposed there and what is actually happening to-day, it is that through the repatriation of Canadian securities money in the form of purchasing power in Canadian dollars is made available to Great Britain to purchase goods in Canada. Great Britain has caused the people of that country to turn over to the British government the Canadian securities they hold in order that Great Britain can turn round and sell these Canadian securities in Canada and with the proceeds pay in Canadian dollars for what she purchases in Canada.

So far as I understand it, the only purchases so far that we permit Britain to make in Canada are those which she is financially able to make through the exchange available to her by virtue of the goods she has shipped to Canada and the securities which have been repatriated in the manner I have described. If that is all that has been done, have we treated Great Britain in any different way from the way in which she has been treated by the United States, or the Argentine, or any other foreign country? While she has had the proceeds of her exports with which to buy in Canada, we have sold to her. While she has had the securities with which to procure Canadian dollars, we have sold to her.

We are now told by the Minister of Finance that, pending the disposal of her Canadian securities in Canada, the operation will be financed for the time being through this short-term credit programme. I am glad of that, that Great Britain is not going to be prevented by a lack of Canadian dollars from buying in Canada. But apparently all we are doing is lending, temporarily financing; we are not doing any more. That is quite a bit short, Mr. Speaker, of what was done by Great Britain for France before France's downfall. Great Britain put at the disposal of France all the pounds sterling that she needed to make any purchases which she required in the British isles. France did the same in francs in France with Great Britain, and they agreed that there would be a settlement after the war. This meant that money did not stand in the way of Britain helping France or France helping Britain. And I ask this, that consideration be given by our government to some similar policy. We must not be told that the limit of our assistance to Great Britain is what Great Britain is able to buy with her goods and her securities. Surely we are not going to stop at any such limited degree of assistance.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, the British government, having taken over the securities, sends them here. They will have to be disposed of in Canada to realize Canadian dollars to the credit of the British government in order that they can make purchases in Canada. As a member of the banking and commerce committee I should like to know how these Canadian securities are being disposed of, or to be disposed of. In this time of crisis, are the needs of the British government such that they are being forced to sacrifice Canadian securities because they need the money? There is only a small group of Canadian financiers who have the money necessary to buy those securities. To what extent are we protecting or do we intend to protect the British investor or the British government by seeing to it that a small group of Canadian investors are not making a big profit at the expense of Great Britain?

I am not saying that this is or is not the case. But I do say this, that all too little use is being made of the private members of this parliament. When I consider the speeches made in this house, led off by the hon. member who moved the address in reply (Mr. Claxton), seconded by my young friend, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras); when I reflect upon the high-class speeches which they made on that occasion, their clearness of mind and their all-round ability; when I observe, as I get to know hon. members of the various parties, the ability represented in this chamber and their competence to serve their country in this time of crisis, I ask myself, is that ability being harnessed? We feel that what is happening is this. Experts—so called—are being called in to advise the members of the government. Sometimes they are experts and sometimes they are not. In that connection we have heard the definition of an expert as a man who does not know very much, far away from home. A policy having been decided upon, with the assistance of those experts, it is brought down to this house, and hon. members—well, I will not say what they have to do.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Swallow it.

Mr. TUCKER: I submit that parliament would be discharging its functions if, for example, in connection with this question of finance, the banking and commerce committee were asked to sit and the report of the Bank of Canada referred to it for examination, with all other matters having to do with the financing of this country's war effort and the financing of assistance to Great Britain —all these things laid before that committee, with the right to call experts and to decide, in the light of the evidence given by those experts and the views of hon. members representing all parties in the house, as to the best way that the financial resources of this country could be harnessed. That, Mr. Speaker, would be true functioning of democratic government. The members of parliament would be given a chance to judge and advise the government as to whether those experts were really expert or whether they were, in their opinion, fakes. I should like to see the banking and commerce committee given a chance to examine as to what is being done with the securities which are being taken from the British people in their hour of need and sold here in Canada. Does any single hon. member on the floor of this house know how these securities are being disposed of? Does any hon. member know whether the British investor and the British government are getting a completely square deal? We hope so, but do not know. Is my time up?

Mr. POULIOT: No. Go on. Good stuff!

Mr. TUCKER: I suppose, Mr. Speaker, you will call "time" when it is up. I have lost track of my time.

An hon. MEMBER: Carry on.

Mr. TUCKER: I suggest that the Bank of Canada should make available all the Canadian money needed to pay a decent price for the securities in which the people of Great Britain have invested in the past; that these securities, instead of being thrown on the market—I suppose they try to get the best price possible for them, but this is not a good time to dispose of securities of that kind—should be dealt with in this way. A credit should be granted by the Bank of Canada to the British government, representing a fair price for those securities, which would become the property of the bank. Somebody may say, "If you pay out Canadian dollars from the Bank of Canada in the sums necessary to buy those securities, you are going to expand the basis of your credit structure to that extent and inflation will follow." My answer to that is that I am satisfied, and I feel it cannot be contradicted—I should like to get the experts in front of the banking and commerce committee and see if they can controvert it—that as you put out more and more Canadian money to re-vest those securities in the people of Canada, to whom they should belong, at the end of the war, you could gradually increase your reserve requirements, if you saw that it was resulting in inflation.

To-day by law the banks are required to have on hand $1 in Bank of Canada notes or Bank of Canada deposits for every $20 they owe their depositors. As a matter of practice the Bank of Canada require them to have on hand $1 for every $10 they owe their depositors; they ask them to have twice as much on hand as the law requires. There is nothing wrong with that. But if the Bank of Canada can require them to have on hand twice as much as the law requires, what is to prevent the Bank of Canada, if they saw any sign of inflation, saying to the banks: We require you to have on hand not $1 for every $10 but $1.10, or $1.15, or even $2 or more, for every $10.

In other words, they can absolutely control the situation. They can gradually increase the cash base for the commercial banking system of this country. They have a tremendous leeway. Until we get to one hundred per cent credit base, the Bank of Canada can put out well over a billion dollars. If that were done, and carefully watched by the Bank of Canada, as it could be watched, at the end of this war, instead of private investors in this country buying up Canadian securities that were once the property of Britishers who had faith in the future of this dominion and invested in it, and perhaps getting those securities for less than they are worth, the Bank of Canada, representing the people of Canada, would own about a billion dollars' worth of Canadian securities on which it would earn interest and for which Britain had been paid a fair price.

Perhaps some hon. members may say that is impossible. When a great refunding transaction like that is going on, if we are to do our duty by the Canadian people we as members of parliament have a right to ask our financiers what is going on and ask them why this cannot be done. So in all earnestness I ask that the banking and commerce committee be set up to examine into the financial transactions that are taking place in this country. Who has more right to look into those transactions than the members of that committee, representing the common people of Canada? We still have self-government in Canada, thank God. We are not ruled by the financiers, we are not ruled by the manufacturers.

In any particular sphere this house is entitled to full information through its committees. So I suggest to the government that the banking and commerce committee be called together as soon as this house reconvenes, with full power to examine into that field of finance and the financial transactions that are taking place. Representing as it does the people of all parts of Canada, labouring people, farmers and so on, representing all parties in the country, if it was able in times past to arrive at good solutions, in this day of crisis, when every member of this parliament is anxious to do all he can for his country, it will get together in a non-partisan spirit and among the fifty members of that committee there may be at least one who will have an idea that is worth putting up to Mr. Towers and his expert advisers. At any rate it will give a chance to everyone on that committee to make suggestions as to the conduct of the financial policy of Canada. It is the right of this House of Commons to ask for that, and I ask for it to-night.

There are other matters I wanted to deal with, but I realize that my time is up. Before concluding, however, I should also like to ask that a committee be set up to examine the wheat problem. That problem should be referred to the agriculture committee which can have experts brought before it to make their suggestions and have them examined by hon. members from all sections of the house, and the committee can then report its conclusions to the government.

Let me say that I would not want anyone to think that I am dissatisfied in any way with the successful manner in which the government have organized this country for its war effort. I am proud of the way in which our ministers of national defence, all three of them, have directed our war effort. I glory in the way in which our Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) has organized the arming of our nation for war. But there again I make a suggestion. Various people have been put in important positions in which they control the whole industrial and economic life of this dominion. There should be a committee of this House of Commons to look into what is being done in that sphere and satisfy itself that it is being done properly. In other words, I ask that the members of this House of Commons be permitted to go to work to help the government win this war. We were elected to help run this country, not someone called in from Vancouver and someone else from Halifax. Some of them, I understand, could not get elected to this house no matter how they tried. They are all right—good men have been chosen—in their place as advisers, but this house has the right to see if they are as expert as they are supposed to be and to advise the government as to their work.

There are many other members of the government of whom I could say how much I think of their work, but I shall conclude with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself. I believe that his work in the realm of external affairs of this country will go down in history as the finest ever done by any prime minister. He has made an enormous contribution to the safety and security of British commonwealth of nations. To win this war it was all-important that we should have the help of the United States of America. In acting as interpreter and bridge between the United States of America and Great Britain, and helping to bring them together, our Prime Minister has done a work that this generation probably is not able to appreciate; but when history comes to appraise it, the Prime Minister will take a very high place and be greatly deserving of his country's undying gratitude.

The Ogdensburg agreement that he negotiated with the President of the United States was the culmination of a sustained effort. I happen to have seven children; I am proud of them; when I heard that the Prime Minister had made an agreement with the president of the great republic to the south that if Canada were attacked we could rely on the resources of the United States to help us in driving back the invader and protecting our homes, when I went to bed that night I thanked God that that agreement had been brought into existence by the Prime Minister and the President, because I felt that my children were safer in our home than they otherwise would have been.

As I listened at this session to the declaration of the Prime Minister as to our war aims and the way in which Canada intends to meet the crisis, I say in all humility I thought it was the finest declaration of war aims and the noblest statement of the spirit in which our people should go forth to meet this present challenge to us and to civilization and freedom to which I had yet listened.

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, this debate has brought out many constructive ideas, and I sincerely hope the government will act upon them. The hon. member who just took his seat (Mr. Tucker) made one or two very good suggestions. I think he rather spoiled his speech with his last few remarks, but the first part was excellent. As a member of the banking and commerce committee I agree that this committee should take up the question of the sale of securities when the house meets again after the recess.

The hon. gentleman also mentioned radio broadcasting. I have tried to obtain a copy of a speech which was made in the British House of Commons with regard to broadcasting. I have not been able to secure that speech, but I know its contents. It was stated that Hitler first used the radio to lower the morale of the people of the countries he wanted to invade. At the present time I understand that he has under his control over 170 short-wave stations, including those of Norway, Sweden and Denmark, some of which broadcast in English twenty-four hours a day in an endeavour to break down the morale of the English people, but that will not be broken. Speaking of radio, I wonder whether something could not be done to prevent a certain German commentator from broadcasting to this country. Even some of our Canadian stations are carrying these broadcasts, and we do not know but what in those broadcasts there may be hidden code messages to his fifth columnists in this country or in the United States, because every word this man says is first checked by the greatest double-crosser of all times, Hitler himself.

I have some questions which I should like to ask the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Gardiner), who I am sorry is not in the house at the moment. First, I should like to ask if any complaints have been received with regard to employers not taking back into their employ men who had to go to training camps; and, if so, what action has been taken.

Then I should like to protest to this government because of the manner in which they have drawn up the rules and regulations concerning the trainees. In England there was an act passed concerning conscription, and that matter was fully debated in the house. I honestly believe that the question of training our men should be debated here. As the previous speaker said, we do get some good ideas here in the house. Give the members a chance to discuss these matters, instead of putting them through by order in council. In the United States the whole procedure in regard to training camps is laid down in their act.

I should also like to ask the minister whether, in the event of the training period being extended to four months, the men called up in the first three classes are liable to be called up again. Finally, what action will be taken with regard to those men, something like 1,500, who were called up for training and given transportation but who did not show up?

I should also like to know whether any complaints have been received by the Department of National War Services concerning the seizure of chattels belonging to men who have been called up for training, I mean chattels purchased under lien or conditional sale agreements. I am informed that in Chatham a seizure was made by a finance company. That matter is covered in the United States regulations; a short-term moratorium is declared, so that the soldier undergoing training is not liable for suit, debt, mortgage foreclosure, repossession proceedings and so on. I realize that the United States man is called up for twelve months and that at present the Canadian boy is called up for only one month, but I really believe something should be done at once with regard to this matter.

Then I should like to refer to the public information bureau. Every week we receive reams of mimeographed sheets, though I know for a fact that not half this material is ever read. As a matter of fact I saw one newspaper man throw one of these envelopes into the waste-paper basket without even opening it. He said, "Why read that stuff? I had that information a week ago." I rather think some of this material is of a political nature, because on the first page of one article I see the words "free speech." We do not even have free speech in this house.

Mr. McNEVIN: Why?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The other day the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) called down the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson).

[Mr. G. K. Fraser.]

Mr. McNEVIN: That does not mean anything; maybe he deserved it.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Yes; that means we have not free speech. The other day the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said he felt the awful seriousness of the war. If that is so, I wonder why he has not tried to keep up the morale of the soldiers who are training in this country, many of them without proper equipment, by giving free transportation on the railways. In any event they should be given free transportation on their own railway. They have been paying for that railway ever since they were knee high to a grasshopper; every time they bought a stick of candy they helped pay for it, and even though they are in training they are helping to pay for it to-day. There is no reason under the sun why those men should not have free transportation. Of course such transportation would have to be within limits; it might be only on authorized passes and perhaps only three or four times a year, but they should have it. I do not think one hon. member would be opposed to that, or is there one who might be? I do not think so. I think all hon. members are for the soldier, and I am glad they are.

I have before me clippings from papers and magazines concerning free transportation. I shall not read them all, because I know that most hon. members have received some of them. There is one, however, I should like to read, and it is as follows:

> In response to an appeal that soldiers in active service ranks be given free transportation on railways the Hon. J. L. Ralston, Defence Minister, has replied that this is without precedent. Even Mr. Ralston must know that this is a most feeble excuse for refusing the enlisted men, whose pay does not permit such luxuries as travel on the people's railway.
> In this statement he is not entirely correct, for in Britain leave for soldiers is accompanied by free transportation to their destination. If precedent must be followed, here is precedent.
> We do not recall any precedent for Lieutenant Robert Davies and his engineering squad which removes time bombs at the danger of being blown to bits at any moment. Nor is there an established precedent for a mad rush to air raid shelters when enemy planes come overhead with their cargoes of death.

I have here an advertisement paid for by the Liberal government in Ontario, and at the bottom I find these words:

> Special request to motorists. When driving along highways these increasingly cold days and nights, give our soldier boys a ride.

Red tape can be cut. All that is necessary is that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) give the word. The soldiers throughout the country are waiting for that word, and I sincerely hope that they get it before Christmas. I mentioned this matter in the house on June 28 and again on July 22. This is November 25; I wonder how much longer the men will have to wait.

Then, I believe we should do something in regard to insurance for the enlisted men. Perhaps we should have a committee of the whole house, or a select committee which would have the duty of dealing with the matter. Possibly the committee on banking and commerce could do it. One suggestion put forth is that five per cent be taken out of dependents' allowances and assigned pay, then the government put in the same amount, and that an insurance company or a group of insurance companies be given the duty of handling the insurance. After Great Britain has won the war and the soldiers return, they would have nest-eggs with which to begin life again. They would have something in the bank with which to start up business.

I am pleased to note that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has accepted a suggestion from this part of the house—in fact, he has accepted a number of them. I refer to the one whereby the income tax may be paid on the instalment plan. This suggestion was made during the last session, and I know it will be a great help to the taxpayer. In fact at the present time throughout Canada people are opening savings deposit accounts so that they may be in a position to pay their income taxes when due.

The Minister of Finance was good enough to accept that suggestion. I sincerely hope he will accept others which may be passed on to him not only at this session but during the recess. One suggestion I would make at this time is that tax-free bonds be issued bearing an interest rate of not more than one and a quarter per cent. In that way I believe we would collect large sums of money.

In moving the address in reply to the speech from the throne the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) suggested that the estimates to improve the tourist trade should be increased from $500,000 to $1,000,000 this year. I agree with him, but would suggest that we set up a committee to deal with the matter, and that the committee have the services of the director of tourist traffic, Mr. D. Leo Dolan, a most capable man, and one who will see that every dollar spent will bring back $100 or $150 in United States funds.

I find that $311,695 was spent last year by the bureau. The sum is now raised to a million dollars, and the increase may seem rather heavy. We must remember, however, that we need United States dollars, and we know that the people in that country want to visit Canada. We can get United States dollars and we can get United States tourists; all we have to do is go after them. They want to be friendly with us, and we want to be friendly with them. Yes, we want to be friendly with them even in a business way.

Our business with other nations should be carried on in a businesslike manner. Especially is that true of the Department of Agriculture. At the head of that department, however, we have one who is not a business man. Therefore our transactions with other countries have been to their benefit, and not to that of Canada. In fact the trade agreements made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) have set the farmer back, instead of sending him forward. In fact the plight of the farmer and the price he receives for his products remind me of a verse which was handed to me on the occasion of my starting in business about thirty years ago. The two lines of the verse are as follows:

> Count that day lost whose low descending sun
> See prices shot to flinders and business done for fun.

The farmer in Canada has long passed the point where he sees the funny side of it. He wants to know where he goes from here. I am asking the Minister of Agriculture what the farmer is to do; I doubt if the minister knows.

The following newspaper clipping I should like to place on Hansard:

> Seattle, Nov. 3.—A telegram received here from Paul H. Appleby, United States undersecretary of agriculture, advised apple growers in the Wenatchee region of Washington state that the department of agriculture has sent two representatives to Ottawa to consult on steps to safeguard any injury to the U.S. market for domestic fruit.

I sincerely hope the deputation was received in a friendly manner, that no concessions were given away and that Canada got just as much as she gave.

The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson) has said that Canada spent $24,000,000 in the United States on foreign fruits and vegetables. We would not spend that much if our trade agreement had been better drawn. I have described the Ontario farmer as the forgotten man, and I believe I am right. He has been forgotten ever since this government took office. But the Department of Agriculture has not been forgotten, so far as estimates are concerned. In 1935 estimates for that department stood at $7,121,210.24, and in that sum was included $500,000 for the operation of the Natural Products Marketing Act. This year they have been cut down from the $16,000,000 of last year to $13,254,323.09. But this year the salaries alone of that department amount to almost $7,000,000. That is not helping the farmer of Ontario, of the west or of the east one bit. The farmer has not a chance. The Minister of Agriculture has said that this government is doing more for the farmers of Canada than any other government ever did. I quite agree with him. This government is doing more for the farmer, more to put him in the hole, more to make him mortgage his farm, more to put him in the red. The farmer to-day merely exists; he does not live. One farmer said that he had a full pocket-book. In that pocket-book he had a copy of his mortgage and the stubs of notes that he owed at the bank, but no money.

Last session one hon. member said that the west did all the talking; apparently the squeaky wheel got the most grease and he thought he would rise in his place and talk to see if he could not get a little grease. Personally I feel that the west and the east get the grease, but Ontario pays for it. As I said before, the Ontario farmer is the forgotten man. His markets have been taken away from him and foreign farm products are being dumped on his doorstep. Hothouse businesses have been put out of business because they have been given no protection. The hog growers have got it in the neck, and they are still getting it. In the last month the price of shorts, middlings and bran have jumped as much as $4 a ton. I believe this is due to the miller just handing it right back to the farmer. The farmer raises the wheat, the miller processes it and the farmer pays for it. As I say, the farmer has no chance at all. In most sections of Ontario the potatoes have been quite poor this year because of heavy rains and a cold fall. In the Port Hope-Peterborough section tomatoes were two weeks late in ripening and then heavy frosts killed off sixty per cent of the crop.

An hon. member to my left referred to the distilling of spirits from wheat. The United States has been doing this for a few years and Canada will eventually have to do the same. Every day England is requiring more high-octane spirits for aeroplanes and Canada should be the country that supplies it. We are adding to our air force every day and we do not know when the supply of oil from south and central America will be cut off. We should be considering new means of obtaining motor spirits. It has been said that it would cost fifty cents a gallon to manufacture these spirits, but I understand that the government is paying more than fifty cents a gallon for high-octane gasoline.

[Mr. G. K. Fraser.]

This year in our district we were unable to obtain a decent cob of table corn because the corn borer had got it all. One would have thought that the Minister of Agriculture with the many millions that he has to spend would have tried to check the ravages of this borer, but I did not see any checking in our part of the country. In fact, the situation is such now that the farmers have given up hope. The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) has suggested that this house should sit as a committee of the whole to discuss the wheat question. We should discuss the problems of the Ontario farmer at the same time.

An hon. MEMBER: Disgusted.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): An hon. member over here says "disgusted." Yes, the Ontario farmer is disgusted. The Minister of National War Services (Mr. Gardiner) made a statement which, as I said before, proves that he is no business man. You, Mr. Speaker, and every hon. member know that the manufacturers and workmen of Canada are ready and willing to produce and will produce if given a chance. I know this statement has been brought up before, but I think it should be again brought to the attention of the minister. He said:

> Factory managers who contend they cannot produce to capacity without interfering with the training of men may have to be told by someone that they as factory managers are not good enough for war time.

Suppose the housekeeper of this House of Commons went to the charwomen when they were cleaning up and handed one of them a brush having only half the necessary bristles and asked her to do as good a job as another woman who had a brush with all the bristles; there likely would be a kick. Factory managers have resented that statement of the minister very much. The factories will produce if they are given the necessary man-power. They are crippled by their need of skilled labour. Some years ago this government was warned that labour should be trained. We are short to-day even of unskilled labour. Our manufacturers are losing men all the time to the different arms of the service. They are glad to see them go, but the fact is that many managers, storekeepers and other employers are working eighteen hours a day, and some of them almost twenty-four hours trying to keep things going. I saw one storekeeper delivering goods at six o'clock in the morning because he could not get a messenger. All I say to the Minister of National War Services is that he will have to play ball. The manufacturers and workers are ready to play ball, but they must have a man in the pitching box who knows how to pitch. These manufacturers cannot be bulldozed.

I feel, and I believe everyone in Canada feels that small war contracts should be checked just as closely as the large ones. Hundreds of feet of fire hose were sent to the airfield at Brantford and not one coupling would fit the hydrants. Ninety-eight fire axes were sent to another training camp. I do not know whether that camp was near an Indian reservation because it is possible the person who sent them thought they could be used as tomahawks. But a mistake was made and apparently the shipment was not thoroughly checked. I do not blame the Minister of National War Services for this because this is a matter having to do with the Department of Munitions and Supply. How many more blunders have been made you, Mr. Speaker, do not know and I do not know, but what I say is, check first. The hose and axes could have waited a few days which would have permitted a thorough check-up by an expert to see that everything was all right. If a mistake was made, even if only $3,000 a day, that would amount to over $1,000,000 a year. Money does not grow on trees, as the leader of the social credit party seems to think.

On June 17 of this year I asked this question in the house:

Has the government stopped the export of iron, steel and scrapiron?

Mr. Howe: We have appointed a steel controller who has complete charge of the import and export of any iron or steel product, and he is now in control of the situation.

I have here a copy of P.C. 2742, dated June 24, 1940, the order in council appointing the steel controller. In other words, he was appointed one week after the minister said he was appointed. I do not think I would go slow in a matter of this kind. If they have to appoint a steel controller, they should jump to it.

I would also suggest to hon. members that they read the debates of the British House of Commons of October 10, 1940, at page 479, with respect to the shipping of oil. I have the volume here.

I was pleased to hear the Prime Minister announce that we are going to have a representative in Brazil and one in the Argentine. I was also pleased to hear the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) say that he was going down to south America and was going to visit both the west and the east coast. I sincerely hope that when we are choosing representatives of Canada for Brazil and the Argentine extreme care will be taken in picking the right men because the south Americans are a very proud people, and they have a great deal to be proud of. They had universities many years before there was one in any part of Canada or the United States, and one has to be extremely careful with regard to their customs and traditions. I would suggest that we send to south America someone who has been in that country before and knows the customs of the people.

Our director of tourist traffic, Mr. D. Leo Dolan, is at present chairman of the Pan-American Highway Congress Association, having been appointed in San Francisco two years ago. The Pan-American union I believe would be pleased if Canada would join up with them. The people of central and south America are friendly, and for the benefit of hon. members I would suggest that they all subscribe to the monthly bulletin of the Pan-American union. They can get it in English, Spanish or Portuguese, although I imagine not many in the house speak Portuguese. I know that hon. members who subscribe to the bulletin will be more than repaid.

On the west coast of south America two men could do all the work that would be required because Spanish is spoken in all those countries, but they would have to be men used to flying because that is how they would have to travel from place to place, although they have in south America about three thousand miles of paved road.

Mention has been made in this house on more than one occasion of leadership with regard to women's activities. I understand that the Minister of National War Services has appointed a man to take charge of that work. I think that is all wrong, and the women will very much resent it. An outstanding woman who is known to be a leader should have been selected. In the city of Peterborough the women's war service auxiliary corps is over two hundred strong, and takes drills and lectures once a week. In the same city we have also a women's service committee doing good work.

In closing, I should like to say that we Canadians should have faith that right is might and that right will be victorious. Let us be thankful, all of us who are privileged to live as citizens of a free country where liberty and justice continue in a world torn by suffering. Let us pray that peace, prosperity and friendship among all the peoples of our war-weary earth may soon materialize and live forever. Let us continue to love our country, respect its democratic institutions and honour its flag. Let us thank God for Canada.

Mr. W. G. WEIR (Macdonald): Mr. Speaker, the thoughts of everyone in this house and in Canada are concerned with our war effort, and also with the efforts that will have to be made at the close of the war to re-establish not only those now engaged in military operations but also those engaged in the manufacture of munitions and the implements of war. It is even difficult in a debate of this kind to interject any other matter because our thoughts are with the British people and the heroic fight they are putting up. Our minds turn to the women and children of the old land who day and night are bravely enduring bombardment. Our minds can hardly visualize those scenes. We in this country are fortunate when we picture what can take place in this machine-age war. Perhaps we do not fully realize how fortunate we are, for we can only dimly picture the destruction that is taking place in the old country.

Our hats go off at this time to Greece for the gallant effort she is making in defending her independence and halting unprovoked aggression of her borders by another country. Her heroic stand is an encouragement not only to us but to other countries that pride themselves on their nationhood, not to allow themselves to be subjected to ruthless aggression by foreign invaders.

Our thoughts go out, too, to our gallant Canadian soldiers who have taken their place in the line with such outstanding credit to themselves and to Canada. They have taken their places on the sea, in the air, and on the land, with valour unsurpassed. We must constantly keep before us, as people on the home front, the ever-increasing problem of knowing what we can do towards making their efforts more effective.

We have already heard statements from the various ministers of the crown pertaining to particular phases of Canada's war effort. They have shown a record of achievement and accomplishment which is phenomenal. This country, normally a calm, peaceful nation, has been changed from its ordinary peace-time pursuits into a gigantic war machine, capable of great expansion in the course of a few months. What has been accomplished in this regard stands as a creditable contribution on the part of the Canadian people of well-directed effort to the common cause.

With full recognition and appreciation of what this nation has done and can do towards assisting the mother country in her war effort, I believe many if not all Canadians will agree with me that the part this country has played in developing friendly relationships with the great republic of the United States may prove to be one of her most important contributions towards the defence and maintenance of democracy in the old land and throughout the world. We look at this accomplishment with gratification and pleasure. The credit for bringing about the understanding and goodwill which exists between our country and the United States must go to the present Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King), who throughout his life has paid particular attention to that one necessary object of human endeavour, namely the creation of good-will among men and between nations.

Much as one would like to discuss further the country's war effort, there are of course other items of interest to discuss. Various hon. members who have taken part in this debate have discussed the war activities of the departments much more intelligently than, I feel, I could do at this time. I propose therefore to discuss one or two other matters. The address in reply to the speech from the throne provides that opportunity; it is a part of our parliamentary procedure designed for that purpose. Its importance, however, in influencing government policy may not be so great to-day as it was in days gone by. I can believe that when we did not have the radio, the daily press, the telephone and telegraph services, the gathering together of 245 members of parliament from all over Canada, bringing to this assembly their different points of view, proved of particular value in expressing to the government of the day the interests of the people throughout the country, and that the government would probably pay heed to such views in developing its policies. Nevertheless, that function of parliament, though possibly somewhat less important at the present time, is fundamentally unchanged. Contributions are made by the various hon. members to the formulation of governmental policy.

I have this feeling, and it is somewhat in line with a suggestion made by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), that the debate we carry on upon the address in reply to the speech from the throne may be a little too formal. More might be gained by a debate in committee, where each question as it was brought up could be answered and cleared up at once. That is not possible in a debate of this kind. Opportunity is provided, of course, for committee debate when the estimates of the various departments are under consideration. Nevertheless, it seems to me that there is much to be gained through discussions in committee, and particularly, if the course were followed of referring more items to special committees or to standing committees. I do not refer necessarily to military items; I refer as well to items which are of general interest to the country and to which members of the house could make their contributions. I suggest this for another reason, having regard to departmental activities. It would have the effect, if civil servants were called before those committees, of bringing the civil service more in contact with members of the House of Commons. By this means they would come more closely in contact with the people of this country, and I believe that that would be all to the good.

Referring again to the speech from the throne, we from western Canada are particularly pleased to note that the government is prepared to proceed with implementing the report of the commission on dominion-provincial relations. This, next to the successful prosecution of Canada's war effort, will be the most important item considered by this parliament. I trust that when the delegates are called together they will approach and consider this report as Canadians, recognizing that the men who made the inquiry and prepared the report were representative citizens, who were not interested in any particular section, but who gave their best efforts towards developing a policy in the interests of Canada as a whole. It would seem only reasonable, therefore, to conclude that their point of view was rational and impartial, having regard to the circumstances of all parts of the country. If the representatives of the provincial governments who are called together to consider this report will consider it in the same manner, we can hopefully look forward to something worth-while being accomplished as a result of these deliberations.

There is an opportunity of making this report the basis of a new pact of confederation. What comes from it will probably be the determining factor in cementing the far-flung sections of Canada into a closer harmony and a greater unity of purpose. The policy of the government in deciding to call together the representatives of the provinces is a proper step to take. Let us hope that these representatives will proceed earnestly and sincerely with their deliberations, and that those features of the report upon which there is agreement will be implemented without undue delay.

I wish now to talk of another matter, of more particular interest to western Canada. Coming as I do from western Canada it is to be expected that I should say a word or two with respect to the wheat situation, including some references to the general agricultural situation as I see it. In so doing, may I say to the farm people of other parts of Canada that we in the west are not unmindful of the circumstances of not only the farmers but also other primary producers in other parts of the country. We are not unmindful of the situation as it affects the fishermen of the maritime provinces or the tobacco growers of certain sections or the fruit growers in other parts of Canada. These all have their problems; likewise we have a problem in western Canada. The chief difference is that our problem happens to loom a little larger in the general economy of the country. As far as the individual is concerned, perhaps the effect on the one is no greater than it is on the other.

I have noticed that in discussions in this house so far regarding the present situation in western Canada the approach to the problem has been much more realistic and more reasonable. There may be some who may feel that we from Manitoba should not be as much concerned in this matter as those in other parts of the west, for the reason that our production is largely diversified. Even with the low price of wheat last year, only one-third of the gross return from agriculture in the province of Manitoba came from wheat. Nevertheless, to those who are growing wheat the problem is equally as important as it is to farmers in other parts of the country.

Wheat did not carry our province last year. It will not carry it this year at fifty cents a bushel net to the farmer, and at that price it never will.

In what I have to say this evening regarding the marketing of wheat I do not propose to offer a solution. I may offer some suggestions, as others have, in the hope that they may be of assistance to the government in formulating a policy for the future.

There is no doubt that so far as the country's war efforts are concerned at this time, our wheat industry appears to be one of the first casualties. We are facing not only low price but increased production and fewer markets. Nevertheless, in spite of those difficulties confronting us at present, I am not unduly pessimistic over the wheat situation. Like the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and also like my friend the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley), I think this thing will work itself out. What is essential is a little reason and care in attempting to see that the problem is properly handled.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) in his statement the other day placed on the record a great deal of valuable information which will help to bring about a proper understanding of the wheat situation, particularly with regard to the manner in which wheat was marketed during the past year. I was particularly pleased—and this is a point I wish to emphasize—that he mentioned that a policy for the coming year could be expected to be announced early in February when this house reassembles. I hope that will be so. There has been criticism of the government because of the delay last year in announcing a wheat policy. There were good reasons for delaying the announcement of policy last year. The same reasons, however, do not exist at this time.

Last year there were many uncertainties to be considered. For example, France and also the low countries were still possible purchasers of Canadian wheat. These countries are now pretty certain not to purchase Canadian wheat. Moreover we did not know by any means the size of the crop we would have or the amount of storage required. These factors are now known, or will be known by the end of this crop year. One thing that is certain from the evidence we have at present is that our storage capacity will be completely filled by the end of the crop year. That being so, it is essential for the government to take into consideration at an early date the matter of providing additional storage to house next year's crop if it is going to be marketed at all.

I want now to say a word regarding compulsory reduction of wheat acreage. Those who think we can materially reduce wheat acreage, I am afraid fail to recognize all that is involved. We can reduce our wheat acreage but, in so doing, we must of necessity turn to something else. It is not as easy as it would appear. Nature plays too great a part. As indication of the uncertainty that existed even last year with respect to the size of the wheat crop, I think it is safe to say that had we experienced another week or ten days of the kind of weather that we had during the last two weeks of July and the first week of August, we might easily have had 150,000,000 bushels less wheat, with practically a failure in coarse grains.

Let me put it another way. Had we had last year a reduction of five bushels to the acre in yield of wheat, there would have been 135,000,000 bushels less produced, which would have largely done away with our storage problem. Had there been no increase in acreage, we would have had 35,000,000 bushels less wheat. If the yield in Alberta, for example, had been the same as it was a year ago, we would have had 34,000,000 bushels less. Or had Alberta had the same crop as she did last year, we would have had 40,000,000 bushels less. I am not picking out Alberta except to illustrate the point that we cannot hope to control this matter of production. We are glad that Alberta was fortunate in having a very good crop this year.

I wish to couple what I have to say with respect to wheat with something in respect of coarse grains. I want to link up in part the live stock industry in this country and indicate the extent to which western Canada is engaged in mixed farming. There are many who think that we should further expand the development of mixed farming in western Canada. I hope that before I close I may at least indicate that we are pretty well on the way as far as mixed farming is concerned.

I should like to go back to point out one or two things that I see in the picture as far as the coarse grain situation is concerned. I do this because of the live stock population we have in Canada and more particularly because of the agreements which the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has entered into with the British government to supply that country with bacon, cheese and other dairy products. I know we want to see these agreements carried out. That being so, then we require a high production of feed grains in order to maintain our live stock.

Just by way of illustration I should like to show the situation at the present time with regard to coarse grains. The estimated production of oats, barley and rye for 1940 is 501,000,000 bushels, while the estimated consumption for the same year is 473,000,000 bushels, leaving a surplus of 28,000,000 bushels. I point out, just to indicate what might happen in this respect, that a reduction of only two bushels to the acre on the coarse grain acreage of western Canada would give us an actual shortage of 8,000,000 bushels in these grains to carry the live stock population of this country this year. From 1939 to 1940 our hog population increased by 37 per cent. The sows to farrow this fall have increased by 27 per cent compared with last year. Cattle production is up one per cent and sheep production two per cent. To-day hog production stands higher than ever before in Canada; this year the figure is 5,882,000 compared with 4,294,000 last year. Here again I would point out to my eastern friends that this year the hog population of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta is estimated at 2,640,000, while the hog population of Ontario and Quebec stands at 2,935,000. Therefore it will be seen that as far as hogs are concerned western Canada is pretty well into that business.

Figures with regard to the hog population show that this year Ontario increased hog production by 29 per cent while Manitoba increased hog production by 60 per cent; Saskatchewan, by 68 per cent, and Alberta, by 38 per cent. These figures again indicate the extent to which we in the west are already engaged in mixed farming, as well as the possibility of expanding that branch of agriculture. I could go on and say a word or two with regard to the feed situation as computed on a unit basis of live stock, compared with the unit basis of feed requirements, but I shall defer that until another time.

I think we should face this cereal production situation in Canada from a practical point of view. It is no longer a western problem only. It is a problem for all Canada, a problem for the municipalities as well as for the provincial governments. We should approach it on that basis. In that connection I think the government might well take more closely into their negotiations the producers and those primarily interested in this problem in formulating future policy, not only for wheat but as well for all other branches of agriculture.

With regard to wheat, I feel the government can now say that it knows the actual situation. It knows that at the beginning of the next crop year the storage facilities of this country will be completely occupied. The farmer knows that the government cannot be expected to continue to take a 500,000,000 bushel wheat crop year after year. Knowing these things, then, I think the government should be prepared to call to a conference the people actually producing grain along with those concerned with handling wheat, and ask them to assist in formulating a policy which they will be prepared to follow.

Just at this point may I say that I believe the farmers of western Canada are prepared to follow any reasonable lead the government will give them. They are waiting for that lead, and when it is given I believe the response will be remarkable. I suggest, therefore, that in dealing with this matter for next year, and also for future years, the government should take into consideration the advisability of referring this matter to a committee of this house to which those interested could be called. Such a committee might sit even during the recess and before it the representatives of various organizations concerned with agriculture, from eastern as well as western Canada, might appear and advance their suggestions. Following that an attempt could be made to formulate a policy to which all would adhere for the marketing of next year's crop.

A moment ago I mentioned the question of storage. I do not think there is any doubt that the government will have to assist in providing additional storage in order that next year's crop may be marketed. I think in the marketing of last year's crop we have gained some experience that will be of value to us in formulating a policy for next year. The quota system has worked with reasonable satisfaction, and I think should be continued. Perhaps certain restrictions should be introduced to deal with the man who has a large acreage. The government might at the beginning limit deliveries under the quota to five bushels to the acre for those with up to 300 acres, and then reduce the quota for the man with more than that acreage. I think farm storage should be continued. It seems only reasonable that if the farmers are to be required to store their grain at home and attempt to finance on it, they should be entitled to a storage earning equal to that of the elevator companies.

The question of credit on this farm stored grain is one of the important matters that must be considered. I am hopeful that if the grain cannot be all marketed and paid for, the government will be able to work out some arrangement under which either the banks or the elevator companies will assist in providing loans on grain that may not be delivered. The hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) suggested the summer fallowing of one-third of the acreage of western Canada and that the government should pay the farmer $5 an acre for the land summer fallowed. The cost of such a policy would be $60,000,000 or $70,000,000. I do not believe that summer fallowing on a large scale such as is suggested, is the solution to this problem. Summer fallowing, as it is done in western Canada, has many hazards and drawbacks. Certainly it does not improve the soil; as a matter of fact it may increase the yield, and it may actually encourage another period of soil drifting, which we have been trying to avoid.

So far as Manitoba is concerned, other methods than that of summer fallowing can be followed. The growing of corn now has become pretty general in the southern part of Manitoba, and can be extended. Other row crops might be introduced.

With regard to the suggestion that bonuses might be paid for summer fallowing in order to cut down wheat production, I would much prefer to see any bonus paid for grass seed, thus assisting the farmers to get a greater portion of this land back into grass.

This leads me to say a word or two with respect to the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. I hope this year the government will be able to see its way clear to increase the amount of money available for this work. I think this is one branch of agricultural policy that can do a great deal toward stabilizing western agriculture.

I would particularly urge the development of community pastures, and providing adequate water supply for live stock. In community pastures the government will have control. They could introduce first-class sires, and thus do a great deal toward improving the live stock of the country. Along with that, at the end of each season an auction sale might be held at those pasture fields, allowing the people to buy the live stock suitable for feeding purposes, instead of having the stock shipped to the central market, where additional costs are piled up against them, and from which they have to be shipped back.

Then, I believe the government should be prepared to go out and urge the farmers to do certain things. One of them is to extend our coarse grains and feed production, and reduce their wheat acreage. They should be urged to provide and store two or three years' supplies of feed. We have had crop hazards in the past. We have had crop failures. Many times we have had the situation where feed has had to be shipped in. Surely, under the circumstances as they exist to-day, and particularly having regard to the removing of a large part of our land from wheat production, it would be sound policy to urge the development and the seeding of greater acreages of coarse grains, as well as the regrassing of larger areas.

May I make one further observation to hon. members from eastern Canada. We feel that they need our coarse grains from western Canada, and we would like them to have them. This of course raises the question of the structure of domestic freight rates. I am not suggesting that we should totally disregard that structure. But in a time of war, with problems of agriculture as they are, and particularly in view of the large production in western Canada, something might be done either by way of bonusing shipments or by making some adjustment in the rate for the duration of the war so that these coarse grains might be shipped more advantageously to the farmers in eastern Canada.

I do not believe that is the only thing that is necessary. My observations lead me to the belief that a great economy could be effected in the matter of handling these grains when they arrive in the east. Purchase by carload lots and direct shipment is the proper procedure. If there are cooperative organizations or associations in a position to purchase and distribute feed grains from western Canada, I believe some policy could be worked out whereby those coarse grains could be supplied on a much more reasonable basis than they have been supplied in the past. The farmers of eastern Canada need them to finish their cattle.

Our western grains are good feed, although some people prefer corn. Probably those who have that preference would not be prepared to say that barley is the better feed. We have, however, got along well with it, and I think it will be agreed that we have been able to finish our live stock in first-class condition by the feeding of barley. Perhaps we should attempt to indicate to the farmers of eastern Canada how barley may be fed to advantage to live stock, so that the farmers in this part of the country may become more accustomed to it. I am satisfied that if that were done, barley would soon come into general use among their feeders. It has finished our cattle and hogs in the west satisfactorily.

As I said at the outset, I am not unmindful of the producers of other primary products, and particularly farm products. At the moment our wheat problem looms up in greater proportion than that of other products. We have attempted to approach the problem in as reasonable a manner as possible. All parts of Canada are interested in it. I believe the farmers in western Canada are prepared to accept any reasonable lead the government may give. I hope the people in the rest of Canada will not overlook the importance of this industry not only to the west but to Canada as a whole. Therefore it must be kept as far as possible in a state of efficient production. Otherwise, at a later time when we may need it, it may not be in a position to continue to produce wheat in the manner in which it has done in the past.

Therefore I submit that a conference of farm leaders from both the east and the west, together with representatives of provincial departments of agriculture, the federal Department of Agriculture, the wheat board, the pools, the grain trade and the banks, might well be called together to meet in conference before a committee of this house to consider the whole cereal crop position. I believe that if those representatives were brought together and shown exactly what the circumstances are, they would be prepared to go a long way toward carrying out any policy the government might formulate. Their problem is that of gaining a livelihood to carry on their business. They are prepared to do the reasonable thing, if given a lead. They are waiting for that lead, and I hope, as was indicated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that that lead may be given before the beginning of spring operations.

The other point I urge upon the government is the necessity of providing the storage which will be required to market at least part of next year's crop. That is the easiest way in which the problem of dealing with financing the crop can be handled. I do not think the costs to the federal government in acquiring additional storage need be very great. In fact, if we are obliged to carry this wheat beyond another year or a year and a half, the return in storage earnings alone should be quite enough to compensate for the outlay which might be necessary to build the storage.

That is the approach I would make to the problem, and I hope, along with other hon. members who have spoken, that something may be developed which will help to assist in remedying a situation which, so far as the farmer of western Canada is concerned, is serious.

Mr. M. E. McGARRY (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended taking part in the debate, but my reason for departing from that well-intentioned purpose is that I wish to refer to a few features of the government's war preparedness to which little reference has been made by hon. members on either side of the house who have spoken.

I wish first to refer to the war-time prices and trade board which was so wisely and so promptly appointed by the government at the very outset of the war. In that connection I would congratulate the government upon its wisdom, vigilance and foresight. This measure has offered a most effective resistance to what I might describe as internal aggression in the form of the profiteer and the hoarder. This is the element which during the last war was permitted to run an unbridled and relentless course across this dominion, a course which not only had an ill effect upon the prosecution of the war but left in its trail a period of depression and deflation from which this country had not fully recovered at the onset of the present war.

I believe that this measure not only expedited and enhanced the war effort of this dominion, but showed wise planning on the part of the government for the aftermath of the war. Some people may argue that any consideration given to the aftermath of this war is premature, but with that argument I cannot agree. While I believe that the thoughts and efforts of this nation should be concentrated upon the successful prosecution of this war, it shows wisdom on the part of this government when they give serious consideration to the day when this downpour of red rain will have ceased, when this tragedy of carnage is ended, when the men who to-day are employed in the manufacture of implements of war and destruction will have reverted to their ordinary pursuits in civil life and when trade and industry shall have toppled from the dizzy and precipitous heights of war time to the more stable economic levels of peace. This forethought at the very beginning of this war has been beneficial to the producer, to the consumer, to the wage-earner, indeed to every citizen. It has added considerably to that unity of sentiment which is so necessary in a total war effort.

While our people are tolerant of the claims that are made upon them; while they are ready to bear the expenses of this war; while our men are overseas, armed against the forces of the tyrannical aggressors, there is no individual, no corporation, no element in this dominion growing fat on the sacrifices and the needs of this nation. Military contributions alone are not sufficient if we are to resist successfully the onslaughts of the dictators.

I congratulate the government upon their vigilance and activity in dealing with the subversive fifth column. Canada, being rich in resources and so sparsely populated, provides a perfect ground for exploitation by fifth columnists. I exhort the government to continue to exercise this vigilance against this enemy in whatever form it may show its head.
