First, then, let us remember that the resources and striking power of the enemy are vastly greater than they were in the first great war. In that war the allied and associated powers were numerous indeed. Of the number, apart from the United States, which during the last year and a half was also a belligerent, France, Russia, Belgium, Portugal, and a dozen other nations which were then allied with us, are to-day neutral or have, for the time being at least, been overrun by enemy forces or compelled to give up the struggle. Italy, which was then an ally, has betrayed her ancient friendship and become the accomplice of the arch enemy. Russia is neutral and has recently concluded a new trade agreement with Germany. Because Russian trade with Germany constitutes a vast breach in the British blockade of German territory, the value of this agreement to Hitler far outweighs any concessions which he may have to make in the Balkans. Within the last few days, following the inclusion of Roumania in the economic system of nazi Germany, diplomatic relations have been severed between Roumania and Britain.

Japan, also an ally in the last war, has entered into a pact with Britain's enemies, undertaking to come to their aid if any country should try to assist her. Recent statements of Japanese political leaders have encouraged an atmosphere of impending crisis. They have likewise marked out a wide field for possible Japanese expansion southward. We shall continue to hope that the wiser counsels of the more moderate leaders in Japan will ultimately prevail. It is, however, only the part of prudence to observe that both in the statements of some of the Japanese leaders and in the movements of Japanese forces there are indications that Japan may be led to undertake aggressive action at the moment that may best serve the common cause of the aggressor nations.

The forces arrayed against us are not only vastly greater than in the last war, they occupy a strategic position far more favourable than they did at that time. Then, by heroic efforts in which our Canadian divisions played an important part, the allied and associated powers were able to hold the line, and save the channel ports. To-day the whole coast from Norway to Spain, from the Arctic ocean to the bay of Biscay, is in enemy hands. The enemy is enabled to send his raiders far out into the Atlantic. Moreover, to help in combating them we no longer have the powerful French navy at our side. Instead, we are hourly reminded that the enemy is seeking an excuse to seize the French fleet and French Mediterranean ports, to be used as weapons and bases against us.

In the air as well as at sea the strategic character of the war has also changed to the enemy's advantage. The development of aviation has vastly reduced the insular security of Britain. Hers is no longer an unmolested workshop. Factories, arsenals and shipyards have their schedules upset and their output reduced by bombardment from the air, and even more by the loss of time arising from the stopping of work during air raids. Moreover, Britain's vulnerability to air attack is relatively greater than the enemy's, due to the concentration of Britain's population and her industry, and to her dependence on overseas supplies of food, materials and munitions.

These basic difficulties in the situation should constantly be kept in mind. The very assurance of moral support, of moral and material help from the United States, is not without its bearing upon the immediate problem. With the long term issue automatically decided against the enemy if he remains inactive, Germany must now stake everything on a supreme effort to destroy the British commonwealth before the resources of the United States are fully mobilized. We may be perfectly sure that this is Hitler's plan of campaign.

No man can tell how fast or how far the red fires of war will spread before the conflagration can be brought under control. The determining factor in the matter of time is likely to be the situation as it develops in the ensuing weeks in Europe itself. Should the attack at the outset be directed wholly or in part against Britain, we have much to fortify us in our belief in the effectiveness of the resistance which the German forces will encounter. Great new armies have been raised, trained, equipped and made ready for battle. Every beach, every headland, every acre of ground where an enemy might attack has been put in a state of defence. The navy, strengthened by flotillas of destroyers from across the Atlantic, still commands the seas. The Royal Air Force, already drawing upon the output of pilots and aircrews trained in Canada under the commonwealth air training plan, continues its operations, alike of defence and offence, with unshaken resolve and even greater vigour. By day the visits of the German attacker are less frequent; by night, the latest discoveries of science are combining to beat down the indiscriminate marauders of the dark.

It was an appreciation of all these factors which led Mr. Churchill to describe 1941 as a "waiting year." It will be a year of guarding every inch of ground, of gathering together equipment and munitions, of perfecting the training of men, and the organization and coordination of forces. If it is improbable that there will be any major attack upon enemy-occupied Europe during the present year, it is equally imperative that no opportunity for preparation should be neglected.

This leads me to speak of Canada's plans for the present year. Much careful thought has been given by the war committee of the cabinet to the organization of the new phases of Canada's war effort. In working out our plans we had not only the advice of our own military and industrial experts but the benefit of first-hand knowledge gained by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) and the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) during their recent visits to the United Kingdom. A programme for 1941, based on the utilization of Canada's utmost productive capacity, has been drawn up in complete agreement with the British government. The measures which have been decided upon are being timed to fit into the programme of the admiralty, the war office, the air ministry and the supply departments of the United Kingdom.

Early this month, in a radio address to the Canadian people on the war savings campaign, I outlined the plans which have been worked out. As an introduction to the discussion of the war appropriation bill I perhaps cannot do better than to place on Hansard a brief outline of these measures. They will be dealt with in detail by my colleagues in the discussion of the bill. Perhaps this is a convenient moment at which to remind hon. members that very full reviews of Canada's war effort were given by the ministers of the departments concerned, in the debate on the address. These reviews will, of course, not need to be repeated.

To-day the strength of Canada's navy is 175 ships and over 15,000 men of all ranks. Under the new programme the expansion will continue at a rapid rate, bringing the navy by March 31, 1942, up to an estimated strength of 413 ships and 26,920 men. I should add that, in addition to the merchant ships being built in increasing numbers, it is proposed to undertake the building of destroyers in Canadian shipyards.

The plan for the army includes the dispatch overseas, successively, of:

1. The balance of the corps troops for the Canadian corps of two divisions now in England;

2. An army tank brigade for employment with the Canadian corps;

3. The third Canadian division, with its complement of corps troops; and

4. A Canadian armoured division

The air training plan will be developed vigorously and energetically throughout the year. All the projects and schools connected with the plan will be opened and in operation before September next, representing a clear gain of eight months on the original schedule. The aerodrome construction will be equal to that of last year. The present strength of the Royal Canadian Air Force will be doubled. The number of aeroplanes now in use in the air training plan, namely, 1,700 aeroplanes, will be increased to well over 4,000 before the end of this year. In Canada, our air defence will be strengthened by an increase in the number of operational squadrons attached to the home war establishment. Overseas, the three Canadian squadrons, fully equipped, manned and maintained by Canada, will be kept up to strength. There will, in addition, be constituted out of the graduate pupils of the joint air training plan, and identified as Canadian, twenty-five new squadrons. Our aircraft industry will concentrate on building in Canada enough aeroplanes for the air training plan. Our surplus capacity, at the request of the British government, will be used for the manufacture of long-range bombers which can be flown across the Atlantic.

A vast increase in production of war equipment and supplies has been arranged. Since the United States is prepared to manufacture for Britain only such munitions as are in common use for United States defence purposes, Canadian armament production during 1941 will be concentrated on types of war equipment and weapons which are not obtainable in the United States, such as mark-3 tanks, small arms, Bren guns, aircraft machine guns, and anti-tank guns. Canada will also specialize on the production of ammunition for these weapons and on the manufacture of explosives.

The production of a wide range of naval guns and 25-pounder field guns will be enlarged. Canada is the only source of supply, outside Britain, for these guns. Canada will also produce anti-tank guns for infantry use, and heavy anti-aircraft guns for defence purposes. Canada is now the only source of supply, outside Britain, for motor transport vehicles. Hon. members were, I am sure, pleased to learn that practically all of the motor vehicles in use in the African campaign were of Canadian manufacture.

It will be apparent that the needs of the armed forces and our war industry will make large demands upon available Canadian manpower. It is estimated that, for the purposes mentioned, 200,000 additional men and women will be required during the present year. An additional 100,000 will probably be needed in industries such as transport, lumbering, mining, et cetera. It is realized that industrial expansion on this scale will require the services of a large number of skilled and semi-skilled workers. Accordingly, the federal government, in cooperation with the provincial governments, is establishing vocational and plant training schools capable of training 100,000 persons a year.

In considering the magnitude of these measures and of what has already been done by the Canadian people in providing men for the armed forces and in producing weapons and materials of war, we should also remember that Canada has sent and is sending to Britain great quantities of foodstuffs and raw materials of war time industry and trade. We know from our inquiries that Britain is not now faced with any serious shortage of supplies. There are, however, commodities which the United Kingdom government has found it expedient to ration. If shipping space were not so valuable, more could and would be done to make additional provision for British needs from our surplus stocks. In foodstuffs, however, as in the provision of military aid, it is necessary to be guided by the wishes of the British government. It alone has the full knowledge enabling it to balance the need for foodstuffs and consumption goods generally against the need for arms and war materials, and to determine in what direction our aid can be most timely and most effective.

In none of its important aspects has Canada's war effort been planned in isolation. We engaged in the war as partners in a joint enterprise. If our effort is to fit into the efforts of the other British nations to produce a strong unified whole, our plans must be made in consultation with them. This does not mean that the Canadian government is not finally responsible for what is done by Canada, but it does mean that, before reaching our final decision, we discuss our plans with those with whom we are cooperating. Plans must, as I have so often said, be modified constantly to meet the shifting needs of war. This implies constant consultation in every field, military, economic and financial.

From time to time it has been suggested in Canada, in other of the dominions and also in Great Britain, that an imperial war cabinet or an imperial war council should be set up in London to give unified direction to the prosecution of the war by the nations of the British commonwealth. Those who advocate such a development are naturally thinking of what happened in the last war when such a body was found to be a useful and, indeed, a necessary instrument.

The imposing title undoubtedly has for many a certain appeal. An imperial war council composed of the prime ministers of the dominions and the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and presided over by the Prime Minister of Great Britain would in fact be an imposing body. It suggests, too, opportunities for direct and intimate conference in the shaping of a common policy for the prosecution of the war in which the whole commonwealth has so vital a concern. It may be premature to speak of such a proposal inasmuch as the British House of Commons was informed as recently as December last that "the Prime Minister does not contemplate adding representatives of the dominions to the war cabinet at the present time." The matter, however, is one which from time to time has received careful consideration. It was discussed at the beginning of the war when Mr. Chamberlain was in office, and has been considered on several occasions since. A moment may come when it will be both desirable and necessary for a conference of the kind to be held in London, or in some other part of the British empire. At present it must be obvious that with the war presenting new and most serious problems to each and every part, in no place can the presence of a prime minister be more necessary or helpful to all concerned than in his own country. The proposal can best be judged by one simple test. Is it the most effective means of achieving the desired end? All other considerations must be put aside. Perhaps the best way of approaching the subject is to ask ourselves how the end is now achieved. It is true that there is nothing imposing about the means which are employed. It may, nevertheless, be said that at this very time such a council exists in reality, although it has no visible form.

The matters of high policy, which in the imperial war council of the last war were considered around the council table by the heads of the several governments of the British empire, are to-day discussed between them by direct communication. The means and agencies of communication, in the intervening years, have alike been materially improved. The cable has been supplemented by the wireless and the transatlantic telephone. Each dominion has to-day its department of external affairs efficiently organized and in a position instantly to supplement the information essential as a background to the discussion of any problem. Not only is each government represented in London by its own special agent—a high commissioner—but the British government is also represented by a high commissioner in each of the dominions.

There are thus, so to speak, three sending and three receiving sources, through each of which special classes of communications are sent and received: (a) from prime minister to prime minister direct—those which relate to matters of high policy; (b) through the secretary of state for dominion affairs to the secretary of state for external affairs, and vice versa—matters more general in character and relating more particularly to information in detail on operations, and the progress of the war; (c) and finally, special communications supplementing those from the sources mentioned from the high commissioner to the prime minister, or to the secretary of state for external affairs and vice versa.

I might mention that in each of the dominions there are similar means and methods of consultation and communication. We are fortunate in having in our capital at this time distinguished representatives from all of the other dominions with the exception thus far, I think, of New Zealand. We have with us in the capital, as hon. members know, Mr. de Waal Meyer, as the representative of South Africa; Mr. Hearne, as the High Commissioner for Ireland, and Sir William Glasgow as High Commissioner for Australia. In these countries we are also represented by our high commissioners—in South Africa by Mr. Laureys, in Ireland by Mr. Hall Kelly, in Australia by Mr. Burchell, and in New Zealand by Doctor Riddell. There is not a day passes that communications in considerable number do not pass back and forth between Great Britain and Canada, many of which are identical with some of those sent to the other dominions. Communications sent by us to London which are likely to be of interest to the other dominions are also sent to the dominions. At the present time there are means of effective communication and consultation in all matters pertaining to the war, much more comprehensive than anything which existed during the last war. I doubt, indeed, if a more efficient arrangement could possibly be made.

The real but invisible imperial council made possible by these means of constant and instantaneous conference has one all-important advantage which would be denied to an imperial war council sitting in London. It affords the prime minister of each of the dominions the opportunity of discussing immediately with his colleagues in his own cabinet all aspects of every question raised. His expression of view, when given, is not his alone—it is the expression of view of the cabinet of which he is the head. It is an expression of view given by the cabinet in the light of its responsibility to parliament. It is, moreover, an expression of view given in the atmosphere, not of London, but of the dominion itself.

In war time, most decisions have to be made quickly. On that score alone, let me compare the two methods. If the prime ministers of the dominions were meeting in an imperial war cabinet in London, they would have either to act on their own exclusive responsibility without regard to their colleagues, or, alternatively, to hold up proceedings while they communicated with their governments at home. On the other hand, the existing arrangements permit the prime minister to consult his colleagues at once when any matter is communicated to him from another commonwealth government which requires an immediate decision. A decision can be reached at once with the secure knowledge that it represents authoritatively and finally the government as a whole.

Direct consultations have been and may continue to be necessary from time to time. They, however, are likely to be most required concerning aspects of the common war effort which necessitate detailed inquiry. Five members of the present government have already visited the United Kingdom since the outbreak of the war. Their visits have been of the greatest assistance to the government in coordinating our war effort with the war effort of the United Kingdom. I believe that these visits, supplementing as they do the regular channels of communication I have described, serve the common cause more effectively than arrangements which would be more formal and imposing.

There is an even more important consideration. Situations, as I have already said, are constantly arising which affect different parts of the British commonwealth in different ways. To meet these situations, the presence of the prime minister in immediate contact with his colleagues in his own country is of the highest importance. Such a situation was that occasioned for Canada by the sudden collapse of France. Such a situation is that which at the moment is presenting itself in the orient.

I think I have only to ask hon. members of this House of Commons if they were, at the moment, called upon to decide whether it would be better to have the Prime Minister of Canada attending at the present time a council in London or to have him here in this House of Commons in immediate association with his colleagues and in a position to confer with them, not only from day to day, and hour to hour, but from moment to moment; whether they would not consider, in a situation such as exists at this time, that it is better for him to be here at the head of the government, and at the head of the country which has elected him to office. I believe this would equally be the view of the government and the people of the United Kingdom.

The possibility of immediate personal contact between the Prime Minister of Canada and the President of the United States, in critical situations affecting the relations between the United States and the British commonwealth, may easily be more important to the common cause than any service which a prime minister of Canada could render at the council table in London.

The united national support of each dominion for its war effort will continue throughout the war to be more important than all else. Under constantly changing conditions, that unity will, I believe, be better maintained by the presence of the prime minister at the head of the administration at home than at the council table in London. What I have said about the Prime Minister of Canada applies, I believe, equally to the prime ministers of the other self-governing dominions. I am looking at the situation as we all know it to be at the present moment. I ask hon. members to consider whether the people of South Africa or the people of the United Kingdom would wish to have General Smuts in London at the present time, or would prefer to have him where he is in South Africa. I must ask a similar question with respect to the prime ministers of the other dominions.

It has also been suggested that the Canadian cabinet should be enlarged to include a minister for overseas affairs who would reside in London and have immediate charge of all Canadian war activities in the United Kingdom and elsewhere overseas. This suggestion is based on the practice in the last war when, for special reasons then existing, such a minister was found necessary by the government of the day. There are several reasons why the present government has felt that no such appointment is now desirable. In the first place, the office of the high commissioner in London is well organized and well staffed. The high commissioner himself has had a long experience in dealing with the various departments of the British government. A new appointee, without Mr. Massey's experience, could not possibly discharge these functions so well. Moreover, in view of the wholly satisfactory, indeed, the splendid services Mr. Massey has been rendering in his present position, the appointment of an overseas minister could scarcely be regarded as other than a reflection upon the high commissioner. Mr. Massey himself is a member of the Canadian privy council. His membership in the cabinet could add little to his authority.

It may even be questioned whether membership in the cabinet would not be embarrassing to the Canadian government representative in London, as well as to the government itself. If he were in the cabinet, his slightest word would probably be regarded as the opinion of Canada. It would be difficult and awkward for him either to refer questions to his colleagues in Ottawa, or not to refer them. If he made a practice of consulting his colleagues, he would seem to have little authority himself; if he failed to consult them, the result would be divided responsibility and uncertainty of jurisdiction, which could hardly fail to have unfortunate results.

It is the opinion of the government that Canadian interests in London and cooperation with the United Kingdom are better served by the system of consultation I have already described and by the present arrangement of having a high commissioner permanently resident there, and by the occasional visits of ministers from the cabinet at Ottawa who do not remain long enough to lose contact with Canadian conditions and the circumstances with which the government is contending at home. I might add that not the least significant of the achievements in Canada's war effort thus far has been the close cooperation and whole-hearted good-will which has characterized the relations between Canadian civil and military authorities in London and between the Canadian and British authorities there, as well as between the Canadian and British governments.

I should like, at this point, to say a word respecting the splendid work which Mr. Massey and his staff are performing. Their devotion, in difficult and often dangerous circumstances, is beyond praise. Mr. Massey himself has discharged his manifold and exacting duties with quite exceptional skill, discretion, and patience. He is a representative of whom all Canadians have every reason to be proud.

It has been the settled policy of the government not to extend diplomatic representation to countries in Europe during the continuation of hostilities. We are, however, continuing to maintain our diplomatic representation to the governments of Belgium and Holland, which, forced to flee from their own capitals, have been set up in London. These countries, neutral during the first eight months of the war, are now allies, and though their home countries have been overrun and at present lie subjected to the German invaders, they continue to control rich colonial empires and large mercantile fleets of great value to the allied cause. Mr. Jean Desy, Canadian minister to Belgium and Holland, has returned to Canada, but we are maintaining a chargé d'affaires in London to keep in touch with these governments and to deal with the questions which arise from time to time involving our collaboration with them as allies against a common enemy.

Diplomatic relations with France are on a slightly different footing. Colonel George P. Vanier, our minister at Paris, has returned to Canada, and has been asked, in view of his military training and experience, to serve on the Canadian section of the permanent joint board on defence. Mr. Pierre Dupuy, formerly on the staff of the Paris legation, is, however, remaining in London, where, among other duties, he is continuing to have regard for the needs and the repatriation of Canadian nationals who were unable to make an escape at the time of the invasion.

Few if any events have affected Canadians more profoundly than the tragic fate that has befallen France. We have not permitted her misfortunes to lessen our efforts on her behalf. Convinced that we are fighting her battle as well as our own, we are continuing our diplomatic relations with her, in the firm belief that whatever the pressure put upon her by an unscrupulous enemy, France will suffer herself to be destroyed before she will take up arms against Britain, or permit her fleet or naval bases on the Mediterranean to fall into German hands.

The diplomatic position with respect to France is, of course, more delicate than with regard to the other two countries I have mentioned, because of the fact that the French government, overwhelmed by the German onslaught, has entered into an armistice with the enemy. We in Canada, however, have no wish to add to the heavy burdens and difficulties which she is facing under the heel of a ruthless and arrogant conqueror, and so long as France takes no action that is contrary to the interest of Canada or her allies, there are the strongest of reasons why we should continue our present relations. We are well aware of the pressure which the enemy is exerting to secure her collaboration in the organization of Europe under German hegemony and control. We will, however, do nothing to stir up bitterness or recrimination over what is past, but will ever seek to encourage the French people to remain true to their great tradition, and to find once again their historic position in Europe and their high place in the comity of nations.

The situation in the far east, of which I spoke quite frankly in this house on November 12, has unfortunately continued to give cause for growing apprehension—an apprehension which is not lessened by the recent Japanese intervention as a mediator in the dispute between French Indo-China and Thailand, the new name for the old kingdom of Siam. As I have already said, the utterances of some Japanese statesmen have been far from conciliatory.

The decision of the Japanese government to ally itself with Germany and Italy, under certain conditions, has undoubtedly greatly increased tension in the whole Pacific area. We have done what we could do to lessen that tension and to avoid any occasion for its further development. We have been glad to welcome to Ottawa the new Minister from Japan, Mr. Seijiro Yoshizawa, who has come to take the post ably filled during the past two years by Baron Tomii. In a period when national passions are aroused, a period which is marked by so much suspicion of motives and of aims, when it is so easy to engender misunderstanding and ill will, we have tried to avoid any occasion for provocation or offence, we have sought to avoid propagandist activity, we have followed developments with forbearance and restraint, and have done our utmost to conserve a maximum of good will in a strife-torn world.

Partly, perhaps, as a result of growing tension in the far east, we recently witnessed an unfortunate recrudescence of anti-oriental and particularly anti-Japanese feeling in British Columbia. This campaign was characterized by wholly unsubstantiated and irresponsible charges and accusations against our fellow nationals and other residents of British Columbia who are of Japanese racial origin. As a result, public opinion was becoming aroused and unjustified fears were being entertained.

In order to obtain a complete and accurate picture of the actual situation on the Pacific coast, the government appointed a special committee composed of persons with a particular knowledge of British Columbia and of the Japanese. This commitee made a careful investigation and has presented a report and recommendations which have now been tabled in parliament. The government has approved the report and is carrying its recommendations into effect.

I shall close this necessarily very brief review of our relations with countries with which Canada has exchanged diplomatic representatives with a word or two concerning our relations with the United States. In a world in which the old methods of free and open discussion, and the old objectives of close and friendly collaboration between nations, have been so greatly curtailed, and over so large an area have disappeared altogether, it is a matter of special satisfaction that, in spite of the stresses and strains of war, our relations with our great neighbour, the United States, have, if anything, grown more cordial, friendly, helpful, and constructive. It is particularly gratifying also to see that there exists not only between our two governments but between our two nations, so perfect an understanding.

I have already referred to the rapidly growing realization by the American people that the fate of our democratic way of life is intimately bound up with the great cause in which we are actively engaged, and to the measures they are taking to make an effective contribution to our success in that struggle. I should like to add a word or two respecting an undertaking nearer home, one of the most important of our joint activities—the permanent joint board on defence. Since its formation in August a considerable number of surveys have been made on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of Canada and the United States, in which military, naval and air experts of both countries have taken part. Detailed reports have been prepared for the consideration of the two governments and appropriate action based thereon is being taken. These activities, touching on the joint defence of our coasts from possible overseas attack will continue to engage the closest attention of both governments and their expert advisers. I am heartily glad to record our deep satisfaction with the progress that has been made, and that intimate cooperation has been established in so vital a field.

Our own relations with the United States form but a part, a segment, of the great circle of friendships which now draw together the peoples of the English-speaking world. These friendships make especially intimate the relations at Washington between the representatives of the various parts of the commonwealth, and with the government of the United States to which they are all accredited. The sudden death of Lord Lothian, the warm-hearted and clear-seeing representative of His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom, at the zenith of his career as a great ambassador and interpreter of his country to the United States, has been most keenly felt. This is true not only in government and diplomatic circles in Washington, where his great abilities were recognized and appreciated, but also here in Canada, where he had so many warm friends and admirers. The strain imposed on the head of a diplomatic mission in Washington in the midst of a great war in which the moral and material support of the United States may be a factor of decisive importance, is exceptionally great. It was undoubtedly a contributing factor in Lord Lothian's death at the early age of fifty-eight.

I regret to have to inform the house of the present indisposition of our own minister to Washington, Mr. Loring C. Christie, who was a close personal friend of Lord Lothian for nearly a quarter of a century. Mr. Christie was appointed to the post of Canadian minister to the United States shortly after the outbreak of war, and within a month or two of the arrival of Lord Lothian as British ambassador. Like him, Mr. Christie had had long experience in responsible administrative posts and possessed a wide and intimate knowledge of the United States, where he was already on terms of personal friendship with leading figures in the United States government.

May I say that I have been amazed, and I might add, in the circumstances, not a little pained to observe recently slighting and belittling references to Mr. Christie. Men who spend their lives in the public service, even in the most responsible posts, are rarely well known to the general public. By the very nature of their work, they do not come in contact with the public, and uninformed persons know little of the contribution they are making to the solution of difficult questions, or the administration of public affairs. After a distinguished academic career at Acadia university in Nova Scotia and later at Harvard university in the United States, Mr. Christie was appointed by Sir Robert Borden, at the age of twenty-eight, to the post of legal adviser to the Department of External Affairs and took part, with his chief, in the work of the imperial war conferences of 1917 and 1918 in London, and the peace conference at Paris in 1919. He attended the international labour conference at Washington in the same year, and was on the Canadian delegation to the first assembly of the League of Nations at Geneva in 1920. He was technical adviser to the Canadian delegation at the imperial conference in London in 1921 and to the delegation to the conference on limitation of arms which met in 1921-22 at Washington. During the latter part of this conference, indeed, he acted as secretary-general of the British empire delegation, and carried out his work in a manner that earned him the high praise of Mr. Balfour who headed the British delegation.

In 1923, Mr. Christie severed for a time his connection with the Department of External Affairs. He returned, however, in 1935. During the ensuing four years which preceded the outbreak of war, he attended a number of international conferences, either as technical adviser or as government representative. He also was immediately concerned with the more difficult problems coming before the Department of External Affairs. His intimate knowledge of constitutional and international law and of international affairs and his sound judgment were of the greatest possible assistance during those troubled years. When the war finally broke over the world and a vacancy occurred in the post of Canadian minister to Washington, I decided that, of all the Canadians available, Mr. Christie was by his training, experience and character, outstandingly qualified to represent the Canadian government in Washington.

The special conditions arising out of the war made many and heavier demands on the Canadian legation than ever before. Mr. Christie's intimate knowledge of government and administrative processes at Washington and of the questions arising between Canada and the United States proved of immense value, enabling him to perform services of the greatest usefulness to Canada.

Since his illness, which has been brought on to a considerable extent at least by the heavy pressure of his official duties, and the whole-hearted way in which he has thrown himself into them, Mr. Merchant Mahoney, counsellor of the legation, who has been on the legation staff since its establishment and who is probably more familiar with the departments of the government at Washington and the work they are carrying on than any other diplomat in that capital, has done outstanding service, and with the assistance of an efficient and hard-working staff has carried on the heavy work devolving on the Canadian legation. I can assure the house that Canada's interests at Washington have not been allowed to suffer in consequence of Mr. Christie's illness. It is apparent, however, that Mr. Christie's condition of health will necessitate immediate provision for additional or other representation at Washington. The matter has been under review and I expect to be in a position to make an announcement with respect thereto in the course of a few days.

The appointment of Lord Halifax as British ambassador to Washington marked a further stage in the development of relations between the United States and the British commonwealth. The increased importance of British representation at Washington was further emphasized by the appointment of Sir Gerald Campbell as British minister to the United States, where he will serve as Lord Halifax's principal collaborator. I cannot express too warmly the appreciation felt by my colleagues and myself of the exceedingly helpful as well as very pleasant relations which existed between Sir Gerald and ourselves throughout the whole of the time he held the office of High Commissioner for the United Kingdom in Canada. I am sure hon. members will wish me to express our regret that Sir Gerald Campbell has left Ottawa, and at the same time to voice our congratulations on his new honour.

We are fortunate, indeed, that Sir Gerald Campbell is to be succeeded by a high commissioner who comes to us not as a stranger but as a friend. The government was particularly gratified to learn of the appointment of the Right Hon. Malcolm MacDonald. An especially warm welcome awaits Mr. MacDonald as the new tenant of Earnscliffe.

For the past decade or two, the countries of South America have been making especially rapid strides not only in the development of their rich and varied natural resources, and in trade with other countries, but in all the activities which go to the development of national life and international relations. Since the outbreak of war, and the consequent cutting off of commercial and cultural relations with Europe, their economic and political importance has greatly increased.

As hon. members are aware, we have been represented at various commercial centres in Latin America by the Canadian trade commissioner service, which, under the direction of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon), has done splendid work in the promotion of markets for a wide variety of Canadian products and in making known trade opportunities to Canadian firms engaged in the export field. Trade commissioners deal with the business world but they do not have access to governments. In recent years, the question of market opportunities has been complicated by import restrictions, quotas, exchange controls, barter and clearing agreements, and other governmental restrictions on trade. In order to secure needed adjustments and modifications where our interests are concerned, it is desirable to be able to enter into discussions with the governments themselves. The war, shutting off European markets and European sources of supply, will greatly stimulate intra-American trade and may well raise problems which will require the careful attention of governments. Moreover, the war has given a new importance, not merely to trade questions, but to the development of mutual understanding and friendly relations on the broadest basis.

As I intimated earlier in the present session, on November 14, 1940, the government has decided to exchange diplomatic representatives with the two largest and most important of the South American republics. For some years both Brazil and Argentina have expressed a desire to enter into diplomatic relations with Canada. They have recently named ministers to Ottawa. We shall be glad to welcome them to Canada, not only in their personal and representative capacities but as a further evidence of the growing importance of these countries and of the close and cordial relations which happily exist between Canada and South America.

Provision is being made in the estimates for the establishment of Canadian legations in the Argentine and Brazil. When the necessary appropriations have been made, I hope to be in a position to announce the names of the Canadian representatives to both of these countries.

I should perhaps add that approaches have been made by other Latin American republics looking to an exchange of ministers with Canada. Their position, however, is somewhat different. While I should not wish it to be understood that further extension of our representation is contemplated at the moment, I should wish it to be known that the government will continue to give the most friendly consideration to the general question.

For the League of Nations the past year has been one of exceptional difficulty. This has been the case, not only because of the cynical disregard of the league's principles and the overrunning of several of its members by the aggressor states, but also because of the withdrawal of certain neutral countries and the difficulty of communicating with the seat of the league in Geneva. While the political activities of the league have had to be greatly curtailed, or abandoned, it is of first importance that the economic, financial and humanitarian work which the league has been so successfully carrying on should be continued and the machinery for that work be maintained. The Canadian government has therefore supported the decision of the acting secretary-general to transfer part of that work to the United States where the facilities of the Institute for Advanced Study at Princeton have been placed at the disposal of sections of the secretariat dealing with the economic, financial and transit questions.

We have also been glad to welcome to Canada members of the international labour office, who, under the direction of the Hon. John G. Winant, recently named United States ambassador to Great Britain, have been provided with working quarters for the duration of the war by McGill University, Montreal. The work of this great organization is important not only in helping to solve problems arising from or made acute by the war, but also the problems which, if experience is any guide, the after-war period may be expected to bring with it. We are therefore glad of every opportunity to assist in making it possible to carry on in Canada the services and studies which, because of the dislocations of the war, can no longer be effectively carried on from Geneva.

It would not be fitting that I should conclude this review of Canada's external affairs and of our present international relations without reference to the loss Canada has sustained since the house last met, in the passing of one of the noblest of her sons and one of the greatest of her public servants, whose life was so completely identified with world affairs.

Seventeen years ago, Doctor O. D. Skelton entered the service of Canada at my request. For sixteen years he was Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs. Before he came to Ottawa his teaching had inspired thousands of young Canadians. Throughout his whole life he enriched our national heritage by his scholarship, our national service by his labours, and innumerable lives by the gift of his friendship.

The outbreak of war and the anxieties of the years which immediately preceded it threw new and heavy burdens on the Department of External Affairs. In spite of failing health, the advice of his doctor and the entreaties of his friends, Doctor Skelton insisted on shouldering far more than his full share of them. I have never seen anything which surpassed his devotion to duty as exemplified in his daily work. His death was marked by expressions of sorrow, admiration and affection almost unprecedented. Many notable messages bore witness to his great work, not only for Canada and the British commonwealth but for the cause of international good will and human understanding the world over.

Only those who have had the closest association with Doctor Skelton during those seventeen years could begin to know what his life meant to the public service of this country. Selfless and self-effacing labour, the highest integrity, and the enlightened use of whatever leisure was granted to him were the measure of his devotion to his native land. Throughout the many tributes that were paid to his work and his memory there ran the theme of his modesty, his kindliness and the example he set and created for the young men who grew up with him in the diplomatic service of the department of which he was the permanent head. It is impossible for me to express in words what I owe to his wisdom, his experience, his counsel and his faithful friendship.

It is a matter of common knowledge that Mr. Bennett, who knew and appreciated the eminent virtues of this great public servant, offered him a knighthood, which Doctor Skelton felt obliged to decline. I wished to submit his name to the representative of the king for a privy councillorship, not as an honour or reward but as a sworn relationship which I deemed appropriate to the performance of his highly confidential duties. This position he was unwilling to accept. He believed that men in the public service could best carry on their work by remaining in the background of anonymity and retiring from the light of public favour. He refused to accept any honour or position which would appear to remove him from the level of his fellow workers or create any barrier or embarrassment between him and them. He hated notoriety, controversy, publicity and everything that was blatant or garish. He knew that the great things in life are wrought in the stillness and solitude of the mind of man, and that reflection and silence become a trusted servant of the people far more than speech and the glitter of the limelight.

By his own modest acceptance of these high traditions of the public service, which he did so much to create, he fashioned the pattern of the Department of External Affairs. Like Doctor Skelton I have always believed, and I believe this house will agree, that the quiet persistent dedication of Canada to the cause of international understanding best fulfils our mission, and perhaps destiny, in a stricken world.

The result of Doctor Skelton's example and influence is that to-day in the Department of External Affairs, in London, in Washington, and elsewhere throughout the world this nation is served by men who, thinking nothing of public acclaim, of personal distinction, or of public reward, have laboured without ostentation, steadily and silently, for the great cause which has been entrusted to their hands.

The name of Doctor Skelton deserves honour on the lips and in the hearts of all Canadians. While he asked for no reward while he lived, he would be humbly proud to know that in the remembrance of his life and labour Canadians found a new dedication and a continuing devotion to national unity, international good will, and the thoughtful and unselfish labour without which they cannot be maintained.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I at the very outset associate myself with the remarks which my right hon. friend has made with reference to the late under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, Doctor Skelton. It was my privilege and pleasure to know Doctor Skelton intermittently over a period of twenty years. Of course I had not anything like the contact that my right hon. friend, or even other members of the present administration, would have had with Doctor Skelton in his lifetime in the course of his duties. But I had sufficient contact with him to know that he was a great scholar and, may I say, a great gentleman. I think I can pay no greater tribute to his memory than to say that he was probably one of the best public servants that Canada has ever produced.

With the early part of my right hon. friend's remarks as to the seriousness of the present situation we on this side of the house are in agreement. Anyone who has observed events as they have occurred during the last few days; anyone who has been observing with anxiety, as I know we all have, the trend of events in the various theatres of war, particularly the continent of Europe, the Mediterranean area and the far east, must be impressed with the thought that within a very, very limited period of time an effort will be made by the axis powers to crush our mother country. In the defeat of that effort Canada will, I am sure, do her part.

To-night I do not wish to say more with respect to the statement of my right hon. friend. With many of the things he has said no doubt we are all in agreement. I am rather intrigued, however, by the number of shadow men, straw men, that he has put up to be knocked down, and I am just wondering what is the implication behind a large portion of his remarks in that regard. Therefore, sir, I move the adjournment of this debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 5.58 p.m.

Tuesday, February 18, 1941.

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. POULIOT

REFERENCE TO EDITORIAL IN THE TORONTO GLOBE AND MAIL

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. The Toronto Globe and Mail published on December 17 last an editorial in which the following sentence appears:

How was Mr. Purvis honoured by the Canadian government for the time and energy he gave unsparingly? When his report was under debate in the House of Commons in April, 1938, the Liberal member for Témiscouata created a scene by throwing a copy on the floor and calling it "rotten", demanding the deportation of Mr. Purvis to his native country, England, as an undesirable. Although Hon. Norman Rogers, Minister of Labour, rebuked the irresponsible member, we have no information that Prime Minister King was moved out of his complacency.

The Globe and Mail was born of a merger of two respectable papers, one being the Globe, which was a respectable Liberal organ. In its issue of May 24, 1935, the Globe carried an editorial entitled "'Irresponsible'—Never", which reads as follows:

An Ottawa dispatch from the editor of the Globe, appearing in yesterday's issue, contained one of those unfortunate errors generally classified as "typographical", and one which, in this instance, was particularly ridiculous. As written in Ottawa it referred to M. Jean-François Pouliot as "the irrepressible member for Témiscouata"; in print the word "irrepressible" became "irresponsible"!

The member for Témiscouata being anything but "irresponsible", the mistake is obvious to those who know him. If "irrepressible" had been changed to "irresistible", indefatigable", or any one of a dozen other words that would apply aptly to M. Pouliot, it would not have been so bad—but "irresponsible" is the limit of absurdity. However, the imp that muddies such things had its way.

M. Pouliot is among the valuable members of the house, well informed on all subjects; a tireless worker, who of late has added to his parliamentary duties the difficult task of compiling a sadly needed classification of unemployed persons in Canada, which will be of the greatest value in relief work.

The editorial concludes with a quotation from Horace Greeley.

The other parent of the Globe and Mail was the Mail and Empire, a highly respectable Tory paper, which in its issue of May 18, 1936, referred to the member for Temiscouata in these words:

Mr. Pouliot is just about the most interesting and the most hopeful figure which the present parliament possesses. . . .

Likeable and always courteous, sincere and hard-working. Such are the attributes which commend him. . . . The only sure conclusion is that he is definitely one of parliament's significant personalities. It is likely that democracy could not function if every member of parliament insisted on being a Pouliot.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT:

It is also a fact, however, that many of the abler members of parliament would go far towards restoring parliament to its traditional ideal if they fashioned themselves more on the Pouliot model of independence to party domination, and diligence.

Now, sir, just one word. I was mentioning the fact that the Globe and Mail was produced by merging two respectable papers, one Liberal and one Tory; and the result is a still-born shrimp—un avorton mort-né—which is a true emblem of the national government which is advocated by such hon. members as the member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce).

WAR MUNITIONS AND MATERIALS

JOHN INGLIS COMPANY—TABLING OF CONTRACTS AND ORDERS IN COUNCIL

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I desire to lay on the table, as requested by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) all contracts between the Department of Munitions and Supply and the John Inglis company, and copies of all orders in council passed in that connection.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

QUESTION AS TO CARRYING OUT OF SOME OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF ROWELL-SIROIS REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to ask a question of the Prime Minister. In a return tabled yesterday, sessional paper 103C, being the correspondence between the dominion government and the governments of Manitoba and Saskatchewan with reference to the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations, there appears a letter under date September 23, 1940, from the Prime Minister of Canada to the Premier of Manitoba. In that letter appears the following paragraph:

You will appreciate that it may be possible to carry out some of the commission's recommendations without calling a conference in the first instance. So far as it may appear to be in the national interest and that of the provinces so to do, the government intends to proceed accordingly.

Will the Prime Minister be good enough to indicate to the house at an early day what recommendations of the so-called Sirois commission might, in the opinion of the government, be carried out without the calling of a conference in the first instance, and what action is now proposed by the government with respect to such recommendations?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): As my hon. friend has been kind enough to ask me to reply to that question at an early day, I shall be happy to do so.

Mr. HANSON (York Sunbury): Very well.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDER 60 TO PROCEED WITH WAR APPROPRIATION MEASURE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): It was understood at the time of adjournment yesterday that, if the house would give its consent to-day, the government would proceed with the introduction of the resolution on which the war appropriation bill for 1941-42 is based. To proceed, however, with that resolution will require, as I have indicated, not only the unanimous consent of the house but its consent to waiving standing order 60, which is as follows:

> If any motion be made in the house for any public aid or charge upon the people, the consideration and debate thereof may not be presently entered upon, but shall be adjourned till such further day as the house thinks fit to appoint; and then it shall be referred to a committee of the whole house, before any resolution or vote of the house do pass thereupon.

The motion to ask the consent of the house to dispense with standing order 60 will be put by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) when he requests permission to introduce the resolution. I am referring to the matter at the outset in order that hon. members may appreciate the procedure suggested and comment upon it if they so desire. Hon. members will see that the regular procedure, if one followed the rules literally, would prevent the house having before it any explanation of the war appropriation bill earlier than Thursday of this week; because, while the notice appears on the votes and proceedings of to-day, to-morrow it would appear under government orders, and at that time the Minister of Finance in giving notice of his intention to proceed would be obliged to advise the house that His Excellency the Governor General had been informed of the subject matter of the resolution and recommended it to the consideration of the house, and that on the day following he would move that the house go into committee of the whole to consider the resolution. To follow that routine of procedure—which has much to commend it at certain times but would seem rather to impede progress at the present time—would occasion delay and would, I imagine, deprive hon. members getting, as early as they would wish to receive it, the information which the Minister of Finance would give on presenting the resolution.

May I say that the government has no desire to press any of its measures at any stage unless so doing is going to accommodate the house generally. I should like it to be distinctly understood that we will not press for the advancement of the resolution by a single stage, certainly not at this stage of the reassembling of the house. But I do think hon. members will agree that it would be desirable to have some business to proceed with this afternoon. If the motion is carried we will then have the opportunity of receiving at once a statement on the war appropriation bill from the Minister of Finance. How much further proceedings should be carried will be, of course, a matter for the house itself to decide.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to say on behalf of this party that we are cognizant of all the things which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has alluded to. Further I would like to observe that probably this is the most important resolution in size or magnitude, measured by dollars and cents, which has ever come before the Canadian House of Commons. The figures which have been spoken of and which will be revealed are almost fabulous to us who deal in small things. Therefore I agree with the Prime Minister that there should not be the slightest move on the part of anyone, least of all the government, to press the matter forward. But I do think it would be a pity if we should have to wait two days formally to get the matter before this House of Commons and to have the minister make his opening statement.

So far as we are concerned we shall be glad to waive the rules with respect to notice and have the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) make his motion this afternoon, and his preliminary speech, on the understanding that the debate will be adjourned in order that I, and everybody else I would hope, may give due consideration to the magnitude of this proposal of the government, having regard to the times through which we are passing. The figures are astonishing. The Canadian people must be brought to a realization of the greatness of the effort as measured in terms of dollars and cents and all that that implies. Therefore, so far as we are concerned, we shall facilitate the introduction of the motion on the understanding that ample time be given not only for the membership of this house but for the general public, through the medium of the great press of Canada, to understand just what is involved in it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand the leader of the opposition to say that he gives his consent to the motion being immediately introduced by the Minister of Finance, on the understanding that if the motion carries and the minister introduces the resolution and makes his speech thereon the debate will then be adjourned.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is my understanding.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I observe that we are perhaps apt to forget that parliament has been already in session for four or five weeks. Hon. members may not recall as clearly as they would had there been no adjournment, what was said during the debate on the address. If the session were being opened now, I should feel that, at the time of the introduction of the war appropriation bill, it would be desirable for the ministers of defence and the Minister of Munitions and Supply to make statements outlining the activities of their departments in relation to Canada's war effort. But these statements, however, have already been made. They appear in Hansard. For that reason the government does not propose to have that particular course repeated at this time.

Hon. members will recall that when the war appropriation bill was introduced at the last session, I made in concise form a statement setting forth the government's war effort programme. Yesterday, speaking on foreign affairs, I took advantage of the opportunity to include in my remarks a concise statement of the government's present programme. There will be no necessity, therefore, to repeat that statement.

I mention these two facts as hon. members, in debating this particular resolution and the bill, may wish to refresh their memories by looking up in Hansard the reviews made by my colleagues and the activities of these several departments and also should they so desire that portion of my remarks of yesterday outlining the government's war programme. For this reason, I agree with the leader of the opposition that it would be in the interests of all concerned to have at this stage of the session, an adjournment after the Minister of Finance has spoken. I share his view that there has never been any measure introduced in the parliament of Canada which has involved as large an expenditure as the bill which will be based upon the resolution which is to be presented to-day. I believe that the public of Canada will appreciate the desire of hon. members to have as much time as possible carefully to study that statement in all its implications before beginning to debate the resolution. The public will realize that, as we have just come back after an adjournment of several weeks, the only means whereby such an opportunity could satisfactorily be afforded would be to adjourn the proceedings of the house for the remainder of the day so that hon. members might prepare themselves for further debate to-morrow.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): As the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has said, it will be impossible for me to make the motion without the unanimous consent of the house, which I understand is being given. As I understand the procedure, I make two motions. The first is that the house resolve itself into committee of the whole immediately. If that passes I then move that the Speaker leave the chair, and on that motion I make such remarks as I have to submit to the house.

I move:

That the house resolve itself into committee of the whole this day to consider a resolution to provide that moneys be granted to His Majesty towards defraying expenses or making advances or loans during the year ending March 31, 1942, and that standing order 60 be suspended in relation thereto.

His Excellency the Governor General having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. ILSLEY moved:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair.

He said: I wish to speak to this motion. Perhaps the shortest way in which I can bring the subject matter of the resolution before the house is to read the resolution as it appears in the Votes and Proceedings:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide, inter alia,

1. That sums not exceeding $1,300,000,000 be granted to his majesty towards defraying any expenses or making any advances or loans that may be incurred or granted by or under the authority of the governor in council during the year ending March 31, 1942, for—

(a) the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada;

(b) the conduct of naval, military and air operations in or beyond Canada;

(c) promoting the continuance of trade, industry and business communications, whether by means of insurance or indemnity against war risk or in any other manner whatsoever; and

(d) the carrying out of any measure deemed necessary or advisable by the governor in council in consequence of the existence of a state of war.

2. That the governor in council be empowered to raise by way of loan under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, such sum or sums of money, not exceeding in the whole the sum of $1,300,000,000 as may be required for the purpose of defraying such expenses or making such advances or loans, the principal and interest of any such loan to be a charge upon and payable out of the consolidated revenue fund.

3. That the governor in council be empowered to reexpend, advance or loan moneys that may be received by way of refund or repayment of advances, loans or expenditure under the war appropriation acts of 1939 (2nd session), 1940 and 1941.

If this resolution pass it will be followed by a bill, the War Appropriation Act of 1941. This bill will be substantially in the same form as the War Appropriation Act passed last summer. The essential features of the bill are:

(2) A grant of borrowing authority; that is to say, it gives the governor in council power to borrow funds to pay for any of the expenditures covered by the vote of credit.

The only change of substance is a provision authorizing the governor in council to reexpend refunds of expenditure or repayments of advances or loans made under this or any previous war appropriation act. For example when a dominion wholly-owned corporation buys, let us say, rubber or silk, the purchase price is charged against the war appropriation. Later the government corporation sells the rubber or silk to firms which have war contracts, and the government is reimbursed for its original expenditure. The purpose of the amendment—perhaps I should call it the new feature of this bill—is to allow the amount reimbursed to be reexpended without making an additional appropriation.

The same principle is involved in connection with temporary advances or loans which are really in the nature of revolving funds. The adoption of the new principle will avoid duplication or pyramiding of expenditures or loans.

Perhaps I should follow the precedent which was set in the introduction of war appropriation bills in the last war, and give the house some indication of the expenditures that were made under the last War Appropriation Act. It might be more appropriate if I did that at the time of the introduction of a supplementary war appropriation act, which will be necessary before the end of the present fiscal year, but it is a little difficult for the house to give intelligent consideration to the war appropriation bill which we are introducing now unless the house knows something of the disposition that was made of the moneys provided by the last War Appropriation Act.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Expenditures under last year's act:

Under the War Appropriation Act of 1940, which was assented to on May 29, $700,000,000 were provided for war expenditures. In the budget brought down by the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), then Minister of Finance, in June of 1940, he stated that the amount required for the full fiscal year would be larger than this total by perhaps $150,000,000 to $200,000,000.

On the second day of August last I spoke in this house and indicated that the total commitments then outstanding for the present fiscal year were approximately $940,000,000. I think the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) will remember that occasion, because for some days he was pressing the government to state what the commitments were for the present fiscal year, and $940,000,000 was the best estimate we could make then, after crediting the money that we expected to be repaid to us by the United Kingdom government.

Now, what has been the actual experience? For this fiscal year up to January 31 the actual cash outgo on the dominion war account has amounted to $538,804,000, excluding $27,133,000 of disbursements recoverable from the United Kingdom or other allied governments. This amount is broken down as follows:

Militia services	$268,686,000
Naval services	57,990,000
Air Force
Home war defence and overseas	41,188,000
Air training plan—Canada	86,294,000
Other defence services (administration, internment, censorship, Royal Military College, etc.)	4,155,000
Department of Munitions and Supply	61,951,000
Other departments	18,540,000
	$538,804,000

This total does not take full account of obligations incurred overseas for which accounts have not yet been rendered by the United Kingdom government. We have made certain advances on account pending the working out of final accounting arrangements, including per capita issue rates for various supplies and services.

For the full fiscal year it is now estimated that our total war expenditures will approximate $875,000,000. That is the closest, the most accurate estimate that can be made now. It means a rapid expenditure during the remaining months of the fiscal year; the expenditure being made now is at a rapid rate. Starting at relatively low levels in the early spring and summer months—approximately $25,000,000 a month in the first quarter of the fiscal year—our war expenditures increased rapidly, amounting in December to $84,000,000 and in January to $87,000,000. This is at a rate of over a billion dollars a year.

In planning the war programme for the coming year we have had regard to the following factors:

(a) The physical capacity of Canada to produce equipment and supplies for ourselves and Britain;

(b) Our consultations with the British government as to the forms our effort should take in order to make the most effective contribution to the joint cause; and

(c) Our belief that the Canadian people desire that this country do its utmost, and that they are willing to make the sacrifices and bear the burdens which such an effort involves.

To finance the programme that has been developed on the basis of these considerations we have decided to ask parliament for a war appropriation of $1,300,000,000 for the coming fiscal year.

The war programme which was outlined by the Prime Minister yesterday and the war activities which will be carried on during the next fiscal year, as set out in the statements made by the defence ministers in the debate on the address, will involve a total estimated expenditure in excess of this sum by perhaps as much as $150,000,000. But, as the house will realize, there are very great difficulties in making precise estimates of war expenditures. In particular, there are at least three factors which make accurate estimates impossible.

First, there is the impossibility of calculating wastage of equipment and the amount of ammunition that will be used, as this will depend upon the nature of the warfare that develops.

The second factor has to do with the capital assistance which has been given to manufacturing plants through the Department of Munitions and Supply. Large sums of money have been advanced, and additional sums will be advanced, to contractors to pay for adding to their plants or to build new ones. Additional sums will be advanced to provide working capital. In many cases Canada and the United Kingdom are making advances on a joint basis, but in some of these cases the division between the two countries has not been settled. In the meantime the money has been put up in order that there shall be no delay; the division will be worked out later.

A part of these advances may be returned during the course of the year, but this cannot be determined now. Furthermore, a portion of the amortization cost of the capital expenditures resulting from such advances may be included in the cost of the equipment which is included in the estimates of the Department of National Defence. If this is the case there may be some duplication in the amounts included in the estimates of the Department of Munitions and Supply and the Department of National Defence. At this stage it is difficult—impossible, I should say—to determine the extent of such duplication because the costs of the equipment which is to be produced are themselves based on estimates. The accuracy of these estimated costs will depend to a considerable extent upon the quantity of equipment which will be produced.

The third factor making for uncertainty in estimating is the question of the amount of war materials and equipment which can be physically produced and delivered within the coming fiscal year. Estimates have been made of the probable deliveries, and I assume that the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) will be discussing the whole question of the production programme at the proper time. It will suffice if I say that this programme is dependent in certain important aspects upon the delivery of machine tools and parts from the United States. If there should be delays in such deliveries the completion of the equipment in question will be held up.

In view of these various uncertainties I thought it preferable not to ask at this time for the total of the estimates which have been submitted. Instead, as I have said, the bill calls for an appropriation of $1,300,000,000. It may be that the total cost of our war effort expenditures during the coming fiscal year will exceed this figure by a considerable amount, and if it does it will be necessary for me to come back for an additional appropriation at a later date.

However, in determining the magnitude of our total war effort we must not overlook another burden which Canada has assumed. I refer to the assistance which we are giving to the United Kingdom in financing the war materials, equipment and other supplies which are being produced for the United Kingdom in Canada. During the first eleven months of the war we made available to her 184 million

Canadian dollars by our repatriation programme; that is, by buying in or paying off Canadian securities which were held in the United Kingdom. For the succeeding six months period ending January 31 of this year we agreed to provide $150,000,000. We have done this, and indeed by the end of this month will have provided an additional $137,000,000 by accumulation of sterling which, in part at least, is in anticipation of repatriation to be carried out in later months of the year. I cannot now estimate the total amount which we will be able to do for the second full year of war or for the fiscal year 1941-42, but I can say that we are following the policy of going as far as it is practically possible to go.

While repatriation involves the repayment of foreign indebtedness, and thus will strengthen the economy in the long run, it is obvious that to-day it imposes additional strain on Canada by increasing the amount her people must save in order to purchase the securities which are being returned to this country. For practical purposes, in considering the burden which is to be placed upon this country it is just as much a part of our war effort as the expenditures which we propose to make on our own account.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister allow me to interrupt in respect to this repatriation? Would he be good enough to elucidate as to the character of the securities repatriated and whether they have been or are to be placed upon the market? That is quite an important point.

Mr. ILSLEY: All the securities that have been repatriated by or on behalf of the Canadian government to date have been government or government guaranteed securities.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are being cancelled, then?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; they are not going on the market. There are industrial securities which are being placed on the Canadian market by the United Kingdom directly, in very much smaller amounts.

If we assume that we will be able to provide assistance in this way to the extent of, say $400,000,000—I am speaking about repatriation still—and if our direct war expenditures do not exceed the $1,300,000,000 which the present resolution asks parliament to appropriate, we get a total of $1,700,000,000 as the financial measure of the burden of our war effort. If we add to this total the non-war dominion estimates of $433,000,000 and probable provincial and municipal expenditures of say $575,000,000 we get a total of over $2,700,000,000 which governments will have to raise from the Canadian people during the coming fiscal year.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

We get talking of these hundreds of millions and billions, and after a while some of us lose our sense of the importance and significance of these sums, but $2,700,000,000 is an important amount of money for governments to raise from the Canadian people in one year. This is over fifty per cent of the national income, which for the coming fiscal year we estimate will be about $5,300,000,000.

In this calculation hon. members will have noted that I do not take into account the additional moneys which will have to be tied up in wheat financing, or the possibility that our direct war expenditures may exceed the amount we are now asking from parliament.

I pause, Mr. Speaker, to let the meaning of this programme and these amounts sink in. Probably none of us can realize the true significance of passing over to governments on the average half of our individual income; or, to put it another way, devoting half the labour and productive facilities of the country to war and other governmental work. When it is remembered that a large part of our population is now at such a level of living standards that it can bear very little of the increased burdens which Canadians as a whole must bear, the burden on the remaining part of the population becomes recognized as all the more staggering. Let each of us in this house ask himself what would happen to his own standard of living if he were to pay or lend more than half his individual income to the state. We are asking the house for this appropriation because we recognize the fact that probably this will be the most critical year in the history of civilization.

I need not say that to carry out the war programme for which we are asking the house to make provision will tax Canada's productive capacity to the limit, will necessitate a continuing and more rapid shift from peacetime to war-time production, and will require for many of us drastic changes in our mode of living and habits of life. As the Prime Minister said in his Sunday night broadcast about two weeks ago, it will "mean more in the way of united determination, effort and sacrifice than has ever before been asked of the Canadian people."

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as has been intimated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) it is not my intention to proceed with this debate this afternoon, and I think the concluding observations of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) will indicate to the house and country one of the reasons why I do not wish so to proceed.

I wonder if the membership in this chamber followed those figures? I wonder if the Canadian people will realize their significance?

I may say to you, sir, that the significance of those figures impressed me more than anything else connected with finance I have heard since coming to the House of Commons. It could not fail to do so. The magnitude of the sacrifice the people of Canada are to be asked to make for 1941 will be emphasized in their minds by the staggering amounts of money the Minister of Finance has asked them to provide.

For these reasons I do feel we ought to take time to ponder what has been said this afternoon. Each one must face the situation squarely, as a citizen, to see how it will affect him, and how it will affect the country as a whole. On more than one occasion I have said the people of Canada will give the government money for its war effort, and the people will hold their government strictly accountable for the manner in which the effort is carried on and in which the expenditures here indicated will be made. I repeat those statements to-day. By and large, Canadians will make willingly any sacrifice the government may ask them to make, if they are assured the money is to be spent in a proper manner and for the purposes for which parliament is about to vote it.

Notwithstanding the fact that this is a party government,—and it still is—motivated by a party spirit, the people of Canada are behind the government's war effort. But those same people I am satisfied are determined to see this war through, if it takes their last dollar. I congratulate the Minister of Finance upon having made a plain statement, notwithstanding the magnitude of the amounts mentioned in it. I hope Canadians will read that statement, every word of it, and understand the significance of it.

On motion of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 3.55 p.m.

Wednesday, February 19, 1941.

The house met at three o'clock.

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

REPORT WITH RESPECT TO DETENTIONS FROM NOVEMBER 1, 1940 TO FEBRUARY 17, 1941

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): As required by regulation No. 21 of the Defence of Canada regulations, I desire to lay on the table of the house the number of detention orders which have been made during the period from November 1, 1940 to February 17, 1941; the number of cases in which a report has been made by the advisory committees; the number of releases; and the number of cases in which the Minister of Justice declined to follow the committee's recommendations.

PRECIOUS METALS MARKING ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO GOLD WATCHES AND SPECTACLE AND EYEGLASS FRAMES

Hon. JAMES A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 12, to amend the Precious Metals Marking Act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think we should have an explanation.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The bill provides for two amendments dealing with the marking of the gold content in ordinary and bracelet watches, and adds a new section to the act governing the requirements for spectacle or eyeglass frames or parts. Full explanation is given in the explanatory notes in the bill.

The amendments in regard to watches have been approved by the Canadian Jewellers' Association, and those in regard to eyeglasses by eight provincial optometrical associations.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

APPOINTMENT OF GEORGE A. TOUCHE AND COMPANY AS AUDITORS

Hon. C. D. HOWE (for the Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 13, respecting the appointment of auditors for National Railways.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

MEAT AND CANNED FOODS ACT

APPLICATION OF COMPULSORY INSPECTION AND MARKETING PROVISIONS TO CANNED LOBSTER

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 14, to amend the Meat and Canned Foods Act (fish and shellfish).

He said: The purpose of the bill is to amend the act respecting meat and canned foods in order to make the compulsory grading and marketing provisions applicable to canned lobster. As the act stands, it does not provide for the compulsory inspection of canned lobster.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

FREE PASSES ON RAILWAYS

Mr. CHURCH:

How many free passes of all kinds were issued on the railways of Canada for the last year of record?

Mr. HOWE: The provisions governing reduced rates and free transportation are contained in sections 345, 346 and 347 of the Railway Act. The number of passes issued by the railways of Canada for any year is not of record in the Department of Transport. Returns are made by the railways to the board of transport commissioners, which does not make any public report concerning free transportation, and has ruled that returns made by the railway companies to the board are held to be privileged and not open to public inspection. The present request was referred to the board by the department, and it has been ascertained that the board is still of like view and does not consider that information such as presently requested should be furnished.

GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING MANUFACTURE AND SALE OF LIQUOR

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. Did a deputation of representative church leaders wait on a committee of the dominion cabinet with a view to restricting the sale of liquor in Canada during the war period?

2. What did the deputation suggest?

3. Has the government adopted any change of policy in connection with the manufacture and sale of liquor under the War Measures Act?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Yes.

2. (1) That sale of alcoholic beverages in taverns, beer-rooms, wine shops, etc., be discontinued and that sale of such beverages be confined entirely to government-owned liquor stores.

(2) That sale from government liquor stores be permitted only between the hours of three o'clock in the afternoon and eight o'clock in the evening and on week-days only.

(3) That all advertising of liquor in Canada be forbidden except in the place of sale.

(4) That when the request in item 1 is implemented an order issue from the Department of Defence closing all wet canteens in military establishments.

3. No.

[Mr. Michaud.]

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—OUTSTANDING DEBENTURES

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. What was the total amount of outstanding debentures assumed by the Canadian National Railways in 1922?

2. What amount of interest has been paid on the above debentures between 1922 and the end of the last fiscal year?

Mr. HOWE:

1. First published statement for consolidated system is that for the year 1923, which shows total funded debt held by public to be $823,099,056.

2. Annual interest charge for 1923 on said debt was $35,412,449.

Since 1923 some of these securities have been retired in full or in part, and replaced by other issues. Variation in annual interest charges could only be determined approximately, and the railway management suggest that if annual interest is assumed to be that for the year 1923, total interest during period 1923-40, both years inclusive, on debt of railway system at the time of consolidation has been $637,424,082.

EXEMPTION OF FARMERS' SONS FROM MILITARY SERVICE

Mr. LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency):

Does the Department of National Defence intend to pass regulations exempting from military service farmers' sons needed for agriculture?

Mr. RALSTON: It is assumed that the question refers to military training. As announced by the Prime Minister, in principle there will be no exemptions, particularly in view of the limited age groups affected; but I may say that consideration is being given by the departments of National War Services and National Defence to the feasibility of postponements where necessary to meet the requirements of essential seasonal occupations.

YORKTON, SASK., AIRPORT

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Was the gravelling of the airport at Yorkton, Saskatchewan, done by the government or by contract?

2. If by contract, who was the contractor, and was the said contract on the basis of cost-plus?

3. How many men were employed, what were their names and addresses and what amounts were paid to each?

Mr. HOWE:

1. By contract.

2. Contract awarded to Carter-Halls-Aldinger Company, Limited, 4th floor, Royal Bank Building, Winnipeg, Manitoba, on the basis of unit prices.

3. No information.

FIXING OF MINIMUM PRICE FOR BUTTER FOR SUMMER SEASON

Mr. LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency):

Is it the intention of the government to fix a minimum price for butter during the summer season?

Mr. GARDINER: The dairy products board has been given power to set a minimum price for butter.

"AIR MAIL GIVES WINGS TO BUSINESS"

Mr. DESMOND:

1. Did the government publish a pamphlet entitled "Air Mail Gives Wings to Business"?
2. If so, how many copies were printed?
3. What was the cost of publishing this pamphlet?
4. What was the cost of distributing this pamphlet?

Mr. MULOCK:

1. Yes, printed in 1939—distributed by the Post Office Department in connection with air mail publicity campaign.

2. 50,000.

3. Approximately $2,000.

4. Distributed with other necessary official instructions and departmental releases at no extra cost.

TAX CREDITS TO INCREASE SUPPLY OF FOREIGN EXCHANGE

Mr. DESMOND:

1. How many (a) individuals, (b) partnerships, (c) corporations, have applied for assistance by way of special tax credits and/or special allowances for depreciation or depletion under the Income War Tax Act and/or the Excess Profits Tax Act?
2. What are the names of each such individual, partnership or corporation who have so applied?
3. What is the nature of the business carried on by each such individual, partnership or corporation?
4. How many of such applications have been granted?
5. What is the nature of the tax credit relief or other concession which has been granted to each such individual, partnership or corporation?
6. What is the estimate of the amount by which Canada's supply of foreign exchange will be increased as a result of each such grant of assistance or concession?

Mr. ILSLEY: I understand that the hon. member is willing to have the question amended so that instead of "Income War Tax Act and/or the Excess Profits Tax Act" the words "War Exchange Conservation Act" will be substituted. If that is so, I will have the question answered accordingly. In the meantime I ask that it stand.

Mr. SPEAKER: Question stands.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

MOOSE JAW, SASK., AIRFIELDS AND TRAINING FACILITIES

Mr. PERLEY:

1. Does the British government (a) own or (b) operate airfields or other training facilities at or near the city of Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan?
2. If so, from whom were the same acquired or purchased, and what are the particulars as to price?
3. Who had the contract (a) to prepare the ground, (b) to erect the buildings?
4. What prices were paid to the contractors for such work?

Mr. POWER: Return tabled.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS—COST-PLUS AND MANAGEMENT-FEE PLAN

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury):

1. How many cost-plus contracts have been awarded by the government since September 1, 1939?
2. To what persons, firms or corporations were such contracts awarded?
3. What is the estimated cost of each such contract completed?
4. How many of such contracts have been revised?
5. What contracts have been so revised?
6. What is the nature of the revision in each case?
7. How many contracts have been awarded by the government on the management-fee plan since September 1, 1939?
8. To what persons, firms, or corporations were contracts of this type awarded?
9. What is the estimated cost of each such contract completed?
10. What is the fee provided for in each such contract?
11. In what management-fee contracts, if any, has provision been made for a reduction of fee in the event of the ultimate cost exceeding the estimated cost?
12. In what management-fee contracts, if any, has provision been made for an increase of fee in the event of the ultimate cost being less than the estimated cost?

JOHN INGLIS COMPANY

Mr. CARDIFF:

For a copy of all contracts entered into between his majesty's government in Canada and the John Inglis Company of Toronto since September 1, 1939, together with copies of all correspondence, telegrams, memoranda and/or other documents and papers relating thereto.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Since this notice was placed on the order paper the minister was good enough yesterday to table copies of contracts entered into between the government and the Inglis company. If, as I assume, they cover all the contracts, this notice might be dropped.

Motion dropped.

PENSION ACT

APPLICATION TO CERTAIN MEMBERS OF CANADIAN AND UNITED KINGDOM FORCES

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Pension Act to make its provisions applicable to certain members of the Canadian forces serving in the present war and in future wars and to their dependents, to extend the benefits of the act to certain persons serving in the forces of the United Kingdom and also to make further changes and adjustments in the procedure and administration of the Pension Act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

CITY OF OTTAWA AGREEMENT

AUTHORIZATION OF PAYMENT OF $100,000 FOR THE YEAR ENDING JULY 1, 1941

Hon. C. D. HOWE (for the Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize the Minister of Public Works on behalf of his majesty to enter into an agreement to pay to the corporation of the city of Ottawa the sum of $100,000 for the year ending July 1, 1941.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

EXTENSION OF INITIAL SUBSIDY PERIOD—CHANGING OF FIXATION-OF-RATES PERIOD

Hon. C. D. HOWE (for the Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Trans-Canada Air Lines Act, 1937, changing the period for the fixation of rates for the current year, as defined in the act, and extending the initial period during which a subsidy may be payable to Trans-Canada Air Lines.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION

CONTRACT WITH NORTHERN WOOD PRESERVERS LIMITED FOR PURCHASE OF POSTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Before the orders of the day are proceeded with may I ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to lay on the table copy of order in council No. 223 dated January 31, 1939, and copy of contract made by his department with Northern Wood Preservers Limited, of approximately the same date, respecting the purchase of posts referred to in the report of the auditor general for the year ended March 31, 1940, pages 61-2, and entered into under the provisions of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and amendments.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I shall be pleased of course to have placed on the table a copy of both the order in council and the contract. In view of remarks made on the other side of the house and discussion in the press, I should like to call the attention of hon. members of the house to that contract. I think when it is read it will be found that the statements made in the report of the auditor general are not justified in the light of the terms of the contract.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Should we not wait and see?

Mr. GARDINER: Of course I am not going to criticize anyone who has made remarks based on the statement of the auditor general, but as the session goes along I expect we shall have ample opportunity of discussing the actual facts in relation to the contract itself.

"TOOLS FOR TREACHERY"

REPLY TO QUESTION WITH REFERENCE TO ARTICLE BY COMMISSIONER OF ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): My friend the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) asked me a question the other day with regard to an article published in the Canadian Spokesman of February, 1941, entitled "Tools for Treachery," by Commissioner S. T. Wood, of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

I have since read the article, and incidentally it has given me the opportunity of reading another article in the same publication, by my hon. friend, which is very interesting.

The article to which my hon. friend calls attention clearly represents conditions as they exist in Canada, according to the practical experience of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Of course the few words quoted by the hon. member must be read in conjunction with the context and the rest of the article. The commissioner never intended to say anything that would reflect on the rights and duties of members of parliament, and he would be sorry indeed if such interpretation has been given to his words. Indeed he had rather in mind certain statements made by members of some provincial legislatures.

So far as my own views are concerned—my hon. friend has asked me to state them—I fully recognize and will always uphold and defend the rights and duties of parliament to comment upon, criticize, and recommend and enact changes in the defence of Canada regulations and the carrying out of such regulations. Indeed my very difficult task in that regard has been made easier by the useful and effective work of the parliamentary committee which sat last session, and whose recommendations have been accepted and made effective.

However, I must say that when a parliamentarian states at public meetings that members of trade unions have been interned because they were trade unionists, or that freedom of religion no longer exists in Canada because certain sects carrying out subversive and disloyal activities under the guise of religious creeds have been made unlawful, this certainly does not help our work, and we have the right so to express ourselves.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): As one of those who has from time to time criticized the regulations made, I ask the Minister of Justice if he would be good enough to name the parliamentarians to whom he refers, because I do not think we should all be under suspicion of having made statements that were not warranted.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I think this will come at the right time.

Mr. CHURCH: Commissioner Wood is doing his duty and doing it well.

POSTAL SERVICE

REPLY TO COMPLAINT RESPECTING MAIL DELIVERIES IN TORONTO BUSINESS AND RESIDENTIAL AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. P. MULOCK (Postmaster General): In regard to the question asked by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) on Monday, February 17, complaining about the inadequacy of mail service in some of the residential districts in Toronto, I advised him at that time that I would have inquiry made. The facts I find are as follows:

1. No general complaints have been received either at the department in Ottawa or by the district director of postal services at Toronto in regard to late delivery of mails.

2. At the postal terminal in Toronto, if trains are on time the letter carriers leave every morning at 8 o'clock without fail on the first delivery. In some parts of the city five deliveries a day are given, in other parts three deliveries a day, and in residential districts two deliveries a day, one in the morning and one in the afternoon.

3. The night train from Montreal carries the mail from the east. This is the main train in so far as early morning delivery is concerned, and it has frequently been late during the present winter. On some occasions it has been late two or three times a week.

4. As the delivery of this mail in Toronto is very important the letter carriers at the postal stations are held until this mail arrives, unless the train is too late, but if it is not available by 8.30 a.m. they leave on their distribution.

5. To expedite the delivery when the Montreal train is late, post office trucks meet the train at Danforth station, the mail having been already sorted into postal station areas by city sorters placed on the train for that purpose. These trucks take it direct to the respective postal stations, where the letter carriers are waiting to deliver it.

Letter carrier work is based on a forty-four hour week. In the residential districts there are two deliveries a day. Whenever the train is on time letter carriers commence their morning delivery at 8 o'clock and complete their delivery at about 11 o'clock. When the trains are late the times of delivery are correspondingly retarded.

7. Deliveries in Toronto have been impeded this winter on account of the slippery and icy conditions of the roads and sidewalks.

Mr. CHURCH: I have received more complaints this morning on the same subject. There should be an improvement made.

Mr. MULOCK: I am sorry; I did not hear what the hon. member said.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

STATISTICS OF PUBLIC FINANCE AND NATIONAL INCOME BROUGHT UP TO DATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): On Monday last the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) requested the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to table the statistics prepared for the dominion-provincial conference, in order to bring the statistical computations of the Sirois report, so-called, up to date.

I now wish to table these statistics, which are in the form of two documents:

1. Comparative statistics of public finance, 1936-40, and
2. National income, 1937-40.

In tabling these documents I wish to make two comments by way of explanation to the house of their content and character.

In the first place, later and more complete information than was available to the commission itself made it possible for the secretariat of the commission to recalculate and refine the estimates of taxable regional income, net income derived from mining, smelting and refining of ores and oils, which was the basis of the proposed mining tax rebate to the provinces, relief costs in total and for unemployables, cost of tax collections and the residual transfers known as national adjustment grants.

I want to make it clear that this material has been prepared by the secretariat on the basis of the most complete information available to them, but it was our intention to submit it to the finance committee of the conference for close examination and criticism, and until such an examination was possible the government could not consider that the national adjustment grants as set forth were final.

In the second place, in the case of those provinces where actual revenues and expenditures were not available for the year 1940 the figures used were budget estimates or forecasts made some months before the close of the fiscal year and supplied by the provinces. In some cases it was apparent that these estimates might be subject to considerable modification when the actual results were available after the close of the fiscal year. It was therefore feared that they might be misleading to the public, particularly if used to illustrate the application of plan I to individual provinces.

It was for these reasons that the government hesitated to give this material circulation without the advantage of full discussion and examination which would have been possible in the finance committee.

I may say that copies of the reports that are being tabled to-day are being distributed to hon. members.

NATIONAL DEFENCE TAX

APPLICATION TO WARRANT OFFICERS AND OTHER RANKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. S. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue if it is true that a change has been made in the application of the national defence tax in regard to soldiers; that this tax now applies to warrant officers, non-commissioned officers and privates in the Canadian Army while serving in Canada, and that payment of this tax by these other ranks has been retroactive to July 1, 1940.

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Revenue): There has been no change in the provisions of the national defence tax.

Mr. WHITE: Am I right in assuming, then, that this tax does not apply to warrant officers, non-commissioned officers and privates in the Canadian Army while serving in Canada?

Mr. GIBSON: That is correct, as far as our active forces are concerned.

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to ask the government what it is going to do in this, the eighteenth month of the war, with regard to conscientious objectors. Some action should be taken in this regard. In the United States these people are interned, and surely something should be done here. Why should some serve while others do nothing?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of National War Services): In the regulations having to do with the calling up of men provision is made for dealing with conscientious objectors, and so far as I know those regulations are being followed.

Mr. CHURCH: I suppose they can serve in the rags, bones and bottles campaign.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Ilsley that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide, inter alia,

1. That sums not exceeding $1,300,000,000 be granted to His Majesty towards defraying any expenses or making any advances or loans that may be incurred or granted by or under the authority of the governor in council during the year ending March 31, 1942, for—

(a) the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada;

(b) the conduct of naval, military and air operations in or beyond Canada;

(c) promoting the continuance of trade, industry and business comunications, whether by means of insurance or indemnity against war risk or in any other manner whatsoever; and

(d) the carrying out of any measure deemed necessary or advisable by the governor in council in consequence of the existence of a state of war.

2. That the governor in council be empowered to raise by way of loan under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, such sum or sums of money, not exceeding in the whole the sum of $1,300,000,000 as may be required for the purpose of defraying such expenses or making such advances or loans, the principal and interest of any such loan to be a charge upon and payable out of the consolidated revenue fund.

3. That the governor in council be empowered to reexpend, advance or loan moneys that may be received by way of refund or repayment of advances, loans or expenditures under the War Appropriations Acts of 1939 (2nd session), 1940 and 1941.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, those of the membership of this house who followed closely the address of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) yesterday on his motion that you do now leave the chair in order that the house go into committee to consider the financial resolution which he read into the record, and the Canadian people, having through the medium of the press and of the radio read and heard the substance of his remarks, will, I hope, have an intelligent appreciation of what this government is asking the people of this country to do in its war effort, measured strictly in terms of dollars and cents.

I confess at once, sir, that I was prepared for astronomical figures. I had heard of expenditures of more than a thousand million dollars, and of substantial sums to be spent in repatriation operations, but I had not visualized so huge a sum as $1,700 million. When we add $433 million for our peacetime activities, we are astonished to find that we have reached a total of $2,133 million.

But that is not the whole story. On top of this huge figure we are to be asked for, and undoubtedly will provide, $175 million to be voted before the end of the fiscal year to take care of a probable deficit under the War Appropriation Act of 1940, to which the minister alluded, which will make a total of over $2,300 million. If we add to this the additional moneys which will be required to finance and to be tied up in financing wheat operations, which for 1940 amount to $100 million of liability principally in the form of credits by the Canadian banks, I assume guaranteed by the government of this country, and which for the coming year may run to $100 million more—no one knows as yet because the policy of the government has not been announced—we have a grand total of over $2,400 million which this government will have to raise directly from the Canadian people and financial institutions, by way of either taxation or borrowing. Then on top of that if we add the probable sum of $575 million which the same people, the same set of taxpayers, will have to raise to finance the probable expenditures of provincial and municipal governments, we shall have reached the enormous figure of approximately $3,000 million to be provided by the Canadian people—a figure calculated to stagger the stoutest heart among us.

Stated in terms of per capita population—and I am stressing this because I want the people of Canada to understand and visualize as far as possible just what this obligation is to be—on the basis of a probable population of twelve million people it means a total expenditure of $250 per head for every man, woman and child in this dominion. When we realize that at least half of our population will be able to contribute little, if anything, in this superhuman effort, it will be seen at once that the per capita contribution of those able to pay will be more than doubled. The minister's statement and these figures give us food for the most anxious and constant reflection.

I have stated on many occasions that, in my view, the Canadian people will give to this government, or to any government which may be established in Canada, the money to carry on the maximum war effort of which Canada is capable. But the same people will hold this government, or any government, strictly accountable and responsible for the method and the manner in which the government expends this money, and for the character of its war effort. I repeat that declaration to-day, as I did yesterday.

In giving consideration to this huge war-time proposal—I shall not call it a budget—it is well, I think, that we should pause and investigate how the government and the minister propose to meet the terrific cost of the programme of expenditure which he has outlined.

Briefly, there are only three methods open to him:

1. Reduction in non-defence expenditures—and I put this in the very forefront.

2. Increased taxation—and there is a limit in this sphere which may not be exceeded.

3. Borrowing.

It is assumed that inflation in any form is definitely barred, notwithstanding what some people may have said recently, and to that decision I am not, at the moment at least, taking any exception. Inflation as a means of financing this enormous programme at this time would, in my opinion, be a false move. Later on, when other sources have dried up, we may have to come to a measure of inflation, but we have not yet reached that point.

It is manifest, I think, that the attack on the problem must come from all three angles; and, without question, one of the first things to be done is the paring down to the bare bone, if possible, of all non-defence or peace-time spending, all along the line.

The minister has estimated that the national income for 1940-41 will be $5,300 million. I have always been somewhat doubtful about the calculations upon which our national income has been based. In my view, any calculation of true national income must not take into account income derived directly from war expenditures, which are based on borrowing; but if I can have an authoritative assurance that the estimate of $5,300 million of national income eliminates the possibility of including any national income from our war expenditures based on borrowing, then I shall be content to accept that figure.

I am doubtful, also, if the national income will be as great as suggested because, in a country which is unable to sell its major peace-time production, namely, its wheat and other cereal crops and general farm production, there must naturally be a substantial shrinkage in the amount of new wealth that is available to be included in national income. In the case of Canada, I suggest that this cannot be far short of $500 million. However, I have no means of accurately checking the estimate the minister has given. I hope he is right. If he is, it will ease somewhat the burden.

As I said a moment ago, the attack upon the problem of financing our war effort must be approached from three different angles. One of the first things to be done must be the strictest paring down of peace-time expenditures wherever possible. This will serve the three-fold purpose of reducing the size of the deficit to be financed by the government, diminishing the competition of government with private spending, and lessening the danger of inflation.

Turning first to peace-time spending, I am sure there will be great disappointment in this country that the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1942, tabled on Monday last, show a very small reduction in the total of ordinary peace-time costs of government. On paper, the total reduction as compared with the expenditures for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1941, is $18,119,000. Of this figure, however, $15,000,000 is represented by the fact that no provision is required for the deficit of the Canadian National Railways.

The government should not and cannot take credit for the fact that there is unlikely to be any deficit on the operations of the Canadian National Railways during the coming fiscal year. The improved operations of the system are accounted for, for the most part, if not altogether, by the increased volume of war transportation and not by any increase in the normal volume of peace-time activities. This is well illustrated by the fact that the volume of wheat moved is really less than normal.

Mr. Speaker, it may be news to the members of this house, and perhaps it will be news to the people of Canada, as it was to me, that last year, notwithstanding the great improvement in traffic, the cash deficit of the Canadian National system is estimated at $16,965,000, or nearly $2,000,000 more than the minister anticipated when he brought down his budget. I say to him that I believe an immediate and full explanation is due to the people of Canada.

The net result of the reductions in the estimates is, therefore, a saving of only $3,381,000; and, most emphatically, I say that is not good enough. There should have been a further sum pared from the estimates. I know some of the difficulties that have to be encountered. But these must be met, if we are to raise these huge sums for war purposes. In due course they will be met. One of the dismaying features is the fact that there are new expenditures of a new kind and character, but which are recurring in their nature, such as unemployment insurance, which, in the eyes of the government at least, have prevented a further saving. But the Canadian people, notwithstanding this factor, will insist that a saving of only $3,381,000 in peace-time activities is not good enough.

To take an isolated example, why is it necessary to spend a sum in excess of $2,800,000 in taking the decennial census this year? I am quite aware that, under the provisions of the British North America Act, the government is required to have the census taken. But Canada is at war. The taking of the census is a purely peace-time activity. It can and must be postponed. As a matter of fact, it ought to be postponed without our having to ask for this. The cost of this elaborate counting and compilation of the population is something that is not absolutely necessary; and if we are to ask the Canadian people, as they have been asked by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and by others who have spoken to them in connection with Canada's war effort and lending programme, to tighten their belts, then every honest effort ought to be made to avoid this expenditure, and expenditures of a like character.

I pause to give just one other example of an expenditure which might be saved. After the declaration of war, there was set up by this government a bureau of public information, under the hon. gentleman who was then postmaster general, and who is now Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty). Later it was transferred to the Ministry of National War Services. I have not been able to obtain figures covering the cost of this service to date. However, a return tabled Monday, indicates that in all departments of government there are eighty-six employees engaged in publicity work—twice the number that flock into that press gallery every day. These gentlemen draw salaries aggregating $164,000, including salaries of $61,000 in the bureau proper. These are, of course, new expenditures, and they are likely to grow. Up to November 30, 1940, the total cost of operation of the bureau of public information alone, apart from the salaries paid by the government departments to those who are not direct employees of the bureau, amounted to $202,000.

I protest against this expenditure. It is an unnecessary waste of public funds. The newspapers of this country will get the news, and it will not be canned news, either. The public is tremendously suspicious of these press releases. Many of them are false. Most of them are propaganda, pure and simple. All of them are unnecessary. Let us have an end of this useless expenditure.

Many of our people in their private lives, if they have not already realized it, will have to realize that they must do without many things they would like to have, or they must defer, to a more convenient season, expenditures which, in normal times, they would make without hesitation. They will save and sacrifice cheerfully if they are convinced that governing bodies are taking the same realistic view of expenditures; and I suggest to this house and to the country that the fact that our peace-time budget has been reduced by only $3,381,000 is not good enough.

Then there are the probable provincial and municipal expenditures, estimated at $575 million. I know this government is not directly responsible for those expenditures, but it has a moral obligation to the people of Canada so far as possible to use its influence to impress upon provincial and municipal governments the fact that they should set an example and cooperate with the federal government in cutting their appropriations, so that it can not be said that over 10 per cent of the national income is to be expended in war time by these administrations.

Considering the exhibition which I witnessed in this very chamber on January 15 last, I am not very hopeful that there will be much cooperation between the provincial governments, or at least some of them, and this government. In all the years I have been in Ottawa I have never seen such an exhibition of national disunity as was shown on that occasion. I shall have something further to say about this at a later time.

This government has not helped the provincial governments very much by cutting off its contribution of 40 per cent of the cost of unemployment relief, although I am bound to say to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance that I think that that was inevitable. After the manner in which the Minister of Finance wielded the big stick at the provincial conference, it was sure to come. I am not quarrelling with that decision.

There are few signs up to date to indicate that the provinces are seized of the seriousness of the situation. Let us consider the case of British Columbia. According to information which I have received, the last budget of the government of British Columbia called for a current expenditure of over $33 million, the highest in the history of that province.

I should like to direct particular attention to the situation in New Brunswick, with which I am most familiar. In March, 1940, the present provincial administration announced a budget appropriation of over $10 million, an all-time high. This, for a province with an estimated population of only 450,000 people, works out to $22 per head. Over 40 per cent of this sum is earmarked to pay the service on the provincial debt which, including the funded debt, treasury bills outstanding, bank loans and guaranteed obligations, the service of which the province has had to assume—less, however, a sinking fund of over $11 million—has reached the net total of just about $100 million. This is the obligation of the little province of New Brunswick. The situation is that New Brunswick, as a result of five years of profligate spending, between 1935 and 1940, now has the doubtful honour among Canadian provinces of having a per capita debt of $216, the highest in the dominion.

There is just one ray of sunshine in this provincial situation. On reading the headlines in the papers this morning, I saw they indicated that the premier of Ontario, who is pictured as the bad boy of the recent conference, is alive to the situation. It is suggested in the press report that probably there will be a reduction of taxation in that province. The signs of an early election there continue to multiply.

With the municipalities, the situation is somewhat different. Most of our municipal governments are administered economically. Of course, there are some painfully outstanding exceptions. The burden of unemployment relief, which has not yet entirely disappeared, coupled with the inability to collect tax arrears, has made their position difficult. I have, however, much more faith in their alibity to restrict expenditures than I have in the ability of the provinces to do so.

The second method by which the government can meet war costs is by taxing. In the last war the mistake was made, not only in Canada but in the United States, of postponing too long the introduction of adequate tax measures. As a result, inflation was given a head start. I want to give this government credit for not having repeated that error. Sound policy demands that we meet as much as possible of our war costs as we go along. Our problem, however, is rendered difficult because we must determine how much and in what manner we can tax without defeating our programme.

I should like to emphasize the fact that there are two sides to every tax; one is the income which it yields to the government, and the other, the economic effect. Every tax has an economic effect. If the stream of private spending is cut down too drastically, it may penalize unnecessarily many of our non-war industries and throw people out of work, so that instead of more revenue being obtained, there may be greater relief accounts to pay.

We have in Canada very substantial savings accounts in the chartered banks and other financial institutions; but if we cut into the savings area too deeply, business and individuals will be unable to take risks because they will have nothing with which to absorb losses. Not only will this mean the restriction of private initiative in industrial lines, but it may mean holding back the expansion of other industries which are called upon to take substantial risks in our war programme. In giving thought to his budget proposals I hope the Minister of Finance will bear in mind that if he is considering proposals for higher taxes, we have had, within the past eighteen months, two major increases in dominion taxes, and they have been raised already to extremely high figures.

The remaining method by which our war costs must be met is by borrowing. I think it is inevitable, and I think the time is rapidly arriving, when we shall have to go outside Canada to borrow. Perhaps it will not be necessary to do it this year, but it will have to be done shortly. The point I desire to make, however, is that an increasingly large proportion of government securities which are sold should be lodged with individuals and savings and financial institutions, and not sold to our commercial banks. I am sure the minister is seized of the necessity of that. I am informed that already the chartered banks of Canada hold huge amounts of government treasury bills awaiting refunding when the new war loan is launched in June or July, and that this sum is likely to be increased greatly before that date. Every time a bank subscribes to a government loan, additional deposits are created, and that increases the total volume of purchasing power available. It is from this multiplication of purchasing power that the danger of inflation chiefly arises.

If government bonds can be sold to individuals and institutional investors and paid for out of earnings and savings, the danger of inflation will be greatly reduced. I am glad to give credit to the minister in connection with the present campaign for the sale of war savings certificates for having made every effort to reach the smallest individual investor. It is only by following this method that the bonds to be issued in June or July can reach the hands of the individual investor. The whole nation must be summoned to the work of selling the next war loan, just as it has been summoned to the work of selling war savings certificates at the present time. I know hon. gentlemen on this side of the house, as well as those who sit on the other side, have been glad to extend the offer of their assistance to this effort. I have not been able to do as much as I should have liked to do, but my place in my constituency has been taken by my former partner. He has devoted practically his whole time to this important national service.

There are people in Canada who will take exception to the astronomical proportions of the minister's proposals. I want to make it abundantly clear that I never have taken and am not taking that position. Before his announcement was made, I had received letters stating that in our war effort we must not bankrupt Canada. But, compatible with ascertaining our ability to pay, I should say that the criticism I have to offer is that Canada's war effort, as distinguished from Canada's war spending, does not represent an all-out effort on the part of the Canadian government and on the part of the Canadian people, especially as compared with that of the mother country.

How does our financial effort compare with the magnificent effort of the people of Great Britain? On the sixth of February, Sir Kingsley Wood, Chancellor of the Exchequer, disclosed in the British House of Commons that Britain's war effort is costing £10,500,000, or approximately $42 million, a day. The population of Great Britain is approximately 47 million people, and that of Canada approximately 12 million people. Canada's population, therefore, is approximately one-quarter that of Great Britain, and if our effort is to be comparable with or proportionate to that of Great Britain, we should be spending approximately $10 million a day.

It is apparent, I think, that in a new country like Canada, where there is not nearly as much invested or accumulated wealth as there is in Great Britain, where we have always been considered a borrowing country, our effort cannot be comparable with theirs; and, on that basis, I suggest that no one can take great objection to the amount which the Minister of Finance is asking the country to vote. Any valid objection can be based only on the assumption that the war concerns us to a lesser extent than it does Britain; and that proposition I deny. We are as vitally concerned as is bombed Britain. We stand to lose as much. We value our liberty as highly as do our kinsmen overseas; and loss means the end of liberty.

I have taken the view that there should be no dollar sign on our war effort. I know there is a limit to our capacity to pay. I do not attempt to define that limit; but, having regard to the issue at stake, I am sure that whatever is needed within that limitation will be provided by the Canadian people, no matter what the cost or the sacrifice, and out of sacrifice will come victory because, without victory, all our resources are valueless. Therefore we should be prepared to pledge those resources to the limit in order to ensure victory.

But one thing the Canadian people will and do insist upon, and that is that the dollars which they provide, by way of either taxation or loan, shall be utilized in the most efficient possible manner. They will not tolerate extravagance or waste, and every dollar paid in taxation or subscribed to war loans must mean a dollar for Britain's effort in the immediate theatre of war and for the defence of Canada—not fifty cents for wasteful and extravagant practices. Evidences of wasteful and extravagant expenditures are to be found on every hand.

I now serve notice on the government that the opposition will scrutinize with the utmost care, if given the opportunity, which I now demand, the expenditure of every dollar —will cheer them on when they discover that it is for the aid of Britain and for the defence of this country, and will criticize and fight against useless expenditure.

I hope that the committee on national expenditure, when set up, will examine and criticize all expenditures for war purposes, past, present and future, and award praise or blame, as the case may be. But the government must not evade or seek to evade responsibility because of the existence of this committee, and the powers of the committee must not be limited to reporting on methods of controlling expenditure. The committee must have power to report on expenditures already made, and the responsibility of refusing to go that far in the order of reference will be upon the government, and upon the government alone.

There is grave uneasiness in Canada with respect to Canada's war effort. It is recognized that Canadian war production has progressed well in many respects, but in many notable instances it is bogging down. We began in June last a system of hasty improvisation, which has developed into an uncoordinated mushroom growth, which leads many people to believe that Canada's war effort in production, upon which the most of the expenditure contemplated by the minister will be made, is haphazard and without a master plan, either as a whole or for war supplies in particular.

May I call the attention of hon. members to this situation? Recently the Right Hon. Arthur B. Purvis went to England on behalf of the British government, which he represents so ably in the United States, in connection with the mobilization of United States industry for supplies and production for British war purposes. He reported that his visit to England was made to get from the British authorities "a consolidated schedule of estimated British war needs" based upon a plan for victory. On his return, armed with, I believe, the information which he sought, he was able to lay before Mr. Knudsen, the very able and capable head of United States production activities, what he termed "a brief but pregnant document", setting forth every form of military and naval material Britain will require from the United States to get ready for the 1942 offensive that is planned to win the war.

I ask this searching question: Did the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), who recently visited England and whom we are all glad to see back safe and sound, bring back a similar schedule for Canada? Is there any evidence that he did so? If so, it has been conveniently kept in the dark.

Mr. HOWE: We work from the same list.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If he did not—or even if he did—has Canada drafted any set schedule on its own account? I suggest to this house and to the country that there is abundant evidence that there has not been drafted any such master plan.

Have we in any degree endeavoured to coordinate our efforts with the plan brought back by Mr. Purvis to Washington? Our Minister of Munitions and Supply makes periodical trips to Washington; but, so far as I am aware, he has no first-class executive in Washington in close touch with Mr. Purvis or Mr. Knudsen, ensuring the complete coordination of our programme with their programmes. It is true we have a legation there and a minister, but at the moment he is unfortunately indisposed through illness, as the Prime Minister told us on Monday. Who is representing Canada at this time in Washington—and especially with regard to coordination in production?

Mr. HOWE: J. P. Carswell.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I know Mr. Carswell very well—or at least I used to know him; I have not seen him for a long time. I am glad to have the minister's statement in that regard; I had not heard it before; if Mr. Carswell is of the right calibre, then the minister has done the right thing, and I tell him so now.

It seems to me, however, that the greatest sin of omission on the part of this government is that it has neither a master plan for war nor a master schedule for war production. The Minister of Munitions and Supply is a capable man but he has no time or opportunity to think or to plan. In his anxiety to fulfil his conception of his responsibilities, in the operation of government, as we have it presently in Canada, and as the chief of war production, I am told he does not give any of his lieutenants authority over more than one isolated phase of the work at one time. It would appear to me that he is so confident of his ability that he carries on a dozen different jobs at one time and even retains the control of the Trans-Canada Airways and other unrelated activities. Someone has described his major job as a 30-ring circus, and he insists on running several side-shows.

Recently there was set up a war-time requirements board, headed by one of the biggest industrialists in the Dominion of Canada. The board was established, if I understand the situation, to plan the most productive and direct use for war purposes of available supplies of materials, power, manufacturing plant and transportation facilities, in order to ensure that war needs, in the order of their importance, shall have priority over all other needs.

Please note the words "to plan" and "direct". Well, the air around Ottawa, and the newspapers of Canada, have been full of rumours and stories and statements and repercussions, and I think there is a good deal of evidence that the chairman of that board did some planning and tried to do some directing—but with what result? The chairman went away to his home in Vancouver recently and, I am told, left on his desk a statement in which he said, in effect, that he would be back in Ottawa if Ottawa had a job it wanted him to do.

This is a very important statement. It is apparent, I think, to those who know the story, that the minister evidently did not want the war-time requirements board to plan or direct war production operations.

I remember reading the order in council which set up that board and the authority given to the board, and I concluded that a correct interpretation of the power simply meant that it was merely an advisory board and that it had no real power; and I believe I am right in that interpretation. The chairman of the board himself, I believe, was seized of the lack of authority, but he was of opinion that when he required authority he would get it. The result would appear to be that he has been refused, and that, while he had the power to plan, he had no power to direct. Take, for instance, certain lagging phases of war production, such as Federal Aircraft. It is reported to me that when Mr. MacMillan set out to create the machinery needed to give war production the right of way, he found himself blocked. The fact is that his powers were advisory only—sweeping, it may be said, so long as he did not try to get action on his own initiative.

That is the sort of thing which is discouraging to Canadians anxious to get ahead with the total effort demanded by the country and visualized by the Prime Minister in his recent broadcasts. We have been deluged in days gone by with promises of what is to be done—splendid objectives on paper, but apparently there is no way to ensure that they will be attained in practice. Take any of the more important items. Naval guns were to be made—the biggest in the British empire. I understand that the programme is now limited to barrels for naval guns.

Mr. HOWE: Neither is true. If I may correct my hon. friend—I wish him to be correct—I said that we had the largest gun plant in the empire, not the largest guns.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If it is idle, that is not much to boast about.

Mr. HOWE: The naval guns are complete guns.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I said I had been told. I read it in the public press. I do not know whether this high-powered board down here in the Department of National War Services slipped again. They did once with regard to this very matter. Take any of the more important items—naval guns, aircraft production, tank production. We were promised all these things, but the results have been most discouraging.

There are several things that are needed in order that we may have a total effort. Right in the very forefront I put the need of a master war plan; and to draft a master war plan we need a war cabinet, composed of the best men in the country, freed from the confining detail of departmental administration and departmental duties.

Recently in a public address I advocated that the immediate duty of the hour is to strengthen the government. I repeat that assertion. There is weakness in the high political command. It is recognized everywhere. If it is to continue on the party basis, it must be strengthened on that basis, but it should be strengthened regardless of party affiliation; and this, because of the need of greater national morale, and the gigantic task at hand.

The fact is that, until quite recently at least, the war and its responsibilities were not taken seriously enough by the government. Canada should have a war cabinet, adequate in size for war purposes, composed of the ablest administrators available, and with no partisan tinge. It seems to me that this is elementary, and nothing else should be tolerated.

There are those who believe that the war effort of the government, being of such a mushroom growth, has reached a state of, shall I say, chaos, and that the record of the past eighteen months stands at an all-time high in futility. With the possible exception of the production of motor units and that sort of equipment, everything has gone wrong except the courage and capacity of our fighting forces, and the willingness of labour and industry to work and produce, if properly directed.

From the very beginning the present state of war production was inevitable. When war threatened, the government did nothing to prepare for war, although it knew that Canada was defenceless. When war came, the government did nothing to ensure the rapid and effective mobilization of the nation. The government embarked upon a policy of minimum, at least moderate, participation and not maximum cooperation. The measure of this country's contribution was governed by political expediency. To-day we are reaping the harvest of the government's default. The situation is so bad that the people are now aroused to it, and relentless criticism of the government is nationwide.

In peace time, it would be the right and opportunity of the opposition to take advantage of the failure of the government to serve the nation according to its needs, but in this time of war we dare not permit the government of Canada to be discredited. England is looking to Canada for help. The United States is looking to Canada to see what is the measure of our effort; and we must close our ranks. We must present a united front. We must lay friendly hands upon this government and help it forward. The interest of the nation and of the empire puts that obligation upon all good Canadians.

Therefore his majesty's loyal opposition, speaking through myself as a humble instrument, declares that its present purpose is not to indict the government for past failures but to help the government to present and future achievements. Pursuant to that purpose, I as leader of the opposition in this House of Commons recently rededicated this party to the service of the state, and I now come again to the government and say, "What can we do to help?"

I have already indicated my belief that the immediate duty of the hour is to strengthen the government, and that Canada should have a war cabinet adequate for war purposes and without any partisan tinge. No appeal to the nation for concerted action looking to victory will bring a full national response until the nation sees that the Prime Minister's solemn renunciation of partisanship in time of war—made not once only—has become a matter of deeds and not mere words. It is true that on more than one occasion he has renounced partisanship. He has said it must not be. But he does not make his followers realize that until they also renounce partisanship his renunciation is valueless. And, therefore, we should have an announcement from the Prime Minister of the accomplishment of such renunciation. That should be coupled with an announcement that his cabinet is to be reorganized and strengthened with men especially qualified to serve the national interest with all their hearts and with all their vigour.

I believe that the people of Canada would be delighted and greatly encouraged if the Prime Minister would say to-day: "At this time of crisis, the Liberal government renounces the principle of partisan government. Pursuant to that principle, we now intend to form a government composed of the best men Canada can supply. Party considerations shall be forgotten. We will bring these men from agriculture, from industry, from labour, from finance. This government will guarantee unity even as it will guarantee efficiency; for in it there shall be leaders of every class and section of the nation. It will be the new model for effective democratic leadership in time of war."

In the name of Canada's duty to the empire, in the name of Canada's efficient conduct of the war, I urge the Prime Minister, in this hour of the empire's need, to make this announcement to the Canadian people. In the name of the freedom of the individual and of those institutions which freedom has given us, I urge this policy upon the Prime Minister.

The War Measures Act and the National Resources Mobilization Act are now the law of Canada. Those acts, in the hands of party government, are bound to grow into instruments of dictatorship unless they are controlled by a really non-partisan government. If, with the aid of the War Measures Act and the National Resources Mobilization Act, the government should seek to build a fortress for the Liberal party, I warn them that they will in fact be building a prison house for all the rights and privileges of the Canadian people; they will be setting the stage for fascism.

Let the Prime Minister look well into the English-speaking world and tell this house the reason why he should not do as other empire governments have done. It cannot be because the Prime Minister believes himself to be endowed with greater wisdom than that of a Churchill or of a Roosevelt or of a Menzies. It cannot be because the Prime Minister thinks that his government's conduct of the war is more effective than that of the other governments to which I have referred. How do we compare with Australia? The question answers itself. It cannot be that the Prime Minister thinks that such a course will harm the prestige and power of the Liberal party.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend asked about a comparison with Australia. Will he tell us what comparison he wishes to make?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is a rhetorical question; the Prime Minister can answer later if he wants to. The fact is that Australia is on the field of battle, and Canada is not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I deny that absolutely. Canada is very much on the field of battle.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Tell that to the marines! The people of Canada know that we are not in Libya. We have a few airmen in England; we have men in training in England.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No politics.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It cannot be that the Prime Minister fears that such a government might drive the war effort of Canada beyond the limit fixed by the Liberal party.

If the Prime Minister will not do this, then I prophesy that it will not be long before he will bitterly regret his rejection of an honest appeal made by me in the name, as I believe, not only of more than a million Conservative voters in Canada but of every Liberal who puts his country before his party; for Liberals know, as well as we do, that this government has failed.

Canadians are slow to anger. We are a patient people; but we are patriots as well. We realize at last that empire democracy needs all that Canada has to give, namely, maximum cooperation upon the highest level of service and of sacrifice. We realize also that Canada is not giving to the empire all she has to give.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I do not threaten the Prime Minister; I appeal to him. In this crisis of civilization Canada must play a mighty part. The hour calls for dominant statesmanship. Let the Prime Minister rise to the need of the hour, and this country will rise also and stand behind him.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): When the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) yesterday introduced the resolution now before us I am sure that everyone in the chamber was struck by the stupendous amount requested for his majesty at this time. For a country of between eleven and twelve million people the amount asked is indeed a staggering sum. But staggering though it may be, I am confident that the people of Canada will realize that in the struggle in which we are now engaged, and which has taken on more definitely than ever before the character of a struggle between the democratic way of life and the totalitarian way of life, the Canadian people are prepared to support the government in raising the amount requested.

Having regard, however, to the enormous size of this vote there are some things that I believe ought to be said by members of this house. The appropriation asked for covers a very wide range:

(a) the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada;

(b) the conduct of naval, military and air operations in or beyond Canada;

(c) promoting the continuance of trade, industry and business communications, whether by means of insurance or indemnity against war risk or in any other manner whatsoever; and

(d) the carrying out of any measure deemed necessary or advisable by the governor in council in consequence of the existence of a state of war.

It includes, therefore, efforts beyond those which are usually viewed as war efforts.

Last May we passed an appropriation bill providing for rather more than half the amount now requested, and so far parliament has had no opportunity of inquiring fully into the manner of its expenditure. I do not suggest that we should delay the passage of this resolution or of the bill that will follow. But I insist that it is the duty of this house to exercise more care than we are exercising as to the manner in which such grants to his majesty are disposed of.

Lately I have been looking over a very interesting and authoritative work on parliamentary grants. I have it beside me here—"Parliamentary Grants," by Durell. I wish more hon. members would read this book. At page 3 Durell states:

It is one of the old standing principles of our constitution that the House of Commons should control the finances of the country. That is the right, privilege and duty of the house. It has been achieved by means of struggles lasting through centuries. . . . Upon this fundamental principle, laid down at the very outset of English parliamentary history and secured by three hundred years of mingled conflict with the crown and peaceful growth, is grounded the whole law of finance and, consequently, the whole British constitution.

And he goes on to say:

Appropriation alone is, however, of little avail if no provision is made for securing compliance with it. The right of appropriation must be accompanied by the right of parliament to satisfy itself as to the expenditure of the money on the services for which it has been voted.

It is true that we have an annual statement of the auditor general laid before this house, but that is only an assurance that the money has been expended for the purposes for which we intended it. We have no assurance that it has been economically expended, or expended in a manner which would serve the maximum public interest.

It will be argued, of course, that at this time to reveal how this money is being spent might give information to the enemy. If that is so the House of Commons might well follow another British precedent and discuss some of these matters in closed session—in camera. During the last war the British public accounts committee—which, as its name denotes, was a public committee—sat at Westminster in camera, in 1916, in order to consider certain of the accounts connected with the war. Our whole parliamentary system is based on that of Britain. Our rules of debate, our procedure, are modelled on British parliamentary practice and British custom and precedents. At the moment, I say, this country and this parliament alike are largely ignorant of what is going on in relation to a large part of our war effort. Rumours are rampant; criticism is rife, and these dampen the ardour of our people for the support and conduct of the war. Some things must remain confidential, but parliament is responsible to the people and the cabinet is responsible to parliament; there should be a closer bond of confidence between the cabinet and the House of Commons at the present time. It is for this house to decide, and this house alone, what financial matters ought to be kept confidential; for none other is the supreme power in deciding what, how, why and when expenditures should be made.

Except when some particular problem has arisen our public accounts committee has seldom met. I read again in Durell that the British public accounts committee exercises great influence over all the departments of government. Here it has exercised no influence, because it has seldom met. How many members of this house know how the appropriation made last May has been spent? I venture to say none except the members of the government, and someone suggests that probably they do not know either. In any event this house has no information of the sort it ought to have regarding these expenditures. Questions placed on the order paper in the early part of this session last November asking for statements with regard to government expenditures, particularly in relation to contracts, brought forth replies that can be summarized in these words: "not in the public interest". It seems to me that if we are to have a war effort that will win the imagination and the support of the vast majority of the people of Canada, and if we are to ask them to subscribe money to various war loans and to pay heavy taxes, we have an obligation to those people to see that the money is properly spent.

Durell, whom I am going to quote for the last time, states:

> The supreme control of the Commons over public grants, as already mentioned, necessarily demands the complete right of control over the manner in which the grants are spent. This second right must be inseparable from the first if the control over the grants is to be effective, but it is a right which was not claimed nor enforced by the House of Commons until long after the right of control over supply had been established.

Then, in these words he quotes Gladstone, in the British House of Commons:

> It is undoubtedly the business of the House of Commons to be responsible not only for the inception of all public expenditure, but also to follow the money raised by taxation until the last farthing is accounted for.

To achieve this end this house has two methods, the auditor general and the public accounts committee. As I said just now, in Britain the public accounts committee performs that function. In our country the public accounts committee has seldom met. I was glad to learn to-day that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) intends to introduce a motion to appoint a special committee to follow our war expenditures through. That is a step in the right direction. A similar committee, with similar power, was appointed in Great Britain early in the war, some fourteen or fifteen months ago. It was supplementary to the public accounts committee, and has been sitting continuously since that time. We are taking the same step some fourteen or fifteen months after it should have been taken.

It seems to me that in the important particulars to which I have referred we in this house have departed from the elementary right of this house to complete control over expenditures. Let me repeat that information may be and indeed ought to be withheld publicly for military reasons, but I submit that there is no precedent anywhere for withholding from the members of this house the provisions of important government and commercial contracts. Surely that is something new, something we ought not to tolerate lest we lose the only real power we possess over the executive arm of government.

To-day we are discussing the largest appropriation ever requested from this House of Commons. How do we propose to raise that money?—evidently largely by borrowing at rates of interest. Can we allow another war to provide the means for a comparatively small number of people to obtain a permanent lien on the future production of our people?—for that is what the payment of interest over a long term will inevitably mean.

It is true that we are asking the small men to save and to lend. Indeed a considerable amount of compulsion is being exercised in some industries to obtain contributions from the employees. And we should remember that many of those employees have been unemployed for a very considerable period of time. To-day many of the expenditures they are foregoing are expenditures upon necessities in their homes and for their families. I am not objecting to the making of appeals for voluntary aid from all classes of our citizens. I think they should be so made at this time. People who save now are being told that they are providing for the inevitable slump that will follow the war. That, too, is something worth considering.

But let me point this out: At the close of this war those small people will have to cash in on their war bonds, just as they did following the great war in connection with the victory bonds they bought at that time. All these gilt-edged securities we are issuing in large quantities and at a fairly attractive rate of interest will tend to get into the hands of those who have accumulated wealth either prior to or during the war days.

Let me repeat: I am not saying we should not encourage the sale of war bonds to the small investor. I believe we should encourage those sales. I realize that this is important, too, from an entirely different point of view; for we have to transfer productive and skilled labour from luxury industries to war industries. This is one method of achieving that objective. It is an important phase of our war savings campaign. But are we really achieving this? Not altogether, I think. Some people are denying themselves necessities. Others invest in war bonds, but deny themselves nothing. We believe that if we are to raise such huge sums now and in the future we shall have to devise new ways and means of raising at least a large part of the money required. It may be necessary for us to say eventually that we must adopt a maximum income standard as well as a minimum standard of life, and tax in full every dollar beyond the maximum standard upon which the country decides.

Meantime however let us use the instruments at our hand—and we have some instruments we could use to a greater extent than we are using them to-day. In view of the various monetary proposals which have been made lately I want to put our position, the position of this group, clearly on record. I may therefore be pardoned for quoting a portion of a speech I delivered in Winnipeg last October, and which my colleagues have requested me to quote. It was made before our national convention, prior to the new monetary controversy which has recently arisen, and is in these words:

The C.C.F. has always placed in the forefront of its economic policy the public ownership and control of the financial system so that money and credit could be made instruments of national policy. Proposals to this end have been met by opposition from all other groups in parliament. There are those who talk vaguely about monetary reform and advocate the issue of "debt-free" money but who fail to recognize that neither the one nor the other can be achieved as long as banks are privately-owned institutions operated for the profit of their shareholders. The C.C.F. urges parliament to make finance the servant of the people instead of allowing it to continue to be the master. Some people fail to realize that money is only a medium of exchange and a symbol. To suppose that a multiplication of symbols will win a war or cure our domestic ailments is clearly a delusion and a snare. Monetary and financial reform must be considered and instituted as part of a general and wide programme of economic reform. It is a means, not an end in itself.

Dorothy Thompson, in an article entitled, "An Ideology That Cannot Win," put the matter well when she wrote:

"The Germans did not vote themselves four billion money units for defence. They voted—had voted for them—thirty thousand planes, so and so many guns, so and so many thousand tons of reserves of oil and raw materials. The German economy is an economy of things and men; the allied economy is an economy of symbols; money. The German economy recognizes that all wealth is in goods, particularly in capital goods, and that these are not created by money, which is only the medium of exchange, but by the application of labour to materials.

The Allies had money, but failed to produce goods. The Germans had no money, but did produce them."

Thus this doughty and bitter opponent of nazism places her finger on the strength of the German programme and upon our own weakness. Hitler has prostituted a fundamental truth of socialist philosophy for a diabolical purpose even as Satan is said to be able to quote scripture to serve his ends. To win the war, to meet the needs of the post-war period we must deliver ourselves from the delusion that money is wealth, and turn to the realistic truth, that all wealth is in goods, created by the application of labour power to material things. This is the Alpha and Omega of the C.C.F. economic philosophy; this is the truth which a new government in Britain is bringing to the attention of the English-speaking world.

I quote that because I believe it summarizes the point of view we have expressed from time to time in this chamber. To-day many people are under the delusion that money is wealth, when, as I said a moment ago, it is merely a symbol, a system of accountancy, if you like, in our economic structure.

Holding these views I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) the following amendment:

That all the words after "that" in paragraph 2 of the resolution be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"the governor in council be empowered to raise, under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931,

1. by way of compulsory, interest-free loans to be levied according to ability to subscribe, and

2. by the public ownership and control and the planned use of the entire financial system, such sum or sums of money, not exceeding in the whole the sum of $1,300,000,000, as may be required for the purpose of defraying such expenses or making such advances or loans, the principal of any such loan to be a charge upon and payable out of the consolidated revenue fund."

Surely we have a right to ask and to expect that when we call upon our men to fight, and perchance to lay down their lives, we should at the same time call upon accumulated wealth to place itself at our disposal. When the budget is before us we shall urge again the elimination of private profit from our war effort, but in the discussion on this bill we deem it our duty to urge the principle of compulsory interest-free loans and the public ownership and control of our financial institutions.

The publicly owned Bank of Canada has proven itself to be a most useful instrument in the control of foreign exchange and the relating of expanding currency to expanding production. Few realize when they talk of using large volumes of printed money that since July, 1939, the active circulating currency in Canada has been expanded by some fifty per cent.

When low price levels prevailed before the present war broke out, when there was unemployment and business stagnation, we advocated the issue of more money to provide more credit, to increase employment, to accelerate consumer demand and raise the price level. That was a measure of reflation which at that time we believed to be both justifiable and necessary. But the situation has changed. With an expanding war effort, with the distributing of new purchasing power in greater volume, with a lessened production of consumer goods, care must be exercised lest we bring about the disaster of inflation. In our opinion both deflation and inflation are evils which we should endeavour to circumscribe whenever it is possible to do so.

To-day inflation would not benefit agriculture whose wheat and other products are unsalable. Many of our agricultural people think that because during the great war inflationary period they were able to reap more dollars for their products, the same thing might happen now. However, the situation to-day is different from that which existed in 1919, 1920 and 1921. Then there was a scarcity of wheat and foodstuffs throughout a great part of the world which had been devastated by war; there was a demand and the scarcity enabled agricultural produce to rise in price.

But to-day we face an entirely different situation. We have in Canada hundreds of millions of bushels of wheat which are yet unsold. Many people have gone into the hog raising industry, and that industry is being threatened with a surplus. When that happens we shall have people going into the live stock industry, and the same thing will happen there. To-day an inflationary period would have an exactly opposite effect upon the agricultural producer to what occurred in the years following the great war. He would have to pay high prices for all the consumer goods which he uses and he would receive relatively lower prices, lower even than those which now prevail, for his commodity. As my hon. friend suggests, he would be cleaned right out, the last remaining shreds would be picked from his already pretty thin body.

Then rising prices would cause distress among those who must live on a fixed income, on relief, or a pension. It would immediately bring about a demand in industry for increased wages. In some industries increased wages are justified to-day by the already increased cost of living, but the increased wages would never catch up with the increased cost of living. We would have industrial unrest which would interfere seriously with our war effort. To my mind the only people who would benefit from such a condition would be the speculators, for whom some of our politicians apparently care more than they do for the welfare of the common people of their own provinces.

We submit that only a planned democratic control of our economy will meet this situation and the situation which we will have to face in the next several years. The days of drift, the old days of laissez-faire, have gone. Whether we like it or whether we dislike it, we have to face the hard fact that to-day we are dealing with a situation which requires organization, planning and new methods. To the extent that democracy is able to plan, to the extent that democracy through its democratic institutions is able to direct, to that extent democracy will live. We dare not allow democracy to fall and ourselves to pass under the heel of some form of totalitarian dictatorship.

That is why we place to-day complete public control, which we believe involves the ownership, of our financial system in the forefront of the proposals that we would make to this house. After all, the financial system is the means, not only by which we account for our productive activities but by which we save. When we say that we save money, let us remember that we save goods. When we do not spend a dollar, we do not demand a dollars' worth of goods. Our financial system is the means whereby we save, whereby we invest and whereby we direct production into its various channels. Only a completely publicly controlled financial system will fill the bill at the present time. More and more the government will have to tell our people what production they require; more and more they will have to tell the people what things they ought to forego.

I heard the Minister of Finance over the radio, I think it was from Windsor, a short time ago, and if I heard him aright he said that within the next year we may require 300,000 new workers in industry in order to maintain our war efforts in the new industrial organizations which we are building at the present time. That, in addition to the men normally engaged in the industries which we cannot do without—transportation, electric power, and so on—will not only absorb all the employable unemployed, but will demand the changing over of large numbers of people from one type of industry to another. This being the case, we have to go in for more planning than we have ever gone in for before. I know that before the war I used to say that, when war comes, planning become inevitable, and that is being borne out more and more to-day. Now, we can either have a planning from the top down, autocratic, totalitarian planning, or we can have planning through our democratic institutions by the representatives of the people for the people and for the common good. That is the choice, it seems to me, which lies before the democratic countries.

In time of war there is only one thing to do, and that is to direct all our energies to the one end, victory over the enemy. But in doing that we have to beware lest we make errors which will snatch from us the fruits of victory when the war is over. We of this group, in placing these suggestions before the house, are putting them forward not in any dogmatic way, but because we believe that they are worthy of consideration. At this time, no matter how widely our views on many things differ, we ought to have one common interest, and that is the preservation of our democratic institutions, so that in the days to come we and those who come after us shall be able to make ordered and orderly progress to a newer and a better day.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Coldwell moves, seconded by Mr. MacInnis:

That all the words after "that" in paragraph 2 of the resolution be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"the governor in council be empowered to raise, under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931,

1. by way of compulsory, interest-free loans to be levied according to ability to subscribe, and

2. by the public ownership and control and the planned use of the entire financial system, such sum or sums of money, not exceeding in the whole the sum of $1,300,000,000, as may be required for the purpose of defraying such expenses or making such advances or loans, the principal of any such loan to be a charge upon and payable out of the consolidated revenue fund."

I would point out to the hon. member that the amendment is dealing with a resolution which has been recommended by His Excellency the Governor General for the consideration of the house. The motion before the house is that I do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole. Therefore this amendment is not in order.

That does not, of course, preclude the hon. member from moving his amendment if he so desires when the house is in committee of the whole; but meanwhile it is not in order.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): First of all, I wish to make a few comments regarding the speech of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and also one or two observations regarding the speech made by the house leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell).

I was somewhat puzzled by a statement made by the leader of the opposition to the effect that, while he would be definitely opposed to inflation at this time, he thought possibly it might be justified at a later date.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not say that.

Mr. QUELCH: Well, words to that effect.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I never said it would be justified. I said we might have to consider it at a later date.

Mr. QUELCH: The hon. gentleman thought we might have to consider it at a later date. I believe most people will admit that, in times when we have unemployment and undeveloped resources, monetary expansion is occasionally necessary. As a matter of fact, we maintain that it is necessary, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), in his speech in September, 1939, admitted that for the purpose of providing fuller employment and greater production, monetary expansion would be desirable. But I cannot understand anyone suggesting that it might be more desirable at a later date after full production had been reached.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I never said that either.

Mr. GRAYDON: He did not say that at all.

Mr. QUELCH: I think Hansard will show that is what he did say.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not say it was desirable; I said that we might have to consider it later on.

Mr. QUELCH: I still cannot understand why we should consider it after reaching full production if we refuse to consider it before we reach full production. Surely the time to consider monetary expansion is before full production is reached. I think the Minister of Finance would agree with that statement.

The leader in this house of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation made a statement with which I do not agree, when he said that when we nationalized the Bank of Canada it served to bring about a better relationship between production and money. In view of the fact that from 1935 to 1939 we had in the neighbourhood of half a million people unemployed, I cannot see how anyone can claim that the Bank of Canada maintained a correct relationship between the amount of money and the amount of employment or production in the country. The minister himself admitted in September, 1939, that it was desirable to have monetary expansion in order to bring about fuller employment and an increase in the production of the country.

The figures quoted by the Minister of Finance must have helped to impress everyone with the magnitude of our war effort. I think it should prove, to all those who have given this matter any consideration, the undesirability, or perhaps I might say the impossibility, of obtaining such enormous sums entirely from the pockets of the Canadian people. Action of that kind would mean the lowering of the standard of living of the people to such a tremendous extent that our war effort would be greatly impaired. If production were static, such action might be necessary. But, as a matter of fact, production is steadily expanding, and is still a very long way from reaching the maximum. I say that in spite of statements which have been made by some ministers to the effect that we are rapidly approaching that point.

We still have thousands of unemployed. I believe that every hon. member is being frequently approached by men, skilled men, looking for work. If that is not true of the east, it certainly is true of the west. In addition, there are thousands of men in the over-age category between fifty and seventy years, who are, perhaps, not suitable for war work but who could make a very effective contribution towards increasing the production of consumer goods at this time. Again, thousands of people are engaged on what one might call wasteful occupations; and the leading one of those I would classify as the advertising business. Why do we need to have to-day thousands of men in the advertising business trying to persuade people to buy more, while on the other hand the government is stressing upon the public the necessity of spending less? I would call that action actually subversive at this time. Surely those people who are trained could be used in the war effort instead of carrying on work which I agree is essential, under our present system, in peace time, but in time of war is not only unnecessary but detrimental.

Many industries could greatly expand their production without taking on any extra labour —for instance, the farming industry. The farming industry to-day could greatly expand production in many lines. But as I listened to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) addressing the United Farmers of Alberta convention in that province, I heard him tell the farmers that they would have, not exactly to curtail production, but to refrain from increasing production along many lines. He mentioned hogs and grain. There is the matter of vegetables. Farmers could expand in this direction, but they cannot sell the vegetables they are now producing. There is also the question of poultry, the price of which is so low that farmers cannot afford to increase production. When I left Alberta the price of No. 1 eggs was from thirteen to fourteen cents a dozen. Does anyone think that in the heart of winter that recompenses farmers for their labour? With a proper price for poultry production would expand. The same is true if there is a just price for all agricultural products of which there is now a scarcity. Production could greatly expand if the price were satisfactory. There should be no justification for what one might call the black-out of purchasing power, when there is a large amount of commodities available—commodities of which we have surplus to-day. Unfortunately, however, the present form of policy results in a total black-out because it does not take into consideration whether certain commodities are scarce or plentiful. Consequently people are unable to maintain a proper standard of living, which we consider necessary for the health and morale of Canadians.

A large amount of war expenditure has been met in the past and will be met in the future by expansion of credit. The government has already hired the chartered banks to create something like $450,000,000, and no doubt large additional sums will be created in the future. We hold that when it becomes necessary to create money it should be created by the Bank of Canada instead of by the chartered banks. We believe that we should maintain an equitable form of taxation in order to withdraw from circulation money in excess of the amount required to maintain that standard of living which will ensure the health and morale of the people.

All money for government expenditure in excess of that procured by taxation should be obtained from the Bank of Canada. That is the considered opinion of this group. Supporters of the government's orthodox financial policy are and always have been extremely critical of any proposal to adopt a real pay-as-you-go policy by supplementing the revenue obtained from taxation with debt-free money obtained from the Bank of Canada. Such a proposal is invariably branded by these people as one of crude inflation. The Minister of Finance in the past has waxed hysterical, conjuring up the terrible consequences of such an act, and in order to bolster up his argument against us he has invariably stated that we have advocated the issue of unlimited sums of money. Let me state most emphatically that at no time have we advocated such a thing. I say that because in the past we have been very careful to emphasize the fact that there is a definite limit to the amount of money that can be issued, that limit being the amount required to make the monetary demand of the people effective against the production of the country. That demand can be expanded until maximum production is reached—and, as I have already stated, we are still a long way from reaching that goal.

On November 21, 1940, the Minister of Finance stated that the government's financial war policy was in accord with the overwhelming preponderance of Canadian public opinion. Is that statement correct? After the minister had declared the government's policy in September, 1939, I was genuinely in accord with the statement he made when he said that as far as possible we were going to adopt a pay-as-you-go policy. He said also that the government would insist upon equality of service and sacrifice, and with that we are heartily in accord. Further, he stated that there would be monetary expansion to provide for unemployment and to bring the production of industries up to maximum capacity. We agreed with that. The minister surely would not suggest for a moment that that has been carried out. We have not adopted anything like a pay-as-you-go policy when one takes into consideration the millions upon millions that we are borrowing. We have not adopted equality of service and sacrifice when we have on the one hand industries guaranteed cost of production plus profit and, on the other, the agricultural industry producing at considerably below cost of production.

The Minister of Agriculture stated that agriculture is making its contribution to the war by producing below cost of production. Is that equality of service and sacrifice? Can any industry continue to function efficiently so long as it is compelled to produce below cost of production? Yet that is the position of agriculture. Farmers are being forced steadily further and further into debt, and the only reason why they are able to continue is the fact that provincial debt legislation exists which makes as a first charge against production of the farm the amount required to finance the farmer for the current year. As I have said, the minister's statement may have been true of the attitude of the people at the time he made the announcement, but there is an awakening among the people to-day. If the minister would travel round the country more, he would probably find that to be the fact.

I believe an explanation of the fact that the protests of people are becoming more audible, and the reason why these protests have not been more audible in the past may be found in a letter that was written by a prominent banker to another banker many years ago. And the statement is just as true to-day as it was then. Let me quote from a letter referred to in document No. 23 entitled "National Economy and the Banking System of the United States." At page 99, from a letter written by Rothschild Brothers of London, England, to a New York firm of bankers on June 25, 1863, I quote:

> The few who can understand the system (cheque money and credits) will either be so interested in its profits, or so dependent on its favours, that there will be no opposition from that class, while on the other hand the great body of the people, mentally incapable of comprehending the tremendous advantage that capital derives from the system, will bear its burdens without complaint and perhaps without even suspecting that the system is inimical to their interests.

I am satisfied that to-day more and more people are beginning to realize that this financial system is definitely inimical to their interests. Since the abortive attempt on the part of the federal government to obtain what I would term a financial stranglehold on the provinces, these protests have become considerably more audible.

Is the finance department of this government in a position to adopt, as it has done in the past, an attitude of intolerance towards long overdue reforms of the monetary system? Are the financial policies adopted by Canada in the past and to-day such as to create a spirit of confidence in the people? Let us go back to the last war. The former Minister of Finance, now Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), has stated that the financial policy to-day is in principle the same as the financial policy during the last war. I give some figures taken from the Canada Year Book, 1939. At the end of 1919 the gross debt of Canada, dominion, provincial and municipal, including railway guarantees, was $3,840,932,655. By 1938 that debt had increased to $7,904,000,000 in round figures. In other words, it had practically doubled.

Perhaps it is not fair to include provincial and municipal debts. Let us just take the dominion debt. At the end of 1919 it was $2,676,635,725, and in 1938 it had increased to $3,540,237,614, an increase of approximately 40 per cent.

We must all realize that we are now incurring debts that we shall never be able to pay. During the depression of 1930 to 1939 we were told on various occasions by prominent bankers that the main cause of that depression was the tremendous debt incurred during the war of 1914-18. If the debt incurred at that time was the cause of the depression of 1930 to 1939, what is going to be the consequence of the debts we are piling up to-day? I believe we all realize that the debts we are contracting to-day will never be met. I do not want to be misunderstood; I do not mean that people who are buying war loan bonds and saving certificates are not going to be repaid; of course they will be paid. But as far as the debt of the government is concerned, that will not be paid; the cost of paying the war saving certificates will be met by further refunding. The interest on these debts will go on forever, or as long as the present system is in operation.

It is easy to understand why this government adopts this complacent attitude towards the piling up of debts. The adviser to the government, the governor of the Bank of Canada, giving evidence before the banking and commerce committee in 1939, stated in answer to the question, "How will these debts ever be met?" words to the effect that it was not necessary for these debts to be repaid. In fact, he seemed to think it rather a foolish question. Let me give the actual words:

> Q. Is it possible for you to imagine any way by which we are ever going to pay the debt we have got?
> Mr. Towers: As the debts of the government are an asset of the Canadian people I do not see much point in the thing.

Here is another question and answer which shows even more clearly his attitude. As a matter of fact, in the second answer he takes the stand that a large debt is a sign of progress, a small debt a sign of stagnation.

Now I want to get this question across once more. Can we hope ever to tax the people of Canada sufficiently to retire the debts, or must we continue to go progressively into debt, although the debt charges may not increase because of lower rates of interest?

A. That debt is an asset of the Canadian people. Now let me say, I am speaking of public, private and all kinds of debt; what would be the object of repaying it?

Q. Well that is what—

A. Speaking of the thing as a whole. Now there may be and there has been an object in repaying debts so far as one individual entity is concerned; but as it is repaid to the holders of the debt one must assume that they are using that money for fresh enterprises, involving fresh debts and fresh assets; so that all I can say would be this, that in a country where the sum total of public and private debt was decreasing, you have a country which is going backward and which is becoming more poverty stricken. Generally speaking, in a country where you find that there is no public and private debt you have a country resembling darkest Africa; there is nothing else.

That, I think, shows clearly why this government are going head over heels into debt, when they have a man advising them who believes that increase of debt is a sign of progress. While it may be true that the national debt is a national asset, we should remember that it is only an asset of comparatively few of the people but it is a liability of one hundred per cent of the people. Therefore the government have to place a levy on all the people of Canada in order to pay tribute to a comparatively few. Is that a desirable condition? But that is the direct result of the government's financial policy as recommended and approved by the governor of the Bank of Canada.

I was interested to observe that the general manager of the Bank of Montreal, Mr. G. W. Spinney, takes just the opposite view. In my opinion, the stand taken by Mr. Spinney is far more sound than that of the governor of the Bank of Canada. Mr. Spinney, on January 24, 1938, said:

Canada's debt burden gradually is lowering the general standard of living, G. W. Spinney of Montreal, general manager of the Bank of Montreal, said in an address prepared for delivery to the associated boards of trade of Quebec eastern townships to-night.

He went on to say:

The primary threat to the welfare of this country lies in our indifferent attitude towards mounting debts. Federal and provincial government indebtedness is ever on the increase and some municipal bodies are shaping their courses in the same direction. Let us consider how our capacity to pay is keeping pace with the growth in our promises to pay.

Comparing the year 1937 with 1927 we find the annual national income of the country is less by something like $1,230,000,000. On the other hand the total of dominion, provincial and municipal direct and guaranteed debt had increased in the same period by some $2,620,000,000. In other words, while the wherewithal to enable us to pay our contractual obligations has shrunk in the last decade, we have in the same period substantially increased the total of our borrowings.

Something seems to be out of kilter here because we are obviously making promises which our present growth in wealth and income does not appear to justify.

So we in this group believe that we are quite justified in condemning the present policy as a debt-creating policy, a policy that is building up a tremendous debt which can never be paid but which will extract interest charges from the people as long as we continue under the present system.

Let us take a later period, 1935 to 1939, the regime of this government. During that period we had an average of a million on relief, half a million unemployed employables, industry operating at only a small percentage of full capacity, our capital assets being steadily depreciated and our defences neglected while foreign countries were rearming. This was all because the Minister of Finance of that time insisted that money was not available to develop the resources of this country. Hon. members who were here during that period will remember how time and again we of this group urged the government to adopt a policy that would make it possible to develop the resources of the nation, but all we got out of the Minister of Finance was hysterics. He conjured up the bogy of inflation; he saw the snakes of inflation creeping about the country, choking the very life out of the people. When it was even suggested that we should make old age pensions available at the age of sixty-five, the minister said it was impossible to find the money, but now we are finding millions and billions for the destruction of life.

I am satisfied that, when this war is over, people will not be content to be told by the government that money is not available to guarantee a decent standard of living in Canada, while we have half a million people unemployed and industries producing only to a small percentage of their capacity. I am satisfied that, when our soldiers come back, they will not be content to be told, as the soldiers of the last war were told, that no work is available for them and they will have to go on relief. Soldiers will not be content to see the widows of soldiers forced on relief because the government refuse to pay pensions, because these women are in the unfortunate position of being unable to prove that their husbands died as a result of war service, or had a 50 per cent disability. As every hon. member knows, that is a situation which every returned man has been fighting for the last twenty years. Finally we had the disability reduced from 80 per cent to 50 per cent, but there are still many widows of men who died as a result of war service who have been forced to accept relief because this government would not accept its responsibility. I do not believe that, after this war, our soldiers will permit such a situation to continue. When they see the government finding millions of dollars for war purposes, they will not be content to be told that in a country like Canada, with all its resources, people must remain on relief and without employment simply because the Minister of Finance considers it necessary to maintain a deflationary policy.

As I have pointed out already, during the period from 1935 to 1939 we urged upon the government the need for monetary expansion We urged that a certain proportion of the unemployed be used to build up the defences of the country, to construct roads, irrigation projects and other essential services, while the balance of the unemployed should be used to expand the production of consumer goods, thereby satisfying the demand of those engaged in other services. That is to say, we stressed the need for maintaining a definite relationship at all times between the production of capital goods and the production of consumer goods, so that the money paid out in the production of capital goods would equal the deficiency of purchasing power that existed as between the total prices of consumer goods available for distribution and the effective demand against them. Provided that is done, there can be no talk of inflation, because by such action you have stabilization, not inflation. And, as I have already said, those who were in the house at that time will remember what happened; invariably the Minister of Finance displayed hysterics, or the debate was adjourned on some excuse or another.

So, Mr. Speaker, I would say that from 1935 to 1939 the Department of Finance continued to sabotage the development of our industries and the training of our man-power, while our potential enemies, unhampered by such financial restrictions, expanded their industrial output to the maximum. Therefore, upon the declaration of war, we found ourselves in this deplorable situation, with weak defences, practically no modern armies, a large volume of unskilled labour, and with our industries running in low gear. In view of the points I have recited, Mr. Speaker, is there any reason why the people of Canada to-day should have any confidence in the financial policy of this government? I could not help feeling amused at the following statement made by the present Minister of Finance, apparently in reply to Mr. Hepburn, on January 24 of this year:

> I can understand that during the depression, when there were unemployed labour and resources in Canada, it may have been difficult for a layman to grasp the rather technical principles that determine the amount of expansion of currency and credit that may safely and wisely be provided for—

I am glad the minister admits that such a policy is at least open to question; I assume he would object to the use of the word "criticism." I am satisfied that the minister will have a far harder job to justify a policy of that kind after the war than perhaps he has had in the past because, as I have stated already, there is a rapid awakening taking place, and the tremendous expenditure of money in connection with this war has opened the eyes of the people as they have never been opened before. I am hoping that the deflationary policies of the past are a thing of the past which never again will be sanctioned by the people of Canada, and that in future the Prime Minister will be compelled to live up to the policy which he laid down in 1935, and upon which he won a great election.

I think we are all agreed that Canada must make a maximum war effort at this time. We know that Canada has tremendous resources, both developed and undeveloped. We also appreciate the fact that we are a long way from the point where these resources may be developed to their capacity in order to bring about a maximum war effort. In our opinion, the main obstacle impeding our progress is the financial bottle-neck. The Prime Minister, the former Minister of Finance and the present Minister of Finance have stated in effect that anything physically possible to further our war effort will be made financially possible. I submit that to-day this policy is not being carried out. I think it is quite obvious that ever since the declaration of war the government has been thinking in terms of money instead of in terms of production. As evidence of the truth of that statement I would quote some examples.

First of all, I might refer again to agriculture, one of the key industries, which to-day is still being compelled to produce many commodities at less than cost of production. We all know that no industry can carry on efficiently under such conditions. The farmers have every right to demand that the government carry out its promise with regard to equality of service and sacrifice. I am not suggesting for one moment that we should hold up England for higher prices. I am suggesting that the difference between cost of production and the prevailing price should be made up by means of a subsidy paid by the government, the cost of which subsidy should be borne by the whole Canadian people. I do not see why one body of people should be asked to make a greater sacrifice, so far as production is concerned, than any other body; and, as the Minister of Agriculture has admitted, agriculture is being sacrificed in this war. We do not know what will be the consequences of this policy, but we do know that the debts of the farmers are being expanded month by month, year by year, and that all the advantages brought about by debt adjustment for the farmers are being wiped out and that this work will have to be done all over again. We are only laying up more trouble for ourselves by ignoring this problem. It will have to be dealt with after the war, so why not deal with it now? The minister need not be afraid that a fair price for agricultural products would cause an increased demand for goods. The farmers have such tremendous debts to pay that any increased returns they receive will be applied on their debts, and of course when money is paid back to the banks it goes out of circulation.

I have another instance to show that the government is still thinking in terms of money rather than in terms of production. I have in my hand a letter which I received from Mr. Justice T. C. Davis, associate deputy minister of the Department of National War Services. Page three reads as follows:

> Scrap iron and steel: This is an item which is particularly important and every effort should be made to salvage all of this type of scrap metal. Only experienced persons can adequately sort out scrap metal, break down and arrange the same for shipment, and experienced persons should be called into consultation in doing this work.
> A thorough investigation into the problem of scrap iron and steel has disclosed the fact that in all parts of Canada, except in Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, there is a ready market for these materials. Freight rates and prices are such in Canada, exclusive of the said three provinces, that voluntary organizations very often make a good margin of profit by gathering up these materials. It is highly desirable that the supply of this type of material be substantially increased.

And it goes on to say:

> In connection with the three provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, there is no place in these provinces where scrap metal can be consumed in quantity, and all such salvage must be shipped to markets outside these three provinces. At the moment, freight rates and prices make shipment generally impracticable.

First of all, he says that this is an item of particular importance, and that every effort should be made to salvage it, but that salvage of this commodity cannot be carried out in the three western provinces because it costs too much. Does that sound as though we are removing financial limitations when we have in three provinces large quantities of scrap iron which the government cannot use because it costs too much to move it?

Mr. ILSLEY: Is it not probably because the moving costs are not so great in terms of money, but are great in terms of labour, coal, and the use of railway equipment? I am told it would be an uneconomic movement, without bringing money into the matter at all.

Mr. QUELCH: Surely at this time, when there is no great movement of grain, there should be plenty of boxcars, or cars of other types available for the movement of these materials.

I am glad the minister mentioned labour, because I intended to say something on that point. Now is the time when there is very little work to be done on the farms. Two months from now, farmers of the prairie provinces will be exceptionally busy. If any work is going to be done to salvage scrap iron on the farms, it should be done in the winter. There will be no labour available in the summer months. If the work is not done now, it will have, to a large extent, to be left until next winter.

I understand there are still many semi-idle railway employees. Certainly they will be busier when the grain moves again. Someone mentioned coal. There is plenty of coal available for the trains. We know that in Alberta many men are idle, or work only a few days a week, because they cannot get orders for coal. They are not employed in any war industry when they are not in the mines. No, I do not think the minister's explanation is very satisfactory.

Then we may discuss the production of munitions in the west. We have in western Canada factories which could be producing munitions. We are told, however, that it is cheaper to produce them in the east. If we were engaged in a modified war effort, that might sound reasonable. But when we are engaged in a total war effort, then I say that every available factory should be utilized, no matter what the financial outlay may be. We must have armaments. If we lose the war, it will not help us to say that we could have won it if we had used those factories. That would be a very poor excuse, indeed.

The financial factor is the one which is being considered. It is physically possible to utilize those factories, but they are not being utilized. And might I mention that there are still thousands and thousands of unemployed. Every hon. member is being constantly approached and being asked if he cannot find a way by which some person can make an effective contribution to the war. Both skilled and unskilled men are in that position. The minister doubts it? Well, I am prepared to give him the names and addresses of many men; so that they can come here and secure work.

In closing, I would reiterate what I said about the stand we take with regard to a financial policy. We feel that as equitable a form of taxation as possible should be maintained in order to withdraw from circulation money in excess of the amount required to ensure a standard of living which would protect the health and morale of the people. All money for government expenditures in excess of that procured by taxation, should be obtained from the Bank of Canada. In other words, we are definitely opposed to any borrowing from the chartered banks or from any other source. If the programme we suggest were followed, we would have in truth a pay-as-you-go policy, with no danger of inflation. It might be necessary to introduce rationing. It certainly would be advisable to eliminate altogether certain industries which are producing unnecessary articles, and put those industries at war work. Many commodities are being produced to-day that people might deny themselves without having their standard of living seriously endangered. We are of opinion that the government is prepared to do everything possible to win the war, provided it may be done by orthodox means. It almost looks to us as though it is prepared actually to risk losing the war, rather than use unorthodox methods.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the speeches of the two hon. members who have immediately preceded me show the necessity of immediate reconstruction by the government of its way of doing business at the present time, so as to bring about national government of all. It is the desire of the Conservative party to work, to cooperate to the utmost with the government, and to have from all a united effort. After all is said and done, it is a government of Canadians in Canada, and it should be the desire of the opposition—it is in fact the desire of the official opposition, with all here—to cooperate with the government to the utmost extent in the prosecution of the war.

But in the dire straits in which this empire finds itself to-day we are not going to cooperate along the lines the two parties to my left are endeavouring to put over. When Canada may be invaded, we will not allow them to use the war as a means of putting over their policies. As I said on December 5—

> . . . I object to the war being used by them as an opportunity to urge their plans, to put across their own cures, remedies, prescriptions, palliatives, patent medicines and gold cures for the economic ills and financial and social burdens of the country. They are using the dire straits in which Britain finds herself to-day to put over their remedies and divide this country when it should be one from coast to coast, with all its citizens ready to support the government. This is what should be done as long as the government are carrying out their duties and doing a real war job, and if they run the war in a non-partisan way, but not otherwise.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): You would rather lose the war, would you?

Mr. CHURCH: The object of these gentlemen is to take advantage of the war to propose their policies, and then in the elections take the reins of government after the war. There is no doubt about that. We have heard of the proposals of these parties in the house before.

Mr. MacINNIS: I submit that the hon. member has no right to impute motives to any other hon. member. We have let him get away with quite a lot. But there are limits to which he can go, and I suggest he should be so advised.

Mr. CHURCH: That is not a point of order. It is just another speech by the hon. member.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am speaking to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has a right to reply to a point of order. I am listening to his reply.

Mr. THORSON: Nobody pays any attention to him, anyway.

Mr. CHURCH: The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) should know that even if it was a misstatement—which it was not—it is not out of order. If we were to call members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation to order every time they make misstatements, they would be called to order every few minutes. Let me say to these gentlemen—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Vancouver East has said, when raising a point of order, that motives have been imputed to him.

Mr. CHURCH: The Conservative party has always been consistent in its trade, tariff and financial protection policies for Canada. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and the other groups in the house are minority groups; but the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, although not large numerically in the house, has considerable influence among the farmers and industrial workers of the country. All its members are sincere in their beliefs; I never doubted their sincerity or motive, and I believe they want to do everything possible for our war effort. I do not, however, want to see the war used as an opportunity for putting across any so-called cures and remedies for conditions, cures and remedies which I do not believe to be in the interests of the people of this country and which can wait until the war is won. As I say, the Conservative party has always been consistent, although I am ready to admit that in the past it has, like other parties, made some mistakes. But it has always consistently supported protection all along the line, and the principle of sound money.

This country dreads an inflationary price movement, and there is no sound reason why such a movement should be allowed to develop in view of the fact that Canada is a country with unlimited natural resources, an abundance of raw materials, a balance of idle labour and capital and the technical resources which can be drawn upon to increase production. Apparently the object of certain people in Canada is to use the great peril Canada now faces, fighting as she is for her very existence, as a means of advancing their platforms and aims and policies. For instance, the suggested amendment aims at the nationalization and conscription of the means of production, namely, the products of the land, of our manufacturers, of our banks, of the sea, the soil, the forest and the mine, and of wealth. We should not lend our support to policies which are foreign to the two older parties, and which would tend to divide us in time of war.

Let us not drive our landowners, our manufacturers and our farmers away from their properties. Otherwise we shall be heading toward the setting up of a totalitarian state or state socialism. All private enterprise will be eliminated and destroyed by these excursions into state socialism. Under such a system the farmer would, in the end, be a paid worker, and the landowner would pass out of the picture. The whole empire, including Canada and the other dominions, would become totalitarian and be subjected to a system of what some people call collectivism. Without an incentive, which is natural in man, he will not work. There would be nothing to work for. It would not take him long to realize that there would be nothing for his long hours of work and toil. This awful struggle is being used to fasten such a system upon Canada in the next election. No such wholesale scheme has been thought of before. The danger should be driven home in the house and in the country.

The Tory party draws its support from agriculture and labour. It has always had considerable support from the trades union movement and the working classes. It believes in a sound policy. It believes in Christian socialism, and it has given Canada considerable Christian socialism in legislation. We may not go as far as many of the hon. members of the groups to my left; we do not believe in the theories advanced by the hon. member for Vancouver East and others. The Conservative party believes in the welfare of our own working people, in our own work for our own workmen; it believes in our own markets for our own products. It believes in sound money, brought up to date to meet changed conditions. The right to possess private property is not derived from man; it is derived from nature, and the state has no right to abolish it; the state can only regulate its use.

While I believe in a reasonable amount of Christian socialism, I do not think this is the time to bring up these matters. The country should not be divided at this time; we should be united in our efforts. The war is the only thing that should be discussed in this parliament to-day. There seems to be no one in the house or in the country who is willing to speak of those principles which made our empire great, those great fundamental principles of public policy. A great future lies before Canada once this war is won. The Tory party is not a rich man's party, it is the party of the working classes, and of the trades union movement, because of its protection for labour. It is our desire that this party should be taken back to the masses who have always been its refuge and strength. I am ready to support the government just as long as it does its duty in connection with this war.

Canada has been behind Australia who has troops in Libya and Singapore. We have only to look at what was done in Australia and New Zealand. I gave a summary of this on a previous occasion. They summoned their parliaments at once to legislate for instant conscription, not only of men but of land, property, industry and wealth. The Australian minister of defence said, "We give Britain an open cheque to draw on Australia's manpower". There was a renewed rush to the colours. More than 1,000 men offered themselves in New South Wales on June 17, and 550 enlisted at one Melbourne depot on June 18 in a few hours. It was decided to raise a third division for service overseas, to increase the home defence force to 250,000 men and to enlist 2,000 more for the navy. The British government was invited to take over aircraft being manufactured for Australia in the United States, and orders were placed for over £2,000,000 worth of aircraft in local factories. Hardly a word of recrimination was uttered. Mr. Menzies, the prime minister said:

> The empire must continue the long struggle with all its resources until British sea-power, through the blockade, brings retribution to Hitler.

Mr. Curtin, the labour leader, when giving unqualified support to the emergency powers measures which incorporated so much that his movement had hitherto opposed, said:

> I am not afraid of what the government may do with its powers, I am afraid only of what the enemy may do if we do not vote with the government.

The same thing happened in New Zealand. It seems to me that Canada is lagging behind. We know now what happened yesterday in Singapore, where a number of Australian troops were landed. Yet Canada would take no part in developing the Singapore base, or give a dollar to it, although it holds the key to the protection of the Pacific. There is no royal road to victory in this war, as Canada will soon find out to its sorrow. The measures to be taken to pay for the defence of this country are to be found in the four clauses of the resolution. The Canadian public will stand for any measures, no matter how drastic, provided the government is making an honest war effort on their behalf. There must be no complacency in this effort. The House of Commons has a function to perform.

On motion of Mr. Church the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, February 20, 1941.

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

CAPTURED GERMAN MERCHANTMAN "WESER"

Mr. REID:

1. Under what Canadian company or department of government was the captured German merchantman Weser placed after her capture and arrival in British Columbia ports?

2. Was the captured ship given a complete examination as to her seaworthy condition or any possible damage to her engines or other machinery?

3. Were the engines, machinery or hull found to be damaged? If so, to what extent?

4. Who was entrusted with such examination and what were the names and qualifications of the men who actually made the survey?

5. Was any estimate made of the repairs required, and, if so, what was the total estimated sum of all repairs considered necessary?

6. Were tenders called for such repairs?

7. What company or companies were given the work of repairing this ship?

8. What was the total cost of all repairs carried out, including engines, machinery and hull?

Mr. HOWE:

1. The Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited.

2. Yes.

3. The hull was not damaged, but was very badly covered with marine growth of hard substances. Engines and machinery, when opened up, disclosed defects to the extent of about 75 per cent; consequently repairs were necessary.

4. Mr. William Adie, a first-class engineer with British Board of Trade certificates, and with over twenty years' service with Canadian National Steamships, was placed as engineer in charge of the work and as acting superintending engineer of the company.

Captain H. S. Hilton, a master mariner with over twenty years' service with Canadian National Steamships.

The above two gentlemen represented the company.

A representative of the Canadian Steamship Inspection branch of the Department of Transport and a representative of Lloyds Registry of Shipping.

5. In view of the fact that the ship had been in southern waters for a long time, and that it was absolutely necessary that it should be classed in accordance with the Canadian government regulations as well as any commercial society for classification, it was necessary to open up for their inspection the engines, and all other machinery, including refrigerating machinery, tanks, steering gear, etc., to ascertain the actual internal and physical condition of the vessel.

For this work, and for such renewals and repairs as were apparent at the time, tenders were called, the successful tenderers being Messrs. Yarrows, Limited, of Victoria, B.C., who were given the work.

As the opening up of the various parts progressed, it was found that additional repairs and renewals were absolutely necessary, and to have endeavoured to secure prices on this work would have meant that as each individual item disclosed itself a new call for tenders would have been required, which was not practicable, and, as is common practice under such conditions, the work was carried out by Messrs. Yarrows, Limited, the ship being at their plant and all opened up.

6. Tenders were called for as referred to in answer to No. 5.

7. Messrs. Yarrows, Limited, Victoria, B.C.

8. Actual repairs, $106,544.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

TRANSPORT COMMISSION—FREIGHT RATES AND TARIFF TOLLS—TRAVELLING EXPENSES

Mr. REID:

1. How many appeals for reduction in freight rates have been made to the board of transport commissioners by British Columbia since 1925 and up to the present time?

2. How many of these appeals have been granted?

3. What number of appeals have been heard by the board of transport commissioners from January 1, 1940, to January 31, 1941, from the province of British Columbia, asking for a reduction in freight rates?

4. How many of these have been granted?

5. How many requests or appeals have been made to the board of transport commissioners or board of railway commissioners by the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific railways, since 1925 up to the present time, for an increase in tariff tolls?

6. How many of these have been allowed or granted?

7. What was the total cost of travelling allowances of the board of railway commissioners during the period from January 1, 1940, to January 31, 1941, and what amount was incurred by each commissioner?

AIRCRAFT PRODUCTION

QUESTION AS TO PRESENT POSITION, WITH REFERENCE TO FEDERAL AIRCRAFT LIMITED

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of requesting from the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) a public statement with respect to a matter of vital public importance, namely, the present unsatisfactory state of aircraft production in Canada, and particularly with respect to the alleged failure of the wholly government-owned corporation, Federal Aircraft Limited, to function.

I make this request at this stage and in this manner, rather than in the form of a motion for the adjournment of the house to discuss this definite matter of urgent public importance, on the ground that we have no wish in the world to embarrass the government's war-time production plans. There has, however, been so much delay in the production of aircraft that it is quite apparent that the government's announced programme, made on several occasions and as long ago as nine months, has been a complete failure.

Federal Aircraft Limited was set up by the minister as a government owned corporation—

Mr. HOWE: Order. Is my hon. friend making a speech on the orders of the day?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am making a statement, and I think it is open to me to do so.

Mr. HOWE: Is it in order for me to continue the debate?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would ask the minister to give some consideration to what I have to say, and to use his own judgment. I do not expect him to make a complete statement at all to-day. I am doing it in this manner because I am advised that I can do it in this way, and I ask the minister and the house to hear me.

Mr. HOWE: Well, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has made his request already; he is now making a speech.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am pointing out what the position is, if I may be permitted to do so. No reflection on the minister or on the government is intended. That matter is too important for anything of the sort. Unless I am ruled out of order I intend to proceed.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have already on a former occasion dealt with the matter of questions on the order of the day. I take it that questions will be asked with sufficient detail to give the minister who is addressed an understanding of the subject matter dealt with, but no expression of opinion should be given by the hon. member who asks the question. I rather think the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) is giving expression to an opinion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then with the leave of the house I ask to be allowed to continue, and if I am not I shall give the statement to the press.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why the laughter? It has not gone to the press yet, but it will go.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sure there is every disposition on the part of all hon. members in the house to give my hon. friend as much latitude as may be necessary to allow him to fulfil any function of the leader of the opposition. But there is a procedure which this House of Commons follows and which my hon. friend knows as well as any member of the House. I think on reflection he will agree that His Honour the Speaker has given a right interpretation of the procedure to be followed at this time.

As far as giving anything to the press is concerned my hon. friend is of course at perfect liberty to do that, but I might remind him of what he frequently says to me, that it is desirable in connection with public matters likely to come up for discussion in parliament to have them so far as possible brought up in parliament in the first instance.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree with that, that is why I am bringing it up here. I understand, then, that I am not to be allowed to proceed further?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Ask the question.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. leader of the opposition has some further question to ask of the minister, of course he is entitled to ask it. All that I ruled was that no expression of opinion should be given.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am proposing to make, in addition to what I have already said, a statement of fact. I believe I am fully within the rule. And I wind up by asking the minister to give to the house a full, complete and true statement of the position. I think I am within the rules, but I certainly bow to Your Honour's ruling if you think I am not.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the statement already made covers fully what the hon. member requires of the minister.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): In reply to the question of my hon. friend I shall be very glad to give shortly the complete statement for which he asks.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Do I understand that I am absolutely barred from completing my statement of fact? If Your Honour rules that I am, of course that is the end of the matter to-day.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): First, Mr. Speaker, I call your attention and that of my hon. friend to his very last words. He says he wants to complete his statement of fact. That is not the purpose of asking questions in the house. The rules are very clear; the purpose is not to convey information, but to ask for information. It will be for the Minister of Munitions and Supply to give the facts after my hon. friend has asked his question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, if we are to have that exhibition of the steam roller—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Who is the exhibitor?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I now desire under standing order 31 to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend if he has already presented to Mr. Speaker the matter of urgent public importance which he wishes discussed?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I have not. If it has to go through the regular procedure it is clear that I cannot go on at this stage and at this sitting, but there will be another time when I can go on. I chose, as I stated in my opening, to put the matter in this form as a question on the orders of the day rather than to move the adjournment of the house. If I am barred, of course I shall have to stop. But I am telling the house and the country—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —that they will not have heard the last of this.

An hon. MEMBER: Cheap!

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Again, Mr. Speaker, we call your attention to those words of my hon. friend. He says he will have another occasion, and it is exactly because he will have another occasion that he has no right to move the adjournment of the house on a matter which he claims to be urgent, the more so since my hon. friend has already spoken on that very question in the fairly lengthy speech he made yesterday in the course of the debate which is now proceeding in the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Standing order No. 31 provides that:

(1) Leave to make a motion for the adjournment of the house (when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance) must be asked after the ordinary daily routine of business (standing order 15) has been concluded and before notices of motions or orders of the day are entered upon.

(2) The member desiring to make such a motion rises in his place, asks leave to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, and states the matter.

(3) He then hands a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed to the Speaker, who, if he thinks it in order and of urgent public importance, reads it out and asks whether the member has the leave of the house.

If the hon. leader of the opposition gives me a written statement of the matter that he proposes to lay before the house so that I may decide upon it, I will deal with it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suppose I should be glad to do that, Your Honour.

Mr. SPEAKER: This is rather a lengthy statement, but I think the gist of it has already been indicated to the house by the leader of the opposition. He has stated himself that he can have opportunity to discuss this at a later date. I rule that it is not a matter of such urgent public importance that it cannot be dealt with at another time, and therefore I cannot accede to the hon. member's request.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT COMMENTING ON CANADA'S REPRESENTATION AT WASHINGTON

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): There is another matter which I should like to draw to the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the house, namely, a Canadian Press dispatch from Brantford, Ontario, appearing in last evening's Ottawa Journal, in which Mr. John MacCormac, Washington correspondent of the New York Times, is reported to have stated that "Ottawa had 'muzzled' Canada's official representatives 'to the benefit of the American isolationists rather than the interventionists' ".

The whole article is, I believe, of sufficient importance that it should be read to the house, but probably objection will be taken to that.

The charge here made is a very serious one, particularly when made by such a well-qualified observer, and should be dealt with immediately. There is grave unrest in the country with regard to Canada's representation in the United States; the position should be clarified at the earliest possible moment, and I invite the Prime Minister to do so.

If I am permitted I should like to read the article; perhaps it has not come to the attention of the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the question my hon. friend is asking me?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The question is, what is the position of Canada's representation at Washington at the present moment, having regard to the statements of this journalist? I quote:

[Mr. Speaker.]

John MacCormac, Washington correspondent of the New York Times, said in an interview here to-day that "the Dominion of Canada is in a position to play an important part as an intermediary between the United States and Great Britain, but she is very strikingly not doing it."

Former Ottawa correspondent of the Times, Mr. MacCormac said Canada is not using her great influence in Washington on behalf of Great Britain. "Canada is . . . preserving a deep and impenetrable silence at the very time when future relations between the two halves of the English-speaking world are being determined by debate over the lend-lease bill."

He said isolationists in the United States were making a talking point of that part of Canadian policy by which the statement of Britain's dollar resources in America did not include Canada's holdings. Most needed in Washington was not more Canadian representation but a change in Canadian policy. He said Ottawa had "muzzled" Canada's official representatives "to the benefit of the American isolationists rather than the interventionists."

I ask the Prime Minister, as Minister of External Affairs, what he is going to do about a position like that.

Mr. POULIOT: The journalist is irresponsible.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): In speaking on Monday I thought I made a very frank, clear and comprehensive statement about the position of Canada at Washington, and I would refer my hon. friend the leader of the opposition to the statement I made at that time as an answer to the question he has just asked. I would say further that I was anxious to proceed this week with the estimates of the Department of External Affairs in order that I might enlarge upon some of the subjects referred to. As my hon. friend knows, I have postponed the consideration of external affairs only in order to accommodate the house. Those estimates will, I assume, be coming up for consideration on Monday next. Perhaps then if need be I may be in a position to answer further questions.

LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN RECENT ISSUE OF "LIBERTY" MAGAZINE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): In view of the practice of quoting editorials I should like to direct a question to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) based upon an article which appeared in the February 15 issue of Liberty magazine, written by Mr. Grattan O'Leary, which contains these words:

Mr. R. B. Hanson, Conservative leader, is a well meaning man. He lacks experience; lacks help; has no good fighting lieutenants; is without a research staff to keep him informed.

I should like to ask my hon. friend if that is true.

COMPULSORY TRAINING

REVISION OF REGULATIONS RELATING TO TRAINING PERIOD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. S. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): I notice in the press that registrars and officials from thirteen military districts across Canada have held a meeting in Ottawa with regard to the revision of the rules and regulations in connection with the four months compulsory training plan. I should like to ask the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Gardiner) if these rules and regulations will be submitted to this house for consideration before they are adopted.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of National War Services): As I understand it, under the legislation itself and pursuant to an understanding entered into last session, as soon as these regulations are enacted they will be placed on the table of the house.

Mr. WHITE: That is the point. Will they come before the house for discussion before they are enacted?

Mr. GARDINER: No. The legislation provides that they are adopted by order in council, and they will be tabled here when passed.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Wednesday, February 19, consideration of a motion of Mr. Ilsley that the house go into committee on a resolution to provide sums not exceeding $1,300,000,000 for the year ending March 31, 1942, for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I respectfully suggest to the government that some notice should be taken of the handwriting on the wall, of the feeling throughout the country, the expressions appearing in the press and elsewhere, and that consideration should be given to uniting all parties in the country and in the house so that we may have a real wartime national government. I think the party system is one luxury we can do without during this war; there has been altogether too much of it. A great many people think the government is conducting a Liberal war, and that our war effort is not being carried on in the non-partisan way it should be. There is some element of truth in that suggestion, I am afraid. I believe in the principle of confederation, each for all and all for each, which is the old Cornish battle cry.

Now the government is proposing a salvage campaign. I have been a consistent supporter of this proposal. On June 5 of last year I moved for a return in connection with the export of pig iron, scrap iron and copper to Germany, Russia, Japan and Italy, and I also proposed a campaign to gather up all the available scrap material in the country. That suggestion was taken up by the street department of Toronto, which realized a large sum of money through the collection of waste material. I do not wish to minimize the importance of this work, but I think the government are just three years too late. Some further very valuable suggestions along these lines were offered last Saturday by Mrs. C. D. Howe in an interview at Port Arthur, when she spoke about the importance of not wasting things in Canada during war time.

The revelation of the strength and skill of the German forces in their occupation of Norway, Holland, and Belgium, shocked the people of this country and the United States. And I can say this, that it was the collapse of Belgium and France which gave the people the urge to do their duty in the war. On the Atlantic and the Pacific, Canada is protecting America's shores; troops have been established there, and air force zones have been set up. Why should not the United States, as it is helping Great Britain, assist Canada to finance the war, in connection with munitions and other matters? As I read the lease-lend bill, the debates so far which have taken place on it, and its interpretation by the attorney general of the United States, it seems to me the government might consider obtaining a loan in the United States at an interest rate of two-thirds of one per cent. That was the figure at which the former minister of finance said moneys could be borrowed. I believe a large loan could be secured at a very low rate of interest, notwithstanding any difficulties presented by the exchange situation, which could be eliminated by a conference. In that way, too, we might go far towards eliminating the small and petty annoyances set up by the foreign exchange situation.

In the old days in Canada everyone owned a house, a small property, a farm, or a garden with some flowers. We have been slow in Canada to see how the rights respecting private property have been taken away from us. To such an extent has this taken place that the people of Canada have, in a measure, become a proletarian people. As I said before, if the government needs money it must, no doubt, take the easiest way of securing it in order to finance the war. But what I do object to is the way they are doing it. In my opinion the government should charge 70 per cent of this war expenditure, if of primary importance —not secondary—to capital, and about 30 per cent to income.

Industry cannot continue any longer to carry the burdens, restraints and artificial barriers which are placed upon it by a score of boards. I do not know how business men can continue to conduct their operations or businesses with all the boards which have been appointed in this country. We have state socialism, all along the line—a totalitarian state. Nobody wants to conduct a business, because of the artificial barriers and burdens placed on wholesalers and retailers by the proposed measure and by the proposals to conscript industry and wealth.

The municipalities are starved to death by federal and provincial powers grabbing their revenues, and the time is coming when they will have no money with which to carry out some of their functions. There was established by the British North America Act overgovernment and overtaxation through a duplicate municipal system, resulting in a triple-header system of taxation, with dominion, provincial and municipal budgets. The government of the day comes along with a scarecrow programme, saying to the provinces and the municipalities, "We will take this tax and that tax from you. We will impose this regulation and that regulation, and take this and that away from you." The result is that the municipalities are starved and the taxes are unloaded on real estate. The municipalities cannot continue their work. There is a proposal to reconstruct industry, trade and commerce and our financial institutions in war time, and to conscript industry and wealth. If we do, we will kill our war effort, because the two industrial provinces which pay eighty per cent of the taxation do not believe in such a system.

Another matter the minister would do well to look into is the duplication of our railways. Why could not something be done in that regard to eliminate wastage, as has been done in Great Britain and in the United States? It is one luxury which we should not have. The minister is trying to get money from the taxpayers and from business men. There is no more money to pay taxes; heavy taxes are killing them. The small man in the industrial centres cannot live.

Great Britain has always protected Canada; she has never failed. Even to-day we owe to her our freedom from invasion. There is a great deal of talk in Canada to-day, but let me say that Canada is not going to be talked out of the British empire. Canada will have to be fought out of the empire.

I was surprised at the remark made yesterday by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson); it ill becomes him to sneer at those in the house or out of it who are standing behind the war effort. The hon. member has preached pacifism and isolationism in this house, and as late as March of 1939 he suggested that we follow a state of neutrality. I opposed his view in that regard—he is a respected gentleman and I do not wish to criticize him too severely. It was he who went to the assembly of the League of Nations only a few months before Munich, and it ill becomes him to sneer at those in this house and out of it who saw this disaster coming and urged upon the House of Commons and the country that we rearm and support the mother country all along the line. Had that been done, we would not have this resolution before us to-day—a resolution which involves the appropriation of over a billion dollars, being part of a total which will amount to three billions before we shall have finished.

I hope the minister will consider methods of reducing expenditures. We could eliminate a great deal of waste. For instance, the League of Nations has cost $4,500,000, and one gentleman said upon his return from meetings of the league that it was the most wonderful joy ride in the world. They come back here saturated with it. They get the virus in their systems, and throw it all over the country.

That is what is the matter with this country. The pacifists caused this war. There are many unnecessary expenditures. For instance, we spend money on useless legations. Why do we need a legation at Dublin? Why do we have to have a man who sits at a table with a representative of Germany? Moreover, Eire is not even a British dominion; it is neutral, and a republic. Why do we make expenditures of that kind?

There is one point on which I congratulate the minister, and that is the action of the press in explaining Canada's three billion dollar budget, because that is what the whole thing amounts to. I am sure the minister and the government must be pleased with the way the public press has put the appropriation bill before the public.

This is what has been said by Mr. Arthur Mann, who was at one time editor of the Yorkshire Post:

> The press is in a double sense an intermediary between the government and the public. It both provides a channel by which ministers can keep the electorate informed of their activities, and it also serves as a kind of barometer, from which the government can gauge the feeling of the country. A press subject to official pressure will give a wholly false impression of public opinion. The correspondence columns of a great newspaper should indicate to the government what people are thinking, provided that the letters published are a true reflection of the letters received. A journal which refuses to publish letters in disagreement with its editorial policy is failing in its duty. In this connection the establishment of the ministry of information by the present government betrayed, in its original form, a lack of confidence in the ability of the press to fulfil its proper functions. The ministry was designed to act as a link between the government and the country, supplying the public with information and keeping the government in touch with popular feeling. Both these tasks lie within the province of the press and, if it has not always succeeded in performing the second satisfactorily it is perhaps the fault of those who would interfere with its independence.

We have set up here an information bureau, but it is a bureau which has no information, and might well be eliminated. In this connection I would like to pay tribute to the press of Canada for the manner in which they have handled the news of the past few months, particularly to that great newspaper, the Evening Telegram of Toronto, whose campaign to aid British war victims was such a notable success. The work of that newspaper has been of great assistance to those in authority, and to those who are carrying on war services. It is a work which in this hour has cheered the hearts of the people in the mother country.

The measure before the house raises the whole question of our contribution toward the campaign on land, on the sea and in the air. The defence of the realm at a time like this is of the utmost importance; all other matters are unimportant and secondary. The war is Canada's first and only problem. No one knows in what position our country may be at the end of this year. The people of Canada have been too complacent.

As there will be another opportunity for me to say something in this regard, and as other members will no doubt wish to speak, I shall take little more of the time of the house. I believe the minister himself appreciates what we owe to the British fleet. Were it not for the protection that the British fleet provides for the United States and Canada, the amount involved in this war appropriation budget would be considerably greater. As a prominent theologian, Doctor Percy Dearmer, said, the people of Canada will do their duty in the war. Referring to the empire, this gentleman said that Englishmen know the truth, that they feel in their bones the conviction that we owe all that we are to the reformation. From the moment that the reformation parliament of the sixteenth century got to work, England, which had been a remote little island at the edge of Europe, leaped up and became a great nation, a pioneer of religious freedom and political liberty, and there came the great blaze of Elizabethan literature and the flow of modern philosophy and science from which there has been no setback. The English bible is a bond of unity to all throughout the world who speak the English tongue.

Canada is not going to be talked out of the British empire; Canada will have to be fought out of the British empire. We can rejoice in the fact that what we have to-day in this country in the way of freedom we owe to the mother country. I only hope that the government will give heed to the handwriting on the wall, will do its duty and give Canada a real war administration. I realize that hard work is being done by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), his other ministers, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and the leaders of the other groups to my left. I know what they have done to help the house transact its business. I believe it is the hearty desire of every hon. member that the war should be carried on to a conclusion. The only reason for recriminations and references to the past is to stir up action at the present time. After all is said, criticism is the tonic which urges governments to action.

Mr. A. W. ROEBUCK (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, each one of the speakers on the other side of the house appears to be adopting the plan of closing his remarks with a call for a real war administration. The suggestion is being made again this session, as it has been in the past, that certain members of the administration should resign in order that other strong men may be brought in in their places. That was the closing suggestion of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). There is something to be said for any proposal to strengthen anything. The problem of life is to gather strength, and if there is an opportunity to strengthen the government, let us strengthen it. No matter how good it is now, if we can make it better, let us do so.

However, I should like to see the members of the opposition demonstrate the bona fides of their suggestion. During the last session of the house someone said that if the government required strengthening, the opposition certainly required it much more. If it is proposed that members of the government resign in order that mythical men from the outside may come in, the opposition is in a position to demonstrate its bona fides by certain of its members resigning in order that these great men may be brought in in their places. This would show that hon. members opposite really mean what they are saying.

We would then have a chance to look over these men, and if they measured up, we might do something about it. But as long as hon. gentlemen opposite keep their seats and advise us to resign, they can hardly expect that we will take their advice very seriously.

The hon. member for Broadview suggested that something should be done in connection with the amalgamation of our railroads. Evidently the hon. member has not yet discovered that the only reason put forward in the past for amalgamation is no longer true. This year our national railway will operate for the first time without a nominal deficit. It has not had a real deficit for years, but this year—

An hon. MEMBER: What?

Mr. ROEBUCK: Some hon. member says "what?" Our national railway has not had a deficit for some considerable time. It has paid its operating expenses and has had a balance year after year for many years. The deficit which my hon. friends opposite talk about is caused by its inability to pay the interest on the accumulated debts of the privately-owned railroads which were combined into the national system, debts which had accumulated since confederation. At the present moment the Canadian National Railways is actually paying the interest on these debts, as well as its operating expenses.

I submit that our railways are of great advantage to this country. Canada would not be the country she is were it not for our railways. Amalgamation should be carried out only on the basis of necessity, and that necessity has now passed. There should be no further proposals to amalgamate.

We are here this afternoon to discuss the important proposals made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). Mark Twain, the famous humorist, in his book The Innocents Abroad, gives a list of adjectives which should be used when polite people are looking at a great picture, and suggests that a knowledge of these adjectives should be considered as part of a gentleman's educational equipment. There are fashions in phrases—very much so. There has developed in this house, and from the newspapers it would seem that there has developed also in the country, the fashion of talking about this war appropriation in extravagant terms. I have heard with regard to it such adjectives as "staggering," "stupendous," "astronomical," and so forth. A billion dollars is quite a sizeable amount, even if one disregards the $300,000,000 annex. It is more than the people of Canada have ever before been asked to advance. It dwarfs the figures of the last war. Yesterday the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) figured out that it meant $250 per head for the population of Canada. He said that we were prepared to carry through even if it took our last dollar. That is heroic, and I am glad to see that kind of resolution being shown by hon. members opposite and on this side of the house, but it will not take our last dollar. I am inclined to deprecate the extravagance of language which is being applied to this appropriation. It will not take our last dollar, and I do not like to see phrases used which seem to suggest the possibility of failure on our part.

The amount mentioned in the resolution is a very large sum, but it is not a sum beyond the capacity of the people of Canada to pay. With all due respect to those who seem to be nervous at the moment, in my judgment it is not a sum which should strike terror into the hearts of our financial leaders. It seems to me that the nervousness over this proposed appropriation arises from the fact that we are talking in terms of money instead of in terms of goods produced. That is why fear grips the hearts of many people and why we are wondering whether this effort will be successful.

Nearly all of us in this house lived through the last war and have vivid memories of the conditions which prevailed then. Most members will recall how Canada during that war emerged out of a period of severe depression into one of very great activity. The depression of 1914 lasted for some time into the war; then it mysteriously disappeared and Canada went to work. Yes, we did go to work. Hon. gentlemen will remember how we shipped goods across the sea to the utmost capacity of the ships that sailed the oceans. The bottleneck was not the producing power of our factories in Canada and the United States; it was the capacity of available shipping to carry the goods across the sea. We are talking now about borrowing money, but we did not borrow the things that we shipped to France to be boiled down in the cauldron of war in the struggle of 1914-18. We made them. We brought forward from the past scarcely a pound of food or a pound of wool. We certainly borrowed not one pound of powder from the future. We made these things from hand to mouth at the time and shipped them across the sea in greater quantities than Canada had ever produced or shipped them before. And this point I would like hon. gentlemen to note that while we were producing more than ever before and destroying at a rate that would have astonished us in years gone by, our working people were better fed, better clothed, better housed, and had more loose change in their pockets, than they ever had had in the years before or have had since. What is the explanation of that anomaly? It lies in the fact that prior to the depression of 1914 the producing power of the Canadian people was lying idle, and it has been half idle ever since. Even to-day it is partly idle.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has estimated the national income of the Dominion of Canada at five and a half billions of dollars, but that estimate is made during a period when Canada is partly idle, notwithstanding the expenditures that have been and are being made and the demand for our production. We are spending on war services, roughly three million dollars a day, the equivalent of $3 per day in wages of a million men; and yet the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) in a recent statement declared that even to-day in Canada quite a number of thousands of employable people are still unemployed. The figure he gave—I am not sure of the exact amount, but it was a fairly big figure—did not include the men who have no work to do but have not registered at any relief office or done anything to call themselves to the attention of the authorities—those who are just getting by. Nor did it include, of course, those who are only half employed—and their number is legion. Nor did it include those who are unproductively employed. Nobody could count these classes I have named. It is quite impossible to get statistics with regard to them, but my thought is that if they could be counted they would number in the thousands. If under these conditions the national income at the present moment is to be estimated at five and a half billions of dollars, I suggest that if more favourable industrial economic conditions could be brought about and our population put to work, there would be no difficulty at all in adding another couple of billions of dollars to our total production.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the hon. gentleman will permit me, just to keep the record straight, the estimated national income for the next fiscal year is $5,300,000,000, not $5,500,000,000, and that contemplates the employment of, I think, two or three hundred thousand more persons who are not employed to-day.

Mr. ROEBUCK: I thank the minister for that further information, but I do not think it destroys the logic of my remarks. The minister's estimate is based on next year's production and includes the employment of quite a large additional number of men. But I am satisfied that even when these things have been accomplished, when this estimate has been justified in fact, the producing power of the Canadian people will not even then be anything like exhausted.

I have heard it stated, and I think it is probably true, that one factory, a large one in the city of Toronto, could make all the tires that are required for all the cars in the whole Dominion of Canada, and the others fight for their position in the sun rather than their producing position. And so with many other lines of production. If we called for production and let the producers free so that they could produce to their maximum, the producing power of the Dominion of Canada would be almost unlimited. Of course it is not unlimited, but it is very, very great. I deprecate, sir, the continuous talk about tightening our belts. I do not like that phrase. In my judgment it is a mistaken phrase, because what little we could gain by penury in the household, by saving and stinting, would be much less than would be gained by a little more endeavour in the matter of production. Instead of choosing the watchword of save and stint and spare, we should adopt the watchword of produce and then produce again and more production. Let it be noted that in order to get a maximum of production in our society, or any society like ours, your men and women must be well fed, well clothed and well housed. Your maximum results must not be achieved by economies where economies are not in order now. You can do far more by the very reverse.

According to figures which were produced in the house yesterday afternoon, already there has been a considerable improvement in Canada's producing power. The preliminary figures for 1940 indicate that Canada's national income was $554,600,000 higher than that of 1939. That is to say, although many people thought that we were working to our limit in 1939, the actual fact is that the production of 1940 was over half a billion dollars greater than the production of 1939. The national income per capita in 1940 is set tentatively at $402, as compared with $357 for the previous year. The production of the Canadian people has increased approximately $50 per capita in this past year—indicating, I suggest to the house, that a further increase of our producing power is by no means out of the question.

One would naturally ask, how can such better conditions be brought about? I do not know that I am prepared to act the Solon in that regard, but I think I can see some things we should not do. I can say how not to do it, if I cannot say very explicitly just how to do it. One of the things which I think this country as well as its rulers should ponder is that if you are to get a maximum of production from your people you must avoid to the very extent of your ability restrictive legislation. In order to obtain maximum producing power your producers must be free. Let me illustrate—perhaps not very well—what I have in mind. When this war broke out the first thing we did, apparently thinking it necessary, was to restrict the travel conditions between ourselves and the United States. So did the United States; they thought they had to tighten up travel conditions from their country to ours. So we went on, on both sides of the line, to a system of passports and visas, exchange regulations and departmental interference, and we succeeded in tightening up—there is no doubt about that—so much so that we checked business as between the two great and neighbouring countries and went some distance towards ruining our tourist trade by too much restraint. I point this out because I want to emphasize the fact that restrictive legislation is a two-edged sword which cuts in both directions and is likely to destroy more than is gained by it.

Let me give another illustration. Canada has had some very sad experiences in high protective tariffs. We had the experimentation of the Bennett regime.

Mr. MacNICOL: The best the country ever had.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Well, the hon. gentleman must have been a beneficiary of Mr. Bennett's tariffs, but most of those who paid do not feel that way about it. The high tariffs of the Bennett regime were restrictive legislation carried to an extreme, and this destroyed a very large amount of the business and producing power of the Canadian people. Yet when we entered this war the first thing we did was to increase our tariff by ten per cent and abolish the free list. I am not saying we should not have done that, but I realize what its effect was. It might have been inevitable. It might have been necessary. But let us look at it and look it plainly in the face. We abolish the free list; we cut down our trade with our neighbours, and I am under the impression, Mr. Speaker, that we seriously decreased the producing power of our people.

The importance of trade restriction is, of course, very great. We have discussed it in this house for many years. It has been a subject of debate ever since I was a boy at school. But, almost equal to the evil effects of too high a restrictive tariff you get those deadly interferences with industry itself within the country—such, for instance, as the boards of control, and these individual controllers who boss industry in our country at the moment. Whether or not they have axes to grind I do not know, but I do know that you cannot have maximum production among business men and manufacturers and farmers and other producers while you attempt to interfere with and boss them and direct their efforts.

[Mr. Roebuck.]

My point is that if the Canadian people are to produce as I hope and expect and confidently anticipate they will during this coming year, the country and the government should realize that, to the extent of our ability in view of the war conditions under which we work, they should be left free.

Almost as important as free men and their ability to go to work is the putting to work of our natural resources. Both should go to work. Both must go to work if we are going to carry this load in ease and comfort. Let me give an illustration, not from our own community but from across the water—that is always safer, because you do not tread on any local toes. I hold in my hand a document entitled "Bulletins from Britain." It is published by the British Library of Information. It quotes Mr. Robert Hudson, Minister of Agriculture, who, it says, has just told the story of the successful efforts to revive agriculture in the homeland. It says:

> For a period of 20 years, after a brief revival in the last war, half the agricultural land in Britain has suffered a steady deterioration. . . . Over large areas fields were used merely as exercising grounds, the cattle on them being fed on imported foodstuffs; whole districts, once fertile and employing 40 men on every thousand acres, were without a single ploughman; staffs were cut down, drainage and hedges neglected, buildings allowed to fall into disrepair. . . .
> The government has made a survey of the entire problem, established agricultural committees in each county to visit every farm and determine what grass fields are suitable for ploughing.
> Already between three and four million acres have been ploughed, land that had been "lost" for centuries has been made fertile again.

This is not a new statement of fact: I have seen it from other sources, but this is from the Minister of Agriculture of Great Britain. One thing in the statement that strikes me is the utter waste, in the days that have gone by of the three or four million acres now ploughed, and another is the resolution which the British government is demonstrating in bringing these acres back into production. I am wondering how many lost acres there may be in the Dominion of Canada, how many natural resources such as these in England are lying fallow and unused; whether it would not be in order for the government of this country to make a survey of our natural resources and see that they too shall go to work. Not that they should necessarily be ploughed, because that applies to agricultural land alone; but of all our natural resources, those of the towns, those of the countryside, those of the forest and mining areas, how many are half used or not used at all, and how many should be used at this time when producing power is a term which everyone should use as a slogan?

The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), in his speech yesterday, made this statement:

> Canada is a country with unlimited natural resources, an abundance of raw materials, a balance of idle labour and capital and the technical resources which can be drawn upon to increase production.

There are times when I do not agree with the hon. member for Broadview, but it seems to me that there he has stated a truth which is vital when we are carrying on a war of production. These natural resources in the hands of a free people are the implements of war which may win the present contest with the German dictator. It has been said, and I think truly, that this war will be won by an attitude of mind. It is clear that the burdens of the war, great as they are and will be, will not be carried indefinitely by the Canadian people any more than any other people unless they are carried with the enthusiasm inspired by a cause. Just the keeping of the German wolf from our door, just holding the Maginot line of democracy-static, is not good enough. We must do more than that. If democracy would be militant it must be on the march, not standing still or holding a Maginot line. It is a mistake to think that our reforms and reform efforts can stand idle and fallow until after the war has been won. With the close of the war will come disillusionment and frustration and the problems of the post-war period. It is a mistake to turn our minds from all social and economic reforms and let them lie fallow until the war has ended. It is positively necessary, that we show to our own population and to the world that freedom has more to give to the individual than has Hitler, and that we hold before our eyes the goal of free men, the vision of a better and kinder and more prolific world in which to live. There is no better time than now for considering some of the things, upon the road to which we have already travelled a certain distance.

At the first session of this parliament we enacted an unemployment insurance measure. It was a grand measure, one of the finest pieces of progressive legislation that has been enacted since the Labour department was first organized. It met with almost no opposition. It will in all probability bring a very great deal of humanitarian good. But why pause? If we are a democracy fighting for the right to improve our social conditions, this is not the time to pause. In the Sirois report was a recommendation for unemployment insurance. But there was a further recommendation that the dominion government should have the constitutional right to enact laws for minimum wages and maximum hours, and to set the age for employment. Why should we not use this occasion to clear away the constitutional obstructions in the way of our passing a minimum wage law applicable to all Canada? Why should we not clear the way for the enactment of a maximum hours law, at this time when everybody is busy and such laws are in the people's minds? Why should we not now give ourselves the right to set the age of employment? Why should we not demonstrate to the people whom we are asking to support this great war effort that we, the democratic House of Commons of Canada, are interested in their social welfare and that we are on the march? Democracy no longer static; democracy moving forward!

There is a certain challenge, Mr. Speaker, in this war resolution. There is a challenge to us to meet this demand which for the present is for $1,300,000,000 to meet it with both courage and intelligence—courage to face the task which is now presented to the Canadian people and intelligence to carry out that task successfully.

There are three thoughts I would like to leave with hon. members in closing these remarks. The first is that more important than almost everything, certainly everything economic, is the positive necessity of winning this war. I need not elaborate that statement; it would be futile to argue it, but first and foremost the requirement placed upon the shoulders of all of us is to win this war. Secondly, to defeat the armies of slavery we must preserve the freedom of action of our own people; freedom to produce—elbow room, if you like—and therefore freedom to fight. The third thought I have partly expressed already. If democracy is truly to win this war, democracy must strike its tents; it must be on the march. It must march in freedom to a better freedom. It cannot be static. We must march forward with our heads up and our banners flying if we are to carry our people with us triumphantly through the difficulties of this war. This, Mr. Speaker, is a war in which victory must be won by the heart as well as by the head and the hand.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, earlier this afternoon the house seemed to be sailing into somewhat stormy seas. However, the winds—and I use that word advisedly—have now subsided and we are in smooth waters once more. Under such favourable conditions I hope to place before you to-day one proposal which I believe would be of great help at the present time. I should like to give my reasons for this proposal rather carefully and deliberately and perhaps not as briefly as I might do in other circumstances.

As hon. members know, the resolution under debate precedes an appropriation bill which will provide $1,300,000,000 for war purposes during the next fiscal year which ends March 31, 1942, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) stated that even this sum might not be sufficient. This amounts to over three and one-half million dollars a day. But the minister went on to warn us that he would require $400,000,000 for the repatriation of Canadian government securities held in the United Kingdom, the money to be spent in financing United Kingdom purchases in Canada. This means more than an additional one million dollars a day for the period of the next fiscal year. Then the minister went on to warn us further—and he was quite right in doing so—that we would require $433,000,000 for dominion non-war expenditures, which again means over one million dollars a day. This makes a total of over five and one-half million dollars a day to be paid by way of taxes or loans to the Canadian government by the Canadian people. Then, as a final blow, the minister said that the provinces and municipalities will require from the Canadian people another $575,000,000. All this constitutes a very, very severe test for the Canadian people. It means sacrifices, great sacrifices; it means a lowering, and probably a drastic lowering, of the standard of living of our people.

So much for the situation here at home. Now let us look abroad. A few weeks ago Hitler and Mussolini held a conference; they seem to be holding more conferences now that things are not going quite so well for them. From this conference there came to the peoples of the world, and in particular to the people of the British empire, this message: "The world stands on the brink of historic events. We will bring the British empire to destruction in 1941." Let there be no mistake about what we face, we who belong to the British empire. Just four days ago, when the house reassembled, our own Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) warned us most clearly and quite properly of probable German and Japanese attacks. Then he used these words, which appear at page 809 of Hansard:

> In the present circumstances it is more than ever necessary to steel our hearts and minds to the magnitude of the effort, and of the sacrifice, that will be demanded of us over a considerable period of time and, in a special measure, throughout the next few months.

There can be no doubt whatever that the Canadian people are about to go through a very, very severe testing time, probably the most severe in the history of Canada. I hasten to say that I believe Canada will come safely through that test and will emerge a finer nation, principally because of the courage, the faith and the good sense of Canadian men and women. But nothing would be of greater help to the Canadian people than that we, their representatives, chosen less than a year ago, should so carry on that they may have the utmost confidence in the Canadian parliament. Far more confidence in parliament is necessary now than in peace time. Our problem in this House of Commons, and the problem of the ministry, is to gain the complete confidence of the Canadian people.

We have just returned from our constituencies. I have just returned from the Pacific coast. We have been in touch with the people we represent; we have been in touch with the nation, and I doubt whether any member of this house would deny that at the moment neither the House of Commons nor the ministry enjoys the complete confidence of the people. Certainly they do not enjoy any more than the confidence which normally would be felt in a peace-time government; and that, Mr. Speaker, is not enough under present conditions.

Mr. MUTCH: It is not true, either.

Mr. GREEN: It may not be in your riding, but I am doubtful.

Mr. BRADETTE: It is not in mine, either.

Mr. GREEN: Why should that be? I believe that the private members who, after all, are the back-bone of this house, are striving to give the type of leadership required, and I know they are capable of doing it. But we are so organized here, we have been handed down such a parliamentary organization, that it is very difficult to gain the complete confidence of our people at this time. They, the Canadian people, realize the awful crisis facing them. The Minister of Finance put it clearly when he said on Tuesday, as reported at page 824 of Hansard:

> We are asking the house for this appropriation because we recognize the fact that propably this will be the most critical year in the history of civilization.

Yes, "in the history of civilization"—and he is quite correct. Our people realize the situation; they realize they are facing a crisis. They know it, because they are sending away their sons, their husbands, their brothers and sweethearts. And, saddest of all, children are sending away their fathers.

The Canadian people have always been somewhat distrustful of political parties, as such—and of all shades. That includes the Conservative party, to which I belong, as well as the other parties represented in the house.

In my opinion, the people are fearful that party politics and party welfare—not restricted to any one party, let me emphasize—are influencing or are apt to influence the deliberations and decisions made in the house. That distrust is deepened by each partisan speech made in the house. Every time a dog fight between parties takes place in this chamber, that distrust deepens. We just about had one this afternoon. It is confirmed time and again in British Columbia, and I have no doubt in the other provinces of Canada by the actions and the talk of the government hangers-on. Probably we would have the same condition if the Conservative party or any other one party were in power.

I do not blame the ministry. I blame the hangers-on, who are out across the country. I am afraid it is impossible, under our present organization, to shake them off. There is no enthusiasm for action taken by this ministry to-day. There will not be enthusiasm, unless some change is made right here in Ottawa. It may be difficult for the ministry sitting here in Ottawa to realize the truth of that statement. Ottawa is a very poor place in which to get a realization of what is going on in other parts of the country. But that situation, in my honest opinion, does exist to-day, and I have reached the conclusion that with the house organized on a strictly party basis, as it now is, it is quite impossible to increase the confidence of the Canadian people either in the ministry or in the house, and that there is far more likelihood of there being a decrease in such confidence, as time goes on.

The Canadian people are sound in believing that in a crisis of this kind the House of Commons should not be carrying on the business of this country on a political partisan basis because in this war, as everyone in the house knows, there is no real issue between the parties. We have one aim. We have a common aim: To win the war, and to win it just as quickly and with as little suffering as possible.

Further, each member in the house knows that if we do not win the war there will be no further need to worry about parties or parliaments; for they, along with all other democratic institutions, will have been liquidated, and the freedom of the individual Canadian will be a thing of the past.

We have moved into a new world, a tougher world, and we must meet these new conditions with a new type of parliament. Great Britain did it, but did it only under compulsion and in the face of imminent invasion. The time has now come for Canada to do the same thing. I implore members of the house to realize that fact. It should be done quickly, before the blitzkrieg comes. We know a blitzkrieg is coming. The Prime Minister has told us; we have been told by others, and it is only reasonable to expect that it will come. The change will have to be made then. I ask the house and the people of Canada: Why wait? Let us do it now so that we will be organized to meet this thing which is rushing up to strike us.

There are different ways of changing the methods of the House of Commons. There are different ways of adapting them to meet the rapidly changing world conditions. I do not pretend to have the only way or even the best way. But I would ask hon. members to consider the whole position, and to think of ways by which we can bring our Canadian parliament up to date.

I propose that the Prime Minister form a "victory" ministry—I repeat, a "victory" ministry, in which the members of each party in the house, Liberal, Conservative, Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and Social Credit, would have direct representation. The Prime Minister had the right idea when, on September 12, 1939, during the first war session—over seventeen months ago—he made this statement, as reported at page 157 of Hansard:

> So far as I am concerned I look upon myself to-day, with all due humility, much more as the leader of all parties in this country united in an effort to do what we can to preserve and defend the liberties of mankind.

Those were noble words. I was inspired by them, and I think every other hon. member present on that occasion was so inspired. In my opinion, the Prime Minister meant what he said. Obviously, at that time he thought it would be possible for the ministry of the day to obtain the united and whole-hearted support of the Canadian people, despite the fact that it remained a strictly one-party ministry. For the sake of Canada I hoped he was right. But events have proved that it was a case of expecting too much. Happenings in this chamber this afternoon have proved that fact. We need not go any farther back than to-day's sitting of the house. It is now clear that enthusiastic and whole-hearted support cannot be obtained from our people for a House of Commons or a ministry organized as is the present one.

I propose, further, that such "victory ministry" should invite suggestions and constructive criticism from all private members in the house. In other words, let us make this a real parliament. Let us make it a gathering of the representatives of our people. To-day Liberal private members cannot readily suggest or criticize in the house. In practice, they are confined to suggestions in caucus, a secret meeting. They are deprived of the unrestricted liberty of placing their views before parliament, and thereby, before the people of Canada.

Mr. TURGEON: Nonsense.

Mr. GREEN: Not entirely, perhaps; but everyone who is honest with himself must admit our procedure here is such that it is very difficult for a private member on the government side of the house, no matter which party might form the government, to express his opinion in the chamber. We have to consider things as they are to-day, not as they were five years ago or fifty years ago. Our present situation is that in this nineteenth parliament about two-thirds of our membership are forced to be silent.

Mr TURGEON: That is not so.

Mr. GREEN: It means, too, that about two-thirds of the ability of the house cannot be put to full use. I have said two-thirds of the ability of the house; perhaps it is more than that. I do not think so, but it is at least two-thirds of the ability of this house. And it means something still more serious. Two-thirds of the people of Canada are unable to have their views made known in this Canadian House of Commons under our present set-up.

Someone may say that if these proposals are followed, there will be an end to criticism. I suggest that if they are followed, the country need have no fear whatever of there being a lack of effective criticism in this house.

In conclusion, may I say that I realize to the full that changes of this type are difficult to make, difficult for the government, for the official opposition and for the other opposition parties. But I do throw out the challenge to hon. members. I believe that if we change our way of carrying on the government of this nation, we can gain and retain the complete confidence of the nation, just as that great man, the Right Hon. Winston Churchill has done in Great Britain. We have been elected since the war started; we have been elected to lead our people through this war, and I am convinced it can be done most efficiently by making the changes I have mentioned. And I am convinced that the effect upon the war effort of the nation and upon the spirits of our people would be astounding.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I had not expected to take part in the debate at this particular moment, but I believe that you and the house will agree with me when I say that the people generally, and certainly the member for Peel, are not used to such staggering appropriations as are proposed to be made by the bill to be based upon this resolution. So far as this war effort is concerned, we are dealing with millions, yes, with billions, but sometimes these amounts are not reduced to figures which the average man on the back concession and on the street corner can understand. To many people the difference between a billion and a million dollars loses its significance. The bill to be presented will provide for the collection from the people of Canada and the spending of $2,600 per minute of every working day as well as Sundays throughout the next fiscal year. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) stated that we may have to go further than that, that we may reach the staggering expenditure of $4,200 per minute. Such figures as these give us some conception of what the war really means to every one of us.

There has been criticism in the press and throughout the country generally of the government and of the opposition parties as well. There is a duty and obligation resting upon the official opposition and the other groups opposed to the government. In order to fulfil our duties as citizens and members of parliament it seems to me that we must be relentless in our constructive criticism of the government and of the manner in which every five-cent piece is being spent in this war effort. What I say this afternoon by way of criticism of the government is simply the carrying out of what I think is the imperative obligation resting upon each one of us, whether he be a member of the government or a member of the opposition.

I ask hon. members to go back to the days when Winston Spencer Churchill was one of the leading opponents of the government in the British House of Commons. Hon. members need go back only to 1936. I dare say that there never have been uttered in this House of Commons words as condemnatory of the government as those used by Mr. Churchill in an attempt to awaken the government of Great Britain to greater action. To-day that gentleman is not a member of the opposition, he is not only the Prime Minister of Great Britain, he is the oustanding public citizen of the world at large. When we criticize the government let us always remember that we have a function to perform as watchdogs and auditors of the treasury of Canada.

What about the duty of the government? I am not suggesting that they do not conceive what their duty is, but one of their duties is an all-out prosecution of this war. Nothing less than that is good enough for Canada and the Canadian people. I implore and plead with the government, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and those associated with him, to see that every dollar of this appropriation is sent into channels which will provide an all-embracing prosecution of the war in order that no question as to its adequacy may be raised in any section or by any class of people in the dominion.

But the government must go farther than that. It has not always carried out its logical duty and obligation to the Canadian people since this war started. I say that in a constructive way, but I hope a lesson will be taken in the future from what I say. The Canadian people want to be told more about the manner in which these tremendous appropriations are being spent. They want to have more than a general statement that money is being used for the army, for the navy, for the air force or some other important branch of our public service. The Minister of Finance cannot render a greater service to the people than by giving a proper and detailed accounting. The people of Canada will then have the confidence in the government of which the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) spoke a few moments ago.

I should like to refer to another matter brought up by the hon. member for Vancouver South, the abolition of partisanship in connection with this war effort. This matter has been referred to so often that perhaps it is not necessary to speak of it at this time. Above all things that we ask, above all things that we demand of the government today, is that they give the Canadian people at least something similar to that kind of leadership which is being given in Great Britain, yes, and in the United States which is not even in the war. Surely we have a right to ask that of the government. We have a right to ask that we be given that kind of leadership so that when the foremost men of this country go on the air, appear on the public platform or make statements in the press, they will grip this nation and bring it to the point where the spirit and hearts of the people will be in this war to its ultimate and logical conclusion.

Without wanting to be harsh in my criticism, may I say that I do not think there are many people in Canada who will not aim some criticism at the government on that score. It may be that this is not possible because we operate under a party system. If it is not possible for that reason, then let us abolish our present system and bring our war effort to the point where the Canadian people really believe it ought to be. Let us consider some examples of the leadership which has been given by this government since the war started, and perhaps more recently since the present parliament opened.

Certainly there is the feeling in the minds of many people in this dominion that there has been a distinct lack of planning in our war effort. You see that statement in the press, and you hear it made all over—that from the very beginning of the war there has not been the real kind of planning that is so essential not only for its successful prosecution but in the interests of our general war-time economy.

Let me speak for a moment about economy in non-war expenditures. The Minister of Finance made only a short speech, and I commend him for that because if there is one thing about the Minister of Finance that I cannot criticize, it is that he always gets to the point when he makes a statement. I hope that habit will spread to the rest of the cabinet. I was not looking at the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) because in his statements he is even briefer than the Minister of Finance.

In one pungent part of his address the Minister of Finance made this statement, and we all agreed with every word of it. He said on February 18, at page 824 of Hansard:

> I need not say that to carry out the war programme for which we are asking the house to make provision will tax Canada's productive capacity to the limit, will necessitate a continuing and more rapid shift from peace-time to war-time production—

I ask hon. gentlemen to pay special attention to the following sentence:

> —and will require for many of us drastic changes in our mode of living and habits of life.

Those are grand words, and I would say that never since Canada became a nation has there been throughout this whole dominion a more earnest and a more active desire on the part of the average citizen to make the necessary sacrifices, yes, even the drastic changes in our mode of living that will be necessary in order that the money may be raised to continue to prosecute our war effort. But is it too much, Mr. Speaker, to ask for some leadership in this direction from the Minister of Finance himself? Is it out of place for the people of Canada to ask that the government should give leadership in changing drastically the habits and modes of their lives as administrators for the Dominion of Canada?

But I look over the estimates for the coming year and what do I find? I hoped that when the Minister of Finance talked about requiring fifty per cent of the national income for war purposes, he had in mind doing something in that regard with the estimates. But perhaps he was a little too brief in his argument before the treasury board; for I find that the only reduction in the current estimates is that the amount this year is $433,000,000 as compared with $451,000,000 last year. That figures out, on a percentage basis, to only a four per cent reduction, and if you leave out of account the absence of any amount required for the Canadian National Railways, which so far as this government is concerned may be regarded as an accident, the reduction is only one per cent. Surely the Minister of Finance did not have in mind that kind of drastic change in the habits and modes of life of the people of Canada, because I can tell him that there are in Canada, and in my riding particularly—and I was glad to hear a member to my left say something about this—working men who in their factories, in the war savings campaign. have regularly subscribed to the extent of one hundred per cent of the personnel.

In many factories the entire payroll of employees has pledged its support, and that means much more than one or even four per cent of their wages. Contrast that with a reduction of only four per cent in the estimates. I was hoping, and I say this in no spirit of carping criticism, that the government would in the estimates themselves give some kind of leadership to the people of Canada as an example of what the government expected of the average citizen in furtherance of our war effort, many of whom are contributing from their own pockets a much larger percentage than one or even four per cent of their weekly incomes.

Turning to another subject, the problem of agriculture is more clearly before the minds of the people of Canada to-day than it has been in the last fifty years of Canadian history. There must be many members of the house who know what the ordinary man is saying about agriculture to-day. Yet we have sat in the house from Monday, when the session was resumed, until Thursday, and not a word has been said by the government as to what it proposes to do to solve the agricultural problems of Canada as a whole. Where are the members of this house? Where is the government? Where is the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner)? Have they nothing to say on a problem that looms so large in Canadian economy as agriculture? But, you may say, this is purely a domestic peace-time problem. I deny that with all the emphassis at my command. Perhaps at one stage in our history agriculture may have been regarded as a domestic and peace-time problem, but to-day, whether you recognize it or not, the whole industry of agriculture is tied up with the efficiency of our war effort. Surely the government have not forgotten that not more than two or three weeks ago there were meetings of agriculturists interested in all branches of agriculture in this dominion who, by resolution and otherwise, pleaded with the government for some real approach to a solution of the problems not only of western agriculture but of eastern agriculture as well. Those resolutions must have been forwarded to the government and considered in cabinet council. Surely the government must know that there is not a moment to be lost in dealing with the present-day problems of Canadian agriculture.

I wanted to say to the Minister of Agriculture, who I am exceedingly sorry is not in his seat—and on that account I may curtail what I had intended to say—that it is time we had a full-time dominion minister of agriculture. I am not suggesting for a moment that if the government believe the present Minister of Agriculture is good enough, he should not be left there. But at least give him a chance to give his undivided attention to agriculture, rather than dividing his attention between two portfolios in time of war. Either the ministry of national war services should not have been set up as a separate ministry, or else it is of sufficient importance to require a separate minister. A full-time minister of agriculture is one of the things that agriculturists all over the dominion are demanding of the government.

I know personally something about the situation of agriculture. The Minister of Agriculture was kind enough to say that by no stretch of the imagination could I be called a farmer. I retorted in kind during the last session, and I repeat it now. But at the same time I will take a back seat to no one in this house in my interest in agriculture and in my endeavour to do something for the agriculturist in my section and in every part of this dominion. First, he receives low prices for his produce; second, he pays high prices for the things he has to buy. Further, there is to-day available very little farm help which is really good. The scarcity of farm help is not a matter of wages; it is difficult to get farm help even if the highest rate of wages prevailing at the time on the farm is offered.

In view of this disparity between receipts and payments, the problem of farm help and wages, and the general situation as regards farming, it is not much to be wondered at that there was an uproar from one end of Canada to the other when, not so long ago, the dominion government decided to peg the price of butter. It may be all very well to argue that from a technical point of view there was some justification for pegging the price of butter; but the average farmer believes, and I am inclined to think he is right, that if you are going to put a ceiling on the price of one of the major products of the farm, there is no reason under the sun why he cannot properly ask that the prices of the commodities he has to buy, which are going up in price, should also be pegged to a ceiling. That applies to everything he has to buy, from his fertilizers to his concentrates; yes, and his groceries and meats are going up without any limit. The situation has become so serious—I often wonder whether we realize how serious it is—that certain provinces of the dominion have had to step into the breach because the dominion government would not do so. Surely we should have some kind of leadership which would not leave the whole problem of dominion agriculture to the provinces alone.

I make this suggestion to the government, although I think it should have come from the government, and I am amazed that they did not put it forward as soon as they came into this house last Monday. In view of the seriousness of the agricultural problem, affecting as it does the whole nature and extent of our war effort in Canada and our help to Britain, a select special committee on agriculture of the House of Commons should be formed by the government and the whole matter brought before that committee, in order to see whether some solution cannot be found of one of Canada's major problems. I hope this constructive suggestion will be adopted.

Since we left here last December there has been a conference.

Mr. HOMUTH: Just the start of one.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) says they just got started. I did not happen to be here when the conference was going on. I read something about it, and I was not very much astonished that it did not go further. One of the newspapers referred to the Sirois report as "the dominion government's baby." I am not going to discuss that point because I have no knowledge of it; but if it was the dominion government's baby it did not have a very good start in life. First of all, both its parents were Liberals. In addition, it was brought into being in a Liberal household, and tended and nursed by Liberal doctors. During its frail life it showed signs of an early demise, until it met a violent death at the hands of another Liberal in its own household. More than that, when finally the baby was buried there was a private Liberal funeral; none of the neighbours were invited in. The only difference between the private funeral in this case and an ordinary private funeral is, that the neighbours had to be brought in to pay part of the bill, and it amounted to over half a million dollars. With regard to the Sirois report, whether it was good or bad, there was a lamentable lack of leadership as far as the Liberal party, dominion and provincial, were concerned.

At the end of this conference—and this is the only reason why I have brought up the matter—the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) made some sort of threat. It may not have been exactly a threat, but in any event it looked suspiciously like one at the time. Maybe he felt justified in making it, but I think he should not have lost too much time in clarifying his meaning. At the end of the conference he made the statement that there was a possibility, in view of the report not having been adopted or any agreement reached upon its provisions, of an invasion, in some directions, of provincial fields of taxation.

It seems to me that the minister owes it to parliament to clarify as quickly as possible what he really meant by "an invasion of provincial fields of taxation."

Another angle I want to touch upon while I am speaking about the failure of leadership on the part of the government, is the matter of taking the census in Canada. It has been mentioned before, and I do not want to labour the subject. But I should like to point out what I regard as a cogent consideration. If the census is a peace-time affair, I think we should not have it at all; but if it is a war-time measure, then by all means let it be done on a non-partisan basis. Unless my recollection is entirely wrong, I remember the Prime Minister rising in his place and saying, in one of his blazes of oratory—and it was an excellent speech—that as regards the war effort of Canada, there would never be the slightest flavour of partisanship as far as he was concerned. I believe he even dared his own supporters—and as I recollect it, some of them accepted the challenge—to banish partisanship as long as he was head of the government. Well, we do not object if it so happens that all the best men for cabinet timber belong to the Liberal party. Let them carry on the war and war-time activities. I am not going to object to that. But when it comes to the question of a war-time measure such as the census—and it must be so regarded or it surely would not be carried on—let us have it on a non-partisan basis, the same as in national registration.

Let me at this point bring up this business of national registration. Many people are wondering about it. I remember the Prime Minister, when the national resources mobilization bill was brought in, saying in this house—I thought he overdid the point a little—"I would to God that we had power tonight to deal with the matters which this bill envisages." Well, the power was given him on that June night. In August that registration was taken. I believe a good job was made of it, and I am making no objection at all to that. The difficulty is that it has been used for one thing and one thing only, which is to separate men of twenty-one to twenty-four years old from the rest of the population and bring them into the thirty-day training camps. I believe we expected more than that from the government. I do not think there is one hon. member who did not expect we would get more than that. I thought we were at last going to mobilize everything in Canada for this war effort. Yet I see it will be April 1 before they have counted the cards down here in one of the buildings that they have for that purpose. That is not good enough leadership in time of war. We may put up with these things in time of peace, but I suggest that if we are ever going to win this war we must adopt a different scheme and different strategy.

Then I heard the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) make some reference to the bureau of information. I do not know who gets out the information supplied by that bureau; I do not know anyone connected with it. Some of the information the bureau sends out may be good stuff; some of it is important; but as the hon. member for Broadview said, there is a lot more bureau than there is information. I just picked up this morning my bulletin from the Department of Munitions and Supply. Is this an example of the leadership we are to expect in this war? It is dated Ottawa, February 15; we did not get it too early, but the news of February 15 may still be important. It reads:

> Apparently some 147,000 hens are valiantly at work in the national service striving to meet the daily needs of the forces, according to an announcement made to-day by the Department of Munitions and Supply, which stated that 8,818,896 eggs were purchased during the last quarter.

It may be all right to mobilize the hens after we get the rest of our resources mobilized, but we should put some other first things first. I suggest that the government look into the whole matter of this bureau of information and other departments of government and see whether we cannot have more of our material resources mobilized and put in shape for our war effort before we bother with the lowly hen, who is going to lay eggs anyway regardless of the bureau of information. I see the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) looking interested; he has some hens that are even as good as those we have in Peel.

I am sorry the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) is not in his seat this afternoon. I know he is a busy man; he will be excused by everyone. But not very long ago he conducted a trade mission to south America. The resolution of the Minister of Finance indicates that this $1,300,000,000 is required for many things, including the extension of trade. Without further delay we should have some real report from the minister as to the success of that mission to south America. I have seen many criticisms with regard to the mission and the way in which it was carried out, and more particularly in one of the financial papers to the effect that one great south American country did not receive the same treatment so far as trade concessions were concerned as was received by Argentina and Brazil. I think the minister should without any delay acquaint this house and the country at large with what we may expect in the days ahead by way of trade with our great south American neighbours.

I close my rambling remarks this afternoon by simply making this suggestion to the government. After all, whether we are ordinary citizens or members of parliament, there is not one of us whose heart does not bleed for the sufferings and privations endured and the cruelties inflicted upon the people in the motherland. Those people who are going through those hardships are not strangers; they are our own people. It is not of the men in the armed forces that we think entirely; they are prepared for hardships and sacrifice, but it is the women and children, the aged and infirm who have had to bear the brunt of the damage and hardship and such ruthlessness as we never thought in years gone by would be possible at the hands of a neighbouring state. While at the moment we are safe and secure on these shores, in all our deliberations and in all our war activities and legislation, let us bear in mind that our first aim should be to do all we can for those men and women over there who are holding the front line for freedom and righteousness and Christianity. Our job is to back them up to-day as never before.

O, how the words of the Prime Minister of Great Britain ring in the ears of every Canadian! Speaking of the tremendous achievements of the Royal Air Force last September, he said:

> Never in the realm of human conflict was so much owed by so many to so few.

So, whether we be government men or opposition men or to whatever group we belong, let us stand together as Canadians and Britishers in this great combat and take as our watchword the words of that great leader of the British people when he said:

> We shall go on to the end.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): It seems to me that before this debate closes, there are one or two things more which need to be said. I should like to commend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) for the work he has done up to the present time. Under the system of finance which he is following, I would say he is doing a good job; he is holding prices steady; he is holding interest rates down; he is finding a good deal of money for Canada's war effort, and as far as I can judge, he is building up our war effort rather satisfactorily.

It must, however, be apparent to everyone in Canada—and that the minister should frankly acknowledge—that this great sum of money is not going to be taken from the people entirely by taxation or by borrowing from the people's savings, but that a very large percentage of this great levy is going to be obtained by the direct creation of new money.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not agree with that at all.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The minister thinks that will not be the situation. Then he is very optimistic. I submit that, long before this war is even at its climax, every thinking person in this country is going to confess and freely acknowledge that money is being created. Even the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) yesterday, as I shall show later on by quotations from his remarks, inferentially and by implication acknowledged that money is being created.

The one great fault we have to find with the minister's outlook on the situation is that apparently he takes the attitude that all the money which is going to be used for financing this war, not only this year but perhaps five years from to-day, must be raised either by taxation from the people's earnings or by borrowing from the people's savings.

I think the time has come when we should define this matter quite honestly. I believe the very best and most orthodox minds, to use the terminology of the minister, are beginning to reason in some such way as this: Two billion dollars this year; two and a half billion dollars next year; three billion dollars the year after! Where in the world is the money coming from, and how in the world is Canada going to pay back this money? I believe the minister is very close to a climax, a crisis; for I have heard several times already, from rather responsible people, this reaction, that they are never going to get their money back. They are afraid there is going to be inflation, and they are alarmed because of various other considerations. I wish to make it quite clear right now that the people of my movement, the social credit movement, are just as enthusiastic about winning this war and just as determined to win the war, as any other people; but they believe the time is coming, in this age of abundance, since our opponents are fighting the war on the basis of goods and resources, when we also must begin to fight on the basis of goods and resources.

Mr. ILSLEY: Which we are doing.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is very fine; I am glad to hear it. The trouble is that when the minister makes that statement, he puts himself, I believe, in a very inconsistent position.

Mr. ILSLEY: How?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think I may be able to show that in a little while.

I should now like to turn to the remarks of the leader of the opposition yesterday in order to indicate the general confusion that seems to be abroad in the land. I have considerable respect for the leader of the opposition. I think he does about as well as he could, having nothing but orthodox financial principles on which to base his reasoning, so when I quote his words I do not wish anyone to suppose that I am seriously condemning him. At page 832 of Hansard he first used the word "inflation" when he said:

> It is assumed that inflation in any form is definitely barred, notwithstanding what some people may have said recently, and to that decision I am not, at the moment at least, taking any exception.

Here let me say definitely, once and for all, that the social credit movement is not standing for inflation in any sense of the word. If the Liberal party, the Conservative party and the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation would just take that simple fact from me, who should know, then we would avoid a great deal of aimless, confusing discussion in future and would be able to devote our attention to the real question at issue, which is, what is inflation? Then the hon. gentleman went on to say:

> Inflation as a means of financing this enormous programme at this time would, in my opinion, be a false move.

I entirely agree with that statement. I would be one of the last men in Canada to advocate inflation in any sense of the word. Certainly it would be destructive. But there is some confusion as to the real meaning of the word "inflation", and it is with that confusion that I propose to occupy myself for a few moments. The leader of the opposition went on to say:

> Later on, when other sources have dried up, we may have to come to a measure of inflation, but we have not yet reached that point.

I think the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) made reference to that statement. To the monetary reformer, to the social crediter, the statement of the leader of the opposition as contained in those words is very, very foolish. You may expand money with a measure of safety while our resources of men and material are not yet fully used, but by and by, in the course of the war effort, when our resources are being fully used, any expansion of money except that which is most carefully managed is likely to produce ill effects. The fact is that if there is going to be an expansion of money, which I take it the leader of the opposition had in mind, the time for that expansion is in the early stages of the war in order to build up the productive and consumptive power of the country to a level which will enable it to stand the strain and the shocks which are to come.

I should now like to quote another short passage from the speech of the leader of the opposition, appearing at page 834 of Hansard:

Every time a bank subscribes to a government loan additional deposits are created, and that increases the total volume of purchasing power available. It is from this multiplication of purchasing power that the danger of inflation chiefly arises.

I submit to hon. members that in this second passage the leader of the opposition must have been using the word "inflation" with a meaning different from that with which he used it in the first quotation. In the second instance I take it—he may correct me if he sees fit—that he meant a rise in price, a surplus of purchasing power beyond the goods and services which exist in the country, whereas in the first instance apparently he meant the issue of money, because he said this was the wrong time for inflation. If he meant a rise in price, it is well for him to bear in mind that such a rise has already commenced in Canada, and consequently there is a measure of inflation at this moment. I think the leader of the opposition will realize that there is some inconsistency as between those two statements; and again may I assure him that I have no desire to find fault. I am very anxious that we all get to understand just exactly what is in each other's mind; for the members of this house and the people of this country do not disagree as to the winning of this war. Some of us think we can do better by one particular device; others do not agree. But perhaps it will be found that these monetary reformers have something of great value, something to which the country is going to be forced—and perhaps at a time when it might not be able to adjust itself to any measure which might be adopted.

May I read another passage from the speech of the leader of the opposition as reported at page 835 of Hansard:

It is apparent, I think, that in a new country like Canada, where there is not nearly as much invested or accumulated wealth as there is in Great Britain, where we have always been considered a borrowing country, our effort cannot be comparable with theirs.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

May I interject the remark that to a monetary reformer that is sheer nonsense. I think I shall show from words uttered in our banking and commerce committee by the governor of the Bank of Canada that it is sheer nonsense; for this good man apparently looks upon wealth as being money saved up and invested. As a matter of fact, real wealth is productive power, or actual goods and services ready to be used, whether in the war effort or for the consumption of the people. Again there is confusion in the way in which the leader of the opposition expresses himself. To continue with his remarks:

And on that basis I suggest that no one can take great objection to the amount which the Minister of Finance is asking the country to vote.

With that I entirely agree. I am not finding any fault with the amount asked by the minister. I am really surprised that he has asked for so little. But if I were looking at the matter as the leader of the opposition appears to be looking at it, I would be alarmed at the amount, because I would say, "Where in the world is he going to get the money?" As a matter of fact, what I do say is this: There are great deposits of iron, vast resources of coal, tremendous stretches of forest wealth, almost limitless productive power with respect to all kinds of food. And, as the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) stated so well in his speech, all I am concerned about is whether we can manage our economy so that we can put to work those vast resources producing the very kind of goods we are going to need, not only to support a high standard of living for our people and our armies but to support the war effort by way of machines.

When I look at Canada from that angle I have no anxiety at all about the amount. May I read one more passage from the speech of the leader of the opposition:

I have taken the view that there should be no dollar sign on our war effort.

If it were parliamentary I would stop at this point and ask this question: What on earth does that mean? If the leader of the opposition has said that he puts no dollar sign on the war effort, then he must not be thinking of Canada's war effort in terms of dollars. Yet, only a few passages earlier in his speech, he was talking about the amount of effort Canada should put forth as being in some way governed by the amount of money saved up. I submit that there is no consistency between the two points of view.

Then he continues:

I know there is a limit to our capacity to pay.

Once more the leader of the opposition is taking the stand that our effort is going to be governed by our money. What I think he should have said was this: "I know there is a limit to our capacity to produce. Our war effort is to be limited only by our capacity to produce." Then he continues:

I do not attempt to define that limit—

Nor do I, may I say.

—but, having regard to the issue at stake, I am sure that whatever is needed within that limitation will be provided by the Canadian people, no matter what the cost or the sacrifice.

We all agree with him. I would, however, be inclined to agree with the hon. member for Trinity when he says that all this talk about sacrifice is needless. If we can produce enough food, clothing and shelter to support the population of Canada comfortably and happily, and at the same time support the men in the field and aid Great Britain in supporting others who are fighting for the empire, without detracting from our production of such things as motor cars, aeroplanes and munitions, then certainly there is no conceivable reason for any sacrifice. Possibly that sounds strange.

Mr. MARSHALL: It is common sense, though.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Let me illustrate, by referring to butter. If we had to take men out of munitions factories to milk cows, to care for them or to make butter, then obviously the amount of butter we would have would be in a measure obtained at the sacrifice of a certain amount of effective war effort. If we had to take men out of the fighting lines or keep men out of the forces so that they could milk cows, then we could say that we could not give our people all the butter they need, and still make our maximum war effort. But when we approach the matter from the other angle, when once we pay a fair price for butter in Canada—let us say 40 cents, for example—and we take away restrictions, so well described by the hon. member for Trinity, we will find great numbers of women in homes who will encourage their sons to keep two or three cows, and to make butter to supplement the family income. As a result of that, we will bring into production an almost incalculable amount of human effort.

Mr. ILSLEY: Would there not be a limit to the productive capacity of the country?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: The more you devote to civilian demands, the less of that limit is available for war assistance or war effort. Is that not correct?

Mr. BLACKMORE: It might possibly be.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the whole story, is it not?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Let us keep to butter—

Mr. JACKMAN: Take steel.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We will take steel later.

Mr. ILSLEY: Take the whole picture, though.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes, but we must start on the whole picture by doing one part of it.

Mr. ILSLEY: If there is a limit to the productive capacity of the country, and it has to be divided between war effort and satisfaction of civilian demand, then any curtailment of that satisfaction of civilian demand leaves a larger amount available for the war effort, and thereby increases that war effort.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is correct, but I wonder whether the minister is overlooking the fact that, no matter how we tried, we would not be able to get that extra work which that woman would be able to do to register in terms of creating motor cars or armoured cars. But we could get that effort to register in terms of creating butter if we could provide a price which would enable her to produce it at a remunerative figure. As I see it—and I say this to the minister in all sincerity—I believe there is a serious tendency to overlook a vast amount of productive capacity which is available throughout the country, not only in the matter of producing butter, but in producing eggs, meats and many other commodities. We, by burdensome taxation, are making it impossible for people to produce profitably or to buy; there is less market for the production; thus we have created a bottle-neck that prevents this great amount of expanding production and consumption which could accomplish a satisfying standard of living in Canada without detracting in any way from the country's war effort.

I should like to refer to one or two authorities in support of what I have to say. I honestly believe that the line of thought which I am following will be some day acceptable to the minister, but my concern is that he should accept it before matters go too far. I should like to refer to what was said by Mr. Towers when he appeared before the banking and commerce committee which sat in 1939. I quote:

Q. —so far as war is concerned, to defend the integrity of the nation there will be no difficulty in raising the means of financing whatever those requirements may be.

Mr. Towers: The limit of the possibilities depends on men and materials.

I should like to draw that statement particularly to the attention of the leader of the opposition. Stress is placed upon men and materials, and I assume that the word "men" also means women and children. I quote again from the proceedings of the committee:

Q. —and where you have an abundance of men and materials you have no difficulty, under our present banking system, in putting forth the medium of exchange that is necessary to put the men and materials to work in defence of the realm?

Mr. Towers: That is right.

Now this I think needs to be said, where the men and materials are, then the money can be created with which to put those materials and people to work. After that, the taxing base of the country will be greater, as has been proved already in this first year of war. The experience in the war has been that when money has come forth and has been invested or spent, it has increased the income of the nation by increasing goods, services and the production of the nation. The same thing will apply to the production of butter and other consumer goods if those goods can be sold and consumed in the country. I should like to turn to the bank of Nova Scotia's monthly review of October, 1939, entitled "Economics of War, No. 1":

Financial outlays are no more than an outward sign of the inner reality.

In this case I take it that the inner reality is really our great coalfields, our mines, our people, and other resources.

The true measure of a country's ability to prepare for or to wage war is the degree to which it can enlarge and redirect its productive capacity to this end. So long as there are unused resources of labour and capital and so long as peace-time resources may be diverted to war purposes without reducing living standards below a minimum subsistence, it is feasible for a nation to increase its war-time capacity and to find the necesary financial means.

I am sure the minister agrees entirely with those words, but I should like to give an illustration. I know of several farms in my constituency which produced great quantities of milk, butter, eggs, pork and beef during the last war, but which to-day are producing practically nothing but wheat. The result is that the people living on those farms are more or less idle during the winter. When they are asked why they do not produce hogs, eggs or other products they will reply that it does not pay. They contend that, by producing such commodities, they would be worse off than they are at the present moment. I think that is sufficient evidence that what I am saying is sound. These people should be producing milk, cream and the like in this war. In the last war many of these farmers were rising at five o'clock in the morning, whereas to-day they get up around eight o'clock during the winter. Previously they worked until ten o'clock at night, whereas to-day their work is finished at eight o'clock. We are losing that extra time and energy because we have not adequately adjusted prices and have not adequately encouraged production. The whole matter has a vital effect upon this question which we are discussing, inflation and the expansion of money.

The all-important matter is the question of inflation. What is inflation? The minister made a statement which I am sure he thought was entirely sound after Mr. Hepburn had made his remarks about new money. Over the radio we hear much talk about inflation. I am assuming and I hope that that talk is sincere. But there were the wildest aberrations from the fact in some of those statements. Evidently these were due to a misunderstanding of the true meaning of the word "inflation". I should like to read the definition of inflation given in Webster's dictionary, the second edition. It is:

Disproportionate and relatively sharp and sudden increase in the quantity of money or credit, or both, relative to the amount of exchange business. Such increase may come as a result of unexpected additions to the supply of precious metals as in the period following the Spanish conquests, in central and South America or the period following the opening up of large new gold deposits; or it may come in times of business activity by expansion of credit through the banks; or it may come in times of financial difficulty by governmental issues of paper money without adequate metallic reserve and without provisions for conversion into standard metallic money on demand.

Since that definition was written, the minister will realize that things have taken place with respect to our money which make that last statement absurd. It goes on:

In accordance with the law of the quantity theory of money, inflation always produces a rise in the price level.

We can safely say that there is no inflation without a rise in the price level. In a country as well ordered as the minister, to his credit, is managing to have this country ordered, where people are not allowed to manipulate prices to suit themselves, the price level is going to depend upon the supply of goods and services available, and there will not be a rise in the price of a commodity unless there is a scarcity of that commodity. The result is that the important consideration to the government must be to see to it that there is a sufficient supply of all commodities which we are likely to use, so that at any time, no matter what the strain may be as a result of buying by the people, there will be enough of those commodities to supply all that the people want to consume.

I should like to give another practical definition of inflation which I have given before. It is from Governor Mariner Stoddart Eccles of the United States federal reserve system. I quote from "Basic Principles of Constitutional Money" by Etta M. Russell:

On March 21, 1939, Governor Eccles, of the board of governors of the federal reserve system, gave a very clear definition, in testimony given before a committee in the United States senate. In answer to the question by the chairman—"What do you call currency inflation?" Mr. Eccles replied, "To me it would mean where the supply of money, bank deposits and currency, in the hands of those who spend that money, is greater than a country's ability to produce the goods for the market. It would be a condition of overemployment, a condition of inability to produce the goods so that the supply of money in the hands of those who spend it, is in excess of a country's ability to supply the demands."

This definition and explanation should be read and reread in the light of present conditions.

In other words, he points out that inflation comes as a result of having more money in circulation than there are goods and services, which is exactly the contention I have made.

May I read a statement which the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna made in a speech delivered before his shareholders in January, 1940, a little more than a year ago. He said:

Inflation, if it comes, will be due to the growth of consumption, civil and military together, beyond our capacity to produce. The military demand must be satisfied, and in the long run, if no other means can be found to bring the total demand for goods within the limit of production, inflation, with its accompaniment of rising prices, sets in as an automatic check on civilian consumption.

I think those definitions show clearly what inflation is. It would be greatly to the benefit of this country if from this time forward the Minister of Finance, the governor of the Bank of Canada, the leader of the opposition and every other responsible public man in this country used the word "inflation" only with that meaning. We then would be ready for progressive thought, and the people would not be alarmed if they should happen to hear that the government had created and put into circulation $500,000,000, for example, possibly in assuring fair prices for butter or pork or wheat.

Once more I am going to make the plea that the government take steps to see to it that there is adequate production. Before the adjournment of the house in December last, I showed how our dairying industry was being allowed to be destroyed; and within a very short time I hope to present to the house some figures with regard to our dairying industry which I believe will astound some hon. members. At the present time we are allowing dairy cows to be exported from this country, at the very time when we need additional milk production in order to supply the cheese and the butter which Great Britain needs. That is an extremely serious matter. We are allowing the price of other commodities to go too low, with the result that we are likely to discourage people from increasing their productive powers, their breeding stock and the like.

This country can create money and can spend it in considerable amounts safely, without inflation in any sense of the word.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I am going to be very brief because I feel, as I believe every other hon. member, and every loyal citizen of Canada feel, that this motion must pass, that the people of Canada are willing and ready to pay all the taxes that are imposed upon them, and to subscribe to war loans and war savings certificates. It seems, however, that it would not be right for us to allow this motion, asking for moneys amounting to more than three times the total national debt before the war of 1914, to go through without some debate.

As I have said, our people are quite willing to accept this motion and what it entails, on the understanding that every dollar spent in the war effort shall be so applied that the nation receives a dollar's value for a dollar spent. They are not getting dollar for dollar value now, because there are too many go-betweens, too many sub-contractors, too many other things which I will not mention here but which will come up when we are in committee of the whole.

The people also feel that, as all are being taxed, this war effort should be on a non-political basis, and not on a political basis such as we have to-day. I have before me a clipping from the Peterborough Examiner of February 13, 1941, in which Alderman Elliott of Lindsay charges that politics were being played in Lindsay. There was, he said, evidence of it at the dominion arsenal. That is holding up the war savings campaign at the present time. One man said to me, "Do you think I am going to give money in the war savings campaign, for these war savings certificates, when my son cannot get a job because he is not a Liberal?"

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That is an honest fact. I have letters on my desk to that effect. It is patronage of the worst kind. I do not say that it is happening in every riding. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) tells me that in his riding the defeated candidate is working hand in hand with him and there is no patronage.

As regards this war savings campaign, the people of Canada are looking to us here in the House of Commons to set them an example. What I am about to say will not, I know, meet with the approval of some hon. members; but I suggest that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) should give instructions that 10 per cent of the salary or indemnity of anyone who receives $3,000 or more shall be paid in war savings certificates.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh!

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Yes, I heard the "Oh". We should set an example. And these certificates should be non-transferable except in case of death. I believe that in the last war everyone took a reduction of 10 per cent. The least we can do is to subscribe 10 per cent to the war savings certificates. If hon. members could show that they had already subscribed, the minister should, of course, make a corresponding allowance; but the certificates should be in such form as to be non-transferable, so that the holders would have to hang on to them for the seven and a half years. A contribution of that kind would more than put the war savings campaign over the top. I think the Minister of Finance will agree with me in that respect. We have too much soft living in this country. In Germany, for the last ten or eleven years, the people have had to work; they have been given work; they have been told what to do. Here in Canada the white-collared class and other classes up and down the line have had it pretty soft. Now, regardless of who we are, we must get down to earth, and dig in.

At the present time, when our boys and young men are called to the training camps they are examined first of all by an outside doctor who receives for that examination one dollar per man. But when they go to the training camp they are also examined by the doctors there. Those doctors do not receive one dollar for examining them; but they receive their pay, perhaps as majors, possibly as colonels, plus dependents' allowances. If 180,000 boys are to be trained during the year, it will mean a saving to this country of $180,000 if this dollar fee is abolished. I am quite sure that the outside doctors would be glad to have it cut out, because in most instances those boys appear for examination when doctors are at their busiest. Those examinations interfere with their regular practice, and, as hon. members know, during the past winter there has been a great deal of flu and other sickness and the doctors have been busy.

To refer again to the matter of savings, we have been asked not to spend United States dollars; but if you go into any fruit, vegetable or grocery store in the country, you will find on the counters United States cabbages and carrots, with Canadian carrots and cabbages alongside. The Canadian farmer, because these United States vegetables are admitted to our markets, is unable to sell his cabbages and his carrots. Right there, it seems to me, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has taken another fall. He has fallen down many times before; on pork—we will not go into that—he has slipped on butter, and I think he is still sliding. The hon. member for Peel said there should be some change in that department. The minister should be either Minister of Agriculture, or Minister of National War Services, or Minister of Garbage Collection, because that is what he is asking hon. members to be. In a letter he sent out he asked us to look after the collection of household bones. What he means by "household bones" I do not know, unless he was referring to family skeletons in some people's closets. He also mentioned, at the close of his letter, the collection of dead animals. Yes! Dead animals! But owing to the fact that the minister has two jobs he is not handling either the one or the other properly. In most places the people who are collecting this scrap metal, etcetera, are unable to get decent prices for what they collect and many are giving up in disgust. I know one society that was offered $5 a ton for scrap paper, another $5.50, another $6, another $6.50, another $7 and another $7.50.

Mr. McCULLOCH: Who will give me $8?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Well, $8 would be nearer the price they should get. But we should have proper prices set. They could be set in the different municipalities, and that will have to be done before there will be proper collection of this scrap. In the orders of the day for February 18, there are seven and a half pages of printed matter, and seven pages blank. Why does the minister not start collecting this scrap right here? He should start saving here in Ottawa, and set an example.

The public information bureau has been mentioned. To-day I received a letter from one of the outstanding newspaper men in Canada. I am not going to read it all, but he says:

> The stuff is invariably old and uninteresting and never or seldom fit for the columns of a newspaper.

From an editorial on the same matter in the Peterborough Examiner of Wednesday, February 19, I read the following:

> So in all it looks as though publicity business is costing about $350,000 per year.
> The chief trouble with all this publicity effort is that it is based on the apparent belief that newspapers all over the country want to receive such material as these publicity men select. They merely come across some items which they consider interesting and away they go—postage free. We do not believe this office is much different from other daily and weekly places of publication, and our experience is that we seldom find reason for making use of this material from Ottawa.

Newspapers have their own representatives in the press gallery; they are senior men and well trained. The Canadian Press keeps a staff there, so there is no lack of news coming from Ottawa. In addition to that there is the daily copy of House of Commons debates and Senate debates, and they arrive regularly when parliament is in session, and they record every spoken word.

Back of all this publicity effort is a lack of understanding of the position of the newspaper. These departments at Ottawa pay for the gathering of such material as they desire to have distributed, pay for office space and equipment, and yet they work on the expectation that the newspaper has space to give away to print things which would not interest their readers. If parliament understood the small extent to which this material is being used it would probably have a better chance to see that much of it can be put down to nothing else than plain waste of effort and public funds.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This reading is a waste of money too.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, we all read.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Most of it goes into the wastepaper basket without even the envelope being opened.

In the training camps they have small stoves used for heating the hutments, and men are detailed to look after these stoves. But no instructions are given them how to look after the stoves. Therefore, since the camps have been in operation, thousands of tons of coal have been wasted. I know that for a fact, because I have had three coal men from different parts of Canada tell me of the wastage in these camps. This coal is going to waste when we have needy people throughout the country who would be only too glad to have even a scuttleful of that same coal.

In closing, let me say that when this government stops political interference throughout the country and gets down to business on a non-political basis, it will have absolutely no trouble about having every loyal man, woman and child throughout Canada subscribe and give everything they have to put our war effort over.

Mr. SOPER: Would the hon. member answer a question? Will he be kind enough to tell us where in Canada to-day a wholesaler could buy a carload of Canadian cabbage?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Yes; I know a farmer in Peterborough who has, I believe, a carload of Canadian cabbage.

Mr. SOPER: I should be glad to have his name sent over.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): This is the largest appropriation bill ever to come before this parliament. I have no desire, and I am sure no member of this house has any desire, to deny the government the sum required, and more whenever it becomes necessary. But we are concerned with two things: first, that the money be raised in the most equitable ways possible, that is, in ways which will tend as closely as possible to equality of sacrifice; and, second, that future generations shall not be burdened with the cost of the war.

This war is not being waged with money; it is being fought with material things and human energy and human blood. When the war is finished, it will have been paid for in the only way all wars are paid for, in the human blood and energy expended in fighting it. The debt we are paying on account of the last war and the debt we will continue to pay on account of this war, if we are not careful, for no one knows how long, will be the tribute demanded by the people who own the resources of this country which are necessary to the conduct of the war. If we have the resources, the technical skill and the human labour required, we can always find the necessary money without paying tribute for bringing into operation these factors I have just mentioned.

Our proposal, therefore, as stated yesterday by the leader of this group, is that those who have available the money needed for this purpose should be compelled to place it at the disposal of this nation without interest, just as we have compelled the youth of this nation to prepare to defend the country, whether or not they feel like doing it. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation has always insisted that as the first step in the organization of our economic life the government will have to take over the ownership and control of our financial institutions in order that the monetary system may be properly used, without the restrictions placed upon it by the profit motive, to finance production; and that also includes war production.

Yesterday the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) referred to a statement by the leader of this group. His words are to be found at page 843 of Hansard:

> The leader in this house of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation made a statement with which I do not agree, when he said that when we nationalized the Bank of Canada it served to bring about a better relationship between production and money. In view of the fact that from 1935 to 1939 we had in the neighbourhood of half a million people unemployed, I cannot see how anyone can claim that the Bank of Canada maintained a correct relationship between the amount of money and the amount of employment or production in the country.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the leader of this group, did not say that the Bank of Canada maintained a correct relationship between money and production; he said nothing of the kind. He said that the Bank of Canada was useful as an instrument for maintaining that relationship; and for the benefit of the hon. member for Acadia may I say that we in the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation are no more convinced that the present government has used the Bank of Canada to the extent that it should have been used for the benefit of all the people than he and his group are. Several times during the course of his speech the hon. member for Acadia repeated that all the money necessary, beyond that raised by taxation, should be obtained from the Bank of Canada. I am not sure that I know what he means. Does he mean the creation of new currency, while leaving credit alone? Let me read to this house a brief extract from a statement by Mr. Walter Nash, Minister of Finance of New Zealand. We have often pointed out in this house that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation's programme is similar to that of the New Zealand labour party, which for a number of years has formed the government of that country. Speaking in the New Zealand parliament on July 17 last, Mr. Nash said:

> We are proposing to borrow a fairly large sum, £38,000,000. We will borrow in three ways —first by floating a war loan, secondly by floating an ordinary loan, and thirdly through the national savings scheme. To the extent that we are in that way able to obtain proper savings for the carrying on of the war and the maintenance of our ordinary civil life, that will reduce the purchasing power and it will not have the impact on the residue of the goods that would tend to drive them up in price. So that the maximum we can borrow free of interest—

I understand the war loan is to be free of interest.

> —or on low interest terms, the better it will be for everybody, but to the extent, and only to the extent that we are not able to borrow, then we will use the credit that is available from the reserve bank.

I think that puts our case fairly well.

Mr. QUELCH: Might I ask the hon. member to explain exactly what would be the difference between credit issued by the Bank of Canada and currency? A deposit in the Bank of Canada is legal tender.

Mr. MacINNIS: I may have something to say on that point a little later.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

I should like to quote a little more of Mr. Nash's statement. He said:

> I want to dispel if I possibly can the illusion which still exists in the minds of some people that we can create unlimited amounts of credit from the reserve bank without any effect on the economy of this country. . . . If, then, we do take the savings from those who have too much, or those with normal incomes who try to save, as some do, then to the extent that those savings are used by the government for the war effort or for civil activities they cannot have any ill effect on the ordinary economy of the dominion. But if we take from the reserve bank large sums of money and just throw the money into the purchasing pool without getting commodities in reurn then we will damage the economy of this country to a greater extent than it has ever been damaged before, and in addition we will cause untold hardship and suffering to a very large section of the community including wage and salary earners and those on small fixed incomes whose welfare and protection is the government's first and foremost responsibility. Unless new money creates new goods the people are penalized and not benefited by its creation. If the new money results in the production of new goods it is all to the good.

Perhaps I can answer the question asked by the hon. member for Acadia by pointing out that war-time economy is different from normal economy. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) said the other day, probably half our total production this year will be non-consumable goods. They are not capital goods, either. In war production we are distributing purchasing power for twice the amount of goods that are ordinarily produced and used for consumption. In other words, a proportion of the people are put to the production of war materials. A lesser number than normally are put to the production of consumers' goods. We have purchasing power put in circulation by these two groups of people to buy the smaller amount of consumers' goods, and consequently prices will rise.

Therefore I am convinced that the more new money is issued, under these circumstances at least, the more we would have drastically to tax that money back, unless we were going to have inflation on a terrific scale. That is all I wish to say on that point. I believe there are people in my own group who are more competent to discuss this subject, although the approach I have made to it appears to me reasonable.

Mr. QUELCH: The hon. member has asked a question. I wonder whether he would permit me to reply to him?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Permission must be obtained from the hon. member who is speaking.

Mr. QUELCH: I should like to know whether he wishes me to answer.

Mr. MacINNIS: I did not ask the hon. member a question. I said I did not understand what he meant. It is just possible that if he took time to answer me I would not, even then, understand what he meant. But that may not be his fault. I admit that the fault may be mine. If, however, it is my fault, I must point out that I am not the only one who feels that way.

I should like now to say a few words respecting the sale of war savings certificates. I am not objecting to the principle of raising war funds in this way. I am convinced that the ultimate objective of the promotion of the sale of those certificates is not, in fact, the raising of funds. I imagine that the purpose is to take money out of ordinary consumptive channels, and under present circumstances that may be desirable. But I do say that those who are pushing the campaign must be very careful, and for several reasons.

I know a great deal of high pressure salesmanship is being used to compel people to buy these certificates, people who cannot afford to buy them, people on low incomes, or whose incomes are already far below the point required to maintain a decent standard of living. I suggest that we are not helping the war effort when we compel such people to subscribe to anything which will lower still further their standard of living.

There is another class of people, wage-earners, who may be receiving incomes which leave a small margin for savings. In some establishments the employees are compelled to subscribe. This applies particularly where the workers are not organized. The management calls in the staff, and they are absolutely forced to subscribe to these war savings certificates. I say that this is wrong. If compulsion is to be applied in the financing of this war, or in the making of loans to conduct the war, then that compulsion should begin with those who have the most. As we need more and more, we may have to take from those who have little. For these reasons I object most strenuously to permitting any employer of labour to bring before him his employees, people who cannot refuse to buy, on peril of dismissal, and telling them they must buy these certificates.

There is still another class, namely, those who for a long period of time have been unemployed. It is admitted that there are such people, because we are told many have found employment since the war began. Those people should not be compelled or even asked to subscribe to or to buy war savings certificates. During their long period of unemployment their household goods, personal goods, clothing and other necessities have been depleted, and they should be allowed a considerable time to make up their requirements.

Mr. GRAYDON: Of course, many of them are anxious to do something.

Mr. MacINNIS: That would be their business; but I am talking about those who are being coerced to do something they do not want to do, and I strenuously object to coercion.

The moment we begin to deal with working people there seems to be an inevitable tendency at the first opportunity to resort to coercion. It is even more striking when we realize that the government shies away from any degree of compulsion when it is dealing with people who have money. Under the National Resources Mobilization Act human beings, most of them members of the working class, have been conscripted, or at least compelled to take periods of military training. Wealth has not been touched—although the act gives equal power to the government to conscript it.

In the financing of this war, employees and other workers should not be called upon each month to give up a certain proportion of their already too meagre wages, while huge sums of money lie idle in the banks of Canada to the credit of individuals.

Speaking on Tuesday, the Minister of Finance said this, as reported at page 824 of Hansard:

> I pause, Mr. Speaker, to let the meaning of this programme and these amounts sink in. Probably none of us can realize the true significance of passing over to governments on the average half of our individual income; or, to put it another way, devoting half the labour and productive facilities of the country to war and other governmental work. When it is remembered that a large part of our population is now at such a level of living standards that it can bear very little of the increased burdens which Canadians as a whole must bear, the burden on the remaining part of the population becomes recognized as all the more staggering.

I cannot see why the burden placed upon this favoured section of the population should be staggering; that is, if it is not considered already to be staggering on those referred to previously, those who are getting incomes so low that they can be taxed but very little. Under these circumstances I do not think we can have anything approaching equality of sacrifice unless we adopt the proposals which were made the other day by the leader of this group. He suggested that we should establish a maximum income and take everything above that. If a maximum income were established, we would be more or less upon an equal basis. That income would be sufficient to provide the ordinary necessities of life—we would just have to forgo the luxuries. Surely that need not be such a terrible thing for anyone to contemplate.

I should like to draw attention to one other point which was impressed upon me by the action taken a week or so ago by the Department of Labour when they gave out the information that this government would no longer assume its share of unemployment relief. I shall not say anything further about this, but I think it is absolutely necessary in a time of war that the social services of the country should be maintained. Personally I think it is necessary psychologically for the winning of the war. Speaking over the radio, I think it was last Sunday evening, Ernest Bevin said that it would be almost impossible for the people of Great Britain to carry on were it not for the social services which had been created and developed during the years.

There are certain people with a very low standard of living—people who are least able to help themselves—such as old people who are living on pensions. Their pittance is worth even less than it was, due to the rise in the cost of living. We guarantee the manufacturer a certain return upon his capital; after some agitation the industrial worker has had it recognized that his wages should bear some relation to the cost of living, and I suggest to the government that it should show its humanitarianism and concern for the welfare of the people by making similar adjustments in old age pensions. I was struck by a statement made on December 29, 1940, by the greatest American, I think, of all times, President Roosevelt. He said:

> I would ask no one to defend a democracy which in turn would not defend everyone in the nation against want and privation. The strength of this nation shall not be diluted by the failure of the government to protect the economic well-being of its citizens.

I think the government of Canada should say the same. We have the resources; and even though we are at war, if those resources are properly organized, if the necessary production is carried on to supply the needs of the people without the restrictions imposed by the profit motive, everyone can have a reasonable and even a decent standard of living in the normal essentials of life. If I understand correctly what the people have in mind, they believe that we are fighting this war not only to defeat Hitlerism, but to destroy forever the social and economic system which creates Hitlers. If we want the whole-hearted support of the Canadian people in this struggle, we must give them some earnest manifestation of our determination to do that very thing.

I was interested, as were probably many other hon. members, in hearing Sir Norman Angell speak on Sunday evening. During his talk he pointed out time and again that if we did not remove the conditions which have impeded our efforts during the last twenty years, the conditions which were responsible for the last war as well as for the present one, it would be useless to go to the expense and sacrifice necessary to defeat Hitler; that other Hitlers would arise. I say to the government that if they want the support of the people to a greater extent than they are getting it to-day, they will have to concern themselves with the social welfare of the people, even though we are at war.

When one discusses the war with people, the almost invariable question is asked: What guarantees does the government give that we shall not have to go back after the war to those conditions which existed from 1930 to 1939 when our young men were deteriorating because they had no work, when they were being driven like cattle here and there? These are pertinent questions, and I plead with the government to give thought to them as a part of our war effort.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I shall make only a few general remarks. The word "sacrifice" has been used frequently during this debate. I am sure that the people of Canada are more than willing to make every sacrifice that is necessary for the winning of this war, but I think they realize, perhaps more than some hon. members, that sacrifices which are not necessary do not help in the war and may prove positive handicaps. I think one of the sacrifices which members of the house might make—and if they do not make it voluntarily they will, I believe, be forced to make it before we see the end of this war—is some of their ideas of what they are pleased to call sound, orthodox finance. Let me quote briefly from a recent article in the London Times. Nobody, I think, will accuse the London Times of being at all radical; yet it had this to say, referring to the changes caused by the war:

> These changes call for readjustments as drastic as those which are demanded by the invention of tanks and planes. In military matters the French general staff enjoyed a prestige similar to that of our own authorities on finance. They, and the whole allied cause with them, have paid a cruel penalty for failure to adjust their thinking to the changed conditions. A hidebound persistence in methods and doctrines which may have been sound fifty years ago may easily prove as costly in the financial field as in the field of actual war. It might not lose the war, it would certainly lose the peace.

After admitting that a fundamental cause of the war was the efforts of Germany to secure foreign markets in order to strengthen her finances when her competitors were forced by their own debts to adopt a similar course, the Times continues:

It is not too early to be working out ways of dealing with the problems which will arise when once again all the participants in this war will be driven by the pressure of accumulated debt to seek to sell abroad at any price while none will be willing or able to buy.

It is for that reason that we in this group have made the remarks we have, and we shall continue to make them during this session because, Mr. Speaker, we must not only win this war but win the peace to follow. We won the last war; but most certainly we lost the peace, and it is not too much to say that this war is a result of our failure to use our victory in the last war to make a victorious peace.

Much has been heard of inflation; but neither the minister, in my opinion, nor the majority of the members of the house have come clean, if I might use a slang expression, on this question of inflation. After the abortive dominion-provincial conference, when Mr. Hepburn suggested an expansion of the currency, which I neither condemn nor praise, immediately the press was filled with talk of inflation, rubber money, and so on and so forth; but I have yet to see one paper or hear one minister, for that matter, or any member of the house say one word of condemnation of the policy of deflation from which we have suffered more or less since the last war. Let me quote from the Monetary Times, which no one will accuse of being radical or social credit. In its edition of January 25 last, in an article on Laval and Flandin, it says:

> Flandin had become Prime Minister in November, 1934, after the fall of Doumergue. In his programme speech he declared: "Deflation in France is practically at an end. I reject any economic and financial policy that would tend to pauperize the labouring classes of France".
> It was not so easy to carry out such a policy. The Banque de France refused to rediscount treasury bills. Flandin wanted to cover the budget deficit by short-term borrowing in order to keep out of the capital market, in the hope that interest rates in the capital market would go down and thus stimulate private investment. The banque's attitude was most embarrassing.
> So Flandin dismissed Moret, the governor of the banque, and appointed Tannery. All went well for a while and might have gone well for a long time if banking interests had not spread the rumour that Flandin intended devaluation of the franc, and that his policy must lead to devaluation anyway. It was in vain that in refutation of those rumours Flandin announced that gold coins would be minted. The public became very nervous and confidence fell very low.
> De Wendel, the great captain of French heavy industry and the most influential regent of the Banque de France, publicly outlined a deflationary policy, and implied that the franc would collapse if Flandin did not adopt his programme. . . . Flandin asked for plenary powers to carry out de Wendel's programme, but the chamber was irritated and overthrew him.
> Laval became his successor. He earlier had learned a profound lesson from the banque. . . .
> One point particularly is well worth remembering to-day, because attempts of the same kind are still being made in certain countries. Following the demands of the banque, Laval decreed deflation of unheard of severity. Above all, he cut down the extraordinary budget to the ridiculous amount of six billion francs, then about 300 million dollars. The extraordinary budget included the expenditures for armaments. This happened in 1935, one of the five years in which Hitler spent, all told, 40,000,000,000 dollars on armaments.

When we are reminded, as we were this afternoon, of Mr. Churchill's statement that "never was so much owed by so many to so few," one of the main reasons for that situation was the policy of deflation which was enforced by the banks, and I might say that this was true in Great Britain and true also in Canada. That is the reason why one Spitfire still has to face from twenty to thirty Messerschmitts. It was not that we lacked the men or the materials or the skill to build aeroplanes. It was because of the deflationary policy imposed by the banks and by international finance, and we cannot realize the truth of the matter until we realize that one fact.

Nor is the end yet. We have had nothing but deflation all these years, and now in war time we are still promised the same thing. Speaking at the annual meeting of the shareholders of the Dominion bank this winter, Mr. Carlisle, the president, said that generations following us will labour under the debts now being accumulated and that there is only one remedy—drastic economy. In other words, tighter belts. He says that our hope lies in greater exports and in internationalism. Then he goes on to say: How can we best bring about this better state of affairs? And his answer is, by reducing the number of governments and by revising the franchise so that the unfit and the unworthy shall not have equal rights with those who work and produce and pay. Beyond question there is everywhere a drive for what they call fewer governments, a concentration and centralization of power.

Well, I say this, that if we want that sort of thing; if we want, as many people in Canada to-day openly advocate, a union of governments under one world control, what are we fighting Hitler for, because that is exactly what he wants? I say, too, that a year ago last September I did not from my place vote to involve the people of this country in a war for the purpose of destroying the sovereignty of this country and the sovereignty of the British empire. I did it to preserve those things, not to destroy them.

Of this I am sure, that democracy as we have known it and orthodox finance cannot both survive this war. From what I hear and from what I read, I think it is pretty plain that with a great many people it is not the intention that democracy shall survive. I see no indication in government circles, or among those in authority, of any admission that they have made mistakes in the past. All I have heard is that those who propose a change in our financial system—and I might say their numbers are growing every day—are ridiculed and opposed, and even accused of making subversive statements.

But, as I said, orthodox finance and democracy as we have known it cannot both survive this war, and I think all the signs point to the fact that those in control intend that, whatever else may be destroyed, orthodox finance shall survive.

With regard to control of prices, I should like to call the minister's attention to the fact that in Great Britain to-day and for a considerable time past—I do not know whether it started at the beginning of the war, but certainly it has gone on for some time—the government is compensating the retailer for selling below cost certain articles, I suppose articles of necessity. In other words, they are using the just price or the compensated price, which social crediters have advocated for the past twenty years. That is one way of preventing rising prices and at the same time not handicapping business by the retailers being involved in loss. If that is being done in Great Britain, I do not see why it cannot be done in Canada.

If I understood the minister aright this afternoon, when the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) was speaking, the minister said or implied that there was no gap between the money raised by taxes and by borrowing, and the actual expenditure on war. If that is so, all I can say is that we cannot be making our greatest effort, because the gap in Great Britain is in the neighbourhood of one thousand million pounds a year; that is, the credit which is issued for the war is one thousand million pounds over and above what is collected in taxation and borrowing.

I should like to say once more that our object in this corner in criticizing orthodox methods of financing the war is not in any way to attempt to handicap the government. But, as the Times has said, although these methods may not lose the war, most certainly they will lose the peace.

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak on this resolution to-night, but there has been so much talk about inflation, deflation and other related matters that I think I should say a few words on this one billion three hundred million dollar appropriation.

[Mr. Jaques.]

Inflation is no new thing. It has been going on in this country, and, in fact, all over the world, since the end of the last war. It has been going on rapidly since 1934. There is nothing extraordinary about inflation if it is controlled as it has been and as it will be. If you want an index of the inflation which has been going on in north America, look at the public debt of the United States, which has risen from $25 billion until the last appropriation bill, which allowed $65 billion. In that period there has occurred almost a threefold inflation in the United States. The standard of living in that country has not appreciably decreased, although the public debt or possibility of debt has increased over three times since the wild inflationary boom, which was known as the stock market boom, in 1929.

We are going through a period of inflation, just as surely as we sit here to-night. There are three ways of meeting the expenditure, of providing this money. The first is by taxation; the second is by borrowing, and the third is by expanding currency. The latter two methods are really inflationary. Every new bond, every new war savings certificate which is issued is a promise to pay back by the dominion government. It is just as much a promise to pay as the dollar bill issued by the Bank of Canada. They are both promises to pay. The government pays interest on the bond; every coupon is new money and therefore inflationary. War savings certificates are not due for seven and a half years; they are delayed inflation, but they are inflationary just the same.

I am dealing now with the borrowing machinery that the Minister of Finance has set up. First, I take the war savings certificates. There is apparently some hesitancy on the part of the people of this country in buying these certificates. In Toronto, where we have in the metropolitan district one-tenth of the population of Canada, we have set ourselves, so I understand by the thermometer at the city hall, to obtain, by the end of this month, 200,000 pledges to buy war savings certificates regularly. In the first half of the month we reached a little over one-quarter of our objective. That, I believe, is symptomatic of the country. There must be a reason for that, and the reasons I suggest are three.

First, there is the lack of inspiration by the government of Canada. There is no driving force; there is no Churchill, no Roosevelt to inspire this country as Britain and the United States are inspired. Second, there is a lack of information. We have endeavoured to get the government to give us specific information as to precisely what is being done. It is my belief, and I think that of those who sit round me, that if the people of Canada knew what is going on they would be more willing to support their government. There is no disgrace in having a failure in production of war materials, but there is great disgrace in not admitting that we have failed in production along certain lines. The third reason is psychological. There is to-day a feeling in Canada that the government is not exercising the greatest economy, or all the economy it might. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I am going to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) a straight question, and resume my seat in order that he may answer. Is it true that in Canada to-day cabinet ministers are allowed and receive the sum of $2,000 a year for a motor car?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Read the estimates.

Mr. ADAMSON: The minister indicates that that is so. I am glad to get the minister's admission; I thought the item was in the estimates. The people of Canada also know that. They say: Here are cabinet ministers each drawing $2,000 a year for a motor car. Most people consider that very excessive. I fully realize that the saving of $30,000 or $32,000 or $34,000, if this item were struck out of the estimates, would be a comparatively small matter. But what is important is that it would show the man in the factory who is asked to give up one hour, two hours, three hours, or half a day's pay every week, that the government are willing to economize for this war effort right in the highest tribunal in the land.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Who is asking anyone to give up half a day's pay?

Mr. ADAMSON: The workers in several industries in my riding have been asked to give up half a day's pay.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): For war savings certificates.

Mr. ADAMSON: Exactly.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Does the hon. member know that the cabinet ministers are buying war savings certificates?

Mr. ADAMSON: But they are also receiving $2,000 a year for a motor car. And the public in Canada do not consider that justified, whether the hon. member does or not.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): The hon. member asked—

Mr. ADAMSON: Mr. Speaker, I have the floor. The hon. gentleman can speak afterwards.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I understood the hon. member was asking me a question.

Mr. ADAMSON: I am not; I was not addressing the hon. member.

On occasions I find myself in the position of driving on his majesty's business in Canada, using my own motor car. I find that the system in general use throughout this country is to pay six cents a mile to a man using his own motor car on the government service.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. ADAMSON: I ask the hon. gentleman to be seated. I have the floor. I am interested to see that this discussion has awakened so much interest.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Will the hon. member tell us whether he is in the army himself?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not a proper question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member has said that he does not desire to have his speech interrupted.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): He should not cast aspersions on other hon. members.

Mr. ADAMSON: If I have cast an aspersion on any hon. member, I am very sorry. The hon. member must have an extremely thin skin. I am dealing with a question of psychology, and suggesting that the ministers give up this $2,000 for the good of the country.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What about the leader of the opposition?

Mr. ADAMSON: Yes; I would even suggest that.

The second method of borrowing this money is by the sale of bonds. Since the tremendous increase in the income tax, people in the bond buying class have found themselves having difficulty to pay their income tax; and when the time comes for the next war loan some time during the summer, the minister is going to find that this reservoir of bond buyers, these people who would normally buy bonds, have no surplus available for bonds, they are up against it paying their income tax. I suggest to the minister that when he puts out the next war loan, some system must be arranged so that not only are they good collateral at the bank, as all Dominion of Canada bonds are, but that they can be bought on the instalment plan without interest in order to allow those who wish to borrow to help this war effort, to do so without incurring extra liability.

There is also this other condition; the minister suggested that this $1,300,000,000 might not be enough by some 20 per cent to meet the cost of this year's expenditures. There is also the repatriation of Canadian securities held in Britain which, while it is not a direct charge, nevertheless adds to the burden. The minister has also suggested that new forms of taxation might have to be employed; during the conference on the Sirois report he mentioned that extra succession duties might have to be levied. I submit to this house that to-day anyone with money is being frightened into holding on to it rather than encouraged to lend it to the government, and I submit to the minister that this is a very serious situation and may prove to be a difficult problem when the new war loan is issued, because it must go over. These are matters that will have to be thought about first.

If the first two methods of raising this money fail, there is a third method, that of currency expansion. I hope we do not have to employ that method, but that should not prevent us from thinking about it. We hope we will not be bombed; we hope we will not have air raids; but while we have these hopes, we must be prepared for whatever may happen. There are two or three methods of currency expansion. The normal manner, the orthodox way if you like, is by increasing the price of gold. Another way is by lowering the peg on the only hard currency left in the world to-day, the United States dollar. Both these methods are possible. There is also the third method, which led Germany and other European countries after the last war down the primrose path to ruin; that is, definite increase of currency without control. I am sure no minister of finance would consider such a method in this country.

I should now like to say a word with regard to war production. There is no doubt that there has been a certain amount of bogging down in connection with a great number of items. I do not think this has been due to the cause most commonly ascribed. I do not believe the principal cause has been political juggling, political patronage or political malfeasance, even though I know patronage lists are still in existence. I believe this has been caused by the maladministration of government departments. Since the war started, some of the ablest business men in Canada have come to Ottawa, prepared to do a job. One by one they have gone back home, unable to do the job they came here to carry out. There must be a reason for that. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the reason is that these men were not given the free hand they should have been given. They were proscribed by considerations of departmental red tape and by other considerations of a pre-war, single party administration.

Beaverbrook in England, Knudsen and Stettinus in the United States, were told by Churchill and Roosevelt, "You are responsible to me for the production of these goods." Churchill said to Beaverbrook, "Go on and produce aircraft. I don't care what you have to do to produce them, but produce aircraft." As a result, aircraft were produced. Undoubtedly mistakes were made and waste occurred, but such things are not important at present; it is the aircraft we want. Knudsen and Stettinus in the United States had the very greatest trouble in producing the Allison engine, and only succeeded because they employed the most drastic methods. They were criticized, but the administration of President Roosevelt was big enough to withstand that criticism. Roosevelt said, "As long as I am convinced that you are doing everything in your power to produce these machines of war, you will have my backing." That, I submit, should be and must be the attitude of this administration.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that there is one way, and only one way, to get on with the production of war materials. Responsibility for that production must be delegated to the man producing them. He must have an absolutely free hand and must not be tied up by departmental red tape. Then these men who come here to offer their services will be able to do the job of which they are capable.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): I feel obliged, Mr. Speaker, to make a few remarks in connection with this measure, which without doubt is one of the most important matters ever to be brought before a Canadian parliament. I am not opposing the amount of money that is proposed to be voted under this legislation. I agree with the words of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) who, speaking in this house on July 30 last, said:

> See that Canada does her utmost—on the land, on the sea and in the air—and the cost, in so far as money can meet it, will be gladly and proudly paid.

I should like also to repeat the words of the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), speaking along the same line on June 24 last:

> I need hardly say that our war effort is not in any sense to be limited by any such financial calculations or by what we can comfortably accomplish. We must make the maximum effort of which this country is capable. Financial provision can be made and will be made for whatever it is physically possible for us to produce or to procure in the way of war services, supplies and materials. The limits of our effort are not fiscal. If there are any such limits they are physical, mental and moral—by that I mean the physical limits of our resources and the mental and moral capacity of Canadians to bear burdens and make sacrifices.

I believe the then Minister of Finance, the present Minister of National Defence, presented very fairly the tremendous issues at stake, and I believe every dollar necessary to carry on the war to a successful conclusion must be made available in the present emergency.

I believe, however, it is very important that the Canadian taxpayers be assured that the money raised is going to be spent fairly, and that all people in Canada should be required to make their fair contribution of the sacrifice. I feel that in many parts of Canada the war effort of the government has not the wholehearted support of Canadians, and that this condition has been brought about for various reasons. I have in my hand a copy of an editorial which appeared in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of December 14, 1940. They quote, as follows, the words of the right hon. gentleman who leads a party in another house:

> I do not exaggerate at all when I say that I have had business men by the dozen tell me that they are leaning on their oars; they have nothing to work for. They say, "We might just as well take it a little easier now, for we are only working for taxes anyway."

Those are very dangerous sentiments for any man in public life to express in Canada to-day. I agree with the suggestion contained in this editorial that it is quite possible the defence of Canada regulations should be amended to deal with these dozens of individuals who are resting on their oars because they feel that under the present available contract terms they have nothing to work for.

We have had considerable discussion in the house respecting terms of contracts. Here is a copy of Canadian Business for December, 1940, which contains information that, so far, has not been placed before us in the house. This issue contains an article by Leslie Roberts, headed, "Is There a War-Contracts Pork Barrel?" The article sets out in detail information as to how supplies are bought in Ottawa. No. 6 reads as follows:

> Contracts are liable to continuous audit, and figures may be revised to keep the manufacturer within his ten per cent profit zone.

Then, in the body of the article I read:

> Normally such a job should be produced for so much, allowing for the producer's legal margin of profit, which is ten per cent.

With one group of Canadians in a position where it is taken for granted that they should have a legal margin of profit of 10 per cent, and a very large group of Canadians who are making tremendous sacrifices without any hope or desire for profit, you cannot have a strong and united Canadian people.

May I at this point make a few observations about a very large number of Canadians who feel they are not receiving the consideration they deserve. As a matter of fact, Mr. Winston Churchill, speaking in the British House of Commons last fall, had this to say about them:

> We shall do our best to encourage the building up of reserves of food all over the world, so that there will always be held before the eyes of the people of Europe, including—I say it deliberately—the German and Austrian peoples, the certainty that the shattering of nazi power will bring them all immediate food, freedom and peace.

Canada has a very important function to perform along the very lines outlined by the Prime Minister of Great Britain. We can produce enormous supplies of food, and the time will come when those supplies of food on hand in Canada will be an important factor in obtaining peace terms to our liking. But in the meantime we cannot expect two million farmers in Canada, two million people who depend directly on farming for their livelihood, to continue under prevailing conditions.

Hon. members may have thought that during the last session some of us from the prairie provinces spoke from a narrow and provincial point of view. I suggest that developments within the last few weeks have made it clear to all Canadians that the problems of agriculture are national, and that they are neither provincial nor local. I saw in the Toronto Globe and Mail of February 12, a dispatch reporting a speech by the Hon. W. L. Houck, Vice-Chairman of the Ontario Hydro Commission, and minister without portfolio in the Hepburn administration. Speaking at a ploughmen's convention, he is reported to have said:

> "I say without fear of contradiction that the Minister of Agriculture betrayed the agricultural classes and left them to work out their own problems against insurmountable odds without any assistance from the department at Ottawa." Mr. Houck charged that the federal minister joined in a nation-wide conspiracy to keep the price of farm products at a point below what it cost to produce them. If others are guaranteed the standard of living, then the farmer must receive the same treatment. No type of man engaged in any industry wants to do more in the war effort than the farmer. He will do his part and do it willingly, but he cannot go on with prices paid at less than the cost of production.

I notice that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) bearded the lion in his den by attending in London a meeting of indignant Ontario farmers. The London Free Press dispatch states that Mr. McEwing, the member of the legislative assembly for the constituency of North Wellington, asked if the federal government would recognize that pork was being produced at a loss, and would be prepared to give the producer the same consideration industry was receiving. The minister replied he was unable to say what the attitude of his government would be.

I must confess I was embarrassed to learn from the newspaper report that a minister of this house in a public meeting should have had to listen to some of the comments recorded in the press. One indignant farmer asked, after the minister had indicated that he owned a farm near London, whether he owned a pair of overalls. It would seem to me that comments of that kind would indicate that we have a great deal of dissatisfaction among a loyal group of people in Canada who are prepared to make every reasonable sacrifice.

This appropriation of $1,300,000,000 should include sufficient funds to carry on agriculture efficiently, so that it may fulfil its proper place in the economy of Canada.

Just one more reference, to indicate that my observation need not be confined to Saskatchewan or even to Ontario. At the conference which ended so suddenly last month, Mr. Bracken spoke concerning the position of agriculture. The report of his speech, as it appears at page 31 of the report of the plenary session held on January 14, 1941, contains the following:

> But what is the situation facing agriculture? In the west we harvested last year one of the largest wheat crops in our history. When it is all sold it will have brought to the farmers a little more than half as much as each of several smaller crops before the depression, and not until the end of next July will farmers have received payment for the last of it. That crop brought the producers a little over 50 cents per bushel on the farm. During the last war, such a crop would have moved readily overseas and farmers would have received in some years three or four times the present market price per bushel. Even in the post-war period before the depression the farm price paid was more than twice the present price. It is now suggested in certain quarters that only a portion of our next year's crop be allowed to find a market through the ordinary channels.

And again:

> Since the war started, there has been a worsening of the farmer's market condition for certain of his major commodities, with some improvement and limited possibilities for certain other products. Disparities between the rising cost of goods the farmer buys and the fixed prices for certain of the products he sells are perpetuating a most difficult situation and giving rise to protest and unrest, the causes for which in war time at least we should by all means seek to alleviate or avoid.

With the evidence coming from such a wide field, I submit that the government should consider its responsibility to agriculture in the present crisis. If there are men engaged in agriculture whose services could be used to better advantage in industry, now is the time for the government to give us that information. I am sure that hon. members from all parts of Canada have had farmers appealing to them for information and instruction as to where they might make their greatest contribution in the present crisis. Until the government states that there are too many people on our farms, until it intimates that it intends to move large groups of agricultural workers to industry, I am sure we shall have a great deal of discontent.

The announcement has been made that relief is to be cut off in the near future. This will add greatly to the unrest which exists in many parts of Canada. If I might refer again to Saskatchewan, I think I can say that hon. members realize that the problems facing that province are not the result of carelessness on the part of the people, but rather they are due to a national calamity and national policies. We have large surpluses of many commodities, and now the government announces that it intends to embark upon a policy of cutting off food from large numbers of our citizens. I submit that if the policy as announced is carried out, a large number of people in Saskatchewan will find it impossible to secure the food they require in their daily lives. I have in my hand a copy of a speech delivered by Mr. Perkins, president of the federal surplus commodities corporation in the United States. He shows how we in Canada might dispose of much of our surpluses. The information available indicates that we have a large group in Canada who are not consuming enough food. If we are to maintain a standard of life which will ensure that certain people will be able to make their greatest contribution in our war effort, those people should have sufficient food. This report states:

> According to this study, the 14 per cent of our families with the lowest incomes, that is, families receiving $312 on the average, are spending only slightly more than $1 per person per week for food (actually, in order to keep going, they spend about 50 per cent more for all purposes than they earned—some merchant got stuck for part of the difference).

And again:

> In other words, this tells us that people with incomes of under $500 a year have about five cents per person per meal to spend for food. Families getting an income of $100 a month have around ten cents per person per meal for food. The market for our farmers is doubled, so far as this group is concerned.

And further down:

What is this potential low-income market like? Evidently these underprivileged people can and will spend more money for food if they have an opportunity. Does this mean that they pay higher prices for better food, or do they actually seek more food? The answer is that they do both. We know that low-income people are eating about half as much as they want. They will buy more food and greater varieties of it, if they have the opportunity.

Another paragraph, which I should like to direct to the attention of the house, reads:

We probably shall hear more and more, during the next few years, about solving our surplus agricultural problems by feeding and clothing the destitute peoples of other continents, particularly those ravaged by war. I hestitate to mention that charity should begin at home, because I agree that it should not end there. The present situation in Finland, for example, has pulled at our national heart-strings. I should like to suggest, however, that before we look at this problem of human hunger through a telescope, that we look at it through a microscope right here in our own country, and remember the millions of youngsters we are pumping into our own society every year on five cents a meal. Innocent victims of malnutrition make mighty poor citizens.

Of course, Mr. Perkins was speaking of conditions in the United States, but similar words might be used to describe conditions in Canada. Unfortunately we have no statistics available to enable us to draw the conclusions which have been reached by Mr. Perkins. I urge the government to see that sufficient funds are set aside out of this appropriation to secure for agriculture a net return which will enable the farmer, not to become a profiteer but to meet his obligations, pay his taxes and have a decent standard of living.

Considerable work has been done in western Canada in recent months to show the spread between the prices received by the farmer for the goods he has to sell and the prices paid by him for the goods he has to buy. I should like to give the house particulars showing the difference between the price of a binder to-day and the price a number of years ago. In 1913, the material in a binder cost $45.56; the labour, $11.97; the overhead, $17.96; experimental work, 34 cents; freight, $17.80; agent's commission, $30.45, and there was a gross margin of $42.94. The cash price at Regina was $167.02. A farmer could buy that binder in that year for 261 bushels of wheat. In 1936, the material cost was $71.06; labour, $22.62; overhead, $33.93; experimental, $2.55; freight, $26.08; agent's commission, $45.50; gross margin, $79.26. The cash price at Regina was $281, equivalent to 319 bushels of wheat. Last year, in order to buy the same binder the farmer had to pay 637 bushels of wheat. I am quoting from "Why a Farm Machinery Cooperative", published by the Canadian Cooperative Implements Limited. This significant paragraph appears at the bottom of page 4:

It is obvious that the farming industry in western Canada is facing a crisis. If a decent standard of living is to be achieved on western farms something must be done to remove the wide spread between the price of things which the farmer has to sell and the cost of things which he has to buy.

I feel that this is the point which western farmers have been trying to make during all these years. On my way to Ottawa I noticed in one of the papers that the estate left by the late president of the Massey-Harris company amounted to over three-quarters of a million dollars. It is quite apparent that making farm machinery is a much more profitable business than operating that machinery on a western farm. The hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) draws my attention to the fact that the gentleman who passed away had other interests. No doubt he had, but I think the fact remains that the manufacture of farm implements has been quite profitable in Canada.

Let me say a few words about labour. As I said earlier in my remarks, a great many farmers in Canada feel that the most important thing now, is to see that the war is won, that Hitler is defeated. Many of these men do not want to waste gasoline operating their tractors in the spring months if the producing of more food is going to add to Canada's problems and is not going to help in our war effort. Many farmers on marginal lands across Canada have been facing the necessity of applying for relief. These men are anxious to get off their farms because they feel, and I think rightly so, that they can make a greater contribution in industry. Last summer, a national registration was taken, and the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Gardiner) wrote a letter to the members of the Saskatchewan legislature under date of July 27. One paragraph reads:

It is absolutely essential for the national welfare, that this registration be as complete as possible. We hope to be able to help the Canadian people by means of the information gathered—to direct those presently unemployed to employment, and to aid those who are employed in obtaining more gainful employment. One of the chief objectives of this national registration is to help the younger generation and to secure information with respect to the aged, the sick and the incapacitated. In general terms, we want to be able to see the whole picture of the location and position of the people who live in this country.

That paragraph outlined a worthwhile objective; and feeling sure that the necessary machinery was being set up to carry out this very thing, I wrote to the associate deputy minister in November on behalf of a returned soldier who has been farming on sub-marginal land and who had appealed to me. My letter read:

> Mr. ——, who is forty-six years of age and a returned soldier with wife and two children, is anxious to place his services at the disposal of the country in any capacity. He advises me that he is a mechanical draftsman and has had considerable experience with the Grand Forks Gas and Electric Light Company in North Dakota. He also states that he has done drawings for the patent office in Ottawa on several occasions, and is anxious to be of as great assistance as possible during the present crisis.

The deputy minister wrote in reply:

> There should be some place in the war industries of the nation where the services of this man could be used to advantage.
> I noted in the public press, yesterday, a statement by Mr. F. H. Avery of the Department of Labour for the province of Ontario, Parliament Buildings, Toronto, that his department was engaged in Ontario in finding where employees were needed and locating such employees. He said that there was already very considerable in the way of shortage.
> Might I suggest that you, in turn, advise Mr. —— to communicate directly with Mr. Avery, giving him all his qualifications, and asking him to place him.

I anticipated that what did actually happen would happen, and rather than annoy my friend, who lives quite a long distance from regular mail service, I took the responsibility of doing the writing myself. I set out his qualifications in a letter to Mr. Avery, who advised me, in view of the fact that this man was living in Saskatchewan, that the Ontario authorities were not encouraging men to come east and that I had better try one of the western offices. So then I wrote to Winnipeg, and they replied that, since this man was living in Saskatchewan, it would be well to take up the matter of his employment with Regina. I then took the matter up with Regina. But in Saskatchewan there are no war industries of any consequence where a man with his qualifications could find employment; so the merry-go-round went on, and the man is still awaiting information that will enable him to serve in a useful capacity in the present crisis.

I have heard some hon. gentlemen opposite sometimes say, when we were speaking here of conditions in other parts of Canada, that if men wanted to work they could find work. I have spoken to some of these hon. members privately and asked them: Can you place in some war industry in your constituency a well qualified man, or men who are willing to come to Ontario or Quebec from Saskatchewan, young men who are able and willing to work in any capacity? I have not been able to discover any place in Ontario which is willing to encourage men to come from Saskatchewan to find employment. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that by this time, the minister having written this letter on July 27 last, some machinery should have been set up whereby people such as the man of whom I have spoken could be placed in employment somewhere in Canada where they could make their contribution in the greatest struggle in human history. I submit that the government would do well to consider first its responsibility to agriculture, and, second, its responsibility to the large number of men in Canada who are anxious to get into industry at this time in order that they may make a greater contribution to our war effort than they are now making.

Motion (Mr. Ilsley) agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman, I was wondering whether the Minister of Finance had anything to add to the statement which he made on this resolution the day before yesterday, or would he prefer to answer questions as we go along? It seems to me there is a great deal that still requires to be elucidated.

The resolution covers three different phases of governmental activity. By section 1, a vote of credit of $1,300,000,000 is sought, which is to be devoted to:

> (a) the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada;
> (b) the conduct of naval, military and air operations in or beyond Canada;
> (c) promoting the continuance of trade, industry and business communications, whether by means of insurance or indemnity against war risk or in any other manner whatsoever; and
> (d) the carrying out of any measure deemed necessary or advisable by the governor in council in consequence of the existence of a state of war.

Paragraph (d) I would call an omnibus clause.

The minister in his very concise statement did not elaborate with regard to any one of these four objectives. At the moment I am interested, as I think the country will be interested, in knowing just what portion of this huge vote of $1,300,000,000 is to be devoted to promoting the continuance of trade. Second, what portion is to be devoted to promoting the continuance of trade, industry and business communications, and is this promotion to be limited to means of insurance or indemnity or what-not?

I think the committee is entitled to some further elaboration and explanation of the intricate wording of the first part of paragraph 1 (b) of this resolution, and I invite the minister to do that.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, no part of the amount that has been spent under the War Appropriation Act of 1940 has been allocated specifically to the purposes set out in paragraph 1, which is the same as a corresponding paragraph in the War Appropriation Act of 1940.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Nothing was spent this present year?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; no sum has been specifically allocated to that. There have been sums spent in nearly every department of government, but they are fairly small sums. The main expenditures have been, and needless to say will be, in the three defence departments and the Department of Munitions and Supply. But there are certain expenditures which are due to the war, and we try to be very careful not to allow any expenditures to be made under the War Appropriation Act which are not properly made under that act, but to allow only those which are due to the war and are really war expenditures. But war expenditures are made in nearly all if not all the departments of government. That is the best information I can give the hon. gentleman in answer to his question, but I cannot tell him what expenditures are made under 1 (c) or under the corresponding subparagraph of last year's War Appropriation Act.

I am not aware of anything having been done in the way of providing for insurance or indemnity against war risk. There has been some discussion of it, and some suggestions made that something like that should be done, but I am not aware that anything yet has been done.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If that is so, why is it necessary to keep this in—if the government has not any programme? What the minister says is quite true. I presume this statement, "Other departments, $18,540,000," which is included in the $538,804,000 tabulation on the first column of page 822 of Hansard of February 18, does apply to every other department. Who decides, may I ask, whether a particular expenditure is a war expenditure or not, because the distribution of these amounts may make a very great deal of difference?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not mean to say that it will make a great deal of difference to the sum total of the expenditure, but it will make a great deal of difference as to whether it is true war expenditure or whether it is peace-time expenditure made and charged to the war. That is a very important function, and I wonder who attends to the distribution of that, and how it is done. Does the Department of Finance do that? Does the comptroller of the treasury have anything to do with that? Is it the auditor general, or who? I thought the hon. gentleman might dig into these details with a great deal of profit.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. That is done by the governor in council either directly or through the instrumentality of the treasury board. The applications are made to treasury board for allotments or approval of draft estimates to be charged against the War Appropriation Act. The matter is considered, and a decision is made as to whether it is properly chargeable against the War Appropriation Act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it left to the decision of the treasury board itself, or is there any system of expert accounting advice—I will put it that way—as to what is and what is not so chargeable? I am not an accountant, and I assume the minister is not either, but I know that there are standard accounting systems in respect of different classes of industrial, public utility and commercial operations, and that accounting has grown to such a fine point that to-day an expert in this line is able to direct and tell public utility corporations and so forth just what the proper practice is. Has advice of that nature been sought and obtained, or is it left to treasury board, which, as the minister knows, is a sub-committee of the cabinet, presided over by himself, and with a secretary—a very competent secretary, I think, if it is the same man who used to be there? Is any one of these gentlemen who sit on treasury board competent to say, from expert experience and advice, what should be allocated to war and what is a peace expenditure? Let us have the low-down on that, if I may use that expression.

Mr. ILSLEY: The treasury board as such assumes that responsibility unless, as I have said, it is taken by council itself. In some instances, council takes it itself directly; but treasury board has the advice of its experienced officials.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are they competent to give the advice, and is it sought and taken, or is there any occasion on which their advice is rejected?

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot remember any instance when their advice was rejected. But it is not their responsibility; it is the responsibility of treasury board itself.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree with that. I want to know what the practice is?

Mr. ILSLEY: The practice is for treasury board itself to decide, and if they make a mistake they are answerable for it. But I can give the hon. gentleman, perhaps, some border-line instances, if he wants me to take up time in doing it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think this is a very illuminating discussion. At least I hope it is.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am afraid I am rather encouraging questioning on it by the line I am taking.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the very thing we should be doing here.

Mr. ILSLEY: For instance, in respect to the Post Office Department, it might be argued that the additional expenditure due to greatly enlarged carriage of mail for troops overseas is an expenditure which is chargeable to the war appropriation, or it might be arguable that it is not, that it is merely an expansion of the peace-time activity which must come.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What has been the decision?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the decision has been pretty much to put it in the peace-time expenditures. There is a considerable increase in the Post Office Department estimates this year. The hon. gentleman may notice that it is nearly $2,000,000. A great deal of it is caused by an expansion of work on account of war conditions; nevertheless it has been put in peace-time expenditure.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suppose occasionally there is a conflict between one department and another. Does the Post Office Department put up a fight to have the additional expenditures charged up to war?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, no.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I can imagine the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), with his sword unsheathed, or what-not, fighting to have this burden taken off his shoulders so that he may have a better report to present to the country, and without such a big deficit or whatever it may be. But I am not very serious about that. What I do want to know is, what is the rationale of the whole thing? The minister has given us a border-line case. I suggest to him that the proper course to pursue would be to have an expert decide this and advise the treasury board. Is there such an expert in the Department of Finance?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is none in the world, that I know of.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I tried to intimate that there are expert accountants in various lines of business activity whose advice might be very useful to treasury board in a case of this kind. As a matter of fact, the minister has a lot of brain-trusters surrounding him. I do not know whether or not he has enough there to take care of this class of work. My fear is that there may be charged to war account a good deal of money that ought to be charged to peace-time activities. I should like to be reassured on that point. That is a very proper feeling for me to have in the interests of the public, because I do not see very many people, especially in some departments having regard to war expenditure, who are trying to save much to the taxpayers.

Mr. ILSLEY: What is the question?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Should there not be a system set up officially charged with the responsibility of advising the treasury board as to what is what?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the treasury board is adequately and sufficiently advised; I do not think they require any more advisers on this point. I volunteer this information to the hon. gentleman, which again perhaps is not wise, that he should have a copy, as perhaps he has already, of an order in council that was passed last October or November, if I remember correctly, after a great deal of consideration, setting out the procedure to be followed in the approval of draft estimates and subsequent allotments.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The allocation?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, out of the money voted by the War Appropriation Act. If the hon. gentleman thinks a great deal of thought has not been given to that, he is wrong.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not suggesting anything of the sort; I am just asking for information.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a long and very carefully worked out order in council which sets out the procedure, but that does not do away with the necessity of judgment being exercised at some point as to whether certain items should be paid out of the war appropriation or not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a very interesting statement. I confess at once that I cannot possibly read all the orders in council that have been passed by this government, some thousands in the course of the year. No human being could undertake to do it. I should be glad if the minister would have a copy of that order in council sent to me. It might have been useful if he could have read it to us here to-night. But the statement that the matter has been given great consideration is reassuring. Of course I have always felt that the treasury board is a safeguard to the public. I know in the days when I was on the treasury board we sharpened our pencils and went at it, and we always felt, after a treasury board meeting, that we had earned a good day's pay by savings to the country. I hope my hon. friend and his colleagues feel the same satisfaction that we used to feel when we cut down a Buick car to a Ford for some militia officer; for in peace time I always found that the higher the rank of the officer, the more expensive car he wanted; usually we limited them to Fords.

Mr. POWER: Your colleague sitting alongside you (Mr. Stirling) did not appreciate your efforts.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He was not there then. I am glad to hear the minister give that assurance as to the safeguards being observed with respect to the proper allocation of these moneys. My fear was—he has to a degree dissipated it—that items which should be charged to peace-time activities might be charged to war account.

Mr. MacNICOL: Can the minister give the committee details of how the amount of $1,300 million was arrived at?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. For national defence the estimate is $1,261,226,524. I am afraid I shall have to revise that. There has just been an adjustment made in one of these figures, so I shall leave it to my colleague the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) to give the exact figures, if he has them.

The army figure is $666,574,659: naval services, $181 million; and air service, $421 million odd, with a credit of about $40 million expected to be recovered from other commonwealth governments. Those are the main items. My colleague the Minister of National Defence for Air says that the amount expected to be recovered from other commonwealth governments is not $40 million but $35 million.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Does that include the commonwealth air training plan?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, everything. Those are the three services, the three defence departments. Then, through the Department of Munitions and Supply, it is expected that about $180 million will be expended; and through other departments, about $32 million.

Mr. HOMUTH: Does the $180 million for munitions and supply include the new buildings that were constructed?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. Then there are some other minor expenditures which I am afraid I cannot give accurately at the moment. As I said in my speech, the total of the estimates that have been submitted will come to perhaps $150 million over the $1,300 million. But the figures I have given will substantially cover the sum of $1,450 million that I mentioned.

Mr. MacNICOL: Have all the amounts that go to make up this $1,300 million been definitely figured out to arrive at a definite amount?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes. Of course the hon. member will realize that this is not like estimating peace-time expenditure, where rather close estimates can be made. There are so many uncertain factors involved in these estimates that they may be very wide of the mark. The figure for the army, for example, is made up of the estimated cost of various programmes allowing for a certain percentage of wastage. There is an enormous amount of detail; but after the figures are arrived at, various qualifying factors come in.

Mr. MacNICOL: This is more or less like a blank cheque.

Mr. HOWE: How many shells are you going to shoot? That is the main thing.

Mr. ILSLEY: I gave at least three factors of uncertainty. There is the question of wastage, the amount of ammunition used—that depends on the nature of the warfare that develops—there is the question, how much of this amount for the Department of Munitions and Supply will be recovered; that is, how much duplication there will be? There is also the question of deliveries, which to a considerable extent will depend upon the promptness with which parts, principally machine tools, can be obtained from the United States, from which country it is necessary to import them.

Mr. MacNICOL: When the minister was speaking to this motion he said:

> In view of these various uncertainties I thought it preferable not to ask at this time for the total of the estimates which have been submitted.

At the time I thought the amount was more or less uncertain; that is why I have been trying to get a break-down of this amount of $1,300,000,000, which certainly is a very large sum of money. Having in mind the fact that at the time of the great war gold was valued at $20.67 per ounce, whereas to-day it is $35 in New York and $38.50 here, could the minister tell us what this $1,300,000,000 would have amounted to at the time of the great war, bearing in mind the difference in the price of gold? In the last analysis, it seems to me that to-day $1,300,000,000 is not such a large sum of money, having in mind the value of gold at the time of the great war compared with to-day.

Mr. ILSLEY: I feel sure that it would be greater than at the end of the last war. That would not depend upon the value of gold; it would depend upon the price level, and it is my impression that the price level at the end of the last war was considerably higher than it is to-day.

Mr. MacNICOL: I was thinking of it in reference to the price of gold during the great war.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think that has anything to do with the matter.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should like to ask the minister a question arising out of the statement he made, as reported at page 823 of Hansard, with regard to advances of money being made by the Department of Munitions and Supply in order to assist private corporations in the construction of necessary plants and equipment. The minister said:

> Large sums of money have been advanced, and additional sums will be advanced, to contractors to pay for adding to their plants or to build new ones. Additional sums will be advanced to provide working capital.

Does that mean that there has been any departure from the scheme that has been in operation during the past year, under which advances were made only for the purpose of assisting in the construction of plants?

Mr. ILSLEY: Some sums have already been advanced for working capital.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the total of the advances made during the past year for this purpose?

Mr. HOWE: Advances for working capital are made only in the case of government owned plants. There have been perhaps three or four instances in which money has been advanced to private contractors for working capital, but that has always been under the direction of a trusteeship. They have been accountable advances to help contractors carry on contracts that were too large for their financial position; that is, contracts which they could not finance through their banks. In those instances we have appointed one or two trustees, as the case might be, to watch the expenditure of this money and to recover it. I believe all such advances have been recovered, and I doubt whether at the moment there are outstanding any capital advances to private contractors.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the anticipated amount that the Department of Munitions and Supply will advance to private contractors during the current year?

Mr. HOWE: I know of no plan for advancing working capital to private contractors during the current year. As I have said, we have made such advances in four or five instances. I know an advance was made in one instance to an aircraft company to finance the purchase of materials until they could deliver their planes, and I know of two or three other instances of that nature. As I stated, moneys so advanced have been under the direction of a trusteeship. The money has been turned over to the trustees to advance to the company, and to recover from the company. It is my impression that all those transactions have been closed; that is, the working capital has been paid back to the government, and none is outstanding at the moment.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The question I am asking is, how much was advanced during the past year and what is the anticipated amount of such advances for this year? During the course of his remarks the Minister of Finance made this statement:

> . . . additional sums will be advanced to contractors to pay for adding to their plants or to build new ones.

I am asking two questions based upon that statement. First, what was the amount of the advances made last year? Second, what is the amount of the anticipated advances for the current year?

Mr. HOWE: Capital assistance, funds expended in creating new facilities, to wholly owned government companies totalled $16,703,000 up to January 31, 1941, and capital assistance to private companies amounted to $42,297,000 up to the same date. Those are all capital advances for the construction of new facilities; there is no working capital shown in this statement. As I have said, it is my impression that at the moment there are no outstanding working capital advances to private companies.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Then do I understand that advances to private companies for the construction of new facilities have not been all repaid?

Mr. HOWE: Of course not. Some of the facilities covered by such advances are still under construction. The ownership of the facilities, however, rests with the government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is your security.

Mr. HOWE: That is the security, and only after the war is over will the advances be liquidated.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was just going to ask a question along those lines. What is the arrangement with regard to the retirement of these advances? The minister states that the crown owns these facilities; I take that to be the fact.

Mr. HOWE: That is correct.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is any provision made for the depreciation of these extensions? If so, over what minimum and maximum periods does this depreciation run? I am asking this question quite deliberately, because I have heard it stated that in these contracts in some instances there is a very short period of depreciation, under which the ownership will pass from the crown to the original owners of the factory in a very short time. I should like to have that point cleared up; that is in connection with the privately owned plants.

Mr. HOWE: It is difficult to recall all the types of contracts we have. Of course, under the ordinary practice, where a plant has been built at public expense for a private owner, the private owner operates that plant for the government, sells the material at cost and receives a management fee for managing the plant. In that case no question of depreciation is involved. The government owns the plant and owns the product of the plant. That is true also if it is a British government plant, as many of them are; and it also holds true if the product is partly for the Canadian and partly for the British government, as happens in many instances.

I am trying to cast my mind around to see if we have any instances of the kind to which my hon. friend has referred. In some instances we install specialized machinery for a particular type of production in a privately owned plant. But there again the machinery remains the property of the crown. The price of the product is adjusted, having in mind the fact that the machinery is owned by the crown; and there is no provision that the ownership in the machinery passes to the private company. At least I can think of none. At the end of the war we own our machinery. We have been getting the advantage of owning the machinery by the adjustment in the price of the product. In other words, no depreciation factor has been involved in the price to us. Whether or not there is a contract outstanding which does provide for depreciation, I cannot say. I do not recall any at the present time, but I shall be pleased to inquire.

Mr. COLDWELL: I wanted to know if it was a general practice. If the minister cannot recall any examples, I suppose we may conclude it is not a practice.

Mr. HOWE: No, it is not a practice.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to ask a few questions in connection with the purchase of machinery. I was in western Ontario last week, and while there I heard a story. I do not know whether there is any truth in it, but the fact is it had to do with the purchase of machinery from a company in the United States. I do not wish to mention the name of the man who gave me the information, nor do I say it is true. He told me, however, that he had inquired from a machine company in the United States respecting the purchase of a certain machine, and that he had been quoted a price. But, upon making an attempt to buy it, he received orders to make the purchase through, I presume, one of the companies set up by the government—

Mr. HOWE: The Citadel Merchandising Company Limited.

Mr. MacNICOL: —to buy machinery. When the machine arrived, having come in a roundabout way, it was said it was priced much higher than it would have been had it been bought direct. Is such a condition possible?

Mr. HOWE: All machinery to be paid for by the government is purchased through the Citadel Merchandising Company Limited, so that we may take advantage of mass buying, and so that the government can itself supervise the purchase of machinery.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the government's own company.

Mr. HOWE: Yes. The president of the company is Mr. Thomas Arnold, and the directors are L. J. Belnap, C. E. Gravel, J. E. Johnson, president of the Canada Cement company, and F. K. Morrow of Toronto.

Mr. HOMUTH: How many of them have ever had experience?

Mr. HOWE: I believe Mr. Belnap has been in the machinery business all his life, as has Mr. Arnold.

Mr. MacNICOL: Manufacturing?

Mr. HOWE: No, handling.

Mr. MacNICOL: A jobber?

Mr. HOWE: Handling machine tools. Mr. Belnap at one time was a partner in a firm in Montreal which dealt in machine tools. Later he became president and general manager of the Worthington Pump company of New York, one of the largest tool companies in the country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Absolutely.

Mr. HOWE: Is the hon. gentleman a shareholder?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, but I know the company.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Thomas Arnold has dealt in machine tools most of his life. Mr. J. E. Johnson, president of the Canada Cement company, is one of the greatest users of machine tools, and Mr. Morrow is a man whose business judgment is respected throughout Canada. I know these men meet at least once a week, and I am told that on occasions they meet at least two or three times a week. I have great confidence in the work they have done in an exceedingly difficult field.

I might say that the machine tool problem is the bottle-neck of the war effort in England, Canada and the United States; and I believe the Citadel Merchandising Company Limited have obtained deliveries of machine tools for Canadian production which place us in a rather fortunate position as compared with either Great Britain or the United States.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am not saying there is anything wrong, nor am I casting any reflections upon any subsidiary of the government; but I should like to know if the condition I have described is possible. For the convenience of the minister I shall repeat what happened. A party inquired in the United States for a price on a large machine, a type with which I am thoroughly familiar. He could not buy it, although he had been quoted a price for which he could buy it. Apparently he had to buy it through some subsidiary company, or some company handling machinery for the government. On receiving the machine from the company he found it cost him more money. Is that possible? If the government has set up some company to act as a purchaser of machines, should a machine cost more when it is purchased through the government's company than if it were purchased direct from the manufacturer in the United States? I believe in this instance the person had to purchase it through the subsidiary of the government. In my judgment, the machine should not cost more to the Canadian purchaser if he purchased it through a government channel than if he purchased it direct from the manufacturer.

Is it possible that in this particular instance the machine could have cost the Canadian purchaser more than the price at which he could have bought it direct? I do not say that such a thing did take place; but the gentleman told me that that was what happened. He was not charging anybody at the time, but was just wondering what kind of business was being done.

Mr. HOWE: I think it is the duty of a member of parliament, if he hears a charge of that kind, to get particulars, supply them to the department and let us check up. I would say it is impossible that that could have happened.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. HOWE: I believe the Citadel company is securing tools economically, even in the type of market in which they have been buying in the last year.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was the intention of setting up the company, was it not?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, certainly. Obviously, we could not have private manufacturers going out and making their own transactions in connection with machine tools, when the government will own and pay for them. That would be quite impossible. We must have a central authority through which orders are placed, and which will take the responsibility of stamping with the government's stamp, and protecting the ownership in the tools. We believe the company is operated efficiently, but if anyone brings us evidence that it is not so operated, we shall be glad to examine the situation and see that it is straightened out.

I believe, however, that, instead of passing on rumours of that kind, it would be the duty of a member of parliament to get the particulars of such a transaction, and turn them in to the Department of Munitions and Supply. That is the only way of which I know whereby we could check transactions of that kind. I believe rumours should be stopped immediately by asking for the exact details.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am glad to get the minister's explanation. When the story was told to me, I asked the gentleman if I might use his name, but he said, "Oh, no, do not do anything like that."

Mr. HOWE: I suggest to my hon. friend that under the circumstances it is not wise to spread a rumoured transaction of that kind all over the newspapers of Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have heard quite a good deal of talk along that line, and I am within my rights to ask for the minister's assurance that such is not possible. If he says it is not, then I am satisfied that the rumour is not correct.

One further question: A few days ago I visited a large plant to which a large addition is being erected. I presume the money to build that addition is being advanced by the government.

Mr. HOWE: What plant was that?

Mr. MacNICOL: Are contracts for such additions let by the government or by the company for whom the addition is being erected?

Mr. HOWE: Sometimes one way and sometimes the other, but the details of the contract are always subject to the approval of our construction branch. The plans and specifications are approved by that branch, and it supervises the expenditures. Sometimes tenders are called for by the company itself, especially when a contractor may have a specialized knowledge of the layout required. In such a case, however, the plans and specifications are approved by the government. The prices received are submitted to the government, and the selection of the contractor is made by the company with the joint approval of the government.

Mr. QUELCH: Would the minister give a resumé of the government's action in connection with borrowings since the declaration of war? First, I should like to know the amounts which have been borrowed from the chartered banks, the dates of maturities, the interest rates, the percentage of the loans used for refunding and the percentage used for current expenditure. I should like to know also the extent to which deposits were expended as a result of those borrowings. If possible, I should like the minister to state what the government action will be with regard to the repayment of these loans. Will it be done by further borrowings from the chartered banks, or will it be done by the payment of legal tender? I noticed a statement in the paper that these loans by the chartered banks were to be repaid by legal tender. Is that to be done, or will there be further borrowings from the chartered banks?

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot give that information to-night because that will require the preparation of a careful statement.

Mr. QUELCH: Will the minister give that during the course of the debate?

Mr. ILSLEY: I can if it is the wish of the committee that this resolution should remain in committee past eleven o'clock. I can give that when the committee meets again, or it could be given on the bill.

Mr. QUELCH: Would the minister include in his statement information with regard to borrowings by bonds and by savings certificates?

Mr. ILSLEY: I will give what information is available. I am not just sure that I can give all that information, but I will give what I can.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Will any of this appropriation be used for the Department of National War Services and, if so, what amount?

Mr. ILSLEY: The estimate submitted for the Department of National War Services is $1,948,252.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Is that the total expenditure?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the estimate of the amount to be taken out of this appropriation for the Department of National War Services.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why should we not have a break-down of the estimates for these different departments?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Will that amount take care of the department for the whole year, or will there be something later on?

Mr. ILSLEY: If this were a peace-time estimate, it would be all that the Department of National War Services could get without a governor general's warrant or another vote, but under the War Appropriations Act that is not the situation. If it is desired, we could give a break-down of that amount, but there would be nothing final about it. The final amount might be more or less.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Subject to this order in council.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: According to the Minister of Munitions and Supply, advances to these private companies during the past year amounted to $42,297,000. I should like to know from the minister how much it is anticipated will be advanced during the next fiscal year. I should like to know the largest amount advanced to any one company last year, and the name of that company.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member's questions are on Hansard, and I shall have to get that information.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Last year we passed a vote calling for the expenditure of $700,000,000. Could the minister break down that vote to show how much was expended under the four paragraphs of this resolution?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I could not. That vote was not allocated to the four paragraphs.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Where can an hon. member obtain a statement of expenditures on specific undertakings, such as Federal Aircraft or the Debert military development?

Mr. POWER: With regard to the airport and military camp at Debert, if the hon. member will ask a question I shall endeavour to get the information. I would have particulars as to expenditures but not as to payments made. Usually the payment is made some time after the expenditure.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): This was originally an emergency landing field but it has been developed into a large military camp. Where shall we be able to get the total expenditures made on that camp?

Mr. POWER: The Department of National Defence would have that.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Will it appear in some return submitted to parliament, or shall we have to ask for information with regard to each one of these undertakings?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the question is asked here, the information should be given, provided the minister has it available.

Mr. POWER: We shall be only too glad to give any information asked for. Eventually this would appear in the public accounts, but it might be hard to find the information in connection with a military camp like the one at Debert. I do not know whether there are, but it is quite possible that there have been roads constructed in connection with this camp and there might be a dozen different items throughout the public accounts. It would take one who was accustomed to perusing the public accounts to find everything relating to the Debert military camp. If my hon. friend wants the expenditures to date, there would be no trick in getting them.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like the total expenditures and the total commitments made with regard to the Debert military camp and airport. Would the Minister of Finance advise the committee the practice with regard to payments? I have had a number of complaints, and I know the minister has had many more, in connection with delay in the payment of accounts. Sometimes these commitments involve the total capital or the total credit of a company.

Mr. ILSLEY: The comptroller of the treasury must verify the facts, and when the facts are verified the account is paid. What the specific steps are that are taken for the purpose of verifying the account, I cannot say at the moment, but I can get that information if it is of interest to the hon. gentleman. It is a matter of detail.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The principles are laid down in the statute, are they not?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I think so.

Mr. HOMUTH: Months and months have gone by after the delivery of goods, but firms have received no payment yet, and they have been very much embarrassed. The banks will no longer advance them money, and that is a very serious matter for some of them. I cannot understand why, two or three or four months after the goods have been delivered, no payment has yet been made.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is often a reason which is not the fault of the comptroller's staff. Sometimes delays may take place because the comptroller's staff is understaffed or something of that kind. There has been a continuous increase in the number of appointments of accountants, auditors, clerks and others working for the comptroller of the treasury, trying to keep up with the great increase in the work of the office. I know that in many instances it has not been the fault of the comptroller or the fault of his staff that delays have taken place.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply one more question. If company "A" desires to buy a steel shearing machine, must it obtain permission to buy that machine from the Citadel company which has been set up by the government and to which the minister has referred?

Mr. HOWE: If company "A" is buying a shearing machine with its own money, it does not need to refer to Citadel at all, except of course at the present time, to buy a tool from the United States, there must be a clearance from the United States government. As my hon. friend knows, the export of machines is by special permit, and usually in such a case Citadel is asked to get the release, but Citadel does not handle the account in any way if it is a transaction between two private firms.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In other words, Citadel is given priority.

Mr. HOWE: Yes. Usually as a matter of convenience, priority is obtained through Citadel, which keeps its own officer in Washington for that purpose. In that way it may be interested in the transaction, although the money is paid direct from one company to the other.

Mr. MacNICOL: Citadel does not direct company "A" to the company from which it must buy the machine?

Mr. STIRLING: Nor is Citadel buying machines for private firms?

Mr. HOWE: No. Perhaps I had better qualify that. Citadel buys machines which the government will own, and which it sometimes installs for a private plant. My hon. friend will understand that we sometimes equip a private plant to do work for the government, but the tools will remain the property of the government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would ask the Minister of Finance to bring down to-morrow or as soon as convenient a statement of the expenditures and commitments up to the latest date for which the information is conveniently available with regard to the cost of the thirty-day training plan. I was in communication with the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) about the matter and he undertook to get me these figures, but they have not yet been made available.

Mr. POWER: They will certainly be available to-morrow. I saw the letter here to-night.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would think they are available and I would like them spread on the record, with the breakdown, if the department has it, showing the amount that was allocated for the scheme out of the 1940 appropriation to be spent (a) by National Defence, and (b) by War Services; also how far the activities of War Services go, and the expenditure in that respect before these men are handed over to National Defence for training. My understanding is that under the present practice War Services calls the men up, pays for their preliminary medical examination and gives them their transportation, all of which of course is charged up to this vote. Then, at the training centre these men are delivered over to National Defence, and from then on the expense in respect of these men is for the account of National Defence until they are paid off, when they are re-delivered, so to speak, to War Services, which transports them back to their homes. I think that is the modus operandi. The deputy minister of war services gave me an item, on request, but it did not include expenses for transportation either way, on the theory that the bills had not come in. I can hardly understand that. I am not doubting his word for a moment, but these men were called up in October.

Mr. POWER: I am not sure about their transportation home. I imagine they would go home at the expense of National Defence. I am not clear on that, but certainly War Services pays transportation to the camp.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the minister, who knows much more about the matter than I do, says that the men return home at the expense of National Defence—

Mr. POWER: I think so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —then that should be included.

This appropriation includes the cost of housing, the hutments. I should like to have the break-down of the cash expended for that purpose up to the end of January, if that is available. That may be too recent a date, but certainly the expenditure up to December 31 last, and the commitments up to that date, should be available. I should like to have the amount of the appropriation for that purpose and the amount out of that appropriation still available to be paid, in as full detail as possible. I am sure they have that information at the department, and we would like to have it as a basis for further questioning. As it is now nearly eleven o'clock, I would suggest to the minister that we rise and report progress.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East) the house adjourned at 10.58 p.m.

Friday, February 21, 1941.

The house met at three o'clock.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

PROPOSED APPLICATION OF CROWSNEST PASS RATES ON GRAIN WESTWARD AS WELL AS EASTWARD

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 15, to amend the Railway Act.

He said: This bill proposes a slight amendment to section 325 of the Railway Act. The purpose of the amendment is to rectify what was omitted when the Railway Act was last amended by parliament in 1925, by granting to the people of British Columbia the same consideration in the matter of freight rates on all grains and flour to the Pacific coast as was given to the other provinces at that time. The adoption of this amendment will not only remove a grave injustice of many years' standing, thereby enabling the people of British Columbia to procure their flour and feed grains at costs comparable to those in other provinces, but will also provide a wider market in British Columbia for the surplus wheat held in the three prairie provinces.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DECENNIAL CENSUS

INQUIRY AS TO DECISION TO PROCEED IN 1941 AND APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon). Has it definitely been decided by the government to proceed with the two million dollar expenditure in connection with the taking of the 1941 census? If so, when will parliament be advised as to the names of the commissioners for the various constituencies?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The hon. member for Mackenzie has just sent me notice that he proposed to ask this question this afternoon. Preliminary arrangements have been made for taking the census this year. I understand that census commissioners have been appointed.

I may say that if the census is proceeded with, enumerators will be selected from all parties, returned men in all cases where available, and women where practicable.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is much virtue in an "if," but what about the "if"? We should have a statement of policy from the government now.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I think I have answered the question as fully as I can at the present moment.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Thursday, February 20, consideration in committee of a resolution to provide sums not exceeding $1,300,000,000 for the year ending March 31, 1942, for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Mr. POULIOT: Some little discussion has taken place on this resolution in this house and in this committee since the beginning of the week. What I have not heard of it I have read in Hansard.

I have been in politics for quite a number of years, and amongst the rank and file members of the Liberal party there is only my friend the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Deslauriers) who is my senior. Therefore I can speak with the experience of years in active politics and in debate in this house. On the other side of the house I see my dear old friend the independent member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), and one of the members from Toronto (Mr. Harris), who is very jovial when he wishes to be, or when he is not frowning. There is the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Woodsworth), who has always been very kind to me as a colleague. Then in the cabinet itself there is my chief, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King); there is my beloved leader for the province of Quebec; there are the other ministers from Quebec and the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), all of whom are senior to me here. Other ministers I have seen come and go, and with one or two exceptions I hope those who sit on the treasury benches to-day will remain there for a long time.

The air is thick and unbreathable. I have never witnessed such backstage intrigue as there is now in high quarters. I am disgusted with the ways in which intrigue is being carried on in the holy name of patriotism when we know that behind it is a group of scoundrels, buccaneers, racketeers, pirates, who are trying to get hold of Canada's wealth for their own purposes. It is hateful; and whether it comes from Winnipeg, Vancouver, Toronto or this city of Ottawa it is no less shameful. We do not want to see the few enriched at the expense of the many. We want to see our soldiers well clothed and well armed, given useful weapons with which to gain the victory. We do not want any slackers in uniform to infest some of the branches of the Department of National Defence, such as that of the judge advocate general; and I know what I am saying. I do not hate Tories, but I hate Toryism, especially under the guise of Liberalism.

I do not see my revered chief in his seat to-day, but I am sure he remembers when I was a young member and came to him for assistance in connection with the difficulties confronting me. He has always been very kind. Sometimes I was indignant when he refused me, when I was fighting for the good cause of freedom and liberty for which our soldiers are fighting now on the soil of England. I believe they should be here to protect our families in Canada, in sufficient numbers and properly equipped to give us all a feeling of security. I remember our beloved leader in the province of Quebec when he was still a young lawyer at Rivière du Loup; in those days he, too, was very kind to me. We have fought many battles together. I remember on one occasion having dinner with him in Quebec city, on the day he was to give his decision to the electors of Quebec East, Sir Wilfrid Laurier's old seat. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) was grieved to have to leave his dear electors of Kamouraska county, who had given him his start in public life.

There are other ministers who have been kind to me, and whom I have supported against the Tories and against hypocrites of every description. Starting in the west there is my hon. friend the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), who, I am sure, remembers the days when the Bren gun matter was discussed. One afternoon about three o'clock, after one of the Tories from Toronto had spoken, I rose in my place to defend the minister; and although Hansard does not record it, I was so pleased to hear my chief the Prime Minister say, "hear, hear" when I was giving h . . . to the other side. Then there is the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon), who comes from Alberta. At one time he was the lone Liberal member from that province, but thanks to his good work and popularity the Liberal representation from Alberta is much larger now, and it is very brilliant. Then there is our friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who is a born fighter. Sometimes I do not agree with his policies, but he is a Liberal to the core, and he is the kind I like.

Passing over Manitoba and coming to Ontario, we come to Windsor. I was the Liberal member who spoke on behalf of the party at the nomination of the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty), who, I believe, is one of the best members of the cabinet and who has a secretary well worthy of him. They both have the spirit of the old school. Both are broad-minded; both are liberal minded; both are worthy of the confidence that is reposed in them. Then there is my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), my friend of all time, my right arm in the civil service committee. We fought and won many battles together, and no one was more pleased than I when he took over the Post Office Department. There is also my hon. friend the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson), who is doing very well. He is a young man, but his merit has been recognized by his chief and his colleagues, and we are all proud of him.

Coming to the province of Quebec, I have already spoken of my leader there. There is also my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power). He is all right. He is just as bright and as conscientious as he could be. His only trouble is that sometimes he is betrayed by those under him, but he is clever enough to realize who is responsible and to deal with such matters himself. I remember when we prepared political campaigns together. Those were the happiest days of my life; I enjoyed them very much, because we had discovered the truth to tell the people. Then there is my hon. friend the Secretary of State (Mr. Casgrain). I am sure one of his proudest recollections is that of the day when he came to Trois Pistoles to protest against the gerrymander which was being carried on by the Tories. At that time he spoke to an enthusiastic crowd of ten thousand people, who were cheering all the Liberals and giving something else to the other party. There is also my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), who is not well at the present time and to whom we wish a speedy recovery.

Going down to the maritimes, there is my hon. friend the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud). I remember being at Campbellton at the side of the Prime Minister, who was then leader of the opposition, supporting the Minister of Fisheries in his first campaign to become a member of this House of Commons. At that time, as I remember, two mass meetings were held simultaneously in the two theatres in the city, and when the leader of the opposition and some other persons tried to express their views only two or three dozen people stayed to listen to them.

Turning now to Nova Scotia we find representing that province two brilliant members of the cabinet. There is the Minister of National Defence for Naval Affairs (Mr. Macdonald), who now occupies the seat of Kingston City, the traditional constituency of Sir John A. Macdonald, and who is doing well in his department because he is an honest man. I pay the same compliment to the Minister of Finance. I remember, in days gone by when the party was in opposition, we were both in the attic. We were neighbours, our rooms were close together, and when I wanted to coin a phrase to damn Mr. Bennett he was my Webster.

I rise to congratulate among others the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) upon the excellent speech he made yesterday. He belongs to the old traditional school, and when he speaks he is listened to. When he says something it carries weight.

Let us come now to the tremendous sum which we are asked to vote in this resolution. It represents one-half of the total debt of Canada from confederation until now. It is a tremendous amount; everyone says so. And to meet the expenditures contemplated it has been suggested that we adopt the conclusions of the Sirois report. I am against it. I have published editorials in a French daily, which has the largest circulation in the province of Quebec, in order to set forth my views on the subject. I find that the work of that commission has been very costly, and it is no good.

What I warn every one against is the financial coup that is being prepared in the dark to give an opportunity to the few to enrich themselves at the expense of the many, including the taxpayers of the province of Quebec. And it is all done in the holy name of patriotism. It is a good example of national unity when the whip of Ontario shakes hands with the member who is now speaking from the province of Quebec.

I wish to congratulate the government upon something that appears in the official report of the dominion-provincial conference. I call attention to pages XIV and 67. One evening I was listening to the broadcast over station CBL, Toronto, when I heard the last sentences of the speaker, Professor J. A. Corry of Queen's university, who said: "We should not have nine small countries; we should have one great country." He was embarrassed and he said it in an undertone. The announcer then stated that those who wanted a copy of Professor Corry's talk might write to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, Toronto, and they would receive it. I applied for a copy but never got it. Instead, I received the following letter:

In reply refer to file No. 18-13R-22

55 York Street,
Toronto, Ontario,
January 14, 1941.

Mr. J. F. Pouliot, M.P.,

I beg your pardon; the name appears as J. F. Pontiot.

Mr. J. F. Pontiot, M.P., Box 414,
Rivière-du-Loup, P.Q.

Dear Mr. Pontiot:

We regret the delay in replying to your card of December 21. The substance of the interview which you heard on the Rowell-Sirois report is contained in a ten cent pamphlet, "Confederation Marches On" by Mr. R. M. Fowler.

A complete summary of the whole report is contained in two volumes (40c. each) published by the Canadian Institute of International Affairs.

All of these can be obtained from any bookstore.

Yours faithfully,

C. R. Delafield,
Programme Division.

I did not know that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation carried advertisements for any bookstore.

A big paper, L'Action Catholique, published in the province of Quebec, carried three articles of mine, the conclusion of one of which was as follows. I will translate it.

About fifteen days ago I heard over station CBL, Toronto, Doctor J. A. Corry, a professor at Queen's university, declare: "We shall not have nine small countries, we shall have but one great country in Canada." The announcer informed the audience that they could get copies of the talk by writing to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I did so but am still waiting for the pamphlet. I feel indignant at the idea that this crank has been appointed secretary of one of the special committees of the conference which opens on Tuesday next in Ottawa and which will examine the recommendations of the commission for the purpose of discussing the commission's findings upon markets and marketing, fisheries, insurance, company regulations, economy in administration, research and statistics, conferences between the dominion and the provinces, transportation, interprovincial trade barriers, et cetera.

Such a lack of tact justifies his immediate dismissal if he was not the loud speaker of the government.

What delights me is that although this article was written only three days before the opening of the conference I find that, as set out on page 67 of the report of the conference, the secretary of the special problems committee was Mr. J. F. MacNeill of the Department of Justice. I commend the government for having dismissed the other gentleman in view of his want of tact. This is one thing, but Corry was speaking. Was he not speaking for the chancellor of Queen's university, Mr. Dunning, who is interested in several insurance companies, and who wanted to make a case for the adoption of this Sirois report in order that his companies might have an opportunity to make some money?

I will go further and draw the attention of the committee to Mr. Fowler, the young man who was discharged by Mr. Hepburn. He was one of the lawyers employed by the department of the attorney general in Toronto. In what office is he now? He is in the office of Leighton McCarthy, K.C., of Toronto. Who is Leighton McCarthy? He is an insurance man. He is a lawyer but he is also chairman of the board of the Canada Life Insurance company, and is a member of the boards of numerous other insurance companies.

Let us consider the Dominion of Canada General Insurance company. The total assets of this company are $264,000,000 and it holds $124,728,841 in government and municipal bonds. No doubt these holdings include many bonds and debentures of the prairie provinces. This company will benefit greatly if they are able to secure dominion government guarantees for these bonds. Then there is the National Trust company. This company has total assets of $8,935,000. Then there is the Western Assurance company. This company has total assets of $10,000,000, and they hold $3,284,000 of government and municipal bonds. Then there is the British America Assurance company with assets of $6,449,000 and holding bonds totalling $2,022,000.

Then we have the bank of Nova Scotia, which holds dominion and provincial bonds to the amount of $40,786,000 and also $69,437,000. The bonds and debentures of the dominion and provinces held by these insurance companies total approximately $250,000,000. I would suppose that three-fifths of that amount, or $150,000,000, would be made up of dominion bonds and debentures and that of the balance one-half would be debentures of the prairie provinces. They come here like Calais burghers with a rope around their necks asking us to change the constitution of this country because they do not know how to handle their own affairs. What is behind it? It is the same thing as went on during the last war. There is considerable intrigue to bring about a union government in order that the rich may become richer and the poor poorer. I am absolutely against it, and my electors are against it.

We are being asked to vote several hundred million dollars in order to buy up stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway and bring about a disguised amalgamation of our railways. I ask the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) to consider that. He never has the ear of the house as I have now. I have it because I tell the truth. There is nothing behind what I say; I speak openly. What have we here? There is to be repatriation of funds which never belonged to the Canadian people. What is going on? We have intrigue for a union government. It is just a case of these people being afraid to miss the bus. They are trying to take advantage of the war in order to bring about an amalgamation of the railways. We have Portage avenue in Winnipeg, Queen street in Toronto and St. James street in Montreal.

I have before me a number of clippings from the morning papers. There is one in the Montreal Gazette entitled "Party Lines Should Go." The next one is from the Globe and Mail entitled "National Ministry Imperative." Then the Ottawa Journal contains one entitled, "Mr. Hanson Again Urges National War Government." In the Ottawa Citizen we find one entitled "Loyal Opposition Aid." Then there is the rottenest of all, the Winnipeg Free Press, the paper of Victor Sifton of the Sifton family, who is now master-general of the ordnance under the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), and he is the owner of the Winnipeg Free Press; he is the man who gives orders to his scribes and slaves to cast slurs upon the colleagues of the Minister of National Defence. All this in the name of patriotism.

I come back to the Great West Life Assurance company. This company holds a formidable amount of the debentures of the prairie provinces. You know that, Mr. Chairman, and you know also that the Minister of Mines and Resources is a director of that company. He boasts of that fact in the Parliamentary Guide. The figures are incredible. This company has total assets of $167,000,000 and it holds bonds and debentures of the dominion and provinces to an amount of $87,452,000. This company, of which the Minister of Mines and Resources is a director, have one-half of their assets frozen in bonds and securities of the prairie provinces. They now want to change the constitution completely; they want to undo what has been done in the past because of their inability to manage their own business.

Do you think that I am going to expose myself to a headache by attempting to analyse the silly figures that appear in these thick reports which are impossible to read? Moreover, those reports do not contain accurate information; they contain fake information. They do not tell us what is going on, they attempt to prevent us from understanding what is going on. This is the result of a work which cost this country half a million dollars, if not more. I am fed up with it. I think it is about time the Minister of Mines and Resources was appointed president of the Great West Life Assurance company. We will then all subscribe toward getting him a satchel with which to go to Winnipeg.

There are two other ministers I wish to mention, the first being the Minister of National Defence. I was very fond of him until he went to St. James street. He is a very likeable man, full of amenity. He is a brilliant lawyer although he has no appeal to the masses. As I say, he is a most likeable man, but I was here a long time before he was. And when I was fighting Bennett I was not receiving $200 a day in fees from the dominion government; I was fighting Bennett on behalf of the Liberal party. I do not hesitate to repeat to my hon. friend what I had already said in the house when he was in England. He told us that there should be no party politics in war. Am I right in that? Well, if it is all right for me, it should be all right for him; and if I cannot recommend any one of my electors to an appointment in the militia, I do not see how he can recommend anybody from Barclay's bank, of which he was one of the directors, and put him in the Department of National Defence, as in the case of Mr. Magee, or bring someone into the Department of Munitions and Supply, as was done with Mr. Borden. I do not suppose that only in Barclay's Bank of Canada are there to be found able men. I said that when he was away, and I say it now he is here. He may listen to me if he wishes. If not, it is his own business.

With regard to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), I will tell him that when I was fighting Bennett during the five years he was in power; when I was supporting the present Minister of National Defence, who was then the financial pundit of the Liberal party; when I was supporting and applauding the Minister of Munitions and Supply—I would like to see him here, not behind the curtain; he is smoking a pipe; I would like him to come into the chamber and listen to what I am saying—I was not building elevators for R. B. Bennett at different places in Canada. I have no lesson to receive from these gentlemen, because I am fighting the cause of the Liberal party for my chief, the Prime Minister of Canada. I am glad to see the minister being applauded by good Tories. But I am fighting the cause of the Liberal party for my chief in order that he shall not be stabbed in the back after they have burned enough incense under his nose.

With reference to this matter, one of the most serious that we have discussed, it is time to see that there is a master, and that the master should be the Prime Minister of Canada, my chief. We should see also that the working members of the cabinet should not be suffering the weight of intrigue or the trouble of intrigue from any of their colleagues or from anyone holding a responsible position under one of these gentlemen.

I shall be through in a moment, but there is something else I want to say. It is that some of these people have not always been burning incense under the nose of the Prime Minister. There is the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce), who said that the Prime Minister was well qualified for peace-time leadership, but that in war time his qualifications for peace-time leadership disqualified him for war-time leadership. That was said in May last. This is a copy that I have received from Hansard, and since I never correct my speeches and I rely on Hansard, I have this in my hand. He said:

> I have been a friend of the Prime Minister of Canada for many years and have admired his many excellent qualities. He was prepared, as few in this country have ever been, by long years of education and training in statecraft for public life. He is a man of high character, a man of peace. I wonder whether these qualities, which are so admirable in times of peace, are not the very qualities which disqualify him now in time of war.
> Some hon. Members: No, no.
> An hon. Member: Shame.
> Mr. Bruce: The Prime Minister's Asquithian attitude of "wait and see", or in other words, let public opinion become crystallized and then follow it, may have been good statecraft for a virile people in ordinary peace times, but it is not the attitude for war time.
> Mr. Grant: He was elected in war time.
> Mr. Bruce: It is now absolutely imperative that we have a man of action who will lead public opinion instead of following it. This man must have a strong and forceful character, must be one who will not be influenced by personal or private considerations, and will be ready to brush aside red tape and all other obstacles in the way of quick and decisive action. Last evening we had an illustration of party loyalty on the part of the Minister of Finance which was most commendable. When I listened to him I could not help the reflection that history may repeat itself and that what has happened in the mother country might with advantage happen here. The Minister of Finance enjoys the respect and confidence of both sides of this house, as well as that of the people of Canada generally. With his splendid war record, his undoubted ability in finance and law, his well known driving force and character, may I venture to suggest that he is the one man in the Prime Minister's cabinet—
> Mr. Martin: You are trying to undermine him.
> Mr. Bruce: —qualified and equipped to lead a war government. The Prime Minister of the United Kingdom was changed in spite of the fact that Mr. Chamberlain had very strong support in the House of Commons, 418 supporters as against the combined Liberal and Labour strength of 197, but he was forced by pressure of public opinion to hand over the seals of office to Mr. Churchill, a man of great energy and ability in whom the people had confidence.

The minister referred to, who was one of the colleagues of the Prime Minister, did not disavow what was said by the hon. member for Parkdale; he listened to him just as though he had been drinking honey and milk. Afterwards, when I denounced bitterly any project of a union or national government, I was interrupted by the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island. I proceeded just the same. I said that, in spite of the fact that we are at war, we can make jokes occasionally, and it is not necessary to have long faces all the time.

I have fought against national government and I am fighting it now because I know very well that, as soon as there is no opposition, the sky will be the limit in matters of expenditure, graft, and so on. I do not say that the ministers themselves graft, but I say that they protect people who do graft. I can tell them what is being done at St. Paul l'Ermite at the expense of either England or Canada. Nobody knows who is responsible, but the war expenditure was supposed to be $5,000,000, and now it is $25,000,000. People are stealing every piece of material they can find there, and the foremen close their eyes. It is a scandal. I do not say that to denounce the government; I say it to denounce the scandals themselves, and it comes from a Liberal. The leader of the opposition was not astute enough to do that himself. He probably knew of what was happening; everybody knew of it; but he continued to praise those men, saying that they were marvellous men, high calibre men.

And now, what are we to have? We are supposed to have a union government; with Arthur Meighen; with a gentleman from Vancouver; with Stewart, the controller, the head of the Tories in Nova Scotia; all these people will come in, and when they are in they will stab our chief in the back. That is the programme, and I wanted to bring these matters to light in a very clear and unequivocal way, in order that there shall be no misunderstanding or mistake about it.

I have stood firmly for the Liberal party all my life. My father did so, when he was elected with Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1896, when he denounced those who tried to stand in his way when he wanted some progress for his own constituents or for the country in general. I am true to the traditions of my grandfather, who voted against confederation because he found in it disguised unification. I am true to the traditions of my great-grandfather, who voted for the ninety-two resolutions, and who also gave his seat of Rimouski to Baldwin when he was defeated in York. Those were the Liberals of other times. When my father was fighting his way into parliament there were very few Liberals in the province of Quebec, and the propaganda they were using were the speeches of Blake, Cartwright and Mills, both in English and translated into French. That was the Liberal food which was being given to the people of the province of Quebec. I wonder what those great men of the past would say if they were here to-day. I am sure they would say: "Pouliot, you are right. What you are saying now is most unpleasant for you to say, but it is your duty to say it in order that the country may not go to the dogs."

I was born a British subject—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bradette): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time is up.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. POULIOT: My father was a British subject, and a loyal British subject. My grandfather was a loyal British subject and so were all my ancestors from the time that Canada was given away by France to England. Now that our king is the king of Canada, I am proud to be a loyal Canadian subject, and my son and grandson, like me, will be loyal British subjects.

So far as those gentlemen of whom I have spoken are concerned, I consider them so small that I shall pay no more attention to them. On the other hand, my interest in the state is supreme, and I think it is my duty, not only as a Liberal but as a good Canadian who is true to the best British traditions, to speak my mind freely in this house in order that the members who did not know what was happening behind the scenes might know it now.

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to detain the committee for very long. I regret that my hon. friend (Mr. Pouliot) has seen fit to make a vicious attack upon me. He is quite entitled to do that if he sees fit, but it does seem to me that it is not entirely consistent with the professions of friendship he has made, a friendship which I have endeavoured, during my period in public life and all the time I have been in this house, to maintain with him.

I do not propose to permit the discussion of the resolution before the committee to be delayed by any personal references on my part. I consider this resolution to involve the most serious matters with which this country has had to deal since confederation. At the time of the debate last session to which my hon. friend referred, exactly the same situation existed. I was dealing then with an appropriation bill of $700,000,000 and was endeavouring to get the house into committee to consider it. I did not think it necessary at that time to beat my breast and proclaim my loyalty to my leader. I think I have endeavoured to show that by my actions during my lifetime

Nor do I need to take the time of the committee in referring to my ancestors. My hon. friend can go back and refer to his if he wants to. I have, however, rather distinct recollections of my own ancestry in the ranks of Liberalism, if that is of any interest regarding loyalty to my leader. I only want to say this, that I have been true to my leader. I have endeavoured, in season and out of season, to support him not only when he was in power but when he was out of power. I have endeavoured to do my duty by my party and by the country as I saw it, and it does not lie in the mouth of any hon. gentleman in this house to make the reflections which my hon. friend has seen fit to make to-day. I am not in the habit of proclaiming my loyalty either to my country or to my leader or to my party. I endeavour to make actions speak louder than words.

May I allude, Mr. Chairman, to two other references which my hon. friend has made. He has referred to Mr. Victor Sifton, who happens to be master-general of the ordnance at the present time. Mr. Sifton, a gentleman from Manitoba, came down here as a citizen of this country to assist Mr. Philip Chester, who had agreed to take for a limited time the position of master-general of the ordnance. Mr. Sifton came down here to assist him in connection with the reorganization of that branch of the department in order that we might attain the greatest possible efficiency in the obtaining of supplies which were all important. Mr. Sifton assisted Mr. Chester, and Mr. Chester gave us his valuable business experience in connection with that work. After about three months, Mr. Chester felt that he was able to leave that office in such shape that he believed it would carry on efficiently. Before he left, he recommended in the strongest possible terms that Mr. Sifton be made master-general of the ordnance. Hon. gentlemen will understand that there might have been some heart-burning on the part of military officers in connection with that appointment. I want to say to the house that it was only after the gravest consideration that Mr. Sifton was appointed. He was appointed because of Mr. Chester's recommendation, and because of what I knew of his personal character and ability. I am glad to say that his appointment was universally accepted by the military officers with whom he is associated. Mr. Sifton is carrying on as any patriotic citizen would want to do, and without salary and without expenses of any kind, giving his services to this country as master-general of the ordnance. I want to say of Mr. Sifton, because he cannot speak for himself, that I have the highest possible confidence in him and believe that his administration will be for the great benefit of Canada, particularly in connection with that important branch of our undertaking.

With regard to Colonel Magee, president of Barclay's bank, I asked Colonel Magee to come to Ottawa. My hon. friend is quite right in that. I personally asked Colonel Magee to come to Ottawa to assist me as senior executive assistant. He came here and has been here ever since. I want to say that I would be greatly surprised if Colonel Magee has given my hon. friend the slightest ground for the attack which he has made on him to-day. I believe he has met all members courteously, has endeavoured to give the very best attention which could possibly be given to the many important matters with which he has had to deal and has been sympathetic and highly efficient in all these matters. I know he has done his level best as a patriotic and extremely capable Canadian to promote the interests of our dominion at this time when we are at war.

That is all I have to say with regard to those matters.

This matter of $200 a day—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I suggest to the minister that he say a word on behalf of the judge advocate-general in view of the vicious attack which was made upon him.

Mr. RALSTON: I did not know that my hon. friend had also singled out the judge advocate-general. The judge advocate-general has been in the department for a good many years; he was there when I was there before. I know that Brigadier Orde has carried out his duties as a Canadian should, and there is, I think, no man in Canada who is so well versed as he in military law and in the practices of the department which requires expert and skilled advice.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Thank you.

Mr. RALSTON: The $200 a day has been mentioned. Indeed, it has been mentioned so often that I think hon. members must be tired of hearing about it. But this is the first opportunity I have had to mention it.

I was asked and was pressed to accept the position of counsel to the grain commission three years ago. This was after I was out of public life and had retired to private practice where I felt my duty to my family required me to be. I accepted that position and for my services indicated the same fee which had been paid to other legal gentlemen in connection with commissions. I could not accept less because I was giving my whole time to the commission and my firm were entitled to my services. The money was paid to my firm, and my share distributed to me, and their share to my partners, and I have no apologies to make to my hon. friend or to anyone else with regard to that matter. The fee was regarded as reasonable under the circumstances, having regard to the fees which were paid to professional men. It was absolutely necessary that the fee should be paid in order that my firm might be even partly reimbursed for the loss of my services for that time, and perhaps I may be pardoned if I say that I endeavoured to give the country the very best service I could in connection with the work of the commission.

That is all I have to say at this time in regard to the matter to which my hon. friend referred.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I cannot refrain from offering a word of congratulation to the Minister of National Defence upon the statement he has just concluded. I do not know that any defence was necessary. It occurred to me that perhaps dignified silence would have been as good an answer as any that could be made. The minister in his judgment thought otherwise and I am not going to quarrel with the position he took. If the people of Canada could look in upon this House of Commons this afternoon and hear what we listened to for forty minutes and have an appreciation of just what it means, I wonder what they would think. I suggest that this sort of thing must cease in the House of Commons of Canada, or we shall be in disrepute. So far as I am concerned I offer to the government any authority which my position carries with it to help maintain the dignity of this house, and if possible to raise its position in the estimation of the Canadian people. I think we all agree that we should do this, and I offer my support wholeheartedly to the leader of the government in that regard. I conclude by again congratulating the minister on the statement he has made.

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps I can at this point give some information that was asked for last night. The hon. member for Lake Centre asked to be supplied with this information. He said:

> I should like to know from the minister how much it is anticipated will be advanced during the next fiscal year.

That is, advanced to private companies. The estimate submitted by the Department of Munitions and Supply to the Department of Finance for capital assistance to private companies for the next fiscal year is $58,858,487.

The hon. member also said:

> I should like to know the largest amount advanced to any one company last year, and the name of that company.

The records of the comptroller's branch show that the largest amount actually paid to any company during the past fiscal year was the sum of $6,946,241.75 to the John Inglis Company Limited of Toronto. There is nothing in the information I have here to show whether that amount was wholly or partly paid on account of the Canadian government or the British government. I understand that the Minister of Munitions and Supply has that information, or at least he has the information as to the commitments made in respect of the Canadian government and the commitments made on behalf of the British government.

The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) asked for quite extensive information. I have the information here; it covers several pages and to read it would weary the committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What does that relate to?

Mr. ILSLEY: To borrowings—how much has been borrowed from the public, how much from the chartered banks, the rate of interest, and so on. Perhaps it would serve the hon. member's purpose if I put it on Hansard so that he can look at it, and then if he wishes to discuss it he can do so on the bill, or later in this debate if we do not get beyond the resolution to-day.

Mr. QUELCH: That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. ILSLEY: The statement follows:

This stock was outstanding in the amount of £24,624,455 or $109,579,000 at the current rate of exchange.

Chartered Banks of Canada

Holdings of Dominion and Provincial Direct and Guaranteed Bonds

August 31, 1939	$1,187,217,015
December 31, 1940	1,288,439,598
Increase	$ 101,222,583

NOTE.—This increase of $101,222,583 does not reflect the issue of $250,000,000 1½% Notes sold to the chartered banks. $150,000,000 was delivered on January 2, 1941 and $100,000,000 was delivered on February 1, 1941.

Bank of Canada

Holdings of Dominion and Provincial Direct and Guaranteed Bonds

August 31, 1939	$163,096,387
February 19, 1941	565,925,771
Increase	$402,829,384

NOTE.—Of this amount of $402,829,384, there is an offset in the decrease of $253,507,331 of gold and foreign exchange sold to the Foreign Exchange Control Board.

NOTE.—The returns of the chartered banks and of the Bank of Canada do not show separately the holdings of dominion and provincial securities.

It is not possible to isolate the influence of these borrowings upon chartered bank deposits because bank deposits are affected by many other factors as well, such as changes in the volume of note circulation, current loans, etc. It is, however, possible to give figures showing the increase in deposits since the war began and in the volume of notes held by the public, which is the other major constituent of the total volume of money.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Monthly Averages in Millions of Dollars

	August, 1939	December, 1940	Increase
Canadian deposits of chartered banks.....	2,532	2,718	186
Bank of Canada and chartered bank note circulation*..	207	347	140
	2,739	3,065	326

* Bank of Canada notes in the hands of the public plus total chartered bank note circulation. Bank holdings of chartered bank notes are, however, small and showed virtually no change over the period in question.

The December figures are the most recent available but the $250 millions of notes which the dominion government has sold to the banks since that time would, other things being equal, increase Canadian deposits by the same amount.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Last evening I asked the Minister of National Defence for Air, in the absence of his colleague the Minister of National Defence, for the figures in relation to the thirty-day military training plan. Could I be supplied with those figures?

Mr. RALSTON: There was a slight confusion with regard to what my hon. friend asked for. He mentioned the thirty-day training plan, and then he mentioned the National Resources Mobilization Act. What he asked first was the amount spent in the present fiscal year under the National Resources Mobilization Act in connection with the thirty-day training period. Then last night he broke it down somewhat and asked for further particulars. He asked for the amount allocated to the scheme out of the 1940 appropriation, to be spent (a) by the Department of National Defence, and (b) by War Services; also how far the activities of War Services go, and the expenditure in that respect before these men are handed over to National Defence for training.

I think the best I can do this afternoon on the information I have here is to lay on the table of the house and send to my hon. friend a copy of two statements. One is the expenditures paid or incurred under the National Resources Mobilization Act to December 31, 1940.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): By what department?

Mr. RALSTON: National Defence. The second is the cost of ordnance stores issued in connection with the National Resources Mobilization Act.

With regard to National War Services, I know what my hon. friend has said and I understand he has already received from National War Services some statements in regard to expenditure incurred. The point he made last night was that transportation did not seem to be included.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They told me they had not the figures.

Mr. RALSTON: I have just spoken to my colleague the Minister of National War Services and I think he will be able to complete that if there are further figures to be given.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Could the minister answer the question asked last night, whether the Ministry of National War Services pays the transportation up to the time these men are handed to the training centre, and the transportation back, or is the latter included in National Defence? We do not want it in twice.

Mr. RALSTON: I must say I had not noticed my hon. friend's question until I came in. I had the impression that National Defence pays transportation from the camps; I should like to verify that. The amount in the statement which my hon. friend will see is something like $197,000 for transportation. That amount has been paid or incurred by National Defence, and when my hon. friend gets the particulars from National War Services the question will be answered.

The hon. member for Cumberland asked for the total expenditures or total payments made regarding the Debert military camp and airport.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I said I should like the total expenditures and total commitments—I am quoted as saying "payments". What I asked for was the total expenditures and total commitments.

Mr. RALSTON: I thought my hon. friend might have that in mind. The situation is that it is difficult, and perhaps misleading, to attempt to give total commitments. Total expenditures, particularly for labour, which my hon. friend will recognize is a very large part of this, are returned pretty promptly; that is to say the labour is paid for by cheque from Halifax and the amount can be obtained promptly. With regard to materials there is some delay, as my hon. friend intimated last night. There are at least two reasons for that delay, and perhaps others. One is the fact that sometimes the receipt for the actual material, as received by the engineer, is not forwarded as promptly as it should be to the paying or checking authority. There has been a heavy burden of work on the engineer. The other is the fact that sometimes—and here I mention the department of my colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply—the notice of acceptance of the tender, which contains particulars of the material which is to be supplied and the price for which the contract has been let, does not go forward in sufficient time to be received by the engineer on the ground, and he has to wait until he receives it in order that he may check the material received with the specifications which were required in accordance with the acceptance of tender; so that there may be some delay in that way.

I think the only practical thing to give my hon. friend is the actual payments which have been made up to a fixed date, I will say up to January 31; I think I can give that to him. I should like him to understand that commitments can only be estimates in most cases. There are two classes of commitments. There is such a thing as a commitment made when the article has been actually bought but payment has not been made. In that case we know definitely what is the price, but generally that is the smallest of the two classes. In the other class we put forward what we call a contract demand on the Department of Munitions and Supply, asking them to purchase certain articles for us. We have estimated that the cost may be so much. Whether that will be the cost or whether the cost will be greater or less depends on the tenders received by the Department of Munitions and Supply.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is hardly a commitment.

Mr. RALSTON: It can be a commitment only for the purpose of endeavouring, as best we can, to have the treasury officer note something opposite that particular vote as the estimated dollar obligation which will be incurred when that transaction is finally completed. Therefore I would prefer not to put those contract demands on record. I could do it easily enough, I suppose, but I do not think it would give my hon. friend very much information.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Along with the actual disbursements as of January 31 would the minister be prepared to give an estimate of the amount his department believes will be required in order to complete the whole project at Debert, in order that we might have the total contemplated expenditure on that whole project?

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You do not mean the pay of the soldiers; you mean the cost of building the camp?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Just the cost of developing the camp itself.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not mind giving an estimate. My hon. friend understands what an estimate is. They do their best, but as my hon. friend can understand services may be added afterwards which throw the estimate out, and naturally I do not want any reflections on the engineers because their target has been overshot or they have not succeeded in keeping within the estimate given.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With that reservation understood, could the minister give the figure?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes; I have a figure in mind now. I can tell my hon. friend now that from the information I get the Debert camp may cost $5,500,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does that include the airport?

Mr. RALSTON: No, that does not include the airport.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How much more for that?

Mr. RALSTON: The airport, of course, is in addition. It must be understood, of course, that with the possibility of changes in requirements such a figure has to be more in the nature of what one of the officers in my department calls a "guesstimate" instead of an estimate. We try however to see that it is at least an intelligent guess based on whatever probabilities can be reasonably foreseen.

Mr. POWER: I have the figures with respect to the Debert airport, with the same reservation that was made by the Minister of National Defence. The estimated sum required for the buildings at Debert is $829,517. I have not the figure in connection with the runways, but I would say they would cost probably another $150,000 or $200,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is about $1,000,000 altogether.

Mr. POWER: Yes, I would say about a million. It may be that Debert will be still further developed during the course of the coming summer, in which case the expenditure will be very much greater. The buildings are completed; the runways will be completed about April 1.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That includes all the hangars?

Mr. POWER: Yes, the buildings include the hangars.

Mr. RALSTON: Just to complete the matter referred to by the leader of the opposition, in connection with the expenses paid or incurred under the National Resources Mobilization Act, and for the benefit of hon. members, I should like to place this statement on Hansard:

Department of National Defence

Expenditures paid or incurred under National Resources Mobilization Act to December 31, 1940

	Expenditures paid or incurred
	Non-recurring	Recurring
Civil salaries and wages		$ 14,621 83
Pay and allowances		5,889,784 54
Travel, transport and freight		197,076 43
Operating expenses of properties		560,943 33
Construction and repairs	$9,126,607 73	138,983 87
Clothing and miscellaneous stores (laundry)		256,128 99
Mechanical and water transport		32,807 00
Supplies, food and forage		1,508,264 11
Medical stores and services		82,819 00
Dental stores and services		10,287 00
Printing and stationery		11,615 16
Sundries		30,315 00
	$9,126,607 73	$8,733,646 26

Statement of Cost of Ordnance Stores issued in connection with the National Resources Mobilization Act to December 31, 1940

	Estimated cost
	Non-recurring	Recurring
Clothing issued to trainees	$2,700,600	$ 610,800
Clothing issued to permanent training staff	539,000
Web equipment, water bottles, respirators and anti-gas stores	711,350
Barrack and miscellaneous stores	1,020,000
Total	$4,970,950	$ 610,800

The committee will understand that one cannot separate the cost of the so-called thirty day training scheme from the cost of the four months plan; that is to say, the same equipment, the same buildings, the same staff and the same ordnance stores and other items will be used. We have endeavoured as far as possible to make a rough separation by means of the classifications "recurring" and "non-recurring."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I used that only as a descriptive term.

Mr. RALSTON: These establishments are available for whatever training plan may be carried on.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then there are the figures from the Department of National War Services.

Mr. RALSTON: The Minister of National War Services gives me this statement of payments by his department. The amount shown with regard to transportation, to which my hon. friend referred, is only $87.43, but the minister tells me that this was the amount actually paid out to December 31. The commitment in this respect is $170,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does that include the cost of landing trainees at the centres?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Where is shown the cost of sending them back home?

Mr. RALSTON: That is in the statement I just gave, $197,076.43.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then what we were speculating about last night is correct; War Services delivers them to the training centres and National Defence pays their way home, so there is no duplication.

Mr. RALSTON: These figures are as follows:

Department of National War Services

Recruiting

Expenditure to December 31, 1940

Administration at Ottawa—
Salaries	$ 5,008 58
Printing and stationery	1,292 11
Telegrams	974 44
Sundry	927 87
		$ 8,193 00
Administration at administrative divisions—
Salaries	$ 96,462 82
Fees and allowances	2,527 00
Travelling expenses	1,861 26
Telegrams	824 90
Telephones	1,581 01
Sundry	1,081 80
		$ 104,338 79
Medical		33,760 00
Transportation		87 43
Meals		1 00
		$ 146,380 22

To that must be added the commitment for transportation, $170,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am glad to have this information. I shall study it and return to the question a little later. I may ask the minister for a further break-down, but I am obliged for what he has given so far.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: With further reference to the question which the Minister of Finance has just answered, I should like to know how many private companies in Canada have received advances during the past year, the names of the companies to whom the advances have been made, and the amounts.

Mr. HOWE: Does the hon. member wish to have the names on Hansard?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should think so.

Mr. HOWE: It is rather a long list; it would take half an hour to read it.

Alberta Nitrogen Company, ammonia, Calgary. The estimated expenditure is $10,110,000, and there is a second commitment with the same company for $207,750.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Are these figures capital advances as opposed to what last evening were referred to as advances for operating purposes?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. My hon. friend has received from the Minister of Finance actual payments; I am giving now a list of all commitments the government has both for its own account and for British account for capital expenditures.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Will the minister divide them as between dominion and United Kingdom accounts?

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. HOWE: Yes. The two expenditures I have given represent a joint account, one-third Canadian and two-thirds United Kingdom.

The next is Algoma Steel Corporation Limited. There is a commitment of $527,333, United Kingdom.

Aluminum Goods Limited, Toronto, $4,500, Canadian.

Anaconda American Brass, Limited, New Toronto, $2,290,000, Canadian. There is a second commitment with the same company of $150,000, also Canadian.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is that the Atlas steel company?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. These latter are joint, 50 per cent United Kingdom and 50 per cent Canadian.

Goldie and McCulloch Company, Limited, Galt, $246,957, United Kingdom.

W. H. Banfield and Son, Limited, Toronto, $128,325, United Kingdom.

I could give the purposes for which these expenditures are made. Does the hon. member wish to have that information?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It would add to the value of the information.

Mr. HOWE: There is another for the Bata Shoe Company, Frankford, for gauges for ·5 inch twin mounting, mark IV guns, $136,600, United Kingdom account.

Beatty Brothers, Limited Fergus, 25-pounder primer No. 1, mark II, $61,108, United Kingdom account.

Boeing Aircraft of Canada, Limited, $87,698, Canadian account; another for $29,940, Canadian account; another for $1,442,000, Canadian account; another for $438,000, Canadian account; and another for $27,400, Canadian account. That is the list for Boeing, all for the manufacture of aeroplanes and for overhauling work.

British Aeroplane Engines, Limited, Montreal, overhauling of Rolls Royce engines, $6,949, Canadian.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is that for plant or work?

Mr. HOWE: That is for additional equipment in the plant.

Brown Boggs Foundry and Machine Company, Limited, Hamilton. This was for assistance in obtaining machinery, and the amount is $65,000, which is repayable. I understand it has been repaid, so that it is not really a capital expenditure.

Acme Screw and Gear Company Limited, 27 and 28 pistols for aircraft bombs, $457,155, Canadian account. There is another for the same company for 40 mm. shell fuse, 251, $135,726, United Kingdom account, and another for $959,655, United Kingdom account.

Chemical Construction Corporation, Niagara Falls, ammonia, ammonium nitrate and special chemicals, $14,535,431, United Kingdom account.

My hon. friend will realize that I have not reached the bottom of the "C's". Does he really want this information now?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is the only time and place that we can get it. I am not asking the minister to read them all, provided he can put them on Hansard. We would then have an opportunity to study this information. I serve notice upon the government that we intend to go into all these expenditures.

Mr. HOWE: That is quite all right, but it is a little hard on the voice to read them. Does my hon. friend wish me to continue, or shall I put them on Hansard?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not want the minister to read them if they can be placed on Hansard.

Mr. HOWE: I cannot put this on Hansard, but I shall have a list made up which can be placed upon Hansard.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We would not be able to close the committee because we would not know what we were going to get. The fact is that the information is not in the shape in which it could be placed upon Hansard.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This is only one part of the resolution.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There will be a lot more.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): We could go on with something else.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We started on this.

Mr. HOWE: Cockshutt Plow Company, Limited, Brantford, 25-pounder shell machining, $313,288, United Kingdom account.

Defence Industries Limited, desalaberry island, Quebec, cannon powder, rifle powder, DNT, TNT and tetryl, $18,670,973, United Kingdom.

Defence Industries Limited, Shawinigan Falls, hexachlorethane, $284,375, United Kingdom account.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is that a subsidiary of Canadian Industries Limited?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, of the war industries. They have been segregated under Defence Industries Limited.

Defence Industries Limited, Winnipeg, cordite, $9,035,000, United Kingdom account.

Defence Industries Limited, Pickering, Ontario, and Ste. Therese, ammunition filling plants, $15,000,000, joint account, $\frac{7}{8}$ths United Kingdom, $\frac{1}{8}$th Canadian.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the plant at Pickering in operation?

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. HOWE: Not yet. Ground was broken about a month ago and it takes a little longer than that to get into operation.

Mr. MacNICOL: My information was that the ground had only been broken.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is an advance.

Mr. MacNICOL: The whole amount would not be an advance.

Mr. HOWE: Defence Industries Limited, Beloeil, Quebec, propellants for test purposes, $75,000, Canadian account.

Defence Industries Limited, Windsor, Ont., for carbamite, $200,000, Canadian account, with some United Kingdom participation.

Defence Industries, Limited, Montreal, ·303 small arms ammunition, detonators, fuses, gains, $8,619,413, for United Kingdom account. In that case there has been an accountable advance for working capital to the top limit of $3,350,000.

Defence Industries, Limited, Verdun, P.Q., small arms ammunition, $675,000, United Kingdom account.

DeHavilland Aircraft Company of Canada, Limited, West Toronto, aeroplane fuselages, $130,000, Canadian account. The same company, the principal overhaul depot, $136,239, Canadian account. The same company, manufacture of Anson fuselages, machinery and assembly, $767,875, Canadian account.

Dominion Bridge Company Limited, Montreal, 3·7 and 4-inch shell cartridge cases, $83,850, Canadian account. Dominion Bridge Company, Limited, Montreal—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister allow me a question? Was it necessary to make that advance to a great company like the Dominion Bridge? Surely they can finance anything. Or is it more advantageous to have it done so? It may ease matters for the minister if he would just give us a brief explanation. Why does the Dominion Bridge company require this, or was it thrust upon them? I do not suppose it was thrust upon them. They are a big corporation; they can go to the banks and get all the money they want. Is it easier for them to do it that way than to take the money out of their own treasury or go to their own bankers, or what?

Mr. HOWE: I may say that we try to place all the business we can with plants which furnish their own facilities. We exhaust that possibility first. We then try to induce private plants to install the facilities that we require; and arrangements have been made through the establishment of the war contracts depreciation board to permit accelerated depreciation on capital expenditures for war purposes. We exhaust that possibility. But where machinery has no possible post-war use, as in the case of shell-making machinery, we have adopted a policy, in agreement with the British government, that we take our depreciation at the start, pay for the machinery, and get our output at cost. Particularly where joint account is involved we have largely followed that procedure.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister elaborate on output at cost? Just how would that be referable, say, to this advance to the Dominion Bridge company?

Mr. HOWE: This machinery is segregated in a separate building. It is operated as a separate operation. We have a treasury officer in the plant, and the price of the product is kept in proportion to the cost plus and agreed profit.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): So you get it at cost, and they get a small profit?

Mr. HOWE: That is it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the size of the profit? Two per cent, or five?

Mr. HOWE: Usually, about three per cent, depending on the size of the operation. Obviously, for a small operation, the percentage must be higher, and for a large operation it is often lower.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That answers the question.

Mr. COCKERAM: Is a treasury officer employed in every one of these plants?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, a treasury cost accountant. The cost accountants are employed by the treasury, not by the Department of Munitions and Supply.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is for the protection of the treasury?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Thank you.

Mr. HOWE: Another, for the Dominion Bridge company, for 25-pound shell cartridge cases, $350,175. Another, for the same company, 3·7 shell cartridge cases, $1,505,195. For the Dominion Bridge company, Montreal, 2-pounder guns, mark VIII, $4,000,000, United Kingdom account.

Dominion Engineering company, Lachine, for manufacture of machine tools, $800,000, Canadian account. Another, for the same company, 6-pounder anti-aircraft guns, $6,232,000, Canadian account. Another, for the same company, for 2-pounder mark VII mountings, $180,000, for United Kingdom account. Another, for 2-pounder anti-tank guns and mechanisms, mark X, $4,435,507; that is 25 per cent Canadian and 75 per cent United Kingdom.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask the minister a question there? In the case of a large amount like that—and I have in mind some other amounts which were mentioned a few moments ago—to factories to which large additions are being erected, after the war is over those additions will still be there. How is that going to be taken care of? Does the government pay for the full addition to the plant—bricks, mortar, steel, roofing and so forth, including the machinery in the plant; and then, after the war, while the machinery will belong to the government, what about the buildings or the additions to the buildings?

Mr. HOWE: I may say that in practically all cases, before we will build an extension to a plant we acquire the land on which the extension is built; we build the building; we own the building and the land on which it stands, for such disposition as we may care to make after the war.

Mr. MacNICOL: In the case of one plant I have in mind, a very, very large plant which has been allotted a considerable sum of money, the addition, while large, is small in comparison with the whole plant. That addition was built on land belonging to the company. Does the government acquire the land which at present belongs to the company, and then build an addition up against the main plant?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. It is a condition of building on company land that the land on which we build, with suitable access to it, is deeded or leased to the government for a nominal sum for a considerable period of time. If my hon. friend will mention the plant he has in mind, I think I can tell him the arrangement.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am sure that the minister can, but I do not want to mention the plant.

Mr. HOWE: Dominion Forge and Stamping Company, Limited, Walkerville, 25-pounder shell forgings, $93,600, United Kingdom account.

Dominion Foundries and Steel Company, Limited, Hamilton, heat-treating and straightening armour plate, $723,535, Canadian account. Another for Dominion Foundries and Steel Company, Hamilton, 3·7 loose barrel forgings, $994,405, joint account, 50 per cent British and 50 per cent Canadian.

Dominion Rubber Company, Limited, Kitchener, toolings for tires, $163,469. Also, with the same company, tool-produced special sand tires, $67,632, for United Kingdom account.

Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation, New Glasgow, 4-inch single mountings, and 4-inch twin mountings, naval, $3,500,000, for United Kingdom account.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the date of that?

Mr. HOWE: I cannot give the exact date offhand, but it was about October, perhaps earlier, September.

Dunlop Tire & Rubber Goods Company, Limited, Toronto, gunfire and brake control equipment and relay controlled valves, $44,000 for Canadian account. Another contract with the same company for military tires, $8,825, for Canadian account.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is that the Dunlop company in Toronto?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. Another for the Dunlop company, Toronto, for tires, $6,195, for Canadian account. Another with the same company for $3,200, and another for $148,500, both for Canadian account.

Mr. HAZEN: Were all these amounts advanced in the last fiscal year?

Mr. HOWE: No. The amounts actually advanced in cash were given by the minister. They represent not more than 15 or 20 per cent of the total.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But they are made out of the war appropriation of 1940, are they not?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, but I am giving now the total commitments, what we are committed to on capital account.

Mr. MacNICOL: For a particular function?

Mr. HOWE: Capital account for producing munitions of war.

Mr. MacNICOL: It does not necessarily mean that it has all been advanced.

Mr. HOWE: Oh, no.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Does it include some working capital too?

Mr. HOWE: No; these are purely for capital account.

Mr. HAZEN: How much has actually been advanced?

Mr. HOWE: The minister gave that figure a short time ago, $48,749,000. The totals I am giving now represent $112,013,323 for British account, $88,651,576 for Canadian account, and $106,453,775 for joint account, making a total commitment of $307,118,674.

Mr. GREEN: Is that to be the complete programme, or are there further commitments?

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. HOWE: Those are the commitments to date. We get requests from time to time from the United Kingdom for additional capacity here, and if it is possible to provide capacity here we go ahead and provide it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is provided for by this resolution?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: But this is intended to be the bulk of the programme, is it?

Mr. HOWE: No, I would not say that. It is the commitments we have actually made to date. We have other things in contemplation, other things under the programme referred to here. We have certain commitments which we are studying in connection with working out plastics.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Does the list from which the minister is reading include commitments or advances for industries or establishments wholly government owned, or is it assistance or advances only to privately owned enterprises?

Mr. HOWE: No. You mean assistance to wholly owned government companies?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Yes.

Mr. HOWE: Those are in the nature of a revolving fund. There is no government company which itself has assets.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): These are advances which the government is making to private concerns to meet production?

Mr. HOWE: That is right.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Does the list from which the minister is reading include advances or commitments to Federal Aircraft or an estimate of what will be required to carry out the programme allotted to Federal Aircraft?

Mr. HOWE: No; but I shall qualify that in a moment. Federal Aircraft is not a manufacturing company. It is a company that designs and supplies requirements, but the actual manufacturing is done in privately owned plants, and the advances to privately owned plants are here. Except for a small manufacturing enterprise which Federal Aircraft are conducting with their own facilities, and which is included here, the advances go to the manufacturing companies. Federal Aircraft simply makes the contracts with the privately owned companies.

Mr. GREEN: Does this expenditure of approximately $310,000,000 cover the total expenditure by the Canadian and British governments in Canada for plant and equipment?

Mr. HOWE: The total commitments.

Mr. GREEN: I mean the total expenditures and commitments.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What portion of that $307,000,000 will ultimately be repayable by the companies to whom the advances are being made?

Mr. HOWE: I would say, roughly, none of it. We are creating assets which we own and are recoverable from the plants which we own.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Has the minister an estimate of the value of the assets at the present time?

Mr. HOWE: The assets at the present time are the figures I am giving you. What they will be after the war, perhaps you can give me.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister said a moment ago that depreciation was taken off machinery and assets immediately.

Mr. HOWE: It is taken off immediately because we pay for the assets. In other words, so far as the government is concerned, the firm has no depreciation to write off because the asset is paid for. That is called taking the depreciation immediately. When the government pays for a thing holus-bolus, the manufacturer has no value left to depreciate.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What proportion of this $307,000,000 represents machinery written off immediately?

Mr. HOWE: Written off immediately by whom.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is the statement the minister made.

Mr. HOWE: Let me try to explain it as simply as I can. We will say we wish to have a manufacturer build a plant to manufacture shells. There are two ways in which this can be done. The manufacturer can create the asset, pay for the plant and equipment. The machinery at least would have no post-war value, or very little, because it is a specialized process requiring specialized tools. Obviously, under these circumstances the government should permit the manufacturer to depreciate his plant during the war perhaps to nothing or perhaps to some definite figure. Provision is made in the revenue act to cover cases where the manufacturer has installed the plant at his own expense, so that there will be a depreciation cost, which would naturally be added to the price of the product.

Then we take the alternative case; the government pays for the building and for the machinery. The government is also the purchaser of the product. In that case there is no depreciation charge to the government.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the government operate the plant?

Mr. HOWE: No. We own it. In other words, the private operator cannot charge depreciation on a plant for which he did not pay. That is what we call taking the depreciation at the start. In that case the product is sold to the government more cheaply than the situation would be with a privately owned plant which bought and paid for its equipment.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): One hundred per cent depreciation is charged up to the initial order? Then the department would be in a more favourable position with regard to any future orders.

Mr. HOWE: We could say that, but we take the depreciation in any event. We say this plant is built for our exclusive use, and we prefer to depreciate it when we build it.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): The minister is referring to equipment furnished to a private industry. That means that the initial order bears the total depreciation.

Mr. JACKMAN: When do you write off the capital cost?

Mr. HOWE: Assuming we are the buyer of the product, we write off the capital cost when we install the machinery. We write it off against nothing; we simply write it off. We own the asset; we pay for it. We say to the operator: you are using our property; therefore you cannot depreciate it.

Mr. GREEN: These are state arsenals owned by the government?

Mr. HOWE: That is right.

Mr. GREEN: And operated by private companies?

Mr. HOWE: That is right.

Mr. GREEN: In every case? Have we any state arsenals operated by the government except those that we had before the war?

Mr. HOWE: We have the Quebec arsenal, which has been greatly enlarged, and the Lindsay arsenal. Those, I think, are the only two we operate directly.

Mr. GREEN: And Valcartier.

Mr. HOWE: Yes. I think that is all.

Mr. GREEN: The policy is for the state to own the arsenal but for that arsenal to be operated by a private firm?

Mr. HOWE: Right.

Mr. ISNOR: What method has the minister of comparing the cost of production in government owned and privately owned munitions plants, if in the one case the entire depreciation is charged at the beginning and, in the other, it is extended over a period of six to ten years? There is a heavy charge borne by the private manufacturer that is not borne by the government.

Mr. HOWE: We have the costs in each plant. We take out the depreciation item and compare the costs for similar work in the two plants. But we appreciate, and the United Kingdom government appreciate that there are two classes of manufacture, one in which either they or we have created the asset and the other where we are using private facilities and the cost includes a depreciation charge. Naturally the plants that have to include a depreciation charge, generally speaking show higher costs than plants where there is no depreciation charge.

Mr. MacNICOL: Can the minister give the committee any information as to the relative cost, say of the 4·5 shell made in a plant the cost of which was wholly advanced by the government, and where the machines are also paid for by the government, as against the cost of the same shell made in a plant owned by a private company?

Mr. HOWE: I do not think that situation exists. I do not think there are any 4·5 shells being made.

Mr. MacNICOL: I just used that arbitrarily.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What the hon. member is asking is whether private manufacturers make them cheaper than the government shops.

Mr. HOWE: Private manufacturers are making them in any event. While we own the factory, it was designed and laid out by a private firm and the private firm operates it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): On what basis, a management fee or cost plus?

Mr. HOWE: Ordinarily on a management fee basis.

Mr. COCKERAM: There are some items of equipment being made in government arsenals and similar equipment made in private factories?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. COCKERAM: How do the costs compare in those cases?

Mr. HOWE: I do not know that I can compare them. The cost of small arms and ammunition, which is the big item in the arsenal product, depends on volume. At the moment the arsenal is turning out much more than any private plant, and I think its costs are lower. In my opinion, the arsenals are very efficiently operated.

Mr. MacNICOL: During the great war a large number of plants all over the country, small plants owned by individuals and large company plants, were making shells. To-day the government is building many of the plants to make the shells in. Are shells that are being made in privately owned plants, if there are any, costing as much as or more than shells made in the wholly government owned plants?

Mr. HOWE: It is difficult to compare shell making in this war with shell making in the last war. In the last war it was in a way Canada's major contribution in the munitions line. We are actually making more shells in this war than in the last, but doing it in a very few plants. The operation has changed; it is more highly mechanized. I do not think we have any plant where the government has not furnished the equipment; no plant in the country would have that specialized type of equipment which is used for shell making. I think in every case the government has installed the equipment, and in a few cases it has financed the building. I do not think the case of a wholly privately owned plant exists in the country to-day.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In view of the fact that the government is following this policy, should there not be some decentralization by the establishment of factories in western Canada—and for the moment I am speaking particularly of Saskatchewan. Recently there was a dispatch in the papers to the effect that three chemical factories were to be established by the dominion government, one to be located in Saskatchewan. Is the minister prepared to say now whether the government intends to go ahead this year under this appropriation with the construction of those chemical factories, and, if so, when they will proceed?

Mr. HOWE: I have stated at each time these chemical factories were mentioned that I have never heard of them and have never been able to find any of my staff who know anything about them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is interesting. Perhaps it is the information bureau that has fallen down.

Mr. HOWE: No; I do not think the information bureau is responsible for these news articles about projected plants. Of course we get inquiries from time to time from the United Kingdom government as to whether we can produce certain chemicals for their account, and, if so, under what conditions and at what cost. We investigate that, and no doubt someone has explored the matter of manufacture of chemicals on the prairies. It is also possible that the financial part of the transaction did not appeal to the British government; I cannot say; I have no personal knowledge about that, but I make the statement on the theory that so many press dispatches must have had some basis in fact, though I have no idea what the basis was. I have made this statement in the house at least three times.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Take the cordite plant which is being built near Winnipeg. That is being built for the account of the British government, is it not?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a D.I.L. operation, is it not?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In ordinary circumstances the material that will be produced at that cordite plant near Winnipeg will have to be transported to the Atlantic coast and shipped overseas. That is the intention?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That plant could have been constructed more efficiently on the Atlantic coast, but it was established in Winnipeg absolutely for local considerations.

Mr. HOWE: Not at all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have it right from a member of the Manitoba government that they pressed for it and got it.

Mr. HOWE: I deny that absolutely, though I do not deny that they pressed for it. I had nothing to do with that plant, but Mr. Harold Crabtree, who had the responsibility, and his board of directors reported to me that this was the economical location for it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Certainly I would be impressed with anything Mr. Crabtree said; make no mistake about that. I do not think he would say it unless he believed it, and he would not believe it unless he had some practical basis for that belief. I want to make that statement right here and now. But I do know that pressure was brought to bear upon the government to build that cordite plant, or some other kind of industrial plant, in Manitoba in order to help relieve the unemployment situation in Winnipeg; and there is nothing wrong about that. But if you are going to use one province or one community in that way you must have regard to other communities. Until very recently less than four per cent of the government contracts were let in the maritime provinces. That does not include contracts the Dominion Iron and Steel company of the time at Sydney had for the account of the British government, which kept them busy one hundred per cent; but it was only with the greatest difficulty that contracts were obtained for execution in the maritime provinces, where they were needed very badly, for material that was to be shipped overseas. Just take the situation in Amherst, about which we will hear a little more after we have had the minister's report in regard to Avro-Anson production. During the last election the minister went down there. I have not the story directly, but my colleague has it; he knows what the minister said.

Mr. HOWE: Went where?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I will have to qualify that; it was either the minister to whom I am speaking now or one of his colleagues. It may have been the late Mr. Rogers, but whoever it was he promised the people of Amherst during the last election that the Amherst plant of the Canadian Car company would be used for the purpose of assembling Anson planes.

Mr. HOWE: My colleague who has been referred to is no longer with us, but I can say this, that at the time of the last election there was no suggestion of any kind that Avro-Anson planes would be built in this country, or any thought of building them. The idea of building Avro-Anson planes dates from June last. That was the first time we ever thought of it.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I do not want to hold the minister responsible—

Mr. HOWE: Better not quote dead men.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): All I am asking, and all the people of Amherst are asking, is results. There was a commitment made by the minister by a telegram—an old method of campaigning which I would not attribute to him—which was read at a large political meeting. I have not the wording of that telegram, but the meeting was held I think early in March, a year ago, and that telegram made a commitment to the town of Amherst.

Mr. HOWE: What commitment?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): That aeroplanes would be built in the town of Amherst.

Mr. HOWE: Not Avro-Ansons, though.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I would not say definitely whether it was aeroplanes of that type, but the minister was on the platform and that telegram was read by the local candidate. I do not know whether it was the Minister of Finance; I rather believe it was the late Minister of National Defence, Mr. Rogers. I do not want to hold the Minister of Munitions and Supply responsible for that; all I ask, and all that the people of Amherst ask, is that we get results in accordance with the undertaking given prior to that time, at that time and since that time, under which very considerable expenditures were made by the town of Amherst.

Mr. HOWE: Since my hon. friend is making his demand perhaps I had better make mine. I would ask that the town of Amherst turn out the aeroplanes we have given them. At the moment there is a considerable pile-up of Anson machines awaiting assembly there. We need those machines very badly, and if my hon. friend could use his influence with the people he represents to have a few more men put to work in that plant so that these machines might be turned out, I should be greatly obliged.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That's right; if Canadian Car is at fault let us know about it.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): The town of Amherst has made a splendid record in the assembling of these advanced training planes for the air force, but I believe that the work might be still further expedited. I am told that some of these planes lack the necessary engines and that other integral parts are missing. Until those parts are supplied the assembling of these aeroplanes cannot be completed. I believe this plant, and the citizens of the town of Amherst, have cooperated in every way possible; their record up to the present time is a splendid one, and they could do ten times the work of building aeroplanes that they have been permitted to do up to the present time. Again I say I do not want to censure or blame the department of the minister, but there has been great disappointment and many misgivings in my constituency, as well as all over Nova Scotia and the maritime provinces, because of the delay in carrying out the contemplated programme with respect to advanced training planes. The minister has promised an explanation of the delay, which I am awaiting anxiously. These planes represent a most urgent war necessity, and we down there want to do everything possible to expedite the carrying out of this programme.

Mr. GREEN: Before the minister carries on I should like to put the picture before him with perhaps a little broader background. He has told us to-day that there are commitments totalling $310,000,000 for plant and equipment in Canada to be financed partly by Great Britain and partly by Canada. The minister will admit that the great bulk of that plant and equipment is being put up in Ontario and the western portion of Quebec; the minister told me that in so many words last November. There may or may not have been good reasons for that at that time, but the fact is that because of this governmental policy the industries of Canada are being concentrated in central Canada, and the economy of this country is being made very lopsided. It was lopsided enough before, but this policy is making it just that much worse.

The minister told me a few minutes ago that there will be more commitments, and the impression I get is that there will be commitments amounting to many additional millions. I suggest to him that the time has come when this question of establishing war industries in Canada should be looked at from the point of view of the outlying parts of the country, both the maritimes on the east and the prairies and the Pacific coast province of British Columbia on the west. There is not so much work there; there is more unemployment. I do not need to go into the details. Hon. members know what it will mean to have these plants all operating in the central part of the country. Nothing would help the war effort of the nation more than to have the government announce as their policy that from now on they will locate many more plants in the eastern and western parts of Canada.

Mr. HOWE: No one is more anxious than I am to distribute plants, but when a study of plants is made, either for British account or for Canadian account, there are certain requirements that must be taken into consideration, and one of these is power—the source and the cost of power. My hon. friend (Mr. Hanson) is complaining about there being no plants in New Brunswick. I am trying to locate a plant there now and the only way is to get power transmitted from a power plant in Quebec to the area where the operations are to be carried on.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Where is that, Campbellton?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course Campbellton is not within the area in New Brunswick covered by the hydro scheme. We are developing power from slack coal at the mines at Minto, distributable over a very considerable area, a good deal more cheaply than hydro. At any rate that is my information. The Campbellton area is not served by that development, and whatever power they have must come from Metis. I regret it, but it is a physical fact that Campbellton, being on the border of Quebec, is not served by power in New Brunswick. We can however develop power from coal in New Brunswick to take care of substantial war requirements if the minister will be good enough to let us have some industries down there. There is a dry dock in the city of Saint John, and I am glad to hear that for the account of the British government some freighters of moderate size will be built there. I hope that this policy will be extended. I wonder if we are to have from the Minister of National Defence for Naval Affairs, before consideration of this item is concluded, some statement of policy in that regard. If the matter comes under the minister who has just spoken, we can get the information from him. What about Canada building some freighters on her own account? This is a large subject which I do not wish to open up at this hour, but I have been giving it some thought and I hope the minister is thinking about it.

Mr. HOWE: There are certain requirements that have to be met with regard to plants. There are certain factors that often make it necessary to go to a certain location, because the facilities cannot be duplicated elsewhere. It is all right to say that you have potential power in New Brunswick. I know that New Brunswick is doing its best to increase its power supplies and has machinery for the purpose; nevertheless power is not immediately available in that area. So far as it has been possible, however, at some increased cost, provided the cost is not too high, we have distributed plants. My hon. friend is wrong in saying that the Winnipeg plant was put there for political reasons.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I hardly went so far—to help the unemployment situation.

Mr. HOWE: I have not had one-tenth as much pressure from the government of Manitoba as I have had from the government of New Brunswick so far as that is concerned. We have people asking us in a nice way to build plants in certain places, and they are earnest in their request, but that is not pressure. We have not had pressure. We have had, from almost every community in Canada, requests to build airports, and there is nothing wrong with that. I only wish we could comply with every one of these requests, but airports are not located in that way any more than manufacturing plants are. We have had special studies made of each of the prairie provinces and of British Columbia to see what can be done.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister tell us what the situation is in British Columbia?

Mr. HOWE: A good deal of war work is being done there. There is a large chemical industry at Trail, put there at government expense. There are large buildings because power is available there.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Does the minister say there is a shortage of power there?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Why are we not manufacturing, then?

Mr. GREEN: I was referring to the question of power in British Columbia.

Mr. HOWE: There is power there, it is true, but there is no steel. Steel has to be brought from a great distance and some types of manufacturing will not stand the cost of transporting steel back and forth across the Rocky mountains.

Mr. GREEN: Does the minister think it is fair that the manufacturing industry of British Columbia should be penalized by that fact? Are we to be prevented from taking part in the manufacturing of war equipment because we are so far away? For that matter, there is no steel in Ontario.

Mr. MacNICOL: Steel is manufactured in Ontario. The Algoma Steel plant is to-day turning out 3,000 tons of iron ore per day.

Mr. HOWE: Two-thirds of the steel manufactured in Canada is manufactured in Ontario.

Mr. GREEN: I meant iron. There is no iron there.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes, there is.

Mr. HOWE: The Helen mine is one of the greatest producers of iron ore. Between the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) and myself we shall get the geography of the country straightened out.

Mr. GREEN: The situation is no laughing matter for the Pacific coast. I should like the minister to confirm the impression he left a minute ago, that the reason we are not getting more plants at the coast is that we are so far away and that it costs too much to transport the steel. He told me last November that it was lack of power. I want to know what the reason is so that something can be done to remedy the situation in our province.

Mr. HOWE: We are establishing in the hon. member's province the type of work the province is best able to do. We put in a great deal of machine tool work. Every machine shop in British Columbia is at present engaged in the making of lathes, shapers and machine tools. That is a type of work that does not involve the transportation of heavy steel back and forth. We are building a large plant for naval guns.

Mr. MacNICOL: Shipping barrels from Ontario.

Mr. HOWE: Yes. We are also obtaining in British Columbia three-quarters of the lumber requirements of the war. I have made an analysis before, and I think it holds true, showing that of all the provinces, British Columbia, on a per capita basis, is contributing more to the war effort than any province except Prince Edward Island.

Mr. GREEN: Yes, and a good deal of what we are shipping we were shipping before —for example, lumber. I do not want to get into any provincial fight over this question because the crisis is too serious for that. The fact is that the government is overlooking an opportunity to have war materials made on the coast. I believe this is largely due to the high freight rates. The only reason for the freight rate situation in British Columbia is that as a result of the war, vessels have been taken off the east to west coast run and the railroads have been allowed to jump up the freight rates. I suggest to the government that they arrange to place boats on this service in order to overcome this difficulty. There is no reason why we should not have plants there. Is this situation to affect our shipbuilding industry?

Mr. HOWE: There is a shipbuilding industry there.

Mr. GREEN: Are we to be prevented from taking a larger part in this work because of the rate charged by the railroads for carrying steel across Canada?

Mr. HOWE: We are referring to war production in British Columbia. I would remind my hon. friend that more ships are being built there at the present time than in any other province.

Mr. GREEN: It is the only province with completely ice-free harbours.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend wants to take advantage of geography in one instance and disregard it in the other. Ships are being built in British Columbia because of its geographical location, and shells are not being manufactured there because of geography. Freight rates have nothing to do with the situation; it is just geography. There is a considerable aircraft industry in that province.

Mr. GREEN: We do not pay money to geography, but we do pay it to the railways for freight rates.

Mr. HOWE: I think that province has the largest aircraft contract which has been given to any single plant.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It is only on paper. Where are aircraft being manufactured to-day in British Columbia?

Mr. HOWE: At two places.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: How many machines?

Mr. HOWE: Quite a few. I cannot give the correct number offhand.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Not very many.

Mr. HOWE: A plant in British Columbia is manufacturing the largest type of machine being made in Canada.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: On February 15 a contract was let with the Boeing aircraft company for $480,000 for the construction of a plant. Is it not correct that that company has manufactured only one small plane?

Mr. HOWE: No, it is not correct. I do not remember the size of the order, but I know we have got a good many more. This discussion is getting into a rather narrow field. The fact is that British Columbia is manufacturing ships because of its geographical location. The shipyards there are filled to capacity until the end of 1942.

Mr. GREEN: That is contrary to the story given me by the shipbuilders in British Columbia.

Mr. HOWE: Let me tell my hon. friend—

Mr. GREEN: They may be wrong.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GREEN: They may be wrong, but I am told there is no reason why we could not be building at least fifty merchant vessels on that coast. At the present moment I believe there are contracts for eight. I have the greatest respect for the minister; I believe he is working very hard at his job, but this thing should be looked into and if necessary there should be a change in policy. Another change which could be made, and which I think would help the whole of Canada, would be to have more manufacturing done in smaller plants throughout the country.

Mr. HOWE: Is the problem to distribute the work or is it to get production?

Mr. GREEN: May I finish my statement? Certain work could be divided up among smaller plants. I am told that this could be done at the coast, that one plant could do a certain job, another plant could do another job and then the product could be assembled. It might prove considerably cheaper to do it that way than to erect these huge plants. I am asking the minister to take this under consideration. Perhaps at the moment he cannot let us know what can be done, but I feel confident that if this change were made he would get rid of many of his problems

Mr. HOWE: I know of no small plant which has not more business than it can do at the moment. The smaller plants take subcontracts from the larger plants. Our aircraft industry is concentrated in seven or eight large centres, but the work is spread out in practically every town and village in the country. Almost every smaller machine shop can get all the work it wants to do.

Mr. GREEN: Not on the coast.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: If it is correct that a smaller plant can get all the work, how is it that in New Westminster a plant which could turn out a hundred thousand shells a month is not turning out one shell to-day?

Mr. HOWE: The trouble with that plant in New Westminster is that it has not the machinery or management. It is an empty building, and there are several empty buildings around the country.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: This company is headed by the most competent business men in the country. It is not a question of management.

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps I am talking about a different plant. My attention has been called to a plant in Vancouver which is being sold for taxes. I have tried to encourage someone to provide the necessary management and equipment in order that some war work might be undertaken.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: As a member of this house I can assure the minister that this plant does not happen to be in Vancouver. The hon. member for Vancouver South will be able to look after that matter. I am referring to the Heaps machine works in New Westminster, which is under the control of eight of probably the finest financial men in British Columbia. Mr. Churchill is demanding speed and more speed in furnishing equipment, and this plant is capable of turning out the necessary work. It is located on tidewater as well as on the railroads. It has the necessary equipment and the skilled labour is available, yet it is not turning out one shell.

Mr. HOWE: Is this plant capable of turning out any product other than shells?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It is the largest foundry in British Columbia. It is turning out a few lathes. They do need a few lathes in the province.

Mr. HOWE: Instead of turning out shells, it is turning out lathes. Apparently it is better suited to that particular production. It must be working on a government order if it is turning out lathes, because we are the only buyer of lathes in the market.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Why can they not get a government order?

Mr. HOWE: They have one if they are turning out lathes. It would be an order for the Citadel Merchandising company, which is a government-owned company.

Mr. REID: This particular plant was in liquidation, but about six months ago a new company was formed. They obtained extra property and installed new machinery. They came to Ottawa looking for orders for shells which they were prepared to manufacture. As the hon. member for Fraser Valley has pointed out, as yet they have received no order for shells. I join with the hon. member for Vancouver South in pleading with the minister to see that more war work is given to British Columbia. There is a Pacific as well as an Atlantic ocean, and no one can tell when we may have trouble on the Pacific. Hundreds of capable men are idle there.

Mr. GREEN: The minister told the committee that all these plants were working to capacity. I know that some machine shops in Vancouver are not working to capacity, even on an eight-hour shift, let alone on two or three shifts.

Mr. HOWE: Which one?

Mr. GREEN: I will check up and give the hon. gentleman the names.

Mr. MacNICOL: In the event of any British Columbia plant being used for, not making, but perhaps turning shells, will not the material of which the shells are composed have to be shipped from Ontario? As I understand it, all this material is made around Hamilton and Welland. What hon. members are asking is that the steel for making shells be shipped out to the west, and after being turned, out there, the shells will have to be shipped back east again.

Mr. COLDWELL: Much that has arisen out of the discussion this afternoon indicates a feeling of uneasiness in all parts of the house with respect to the Department of Munitions and Supply and its part in the war effort. This concern is directed particularly, I think, to the aircraft industry. I understand that certain reports have been made to the department. If we are to get a clear picture of the condition of the aircraft industry, these reports should be placed on the table of the house so that we can read them. I understand, for example, that a report has been made by one Ernest R. Breech, chairman of the board of the North American Aviation company, and that that report contains some pungent and vital criticisms of the aeroplane industry and of the department in relation to it. A short time ago I noticed that the Minister of National Defence for Air stated that the empire air training scheme could not be proceeded with at the rate that had been hoped for, on account of the fact that certain training planes were unavailable and that we would not be turning them out sufficiently—

Mr. POWER: I specifically stated that that had nothing to do with the production of Anson aeroplanes.

Mr. COLDWELL: Let me just finish.

Mr. POWER: I did not want the hon. member to get away with that.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister can correct me if I am wrong. The minister says that that has nothing to do with the Department of Munitions—

Mr. POWER: No, not at all. If the hon. member would listen to me he would hear what I said.

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, certainly his statement was to the effect that the third group, I think it was—I am speaking entirely from memory—could not begin and proceed with their training because we were short of the necessary training equipment.

Mr. POWER: If my hon. friend will permit me, I did add at that time that that delay was not due to the delay in the production of Canadian-built Anson aircraft; that they were not expected at this time.

Mr. COLDWELL: That may be so, but may I point this out—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): When does the minister expect them?

Mr. POWER: Pretty soon.

Mr. COLDWELL: In view of the condition which has developed across the sea during the last six or eight months, the situation in our own aeroplane industry, from all we can find out about it, is deplorable. I do not know the number of planes that is being turned out in the various plants, but I do know something of the condition of some of the plants in this country. The hon. member for Fraser Valley spoke a few minutes ago of the Boeing plant in British Columbia. I believe the statement he made is in accordance with the facts. We know something about the Malton plant near Toronto.

Mr. HOWE: What do you know about it?

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, we will tell the minister about it on Monday.

Mr. GARDINER: We may be here three hours to-night. Why not to-night?

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, to-night, if it is necessary. I said that because, a little earlier this afternoon, I was asked if we would agree to the house rising at six o'clock, to which I assented. That is why I made the suggestion that it be Monday.

The Minister of Munitions and Supply has told this house on more than one occasion that certain branches of our war effort and of the provision of supplies were in production and that we were away ahead of schedule; and then we find out that as a matter of fact we are not ahead of schedule, or, if we are, the schedule calls really for nothing at all and therefore we must be ahead of it. I am suggesting this. I believe that a number of reports have been made. I understand that there is a report to the minister on this particular matter from the war requirements board. If we are to discuss these matters intelligently, all these documents should be on the table of the house so that we can go into them. The time has come when this parliament has got to get at all the information. Some of us for the last six months—

Mr. GARDINER: What was the hon. member doing two years ago?

Mr. COLDWELL: What was I doing two years ago? I will answer that question.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Holding up all the estimates that had anything to do with it.

Mr. COLDWELL: I would like to say to the hon. member who interrupted me that we were adopting a realistic view of the situation as it then was—

Mr. GARDINER: A little foresight would have been better, with the situation as it then was.

Mr. COLDWELL: —and since then events have entirely changed the picture. As the minister knows, we had no confidence in those who had betrayed democracy and collective security all through the years, and until there was a change of government we feared that we might be involved in a struggle which was not for democracy. One of the reasons we are to-day supporting the war to one hundred per cent of our ability—and there is no group in this house that has a greater stake in the successful outcome of this war than the group for whom I am speaking this afternoon; make no mistake about that—

Mr. GARDINER: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Is he telling the committee that he was not in favour of the pacifist movement in this country for ten years prior to the opening of the war?

Mr. COLDWELL: I always took the position that the only security for a country like Canada was collective security.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): And no defence at all.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is the position I always took.

Mr. GARDINER: And no defence.

Mr. COLDWELL: And I always said that the best defence for Canada was to be found in the collective defence of the world. That was my position and it has been all through the years. I have been a member of the League of Nations society for many years, and that is the position I held.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, we will forgive you that.

Mr. COLDWELL: Let me tell the minister this: we shall have some form of collective security after this war, or we shall have no security at all. To-day we are trying to fight collectively for collective security.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Hear, hear. May I ask my hon. friend a question? Does he agree with me that collective security must mean also collective preparedness?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How long has the hon. gentleman been in favour of collective preparedness?

Mr. COLDWELL: I agree with the minister that collective security must be collective preparedness, and that our preparedness must include this thought, that war must not be used as an instrument of national policy but purely as an instrument to prevent war.

Mr. GARDINER: May I ask another question, Mr. Chairman? Did my hon. friend not say in this house in 1937—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GARDINER: —that he was opposed to any expenditure—

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): He can't take it.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member who has the floor is entitled to proceed unless he wants to answer a question.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not in the habit of interrupting anybody on the other side of the house—

Mr. GARDINER: You had better look up Hansard.

Mr. COLDWELL: —but I would tell the hon. member who said I "can't take it" that I can take it from him any time he cares to put it up to me.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): And I am speaking "collectively" too.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was saying when I was interrupted that there is no group in this house which has a greater stake in the successful outcome of the war than the group which I represent; and with those of our labour colleagues, if you will, across the seas who took the same position in years gone by that we took, we believe that this war is being fought for the democratic way of life and the right of man to say the kind of things I am saying now on the floor of this house. If we are not fighting for that, we are fighting for nothing at all.

Having tried to answer the interrupters, may I again say to the minister that I am of the opinion that every report that is available regarding this industry should be placed before the house at our next sitting so that we may know exactly where we stand. I hear that we are turning out—I shall not name the number of planes but it is very few, yet I have a distinct recollection that last July, I think it was, the Minister of Munitions and Supply indicated that early this year, in the month of January, I believe, we would be turning out something like ten planes a day. We are not turning out ten planes a day or anything like it. Let us know just what we are doing, because it is now self-evident that the extent to which we can retain or gain mastery in the air will in all probability decide the outcome of the war. We ought to have been making every possible effort since the fall of France—I say this notwithstanding the statement made by the minister for air (Mr. Power) a few minutes ago—to relieve Great Britain of the necessity of sending any training planes to Canada, because she needs every plane she has or can muster to defend the narrow strip of water which separates her from Europe.

I ask the minister to let us have a frank discussion. If there are matters which cannot be discussed publicly; if there are reports which cannot be placed publicly before this house because they might give information to the enemy, let us meet in a closed session and get to the bottom of this thing so that we may all work together rather than do what I fancy we are doing now, namely, working critically and somewhat at cross-purposes.

Mr. HOWE: My difficulty is this. I should like to place the reports on the table, particularly because they do not say what they have been quoted in this house as saying—quite the reverse. I should like to give the house the report from Mr. Breech, but unfortunately that was made orally to the war-time requirements board. That report is reflected, I presume, in Mr. MacMillan's report to myself, which is very comprehensive, covering the whole munitions programme. It gives the numbers of everything manufactured up to this time and the probable numbers of everything that will be manufactured up to the end of the fiscal year 1941-42. These are the very figures which Great Britain has asked us particularly not to give out, and a secret session would not materially change the situation because such figures are not given in secret sessions in Great Britain. The figures are highly confidential, giving the number of units that were shipped to Great Britain.

I can say to my hon. friend, however, who believes, as does the leader of the opposition, that the Breech report recommended that the Anson programme should be taken away from Federal Aircraft, that it recommended nothing of the sort. It recommended that it be not taken away from Federal Aircraft. It made one or two recommendations in connection with the organization of Federal Aircraft but said the programme was rapidly rounding into shape. That shows how far afield we can sometimes get.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is why we should get the actual facts.

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps I can lay on the table the part of the report referring to aircraft, but I am afraid that hon. members would then ask for the rest of it, and I should have to say that I could not make public the rest because it contains figures which must be kept confidential. We have a censorship to prevent just that sort of information from reaching the enemy. I rather imagine, though, if hon. members would like the aircraft section of the report, that I can lay it on the table, and I shall be very glad to do so.

So far as the report of Mr. Breech is concerned, I have never seen it. It was made orally, I think. I have questioned Mr. MacMillan and Mr. Henry, who accompanied Mr. Breech, and I have every reason to believe that the views of Mr. Breech are reflected in Mr. MacMillan's report.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): But the minister will admit that the Avro-Anson production of planes is many months behind schedule.

Mr. HOWE: No. There was never the slightest thought in anyone's mind that we would get the first Avro-Anson plane before the end of February, 1941. We expected them to be delivered at the end of February. The first plane has been flown but it has not been delivered. I do not care to predict when production will come. Perhaps I had better leave that until I make a statement on the company. All I will say now is that we never anticipated having Avro-Anson planes of Canadian manufacture delivered at this date. Any delay in the air training programme—and I shall discuss that later—largely arises from the fact that, as you have heard my colleague state, the training was advanced by six months at this school and by six months at that school and the whole programme advanced by one year. We simply cannot advance our production as rapidly as it is possible to advance the school training. However, we are not doing too badly in meeting the situation, as I think hon. members will agree when I deal with that subject. Any present-day shortage of training planes has nothing to do with the Avro-Anson production, because no production from that source was contemplated by this time, and no statement ever was made or can be found to the contrary.

Mr. McIVOR: Our aeroplane factory at Fort William is turning out two and three Hurricanes a day. The plant is humming and speeding up production and there is every hope that production will reach more than two or three Hurricanes a day. That is pretty good considering what went before.

Mr. COLDWELL: It shows that more of these plants should be established on the prairies and in the west.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Referring to the statement which the minister was making to the committee about an hour ago, could he not secure the permission of the house to have the rest of the statement placed on Hansard without reading it?

Mr. HOWE: I shall be glad to hand the material to the reporters for inclusion in Hansard.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Would the minister give us also the story regarding the commonwealth air training No. 1 depot at Toronto, the small arms ammunition plant at Long Branch, the development at Pickering, Ontario, and the new development at Scarborough? Perhaps the minister could give us this information on Monday next.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East) the house adjourned at 6.03 p.m.

Monday, February 24, 1941.

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

GRADING OF HOGS

Mr. McGREGOR:

1. Under the prevailing system of rail grading of hogs, into how many grades do hog carcasses fall?
2. What is the base or foundation grade called?
3. What are the names of higher grades, if any?
4. What premium over the price for the base grade is paid for each higher grade?
5. What are the names of lower grades, if any?
6. What deduction from the price for the base grade is made for each lower grade?
7. How, and by whom, is the difference in each grade determined?
8. How, and by whom, are the differentials in the price paid for each grade determined?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. There are five main quality grades for hog carcasses. Including all sub-divisions, there are fifteen different classifications.
2. "B 1" grade.
3. "A" grade.
4. One dollar per head premium is paid for "A" grade carcasses.

5 & 6. Deductions from basic grade: B 2 50 cents per head; B 3 $1.50 per head; C 1 $1 per head; C 2 $1 per head; C 3 $2 per head; D 1 $1.50 per head; D 2 $1.50 per head; D 3 $2.50 per head; light, $2.50 per head; heavy, $3 per head; extra heavy, $2 to $3 per cwt.; sows, approximately $5 per cwt.; E grade, at value.

Note: These deductions vary according to time and place. The above are believed to be in effect in Toronto at the present time.

7. The standards of quality for the various grades are established by the department, while the actual grading of carcasses is done by official graders appointed by the Civil Service Commission.

8. In 1922, the premium on the select bacon grade was established by agreement between the department and the joint swine committee, the membership of which includes representatives of various producers organizations. Subsequent modifications in the method of calculating the premium have been decided in the same way. On at least two occasions, general conferences of producers and live stock shippers were called to discuss grading and settlements for hogs and, in addition, provincial departments of agriculture were consulted.

The deductions on undesirable grades are established within the trade, between buyer and seller, according to the commercial value of the various qualities.

WAR REFUGEES

Mr. ROY:

1. Has an agreement been reached between the dominion government and that of the province of Quebec on the subject of war refugees?
2. If so, what is the nature of such agreement?
3. Is such agreement the same for all the other provinces of Canada?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. No formal agreement has been reached with the government of the province of Quebec on the subject of war refugees. There is, however, a general understanding between the dominion and all the provinces regarding the movement of British children from overseas to Canada. The understanding reached was that the children coming to Canada under this movement would be taken care of for the duration of the war. The provinces agreed to accept the responsibility for their placement and general aftercare, using the existing facilities in each province without cost to the dominion, the dominion agreeing to reimburse them for any additional costs they might incur.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Answered by No. 1.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE — CORRESPONDENCE WITH RURAL MUNICIPALITY OF ELFROS NO. 307

Mr. NICHOLSON:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the prairie farm assistance branch and the rural municipality of Elfros No. 307 during the year 1940 and to date in 1941.

Mr. GARDINER: I know of no reason why all this information should not be brought down, unless any of it has to do with individual yields—that is where affidavits have been taken—that of course cannot be brought down.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the minister explain why not?

Mr. GARDINER: In all these cases where an individual has made an affidavit the departmental officials have taken the position continuously since the act was brought in that it would not be in the public interest to bring that information before the house. The individual makes a declaration, which may be four or five acres out one way or the other; it is difficult for individuals to keep track of their acreage sown all the way through the year, and sometimes there is a dispute over the matter which if aired locally might create some misunderstanding.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Even then I do not see that that is a reason for not bringing it down here on an order of the house. I do not agree with the minister's reason.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion subject to the limitation stated by the minister?

Motion agreed to.

SHIPMENTS OF POTATOES TO SOUTH AMERICAN COUNTRIES

Mr. HATFIELD:

For a copy of all correspondence and special reports exchanged between J. A. Strong, or the office of the Canadian trade commission in Buenos Aires and the Department of Trade and Commerce of Canada regarding shipments of potatoes from Canada to the Argentine and other South American countries since September 1, 1940, to date.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY—CORRESPONDENCE WITH PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

Mr. ROY:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, and other documents exchanged between the dominion government and the government of the province of Quebec, from January, 1930, to date, regarding the proposed canalization of the St. Lawrence.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As hon. members are aware, negotiations have been proceeding between the government of the United States and our government with respect to the St. Lawrence waterway. To bring down the documents requested would require in the first place the consent of the United States government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not this?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, it relates to the St. Lawrence waterway. The fact that the negotiations are between this government and the government of the province of Quebec does not exclude the fact that they relate to matters that are the subject of negotiation at the present time between the United States government and this government, and in the circumstances they should be regarded as confidential. For that reason the correspondence cannot be brought down at the present time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I must register a protest against that. What is asked for is the correspondence between the government of the province of Quebec and the dominion government regarding a project in which the province of Quebec is vitally interested, and to which the United States of America is not a party. I suggest that such correspondence is not and ought not to be treated as confidential, but should be placed on the table of this house for the information of the Canadian people and especially the people of the province of Quebec who want to know what their government is doing about this.

Mr. ROY: I should be satisfied if the government would produce all the correspondence exchanged between the government of the province of Quebec and the government here at Ottawa, excluding all correspondence with the government of the United States.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand from my hon. friend that he will be quite satisfied to have such correspondence as has been exchanged between Ottawa and Quebec and which is not confidential because of what it would disclose with respect to present negotiations with the United States. If that is what my hon. friend is asking for—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then as leader of the government of Canada I am being asked to disclose information which relates to negotiations which are pending and which of necessity are confidential as between the two governments. In the first instance I should have to obtain the consent of the government of the United States to the tabling of any correspondence relating to negotiations now taking place. I do not think I would be justified in placing upon the government of the United States the onus of not having this correspondence produced when I know that international procedure would require that it should not be produced. On that basis, I am prepared personally to take the responsibility for not tabling any such correspondence at the present time.

Motion dropped.

LITTLE ANSE, N.S., BREAKWATER

Mr. MacKINNON (Kootenay East):

For a copy of all payrolls for 1940, in connection with the work performed on the breakwater at Little Anse, Richmond county, Nova Scotia?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury):

For a copy of all cost plus contracts and of all management fee contracts, the ultimate expenditure upon which is estimated to exceed $1,000,000, awarded by the defence purchasing board, the war supply board, the Department of Munitions and Supply, the Department of National Defence, the Department of National Defence for Air, or the Department of National Defence for Naval Affairs, since September 1, 1939, together with any supplementary contracts or revisions made to date.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE—A. NEWMAN

Mr. NICHOLSON:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the dominion Department of Agriculture and the Alberta government during the years 1935 to 1940, inclusive, in connection with the work of Mr. A. Newman, field man with the live stock and poultry branch, dominion production service. Also a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the dominion Department of Agriculture and Mr. A. WAR PENSIONS

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER PROBLEMS OF EX-SERVICE MEN

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved:

That a select committee be set up to which shall be referred for consideration the general provisions of the Pension Act and the War Veterans' Allowance Act, and to which shall be referred specifically such questions connected with pensions and the problems of ex-service men as the house may deem advisable; and

That rule 65 be suspended in relation thereto; and

That the said committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records; to examine witnesses for evidence; to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee for the use of the committee and members of the house; and to report from time to time; and

That the committee shall consist of the following members: Messrs. Abbott, Black, Blanchette, Brooks, Bruce, Casselman (Grenville-Dundas), Casselman (Edmonton East), Cleaver, Cockeram, Cruickshank, Emmerson, Eudes, Ferron, Gillis, Gray, Green, Harris (Gray-Bruce), Isnor, Lapointe (Matapedia-Matane), Macdonald (Brantford), MacKenzie (Neepawa), Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre), Macmillan, Marshall, McCuaig, McLean (Simcoe East), Mutch, Quelch, Reid, Ross (Middlesex East), Ross (Souris), Sanderson, Thorson, Tucker, Turgeon, Vien, Winkler, Wright.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): In submitting the names of our soldier members by some inadvertence the name of the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White) was not included. He is a returned man and while he was incapacitated I do not know whether he is a pensioner. I wonder if the minister would be good enough to add his name to the list of members. This addition would not alter the balance in any way.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I shall be glad to do that.

Mr. SPEAKER: The name of the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough will be added to the list of members of the committee.

Motion as amended agreed to.

SIR FREDERICK BANTING

INQUIRY AS TO MISSING AEROPLANE ON WHICH SIR FREDERICK WAS A PASSENGER

On the orders of the day.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to inquire of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), or perhaps more properly of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), if the government has received any information other than what is contained in the morning papers with respect to the reported loss of a plane in which Sir Frederick Banting was said to be a passenger.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): There is a message on my desk now and I was inquiring into its authenticity just before I had to leave rather hurriedly for the chamber. I shall make further inquiry and let my hon. friend have any definite information I am able to obtain.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Just before I came in I had word from the Department of Transport that the plane has been found. It is on a point of a bay on the direct route between Canada and Botwood. There is a message written on the snow which indicates that someone on board the plane is alive at least. A plane has been sent out equipped with skis which will be capable of landing there and it is probable that there will be definite word before the afternoon is over.

[Later:]

REPORT OF AEROPLANE ACCIDENT WITH LOSS OF ALL ON BOARD EXCEPT PILOT

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I should like to give to the house the latest information that has come to hand with reference to the aircraft disaster in Newfoundland. I am afraid it brings extremely bad news to Canada. The message is from Wing Commander Gordon, Newfoundland airport, to headquarters, Eastern Air Command, Halifax:

> The pilot Mackey is alive; the others are dead. Two trappers are at the aircraft. Aircraft dropped more emergency rations to party. Moth skiplane en route from St. Johns, Newfoundland, to Newfoundland air port.

I believe that is a Newfoundland government plane. The memorandum I have goes on to say:

> The Moth skiplane will proceed to the scene of the crash as soon as possible. Two skiplanes from Ottawa Air Station are also proceeding to Newfoundland to bring out the pilot and deceased.

For the Department of National Defence I wish to express the deepest regret at the passing of Sir Frederick Banting, who was himself an officer of the department. He has been rendering invaluable professional services to Canada, and he has also been serving the country by devoting his outstanding abilities to research—not merely abstract research but research applied practically to the problems which face us in this time of war. In fact, the trip he was making had been necessitated thereby. I know that all the officers, non-commissioned officers and men of the defence forces will join with me in this expression of deep regret, and in the most heartfelt sympathy to Lady Banting and family and, as well, to the relatives and friends of the others who perished—Navigator William Bird of Kidderminster, Worcester, England, and William Snailham, of Bedford, Nova Scotia.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with your permission and that of the house, I should like to supplement the words of the Minister of National Defence. On behalf both of the government and of hon. members of this house, may I say what a shock it has been to us all to receive the sad intelligence which has just been imparted to the house. May I also express our deep sympathy with the relatives of those brave and gallant men whose lives have been so unhappily sacrificed in the disaster of which we have just heard.

Perhaps I may be allowed to add a special word touching the loss which our country has sustained in the passing of Sir Frederick Banting. It was not so long ago that this parliament, in recognition of the distinguished services which he had rendered to science, voted to him an annuity that he might the better devote his life to scientific research.

In his passing our country has lost one of her most distinguished sons, who was proceeding to Britain on a mission of high national and scientific importance.

Doctor Banting was honoured by the universities and learned societies of the world. He was the winner of the Nobel prize, which he generously shared with his associates. His medical discoveries have brought honour to his native land. The name of Sir Frederick Banting will live in the history of medicine as a great benefactor of mankind, who by his discovery of insulin brought new hope to the suffering and the promise of life to many who were doomed to early death before his researches were crowned with success. Great will be the grief that his own life, so full of promise for human welfare, should have come to such an untimely end.

Sir Frederick offered his services to his country as soon as war broke out. He organized a particularly important branch of medical research. With a band of devoted fellow workers he had dedicated himself to the solution of the new medical problems associated with aviation, and the speed, height and low temperatures involved in the operation of modern aircraft. Already his work had proved of inestimable value. The world of medicine will deplore his loss as his fellow citizens join with men of many nations to mourn his passing and record their gratitude for the rich achievement of his devoted labours.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I desire to associate myself with the eloquent words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and only regret my inability to express my sentiments and feelings with the same facility and felicity. I had not the pleasure of Doctor Banting's acquaintance, but I am glad to have been a member of this house when a few years ago parliament voted him the annuity to which the Prime Minister has referred, in order that he might be quite free of monetary considerations in the researches he was conducting. I am delighted to think that at a later date his sovereign recognized his worth and honoured him as a Canadian. I am sure we all join in expressing to Lady Banting and his other loved ones our most sincere sympathy.

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, as a colleague of Sir Frederick Banting in the medical faculty of the university of Toronto, and as a member of the board of governors of the university, I am deeply shocked at the news which has been just imparted to us. I wish to add my voice to the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in expressing the deep regret and profound sorrow that all Canadians will experience when they learn of the tragic death of Sir Frederick Banting who has brought such distinction to Canada. He and Louis Pasteur will be remembered forever for their great contributions to medical science. Generations yet unborn will feel gratitude that such a man as Sir Frederick Banting lived to enrich the world with one of the greatest discoveries ever made in medical science, for the relief of human suffering.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): On behalf of my group, Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself with what has been said already. I think the sentiments of all of us have been most appropriately expressed.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): On behalf of this group, Mr. Speaker, I desire to associate myself with the sentiments which have been expressed in this hour of very great sorrow for us all.

CANADIAN YOUTH CONGRESS

RAID BY MOUNTED POLICE ON HOME OF MONTREAL SECRETARY

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). I am informed by the secretary of the national young people's union of the United Church of Canada that members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police raided the home of Mr. Jack Brierley, Montreal secretary of the Canadian youth congress, on February 13, last. Since the Minister of Justice has already declared this organization to be perfectly legal, what was the reason for such a raid, and upon whose authority was the raid made?

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): If my hon. friend will kindly wait until to-morrow I shall have the necessary investigation made and give an answer.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

INQUIRY AS TO PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO ACT—TABLING OF AMENDED REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) whether it is proposed to bring down this session any amendments to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, and if so when we may expect them.

I should also like to inquire whether in the administration of the act in Saskatchewan this year action was taken under any special rules or regulations made after the act was passed, and if so would the minister be good enough to table them at the next sitting of the house.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Answering the first question, in the list of proposed legislation for this session it is suggested that there may be amendments to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, but we are not certain that they will be brought down this session. As to the second question, I think there were a number of amendments made to the regulations, and if so I shall be glad to table them.

WAR SAVINGS CERTIFICATES

STATEMENT AS TO PROGRESS OF SPECIAL FEBRUARY CAMPAIGN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a brief statement to the house on the progress of the war savings certificates campaign.

During February we have, as hon. members know, been conducting a special campaign to increase the sale of these certificates to at least $10,000,000 a month and to ensure that at least 2,000,000 Canadians will pledge themselves to become regular war savers for the duration of the war. I now feel it safe for me to say that we expect not only to reach but to exceed that objective, possibly by a substantial amount.

During the first twenty-two days of the month applications amounting to $7,115,556 have been received. This total reflects only to a slight extent applications that result from payroll savings and bank pledges. As the house will realize, it is on these two phases of the programme that we have been placing primary reliance, and, while we shall not have the complete figures until after the end of the month, the reports already received from the thousands of voluntary committees and workers throughout the country indicate that the response to our campaign will be far greater than we expected.

The enthusiastic response of employers and employees to the payroll savings plan as a means of regular war saving is indicated by the fact that honour roll certificates have already been issued to 915 companies and other firms. These honour roll certificates are issued to any firm whose employees are participating in the plan to the extent of at least seventy-five per cent, and our national war savings committee advise me that they have yet to hear from the first firm to report that it has not yet been able to or is not likely to be able to secure at least a seventy-five per cent participation. Hon. members will already have noted from the press that quite a substantial number of firms are actually reporting one hundred per cent participation.

Before taking my seat I wish to pay tribute to the many thousands of volunteer workers throughout the country who by weeks of hard work and effective organization have made these results possible, and to express to them my confidence that in this concluding week of the present intensive phase of the war savings campaign they will be able to report the rolling-in of applications in a volume that will more than justify all the thought and energy which they have put into the campaign.

Mr. LOCKHART: Would it be possible to amplify that wonderful result achieved by voluntary workers by having the census made by voluntary workers, thereby saving the country a lot of money?

Mr. MacNICOL: No applause from the other side.

SUPPLY

THE WAR—PRESENT POSITION—CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON MOTION OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Monday, February 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Ilsley for committee of supply.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on Monday last when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) moved that the house go into committee of supply, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) took occasion to deliver to the house a very carefully prepared speech dealing with a variety of important matters, including a review of the war situation since December 2 last, when he gave his last statement on the European situation.

The speech, in part at least, was designed to afford a suitable background, as he put it, against which to consider external affairs and also the 1941-42 war appropriation bill, the resolution preceding which was introduced by the Minister of Finance on Tuesday last and debated on subsequent days of last week.

In the course of his remarks the Prime Minister stated that "it is not possible to divorce war enactments and the foreign policy on which they are necessarily based". That, of course, is a truism and would be wholly applicable if our war enactments were in fact and in truth based on a sound, well-thought-out master war plan. But, in view of the fact, as I stated on Wednesday last, that Canada has never had and has not now a sound and well-thought-out master plan for our war effort, the truth of this statement is therefore in this instance at least open to question.

However that may be, I do not for the moment desire to pursue that line of thought, and having listened attentively to and having since read with some care the Prime Minister's statement I am in agreement with much that he said in the early part of his remarks with respect to the operations in the various theatres of war—in Europe, Africa, and the far east—and may I pause here to say, with regard to the gravity of the situation upon which the Prime Minister laid great stress during the course of his remarks.

The African campaign has thrilled us all. We have been delighted to read and hear of the spectacular victories which have been achieved by the British and Australian forces over the enemy in Egypt and adjacent territory. We have been especially proud of the part played by the armed forces from the sister dominion of Australia. The infantry from that dominion and their gallant airmen nave been the very spearhead of General Wavell's command. They have covered themselves with glory; their achievements have been, very properly, the subject of world acclaim, and nowhere, I hope, has that acclaim been given more wholeheartedly than here in Canada.

Loyal Canadians will not envy Australia the palms of glory that have come to her armed forces as a result of their courage and daring. To me personally there is an element of regret that no Canadians participated in this campaign. I have no criticism to offer at this moment that our gallant men of the first and second divisions were not represented in these achievements. There may be good and sufficient reasons why this country was not represented. The Prime Minister did not enlighten us. Perhaps at a later stage he will be good enough to tell us whether an expeditionary force of Canadians to Egypt was considered, and if not, just what the position is. I have no doubt that the personnel of the Canadian divisions in England would have welcomed an opportunity to participate.

With respect to the change which has taken place in recent months in the attitude of the United States towards the war to which the Prime Minister alluded, there is no doubt that the change has been marked and has gained great momentum, due, I think, almost wholly to the magnificient leadership given by the president of that great country.

Just a little over a year ago, and for some time after the declaration of war, I spent a considerable period of time in the United States. I had some opportunity of analysing public opinion as expressed in the press and elsewhere, and I confess to this house that at that time I was startled by the apparent strength of the so-called isolationist movement. There was the cry that the United States would never again participate in a European struggle, that the situation in Europe was no concern of theirs—in fact, there was a demand, which at that time I rather overestimated, that there should be no aid to Britain and the democracies except on a purely commercial basis. I read that outrageous book, England Expects Every American To Do His Duty, with a great deal of disgust.

There was, in some influential circles, a feeling of frustration, and in others almost a certainty that Britain and her ally could not whip Hitler. This feeling was greatly intensified by the fall of France and the happenings at Dunkirk. At that time there was a great preponderance of public opinion in the United States that Britain could not carry the whole load and that she was bound to succumb.

This feeling, however, produced in the minds of the great mass of thoughtful, liberty-loving people of that nation a tremendous reaction and revival of sympathy for the principles of liberty and democracy and for the only remaining active defender of liberty and democracy. The principles established by congress before the war opened, based on detachment and non-participation except on a purely commercial basis, were vigorously attacked by those thoughtful elements who realized to the full just what the fall of Britain would mean to them and to their country. Under the skilful and intelligent leadership of their president, the great mass of the people of the United States came to a realization that for the preservation of themselves and of all those things for which the republic was founded, they must make this their war if not their fight.

The tragedy and the unanswerable logic of the trend of events in May and June last brought the situation home to our great neighbour as, perhaps, nothing else could. They realize now that their own security, the preservation of what is termed "the American way of life," the democratic way of life, and its survival, are of supreme importance to them; and they know, too, that all these things may be preserved only by keeping the battle over there and by victory for Britain in the immediate theatre of war.

This is the theory which I have continuously urged upon the Canadian people as being the matter of most paramount importance in our war effort—that the defence of Britain and her ultimate victory and triumph in the theatre of war is our first and primary objective; that the defence of Canada is of secondary importance, but only secondary; and therefore we on this side of the chamber have advocated without cessation the doctrine that our first and foremost duty is to support and sustain Britain overseas, and to see to our own defence next. This doctrine in a degree has been accepted by the government of the United States. They subscribe to the principle and doctrine that the British navy and the Royal Air Force are their first line of defence, as they are ours, and to that end, effective aid to Britain, compatible with their duty to provide for their own defence, is of vital importance. Their resources, material and other, are vastly greater than those of any other nation in the world. Their stake in the outcome is as large and as vital as that of Britain; and a realization of that, and of the measures which they have adopted and are adopting, gives us the greatest hope for the future.

I have never allowed myself to think that Britain would not win this war. I do not say that Britain could not win through without aid from the United States, backed, as she is, by all the resources and the man power of the sister dominions, if placed at her disposal; but the burden is so great, the theatre of war has been so greatly extended, that to me it is extremely doubtful whether, left without outside aid, the issue can be decided in favour of the democracies. It might well end in a stalemate. The material assistance which the United States has already given, can give, and I am sure will give with increasing momentum in the ensuing months, will without question be of decisive importance, and may well turn the scale.

We should, I think, frankly recognize this fact and not in any degree attempt to deny it. We all listened with emotion to the last broadcast of the British Prime Minister, in which he appealed to the people of the United States to give Britain the weapons, the materials and supplies, the instruments—and the job would be done. How heartened we all were at the words of Lord Beaverbrook yesterday in which, among other things, he said that nazi war planes had lost their terror; that, when Churchill came to power, the people of Britain feared them; now they defy them. I was especially impressed with that part of his plea in which he urged the people of this dominion to send food and weapons, and exhorted them "to seek the world over for ships." We are sending food, for a price. Have we ever given any food to Britain? How many weapons have we actually sent to Britain other than those for our own forces? We are not told. When a cry like Beaverbrook's comes to our ears, are we not uncomfortable at the thought that we do not know what has been done, that our government soothes us with promises and generalities, but is never factual? Is it possible that we have done nothing? I do not think so. I should like to know.

Then the cry for ships and shipping! We are to build ships for the account of the British government, but how many keels have actually been laid? Let the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) tell us what progress has been made.

While I am paying a tribute to the might and importance of the United States in this gigantic struggle as it will affect the issue, may I be permitted to draw the attention of the house and of the country to the fact that the Prime Minister, in the course of his address did not tell the house or the country anything at all with respect to the war relations of Canada and the United States in connection with the recommendations, and operations resulting therefrom, arising out of the appointment of the joint defence board. On no occasion has he done so. To me this omission is amazing. It is well known that the board has had many meetings. It has travelled over this continent from east to west, and back again. Undoubtedly it has made recommendations. What is the nature of these recommendations? Are the Canadian people to be told? Apparently not. If we are not to be told what these recommendations are, then at least we should be told why we are not to be told. I invite the Prime Minister to tell us all that can be safely stated. If there are deep military secrets which may not be divulged because of their nature and because public knowledge would endanger the safety of the state, and give information to the enemy or possible enemies, then I would not press for details. But, generally speaking, we should know. It is not good enough merely to say we are working in close harmony with the defence department of the United States.

It will be recalled that during the course of the debate on the address on December 3 last I asked the Prime Minister across the floor of this chamber if there were any commitments; and, intervening in my address, he declared vehemently and emphatically that there were none. I confess I am puzzled about the situation. There are no commitments, we are told. Are there understandings? There is no evidence of joint undertakings except, as I understand it, that the great airport at Gander, Newfoundland, which Canada is building and at great cost; the work on which is said to have bogged down in an amazing degree, and which will cost much more than double the estimate, is to be used—and quite properly—by the United States air force. Is there any deep military reason why we should not know something of this?

Frankly I cannot understand the statement that there are no commitments. I invite the Prime Minister to tell us all that is permissible and within reasonable limitations; and I suggest that that is a reasonable request.

The Prime Minister devoted some time to repeating the substance of a recent radio address in connection with the war savings drive, to a review of the development of the army, navy and air force, and the dispatch overseas in 1941 of more units.

May I pause here to congratulate the Minister of Finance upon the statement which he made this afternoon before the orders of the day were called? The effort resulting from the war savings certificates drive shows what a united nation can do, and what Canada is doing to-day. Notwithstanding the fact that things are as they are in my province, I know that the people got behind this war savings drive, although many of them are very much opposed to doing so because of the manner in which, they think, the war is being carried on. Notwithstanding that, the people of Canada are patriotic and will sink their differences and get behind this government in a drive of that kind.

I do not think that at this time I should go into the question of the developments of the army and navy and air force. There will be a further opportunity to do so, and the subject will bear further scrutiny and examination. We shall hear a good deal this session about Canada's production of war equipment and supplies. We are always being told what is going to be done, but we have never had a full statement of what has been accomplished; and if the government persists in its present policy, we shall never know what has been the measure of that production. The reason is always given that the British government does not want production in terms of units known. We are told in terms of dollars and cents, but nothing more. That does not seem to be the policy in Australia, where the people are kept informed as to production by their government. The reasons which impel the British government to indicate that figures of production should not be given would appear to be applicable to Australia. And I venture to say that, compared with our wealth, national resources, man power and population, Australia has done much more relatively than we have.

The reason is quite clear. The sister dominion was never limited to a policy of moderate participation; they have been committed to a policy of all-out effort ever since they went into the war. It seems to me that it would be quite appropriate for us here in Canada to pay a formal tribute to Australia for its recent and notable military achievements. As the Prime Minister has not done so, I deem it a great privilege, as leader of the opposition, to have this opportunity.

Australia has done a great job in the middle east. As I stated a few moments ago, it has been the spear-head of General Wavell's attack. It has demonstrated the new science of assault warfare. It has helped to prove the potency of the offensive spirit of the empire. It has set an example to the world in gallantry and effectiveness.

Australia is also now at Singapore and in the Malay peninsula. We can confidently expect that the Australians will give the same high account of themselves in these new theatres of war as they have in Egypt and in Libya, should the need arise.

Australia, from the outset of the war,—indeed, long before the war started—has operated on the principle of maximum contribution. It has set the highest standard of service and sacrifice, and has lived up to it. The inspiring consequences of this policy are well known, in terms of the mobilization of man power for home and overseas service, air personnel, aeroplanes built in Australia, naval strength, and so forth.

Australia has raised an army corps comprising four divisions for overseas, together with corps troops and adequate reserves. At least two, and possibly three of these divisions are already on active service in the middle east. An additional fully equipped force arrived recently at Singapore. By the 1st of November, 1940, the Royal Australian Air Force had recruited more than 37,000 men, of whom 12,218 had been chosen as aircrew. Squadrons have been sent abroad to England, the middle east and Singapore.

At the end of 1940, the personnel of the Royal Australian Navy exceeded 15,000, including reserves. I have not been able to secure exact figures for the number of men mobilized and trained for home defence. However, the objective repeatedly stated by the Prime Minister is 250,000, and energetic steps are being taken to achieve that objective within the shortest possible time.

In aircraft, Australia is producing an intermediate training machine, the Wirraway, which is similar to the Harvard. These Wirraway machines are now being turned out at the rate of rather more than seven a week; and the first 200 have already been delivered. The Wirraway is powered with a Pratt and Whitney single-row Wasp engine, which is also manufactured in Australia.

The Australian Tiger Moth, an elementary trainer manufactured by the de Havilland Aircraft Company, was, before the end of 1940, being produced at the rate of two Tiger Moths a day. The two-hundredth machine out of a contract of 500 was delivered at Christmas. The Gypsy Major engine with which these planes are equipped is planned, assembled and tested by General Motors-Holden's in Melbourne. The actual parts are made by thirty-six manufacturing firms in Adelaide, Sydney and Melbourne. These engines are now being turned out at the rate of two a day.

The production of Beaufort bombers is under way, and the first complete Beaufort is expected to undergo tests in April next. By the middle of 1941, the Beaufort project will be the largest single industry in Australia and it is estimated that it will ultimately employ about 10,000. The Beaufort project was originally contingent on the supply of Taurus engines from England. As these were not forthcoming, Beaufort airframes were modified to take a twin-row Wasp engine, manufacture of which was begun in Australia.

According to a press report in the Sydney Morning Herald, January 11, 1941, the Australian Minister of Munitions, Senator McBride, stated that Australia's production for war now included:

Guns: 3·7 and 3″ 20 hundredweight anti-aircraft guns in production now.

Gun ammunition: a complete range of components in full production, including shell bodies, fuses, primers, cartridge-cases, cartridge-bags, mortar bombs, hand-grenades, and aircraft bombs, ranging from 8½-pound practice type to 250-pound service pattern.

Explosives: A complete range of service explosives including propellants, high explosives, and pyrotechnic materials, in full mass production. These were being assembled into complete rounds of gun ammunition, produced from Australian raw material, and covering the entire range in use in the army and navy.

Small arms ammunitions: Production mostly of the Red Label class, the highest quality, made especially for use in aircraft machine guns. Armour-piercing, tracer, and incendiary types also produced.

Small arms: Rifles, Lewis gun components, land service and also right and left air-cooled aircraft patterns.

Precision instruments and optical munitions for equipment of artillery, including searchlight equipment.

Armoured fighting vehicles: Machine-gun carriers, which have superseded armoured cars.

Wireless sets: All patterns, mainly of Australian design for all services.

Miscellaneous items: Assault boats, pontoons, and other bridging equipment, and a range of engineers' stores running into several hundred separate items.

All this means a magnificent effort; and we must always remember that Australia has only two-thirds the population of Canada, and about one-half our natural wealth.

I know I speak for the whole of the people of Canada when I pay my profound tribute of praise to this great dominion. I heartily congratulate its gallant people, but I can assure them that, although Canada may have been slow in starting, we will be in strong at the finish.

If Australia can be frank about their contribution, as they have been, there is no reason why Canada should not be; and if they make public their figures, I am not prepared at this time to accept the conventional answer of the Prime Minister that disclosure of Canada's contribution in terms of units will give comfort to the enemy. That can be only if Canada's contribution is as small as some people in this country are now beginning to suspect. Moreover, if our contribution had been what it should have been, there would certainly then have been no room for rejoicing in Germany. But however unpalatable the truth of our unpreparedness may be, let us have the truth. If Australia has made a good beginning and we a bad one, let us say to Australia: "To-day we are lagging behind you, but to-morrow we will be racing you to the post. We are now on our way."

The Prime Minister took great pains to prove that his place, as Prime Minister of Canada, was in Canada and not in England at any time. Our friend, the Hon. W. D. Herridge, and others, must have been greatly gratified to have so much attention paid to his suggestions that the Prime Minister should go to England and see at first-hand for himself the whole position and the necessities of the situation.

The Prime Minister's remarks constituted at least an indirect rebuke to Mr. Menzies, the Australian Prime Minister, who is now in London, and who stated in a broadcast on his arrival there that he had gone to England to secure information and first-hand knowledge and to endeavour to coordinate the war effort of Australia and Great Britain, which it had not been possible to do without direct communication.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sure my hon. friend does not wish to misrepresent me or what I said. My references were entirely to the establishment of a war council in England at the present time, not to a visit to England at any time. My hon. friend says "at any time." I made no such statement. I said there were times when it would be appropriate to go, but I did not think this was the time to establish an imperial war council.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Possibly I was wrong, but I will come to that again a little later; I intend to deal with it quite fully.

If the methods of communication described by the Prime Minister between the British government and the Canadian government are so satisfactory, and if the high commissioner in London is acting with such great capacity, why has it been necessary for five ministers of this government to go overseas between November of 1939 and this date? That is the query I put to the Prime Minister.

Early in the war the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) went overseas, presumably to sell our wheat surplus. We have never been told the result of his operations. If they had been successful I am sure we should have heard of them.

Next to go was the late Minister of National Defence, who early last session made his report. He went definitely, I should say, for the purpose of first-hand consultation. The high commissioner was there; the telephone and the cable were functioning then, as now; but he went—and properly so—for the purpose of ascertaining at first hand, by observation and consultation, what was to be done and what was needed. Indeed I think it was so stated in the press. Otherwise why should he go at all? If the Prime Minister's statement of Monday last is well founded, there was no need of his going; but that was not the theory then, and I submit that it is not a sound theory now.

Then the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) went overseas. I am sure every Canadian who has followed anxiously our war effort thought he did the proper thing. I know I did. He must have felt the necessity for going, for he went; and not only did he go himself but he took with him his chief of staff, his principal executive assistant, Colonel Magee, and other high ranking officers. Why? Surely for the purpose of observation and first-hand consultation with the British authorities. Don't tell me that he went merely for the purpose of reviewing the Canadian divisions or for consultation with General McNaughton, important though the latter no doubt was. Undoubtedly he went for the all-important purpose of gaining first-hand information for the future guidance of himself, the cabinet and their advisers. To suggest anything else is to insult our intelligence. In due course I hope he will tell us, with some detail, the results of his mission.

Next to go over was the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). We all know he went, because on many occasions since his return he has told us so. Just why he went, however, is not so absolutely clear. If it was for the purpose of selling our bacon and cheese, I suggest that he could have done quite as well by staying at home.

Finally the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) went, and quite properly so; for if he did as I hope he did, and consulted with the British authorities respecting the production of materials and equipment, his visit will have served a most useful purpose. So far we have not been privileged to hear with any detail of the observations he made or the plans he brought back, but I invite him to tell us at the first appropriate opportunity; and I know his remarks will be reassuring.

The Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Munitions and Supply are key ministers who can ill afford to be absent from their desks and duties in Ottawa, but they went overseas because in their opinion it was necessary, and the proper and best thing to be done in the circumstances.

I come now to the question of an imperial war cabinet. I have not heard anybody—at least anybody in authority—argue that there should be set up immediately an imperial war cabinet, but the Prime Minister should not close the door to the possibility of going to England, perhaps to participate in an imperial war cabinet or conference. I have an idea, though I am no authority at all, that good results would follow from such a cabinet, as they did during the last war. Anyone who reads the memoirs of Sir Robert Borden I think will understand the reason for the setting up of the war cabinet and the good that came from it. Only yesterday the London Dispatch put forward the suggestion that Prime Minister Churchill fly to the United States to confer with President Roosevelt. It is suggested in the United States that if this could be done the results of the proposal would be tremendous. Personally I do not think it is possible for him to do so, but underlying that suggestion is the thought that by personal conference things might be done which cannot be done by other means of communication.

At all events, many people in this country have no confidence that there is complete cooperation between the British government and the Canadian government, that there is coordination of purpose and action, and that we are doing all that the British situation requires. The government refuses to lay on the table the papers which would establish the facts, and we do not know. I suggest that from a visit of the Prime Minister to Britain might come complete unity of purpose and action, and increased effectiveness of our war effort.

The Prime Minister has devoted a great deal of attention to our representation abroad other than in Great Britain. What is the total cost of our foreign representation? I invite the Prime Minister to tell the country. And what is the position with respect to Japan? The previous minister, Hon. Randolph Bruce, retired on December 17, 1938, over two years ago, and no new appointment has been made. During critical developments in the far east there has been no Canadian minister in Tokyo to assist the British ambassador and to keep the Canadian Prime Minister in close touch with those developments. Why do we maintain an expensive legation in Tokyo, for which there is an estimate of $59,000 provided this year, and leave it without a minister for over two years? Is it possible that this seat is being kept warm, as some people have hinted, for the present Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie)? I think he would be a pretty good chap; why not ship him over there?

Then with respect to the position in Washington, I regret as much as anyone to learn of the illness of Mr. Loring Christie; but from the information I have gleaned since the Prime Minister spoke on the seventeenth I have no doubt in the world that there is an immediate necessity for the appointment of an outstanding Canadian citizen as Canadian minister to Washington, and that he should not necessarily be a career diplomat. In fact I think the appointment should be given to a man who is not a career diplomat. It should be given to one who can represent Canada with dignity and authority; one who, on occasion, can speak to the people of the United States as Lord Lothian did and as Lord Halifax will—and as Mr. Christie did not. Recently I have seen the suggestion that Mr. Leighton McCarthy, K.C., of Toronto, is to be appointed to this position. Mr. McCarthy is an outstanding Canadian citizen, and if he is appointed I am sure he will do good work for Canada down there at a time when it is absolutely necessary for us to have the best possible representation.

I suggest further, Mr. Speaker, that there should be associated with the minister an outstanding industrialist—not a mere departmental official such as Mr. Mahoney or Mr. Carswell—who will work in close cooperation with Mr. Purvis and the British mission. I am not casting any aspersions on either of those gentlemen I have named. I know Mr. Mahoney well; I am indebted to him for courtesies on more than one occasion. He knows his way about Washington, but he is a departmental official and has not the status that an oustanding industrialist would have down there representing this government. I recall that during the last war Mr. Lloyd Harris, of Brantford, an outstanding Canadian industrialist and a man who at one time occupied a prominent position in this parliament, was appointed to head a Canadian mission in Washington. It is true that this was before we had a minister, and there was great necessity for such a mission. I suggest that from the standpoint of coordinated effort in production the necessity of such an outstanding industrialist, standing side by side with our Canadian minister to Washington, is just as great to-day as it was then. And as a tribute to our vital interest in the United States and the importance of our represenstation in that country, might it not be wise to raise our minister there to ambassadorial rank? I invite the Prime Minister to give consideration to this suggestion. Rank means something, even in the United States.

The Prime Minister definitely closed the door to the appointment of an overseas minister. In my view, it is unwise to do so. I think I suggested early last session that this might be a good move. The circumstances which led to the appointment of an overseas minister in the last war may well recur. At that time Sir George Perley was there, and he certainly was a trusted confidant of Sir Robert Borden, certainly as trusted as Mr. Massey is by the Prime Minister; but the appointment of an overseas minister became necessary in his time to help and assist him and to coordinate effort; and the circumstances which led to the appointment at that time may well recur, if indeed they have not already done so.

But there is a matter of much greater importance looming up. Is Canada to be represented in the consultations which must precede the planning of the campaign which will develop after the battle of Britain has been fought and won? Is Canada to be represented in the task of planning the offensive in 1942? I know we have in Lieutenant-General McNaughton a soldier of first-class rank and importance and ability. But can he represent Canada in such conferences and speak with authority for the Canadian government? I suggest that no one but a minister of the crown, who is a member of our cabinet and bound to the principles of cabinet responsibility and solidarity can speak for Canada in such matters, acting always on the advice and responsibility of the chief of our overseas army.

Has Mr. Massey, in his present position, the authority to represent Canada in such matters and in such manner? I think the answer is no; that he must merely be an intermediary between the cabinet here and such conferences, and that he will have no authority. Indeed, he would not assume such authority. No one who is not of cabinet rank would presume to do so.

Reverting again to the question of an imperial war cabinet, may I recall to the minds of hon. gentlemen a statement made in the War Memoirs of David Lloyd George, volume IV, at page 1765, in which he says:

> But the value of the cabinet and conference were vastly greater than their immediate utility as an instrument for discussing our common war problems, and with the extent and method of the help which the dominions could supply.

I should like the house to note these words:

> The meetings had an immense importance for the consolidation of the British empire. The imperial cabinet did not end with a discussion of common problems; it directed common action in events of solemn magnitude which were shaking the earth and shaping the destinies of the people in every clime and continent. The fact bred alike a new individual dignity, and a more conscious solidarity. In our discussions there was less concentration, in the minds of the dominion premiers, on the sectional interests of the part of the empire which each represented, and more eagerness to pull together to secure a maximum achievement in our joint effort. We were partners, not only in a commonwealth, but in a crusade. And the fine spirit thus engendered proved to be of critical value when, after the war, we came to complete that review of the empire's constitution which had received its preliminary survey while we were in such temper.

Nor was the work confined to our discussions round the conference table. The visiting dominion premiers took advantage of their presence here to travel around the country, to meet with the people of the homeland, and deepen by speech and interview our sense of common purpose and imperial unity. Mr. Hughes, of Australia, had done some invaluable work of this order when he was here in 1916. Meantime, his work was continued by Sir Robert Borden of Canada. . . .

I suggest to the house and to the country that this estimate by Mr. Lloyd George of the value of the imperial war cabinet and imperial war conferences appears to be very important, therefore I have read it into the record; and I hope it will provide food for thought for the right hon. gentleman and his government.

The Prime Minister intimated that membership in the Canadian cabinet would be an embarrassment to the Canadian government representative in London, as well as to the government itself; and to establish his point he introduced somewhat novel constitutional principles. But it is a matter of record that Mr. Bonar Law told Sir Robert Borden in the last war that Sir George Perley's status as acting high commissioner, until the formation of the union government, was greatly enhanced by his membership in the cabinet, and that his prestige was greater than it would have been if he were merely high commissioner. Accepting Mr. Bonar Law's advice, Sir Robert Borden retained Sir George Perley as a member of the cabinet until the formation of the union government, at which time Sir George became permanent high commissioner, and Sir Edward Kemp, overseas minister.

With reference to our diplomatic relations with France, I have a few observations to make. The delicate diplomatic situation between ourselves and unoccupied France calls, for, I think, greater clarification than the Prime Minister has given us. Every Canadian, be he of French- or English-speaking origin, desires the rehabilitation of France as a great nation, and is prepared to do whatever is possible to that end. I do not suggest what is the duty of the government in the premises. I do think it is the clear duty of this government to take every necessary action to strengthen the hand of Marshal Petain and his government as at present constituted, but only so long as they fight against the pressure being exerted to secure direct French collaboration against Britain and the empire.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

If we can offer any inducement or assistance to enable them to resist the conqueror's efforts to secure Mediterranean bases and the use of the French fleet, we should do so. But we must safeguard ourselves against any possible advantage being gained by the enemy through our continued maintenance of diplomatic relations with the Vichy government.

I would ask the Prime Minister to state to the house whether the present situation has the full consent and approval of the British government. If it has, then I am content.

With respect to representation in Latin American countries, I suggest to the right hon. gentleman that in war time, and having regard to the huge war appropriation bill which is now before the house and all that it involves, he should give pause before he embarks on a spending campaign for the purpose of establishing diplomatic relations with the south American republics, unless it be that he visualizes the day when we shall join the pan-American union and the north American axis.

The establishment of Canadian legations in the Argentine and Brazil will not be an important contribution to our war effort. It will be no contribution at all, and that is what matters at the moment. I doubt if it will be even an important contribution to our trade efforts with those countries. A trade mission to these countries, or a representative located in the capital of each of them, could and would do a great deal of good for Canada's export trade; but I have never yet learned that Canada's trade was in any way furthered by the appointment of a diplomatic representative. I have urged from the beginning the appointment of some sort of trade mission to these countries, but so far nothing has been done except the minister's visit last winter, which, unfortunately, was more or less abortive because of his illness.

It was upon the theory that Canada's material as well as diplomatic interests would be greatly enhanced with Japan that we set up a legation there. The former occupant of that position impressed upon me personally the desirability of his being knighted so that he would have a higher status and could do more for Canada's trade with Japan. He had his way and was knighted, but I never heard that it was a very effective proposal from the point of view of trade. The Prime Minister suggests that trade commissioners do not have direct access to governments. That is true, but I suggest that that is not the vital and essential point. What is vital and what is essential is the fact that trade commissioners do have access to business men for the sale of Canadian goods and the exchange of commodities between the countries. That is the important point involved.

I have already on another occasion referred to the tribute paid by the Prime Minister to the memory and work of the late Doctor Skelton, Under Secretary of State for External Affairs. I have paid my own brief though inadequate tribute to his memory, and I shall not repeat now what I said then.

In conclusion, I desire to make a few brief observations with respect to Canada's position in external affairs at the present time and during the post-war period. These observations are based entirely upon the theory that Britain will win the war and will not be destroyed, that Canada will assist her in that effort and will not be invaded.

I suggest to the house and to the country that in the present and future circumstances continued membership in the British commonwealth of nations is a fundamental condition of Canada's freedom, prosperity and security; that without the survival of the British commonwealth, Canada's free national life is doomed to extinction; that the friendship and cooperation of the United States are and will remain a condition of survival for Britain and the commonwealth, and the hope of renewed freedom to France and her northern neighbours. For the permanence of this essential transatlantic friendship, Canada has a special responsibility.

The boundary between Canada and the United States is the line of closest contact between the political system of the British commonwealth and its allies, on the one hand, and the republics of the Americas, on the other. Canada has been destined, by geography and by history, to become more and more the bridge, not only between Britain and the United States but between the old world and the new. To fulfil this, her high destiny, Canada must cherish active association in the British commonwealth and must avoid policies that tend to continental or hemispherical isolation which would weaken or nullify Canada's broader connections.

The Americas cannot stand alone. Neither in economic resources, in man power nor in institutional developments can an isolated America find the means of preserving a free world or freedom for any of the nations of the Americas. No matter how desirable closer cooperation with the United States may be—and I welcome such a spirit—every step toward such closer relations must be matched by constructive movement toward continuing full cooperation in the British commonwealth, and especially with Great Britain.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in joining in this debate this afternoon I do so with some timidity because I realize that we are discussing the external affairs of Canada rather than the internal economy of our country and its relation to our war effort. For several days we have been considering the war appropriation resolution, and in all probability we shall continue to discuss it for a considerable number of hours. Consequently the few remarks which I shall make this afternoon will be confined rather to our relations with other countries and to one aspect of our war effort which I do not think has been sufficiently emphasized.

I know it is of great fundamental importance that we should organize our economic strength in order that we may give to the cause in which we are engaged that assistance which we can best give. But there is another phase of the struggle to which I think sufficient attention has not been given, that which I would term the political arm of the struggle. We have been dealing with the military activities, we have been dealing with the economic activities; I suggest that we ought to be giving some attention to the political activities of the allied nations.

What are we fighting for? That question is being asked in our own country, and, particularly, in the United States. Those of us who have been following the debate in the United States congress on the lease-lend bill will have noticed that on more than one occasion a senator or representative has introduced that angle into the discussion. One of the supporters of the measure is Senator Austin. No one can accuse him of being lukewarm to our cause, but I notice that a few days ago he once more raised that question in the discussion of the lease-lend proposals.

It seems to me that we are fighting for the things for which the common people of Great Britain are fighting. In the mighty struggle across the seas the common people of Great Britain are throwing their full weight and support into the war because they believe that out of it will come something better than they or the world have ever known. I am disturbed when I read of prominent people in our own country taking issue with what has been said by men like J. B. Priestley or Right Hon. Ernest Bevin. I read with a great deal of interest the report of a speech made by Senator Meighen, not in the other place but at a public function at Toronto. He is reported to have said:

> Mr. Bevin says that universal socialism, with the rights that are the heritage of the common man, is to come all at once upon us. Privileges are to go at once and forever, and the state is to take charge of the nation's affairs, in all departments.

Of course Mr. Bevin did not say quite that. What Mr. Bevin and the other leaders of Britain's dynamic labour forces have said is that out of this war must come a newer and a better way of life, a newer and a better society in which man will be able to find security and the right to enjoy the fruits of his labour and the fruits of the great scientific age in which we live. I should like to quote the comment of Mr. Meighen. He said:

> Is that what we are battling for? I think not. If this is the direction in which we move; if property, profit, the reward of toil, the fundamental instinct of the human race to gain, to acquire, to have, to reach somewhere is taken away, then I, for one, do not feel that we have anything worth fighting for.

I venture to say that if a man connected with one of our trade unions or farmer organizations, pointing to the condition of unemployment and the poverty of the agricultural producer who has produced too much, had dared to say something of this sort on a public platform in Toronto, the attorney general of Ontario would have laid a charge against him for his utterances as being subversive of our war effort. And I say that a statement of this kind is subversive of our war effort because while perhaps Senator Meighen overemphasized one phase of what Mr. Bevin said, nevertheless it is true that the common people of Canada and of other lands are not fighting this war so that a few men may gain, a few profit and a few acquire, but rather that the fruits of human labour and of the age in which we live may be more properly distributed than we have known them to be in days past. Other leaders of the British labour forces have said much the same thing. For example, Mr. Arthur Greenwood, who you will recollect at the eleventh hour, nay the twelfth hour after Munich, rose in the House of Commons when the fate of Poland was in the balance and even those in opposition to him called to him to speak for England. Said Mr. Greenwood:

> It is urgent, in this great struggle, that the whole of our material resources should be mobilized behind the national cause. The only way to do this is the socialist way, not perhaps in every detail as we have thought it out in days of peace, but in principle and spirit. War may alter the method, but it cannot alter the socialist purpose, which is to bend all our national resources to public ends.

It is true, of course, as I said the other afternoon that the word "socialist" to-day has a good many meanings and its meaning all depends on who uses it. While the fundamental principles are there, there are those who tried to prostitute the meaning of the word because socialism was popular in some countries and unpopular in others, and they used it in different ways in different countries according to whether it was popular or unpopular there.

But we of this little group in the House of Commons are supporting this struggle because we want to fight for the things for which the British people fight. We are not supporting the struggle in order that the system which allowed men to acquire and to gain control of vast amounts of profit should be perpetuated.

When we met in our annual convention last October we received a greeting as we usually do from the Labour party of Great Britain, for throughout our entire existence they have recognized that our philosophy and theirs meet not only at many points but at all points, and I should like to place on the record our reply to their greeting so that there may be no misunderstanding as to what our position is in relation to the present struggle. We sent this telegram, which was approved by our entire convention:

> Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in national convention appreciates greetings from Labour party. Convention has authorised national executive to express gratification for the magnificent contribution labour is making towards the preservation of human liberty, and the leadership it is giving in interpreting democracy in terms of social betterment. Our convention assures the Labour party of our wholehearted support in carrying on the war and in its efforts to build a new and better social order.

Mr. REID: If the hon. member would permit a question, he said that the British Labour party or the British Socialist party met the views of his own party at all points. Might I ask if the British Labour party agree that production should be for use and not for profit?

Mr. COLDWELL: Certainly.

Mr. REID: The British Labour party?

Mr. COLDWELL: Certainly, it has exactly the same philosophy that we have in that regard, namely that production should be for use and not for profit; that is to say, that the motive of production should be the motive of consumption or of use, and not the motive merely of making a profit for the people who happen to own the resources and the machinery of production. That is the philosophy which stands behind all movements like our own throughout the world, and incidentally may I tell my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Reid) that a convention of the clergy assembled recently at Malvern, England, under the chairmanship of the Archbishop of York said in their main resolution that out of this war must come a cooperative commonwealth in which the motive for production must not be profit but consumption. It is the same idea. Of course that does not mean, as some people seem to infer, that the retailer who handles a pound of tea should not sell it for 35 cents when he paid only 25 cents for it. Nothing of the kind, because in that extra ten cents are various items—his rent, payment for his labour, overhead. That is not profit. It is merely a reward for the services which he is rendering to society, which is an entirely different thing. The definition which I have just given is the one which is accepted by all economic writers who know exactly what they are talking about.

I said a few moments ago that I wanted to say something about the political aims of this war. First of all let us turn for a moment to see how the German nazis have appealed to some people in the countries which they have overrun and how they have been able to dominate the thinking in those countries. True, they have in mind a Europe organized completely as one great economic whole, and dominated completely from Berlin. But they go further than that. They want a world organized and dominated from Germany; there is no question about that. The economic proposals of Germany are for a single monetary system in Europe, a single economy for Europe, and such as it is, if it may be dignified by the name, a single culture for Europe—all of course controlled from Berlin by the people who to-day control Germany and to a large extent Europe. This, it seems to me, is an even wider aim than Napoleon ever had. Napoleon had as an ideal the removal of the national boundaries in Europe, or at least the binding together of Europe under the leadership of France. Hitler, however, would not bind all Europe together under the leadership of Germany, but, rather, would bind it together under the domination of Germany for exploitation by the German political party of which he happens to be the head.

Throughout Europe and throughout the world there are people who profoundly disagree with such an aim. They are to be found, as I have said, in every country; and surely we should take every opportunity of appealing to these people. Let us remember that this is not a war between Britain and Germany; it is a war between the way of life which we visualize and the way of life which the nazis visualize; and unquestionably millions of people now under German domination sympathize with our point of view rather than with that of those who dominate them at the present time. To my mind it is a profound mistake to talk about exterminating or destroying the German people. There are many Germans in concentration camps, or underground, or in exile across the world, who have a more bitter hatred—and with reason—of Hitler than any one of us can possibly have. We should be appealing to those people.

Nor should we forget this, as I heard J. B. Priestley say over the radio a week ago last night, that there are among us those who are as much enemies to the things for which we fight as are the German nazis. There are among us those who speak our language, share our blood, are of our people and our race, whose ideas have more in common with those of Hitler than with those of the democratic leaders in this great struggle.

Let me repeat: The people who once formed the forward-looking movements of Europe—the great social-democratic movements of Norway, Denmark, Holland, France, Germany itself—are not all dead. We have allies in every conquered country, and I believe that the victory of our cause will depend upon the extent to which, when the time comes, these people are able to and will assist us in the struggle. We must, therefore, appeal to our potential allies everywhere. Sometimes our cause is badly served by people who are high up in our own state. Recently there was published a little pamphlet called The Black Record, by a high diplomatic officer of the British government, Sir Robert Vansittart. In that pamphlet he does nothing but condemn all the people who have lived in Germany for a long period of time. To my mind we shall have to seek potential allies among some of the very people who are now under the heel of Hitler.

The road which lies ahead of this country and of the other nations participating in this war is undoubtedly long and terrible. I sometimes think that our cause is not well served in another particular, that often we give too much credit to Hitler and those round him for their ingenuity, their ability to think up new ways of waging war and of frightening their opponents. After all, if a nation is frightened it is already partly conquered. One of the reasons why I believe that the British people will eventually win the great struggle which lies ahead of them is that they have refused to be frightened. They have heard, and some of us have heard, the broadcasts of Lord Haw-Haw and other propagandists of Germany telling them of the terrors that lie ahead. But, although quite properly they are alarmed, they have refused to become frightened. In my opinion we should try to give our own people the idea that we, too, can prepare some surprises; that we, too, can garner together a great strength, and that we, too, can go forward to ultimate victory. That is one of the reasons why I should like to see at this session of parliament a full and frank discussion of our country's war effort, so that we may know exactly where our weaknesses and our strength lie. May I tell the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that, having crossed this country twice in the last several months and met a large number of people, I know there is a great deal of criticism, much of it in all probability not well founded, but it is there because this parliament has not thoroughly gone into every detail of our war effort, as perhaps we ought to have done.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) contrasts our own war effort with that of Australia. We of this little group have always held the view that Canada's best contribution can be made, not in raising large bodies of men and sending them overseas, but in organizing our industrial strength so that, without profit to any individual, we can provide Great Britain with quantities of equipment, when air raids have devastated industries and made it difficult for her to provide for herself; and that, it seems to me, is still the best effort, by a long way, that we can make. Moreover, I would go so far as to say that, if we adopt that policy, much of this production should be a gift from Canada rather than an account which some day we shall collect.

May I also say in this regard that it would be well if the government paid some heed to criticisms which are being made, in another particular, of the lend-lease bill in the United States. I have heard United States commentators say that Great Britain is asking of the United States something which Canada is not giving; that she is asking their country to lease-lend equipment, but that she is paying for all the equipment she receives from Canada. Obviously that is not true, but I have heard nothing that offsets that argument, and I have heard it repeated on a number of occasions over various United States networks as I have listened to the Washington news at night. They are networks to which our people in Canada listen, as I often do when I am at home myself. It conveys an utterly wrong picture of what this country is doing, because we are maintaining at our own expense a comparatively large force across the seas in Britain and Iceland as well as in the outlying parts of this continent; and at the moment we are supplying that force with large quantities of equipment.

The leader of the opposition made a comparison with Australia.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not a comparison; I simply said what Australia was doing.

Mr. COLDWELL: The leader of the opposition praised Australia. I, too, would join in that praise of our sister dominion. She has done a remarkable job. But I wonder how many in this house know that the smaller dominion of New Zealand, with a population of less than 1,000,000, has done relatively more than Australia, has done relatively more than any of our British dominions. Is this not significant; for that country has had in power for the last six years a labour government, a government which at Geneva, on every occasion during those years, protested against the desertion of the principles of collective security by the great powers and urged that the security of New Zealand, as of every other nation, depended upon such collective effort.

We have witnessed in the last two years, ever since we guaranteed the Polish boundaries on March 31, 1939, an attempt to rebuild some system of collective security which we had failed to preserve when we had an opportunity to preserve it in bygone years.

One other observation I would make, and I would draw this particularly to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). Most of the members of the present New Zealand government opposed the last war. A number of them spent a good deal of the war-time period in the gaols of New Zealand because they were conscientious objectors opposed to the war of that day; and there are many people in Canada and across the seas who, having watched the attitudes of the governments of the world before this war came upon us, feared that those governments were much more interested in preventing the rise of progressive movements in Europe than in preserving democracy in that hemisphere. But now, when the battle is joined and the leadership towards a greater measure of democracy is apparent in the nation which heads this great effort, these fears have to a large extent been removed, although not entirely, from the minds of most of our people.

I said that a great struggle was ahead of us. Those of us, and I am one, who have near relatives in the very heart of this great struggle, hear from time to time their reactions to what is going on. At the present time I have right in the city of London a sister whose home has been partly destroyed by bombs. But the thing that heartens and cheers me is that, in spite of all that they are going through, there is no weakening of the morale of the people. They are determined that there shall be but one end to this great struggle, and that one end is the destruction of all that threatens us to-day.

I believe that at last we are preparing for the task which lies immediately ahead of us. These preparations must be speeded up, and in all the criticisms that we have made and shall make of the government in this regard, that will be the thought in our minds; for, after all, in a democratic chamber it would be a great misfortune if we were all of one mind, if we were all of a single government group. A virile opposition is a valuable spur to any government, and I only wish that the opposition in this chamber at the present time came closer to the number to be found on the government side of the house. I believe that would be of great advantage to the government and to the country at this particular time.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Time will cure that.

Mr. COLDWELL: Perhaps it will, but I am thinking of the situation at the moment.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is where the strengthening is needed.

Mr. COLDWELL: This is a war of machines; therefore the contribution that we can make in the industrial field is, I believe, the best contribution that we can offer at the present time, and it ought to be our principal effort. But if that principal effort is to be carried through, as it ought to be, then we must remember that those engaged in making these machines, those engaged in industrial labour, are as vital to our war effort as the men who are at present training in uniform. We shall make a grave mistake if we do not take labour into our confidence at every phase of the war effort.

I listened, as some others here this afternoon did, to Sir Walter Citrine when he addressed the Canadian club in the Chateau Laurier some time in January. He made it abundantly clear that the reason why British labour had foregone some of their old rights and privileges was that they had absolute confidence in their leaders and were organized to the fullest extent. They were thus able to discuss their affairs with the government and with employers' organizations on an equal footing, and consequently industrial difficulties that arose had been ironed out.

One of our misfortunes is that in our country to-day labour is only partly organized. I have heard it said that it is not more than twenty per cent organized. It may be more than that, but in any event it is not fully organized. Yet we find that there are economic Bourbons in Canada who are trying to prevent the organization of labour. If they only knew where their own best interests lie, they would encourage the organization of their employees in order that there might be an instrument with which to iron out industrial difficulties. If industrial troubles arise in Canada in the future, they will arise not from the fully organized labour groups, but from the sporadically organized groups without the experience of the great labour organizations which could give them the sort of advice they ought to have. If our war effort is to be successful, we should see to it that we do not allow discontent and dissatisfaction to permeate the ranks of any part of labour in this country.

One other factor I should like to mention in connection with our war effort is the condition of agriculture. After all, we have in Canada several million people who are engaged in various agricultural pursuits. To-day their principal product is not needed, because war has cut us off from the markets of the world. A short time ago I again saw huge piles of wheat lying out under the snow in the part of the west which I represent in this house. I know of one man who has a pile of wheat sixteen feet deep, containing over sixteen thousand bushels. There it lies, covered with sheaves, out under the snow. I am not saying that this is the fault of the government; I am pointing out that men in that situation have piles of wheat but have not the necessary money with which to buy those commodities that are essential to the welfare of themselves and their families.

I would urge the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to let these men on the prairies know now what is expected of them during the coming summer. Here it is February 24; in less than eight weeks in the constituency which I represent men will be seeding their land. It is not too early now to give them an indication of what is to be expected of them. If we are going to have a quota system, then let our people know what their quotas will be in order that they may make their plans accordingly; for, as I have said in this house before and as I repeat to-day, those quantities of food piled high, which appear to be a liability and a drug upon the market, ere the war ends may become an incentive to the distressed and starving peoples of Europe to rise against their masters in order that they may receive a portion of the bounty which nature has showered upon us. Therefore, in our war effort we should not overlook agriculture but should see to it that agriculture receives proper consideration at this time.

I have one other point I want to place before the house. We must begin at once to prepare for the conditions that are going to come upon this country after the war. When I think of what may happen when the war ends, it seems almost like a nightmare. We say we are going to place an additional three hundred thousand men, and perhaps some women, in industry in the next year or so; the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) told us that the other day. The Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) has told us of plans for training thousands of men for the new industries that are now coming into operation; plans which, if I may say so, seem somewhat inadequate. Should the war end with a victory within six months, what are we going to do with these hundreds of thousands of men who will be demobilized from industry, particularly if we add to them the many thousands who will be demobilized from the armed forces of the crown? I fear that unless we are properly prepared, we court great social trouble, almost social chaos. I do not think these men, some of whom have known poverty and unemployment, some of whom have ridden the rods from one end of this country to the other, will consent to be placed back in a position where they will live at a level lower than that of decent subsistence, and perhaps have to ride the rods again.

I am most anxious to see the ablest committee that can be appointed by the government and by this house begin now to make plans for that future day. It may not be—I hope it is not—as far off as we sometimes fear it might be. I noticed a short time ago, I think in the press, a report that the Prime Minister had appointed a committee of departmental officials. This is not enough, although I have confidence in many of our departmental officials. Like the leader of the opposition, when Doctor Skelton died I felt that, without making any comparison that might be taken in a wrong way, Canada had lost its greatest civil servant, a man who served this country as few others have ever served it. Therefore I have no criticism to offer of many of our departmental officials, but they view matters from the departmental angle, and we need a committee with a wider viewpoint.

Finally, I hope our government will maintain and extend its friendly relations with the United States. Indeed, I hope the government will maintain and extend its friendly relations with all the peoples of the American hemisphere. Contrary to the view expressed by the leader of the opposition, I think it an excellent thing that representatives are to be appointed to the principal south American countries. I am glad the Prime Minister is going to appoint someone to take over the load that cannot now be carried by Mr. Christie because of ill health. May I respectfully submit to the Prime Minister that when he appointed Mr. Christie I thought he made an exceedingly good appointment, because it was a well deserved promotion for a man who had served Canada well in the public service. I was hoping that the right hon. gentleman might be able to find among those in his department some other trained official who could take over that post in the United States. I repeat what I said a few moments ago. I consider it most important that we should maintain the closest contact with the United States, that we should have representation there able to meet any criticism, of ourselves or of our war effort, of the type to which I referred a little earlier in my remarks.

These are some of the thoughts that we have in mind at the present time. As regards the actual details of our war effort, we shall have another opportunity of discussing them on another measure. All I want to say now is that we hope that the next few months, very difficult though they may be, will result in a victory for our cause, and that in the meantime we may consider our internal conditions and prepare to meet the problems that inevitably will arise when this war ends.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I represent a group and a movement which, while a definitely reform movement, advocates something which is almost diametrically opposed to what has been advocated by the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Coldwell). We do not believe it will be necessary to take away from men the incentive for action, the right to own and control their own property, their own industry. We do not believe it will be necessary to take away from men the right to rule themselves, not only as large units but as smaller units. We believe we have a method which, if adopted and applied wisely and honestly, will accomplish the ends which I have mentioned.

My remarks will have more or less to do with the internal economy of the country. I am going to quote from the Prime Minister's speech three small excerpts which might form a text for my remarks. The first is found on page 806 of Hansard:

> It is not possible to divorce war enactments and the foreign policy on which they are necessarily based. This is particularly the case at a time of war when both foreign policy and war measures themselves are focused upon the successful prosecution of the war.

With that I entirely agree.

From page 809 I quote the following words:

> That the forces of freedom will triumph in the end, I have no doubt whatever. But equally I believe, as I have already so frequently said, that the road is going to be much harder, much longer and much more terrible than most people imagine. We should govern our thoughts and actions accordingly.

Again I find myself in complete agreement with the Prime Minister.

Finally, on page 813 I find these words:

> The united national support of each dominion for its war effort will continue throughout the war to be more important than all else. Under constantly changing conditions, that unity will, I believe, be better maintained by the presence of the prime minister at the head of the administration at home than at the council table in London.

Upon the latter sentence I shall not make any pronouncement; my point of view would be that it is the Prime Minister's own business whether he stays at home or goes abroad. We elected him to use his discretion, and whatever he chooses to do he will have my support in doing it. With the former sentence I heartily agree.

What I am going to say next may meet with less approval than what I have already said. I have said two or three times that when I felt that the government were following policies injurious to the Dominion of Canada I would take every opportunity to oppose those policies, and would indicate the points on which I believed they were in error. I should like to quote now some small excerpts from the supplementary submission by the government of the province of New Brunswick to the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations. It is not my desire to raise the contentious question of the Sirois report, but I believe that commission served a great purpose to this country in that it caused people everywhere to think about our problems and elicited from every province valuable comments upon its particular problems as well as suggestions for their solution. Having said that, I quote some words which I think will be unpalatable to most hon. members. On page 3, referring to confederation they say:

> The result has been that confederation has not conduced in any way to the welfare of New Brunswick, and has been disastrous to this province.
> Thus the main object of the union has been nullified and this has given rise to practically all the difficulties which now exist.

Those words are sufficiently solemn to require no comment from me. Then I read from page 6 of the same document:

> Canada can only be great if it carries out its obligations. National unity can be developed and exist only on the basis of a national economy, not an international economy.

It would be unfair for me to read into those words an interpretation which perhaps they were not intended to convey, but I think everyone will grant that a person is at least free to suggest that the writer had in mind economic nationalism rather than such dependence upon trade as we have had.

I read next from page 4 of the same document. Speaking of Canada, the writer says:

> Its duty is toward the provinces as provinces.

And again:

> Nearly $300,000,000 of the public money of Canada are invested in the United States for the development and operation of railways, harbour facilities and even coal mines in that country.

It would take too long for me to comment on that remark. Perhaps some day I shall say more about it.

Finally, I read from page 6:

> In any federal union each province or state should have a fair deal and centralization of power is fatal to the union. Centralization is unthinkable under the confederation of the British North American provinces scattered across the continent. If centralization is persisted in by parliament there is an apparent danger that it will destroy confederation.

It will now be apparent to hon. members why I selected as my text the Prime Minister's solemn remark as to the importance of Canadian unity. Doubtless all hon. members have been as much alarmed as I have by the tendency toward centralization which is apparent at the present time. I have in my hand the A.M. Papers of February 17, issued by the Department of Munitions and Supply, setting forth the contracts awarded in the week ended on that date. I find that of 110 contracts fifty-eight were placed in Ontario, thirty-one in Quebec, only eight in British Columbia, six in Manitoba, two in New Brunswick, two in Alberta, two in Saskatchewan and only one in Nova Scotia.

When the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) was being criticized on this score the other day, he defended himself by pointing out that orders were placed where they could be filled. I am not questioning that; what I am pointing out now is that in the Dominion of Canada a development has been going on which has so centralized the industry of this nation that it has become necessary to place these orders in the two central provinces. May I hasten to say that I am not finding fault in any way with Quebec or Ontario. The people of those two provinces are good Canadians and are entitled to their full share of the good things available in this nation. But let it not be forgotten for one moment that the people of every one of the nine provinces of Canada have an equal right. If that is forgotten, then unquestionably the unity of this country will be threatened, or, if not the unity, at least the strength.

May I cite another example of the dangerous centralization which is going on in Canada to-day? I have the Department of Munitions and Supply sheet issued on February 15, and in it I read the following words concerning a gentleman appointed as motor vehicle controller.

Mr. MARTIN: A good man.

Mr. BLACKMORE: He needs to be a good man to fill that position justly and equitably. I read the following words:

> The motor vehicle controller has wide powers to control and regulate the entire automotive industry. He can license any person or company manufacturing or dealing in motor vehicles. He can license manufacturers and distributors of trailers, tires, and all other motor vehicle accessories and parts. He can issue licenses to manufacturers of materials entering into the making of motor vehicles.

Again:

> The controller may prohibit any person from making or dealing in motor vehicles, either entirely or to such an extent as he may see fit. Subject to the approval of the minister, the controller may establish a quota or quotas prescribing the kind, type or model of motor vehicles, and the number of any kind, type, or model that may be made or dealt in by any person or company.

I am not going to discuss the advisability or the inadvisability, the necessity or the lack of necessity, of conferring upon such a man such powers as those. But I am going to observe that in a large measure that amount of power nullifies, during the progress of the war, the all-important provincial power over property and civil rights with respect to motor vehicles. If this man does not exercise the powers of his high office with justice, broad-mindedness and interest in the welfare of northern Saskatchewan and southern Prince Edward Island as well as of Quebec and Ontario, then the result will be a concentration of power which may injure this country quite seriously before the war is over.

Other controllers have been appointed, of whom I might mention just two, the fuel controller and the sugar controller. The powers conferred upon them are well-nigh boundless. As I understand their powers, they can close up a sugar factory or an oil well, or they can put either enterprise under such handicap as will render it economically unsound in a very short time. Should a man in one of those positions wish to destroy industry, we will say in Manitoba, in order that industry in Ontario might get the market, it would be within his power to do so. This could be done by secret devices which would not be observable to the ordinary citizen.

Some provinces are already suffering from the disastrous effects of centralized power which has been used in the past to the benefit of certain interests in the two central provinces. Several of the major disabilities of the provinces have developed as a result of the possession and exercise by Ottawa of the power to disregard the will and the welfare of the provinces. Among these disabilities I would mention, first, the deterioration of industry or its inability to establish itself in any given province. To-day industry languishes in seven of the provinces. As an example, may I cite the state of industry in New Brunswick? Formerly that province was great and well to do, having a rich industrial life and a happy people. In support of my statement I should like to read from page 76 of the brief submitted by New Brunswick to the royal commission. I quote:

> New Brunswick was in a quite different position. It was regarded as the wealthiest section of British North America. There was no racial controversy. The economic situation was satisfactory. The relations with the other provinces were amicable. It had relatively large manufacturing and commercial organizations. Banking houses, financial institutions and insurance companies were established and were giving service in the assistance of industries. The people were contented, well-ordered and enterprising. . . .

Now let hon. members recall the first statement which I read from the supplementary submission of New Brunswick; then let them ask themselves whether or not there is something that can and should be done by the members of this house to help that province.

May I read next from the New Brunswick submission at page 49, where I find a hint of the condition of industry in that province at the present time, and of the underlying reasons:

> The disadvantages from which New Brunswick has suffered in relation to the tariff were further accentuated and increased by the unauthorized burden of excessive freight rates on the railways in the maritime provinces after 1912.
> Principally as a result of these two elements industries became centralized in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Large companies having their head offices in Ontario and Montreal bought up many industrial plants in New Brunswick and then closed them down. The manufacturing in New Brunswick at the present time is insignificant as compared with manufacturing in other parts of the dominion.

I ask hon. members, can this government be justified in expecting from New Brunswick the war effort which she could have rendered had she been kept as strong economically as she was when she entered confederation? There will be those who will say: But that was an impossibility. I challenge that statement. It is not an impossibility for the people of any area in this richly endowed Dominion of Canada to be prosperous and happy; and if any area has become poverty stricken, it is because of faulty principles applied in policies dictated from Ottawa and forced upon the provinces.

May I give just a simple illustration of the way in which Ottawa policies can militate against a province like New Brunswick, and of how utterly helpless New Brunswick is to prevent it. On page 63 of the New Brunswick submission hon. members will find a statement concerning Connors Brothers, Limited, canners of fish, principally sardines. In their establishment there are 600 employees. They give employment to 1,000 men engaged in fishing. There is $2,000,000 invested in the industry. Surely one would expect the dominion government to do something to assist an industry of such value in providing employment for the people of Canada and in increasing the well-being of New Brunswick. But this is what this government actually did.

This canning factory in 1937 placed an order in Maine for $5,070.04 worth of tinplate. When the goods crossed the border, the Minister of Finance was not content with charging his duty upon the $5,070.04. He set the price at $5,553, and then levied his duty upon that sum, thereby taking from the company $1,110.60. Then he imposed an excise duty of $199.91. Then he imposed further a dumping duty of $1,066.10. The result was that these duties so greatly increased the cost of the tin-plate, which constitutes a major part of the cost of the final product, that the cost to the maritime provinces was estimated at several hundred thousands of dollars annually, and the cost to the Dominion of Canada was several million dollars annually. I am not going to discuss the possible reasons for these imposts. I merely point to the fact that they were there, and that they militated against that valuable industry which was a natural industry to New Brunswick, and I point out that unless the policies at Ottawa are managed in such a way as to cause the federal government to refrain from placing such a burden upon the industries of a province, the provinces can never be prosperous or strong.

I turn now to a second major disability of the provinces—the alarming development of price disparities, bearing with especial severity upon our agricultural population. In the Searle index letter of February 19, I read the following statement:

> The Searle index of the cost of things farmers buy (147 items) now stands at 142—1913 equals 100. This means that these things cost farmers of the west at the present time 42 per cent more than did similiar items of the same quality in 1913-14.
> The price of wheat, No. 1 northern, on February 18, basis the open market price, was 14 per cent less than it was in 1913-14. This means, therefore, that a bushel of wheat in western Canada now has a purchasing power of 58 per cent only, in comparison with the purchasing power of a bushel of wheat in 1913-14 of 100 per cent.
> The Searle index further shows that the cost of the things that farmers buy has risen 8 per cent as a result of this present war. That is, costs are now 8 per cent on the average higher for the 147 items than they were in August 1939.

Apologists for the government will urge that the prices which western farmers obtain for their products are dependent upon external market conditions, and they will point to the collapse of Holland, Denmark and all the rest of them as the reason why. Their defence is a very weak one. I shall not enter into the whole question just now, but let us as responsible members of this house bear in mind that this disability does exist, and that so long as it exists it is simply fatuous for us to expect from the people of western Canada a similar contribution in the conduct of this war to their contribution in the last war, be their will ever so strong.

There is another aspect of the question which, I think, will require much apology on the part of government supporters. The cost of binders, to take only one example, has risen since 1913, according to the figures I find in "The Cooperative Machinery Plan," published by Canadian Cooperative Implements Limited, as follows:

Year	Material	Labour	Overhead	Experimental
1913.....	$45.56	$11.97	$17.96	$ .34
1936.....	71.06	22.62	33.93	2.55
1940.....	....*	....*	....*	....*

Year	Freight	Agent commission	Gross margin	Cash price Regina	Cost in bushels of wheat
1913...	$17.80	$30.45	$42.94	$167.02	261
1936...	26.08	45.50	79.26	281.00	319
1940...	....*	....*	....*	340.00	637

* These figures not available for 1940.

Those machines are manufactured in Canada. It must lie within the power of the dominion government, or the Ontario government, or both, to control the price of them. Yet let me point out, what I consider a disgraceful thing, that the agent's commission rose from $30.45 in 1913 to $45.50 in 1936, and the freight, over which this government certainly has control if it chooses to exercise it, increased in the same period from $17.80 to $26.08. I am not going into further details regarding the matter. I wish merely to point out that there is here a glaring injustice, that this situation has been permitted by the government at Ottawa to develop, and that a major part of the blame must be assumed by the Mackenzie King administration, for it has held office most of the time during which those changes have taken place.

The increase in price has been made notwithstanding the recommendation of a special committee of the House of Commons in 1937 on farm implement prices. The government received the recommendations of this committee, and then allowed the machine companies to increase the price next year, as if in open defiance of the government, of the committee, and of this house. And we talk about democracy! My local newspaper, the Lethbridge Herald, is very fond of picking up things which men like me say, and writing editorials about "the things that make Hitler happy." I imagine it would be very fitting for them to take this and write a good editorial on it, and I commend to them through you, sir, the suggestion that they take this set of figures and write an editorial on "making Hitler happy." How in the world could one gladden Hitler any more than to show by such things as this that in a country like Canada, with almost limitless resources, the powers that be are strangling, hampering and impairing at every turn of the road the production of this country and its fighting strength?

Not only did a committee of the House of Commons find that these prices were unjustifiably high; a committee of the Saskatchewan legislature on farm implement prices and distribution, sitting after the rise in price, recommended also that something be done. As usual, however, when any province asks the dominion government to do anything, the dominion government slaps it in the face. Let somebody call that "democracy" and defend it! Canada seems to leave her farmers to take care of themselves. Everybody can be the recipient of the most solicitous care and attention, except farmers and labouring men.

May I contrast our way of doing things with what I read concerning the United States? I hasten to say that I have not personally investigated this matter. I have again to depend upon what I read in the Searle letter. But I find in that letter, from which I quoted previously, a statement by the editor which indicates that at the present time the United States is spending great sums of money in an endeavour to bring about price parity, which means, as hon. members know, a set of prices as a result of which the men who produce and sell have a chance to get as much for the commodities they sell as they have to give for the commodities they buy—a set of circumstances which would overcome the glaring inequities to which I refer in the rise of the price index. According to the Searle letter, the United States has made allowances to farmers for keeping certain land out of cultivation, for engaging in a special kind of ploughing to prevent soil erosion, for the planting of trees, or of certain kinds of designated crops and so forth. I quote:

> These benefits to farmers, within the lines of this broad "parity" policy, take the form of cash payments. The editor of this Searle letter has just returned from a visit to certain parts of the United States, and finds that the state of Oklahoma, for instance (the only state of which he secured accurate records) in 1939 enjoyed a total cash income from tne sale of agricultural products of $167,000,000. Oklahoma farmers received cash payments from the federal government in addition however of $27,731,000 or approximately a 17 per cent bonus on the cash they received for their agricultural products on the market.
> It is not supposed that this "parity payment", as it is called, of $27,000,000 brings the income of 213,000 Oklahoma farmers up to the desired and aimed at parity, but at least it is pretended that the cash payment is some step in that direction.

What do Canadian farmers face? Hon. members do not need to have the case reviewed. Out in Saskatchewan they are struggling to organize a cooperative with the hope of obtaining a modification in the price of implements. I contend that no group of farmers in this dominion should be obliged to organize. This government, concerned about the output of agricultural products for the conduct of this war, should be most urgently interested in the welfare of the farmers and go out to seek their needs, instead of pursuing the shifting, vacillating, uncertain, disheartening policies which have obtained in this country for the last several years, and just exactly at the time when the farmer begins to get something like a reasonable price for his butter, pegging the price, putting the ceiling in butter prices, all right, but utterly ignoring the floor.

The third great disability from which the provinces are suffering is that of an outrageously inequitable freight rate structure. No particular province is alone in this respect; I believe all are suffering. I referred for a moment or two to the exorbitant increase in the freight rates on that binder—may I quote again?—from $17.80 in 1913 to $26.08 in 1936. People will ask, perhaps, what will you do? I am not suggesting what should be done. I think I know what should be done. I know there are many people who do not think I do. The amazing thing to me is that so many hon. members seem willing to let the patient die rather than try a new remedy, and they are so cocksure and all-wise about everything one suggests to them. They can sneer and laugh about any new idea, at the same time that they see their country deteriorating into an abject, hopeless, impotent expanse of poverty and misery—in many cases, see their own province doing so. Meanwhile the inequity of the freight rate structure exists, and it is the duty of the men in charge of this country to see that the wrong is remedied. My time will not permit me to go into as much detail as I should like to do in connection with this matter. Probably I shall have more to say about it at some other time.

I am going to refer to a statement that appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail and was reprinted on January 22 in the Fundy Fisherman dealing with freight rates from which Prince Edward Island suffers. Let me read the exact words:

> Maritime province farmers have reason for complaint. According to provincial government officials attending the Ottawa conference, Prince Edward Island cheese is shipped to Montreal, weighed there and then sent back to Halifax over much the same route, for export to England. The producers receive the Montreal price, less the wholly unnecessary freight charges, since all cheese exported from Canada is paid for on the basis of Montreal prices.

I have tried that bit of information on several prominent Canadians and in every single instance they have found it utterly impossible to believe that such a condition existed or was permitted to exist in this country.

> Thus, at a time when the railway between Montreal and Halifax is jammed with trains carrying vital war materials and munitions, and scores of miles of additional passing tracks had to be constructed to facilitate traffic, we have the strange spectacle of maritime province cheese destined for Britain being shipped more than a thousand miles merely for the purpose of being weighed. Is there any reason why the cheese could not be weighed and graded at Charlottetown or Halifax?
> The maritime farmers have another grievance: Hogs raised within sight of Halifax harbour are paid for on the basis of prevailing Montreal prices, less the freight rate from Halifax to Montreal, which means Nova Scotia farmers get about sixty cents per hog less than Quebec farmers. That may be reasonable enough if the hogs are to be slaughtered in Montreal, but it seems a bit thick when they are killed, pickled and packed in Halifax and sent directly overseas, with the overseas price to the Canadian bacon board based on delivery at the Atlantic seaboard.
> Is it any wonder the maritime producers are angry after taking the matter up with Ottawa and getting nowhere?

That last statement is, I think, a challenge to Canada. It is the fact that the maritime provinces have taken up these problems at Ottawa and have got nowhere in dealing with such flagrant abuses as this.

> The whole thing shows a lack of proper consideration.

These are moderate words, I would say.

I did not take the trouble to look up authorities in this matter and I am taking what they say. My time is finished and I will close with this observation. I will merely touch upon the fourth main disability of the provinces, the credit structure, and pass on. We must take action with regard to credit facilities in Canada. Here we have four disabilities from which the provinces of this country, from end to end, are suffering excruciatingly—four disabilities which are hampering the productive power and the war strength of the nation at every turn.

In all sincerity, in all humility and good nature, I suggest to the government that they take steps immediately to remedy these abuses, that they see to it first of all that industry in Canada is decentralized; second, that price parity is established within the provinces. In order to do this, they might plan production, working with the provincial governments and with the producers that we may not have too much goods and yet have enough. Again, let them render it possible for any worthy institution or individual in Canada to obtain credit. Let them modify his costs so that he can produce. Let them provide markets for him one way or another. It may be said, "But we cannot get external markets". I am not asking for external markets. The thing that astounds me is that the men in this government do not realize that one can have internal markets without depending upon markets abroad.

Let the government manage prices by producing plenty through the bonusing of labour costs and production costs in order to allow the primary producers to get fair prices for their products and to obtain at fair prices the commodities they have to buy.

Let the government discharge their responsibility, entered into at the time of confederation, to provide freight and other transportation as a service, giving all the people throughout the dominion a fair chance in the matter of freight rates.

Let the government devise and enforce an equitable freight rates structure planned to aid producers and consumers and not to enrich the shareholders of big railways.

Finally, let the government discharge their responsibility under item 15 of section 91 of the British North America Act, in which the dominion was given charge and responsibility concerning banking and credit, which means that it is Canada's business to see that the credit-worthy people of the country receive credit whether the bankers think they ought to receive it or not.

If the government will do these four things, they will find very soon that there will be a much more united Canada, a much more powerful Canada, a Canada that shall go forward in this great struggle with confidence and assurance, using to the full the resources God has given her.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, my reason for taking part in this debate is more particularly that I feel it my duty to make my position clear before the house and before the country on one or two points which were raised in the house and in the newspapers last week. Before doing so, however, I wish to say a few words on the subject matter of the debate, the purpose for which the motion to go into supply is before the house, namely, external affairs.

Of course at the present time all our activities in external affairs are governed by the war. The foreign policy of Canada or of any country is determined by its national interest and by its cultural and moral structure. We are at present going through a terrible crisis. Canada accepted the necessity of this war because she could not do otherwise, and because her honour and her most sacred interests were at stake.

The British commonwealth of nations represents a civilization to which the members of that commonwealth are so deeply attached as to be ready to defend it if the need comes. Hitler is making war on the whole world, politically, morally and economically. He said himself only a few weeks ago in one of his famous vituperations:

> Two worlds are in conflict, two philosophies of life. One of these two worlds must break asunder.

Britain and Canada are fighting to save and preserve the soul of man, to save the other world, the one that Hitler is trying to destroy. If, at the start of hostilities, some may have entertained different views as to where our duty lay, surely the events of the last few months must have changed their views about it. In the light of new, extraordinary and unforeseen conditions, surely they cannot stick to opinions which they might conscientiously have entertained when civilization itself was not at stake.

Our policies must be realistic, based on facts, on life. Common to all our national groups in Canada are fundamental ideals that should unite us all. First among these is freedom of the individual; we Canadians do not want to be either tools or slaves. Second is the freedom of national groups in our community to develop their own cultural mentality and traditions; we have only to think of the ruthless destruction of Czech and Polish nationhood to know what would happen if Hitler were ever the master of Canada. Even in France, although there is an armistice, the process is in operation. I received the other day from the comité France-Amerique circulars protesting against the compulsory evacuation by Germans of all the French citizens of Lorraine, all those whose names were not German. They were robbed of their property and expelled from their native land. Everywhere Germany has done away with the national language of the communities she has enslaved. We do not want that in Canada.

The third ideal is the liberty of the Christian faith. Does everybody realize that we to-day are witnessing the same events as happened thirteen centuries ago when the forces of Mahomet tried to dominate Christianity and forced Christians everywhere to take up arms to defend their faith? There were nations at the time which hesitated, which did not defend themselves at the start; they were conquered and they had to choose between death, slavery or adjuration of their faith. Hitler with his complex of divinity would land us back in the dark ages, but of course with the new modern technique which he has invented. As between the Cross and what it means to us and the pagan swastika and what it represents, we certainly choose to defend everything that is dear to us.

Furthermore, a nazi victory would mean the shattering of the world structure as we know it to-day. Some make the mistake of believing that civilization is secure. It is not. We have to watch over it and guard it. Before the advent of dictatorships there was stability in the world; the word of any great country was as trustworthy as its very existence. To-day the new world order is made up of gangsterism, lying and diplomatic blackguardism. If this is to be the victorious order, it will be useless for nations to engage in negotiation or enter into agreements or treaties. It would be better to have no agreements than to have broken agreements. Honesty, justice and respect for the plighted word are necessities in international relations. Until we have those, no small nation can be neutral or secure. I believe in the League of Nations, as does my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and other hon. gentlemen who have expressed themselves accordingly. Perhaps it may have to be reorganized, but an international body is absolutely necessary. We shall, however, have to see to it that the pledge of all members is fulfilled and lived up to.

This is a war parliament. This government has received a mandate to lead the country in this struggle for freedom and peace. Up to this stage of my remarks apparently everyone has agreed with me, but I am afraid I am now entering another field where there may be some disagreement. Suggestions have been made in this house by hon. members for whom I have the greatest respect, and similar suggestions have appeared in certain newspapers, that we should change the complexion of this government and have what is glorified under the name of "national government." I feel it my duty to express my views frankly and respectfully, but firmly. Perhaps I am more at liberty to speak than other members of the government because I would gladly give up my own place to someone else if that were the better course to pursue. I feel sure that those who know me well, realize that it is only a sense of duty that keeps me in the position I now hold.

Mr. Asquith has said that democracy implies that the will of the people must prevail. I ask in all sincerity: Is not the present government the government which Canada said only a few months ago that she wanted during the war? Indeed, every one of us has been accepted and endorsed by the people as part of the government for the purpose of carrying on the war. This parliament is not a pre-war parliament as were the parliaments of Great Britain and New Zealand. This government is not a pre-war government. The war policies of the government were submitted to the people. The issue was fought squarely. The people were asked unequivocally whether they wanted this government to lead the country during the war or whether they wanted an aggregation of best brains, as has been suggested by some newspapers and given by my good friend, the leader of the opposition.

Every candidate of the official opposition was a candidate for a national government. Not only could that be seen in the newspapers of the time; but if hon. members will consult the Parliamentary Guide just issued, they will see that every one of my hon. friends opposite from the leader down is described as "N.G.", meaning "national government". Even the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), for whom I have the greatest respect and affection, is referred to in that way.

Mr. GREEN: I was elected as a Conservative.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The hon. member is referred to as "N.G.", like all the others.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask the minister—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, my hon. friend is "N.G." too.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is that red book published by the government?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No.

Mr. MacNICOL: Whoever put "N.G." after my name had no business doing it. I ran as a Conservative.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Did my hon. friend protest before March 26?

Mr. MacNICOL: I ran as a Conservative.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I congratulate my hon. friend.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): So did I.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I congratulate my hon. friend. So the whole thing was a joke?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is a burlesque.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, a burlesque, and the people of Canada thought it was. I hope my hon. friends will not resent anything that I say. Thirty-nine of them were elected, but there were 206 "N.G.s" who were defeated by the people of Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: I increased my majority.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Can my hon. friend say that the people of Canada want a national government? How can that be said without some degree of comedy? Listen to what was said in the press at the time. A leading newspaper, the Winnipeg Free Press had this to say on March 27, 1940:

> The government support is now so general and national in complexion that, while it may bear the Liberal label, it is, by every test that counts, a "national government." It has in some respects lost the right to call itself Liberal, for hundreds of thousands of the votes cast in its favour came from electors who are not, and never will be, Liberals at all. They were impelled to vote as they did because they resented the kind of campaign that had been waged and because (as they had every right to do) they believed Mr. King and his colleagues when they announced their watchword of "no politics for the duration of the war".

Here is another one, also from the Winnipeg Free Press, written on March 13 last:

> The maintenance of an effective and powerful opposition is the best guarantee a democracy has of dynamic and efficient administration. To destroy or weaken that unnecessarily by the formation of a national government is unwise and dangerous, for no political deadlock has emerged and no major issue has arisen in regard to the conduct of the war which calls for the extreme steps involved in the building of an emergency union of existing political groupings.

The Prime Minister has no mandate to form such a government as is suggested. Indeed, he has a definite mandate against forming such a government; and if the opposition was pressing this request, I know of only one way of meeting it: Let the people decide. Do the people want it? Surely a new election would be unthinkable. Then why try to divide Canada by pretending to unite it? Why throw this apple of discord into our national arena?

My province is unanimously opposed to the proposal. The mere mention of the name "union government" brings forth painful memories which it is almost a crime to resurrect at this time. I speak very frankly. I do not feel that I could sit in such a government if I were asked to do so and represent my province. Frankly I say and I believe, and I think others will believe, that I cannot do it and no other man can either. Do you not think, Mr. Speaker, that anything which would destroy the unity of our country could be called an act of sabotage? In a democracy the designation of the rulers of those who are to be governed is and must be made by the vote of the people. I beseech the promoters of this scheme—and I know they are anxious that Canada should give its best war effort—to let well enough alone. I implore them not to undermine the confidence of the people in their duly and freely elected rulers.

We are being told that in other nations of the commonwealth, national governments have been formed. Yes, in two of them, Great Britain and New Zealand.

Mr. COLDWELL: Not New Zealand—Australia.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Not Australia—New Zealand. In Australia the Labour opposition were invited to come into the government and they declined. They accepted to act as a sort of advisory committee. That is what they are in Australia. But in Great Britain and New Zealand, when the war came, there were in power pre-war governments, and instead of the government going to the people and having them ratify the government's war policy, the government formed what was called a union government and dispensed with a general election. In south Africa, far from forming a national government, they dissolved the union that existed between General Smuts and General Hertzog.

I have here something which comes from a part of the commonwealth whose loyalty will certainly not be challenged—Northern Ireland. There on the 25th of June, 1940—and I take this from the Journal of the Parliaments of the Empire, Mr. Beattie moved in the House of Commons the following motion:

That this house views with alarm the continued refusal of the government to cooperate with all parties in the house for the formation of an all-party government for the duration of the war.

Speaking on the motion Lord Craigavon said:

The thought of including members from the other side of the house has occupied my mind for some time, but I believe the government are in a stronger position as they are; and, therefore, if the hon. member who has moved the resolution will accept my word that I have nothing at the back of my mind but the desire to have as strong a government as possible in the present crisis, it covers the whole ground of the motion.

The question was put and negatived.

Later, on the 29th of September, Mr. Warnock moved the following motion:

That in the opinion of this house the government of Northern Ireland as at present constituted is not the most effective instrument for the prosecution of the business of the state, either in relation to the war effort of the country or the ordinary business of good government, and that the welfare and prosperity of Northern Ireland, present and future, would be better secured by a reorganization of the cabinet.

Those are almost the words which we have heard in this country. The Prime Minister, Lord Craigavon, in reply said:

—that if he thought that any other man could step in with the knowledge he had of the complications across the channel and the difficulties that confronted them, if he thought he could serve Ulster by stepping down he would do so immediately. Mr. Warnock would like to have a general election, because that was tantamount to what his motion came to. It was a very inappropriate time and he doubted very much whether one of those loyalist members who had backed them up for so long would lose his seat.

I, too, doubt very much whether a single one of our members on this side of the house would lose his seat if there were a general election now, as might be compelled by the government acceding to this proposal.

The country has given a mandate to the Prime Minister—not to the editors of some newspapers, important as they may be—to form a government. Public opinion is not opinion that is expressed most loudly by a few. Public opinion is opinion which is socially accepted, reflecting the private views and opinions of the members of the community. Newspapers put forward opinions which are their own, those of the proprietors or editors. They have a perfect right to do so if they are frank about it. But if they say, as some editors are tempted to do, that the opinion of the editor is the public opinion of the country, or of the province, or of the race to which those gentlemen belong, it is a mistake, and should not dominate the policies of any country. Usually it serves a purpose which is not at all the one that they have in view.

There are two classic examples in contemporary times. Take the election campaigns of President Roosevelt, both the last one and the one in 1936. Practically the whole great press of the United States was fighting President Roosevelt. The house knows what the result was. The opinion of the press was certainly not public opinion. The same thing occurred in England not very long ago, when the great newspaper combinations controlled by Lord Rothermere and Lord Beaverbrook tried to establish empire free trade. They were very outspoken, even vociferous about it, but their views were not the public opinion of England nor the public opinion of the British dominions. May I quote in that respect the words of an article that I read yesterday—well, yes, I read these things even on Sundays—in the Political Quarterly, an important English publication:

> But it can be noted that every time the press conducts a campaign which is pure published opinion, it has the effect of making many people puzzled and suspicious. By tampering with opinion, by regarding public opinion as a vague word which can be raked out to support an editorial argument, the press plays with fire.
> The press would be working in its own long-term interests, if it always took its responsibilities to the public 100 per cent seriously and if it asked itself frequently the question to which a preliminary answer has been attempted here: "What is public opinion?" But the deeper question for democracy and far-seeing leadership, and one needing a regular, accurate, objective answer, is "What is private opinion?"

May I speak of one newspaper which is very prominent in this campaign in my own province—the Montreal Gazette? I am a personal friend of the editor of the Gazette and of his representative in the press gallery, and I should not like to say anything that might be unpleasant. But do you think, Mr. Speaker, that the Montreal Gazette represents the opinion, I will not say of the province of Quebec, but of the English-speaking citizens of that province? Not long ago we had a federal election. I took part in that election in the very community in which the Montreal Gazette operates. The Gazette was then advocating national government, as it is to-day. My two dear old friends, Mr. White and Mr. Cahan, both representing strong and traditionally Conservative constituencies, and very good men indeed, were defeated because their election campaigns were engineered by or supported by the Montreal Gazette. The same thing happened in the provincial election a few months ago. It might appear bold on my part, but I venture to say that I represent the views of the English-speaking electorate of Montreal better than does the Montreal Gazette. When some editors speak on behalf of the people of Canada, it reminds one of the tailors of Tooley street speaking for the people of England.

Is it certain that a union government, if it were formed, would be strong as far as the confidence of the country is concerned? Yes, we had a union government; it carried the country in 1917. I do not want to recriminate or to give any reasons which might lead to a discussion. But as soon as that general election was over, there were by-elections throughout Canada, during the whole term of that union government, and everywhere the government was overwhelmingly defeated. In all the provinces of Canada, except in the case of ministers who, at that time, had to go to the electors after being asked to join the government, the candidate of the union government was defeated. And, mind you, all those constituencies had elected union government supporters in 1917.

In Ontario that happened in Glengarry and Stormont, Ontario North, Peterborough West, Temiskaming. I will not refer at length to Quebec; it is not necessary to do more than call attention to Quebec East, Kamouraska, and the St. James division of Montreal. But in New Brunswick there was Victoria and Carleton where Mr. Carvell, upon being appointed to the board of railway commissioners, was replaced by Mr. Caldwell with a big majority. In Saskatchewan, when Mr. Turriff was appointed to the senate, the union government candidate was defeated. Is this a good record on which to recommend similar government at this time? No, Mr. Speaker.

The internal advance of democracy depends upon giving expression to the will of the people. Nazism and fascism have nothing new in them, because they are merely the old sort of tyranny when a government was seized or set up by a group instead of being selected by the people of the country. Even those who clamour for a national government say that there must be a strong opposition, and they are right. An opposition is a necessary part of a democratic parliament. It has duties to perform as important as those of the members on the government side. Do any of my hon. friends believe that the joining together of all groups in a government is desirable if it has the necessary effect of further weakening the opposition? I do not. I reiterate my plea to the promoters of this proposal not to persist in an endeavour that will be detrimental to the cause which we all desire to serve.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must remind the right hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I shall be through in a moment, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. members: Go on; go on.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): We need unity in Canada, for the carrying out of both our internal and our external affairs, and we may thank Providence that unity exists to a greater degree than it has ever existed in any other period of our history.

I remember meeting Mr. Andre Siegfried, a prominent French writer, a few years ago. He is well known in Canada, having travelled throughout the country, and he has written books on Canada. He told me that he had noticed some divisions in the country, which he said were quite understandable because of its wide area and the differences in race and mentality. He said there was only one way of uniting Canada and that would be for Canadians to fight for a common cause, to oppose invasion if the country were ever invaded, and to share in the same struggles and the same perils.

I believe, indeed I hope, that the present struggle through which we are passing, the sacrifices in which we are all sharing, may have the effect of welding us into an enduring and stable nationhood. We should learn to be more tolerant of one another as a result of these sacrifices, and we should try to restrain those who have been and are now speaking or writing things which may create friction and may be resented by people in other sections of Canada.

Especially when it comes to creeds and religions, how can a soldier, a loyal worker, go on with his work and continue to make sacrifices if at the same time he reads things that make him feel that in his own country he is an object of suspicions and attacks?

The isolationists in the United States have had no greater mouthpieces than German agents. Hitler has boasted that he uses honest men and honest opinions in every country to serve his purposes, and those who know what has happened in Holland, Norway, Belgium and France know that this is true. The fifth column rather than armed forces defeated these countries.

I have read a book published a couple of weeks ago by a prominent French writer who now lives in Montreal, M. Andre Cheradame. The book is Défense de l'Amérique, the Defence of America, and I hope it will be translated and distributed throughout the dominion. What has happened in Europe during the last few years before the war, and more particularly in France, is described in this book in an illuminating manner. It will open the eyes of many. In France in the last few years, without the people knowing it, newspapers, large and small, were doing the work of the agents of Hitler. This is being done now in south America and in the United States, and it is paid for by our enemies.

I disagree with the leader of the opposition, who the other day criticized the expenditure of the money that is being devoted to the bureau of public information. We are not spending enough on public information. The dissemination of propaganda has been the greatest part of the enemy's activities. The greatest victories achieved by Hitler have come about through the disintegration of morale and opinion in the various countries in which he intended to wage war afterwards. To combat this, it is necessary to spend money. It must be fought by our own bureau of information; and, although the word is not usually popular, we must use propaganda in order to destroy the evil work of the agents of our enemies.

Let us end discussions and contests on small questions and discuss the larger ones. Let us not have our perspective obscured by smaller interests, thus being prevented from seeing the larger interests upon which the safety of the country depends.

Internal weakness brought about the fall of France; there is no doubt about it. We must try, therefore, to strengthen our hands against internal weakness and to do our best, every one of us, to keep our country strong.

I was referring to what was being said. Sometimes extracts from certain writings in my province are translated and published in the English-speaking provinces, and sometimes extracts from newspapers in the English-speaking provinces are translated and published in my own province, just to create trouble and difficulties. But the bad things that are published in the English-speaking provinces, I tell my friends in my province, do not represent the views of the English-speaking electors of Canada; and I ask my good friends from Ontario and the other provinces not to believe that certain things they may read are an expression of the views of patriotic Quebec.

Pestilential microbes and animals do not prevent nature and the world from being a work of beauty. Last week I completed thirty-seven years in this House of Commons, and at the beginning of my thirty-eighth year I pledge myself to employ the years which remain to me in fighting any diabolical conspiracy of malicious, narrow and despicable microbes, whenever and wherever they may be found, in order that they may not defile the work of beauty that is Canada.

Another word and I shall conclude my remarks. I want to say a word of admiration for Britain. We admire Britain; the world admires Britain. We admire the British army, the British air force, the British navy; but, above all, our admiration goes out to the millions of common, long-suffering men, women and children, exposed by their own free choice to mutilation and death, who could end the war by surrender if they brought pressure to bear on their government but who courageously refuse to do so. Mr. Speaker, such a nation is a great nation. Such a nation cannot die. Such a nation cannot lose. To be the associates, to be fellow-citizens in a great commonwealth of such a people is the proudest honour that could come to any country in the world. Yes; in all our activities and our sacrifices for freedom we will endeavour to be worthy of that splendid people and that great nation, and we will not fail her in her hour of trial.

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to take part in this debate; but in view of the latitude that is given on the motion to go into committee of supply, I feel that some matters require a little discussion. Since the house adjourned last December, many things have happened which have pretty well changed the complexion of the whole situation in Canada. From one end of the country to the other, newspapers, public gatherings and public speakers apparently have changed their general attitude, so that to-day they are criticizing not only the government's war effort but also many other things the government have done. If those criticisms emanated only from Conservative newspapers or Conservative speakers, one could put them down immediately as political propaganda, but such is not the case. Some of the most vitriolic attacks on the government have come from former friends of the government, from newspapers which a few months ago were very friendly indeed.

I am not, however, particularly concerned about the attitude of the newspapers. During the last election campaign many of them could not say enough partisan things in favour of the government. They have now changed their tone, and to-day from one end of the country to the other the newspapers are demanding national government. Why they have changed their attitude I do not know, nor am I very much concerned about it. But I do resent, with all the strength at my command, the fact that these same public speakers, these same newspapers, these same public gatherings that are belittling the government's attitude and its war effort, turn to the opposition and say, "Oh, they are just as bad as the government."

Let us go back to the start of the war. The leader of the opposition of that time pledged the cooperation of this party to the government. We said that in every possible way we would assist the government in its war effort, and we endeavoured to do so. If we offered any criticism it was not because of what the government was doing but because we did not think it was doing enough. We followed that policy during the last campaign. Weeks went by. Statement after statement was made by members of the ministry. We accepted those statements as facts; we took them as the truth concerning the efforts being made by the government in connection with the war. But as months went by and the truth concerning those efforts came to our attention, we began to realize that a great many of those efforts existed in the minds of the ministers or on paper, and had never come to fruition.

After all, if there is any criticism of the government to-day, it is because they have honestly erred, because they have failed to be frank with the members of this house and take them into their confidence. We promised our cooperation. The government never took advantage of that promise except to read in this house statements that later were shown not to be in accordance with the facts. So I say, if there is criticism of the government, it is purely because they have failed to be frank both with the members of this house and with the people of Canada. Time after time we have listened to radio broadcasts asking the people to face the facts. The people are quite prepared to face the facts if they are told the facts; but if you hide the facts from the people, only one thing can happen: suspicion grows and rumours become so rampant in the country that everyone begins to suspect the sincerity of the government in its war effort. If the government wish to carry on in that way, that is their business. If they refuse to give us the facts that we are entitled to, they must take the responsibility for so doing. As far as we are concerned, however, we resent the attacks that have been made on the opposition, because we promised cooperation with this government. This is the first opportunity we have had to get information from the government, and the position of this opposition is that we are going to get the information regarding our war effort if we have to sit here until Christmas.

Time after time discussions have arisen in this house and ministers have passed it off. At times they have shown a very short temper. Private members have yelled "sabotage" and other words because we dared to criticize the government. Those things are not going to frighten the members of the opposition; we are going to play our part in this war. The cooperation we have promised has been studiously ignored by the government; now we are going to play our part. We have as much at stake in this war as they have; our children, everything we own is at stake as well as that of the members of the government. From now on we are going to play our part, just as big a part as the government, and we are going to force the government to give us the information they have repeatedly denied us. It is the lack of frankness on the part of the government that has brought so much criticism down upon their heads, criticism that is in some measure well deserved.

The people of Canada are not expecting members of the government to be supermen; they are not looking for supermen in the House of Commons; they know we are all human. We represent certain ideals, certain policies; but there is not a man in this house who is not concerned to-day about one thing, namely the carrying on of this war to a successful conclusion. If the government, instead of concealing the mistakes they have made, would be honest with the people of Canada, admit they have made mistakes and have as far as possible rectified them, and are carrying on to the full extent of their ability, how much more confidence the people would have in the government. Mistakes have been made; no matter what government was in power, mistakes would be made; but at least let them take the people of the country into their confidence, admit these mistakes, and then the people would feel that at least we have on the government benches men who are trying to do their part.

I have said this on the floor of the house before. I ran as a national government candidate; I believe in it; I still believe in it. But the Liberals were elected; very well, that is the voice of the people. If the Liberals are going to carry on as a Liberal government, let them do so; I have no objection to it. But what we are asking them to do is to carry on this war and fight it, whether they be Liberals, national government, or whatever it may be.

On several occasions we have criticized members of the government because of things we knew were happening in the administration of their departments, particularly in relation to the war effort. Statements have been made by the ministers, statements which we find to-day were not according to facts. The ministers may have thought that what they stated might happen, but thinking is not good enough when even the shores of Canada are menaced. As a result of the attitude of the government, the only thing we can do is to bring publicly to their attention and to the attention of the people of this country the facts, so that perhaps they in turn can stir the government and bring out the true facts of the situation as far as our war effort is concerned.

Let us go back to the statement made by the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) that the war policies of the government were submitted to the people last March. I take issue with him on that. Who can forget the first broadcast that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made then; he did not speak of national government except to associate it with the union government of the last war, and in a very subtle way, as only the Prime Minister of Canada knows how to do; he raised the bogy of conscription. He raised that bogy in his first speech. No one can deny that one of the biggest issues in that election was the issue of conscription.

Then the government was reelected to power with an overwhelming majority, and to-day we have conscription. To-day conscription is the law of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. HOMUTH: Modify it as you like, but let us face the facts. Let us have some courage in this matter. We never question the courage of the men in our air force or army or navy, but we expect courage also from the men back home, and particularly from the men who are sitting in this House of Commons; courage to face the facts, courage to do those things that they think are right, and we expect them to direct Canada's utmost efforts to the winning of this war. If the members of the government, and if the private members of the government party—because, after all, they are a force to contend with—show the courage they ought to show, there will be no difficulty as far as an all-out effort in this war is concerned.

Last fall we met here and time after time we questioned the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) and the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) as to the production of Bren guns. They either gave an evasive answer, or refused to answer, or said that which did not satisfy the opposition.

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend will permit me, the answer I gave him was that I did not consider it in the public interest to make public the number of Bren guns being produced, but I did give to his leader, as I did to the leaders of the other groups in the house, an exact statement of the number produced.

Mr. HOMUTH: The Minister of National Defence made a statement that we were producing ahead of schedule. I disputed that statement; I dispute it now; I am not going into the details now, but I dispute it. I dispute it because of evidence that certain members of the government who acted as counsel for the government before the public accounts committee tried to bring out before that committee. But what I am getting at is that while we were discussing this question and questions were being asked of this government, at the same time the contract was being revamped, a new contract was being made, and no member of the government, not even the Prime Minister, was frank enough with hon. members to state that they were making a new Bren gun contract.

Are we simply pawns in this game? Have we no place in this house? Have we no responsibility?

Mr. RALSTON: Will my hon. friend permit me again? I do not know where my hon. friend gets his facts; I understand that the new Bren gun contract was made in November of this year.

Mr. HOMUTH: It was made in October.

Mr. HOWE: November 29 is the date of the contract.

Mr. RALSTON: And I think this house was sitting in July.

Mr. HOMUTH: The house was sitting in November and December.

Mr. RALSTON: I was not giving my hon. friend information with regard to Bren guns.

Mr. HOMUTH: I am talking not about the minister, but about the ministers generally; one is as much to blame as another. The contract was dated October 31; I have a copy here. I am not complaining about it. Every hon. member who knows what a terrible contract the first one was, is pleased to think that a new contract was made. But when the new contract was made, the former Minister of National Defence, who was Minister of National Defence when the former contract was negotiated, made a statement to the press. This information was not given to the members of the house in spite of the fact that the Bren gun contract and Bren gun production had been mentioned many times. This contract was negotiated and signed while the house was in session.

Then the newspapers broke the story in January. After the story had broken, the former Minister of National Defence gave a statement to the papers to the effect that the old Bren gun contract had been cancelled. The present Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), who was Minister of National Defence at the time the old contract was negotiated, promptly issued a statement denying pointblank that the new contract was a termination of the old. On the contrary, he declared, the government was so pleased with the results of the old contract, that the new contract was a tremendous enlargement of the old arrangement.

That is not the fact. There is practically no similarity between the old contract and the new. The second clause of the new contract for Bren guns negotiated between the government of Canada and the John Inglis company provided for a price and conditions which will prove a tremendous saving to the Canadian government. Further along in the contract it is shown where all the profits accruing to the John Inglis company must be turned back to the government. The contract was different from its very inception. Instead of retaining the tremendous profits they would have earned under the old contract, the John Inglis company is now to be paid a fee for the production of Bren guns. This will mean a tremendous saving to this country.

I mention this not because I and every hon. member of this house are not pleased with the new contract; I am simply drawing attention to the lack of frankness on the part of the government. The government have refused to take the members of the opposition into their confidence. They have refused to trust us with matters that should be made public. If they would change their tactics, they would not only enhance their position, they would increase the confidence of the people of Canada in the government. I could go on to recite promise after promise which have been made by the Minister of Munitions and Supply to produce various things, and which have not been fulfilled.

What is wrong with Federal Aircraft? I do not know, and apparently the members of the government do not know. One has only to read the report of a speech delivered by the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) before the lumbermen's convention in Montreal, where he is reported to have said:

> In some training schools three advanced training planes were doing the work of four because there had been delays in the Canadian production of these planes.
> "Unfortunately, I don't know why it has not been possible to produce these planes on schedule and I am not in a position to judge the delays," he said. But one exasperated officer had told him the other day: "There are some manufacturers who are either damn fools or damn liars."

Apparently he does not know, but some officer places the responsibility upon the manufacturers of this country. Surely the time has come when the house should be taken into the confidence of the government. In view of the feeling which prevails across the country with regard to Federal Aircraft, one of the first things to which this house was entitled was a statement from the Minister of Munitions and Supply or the Minister of National Defence for Air explaining fully what was wrong with the aircraft production of this country and showing how plans had been made to see that the production promised by the minister was accomplished.

Yesterday the people of Canada had the opportunity of listening to Lord Beaverbrook. His was a speech that inspired every one who heard it, but it was a speech which placed upon us certain responsibilities and which showed us where our responsibility lay. He referred to the northwest passage and mentioned the danger that lay in that direction. He spoke of the protection of these islands and what was needed. He referred to the ships that were required in order to replace the tonnage that had been and would be lost. In other words, he referred to the submarine warfare.

In November of last year this government gave a contract to the Midland shipbuilding yards for the building of submarine chasers. What happened? A certain type of hardwood timber was needed for the bottoms of those submarine chasers. I do not know whether this was a cost-plus contract, but from the manœuvring that has been going on I would say that it is. The contract for those timbers was given to a dealer in Toronto, but not a man who owned a mill. They did not go to the big sawmills of this country, or even to the small sawmills, to obtain the timber; they went to this dealer in Toronto. That dealer went to another dealer to get the timbers. That dealer in turn went to a man in my riding who was a milk peddler two years ago. He was asked to produce the timbers so he went out and bought a hardwood bush and hauled the logs into Preston, my own home town, and had them sawn into timbers to be used in building the submarine chasers in Midland. Half the logs were too small and would not produce timber of a sufficient size, so it was rejected. If my information is correct, and I have no reason to doubt it, they still have not sufficient timber to lay the first submarine chaser frame in Midland. If there is no supervision of these contracts, and if they are cost-plus contracts, then I can understand how such things can happen.

To-day the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) told us how the people had responded to the war savings certificates campaign. I can tell the house how pleased we were in the riding of Waterloo South at the response which has been made. In that riding the people bettered their quota. They subscribed to this campaign because they are anxious to do something to help win this war. They feel that this is the one way in which they can help. While the minister is appealing to the people of Canada to pull in their belts, to save their money and to do without many of the things which they have been doing without for years and which they thought they might have an opportunity of having, a contract like this is let.

The thing is passed from pillar to post. Do hon. members think the first dealer was going to carry out his part for nothing? Do hon. members think the second dealer was going to act for nothing? Do hon. members think the third dealer was going to work for nothing? One of the main troubles in the whole set-up of our war effort is the fact that so many of these contracts have been sublet and profits have accrued to those who sublet contracts without their being earned.

We are in this war. We members of the opposition are just as enthusiastic as any other members of this house or as any other group of men or women in this country. We are willing to help this government. We want to do everything we possibly can to help the government in their war effort. But we ask them to be frank with us. We ask them to be honest with us. We ask them to be big enough to admit their mistakes and to show us that they are rectifying them. If they will do that, they need have no fear at all as to the response the people of Canada will make.

The people of Canada can take it. They have taken it before. There are not many homes in this country which did not suffer as a result of the last war. Before this war is over, there will be very few homes which will not have loved ones in the fight. We are all in it as far as we can go. If we cannot have a national government, if we are going to continue to have a Liberal government, let us at least have a fighting government that will make an all-out effort to carry our cause to victory. We are willing to cooperate with the government and to play the game, but we do ask the government to be honest with us and tell us frankly the things they should have told us a long time ago.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this debate, and I wish to say at once that a debate on external affairs is not an appropriate occasion to raise the matters referred to by the last speaker (Mr. Homuth).

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The motion is to go into supply, and on such a motion one may discuss anything.

Mr. HOWE: I had intended to speak at the first opportunity when the war appropriation bill came up for discussion, and I still intend to do so. I shall then discuss fully the production of aircraft in this country and expose the outrageous campaign that is being waged against Federal Aircraft. Never before in my experience as a citizen of Canada have I seen such a deliberate campaign of misrepresentation with regard to a situation which has been reported on by the highest authorities in the industry, whose reports I intend to lay before the house regardless of the fact that in doing so I shall have to give a frank statement of production figures. While it is against the policy of the government to divulge these figures, a situation has developed that, I believe, warrants me in giving the figures, as far as aircraft are concerned. I do not intend to waste time this evening on the situation discussed by my hon. friend, except to say one word regarding the purchase of timber for mine sweepers at Midland.

These contracts are let as a lump-sum contract, a firm contract. The price is established after studying costs in all parts of Canada, and all builders of mine sweepers accept the same price. It is quite obvious that if what my hon. friend the member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) says is true, the operators of the Midland yard have not his great capacity and buying skill, because he could buy the timber very much better. That is their misfortune, and the loss must come out of their pockets. I think, however, that transaction, running into a few hundred dollars, is hardly worth wasting more of the time of the house in discussing.

What I wish to discuss to-night is the Bren gun contract. The position of the Bren gun contract is just this. Before the war, the government decided that it was in the interests of defence to establish the production of Bren guns in this country. I shall not go into the background of the contract. A contract was entered into with the John Inglis company for the production of 12,000 Bren guns, 7,000 for the account of the Dominion of Canada, and 5,000 for the account of Great Britain. Production was to be at the rate of roughly 5,000 guns a year.

That contract became a great political issue. I was not associated with the war department at that time; but having had considerable experience with contracts, I made a study of the Inglis contract, and took it upon myself to rise in the house to speak in defence of it. In my opinion, as I expressed it at the time, it was an eminently fair contract, and I have had no reason whatever to change that opinion.

Bren gun production proceeded according to contract. The result was that when a large demand for guns arose as the war proceeded, the Inglis plant had developed a technique for the manufacture of automatic guns which gave it a particular standing in this field. A great demand for automatic guns developed in both Canada and Britain, and increased numbers of Bren guns were required. Canada was the only country outside the British isles that was producing Bren guns, and I must say, in spite of the eulogies we have heard of production in Australia to-day, that that is just as true to-day as it has been at any time since the war started.

We were called on by Great Britain to increase our production of Bren guns for British account, and by our own defence department to increase our supply of Bren guns for Canadian account. In addition, we were asked to undertake the production of other types of automatic guns, the Colt-Browning aircraft gun, the Browning tank gun, the Boys anti-tank gun—all automatic guns, the technique of building which was the same as had been developed by the Inglis company in the manufacture of Bren guns.

True, we have placed contracts for automatic guns with other firms, but in every case we were faced with the position that the Inglis company had the technique which they had perfected in building automatic guns. They had the trained staff necessary to carry on the work, and they could get into production of a new type of automatic gun from six to eight months sooner than any other firm which had to start from the beginning. What has been the result? Instead of a production of 5,000 Bren guns per annum as contemplated in the first contract, we have to-day a production under contract with the Inglis plant of 97,500 guns per annum.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the minister say whether that is what the contract calls for, or whether that is the production—97,000? Surely the minister does not mean that. You do not mean you are producing 97,000.

Mr. HOWE: I said that the Inglis company had contracts for that amount. I said that the first contract called for 5,000 guns per annum, and the present contract calls in total for 97,500 guns per annum.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not 9,700?

Mr. HOWE: No, nineteen and a half times as much as the original contract, which is 97,500 guns per annum.

What is the position of the first contract? The first contract was to be carried out in the plant owned by the John Inglis company. It is true the government was to furnish certain machinery which would remain the property of the government; nevertheless in the first contract the Inglis company contributed the plant. As time went on the situation changed and the Inglis company was not disposed to furnish the plant for the balance of this work. The result was that we began to build plants, government property owned by the government, to be operated by the Inglis company.

Mr. MacNICOL: Adjacent to the Inglis plant?

Mr. HOWE: Nearby on other property, which was owned at that time by the Canadian National Railways. We built one other plant on the Inglis property itself, and we are building very large plants adjacent to it, across the railroad tracks on property owned by the crown in the name of the Canadian National Railways. Those plants we own lock, stock and barrel. The layout was made by the Inglis company, and the Inglis company designed and supervised the construction of those plants. Would any hon. member suggest that an expansion such as that would be covered by a contractual relation entered into for the production of 5,000 guns per annum? I wonder what would have been the attitude of the opposition had we carried on the original contract to cover changed circumstances such as that. Obviously, what was required for the new operation was a management-type contract, a contract such as we have also in a great many places where the government builds what is in fact a government arsenal and enters into a contract with a private firm to exercise its skill and managing ability in operating that plant for the government.

The result is that we entered into a contract with the Inglis company for the new work, as was always contemplated and always understood, on a management fee basis, that is, a fee representing about three per cent of the cost of the equipment to be produced in those government arsenals. What did we find as time went on? We had the great bulk of the work of the Inglis company under a management fee basis, and the original plant under the original contract, and obviously it was very difficult for government accountants to separate the two contracts. The work was going on in one plant under one contract, and in another building, under a separate contract. Material was coming in from the outside and being used, some in one plant and some in the other. Under the circumstances it seemed common sense to make a blanket contract to include all the Inglis operation and to level off on one contractual relation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You made a new contract and wiped the other one out, and I think you did right.

Mr. HOWE: Certainly.

Mr. HOMUTH: Why did you not tell the house, then?

Mr. HOWE: I will explain that.

Mr. CASSELMAN (Grenville-Dundas): How much money did the government have in the Inglis company before the contract was taken over?

Mr. HOWE: Let us not worry about that. No expenditure was made without an order in council and a memorandum of agreement. Well, we have reached this point: the leader of the opposition says that we were right in making the contract.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A new contract.

Mr. HOWE: What about the terms of the new contract? We said, "We want to get something definite in this. We know what your guns are costing. We know what Bren guns are being purchased for in the United States. We have a fair idea of what a reasonable cost for Bren guns is. We will figure out three per cent of that cost, based on the United States price, and we will fix the profit, not as percentage of the cost of producing Bren guns, but as so many dollars per gun, representing three per cent of what we believe to be a fair price. If you can turn out guns faster than the contract, that suits us very well, and you will make more money. If you can cheapen the cost, as we believe and hope you can, you will obtain perhaps a little more than three per cent, but certainly not more than four per cent." There was more profit advantage to the company in cutting the cost of the gun. I doubt if any man will read the Bren gun contract as now drawn and say that it is not a good one.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Nobody has criticized the present contract. What we do criticize is the secrecy which surrounded the whole matter while the house was in session.

Mr. HOWE: I am just coming to that.

Mr. McGREGOR: What is the price per gun?

Mr. HOWE: Will my hon. friend sit down? This is not a committee. We have agreed that a contract must be drawn, that we must have a new contract. And we agree that an equitable contract has been drawn. That seems to be settled.

What about the manner of announcement? I suppose that in the Department of Munitions and Supply we draw at least three thousand contracts a month. Many of them run into very large figures. It is done as a matter of routine. We have a large staff of solicitors that do that work. So far as I can remember, no contract has ever been announced in this house or to the press. I have never known it to be done. We have arrangements so that automatically, when a contract is awarded, an announcement is made; and if my hon. friends opposite will check back through the books which we distribute every month, and press notices which have been made from time to time in our department, they will find that every addition to the Bren gun plant, every new type of production, and the value of every contract, have been announced. That is all we do in the ordinary routine, and there was no reason why we should depart from it.

It is true that this was a large contract, but we have entered into a good many larger contracts. It was handled in exactly the way in which all contracts are handled in the Department of Munitions and Supply. Surely my hon. friends would not suggest that we publish the details of every contract we make. In the first place, no newspaper would print it. The press would get tired of it after a while. In the second place, it is not desirable, in dealing with private firms, to publish the details of contracts. The information can be of use only to the competitors of the firms in an attempt to "scrooge out" a better deal with the department for a similar type of product. So we do not make any public statement. How did this get published? I will tell my hon. friends that. They may as well have the whole story.

As some of you may have read in the press, I went to England.

An hon. MEMBER: With difficulty.

Mr. HOWE: A day or two after I left Canada, and before, I may say, the acting minister had really got his feet on the floor in my office, a reporter came in with a letter written by, I believe, Mr. Clifford Sifton to his Ottawa correspondent. It contained some rather extraordinary statements about what he understood to be the new Bren gun contract. My secretary, although I think he is as capable a private secretary as there is in Ottawa, used, I must say, exceedingly bad judgment on that occasion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would not put it on him. That is hardly cricket.

Mr. HOWE: There is nobody else to blame, because, as I think he would tell you, he did it all himself. It became a matter of public interest when a newspaper asked for it. Instead, however, of making a press statement on it, he prepared a statement which he handed only to the reporter in question. The result was that, instead of the statement being distributed to all the press of Canada, it appeared in only two Canadian newspapers—which naturally annoyed the rest of the press. Those are the facts. That is not according to the routine of the department; it is one of those things which happen, and which I do not think anyone can explain, but I am taking the house into my confidence and telling them exactly what occurred.

So much for the announcement. We now come to the question of the effect of the comment. In the John Inglis company we have the largest plant in the British empire for the manufacture of automatic guns. I am not certain that it is not the largest in the world; I know of none larger. This plant has come on amazingly. A great many hon. members have been through it. I doubt whether anywhere in the British empire there is a more efficient operation in the manufacture of any type of gun. What has been the effect of the comment? I have a file from the John Inglis company themselves, showing the effect it has had on the morale of their works, on loss of production, and on the disturbance of their staff.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On what?

Mr. HOWE: On the disturbance of the morale of their operating staff; that is, their foremen and superintendents.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is the minister speaking of the cost? I did not catch what he said.

Mr. HOWE: I am saying what has been the effect of the propaganda that went out, of that action by the press.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of the announcement?

Mr. HOWE: The attack that was made. It was not the announcement. The announcement stated the facts. Here are some of the headlines:

Drew states millions to be saved for public by Bren contract veto.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is probably true.

Mr. HOWE: Millions?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Probably.

Mr. HOWE: The original contract was for 12,000 guns. It would be hard to make millions out of that. Another:

Says government taking over war production in John Inglis plant vindicates him—

George Drew. Mark that.

Mr. HOMUTH: It did not vindicate the government.

Mr. HOWE: I doubt if it vindicated George Drew.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. HOWE: I suppose it is; yes. To continue:

Which would otherwise have gone to a group of ambitious promoters who saw an opportunity to capitalize upon Canada's need for weapons.

We have a fine lot of statements there. I doubt if anyone would suggest that, while the brief I have before me may tend to exaggerate the harmful effects, such talk could be helpful to the production of the Inglis plant. What is the object of this sort of talk? What is behind it? Nothing but political kudos. My hon. friend rises in his place on a motion to go into supply on the estimates of the Department of External Affairs and talks politics about the Bren gun contract. Is that statesmanship? He says that so far as he is concerned the opposition will do its duty.

Mr. HOMUTH: Do yours.

Mr. HOWE: I am doing it. I am trying to protect the war production of this country. I am trying to stop attacks upon Bren gun production, and I am exposing the type of situation that we have so far as this discussion is concerned.

I do not know that I am called upon at this time to say anything further, but I do hope to take occasion in the next debate to discuss fully the aeroplane production situation in this country and to deal with some other phases of the war work. It seems to me unfortunate that statements are going unchallenged for the reason that no one has a chance to answer them at the time they are made. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) makes a statement attacking production of aeroplanes in this country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I did not. I asked the minister to make a statement explaining the lack of production.

Mr. HOWE: Yes; but he gave a press release which was the most extraordinary and misleading document ever produced in or out of this house and which I intend to deal with fully at the next opportunity. I do conceive it to be my duty to try to stop these malicious attacks on the John Inglis company in consequence of their contractual relations with this government, and I sincerely hope that these remarks of mine will have that effect.

Mr. BROOKS: I wanted to ask the minister a question for information. In that 97,000 Bren guns—

Mr. HOWE: I did not say Bren guns. I said automatic guns.

Mr. BROOKS: Are there any included for the British government?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. BROOKS: How many are being manufactured for the British government?

Mr. HOWE: I would say about two-thirds for the British government and one-third, Canadian.

Mr. BROOKS: What is the increase in Bren gun production?

Mr. HOWE: This is not committee. My hon. friend will have an opportunity to ask these questions.

Mr. BROOKS: I did not wish to embarrass the minister. I was asking for information.

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): I wish to speak for only a moment or two, and perhaps this is an appropriate time to try to pour a little oil on troubled waters. May I get back again to what I thought was the subject before us, external affairs.

Some months ago I suggested that it would be well for the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the government to consider the appointment of an overseas Minister of National Defence. I do not hope to make any great impression on the Prime Minister's mind by anything that I may say, but I would call his attention to a statement made when the Minister of Overseas Military Forces, as I believe he was called at that time, was appointed in 1916. The powers of the minister were defined by the Prime Minister and are condensed in the Canadian annual review as follows:

1. He was charged with the control of and was responsible for the administration of the affairs of the military forces of Canada in the United Kingdom and on the continent of Europe; the ordnance, arms, ammunition, armouries, stores, munitions and habiliments of war belonging to Canada in those countries; all expenditure incurred in the United Kingdom or elsewhere in Europe for or in respect of these forces.

2. He was given power in urgent matters to act provisionally without reference to the Canadian government.

3. He was charged with the negotiations on the part of the government of Canada with his majesty's government, in all matters connected with the government, command and disposition of the overseas forces of Canada and arrangements for coordinating their operations and services with those of his majesty's troops.

4. He was given power to appoint and pay the necessary officers and clerks and to create an advisory council.

I submit that if a minister, having these powers vested in him, were sent overseas, he would relieve the government here, and particularly the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), of a great deal of routine work and would enable him to carry on more effectively the work for which he is responsible in Canada.

With reference to what the Prime Minister has said about the duty which is now being performed by the Canadian high commissioner, I share his admiration for the excellent qualities of Mr. Vincent Massey, who, in my opinion, is doing a splendid job in England; and I should like to refer to something which perhaps does not appeal to the Prime Minister as much as it does to me, for the reason that, from his habits of life, he is not so well acquainted with the matter. I refer to the excellent work that Mrs. Massey is doing in war services in England. I think, therefore, we are very fortunate in the occupant of that post, and in the fact that his wife is so capable of carrying on the many duties which now are imposed upon her.

In 1916, Sir George Perley was acting high commissioner in England. The government of Sir Robert Borden must have thought it would be an advantage to have an overseas minister who was a member of the Canadian cabinet, who could take certain responsibilities on the spot and act promptly, because he asked Sir George Perley if he would assume that duty. So in October of 1916 Sir George was appointed Minister of Overseas Military Forces for Canada, in which capacity he carried on for one year. I think during that time someone else acted as high commissioner, but at any rate Sir George gave up his new position only when another appointment was made and Sir Edward Kemp became overseas minister, after which Sir George resumed his post as high commissioner. I am quite sure that if Mr. Vincent Massey were a member of the cabinet, he would be able to carry out these duties admirably, although I presume he could not act as overseas minister without being a member of the cabinet.

I do not wish to elaborate further on that subject. In conclusion, I should like to quote a statement made by the younger Pitt on July 22, 1803. At that time, as hon. members will remember, England was at war with France; and if you substitute the name Hitler for that of Bonaparte, and Germany for France, you will see the striking way in which this statement applies to what is going on to-day.

I am certainly not denying that the enemy would find great difficulty and danger in transporting his army to this country, but it is by running desperate risks that he can alone hope for success. We may have a proud navy of ships of the line and frigates. . . . But I can conceive a case in which ships of that kind would not be sufficient to meet an innumerable flotilla of boats issuing from all the ports, harbours, and creeks on the opposite coast of France, and covering the channel for several miles in length. . . . Englishmen must look to this as a species of contest from which, by the extraordinary favour of divine Providence, we have been for a long series of years exempted. We ought to have a due sense of the magnitude of the danger with which we are threatened; we ought to meet it in that temper of mind which produces just confidence, which neither despises nor dreads the enemy; and while on the one hand we accurately estimate the dangers with which we are threatened at this awful crisis, we must recollect on the other hand what it is we have at stake, what it is we have to contend for. It is for our property, it is for our liberty, it is for our independence, nay, for our existence as a nation, it is for our character, it is for our very name as Englishmen, it is for everything dear and valuable to man on this side of the grave.

Parliament has now provided ample means for our defence; it remains for the executive government to employ them to the best advantage . . . If government showed the same determination to apply all those means that parliament has shown in providing them; if the people follow up the example which the legislature has set them, we are safe. Then I may say, without being too sanguine, that the result of this great contest will ensure the permanent security, the eternal glory of this country; that it will terminate in the confusion, the dismay, and the shame of our vaunting enemy; that it will afford the means of animating the spirits, of rousing the courage, of breaking the lethargy, of the surrounding nations of Europe; and I trust if a fugitive French army should reach its own shores after being driven from our coasts, it will find the people of Europe reviving in spirits, and anxious to retaliate upon France all the wrongs, all the oppressions, they have suffered from her; and that we shall at length see that wicked fabric destroyed which was raised upon the prostitution of liberty, which has caused more miseries, more horrors to France and to the surrounding nations, than are to be paralleled in any part of the annals of mankind.

Mr. D. KING HAZEN (St. John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, during the course of his speech this evening the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) informed us that the view had been expressed that we should change the complexion of the government. That was not news. That view has been expressed on many occasions, and apparently it is gaining support. Evidently that opinion is causing some concern to the Minister of Justice and some other members of the government; for the minister devoted the greater part of a speech lasting almost an hour to reasons why we should not have a non-party, a union or a national government in this country to-day. His chief argument was not new; the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) advanced the same argument here some months ago, that the Liberal party was returned to power by a large majority in March of last year.

Mr. GRANT: He was right.

Mr. HAZEN: He was correct in that statement, but he failed to take account of the fact that the whole face of the world has been changed since last March and that the people of this country face sacrifices and responsibilities they never believed they would have to face when that election was held.

On a number of occasions it has been pointed out in this house that party government is having a bad effect on our war effort. It has been stated that under the party form of government it has been impossible to control the political machine, to keep in check strong partisan party followers, and that, in consequence, political patronage, political pull and political favouritism continue. As a result, in many parts of this country to-day there is dissatisfaction and ill-feeling instead of confidence and unity.

A glaring example of political patronage and partisanship may be found in the manner in which the government proposes to conduct the census this year, at a cost of $2,800,000. This undertaking is not to be conducted on a non-partisan basis. The workers employed to take that census, the men and women, will be employed on the recommendation of supporters of the government and of defeated candidates in the last election.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: In what riding?

Mr. HAZEN: This policy cannot be justified in war time, and I would ask the government to reconsider any decision of that kind.

It is, however, not of the internal affairs of party government that I want to speak to-night, but rather of one phase of its external affairs which has been forcibly brought to my attention by a letter which I have just received, which leads me to the conclusion that party government, in one respect at least, is having a bad effect outside Canada.

This letter came from an active official in one of the largest and best known associations of young women in the United States, and had enclosed in it a clipping from one of New York's influential papers. That clipping, which was dated Ottawa, February 15, contained a report of the criticism of the government's efforts that the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) made in this house on Wednesday last. It was too brief an account to give a fair and accurate report of the able address made by the leader of the opposition on that occasion, but the reading of it by a citizen of the United States who did not know what was going on in this country would lead to the conclusion that Canada's war effort was futile and based solely on political expediency. We all know that such a conclusion is wrong, although there have been some cases perhaps of futility and more than one case of political partisanship.

The writer of this letter took exception to criticism of this kind appearing in the public press of the United States at a time when the friends of Britain in the United States were doing what they could to explain the need for and the importance of passing by the senate of the United States of the lease-lend bill No. 1776 that is now engaging its attention.

The writer said, and I think her words are put in rather diplomatic form:

> We are all doing what we can to contribute to the information which each individual here seeks to help him make up his own mind about the wisdom of the bill. The kind of sacrifice which Canada, a sovereign country, is making voluntarily for Great Britain is of great interest to everyone.

It was apparent from the letter that dispatches of this kind were hindering the efforts of our friends in the United States to further our cause there.

The policy of the opposition party, as stated by the leader of the opposition a number of months ago, is to give every possible support to the government in its war effort, reserving to itself the right of criticism. That policy the opposition party has followed consistently, according to its lights. Last May the Prime Minister, in the course of a speech in this house, said that the government expected criticism from the opposition.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Constructive criticism.

Mr. HAZEN: Criticism is one of the duties of the opposition. But a result of criticism under the party system, and that criticism being published abroad, is to harm the efforts of our friends in the United States who are working on our behalf—and I might say on their own behalf—and some aid is furnished to those who are attacking bill No. 1776 in the United States senate. This is something which should, if possible, be avoided. It seems to me that this is another reason, and an important one, why we should have in this country some form of national or union government.

An hon. MEMBER: Does the hon. member want another election?

Mr. HAZEN: In this house and in this country we are united in our determination to bring this war to a victorious conclusion, and we should show a united front to the world in the form of a government which is representative of all parties in this house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The right hon. gentleman did not open the debate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; the minister opened the debate by making the motion. The Prime Minister has already spoken. I have no objection to his speaking, but if we are to have order for one, we must have it for another.

Motion (Mr. Ilsley) agreed to, and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Reid in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

36. Departmental administration, $220,800.

Mr. GREEN: Would the Prime Minister explain what steps have been taken by the government to assist Canadian citizens who may have been caught on the continent of Europe or who are at present in China or Japan or countries in the orient where there may be trouble?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In respect to citizens of Canada who are on the continent of Europe, we have in London at the present time, in addition to the high commissioner and officials of the high commissioner's office, our diplomatic representation which was formerly sent to France and to Holland and to Belgium. The chargé d'affaires of the former legations has taken such steps as he has found possible to get particulars of Canadian citizens who are in different parts of Europe, and to make representations in such ways as are possible to secure their exit to Canada or to London from the country in which they may be at the present time. We are endeavouring also to supply them with such financial assistance as they may require where that is essential toward securing their maintenance and exit.

The situation differs in different countries. As my hon. friend knows, of Canadian citizens who were in France, some are in the occupied area and some in the unoccupied area. No Canadian nationals have been interned in non-occupied France and arrangements are being made to provide facilities for the repatriation to Canada of individuals who desire to leave non-occupied France. Some difficulty has been encountered in securing exit permits. The chief difficulties are in securing transportation and permission to cross Spain. The number affected is, however, very small. The United States authorities in France, occupied and non-occupied, have been authorized to pay up to a maximum of $45 United States funds a month to Canadian nationals, depending upon their needs. No one may secure more, no matter how much his holdings in Canada may be. Recipients are required to sign receipts and pay the moneys advanced out of their accounts in Canada. In case of necessity the necessary funds are advanced if the recipient or his or her family is not financially able to provide for reimbursement. Approximately 60 individuals or families are affected.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has the government any knowledge of any Canadian nationals being interned in occupied France?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Canadian nationals, as well as other British subjects of military age who remained in German occupied France after the French collapse were interned by the German authorities. Approximately ninety men who are Canadian nationals have been interned near Paris. The next of kin have been informed so far as possible. By decree of December 5 the German authorities extended the internment order to include women and children who are British subjects, alleging that this action was taken in retaliation for the action of the British authorities in interning German women and children in England. The total number of British subjects so interned is approximately 3,000. They are interned at Caserne Vauban, not far from the Swiss border. We have not been able to ascertain how many Canadian women and children are included. The United States authorities who are looking after Canadian interests in France state that it is expected that the names of any Canadian women and children who have been interned will be notified to them, as the protecting power.

So far as Asia is concerned, some months ago the government notified Canadian nationals in Japan that it would be the part of wisdom for them to secure passage home. We were not at all certain that their leaving the country was imperative, but conditions were such as caused the government to feel it was advisable to make sure that as many as possible did leave Japan at as early a time as possible, having regard to the time at which the notice was given to them. I have particulars with regard to the situation there.

Owing to the increased tension in the far east, continuous attention has been given to the problem affecting Canadian nationals in the event of the development of a serious crisis. As early as October, 1940, the Canadian legation in Tokyo was instructed to advise women, and children and others whose presence was not absolutely essential to leave as soon as possible. A further warning was issued on October 25. At that time it was suggested that all Canadians should consider the advisability of arranging for their early repatriation. A third warning was issued on February 6, 1941. Of the 543 Canadians known to be in the far east in August, 1940, exclusive of the legation staff at Tokyo and Japanese Canadians, a certain number have moved to safer areas. Approximately 200 have returned to Canada, and it is estimated that some 177 have remained in what might be considered the danger zone. I understand that most of the number that are remaining belong to religious orders. They have felt that they ought to stay at their posts regardless of what the situation might be.

Mr. GREEN: As yet no minister to Japan has been appointed, although the post has been vacant for some years. It does seem peculiar that an appointment has not been made. Will the Prime Minister explain to the committee the reason for this and will he state whether it is expected that an appointment will be made shortly?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We are fortunate in having as chargé d'affaires at Tokyo an exceptionally able member of the diplomatic service, Mr. McGreer. He has had experience in the legations at Paris and Washington, and in the department at Ottawa. He is one of the career men and is well qualified to fill the post of chargé d'affaires. He served under the former minister at Tokyo. From time to time the government has had different persons under consideration for this particular post. I may say that, since the war, there has been a great demand for persons who are prepared to give outstanding service in the different branches of the public service. Some of those who have been considered for the position of minister to Japan have taken on other work which they considered more urgent.

I might cite a particular case. I had in view the appointment of General Odlum as minister from Canada to Tokyo. General Odlum has taken an interest in oriental questions and is particularly well informed on the situation in British Columbia. I thought I had succeeded in having him accept that appointment. As, however, the committee knows, General Odlum has been appointed to command the second division overseas.

Other names have been considered, but special circumstances have made it difficult to secure the person who the government felt was most desirable for this position in Japan. We would wish to have someone with special qualifications. Just at this particular time it has not been possible to secure the person we would wish to have, all circumstances considered. If there had been any reason to assume that Canada's interests and the interests of our nationals who are in Japan were not being carefully looked after by the legation staff at the present time, some further appointment certainly would have been made. But we have every reason to feel that the interests of Canadian nationals and the interests of the government in relation to Japan are being carefully cared for at the present time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It would be a matter of public interest, I think, if, following up the discussion in respect of Canadian nationals, the Prime Minister would be good enough to tell us if he knows the number of Canadian nationals in Germany, Norway and in the low countries, so that we may get a true picture of just what the situation is.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sorry I cannot give my hon. friend that information.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suppose they are in with the British.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I could not hear the Prime Minister's reply. Am I right in understanding that there are international regulations governing the treatment accorded to prisoners of war, and are there similar regulations governing the treatment to be accorded to Canadians who might be in Germany or in German-occupied countries? If so, has the Prime Minister any information as to the treatment that has been accorded to Canadians who are still in German-occupied territory?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is quite right in assuming that the treatment accorded to prisoners of war is subject to international convention. We in Canada are taking care to see that Germans who are interned here are treated properly, and we hope that Canadians who are interned in the countries of Europe are being similarly treated. If we had reason to believe that they were not being treated in accordance with international usage, every effort would be put forth to see that proper representations were made and the situation corrected so far as that was possible.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is provision in the convention, as I recall it, for a periodical inspection to be made of the internment camps in Britain, we will say, or Canada, by a representative of the other belligerents, and we have the same right to make a periodical inspection of our nationals who are internees or prisoners of war in Germany or German-occupied territory. Has Canada taken any steps to see that the terms of the convention are being carried out by Germany, or is that left to the British government or the government of the United States?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The work of supervision in that respect is carried out for Canada by United States representatives, and we get reports from them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a complete answer.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): May I ask if appointments have been made of ambassadors to Brazil and the Argentine, and, if not, when they will be made?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This committee will be asked to consider an item of expenditure to make provision for legations in the Argentine and Brazil, but until financial provision has been made it would not be possible to make an appointment. I assume that there is little doubt that the house will approve the recommendation of the government to make provision for the appointment of ministers to the Argentine and to Brazil, but the appointments must await the appropriations by parliament.

Speaking of the representation of Canada in South America, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) this afternoon expressed a point of view which, it seems to me, will naturally present itself to many who are considering the question of the wider representation of Canada in other parts of the world. My hon. friend felt that this was perhaps not the best time to incur that increased expenditure. On the other hand, the hon. leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) expressed the contrary view and said that he felt that at this particular time it was very desirable that Canada should have representation in the south American countries. The two points of view afford opportunity for debate, and I can assure hon. members that both have been taken into consideration very carefully by the government.

One of the reasons why the government feel that it is desirable to open legations in Brazil and the Argentine is that for some time past each of those countries has been desirous of opening legations in Ottawa. They have felt that it was in the interests of their countries to come into closer contact with Canada. Their association with north America up to the present, so far as diplomatic representation is concerned, has been confined to the United States and Mexico, and they feel it would be to their advantage to be represented here.

Our government has precisely the same feeling about the representation of Canada in the two largest republics in south America, that this is a time when great changes are taking place in the world, that south America is likely from now on to have a much closer relationship in business affairs and in matters affecting government and the like with the continent of north America than she has ever had in the past. Unquestionably south American problems will become increasingly our problems as the situation in Europe comes to be changed for better or for worse in the course of the years now beginning, and the government feel that we owe it to the people of our country to be able to get first-hand knowledge of the changing situation in south America and that we should not leave that field, so far as relationships between countries are concerned, exclusively to other countries, leaving Canada the one country in this hemisphere with no diplomatic representation in south America.

There is the further point which I mentioned the other day, that all matters of trade are becoming increasingly matters with which governments must of necessity have some concern. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition said that he would like to see commercial agents keep more in touch with business men. When it comes to the import and export of commodities, licences have to be obtained and all kinds of controls are exercised. Unless the exporting country has some diplomatic agent in the other country who can make representations on its behalf, it is very likely to be completely ignored in international transactions of the kind. We have been fortunate in having wherever we felt we should make use of it the British diplomatic service, but just as we have found it to be to the advantage of Canada to have our own representation at Washington, Paris and elsewhere, so we believe we shall find it of equal advantage to have our own representation in south American countries.

Speaking on this matter, I should say that other Latin-American republics have pressed for an exchange of ministers with Canada. We have hitherto felt, and I think rightly, that we should begin our representation in south America in the two largest republics, and later on consider its extension to other countries of south America. I should speak perhaps of Chile in particular, but we have felt that until the two legations are opened and we see what progress is made as a result, we should not for the present ask parliament to extend our representation.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will the Department of External Affairs have to consider educating our representatives in south American countries in the Spanish language, or will that be undertaken by our universities?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is no doubt that we shall have to consider very carefully whatever appointments are made. We shall take care to see that whatever is required in the way of necessary Spanish assistance will be obtained in a manner that will be satisfactory to Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In view of the occupation of France and the low countries, would the minister say just where our representatives—Jean Désy, for instance—are at the present time?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As my hon. friend is aware, when Holland and Belgium were overrun, the minister and staffs at both Brussels and the Hague were obliged to leave, and indeed, only got away—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): By the skin of their teeth.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes; as my hon. friend says, pretty much by the skin of their teeth. Certainly they had a very rapid exit, and one filled with considerable adventure. The legation staffs, however, moved to London. Mr. Désy was the minister at the Hague and at Brussels. For some months he was in London. He has since come back to Canada, and was in Montreal for a short time making a very complete report to the government on some matters of which he thought we should be informed. At the present time he is in the Department of External Affairs in Ottawa, on special duty.

As my hon. friend is aware, Colonel Georges Vanier is the minister to France. The government felt that Colonel Vanier would be not only a most acceptable but a most desirable member of the permanent joint defence board between Canada and the United States, and we asked him to come to Canada and for the time being to accept appointment on that board. That is the position which Colonel Vanier is filling at the present time.

Mr. Dupuy was made chargé d'affaires when Colonel Vanier left. Mr. Dupuy has his headquarters in London. He has been to France, keeping in touch with the government there. Other members—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not asking the Prime Minister to go into detail.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: At the present time Mr. Dupuy is acting as chargé d'affaires of Canadian representation to the Netherlands and Belgian governments.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suppose that the decrease in these estimates is accounted for by the fact that the legations themselves are not functioning as such.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There has had to be a considerable readjustment. In some instances as much in the way of representation is not required.

Mr. CASSELMAN (Grenville-Dundas): I wonder whether the Prime Minister would mind making a statement respecting what progress, if any, has been made on the St. Lawrence treaty? This matter is of great interest to my constituency. In common with other representatives I have been endeavouring to get some information over a period of many weeks. As a matter of fact, within the last two months I was with a delegation before the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin) here, when it was suggested to us that possibly we should go to Toronto for our information; I think the minister's words were that it was "a baby of the Ontario government". From what I see in the press I have come to the conclusion that possibly it is a baby of the United States government.

I am particularly interested because apparently the scheme which is now being discussed is one which has never been under consideration before. It is impossible to get any definite information or to obtain maps showing the water levels. This means a great deal to my constituency; I believe that some 26,000 acres of the earliest settled land in Ontario will be covered by water if a single stage scheme is carried out. I understand that such plans are in existence, and, at the time the delegation were before the Minister of Public Works, we received a promise from him that at some time those plans would be available, so that the people in that district would see what they were likely to suffer as the result of a development under a single stage plan. Although my information is indefinite, I have been told that these plans are in existence. When the Prime Minister is making a statement on this point, would he say where such plans can be seen?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not know that I can say more at the moment with respect to the St. Lawrence waterway project than to mention that, as I think my hon. friend is already aware, the subject is a matter of negotiation at the present time between the United States government and the Canadian government. Until those negotiations are completed, when and if they are, I am hardly in a position to indicate to the committee what the nature of the agreement is to be. When my hon. friend says it differs from anything which has been considered before, he probably refers to only one phase of the agreement. The committee will recall that an agreement in the nature of a treaty was made between the government of Mr. Bennett and the government of the United States, but the United States Senate failed to sanction it. Further negotiations have taken a somewhat different form.

The view has been held that all the waterway problems, as far as it is possible to connect them, should be brought together into one agreement and dealt with there; that is to say, matters affecting power, navigation, the levels of the waters on the lakes, scenic aspects at Niagara, and the like. An agreement covering all of these interrelated problems has been under consideration by both governments more or less continuously for some time past. Any agreement which is reached will of necessity involve an agreement between the provincial government and the dominion government as to matters affecting Ontario. There will have to be an agreement or understanding with the province of Quebec with respect to matters affecting that province. I have always taken the position that, with respect to an international agreement, we would desire first to settle matters between our own provinces and the dominion government before we finally reached an agreement with another country. We have not yet completed the negotiations with either the province of Ontario or the province of Quebec. I hope that they will not take long to complete. If they are completed, the next stage would be to continue negotiations with the United States.

My hon. friend's question at the close related, I believe, more particularly to the one stage plan and the two stage plan development at Morrisburg. I cannot say offhand to him at the moment where these particular plans may be seen, but I shall make inquiries and, if they are available for inspection, give him a further answer later on.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If we understand the Prime Minister aright, the whole position is still in the negotiation stage, and therefore he is not in a position to make any statement as to what may be done. And, anterior to arriving at the agreement there must be, as he said, an agreement with the two provinces, because some of their rights, I assume, are to be affected. As I understand the legal position, the only jurisdiction this government has is with regard to navigation. If it were solely a question of power, which I believe it to be, the major part of the jurisdiction would, of course, rest in the provinces, because I think it is an accepted fact that in law power that may be generated out of the Canadian development belongs to the provinces.

There is another aspect of the matter I might touch upon. When the previous arrangement was negotiated it was in the form of a treaty. Under their constitution that treaty had to go for confirmation and sanction to the senate of the United States. Is it proposed to follow the same practice in this, or is it proposed, as I have seen suggested, that by some stretch of the powers contained in the boundary waters treaty, it may be entered into as a mere agreement which would not require the assent of a two-thirds majority of the senate, as a treaty would in the United States, but merely a majority in both houses of congress?

I have taken the trouble to read the boundary waters treaty of 1909-10, and I venture the opinion that it was never the intention of the high contracting parties to the treaty that an agreement involving the international section of the St. Lawrence waterway should be entered into as a mere agreement. There is no power there, and I would ask the Prime Minister whether the opinion of the Department of Justice has been taken on that particular phase of the question. If so, will he table it?

My own view is, and it is agreed to by others whose legal opinion I value, that the provisions of the treaty of 1909-10 do not contain powers to make an agreement of this kind respecting the development of a huge project such as would be developed at Morrisburg. It must be followed by a treaty. If the Prime Minister has an opinion on that point, as to the jurisdiction to proceed, not by way of treaty but by mere agreement, I should like to have that legal opinion tabled so that we might study it. The matter is of importance especially so far as the other high contracting party is concerned. As regards Canada, we have not the same constitutional provision. The treaty or agreement or whatever it may be, would, I assume, be submitted to parliament for adoption. If it is a treaty, it has to go to the United States senate to be confirmed by a two-thirds vote of that body. If it is a mere agreement, then it has only to carry the affirmative vote of a majority of both houses of congress. The Prime Minister will be seized of what I am suggesting. Has he taken an opinion on that point and, if so, is it available?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand that the United States government itself has been considering whether in the public interests it would be preferable to have the understanding between Canada and the United States with respect to navigation and power on the St. Lawrence made in the form of an agreement between the two countries, which would be approved by a resolution of both houses, alike in the United States and Canada, or whether it should take the form of a treaty. There are arguments pro and con. The argument with respect to agreement is that if work is to be done it is likely to be pressing, and the more rapidly money can be procured for the purposes of development, the more expeditiously the work will be proceeded with. Whether or not the United States intends to press that aspect of the question I cannot say at the moment, but so far as we are concerned the Department of Justice has been looking into the very question which the hon. gentleman has raised, and I shall be in a position when a decision has been reached, to give him an opinion from the department regarding the legal point he has raised.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): As soon as convenient, if the opinion is available, I should like to have it.

Mr. CASSELMAN (Grenville-Dundas): For the purpose of keeping the record clear may I point out that both the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition have referred to the Morrisburg scheme. As a matter of fact, the Morrisburg scheme is the one referred to as scheme B in the report of the Hydro Electric Power commission engineers of 1921. Scheme B has never been considered from that time. There is no dam at Morrisburg under the scheme which I understand is being considered at the present time. Complete power development under the scheme which is now being considered is at Barnhart island. The new idea in the scheme is to have a control dam at the village of Iroquois, which village incidentally is to be wiped out. The control dam in itself is not a new scheme, because prior to 1921—as a matter of fact as far back as the days of the late Sir Adam Beck—a control dam was considered. Its location was not defined, but at least it was not at the village of Iroquois.

The scheme being considered at the present time develops power estimated at 2,200,000 horse power at Barnhart island. The control dam is at the village of Iroquois, and it is a dam which is not used for the purpose of developing power.

May I say again that my constituency is particularly interested because, under the previous treaty, which it was attempted to negotiate in 1932, only 9,000 acres of land was flooded. Under this scheme 26,000 acres will be flooded, the greater part of which is on the Canadian side of the river. This is due to the fact that the banks on this side are much lower than on the United States side. I suggested in my first remarks on the subject that this was some of the first occupied land in Ontario. As a matter of fact, the occupancy of the land, the grants of title to the land go back to 1784. Many sites along the front in a distance of a few miles are most historical. The first church, the celebration of the 150th anniversary of which was held in 1934, is in this district. There is a memorial church and there are numerous cemeteries. Although the people in that district are told that their compensation will be such that they will have no worries after the project is completed, I assure hon. members and the people of the district that, after the project is completed, if it is completed on the basis of a single-stage development, there will be more heart-burnings in the district than there have been in the previous one hundred and fifty-five years of its existence.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Will the Prime Minister make a statement regarding the personnel of the permanent joint board of defence, the authority they have, and what has been accomplished to date?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not the names of the members of the permanent board, but I shall have them to-morrow. As to the powers of the board, they have powers of investigation of matters of joint defence on both Atlantic and Pacific coasts and the making of recommendations to the respective governments. The recommendations come in the form of reports from the board to the government of the United States and the Canadian government. The recommendations considered by the Canadian government are those relating to matters of defence for which, if the work is to be performed, Canada must undertake the responsibility. When the reports are received by the Canadian government, they are referred to the departments of the government to which the work itself relates. For example, if the work relates to naval defence, the report on that subject goes to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services. If the work relates to air activities, it goes to the air minister. The matter is considered by the military experts in the department and the war committee of the cabinet on the recommendation of the minister decides whether or not the work is to be carried out.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition spoke about commitments, and said he found difficulty in understanding how there could be no commitments. I hope I have made it clear that while the board has power to make recommendations to the government, the government itself decides whether or not those recommendations should be carried out and the work undertaken.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is quite clear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But that is not in the nature of any commitment which Canada is under to the United States or which the United States is under to Canada. There is nothing in the nature of an obligation on the part of either government to carry out what the joint committee recommends except in so far as the government itself is prepared to take that step. That was what I meant in saying there were no commitments.

As to what has been done, I think perhaps the committee will agree that there is nothing in the nature of military secrets which should be kept more a secret than practically everything contained in the reports which have been made on the joint defence of Canada and the United States. We could not bring down those reports in this parliament without disclosing matters affecting the defence of the United States as well as our own coast defence. It would not do to publish that information; it is the information above all else that the enemy would wish to have. That is the sole reason for not publishing the reports.

I have here the names of the Canadian members of the permanent joint board. They are: Colonel O. M. Biggar, chairman; Brigadier Stewart, Air-Commodore Cuffe, Captain H. E. Reid, Colonel G. P. Vanier, H. L. Keenleyside, secretary.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if in this connection he is getting the full cooperation of the province of Ontario. Within the last five hours I had dinner at Brockville, where I saw a corps of engineers of the Ontario hydro electric, with blueprints and what not, who are working on this project. The question I am asking is whether we are getting the full cooperation of the Ontario government with regard to this St. Lawrence development.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am afraid I cannot answer that question until an actual agreement between Ontario and the dominion has been reached. I have every reason to believe that for some time past there has been a disposition on the part of the government of Ontario to cooperate with this government in matters pertaining to the St. Lawrence. Whether or not all the questions that have to be considered have thus far been taken up, I am not in a position to say.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I was just anxious to get from the Prime Minister a statement that as far as the general plan is concerned, as it is being developed by the dominion authority, it is in unison with the general plan of the province of Ontario with regard to the development of power.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think that is correct.

Mr. HOMUTH: I do not know whether or not I should ask the Prime Minister, but one question that arose a year or two ago was that of the export of power. I realize that the Prime Minister may not be able to answer that question now, but if he can, would he tell the committee whether or not any agreement with Ontario is predicated on the question of the export of power?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply has been conducting negotiations with the Ontario government, on behalf of the federal government. This evening he told me there were some matters still to be considered. The question my hon. friend has mentioned may be among that number, but I am not in a position to say definitely.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have no desire to hold up the Prime Minister's estimates, which are not ordinarily of a contentious nature, but my colleague the hon. member for Broadview would like to speak on this subject to-morrow, so I would ask the Prime Minister to call it eleven o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend not allow one item to go through?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, yes. Will we take up these estimates to-morrow?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. I may say to my hon. friend that I am anxious to get through the estimates of the Department of External Affairs in order that I may give attention to other very pressing matters.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We shall be very glad to help the Prime Minister get them through.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Perhaps the Prime Minister would be kind enough to say that he will give us some statement with regard to the question of licences for the export of power under this development.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think until we have concluded negotiations with the province of Ontario, any matters that are likely to arise in connection with those negotiations would be better left over. I prefer not to make a statement at the present time.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Perhaps it will come after instead of before.

Mr. JACKMAN: I understand there are still a number of members who wish to ask some questions with regard to these estimates. If the request of our leader in regard to the hon. member for Broadview is granted, will it apply also to other members on this side?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I suppose if we had strictly followed the customary practice, we would have confined discussion to the particular item before the committee. I think we have discussed everything but that item. I would not ask that the item be passed except with the understanding that on other items the same general discussion may be carried on, if it is so desired.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think the Prime Minister will agree that on the administration item the discussion usually is of the widest character, but that we are confined to the particular items in subsequent discussions. To-morrow we will facilitate the passage of these estimates, but several hon. members do wish to speak, and I would ask the Prime Minister to report progress now.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Reid): Shall the item carry?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With that understanding; or is it absolutely necessary for the Prime Minister's purpose to get an item through to-night? I do not know the technical position.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No; it is not necessary at all.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, February 25, 1941.

The house met at three o'clock.

"THE CANADIAN TRIBUNE"

QUESTION AS TO VERBAL NOTICE OF SUSPENSION GIVEN BY MOUNTED POLICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), but in his absence I shall put it to the government. I have just received a telegram from the editor of the Canadian Tribune stating that he has been advised verbally by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police of the temporary suspension of his paper. Is it the policy of the department to suspend without official written notice from the department to the publisher? If that is so, we should understand the position.

[Mr. J. H. Harris.]

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would assume the department would give official written notice; but whether written notice would be given in the first instance, or through an officer at the time of taking action, is a point I would have to leave to the Minister of Justice to assume. I expect the minister will be here to-morrow.

NATIONAL HEALTH

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE AT THE PRESENT SESSION

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) if at this session it is the intention of the minister to recommend the appointment of a standing committee of the house on health?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): No, it is not.

WHEAT

QUESTION AS TO PRICES AND QUANTITIES SOLD SINCE AUGUST 1

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I wonder if the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) would be prepared to give the house a statement as to the amount of wheat sold since August 1 last, to whom sold and the average price received? If he has not the information at hand to-day, perhaps he can give it to-morrow.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have not, of course, the information at hand, but I shall look into the matter referred to by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle and give some answer at the earliest possible moment.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

36. Departmental administration, $220,800.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yesterday the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was asked some questions in connection with the proposed agreement between Canada and the United States in connection with the St. Lawrence waterway. I should like to make an observation or two in reference to what I understand is to be part of that agreement.

On January 26 the Toronto Telegram contained an article entitled "Seaway Draft Includes Plan for Diversion," I should like to quote briefly from that article as follows:

Diversion of Ontario waters into the great lakes is provided for in the draft agreement reached at Ottawa between representatives of the Canadian and United States governments on development of the St. Lawrence, according to Doctor T. H. Hogg, chairman of the Ontario hydro commission.

The diversion plan would permit Ontario to flow water from the Albany river into the great lakes.

I presume that should really read "from the Albany river watershed into the great lakes." If that statement is correct, the proposed agreement will provide for the diversion of water from one watershed into another. I am very much concerned over this because I have covered the district thoroughly and am well acquainted with the situation in connection with the waterways of northern Ontario. Article 3 of the Boundary Waters treaty relating to boundary waters and questions arising between the United States and Canada, under which was set up the international joint commission, reads:

It is agreed that, in addition to the uses, obstructions, and diversions heretofore permitted or hereafter provided for by special agreement between the parties hereto, no further or other uses or obstructions or divesions, whether temporary or permanent, of boundary waters on either side of the line, affecting the natural level or flow of boundary waters on the other side of the line, shall be made except by authority of the United States or the dominion of Canada within their respective jurisdictions, and with the approval, as hereinafter provided, of a joint commission, to be known as the International Joint Commission.

When the proposed St. Lawrence treaty is passed by this house and by the United States congress, if this article states the matter correctly it will contain a clause permitting diversion of water from the Albany river watershed. The Albany is a wholly Canadian watershed; it belongs to the James and Hudson bays. In spite of what has been said to the contrary, this country will be settled at some time in the future. There may not be great numbers of farmers as there are in southern Ontario, but there is some fine arable land up there. Important mines will be developed, similar to those which are located east and west of this area. After this settlement occurs it will be found that this water which may be diverted under the treaty is needed for the development of power to be used in the north. According to article 3 of the Boundary Waters treaty the United States congress would have to give its assent to the cessation of the flow of this water southward once it has been diverted. In my judgment this water will be forever lost to northern Ontario as far as any future development is concerned.

I feel quite strongly on this question. I regret exceedingly that other hon. members are not denouncing this proposed diversion. In my judgment it is wholly unnecessary. I feel sorry for the Prime Minister. I do not think that he agrees wholly with this diversion, but the premier of Ontario has given him such an unpleasant time—I will go so far as to say that it is largely undeserved—that perhaps he thought he could be placated by letting him have the water from northern Ontario. I would not do that at all; I would fight him to the last ditch and not allow the diversion of any water from northern Ontario.

I have been trying to stir up northern Ontario over this question, but I have not been very successful; few people seem to be able to comprehend the significance of the loss of this water. At present the country is unsettled and people cannot appreciate its future needs. I was glad, however, to read an editorial in the Northern Tribune, which is published at Kapuskasing, a town which is represented by you, Mr. Chairman. The editor of this paper endorses the stand I have taken. I had hoped that all northern Ontario editors would rise to the defence of that section of the country. In my judgment this diversion will be nothing less than an outrageous tragedy.

I should like to quote briefly from what the editor of Northern Tribune has said. I feel he almost deserves a vote of thanks by this house for having had the courage to write this editorial. It reads:

The north has a good friend in parliament, in one respect at least. Mr. John R. MacNicol, M.P. for Davenport Toronto, has made almost a life study of the Hudson bay watersheds.

That was a nice thing for that editor to say about me, because I live at least a thousand miles away from the area I am talking about. He goes on:

In particular, Mr. MacNicol has contended that the water powers of the north belong to the north, as a pledge of her future, and he has strenuously opposed every proposed alienation of those water powers as diversion enterprises for the benefit of other areas. Unfortunately, his has been almost the only voice in parliament raised with any vigour to defend our interests; and so it is easy to understand why we can't make a successful fight.

This question is a very complex one, and its understanding requires considerable travel and study. I have been up and down these rivers, and I would that every hon. member would rise in his place and denounce the proposed incorporation into this international treaty of the diversion of waters from northern Ontario. The editorial continues:

> This newspaper has always maintained that the north's water powers and streams belonged to us up here and should be conserved. The very politicians and other orators who paint such glowing pictures of the future of Canada's north show by their attitude on this matter of water powers that they lack the conviction which should fortify their utterances. If we are going to have prosperous industrial centres and sound agricultural development adapted to the tempering climate, in the future so raptly envisioned, why are we now alienating the potential water powers that would be a necessity to ensure that future?

Alienating for the present? No, not if the international treaty applies. But as a matter of fact they will be alienated forever, because, as the government well knows, the United States congress would never permit the stoppage of the flow of these waters once they were diverted. Why? What effect have they on the waters of the great lakes? They have none at present because Chicago is taking so much extra water, but if Chicago can ever be stopped from robbing the waters of the great lakes, once you have plants established all along the great lakes, riparian rights will be established alongside the harbours of the lower lakes and rivers based on the water levels thus established and the United States could never be prevailed upon to permit the stoppage of the flow of that water.

I do hope that the Prime Minister, if he feels this is necessary for the sake of peace between the government of Ontario and the government of Canada for the duration of the war, will see to it that a clause is put into the agreement providing that when the war ceases the diversion also shall cease and the water shall thenceforth belong to northern Ontario.

Diversion is being denounced everywhere. It is being denounced in congress and throughout the United States by their leading men. At the present time Chicago is again proposing to submit a bill to congress to ask for the diversion of more water. I am thoroughly familiar with the situation in Chicago. They find it perhaps more difficult than any other great city in the world to obtain the water supply required to take care of their domestic sanitary problems. While I am wholly opposed to their diversions I cannot wholly blame them. While I oppose them, I admit that they have the right to go after more diversions.

On January 13 of this year a meeting was held in Detroit of the Great Lakes Carriers' association, which was attended by the engineers of various great cities such as Milwaukee and others along the shores of the great lakes. The secretary of the association, Mr. R. F. Malia, said this:

> The state of Illinois intends asking the supreme court on Monday to amend the decree handed down in 1930 restricting the Chicago diversion.

The report goes on to say:

> Mr. Malia stated Illinois was expected to ask the supreme court to permit the diversion of lake Michigan water to be increased from 1,500 cubic second feet to 5,000 cubic second feet.

That is exactly the amount that is going to be poured into lake Superior and finally into lake Huron and lake Michigan, and away would go our water at once, just as I predicted it would, if these diversions were allowed to take place. I have not the slightest doubt that the United States congress will in due course accede to the request of Chicago and the state of Illinois. They have their ears tuned to the political winds just as we have here, and had the Prime Minister not happened to have his ear attuned to the political winds in Canada I do not believe he would have tolerated these diversions for one second. But he was in a tight corner. The works for one of them had already been completed before they got the necessary permission. Just fancy a provincial government committing an act like that in violation of an international treaty without the consent of this government! But the provincial government proceeded to erect works on the Kenogami river, fourteen miles north of Long lake, cut through the height of land and constructed a canal through the international watershed, in spite of the opposition of this government. When these works were completed and $2,000,000 had been spent on them, they finally got the consent of this government to proceed and let the water flow. I would not have given my consent. I would have let those works rot until kingdom come before I would have allowed an international agreement to be set at naught.

The very same thing is going to happen again with the Ogoki river. I only wish I had the power or strength or knew what I could do to arouse public opinion in this matter—particularly in northern Ontario, Mr. Chairman, which is going to be the great loser; for a large volume of potential power on this river will be lost forever to northern Ontario. I have been trying my best, I frankly admit, to stir up Saskatchewan and Manitoba, but I have not yet made any headway. They have some interest in the matter because they have a great port on Hudson bay, the port of Churchill. I have been there and I predict that some day it will be a great port. I do not know whether the diversion of water from Hudson bay will affect it or not, but the late Captain Bernier, in a letter from which I quoted last session, was of the opinion that it might. I have communicated with the engineers and the ministers of public works of Saskatchewan and Manitoba but I have not been able to get them to move yet. Manitoba and Saskatchewan should send delegations down here to protest against the inclusion in this agreement of anything that might at any time affect the levels of Hudson bay. I do not know that the levels would be affected. I have read an article that said that such a suggestion was silly. I am not engineer enough to know whether it is silly or not, but Captain Bernier was a great authority and I am prepared to take his word. He made some strong statements about the water levels of Hudson bay. He is dead and gone, but he was a very great engineer and sailor, and did a great deal for Canada. In my opinion he should have been knighted. He never received the recognition he deserved.

Now, let us review the position. Starting in the east, on the St. Croix river, at Grand Falls, or Sprague's falls, as it is sometimes called, there is a dam across the river at the international boundary, and the whole flow of the St. Croix river is now taken through the state of Maine and poured back into the river a little further down. That may be under an agreement between the province of New Brunswick and the government of the state of Maine; I do not know. But the fact which stands out is that the whole of the river goes through the state of Maine to be used for power purposes. Then, on the St. Lawrence river, the southern branch just east and south of Cornwall, as the Prime Minister knows, 25,000 second feet of water are diverted out of that river down to Massena, down the Grass river, and back into the St. Lawrence, in open defiance of the Ashburton-Webster treaty and our own international joint agreement. That condition was to last only until the end of the last war. The last war ended in 1918, and that water is diverted just as freely to-day as it flowed in 1918; we cannot stop it.

At the other end of the line, Chicago has taken 10,000 second feet. I do not know whether that has been reduced recently, but that is the amount they were allowed, and according to the article I read, application is to be made to take more than the 1,500 cubic second feet allowed by the supreme court.

I wish I could impress sufficiently upon the Prime Minister that when this treaty comes up again, whatever we are compelled to-day to do for the so-called production of power, these points should be seriously examined. I do not believe the argument about power production. Just a short time ago the hydro-electric commission issued a statement that they have ample reserves of power; and surely to goodness 80,000 horse-power will not have any great effect on the production of munitions, particularly when they must have had more reserves of power than that.

Finally, to come back to where I began, if the diversion of the Kenogami river and the Ogoki river, two tributaries of the Albany, comes under the jurisdiction of the Boundary Waters treaty, the flow could never be stopped without the consent of the United States congress. That means that from lake Superior to James bay there would be a corridor right across northern Ontario over which we would have surrendered our sovereignty as far as the absolute control of our water goes, and as to which we would be subject to the consent of the government of the country to the south. I have not a word other than the kindest to say of the government of the United States. In that country we have the best neighbours in the world; we should thank God for such neighbours. But that fact would never induce me to surrender any sovereignty which this country has. It may be that water has to be poured into the great lakes, but that is not my opinion, because I believe that if the Warren report of 1921 and the report of the engineering board of review of 1926 were carried out at Niagara Falls, there would be ample water on both sides of the river. The reports state that we both can take 10,000 second feet, and the level of lake Erie would be raised as it should be, and the building of the proposed works in the Niagara river would likely not cost more than is going to be squandered in northern Ontario.

We are told that those commitments will cost $3,000,000, but having in mind what the Chippewa canal cost as compared with what we were told it would cost, and having in mind also the disparity between the estimated and the actual cost of the Kenogami works, I have not the slightest doubt that the cost of the northern Ontario works will be many millions more than we are told it will be. And that expenditure it is proposed to make in war time. Those hon. members who come from the west via the Canadian National railways passed recently the station of Ferland, north of lake Michigan. What did they see there? They saw large piles of equipment and numbers of men going up to build a railway and construction works to take material up to Waboose falls, on the Ogoki river; and this in war time, when men are needed in much more important places than in the bush, and where next summer they will encounter hordes of mosquitoes and black flies. That is where the grandfathers of the black flies come from; they are so big that they take a cube of a quarter of an inch out of one's neck, and send word back to their relations to come and get some more like it. If I were prime minister of Canada—which would be impossible—I would not allow this work to go on while men can be employed elsewhere much more effectively. While our school children are denying themselves ice cream cones and picture shows in order to buy war savings stamps, these millions should not be squandered in northern Ontario. I would not allow it; it is unnecessary. I repeat this because I want to make it as impressive as I can. If the Prime Minister is compelled to insert in that agreement that the waters shall be diverted from northern Ontario, it should be stipulated that diversion shall continue only until the war is over. The war cannot last, I hope, more than three or four years, and it would take that length of time to do the work, so that it may well be delayed until the termination of the war.

Mr. HOWE: I should like to make a few remarks, as member for Port Arthur, in reply to the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). I seldom speak in this chamber as member for Port Arthur, and I think there is a feeling in my riding that I have come to be too much of a statesman and too little a member for the constituency. Port Arthur is a great riding. It is large in area. It extends from the boundary of Fort William east past White River, and from the shores of lake Superior to the shores of James bay. In that riding is the entire development which the hon. member for Davenport has been discussing—the Ogoki and the Long Lac diversions.

My hon. friend is a great friend of the north country. He is, I believe, one of the few members who have gone as far north as Churchill to make himself familiar with northern conditions. I believe that he has toured the Ogoki country and made himself familiar with that section. But in my opinion, I am sorry to say, he looks at the north from the viewpoint of Toronto. Looking out from his home in Toronto over lake Ontario—and a most beautiful view it is—I fear that his vision is foreshortened, that he cannot appreciate the vast expanse and huge development of the northern ridings which you, Mr. Chairman, and I represent. His discussion would lead the house to believe that the Ogoki is being diverted wholly to provide water power at Niagara falls. We have no objection to supplying water for Niagara falls provided we get the use of the water in the north; and I am happy to say in connection with this particular diversion that we do get a very material benefit from this development, in the north itself. The Ogoki water is diverted into lake Nipigon. From lake Nipigon to lake Superior, a distance of about fifty-five miles, it passes through two separate power developments, both of which, I may say, are in operation and developing power. In the course of that passage it develops, I believe, an additional 110,000 horse-power—certainly over 100,000 and possibly 125,000. Similarly, from the water that is diverted into the Long Lac—and there again we have a ready-made development—there is a potential horse-power of 35,000. My hon. friend suggests that it is far better to keep the water running into Hudson bay. I hope to see all parts of my riding equally developed. I believe we have a magnificent country there and I expect to be the member until the population along the borders of Hudson bay about equals the population along the borders of lake Superior. At the present time, however, for some reason the population has become established along the shores of lake Superior. We have two large cities there and fifteen or twenty thriving communities, all forming a part of the riding, and all adjoining lake Superior. In that area there are very considerable war industries. In Fort William we have the largest aeroplane plant in Canada, giving employment to about one-third of the entire number of persons engaged in the aeroplane industry in the whole of Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What are they making?

Mr. HOWE: Hurricanes, the aeroplanes that are winning the war; and they are turning them out at the present time at the rate of fifteen a week. In Port Arthur we have a shipbuilding plant that has a splendid record in the production of corvettes for the Canadian navy. We have other war industries in these towns. We have a large mining industry which is served from the Nipigon power development. We have in the Long Lac mining fields, which obtain power wholly from the plants I am speaking of, a large production of gold which is greatly needed to provide exchange for war industry. At the head of the lakes we have four pulp and paper mills. While these are not producing gold they are producing pulp and paper which is so largely used in the United States and which is converted into gold. We are short of power in that area. In the north we believe, and my hon. friend will find it rather difficult to convince the people at the head of the lakes otherwise, that it is good business to divert water now flowing into Hudson bay into the more populous part of that area and to use that power at the head of the lakes.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am not trying to convert them. I am opposed to it.

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member will have some difficulty in proving that it is not good business. Then, as the water flows into lake Superior, I may say, speaking as member for Port Arthur, I lose interest pretty well at that point, but it has served its purpose to the people I represent, though as Minister of Munitions I retain a lively interest in it. It passes through Sault Ste. Marie and there it generates power which is badly needed for the great steel industry at that point. It then flows on to Niagara, and through the generosity of the United States government it is not necessary to wait until the water actually flows down, which will take some time. Instead we are able immediately to use this flow from Ogoki for the production of power at Niagara Falls to serve existing plants.

My hon. friend speaks lightly of the value of 125,000 horse-power at Niagara falls.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is 80,000; that is 45,000 less.

Mr. HOWE: It depends on how you look at it. I was taking the combination of two different developments which would represent 125,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: This will be developed beside the falls.

Mr. HOWE: Well, we will compromise between 80,000 and 125,000 and call it 100,000. My hon. friend, being a reasonable man, will not object to that, I am sure.

Mr. MacNICOL: I state the facts, and the fact is that it is 80,000.

Mr. HOWE: I will compromise again and make it 80,000. The 80,000 will provide power to operate a good many munition plants. It depends on the type of plants, but 80,000 horse-power is a substantial block of power, and I can assure my hon. friend that as Minister of Munitions and Supply I am glad indeed to have that additional production from the Niagara area.

Going further down the river, we visualize the time when power will be generated again in the vicinity of Cornwall; and there again, the same water that helps us so much at the head of the lakes will be of as great assistance there. Lower down it will flow through the Beauharnois canal and once again give us help, and it is not beyond the bounds of possibility that it may be once again used at Lachine to help us there.

My hon. friend speaks of this project as one of scenic beauty and communication. I hardly think he suggests that power will be used on the shores of Hudson bay even while I am member for Port Arthur. However, if he will assess the value of that power, not from the point of view of a citizen of Toronto looking out on lake Ontario, but as a citizen viewing the whole great Niagara system of waterways, extending over the height of land and reaching back into the Ogoki country and following that into the sea, he will find that the extra water diverted from Ogoki will create benefits far in excess of the disabilities to which he has referred.

I am always delighted to hear my hon. friend speaking of the north. I appreciate his interest in that country and I hope that some time he will come up and join me at the head of the lakes and so obtain a better knowledge of that particular area, adding to his already wide acquaintance with the north. I shall be glad to see him.

Mr. MacNICOL: I cannot for the life of me understand why the minister should refer to Toronto. The diversion of water might help Toronto through the development of power and therefore, from the minister's point of view, I ought to be in favour of it. But I am looking at the broad picture. I wonder how the minister will be able to develop power on the Ogoki when it is required, or on the Kenogami. I have been on these rivers and I know there are fine falls on them. On lake Ogoki there is a suitable place for settlement by and by. Where will they get their power? From the Albany fifty miles to the north; but that water should stay there for development in that area. Port Arthur can get ample power without that. There are four magnificent falls on the Nipigon river south of the outlet of the lake. One of them, one of the most beautiful I have ever seen, is the Virgin falls. From all four, over 100,000 horse-power could be produced. If power is required at Port Arthur why are not the falls on the Nipigon river developed at once, as they can be? They have developed Cameron and Alexander falls, where I believe there are one hundred thousand horse-power, and the other falls would produce another 100,000 horse-power. I should think the minister would be up on his feet fighting for the territory he represents; there are only black flies and mosquitoes there now, but later there will be many people and they will want power.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I should like to discuss this problem briefly but from a point of view different from that taken by the minister and the hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. MacNicol). I wish to say a word concerning the harnessing of this energy at Cornwall. The constituency which I represent, similarly to that of the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Casselman) will be materially affected by the proposed development of the St. Lawrence waterway, from the point of view both of navigation and of power. If the project is proceeded with by the single-stage scheme, with a control dam, there will be built at Barnhart island a dam and power house which will affect in a substantial manner the whole face of the town of Cornwall and the countryside surrounding it. Since it is not yet known what the terms of the agreement will be and how the east end of the river will be affected, it is impossible at this moment to say just what may happen so far as Cornwall itself is concerned. What we do know, however, is that the elevation of Cornwall is much below that of the development upstream, the consequence being that certain dykes will have to be constructed to protect Cornwall.

On the other hand great advantages will be derived from this development, and in discussing this scheme with the people in that vicinity, I find that in principle they are in favour of it. Unquestionably some of the effects may be detrimental. The hon. member for Grenville-Dundas spoke of the flooding. It is true that there will be a great deal of flooding, with a single-stage development much more than with a double-stage development. He spoke of 26,000 acres as likely to be flooded; I suppose that included both sides of the river. On this estimate a great deal of the countryside will be flooded, and, as he said last evening, much of the property of those settlers whose ancestors have been there for perhaps a hundred and fifty years or more will suffer on that account. It may be not unwise to suggest, with great respect and deference, the setting up of an arbitration court to deal with such matters. If the legal aspect of the problem alone be considered it may be that the replacement value will be the only return the owner will get if expropriation follows. Therefore I suggest the setting up of an arbitration court with reference to the flooding.

My hon. friend spoke of inability to obtain maps. I have had the same difficulty. I presume the reason is that the agreement has not yet been concluded. I have tried on more than one occasion to get such maps and each time have been refused. I believe, however, that there is a map in the office of one of the engineers which anyone can see if he wishes.

I should like to say a word as to the navigation aspect of the matter. The canal in connection with this scheme will be in United States territory. We know that there are good reasons for that from an engineering standpoint. I do not want to go into that now; I shall probably have an opportunity to do so later. But there is one thing concerning that canal which vitally affects the town of Cornwall. The canal follows the south channel of the river, going through United States territory and coming out at one extremity between Cornwall island and St. Regis point, thereby entirely avoiding the town of Cornwall. With very little additional expense the canal could be made to go through the island of Cornwall and come out immediately opposite the port of Cornwall, giving added advantage to the town, where unquestionably industry will follow in coming years. If that is not done, then as far as deep sea navigation is concerned Cornwall will be entirely off the map. With 2,200,000 horse-power at its door it would be unfortunate were this suggestion not to be given the careful consideration it deserves.

I also, with the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas, was a member of the delegation which waited upon the Minister of Public Works. I believe the delegation was unanimous in approving this project in principle. They may have been divided so far as the question of a one-stage or two-stage scheme is concerned. I think the people in that vicinity consider also that on the whole the agreement will be not only in the best interests of the community immediately affected but in the best interests of the people of Canada.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I wish to make one or two observations on this question, but let me say at once that regardless of whose ox is gored or what happens in regard to this project, let us get on with the war effort; if there is going to be some difficulty here, there and yon, let us prosecute the war effort until that job is finished. Let that be our first job of work in all these developments.

Having said that I ask you, sir, not to consider that I am approaching this question from an academic point of view but rather from a long-range viewpoint that will ultimately bring to Canada in her St. Lawrence development the destiny that belongs to her. I am not taking the viewpoint of the city of Toronto alone. I might say to the Minister of Munitions and Supply that I am going even beyond Canada in the views I express, but I have in my mind's eye all the time the development of industry in Canada.

Many of us have had for years a vision that with the development of the St. Lawrence waterway the Ruhr of this hemisphere may be found along the banks of the St. Lawrence. That has engaged the attention not only of us Canadians but also of British empire industrialists during the last two decades.

I should like to interject here, inasmuch as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is going to speak in a moment, that I was very sincere last night when I asked him to define his policy with regard to the export of power. I suggest he should give that information, not only for us in Canada, but for observers the empire over who are taking a long-range view with regard to the possibility of industrial development in this country. Before this vote passes I suggest the Prime Minister ought to take us into his confidence, and set out the government's policy with regard to the export of power.

I have in mind the grave danger which will arise in connection with the granting of export licences, due to the fact that those who receive power may gradually come to the conclusion that they have some vested rights, and that therefore power must continue to be supplied to industries in the United States who are consuming it.

Coming back to the long-range view which I should like the committee to take in this connection, may I say I speak with the authority of one of the larger industrialists in the United Kingdom and of perhaps the largest industrialist in Australia. May I refer first to Mr. George F. Davis of Sydney, Australia. Mr. Davis is chairman of the Cockatoo island dock works, the largest dry dock south of the equator, and an organization which is at the present time employing something more than 5,000 men who are engaged in the construction of all sorts of craft, including aeroplanes, destroyers, and steelware and ironware of all kinds. He is also chairman of a group of three, namely the Commonwealth of Australia, one of the dominions—its name escapes me—and himself, each of which has invested £666,000 sterling in an effort to find for Australia a gasoline supply from the development of shale. The business to which he belongs put up his third of the investment, the Commonwealth of Australia put up its third, and the dominion supplied the remainder.

Mr. Davis was in Canada two years ago, and while here he motored along the St. Lawrence river. As a matter of fact he entered into negotiations with the city of Trenton in connection with securing a site for a plant of some magnitude. He is enthusiastic about the possibilities of the St. Lawrence river, and is anxious to see its development.

I now turn to an industry capitalized at £10,000,000, operating seventeen plants in the United Kingdom and one in the Irish Free State, which is anxious to locate in Canada. The chairman of the board of that organization, Mr. Harold J. Cotes, Imperial House, Kingsway, London, is one of the active men in the chemical industry of Great Britain. May I emphasize to the committee that Mr. Cotes is also chairman of the European cartel which handles the same products, and his organization has possession in the British empire of all the Scheidelmandel patents which are owned in Berlin, Germany. Owing to the war his organization finds itself divorced from Europe, and is now anxious to see an extension into Canada and the United States of the development which has taken place in the British isles.

The raw product used by these firms of which I speak is organic material, which comes from the greatest producer of organic material in the world, namely India. As hon. members are aware, the animal kingdom in India is to some extent considered sacred; nevertheless more cattle and other organic materials are available in that country than in any other country of the world. At the present time about half that material finds its way by boats to Australia and New Zealand. The other half finds its way by caravans and boats to Belgium, in small measure, to Holland in somewhat greater measure, but more particularly to the United Kingdom. They are the manufacturers who, in turn, ship these manufactured goods to the United States, Canada and the world over. These are the industrialists who, on account of conditions in Europe, are anxious to locate in Canada. I would ask the committee to take a long-range view of the possibilities of developments along the St. Lawrence river, so that we may get on with the development. Of course when we are doing so we must not do anything which would in any way slow down or harm our war effort. Let us show to the rest of the world our determination to establish along the St. Lawrence a worth-while industrial development, because we must realize that along that river are to be found possibilities and opportunities not found anywhere else.

I look forward to a statement of policy from the Prime Minister. His word will travel to all parts of the empire and encourage industrialists to think about the possibilities in Canada. I believe one way to have them think about the possibilities in this country is to show them the opportunities Canada affords. I believe industry will come here if we proceed with developments such as those offered by the St. Lawrence river.

This morning I heard a broadcast over a C.B.C. radio station to the effect that it is the intention to go ahead with a one-stage development. Undoubtedly that development will involve a tremendous amount of property damage. But do not let that stand in our way; let us go on with the work. When the Prime Minister makes his announcement of policy respecting the export of power let him tell us, and everyone in the United Kingdom, that there is unanimity of opinion on the part of this government and the government in Ontario, so that those people overseas who are looking for places to establish big industries will look with favour on Canada and particularly on the possibilities offered by the St. Lawrence development.

Mr. ROY (Translation): The proposed St. Lawrence development is a matter of such vital importance to the people of Quebec that we cannot view it with unconcern, especially as we are threatened with seeing it carried out without having been submitted to the approval of the electors of Quebec or of Canada.

The province of Quebec has always strongly objected to the proposed development as being contrary to its own interests as well as to the general interest of Canada. From 1930 to 1935 the head of the Quebec Liberal government, Hon. Alexandre Taschereau, unceasingly fought the proposal, which he condemned in the most unequivocal terms. From 1936 to 1939 the National Union government led by Hon. Mr. Duplessis constantly and vigorously opposed the project. And at the present session of the Quebec legislature the opposition has taken further means to obtain information respecting the position and views of the Quebec government in its relations with the dominion government on the subject. This information the premier, Hon. Mr. Godbout, refused to give.

Recently I placed on the order paper of the house a request for the tabling of all correspondence exchanged between the dominion government and the Quebec government on the subject. Hon. members are aware that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) refused to table this correspondence, under the fallacious pretext that to do so would be to divulge information that should remain confidential between the governments of Canada and the United States.

It is unthinkable that we should have to face the possibility of this proposal being carried out without having been submitted to the approval of the people of Canada and especially of the provinces more directly concerned. It is unbelievable. It is inconceivable. In collusion with our provincial government, contrary to our interests and in spite of our opposition, the government is about to alienate our chief source of wealth. Once more, I reiterate my request that the government table the correspondence exchanged with the Quebec government, in order that the people may know how our resources and interests are being dealt with, in collusion, as I have said, with the provincial government which has not submitted the question to the people either.

Since the people of Quebec are opposed to the proposed development and have not been declared incapable of managing their own affairs, they are entitled to be kept informed regarding the tergiversations of the two governments—federal and provincial—and the means taken to carry out the plan.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The discusion on the St. Lawrence waterway opened with some remarks by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). With respect to the engineering aspect of the question I feel that what has been said by my colleague, the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) covers all that the committee would wish to have at this stage in the way of reply to my hon. friend. There was, however, one particular appeal which he made to me, that I be not unduly influenced by the attitude of the Ontario government. May I say to him quite frankly that with regard to this, as with all public questions, I have tried to maintain an attitude which is not influenced either by fear or favour. So far as the Ontario government or any other provincial government is concerned, that is and has been and always will be my attitude. However, when concerned with public affairs, I always greatly welcome harmony and accord as being wholly preferable to discord. I must say it has been a pleasant experience to have had the cooperation which the federal government has had from the government of Ontario in such negotiations as have recently been carried on with the province of Ontario respecting the St. Lawrence waterway.

Last evening the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Casselman) spoke particularly with reference to the situation of Morrisburg. He asked if it would not be possible for him to see the plans as they might affect the constituency which he represents in this house. This morning I had a word with the legal adviser of the Department of External Affairs and he informed me that as the plans are not final, and cannot be so in the nature of things until the whole matter has been concluded between the United States and Canada, if it is, it would not be advisable to give publicity to them in their present stage because there may be modifications that would be considered before the final adjustments are made. There cannot, however, be any objection to my hon. friend calling at the department and asking Mr. Read, the legal adviser, to show him the plans. This, I may say, will be gladly done. May I add that Mr. Read is of the opinion that it should be possible at an early date to have reproductions of the plans prepared and published. His memorandum to me states that the final plans for the development of the international rapids section have not been settled and cannot be settled finally until after the conclusion of an agreement or treaty with the United States and the setting up of an international commission which, among other things, would be charged with the duty of the preparation of the final plans. It is impossible, therefore, at the present stage to indicate with precision the limits of flooding, or even the locations of dams, power houses and other works. It is, however, possible to show in a general way the nature of the development and the limits of the flooding. He then goes on to say that a plan has been prepared, but it cannot be made available for general publication without the concurrence of the United States authorities. But it is hoped that reproductions may be made generally available in the near future.

Mr. CASSELMAN (Grenville-Dundas): I thank the Prime Minister and I assure him that I shall be very glad to call at Mr. Read's office.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad it has been possible to meet my hon. friend's wishes in that particular. May I say also that I regard it as being fortunate that this discussion should have taken place this afternoon. Important suggestions have been put forward by hon. members who have spoken, such as the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Chevrier), the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris), and others. The hon. member for Stormont referred to an aspect of the development which would affect the port of Cornwall. I cannot say more at the moment than that I shall see that what he has said is brought to the attention of the officials who have the matter in charge with a view to having his suggestions carefully considered.

The hon. member for Danforth has asked me to make a statement as to the government's policy with regard to the export of power. I think that our policy in that regard is pretty generally known and has been clearly defined in the past. In a word, it is not to permit the alienation of power from Canada. I would define that as being the policy of the present government with regard to the export of power. Of course, it is possible that in certain circumstances it might be advisable to have provision made, when there is a surplus of power in Canada, to permit such surplus being used temporarily to meet a special situation in an adjoining country. The use of surplus power to serve a temporary purpose and to prevent waste, while carefully securing the interests of Canada with regard to its power development in its entirety, is quite another matter than permitting export in the nature of alienation. I agree with the hon. member for Danforth that it cannot be made too clear that the government of Canada believes that there are tremendous opportunities in this country for industrial development, and that those opportunities will be vastly enhanced as additional power is developed. It is the purpose of the government to further in as rapid a way as may be possible those measures which will serve to increase the industrial development of this country.

Last night I gave offhand a statement of the situation as regards the agreement with the United States which is being made the subject of negotiation at the present time. Not having the exact information before me at that time, I feel it might be advisable for the sake of the record to make a further brief statement which will outline with greater precision the present stage of the negotiations.

The negotiations with the United States with regard to the St. Lawrence development took place in Ottawa and Washington in January, 1940. They were deferred and resumed later in September when a proposal was made, which culminated in the exchange of notes on October 14, enabling diversion of the Ogoki and Long Lac waters into lake Superior and the immediate utilization of 5,000 cubic feet per second at Niagara. The use of this water commenced at the beginning of November. Under the exchange of notes, temporary great lakes-St. Lawrence basin committees were set up by the two governments to work in cooperation and to supervise engineering investigations, with a view to facilitating work, in the event of the conclusion of an agreement. These committees have been carrying on their work at Ottawa, Washington, and Massena. General negotiations with representatives of the United States took place at the beginning of January, 1941, and a draft agreement has now been prepared and is under consideration by the governments.

Negotiations for the conclusion of an agreement with Ontario for the taking over of the power works in the St. Lawrence, in the event of the conclusion of an agreement with the United States, were carried out in the autumn of 1939 and resumed in April and December, 1940, and again in February of this year. The agreement has been prepared and is under consideration by the governments. Then, with respect to the province of Quebec, there are certain aspects of the St. Lawrence development which are of interest to the province of Quebec and negotiations were carried out in the autumn of 1940 and at the end of January of this year with respect thereto. They are still under consideration by the governments.

That is the position as it is at the moment, and that I think is as much information as I would be justified in giving to the committee at this stage.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to take any part in this discussion of the St. Lawrence waterway because I apprehend that there will be, I hope at least there will be, ample opportunity for such discussion at a later stage before the development becomes operative, if it ever does so become.

In the first place I should like to make this general observation, that Canada should, as intimated by the member for Danforth (Mr. Harris), confine her expenditures of large sums of money at the present time to the conduct of the war, and this development in my view can by no stretch of the imagination be called a war measure.

Without at this time making any further declarations for or against the policy of entering into the construction of the St. Lawrence waterway project, I should like to revert for a moment to the statement which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has just made on the question of government policy. It may be of some interest if I refer to a debate that took place in this house as long ago as the 15th day of June, 1925, during my first term as a member of this house. The then member for Lambton West, Mr. LeSueur, on a motion of the minister of railways that the house go into committee of supply, moved in amendment:

> That the Speaker do not now leave the chair, but that it be resolved:
> That in the opinion of this house the export of hydro-electric power from Canada should be permitted only on yearly licence, and no licence should be issued beyond those at present outstanding except for off-peak power.

I had the honour to second that amendment. I cannot honestly say that I was able at the time to contribute very much to the sum total of the knowledge of the House of Commons, but there were those who did. Among those who participated were the then leader of the opposition, Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, and the present Prime Minister, who was at that time also prime minister. I find upon looking up the record that my memory is substantially correct, that there was a suggested amendment which met I think with the unanimous approval of the house. That amendment was suggested by the right hon. gentleman himself, as I recall it; I have not taken the time to go through the whole record. But this is what was moved and finally agreed upon, and it will be found at page 4288 of the debates of the house for the 1925 session, if anybody is interested in looking up the discussion:

> That in the opinion of this house the export of hydro-electric power from Canada should be permitted only on yearly licence, and that hereafter no licence for export of power beyond that already granted should be issued except with the concurrence of the province or provinces in which it is proposed to develop such power and of any other provinces adjacent to such development and interested therein.

It will be noted that the principle against the export of power is there stated, and no exception is made with respect to off-peak or surplus power. But a very important consideration was imported into the opinion then expressed by the house, namely, that "no licence for export of power beyond that already granted should be issued except with the concurrence of the province or provinces in which it is proposed to develop such power and of any other provinces adjacent to such development and interested therein." As I understand it, that was the policy laid down by parliament at that time and assented to by all parties represented in the house. In substance the Prime Minister's declaration of policy to-day does not depart from the principle therein stated.

The Prime Minister has used the word "alienated." I interpret that to be synonymous with non-permission to export, and if I am wrong I wish the Prime Minister would correct me. The Prime Minister, as I have understood his declaration on that point in the short address which he made, stated it was the policy of the government not to permit the alienation of power in Canada, and I have interpreted that in the sense I have endeavoured to express.

The Prime Minister did raise the question of the use of surplus power and intimated that an exception would be made in certain circumstances with respect to the alienation of surplus power. That is an exception which hon. gentlemen who think the matter through will agree has very far-reaching implications. Surplus power is in a measure a technical term. It may be synonymous with off-peak power. I am not a technician and I do not know the effect of all these technical terms. But I do know this, that history has taught us and the experience of this country has been that once a licence is given for the export of power, whether it be prime power, if that be the correct term to use, or surplus power, or off-peak power, that power is gone for good, once and for all, and may never be brought back. I think that is the history of the export of power in Canada.

In the past there have been two schools of thought on this subject. I remember very well a very good friend of mine in this house for many years who took the view that surplus power, power which was not at present being consumed in Canada or which might not be immediately needed for consumption in Canada, was a commodity which this country might very well sell to bring in a financial return which would redound to the benefit of the people of Canada. That I always thought was rather a short term view of the whole question. It might bring in an immediate return, which would of course be recurrent in its nature, but, taking the long view, that power would be gone, and gone for good, and would never be available for industry in Canada, something that we have been endeavouring to stimulate and build up in this country for many years.

If I interpret the Prime Minister's remarks correctly, the government are leaving the door open so that as and when circumstances warrant a substantial portion of the power developed under agreement or treaty or whatever it may be will be available for export from Ontario to the United States. I warn the Prime Minister here and now that in my view such a policy will not redound finally to the benefit of Canada.

I am intrigued by the idea which has been suggested to me that one of the fundamental considerations which has induced Ontario to go into this development is that they might be permitted to export a part of this power. It ought to be made clear to this house and to the country, if the government of Ontario in the course of these negotiations with the federal authorities have raised that question, just what the attitude of the federal government is in that regard. Is it to be in the agreement? We ought to know. In the interests of the future industrial life of Ontario this, in my view, ought not to be permitted, and I warn the Prime Minister of the danger of leaving open a loophole for export of so-called surplus power or off-peak power, or whatever you may call it. It is all a valuable commodity, something which may be required in the future of industry in this country.

So far as I know, from the point of view of Canada the only possible excuse for the development at the present moment of this project is that a shortage of power is threatened in Ontario. I am not in a position to speak about that. I should have supposed that, if that were so, there is ample opportunity to develop power at sites other than the international section of the St. Lawrence and bring it into operation months and years ahead of the production from this development now under consideration, and thus be available to supply power in case of a shortage.

Be that as it may, the point I am endeavouring to make is this. Is it a condition precedent to entering into an agreement with Ontario that the hydro electric commission of that province, a government department controlled by the province, are to have the right to export power from this development? Second, has the government gone so far as to agree to that principle? A word on these points from the Prime Minister would be reassuring. He may say that the agreement has not yet been concluded. I assume that is correct; I have no reason for thinking otherwise; and I want to warn the Prime Minister that the people of Canada, and in particular the people of Ontario, will be watching this whole thing to see whether the government of Ontario are predicating their assent to an agreement with respect to the development of the St. Lawrence waterway on the theory that they are to be able to sell this power. I would ask the Prime Minister to tell us frankly and precisely what the position is in that regard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am in much the same position as my hon. friend has expressed himself to be. I had not expected to debate to-day the question of the St. Lawrence waterway, and am not in a position to do so in any detail. Particularly, I am not in a position to discuss negotiations which have not yet been concluded.

My hon. friend has referred to conditions precedent. I am not aware of any conditions precedent that have been laid down; if there are any such, I do not know of them. All I can say with respect to the policy which my hon. friend read a moment ago as that which was unanimously agreed to by this house, is that that policy was one I supported at the time, and that it is one which I intend to continue to support and to remain true to, regardless of any circumstances.

I do not wish this statement to be interpreted in a sense so narrow that it would make impossible some developments that, for example, might be necessary to avoid waste or to help to accommodate others in a time of war, in meeting a situation which is imperative.

I agree altogether with the view which has been expressed here this afternoon that the St. Lawrence waterway development as a project in time of war can be justified only on the basis of war necessity. I would not for a moment think of coming to this house and asking the house to take up its time in discussing this matter if it had not an immediate bearing upon war effort. But, as hon. members know, the war aspect of the need of additional power both in this country and in the United States is one which has been before the country for some time, also the question of the building of warships on the great lakes, and it is from that point of view that the government is proceeding with negotiations.

I have made it quite clear that no agreement should be reached which will put beyond the complete control of this parliament the export of power for any period of time, but the accommodation to which I have referred in meeting any present situation is something which, I believe, ought to be taken into account. I do not wish to be limited to a narrow view that, if more power is developed at Niagara than the province of Ontario can use at this moment, and if some of this surplus power could be of service to industries in the United States which are producing war materials, the government of Canada would take the position that they would not seek to oblige our neighbours if they felt that that power would be of service in connection with the war. Everything has to be viewed in the light of circumstances which have to be met. It is in that sense that I have stated the broad policy, making clear that whatever is done, in any phase of the matter, to meet an immediate need and to serve a temporary purpose, would also have to be considered and, I think, will be considered in the broad way in which this parliament would wish to view matters of this kind.

Mr. ROWE: Would the Prime Minister tell the committee the approximate anticipated date of completion of the project?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wish I could tell my hon. friend. I do not know. Until all negotiations are completed I cannot say when it will be.

Mr. ROWE: I ask that question merely in view of the project being justified only, as we might conclude from what the Prime Minister said, to meet a war emergency. Does the Prime Minister believe that this is the quickest way of securing power for that purpose?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope the agreement will be reached very shortly. If the government saw a more expeditious way of effecting the end which is desired, the motive which underlies the whole purpose of the agreement, it would take that more expeditious method. But having regard to all the circumstances which have to be taken into account in connection with power and the navigation of the St. Lawrence, we believe that, in proceeding as we are with the negotiations at this time, we are serving a public interest in the best way in which it can be served.

Mr. COLDWELL: I wanted to get back to something which really is connected with our external affairs rather than something which concerns an international agreement but relates more or less to some other matters which will come before us later.

Last evening, when this matter came up, the Prime Minister was explaining the situation regarding our representation in France, and I am anxious to get the picture. The report of the department states, at page 11, that:

> Mr. Pierre Dupuy, first secretary on the staff of the Canadian legation in Paris, remains in London to look after the interests of Canadian nationals who were unable to leave France and generally to act as liaison officer.

The Prime Minister was interrupted last evening when he was saying this about Mr. Dupuy.

> Mr. Dupuy has his headquarters in London. He has been to France, keeping in touch with the government there.

What is the exact situation regarding our representation in France? We have in Ottawa a representative of the Vichy government. I am not raising that point at the moment. But is Mr. Dupuy now accredited to the Vichy government or is he in contact with the government of de Gaulle, the free French government in London? What exactly are our relationships with the two governments? That was the point I wished to raise, because I think it is of some interest.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps I can help to clear up what is in my hon. friend's mind and which may be a matter of concern also to others. The representation of one country in another is not to any particular government but to the country itself. One government may be in office at a particular moment and another government at some other time. Canada's representation to France is not to the Vichy government as such; it is to the government in France with which this government feels it is in a position to continue diplomatic relations. It is not in any sense representation to Vichy as against de Gaulle; it is representation to France itself. The fact that the government of unoccupied France at the present time is at Vichy and is headed by Marshal Petain is, we have felt, the strongest of reasons why we should seek to maintain as long as possible a relationship that will enable not only our government on our own behalf, but, I might say, in the interests of the whole British commonwealth to have immediate access to that government and to exchange information with it.

With regard to the circumstances that govern with respect to the legation in France, I might say that when the French government withdrew from Paris, officials of the Canadian legation followed it to Tours and finally to Bordeaux. With the approach of enemy forces within a short distance of that city, the Canadian minister as well as the British ambassador and the South African minister departed from Bordeaux late in June and took ship for England. The Canadian minister, Colonel Vanier, is at present absent on leave in Canada. In view of his military and diplomatic experience, he has been appointed to the staff of the permanent joint defence board.

It is the desire of the Canadian government to maintain with the people of France as friendly relations as possible. Whether we can reestablish a legation in France in the near future will depend on the development of relations between the government of France and the axis powers. The chargé d'affaires to France, Belgium and the Netherlands is continuing to maintain an office in London. Mr. Dupuy is chargé d'affaires not only with respect to France but with respect to our relations with the Netherlands and Belgium. The governments of the two latter countries are in London. The government of France is of course at Vichy at the present time.

The leader of the opposition last night asked a question which I should perhaps answer as I speak on relations with France. He asked whether the action of the Canadian government in having Mr. Dupuy as chargé d'affaires representing Canada at Vichy, as he has done, had the full approval of the government of the United Kingdom. I may say that not only has Canada's action been approved by the government of Great Britain but we have been thanked very warmly by the British Prime Minister for the services which we have been able to render at this time through the association which this country has maintained with France.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I revert to the St. Lawrence question. In the discussion last evening of the treaty or agreement I had not before me at that time my files in relation to this matter, but my understanding is that the United States authorities themselves suggest that a treaty is not necessary and therefore that two-thirds ratification or confirmation by the senate of the United States is not necessary. Article 13 of the boundary waters treaty, which is contained as a schedule to chapter 28 1-2 George V, 1911, reads:

> In all cases where special agreements between the high contracting parties hereto are referred to in the foregoing articles, such agreements are understood and intended to include not only direct agreements between the high contracting parties, but also any mutual arrangement between the United States and the Dominion of Canada expressed by concurrent or reciprocal legislation on the part of congress and the parliament of the dominion.

Reading the preceding articles in connection with that article to which this one refers, I wish to make a submission to the Prime Minister.

I suggest that it never could be held as a legal proposition that there was any intention on the part of the high contracting parties in 1909 to make provision at that time for any such tremendous undertaking as the St. Lawrence waterway by mere agreement under Article 13, and I base this on the theory that the pith and substance, to use the language of the lawyer, of the whole treaty would indicate otherwise.

What is the basis of the treaty? What is this pith and substance? It was to establish a means, in the form of a commission, whereby questions relating to boundary waters between Canada and the United States might be settled amicably by negotiation, and for that purpose and that purpose alone the international joint commission was created. In pith and substance the treaty cannot, in my view, be regarded as making provision for such a tremendous undertaking as the St. Lawrence waterway project.

If I am wrong in that theory, as to the proper construction of the treaty—and I am suggesting this for consideration not only by the Prime Minister but by the law officers of the crown—why was it necessary, for example, to conclude a convention in 1929 to deal with the diversion of water at Niagara Falls? The purpose of that convention was to provide for the maintenance of the scenic beauty of the Niagara river at the falls, and such purpose would come more clearly within the treaty of 1909 than would this proposed agreement with respect to the St. Lawrence waterway.

I wish to make it clear that in my view the boundary waters treaty itself gives no authority to either of the high contracting parties to enter into a legal binding agreement for the construction of this waterway.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should be paying myself too great a compliment if I attempted to debate the question with my hon. friend from the legal point of view, but I am quite pleased to have the views my hon. friend has expressed so that they may be taken into consideration by the law officers of the crown.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was the purpose of the remarks.

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not know whether this is the proper place to interject a relatively small matter of water diversion, but in the part of Alberta adjacent to the constituency I have the honour to represent we have a problem of water diversion which is also under the jurisdiction of the boundary waters treaty and is I believe, subject to the control and jurisdiction of the international joint commission which was set up to deal with these matters. I refer to the water diversion on the St. Mary and Milk rivers, in southern Alberta.

It is hardly necessary to refer to the history of these two rivers, other than to state that they both have their origin in the United States, flow into Canada, the St. Mary river eventually finding its outlet in Hudson bay while the Milk river flows north and east along the southern margin of Alberta into Saskatchewan and then back into Montana in the United States.

The diversion of the flow of these two rivers became a matter of international negotiation, and they were eventually put under the control of this commission. In 1920 the commission, as a result of disputes between the engineers as to how the waters of the two rivers was to be measured, held a hearing and made certain recommendations to be followed by the two countries. The recommendations of the commission were unanimous. After thorough investigation they found that the areas of land in each country capable of irrigation from the waters of the St. Mary and Milk rivers and their tributaries far exceeded the capacity of the rivers, even under the most exhaustive system of conservation. And the commission went on to recommend "that every effort should be made to obtain maximum efficiency in irrigation from these waters."

I think it should be pointed out that the fundamental principle governing the use or the right to use water for irrigation purposes is "beneficial use." Proximity or prior claims have no validity so far as the right to the use of water is concerned; it is prior beneficial use which is the determining factor. It is a matter of "use or lose."

The importance of the recommendations of this commission become immediately apparent from what follows. In 1938 the United States completed the Fresno reservoir, located a short distance below the site of the chain-of-lakes reservoir recommended by the commission on their side of the boundary. This solved the storage problem for them, and as a result they were able to use in 1939—I quote from the report of the engineer, a former employee of the irrigation branch of the dominion government—"nearly one hundred per cent of their share of the St. Mary water."

In 1939 Canada "overdrew her account" on Battle creek, which is one of the subsidiary streams. The total flow in that year on the three largest tributaries was about 144,000 acre-feet, of which our share was 72,000. Of this we used a total of only 22 per cent. In other words, by the completion of the Fresno reservoir by the United States, the whole situation is changed. They have put themselves in a position to use all their share, and more if available. This treaty is not like an act of parliament, and cannot be enforced as such. It is more in the nature of a gentleman's agreement. There is no limit to its duration; either party may repudiate the agreement and ask for a reconsideration of the whole matter if they think the terms are working against their interests.

Boiled down to its simplest terms, it means that Canada has the right under the agreement to half of the flow of water in these two rivers, if she uses it. She cannot get the beneficial use unless, as the United States government has done, she builds effective reservoirs for the conservation of the run. There is not sufficient water in the two rivers to supply all the irrigable land. The United States has put itself in a position to use its share and more. It is not unreasonble to expect, and the engineers of the United States government are alive to the situation, that an application will be made to have their allotment of this water increased, on the basis that they are making beneficial use of it, whereas Canada is not.

How does this affect Alberta and the Dominion of Canada? Southern Alberta, as most hon. members know, is arid and semi-arid. A small irrigation project is in operation there. The arguments of the hon. member for Lethbridge in this house last session commended themselves to me, and I have in the interim spent considerable time in getting authoritative information on the subject. Here is a splendid opportunity for Canada to solve one of her major problems, namely, the wheat problem, of which we hear so much, by laying the basis for another industry which has already demonstrated its ability to survive and grow. I refer to the sugar industry in southern Alberta, which has been and is an unqualified success and is on the eve of greater expansion.

But alas, we have not in southern Alberta at the present time water storage facilities to make it possible to irrigate all the land adjacent to the present irrigation ditches. We had to "borrow" water, if you will, from the United States last season in order to save a portion of our beet crop. If Canada is to save and preserve for future use her share of this water, a solution of the problem can be found only in the building of a dam on the St. Mary river. Competent government and private engineers have thoroughly investigated this project; they recommend it as economically sound, and I am concerned lest the government may let the opportunity slip and this water be lost for all time to the agricultural interests of Canada and more particularly of southern Alberta.

To build this dam, which is the preliminary step in the conservation of this water, would involve an outlay of approximately $3,500,000. But it would establish our right to the water and provide irrigation for over 500,000 acres of land which at present, fertile as it is, is worth not more than $5, $6, $7 or $8 an acre, whereas if water were supplied it would immediately become worth, at a conservative estimate, $30, $40, $50 and in some cases even as high as $60 an acre. At the same time it would assist in giving us what we so much require in our western economy, namely, diversification of our agricultural and industrial life and resources.

I urge upon the government, if this is the proper time and place to do it, that at this time they take appropriate steps to ensure that Canada shall not lose, through lack of use, her right to the waters to which our good neighbours to the south have agreed heretofore and up to the present agree we are entitled.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The matter to which my hon. friend has been referring is one to which the government has given consideration. A short time ago a committee was set up carefully to study the project of the construction of a dam to conserve waters in Alberta. The matter is one to which we are giving careful consideration, and I hope it may be possible before very long to give a definite assurance as to what may be done.

Mr. ADAMSON: May I return to the discussion respecting the St. Lawrence deep waterway? I should like to deal particularly with the point raised by the leader of the opposition concerning the export of power. I understand that off-peak power is being exported from the Niagara system at present, and that it is a valuable source of foreign exchange.

Can off-peak power be exported without a licence? It will be understood that off-peak power is very different from surplus power. Surplus power is power in excess of the requirements of the peak load, or the amount of horse-power available which we can not use at all at the present time. Off-peak power is the power which is produced during slack periods of each day and for which there is no market or, at best, a secondary market. Peak load is the output of power for a period of twenty minutes during which the maximum demand is made on the generating system. As an example, may I point out that daylight saving now in force has saved Ontario about 180,000 to 190,000 horse-power in primary power, because we were able to shift the peak forward in the day for a period of an hour or so, and thus stagger the demand. For example, the street-car load and the evening meal cooking load are put forward an hour, and so do not coincide with the lighting up time, which now comes when the street-car load and the cooking load have passed. This has saved a tremendous amount of power.

The question I should like to ask the Prime Minister is: Can surplus power or off-peak power, or both, be exported without a licence?

When we make a firm commitment, even for as short a time as a year, to supply 24-hour power for export at 100 per cent power factor, it has been found that industries are built up in the country receiving the electric energy, and it has never been possible to get the power back. In this country we have not been able to do it. We are going to need all our power. I believe we are going to need every single horse-power we can develop in Ontario and on the St. Lawrence. We will require it for electrical smelting of bauxite at the aluminium plant near Kingston and electrical smelting of iron and other ores, as well as in electrical furnaces treating scrap metal. Certainly we are not going to have any surplus power to export. I warn the Prime Minister that entering into any negotiation for the export of surplus power, even if it be of a temporary nature, is fraught with the greatest danger.

I was deeply interested in the observations of the hon. member for Stormont respecting the single- and double-stage developments of the St. Lawrence power system. It is reported that the two-stage development can produce power within a period of three or four years from the commencement of construction, whereas the single-stage development would take considerably longer. It is estimated that it would take seven years, or three or four years longer than the two-stage development. As this development must be considered in the light of a war measure, the sooner we get the power the better. That, it seems to me, is one of the most important points with which we are confronted. How soon can we get this power? As I understand the matter, the two-stage scheme will produce power three or four years earlier than the single-stage scheme, and that factor should outweigh all but the most serious engineering difficulties connected with the project.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Licensing for the export of power for off-peak purposes comes within the jurisdiction of the Department of Trade and Commerce. I have asked my colleague, the minister of that department, to secure from his officials a statement respecting the present position. When I receive it I shall reply to the hon. member.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Before the recess, with several other hon. members I urged the installation of a high-powered short-wave radio broadcasting station in Canada. I believe there are many reasons why it would be advantageous for Canada to have such a means of communication with south America and Mexico. The cost is not prohibitive, and I understand the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is anxious to have the installation. It would prove greatly advantageous to the Department of External Affairs in these troubled times, especially in view of the fact that German, Russian and Italian radios hammer at those people all the time. Will the Prime Minister tell us when we may expect to have a high-powered short-wave broadcasting station, and will he explain why we have not such a station to-day?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have tried to anticipate questions which might be asked, but I must confess I had not thought I would be asked to enter into a discussion respecting radio this afternoon. That is a matter which comes within the jurisdiction of my colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply. I would say to the hon. member, however, that, as in many other matters, the consideration at the root of the question is one of expenditure of public moneys. As the hon. member is aware, a short-wave station of the kind he has suggested would occasion the expenditure of a large amount of money.

[Mr. Adamson.]

I know that thought has been given to the matter by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the department. Possibly at some other time the minister will tell the hon. member why the project has not been proceeded with up to the present, and whether there is any likelihood of its being proceeded with in the near future.

Mr. GERSHAW: I should like to endorse some of the observations of the hon. member for Calgary West respecting international streams. In southern Alberta the streams which flow down the mountain sides are the heritage of the people in that district. As he has pointed out we are now in great danger of losing for all time to come the benefit of the water nature has provided. These waters are greatly needed in Canada, and we cannot afford to let the United States of America establish a prior claim. Certain irrigation works have been undertaken but not completed, and the result is that farmers in that community have experienced a scarcity of water. Their crops have not properly developed; in some instances loss has been considerable, and in all instances the farmers are deprived of the margin of profit they would otherwise enjoy. The time for action is now, so that we may secure these waters and make beneficial use of them. The need is really very great. Large sums of money have been spent for relief in those districts, and if use could be made of these waters the relief problem would be solved to a great extent.

These irrigation structures are something that will endure. Not only will the people who are at present in that section have the benefit of them, but they will be of benefit to those who follow after. I want to impress upon the government two factors. First, we are liable to lose these waters if beneficial use is not made of them. Next, the sugar beet farmers and also the mixed farmers located in those districts are badly in need of this water. As everyone knows, we have the fertile soil, the sunshine and the climate; we have many things needed for successful farming, and yet year after year the people have had crop failures and great discouragement because of lack of water. This is one method which could be used to absorb unemployment. It is a rehabilitation measure which would help to solve the great problems which will have to be faced at the conclusion of the war and even during its progress. Thousands of people could be employed and permanent homes could be provided for many who are now eking out a meagre existence.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) that as regards peak power and surplus power, licences are required.

Mr. GREEN: In the annual report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs for the calendar year 1940, reference is made to the sending of children from Great Britain to Canada. On page 8, I find the following:

> The total number of applications from British parents exceeded 70,000 up to July 5, 1940, when postponement of the scheme had to be announced, due to the difficulty in securing convoyed shipping space. On September 20, 24,130 children had been approved for Canada; 1,538 had actually sailed.

Would the Prime Minister care to make a short statement with regard to that particular situation?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Here again my hon. friend is getting more or less out of my jurisdiction. The Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) is in charge of immigration, and one branch of his department has been giving special attention to the matter of children coming from England to Canada. Unfortunately he is not in the chamber at the moment, but I shall direct his attention to the question asked by my hon. friend and he will probably be able shortly to let him have the information he desires. I may say to my hon. friend that it has been extremely difficult to get transportation for children from Great Britain to this side for some time past. This is due, as he himself has mentioned, to the difficulty of getting space on ships. I do not think there has been an appreciable increase in the numbers, beyond what was reported to the house not very long ago.

Mr. GREEN: The report of the department refers to the establishment of a Canadian consulate in Greenland. Would the Prime Minister explain that situation?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As my hon. friend is aware, Greenland is a dependency of Denmark. At the present time it is managing its affairs under two governors; the country is divided into two parts, and a separate governor is in charge of each. Canada has viewed with special interest anything that has taken place in Greenland that might affect the war situation. The country lies on one of the routes between the old world and the new which might be made a base for operations by the enemy. We have thought it desirable to have representation in Greenland so that we might be kept aware of possible developments.

We have also felt that we would wish to be of what assistance we could at this time to the people of Greenland. They have been cut off from supplies in some directions and we have been able to give them certain supplies. In order to get the information we would wish to have and be able to communicate rapidly at any moment, we have thought it advisable to have a consul general stationed in Greenland. Mr. Kirkwood, who was previously on the staff of our legation in the Netherlands, has been freed from his duties there for obvious reasons. He has at the government's request taken on the duties of consul general in Greenland.

The United States is similarly concerned with and interested in what may happen in Greenland and also has a consul resident there. In respect of practically all matters that relate to Greenland in which there is a mutual interest, we have been in communication with the United States. The government of the United States and our government have felt that it was desirable we should cooperate in viewing with common care whatever might be of concern there. I believe that the cooperation which has taken place thus far has been of real advantage to both countries.

Mr. GREEN: Would the Prime Minister explain the method by which questions that arise between Canada and Newfoundland are handled, particularly those concerning Canadian troops? There must be different problems coming up from day to day, and I should like to know what machinery there is for ironing out any difficulties that may arise.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Such matters are the subject of negotiation between the department of government here which is immediately interested in the particular matter under consideration, and ministers and officials of the Newfoundland government. For example, matters pertaining to the air force in Newfoundland would be taken up by the Minister of National Defence for Air with some minister and officials of the Newfoundland government. Similarly those with regard to the army would be taken up by the Minister of National Defence, and those having to do with naval affairs would be taken up by the Minister of National Defence for Naval Affairs. As my hon. friend knows, the government of Newfoundland is practically under the direction of the government of the United Kingdom, and United Kingdom officials take part in the settling of any matters which are of mutual concern. The Minister of National Defence for Air made a personal visit to Newfoundland some little time ago in order to familiarize himself with the situation there. Contacts were made between the minister and leading members of the government of Newfoundland, as well as with His Excellency the Governor. There is almost a day-to-day exchange of communications between officials there and our own officials.

Mr. GREEN: What methods have we for keeping in touch with the government of Iceland?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would not say that we are in daily touch with the government of Iceland. In sending our troops to Iceland we had communication with the government of Iceland through the Department of National Defence. These matters really come more under the immediate direction of the defence department, and I am therefore able to give my hon. friend only a general statement. I am informed that the British government has a minister in Iceland, and without doubt our officials are in touch through him with the authorities in Iceland.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I should like to go back for a moment to the question of the Vichy government. I was very glad that the Prime Minister made his statement with reference to our diplomatic relations with the Vichy government, because I think it will clear up what, in the minds of many people, has seemed to be an anomalous situation.

If I understood the Prime Minister correctly, he said that he thought it was wise to retain our contact with the French people and also in that way to serve as a channel through which the other members of the British commonwealth could retain their contact.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would not go so far as that. I would say that I believe our contact with France has been of assistance to other nations of the commonwealth, but I should not like it to be assumed that Australia, for example, retained contact with France through our representative.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): If I understood the Prime Minister correctly, he said that the Prime Minister of Great Britain had expressed appreciation of that contact through Mr. Dupuy. What occurred to me was this: Why, if the United Kingdom desired contact with the Vichy government, did it not maintain direct contact rather than indirect contact through the Canadian representative? If it is argued, however, as it might be, that the British government could not do that if it were going to recognize the de Gaulle movement, the corollary of that argument is that we, by maintaining contact with the Vichy government, are not giving recognition to the de Gaulle movement. I raise that point merely because there is, in some quarters in Canada, a feeling that there is, in some parts of this country, more sympathy with the Vichy government than with the de Gaulle movement. I for one do not believe that such is the case. But the continued existence of the anomalous situation where the United Kingdom is severing its diplomatic relations with the Vichy government while we maintain ours, is something that ought to be clarified if we are not going to be placed in a false light in the eyes of a great many people.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that, in these times of war, situations arise which tend to complicate matters. The relations which our government have had with France have happily escaped some of the difficulties which have arisen in connection with the immediate relations of the British government with the government of France. Undoubtedly the United Kingdom government have had reasons of their own why they should have taken the action which they did concerning the severing of their diplomatic relations with France—if the word "severed" is the correct one to apply, and I am not sure that it is correct. The representatives of the government of the United Kingdom did leave France and have returned to England, and for certain reasons which must be obvious, they have not gone back to France. But we in Canada are happily in a different relationship. There is nothing similarly strained in the relations between this country and France, and we have felt that so far as it was possible to maintain a bridge that would be a helpful one between any part of the British commonwealth of nations and France at this time, the better it would be both for the people of France and the people of Canada. We hope that, sooner or later, all the legations and embassies will be restored, but that may take some time. We should be duly thankful that we are able to be of any assistance whatever in helping to maintain a link with France in the present situation.

I would add that I do not think there is anything to be gained but much to be lost in continuing to discuss in this parliament the relations between the government of Vichy and the de Gaulle movement. The de Gaulle movement is not a government, nor is it a country. As I said a moment ago, representation to a country is made, not to any individual or group of individuals, but to the people through the government of the country. This whole question is one which I think hon. members will realize should be discussed only if we are perfectly certain that what we say here is not likely to complicate, but rather calculated to ease, a situation that is very difficult in the old world at the present time. My advice to the committee, if I might be permitted to offer such, would be that unless there is something to be gained by the discussion, we had better avoid it altogether.

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I revert for a moment to the question of water conservation on the St. Mary river. I am very glad that the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Edwards) and the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gershaw) spoke in support of that project, and I appreciate greatly the attention which the committee paid to what they had to say. This is a vital project to us out in that section of Canada, as anyone who has lived there and seen the actual situation will realize.

May I commend the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his government for having gone so far as to manifest considerable interest in this problem by the appointment of a committee. I wish to draw the attention of the government to the danger of possible delay in proceeding with this work. As the two members speaking before me have stressed, it is extremely important that we go forward with this work at once. I am afraid that if there should be delay for a year or so, complications which we cannot now foresee might arise, which might seriously endanger the whole project. We believe that the work should be begun this spring and that the committee which has been appointed should be given instructions to cut short its work in righteousness, so to speak, and make an expeditious report on the situation so that the work may be commenced immediately.

There are several reasons why we believe our stand in this respect is sound. In the first place, it is commonly urged with reference to expenditures of this kind that in the midst of this tremendous struggle we cannot afford the money. May I point out that we shall never be able to afford it better than right now; for while we are endeavouring to raise approximately two billion dollars in 1941, an expenditure of two and a half billions is very likely for 1942, so in view of these probable expenditures one on top of the other, it would be just as easy to get the money for the St. Mary river project this year as next or the year after.

There is another aspect of the question. While perhaps a labour shortage has begun to develop in the central provinces where a large amount of munitions manufacturing is going on, that shortage is not developing in the western provinces, particularly in Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. We still have plenty of labour in that area to do all the work that is necessary in building this project, but naturally our man-power will be gradually drained off just as it is likely to be drained off in other provinces, and a year from now we might not have available the present supply of labour or be able to obtain it at as reasonable a rate. That is a matter which needs to be taken into consideration.

Another aspect which I think should weigh with us is that this project is really a war measure. We do not know now what our needs are going to be before this war is over. At present we have access to stores of foreign sugar, for example. We can buy cane sugar and we have available the boats to bring that cane sugar to Canada. We may not always be so fortunate. Before the war is over, it may be necessary for us to manufacture our own sugar right in that area. As the hon. member for Calgary West pointed out, that area is eminently adapted for the production of beet sugar. As I have observed several times in this house, I doubt whether there is any better area to be found anywhere. When it is remembered that, once we have the water out on the land, we can put up a sugar factory which will produce probably five per cent of Canada's needs, and get it in operation in nine months, or between now and the end of this year, the matter is one which should be borne seriously in mind. We should be making provision in case we need that area as a source of food. Again, the district is admirably adapted for the production of vegetables. That cannot be said of all areas, because the climate elsewhere is not invariably as good. Therefore I would say that as a war measure the project is not entirely without value.

Again, if the area is to be used as a place of settlement of soldiers after the war, it should be borne in mind that it will take at least three and probably four or five years to construct a dam and get the water out to the land so as to prepare it for settlement. That is another reason why we should not waste any time.

Another aspect of the matter which is of importance is that of beneficial use and priority. It is pretty well recognized that those who have prior use of water, and especially those who have prior beneficial use, acquire a claim. Every year we defer the construction of this project and the bringing of that water to beneficial use, we allow the United States one year more of beneficial use and prior right—which might be an extremely important matter one of these days.

There are some who say that this whole project should be deferred until after the war. Let us remember, however, what happened during the last war. Before that war ended, an investigation had been made regarding the whole Lethbridge southeast water conservation project, and I believe the officials were thoroughly impressed with the importance of going forward with the project. Yet that project has been deferred until the present time. Eighteen years have been wasted—apparently because people waited for the close of the war. We can well imagine that if we continue thinking in the orthodox manner, as we think now, after the war we shall say, "Well, we surely have to retrench to the very minimum, the very last degree; we cannot spend any money now, we must get out of debt"; and the result will be the further deferment of this project. That also, I think, should be borne in mind.

There is one more consideration. I have pretty good evidence to show that United States people living in the area concerned are beginning to look forward to the gaining of some of Canada's water rights. It is well known what can happen in a democratic country when the people as a whole begin to demand that something be done. The longer the government defers this project, the more possible it is for a public opinion to develop in the United States, just across the border from Alberta, demanding that something be done. Consequently, in the interests of good feeling between us and the United States, as well as for our economic development, we ought to go forward with the dam at the earliest possible moment.

I wish once more to commend the Prime Minister and his department for taking this matter into consideration, and to add my voice to those who have already urged that we should go forward promptly with the work.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the Prime Minister explain the relationship which exists between the high commissioner's office in London and Canadian military headquarters? Are they two quite separate entities, or do the communications which ordinarily pass between the government and either of them or of the departments in Canada, pass through the one or the other?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They are separate entities. But there is a liaison between the high commissioner's office and military headquarters in London, whereby the high commissioner's office is kept in touch with matters which are of concern and mutual interest. The military headquarters in London communicate direct with the Department of National Defence here, and the Minister of National Defence has his immediate contacts with its staff.

Mr. STIRLING: Is that liaison officer an official of the Department of External Affairs?

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He is a member of the staff of the high commissioner. It is a liaison with the high commissioner's office so that the high commissioner may be kept informed on matters with regard to which we would wish him to be informed.

Mr. STIRLING: One other question in connection with the high commissioner's office. Is there on his staff a man versed in the British requirements in munitions such as Canada is preparing—knowledgeable on the subject of Britain's requirements in a scientific way?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Department of Munitions and Supply have their own representative in London. His name is Charles Banks. He represents the department in London itself.

Mr. STIRLING: He is not under Mr. Massey?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He is under the Minister of Munitions and Supply.

Mr. STIRLING: And consequently he is not answerable to the high commissioner, he is answerable to the minister?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, he is answerable to the minister. But in all these matters which relate to the London offices, an effort is made to see that the high commissioner is kept fully informed of what is happening, so that if for any reason his co-operation were needed or he thought it desirable to bring some matters to the attention of the Minister of External Affairs, he would be in a position to do so.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I notice that the Canadian government appointed in February of last year a commissioner to New Zealand. Are there any arrangements to have New Zealand appoint a commissioner to Canada? Has the Prime Minister any announcement to make in this connection?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Up to the present the government of New Zealand has not found it possible to send a high commissioner to Canada; but we shall greatly welcome a representative from New Zealand should the New Zealand government think well of appointing a representative here. We have, of course, no control over the appointment.

Item agreed to.

37. Representation abroad—including salaries of high commissioners, ministers plenipotentiary, consuls, secretaries and staff, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act or any of its amendments, $593,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The committee will be, I am sure, not only interested in learning but pleased to know that the government has been successful in enlisting the good offices of Mr. Leighton McCarthy at this particular time, and that Mr. McCarthy has been appointed as minister to Washington. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition mentioned last night that he thought we should have at Washington at this time an outstanding citizen of Canada, and he linked Mr. Leighton McCarthy's name to the designation which he had given, so I am happy to feel that on this occasion both sides of the house are of one view with respect to our good fortune—I call it such advisedly—in securing Mr. McCarthy's services as minister.

Perhaps I should tell the committee that some years ago I tried to get Mr. McCarthy to take the office of minister at Washington. Mr. McCarthy could not see his way at the time to sever his business connection in Canada to the extent of giving himself to the diplomatic service. He has indicated to me off and on since the war began that if he could be of service in any way he would be glad to consider any proposal that might be made to him. As soon as I found that Mr. Christie's recovery would unfortunately likely take some time, I got in touch with Mr. McCarthy and, after having considered the matter carefully, he has agreed to accept the position of minister for such time as he is able to give his services at Washington.

As hon. members know, Mr. McCarthy is a former member of this House of Commons. He took a prominent part in the discussion of public affairs when he was a member of parliament. He is head of one of the largest insurance companies in Canada and has had a great deal to do with private business. He has also an exceptionally high standing in his own profession, that of the law. He has always been interested in international affairs. With respect to his appointment to Washington there is a circumstance which I believe to be of real value to us all; it is that Mr. McCarthy and the president of the United States have been very close friends for many years and know each other intimately. I feel that no better appointment to Washington could possibly have been made.

Some little time ago the Prime Minister of Great Britain communicated with me with regard to a possible appointment to the imperial privy council and discussed the qualifications which he felt should govern in the appointment of a privy councillor. Mr. Churchill set forth the following condition and qualification which I pass on to the committee as exceptionally valuable, whether made applicable to the position of privy councillor in Britain or in any of the dominions. The position, Mr. Churchill said, should be regarded not as being bestowed as an honour or as a reward, but as the sworn relationship deemed necessary for the performance of highly confidential duties by persons of eminent stations. The government has felt that Mr. McCarthy's relationship with itself would be one involving the performance of highly confidential duties and he would certainly be recognized as enjoying an eminent station. The cabinet therefore recommended to his excellency the appointment of Mr. McCarthy as a member of the privy council of Canada. His excellency has been pleased to approve the recommendation. Mr. McCarthy, therefore, goes to Washington not merely as a minister but also as a member of the privy council of Canada.

Recognizing the importance of the work to be done at Washington, and in order to give Mr. McCarthy the best assistance we possibly can, the Department of External Affairs has arranged to have Mr. Hume Wrong accompany Mr. McCarthy when he goes to Washington. Hon. members will recall that Mr. Wrong was associated with the legation at Washington for ten years altogether, and he is therefore familiar with the Washington scene and has many friends in the different departments of government there. Mr. Wrong has been at the League of Nations as permanent delegate from Canada. That particular position has been abandoned for obvious reasons. Since October, 1939, he has been special economic adviser in London, dealing more particularly with matters of economic warfare and with financial questions. He is therefore familiar with many aspects of the situation in London and will bring that added knowledge to the discharge of his duties in Washington at this time.

As I mentioned on Monday a week ago, the affairs of the legation, during Mr. Christie's unfortunate illness, have been administered by Mr. Merchant Mahoney as chargé d'affaires. I doubt if a more faithful, honourable or efficient officer could be found in any public service than Mr. Mahoney has been in the years he has been at Washington. In fact, if I recollect rightly, he was first appointed to Washington some time before the legation was opened. He was appointed as representative of the imperial munitions board. He has made for himself a place of exceptional confidence in Washington and he will continue, of course, as counsellor at the legation. The government feels, however, that he should be given a higher rank than he is at present enjoying. He is at present commercial counsellor, but his duties have taken him outside purely commercial lines into general problems of government and matters of general concern; his responsibilities have long ago outrun the limited description of his duties conveyed by the title "commercial counsellor" and he has therefore the position of counsellor of legation without qualification.

Mr. Wrong will be the senior counsellor, having had exceptional experience in international affairs in many parts of the world, but I should like the committee to realize that this country owes a very great debt of gratitude to Mr. Merchant Mahoney for the way in which he has supported all ministers who have been in Washington and the very unselfish role which he has taken at all times in serving this country there.

I feel I should place on the record an exchange of correspondence which has taken place between Mr. Christie and myself, so that the committee will know exactly the position as it stands at the present time, and as it relates to the future. On February 19, Mr. Christie wrote to me from the Hospital of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, 66th street and York avenue, New York, as follows:

My dear Prime Minister:

I have now learned from my doctors that my full recovery is likely to take somewhat longer than they thought and I had hoped. My absence from Washington, particularly in these very difficult times, has been very much on my mind and I know it has caused you concern. I had expected to be able to take up my full duties at the legation before this, but I quite realize that, with a convalescence in prospect that may take some months, the vital interests of Canada in Washington cannot be adequately maintained without full and effective diplomatic representation there.

In all the circumstances I hope it may be found possible to grant me the extended leave of absence from the legation which I am told I must have in order to complete my recovery. I hope you will therefore, feel entirely free to make whatever arrangements in respect of the Canadian legation at Washington the needs of the country and the service may require.

Yours very sincerely,
Loring C. Christie.

To Mr. Christie's communication I replied on February 20 as follows:

Office of the Prime Minister
Canada

Ottawa, February 20, 1941.

My dear Christie:

I am more than sorry to learn that you now feel your complete recovery may take rather longer than we had all hoped. I know that your enforced absence from your post in this critical period has been an added source of anxiety which no doubt has been impeding your recovery.

It is characteristic of your thoughtfulness in all that pertains to the public service to suggest that your present indisposition should not be allowed to impair in any way the effective representation of Canada at Washington, especially in time of war. Anticipating that such would be your attitude once you found that time would be required for a complete restoration of your health, I had, prior to the receipt of your letter, been considering what steps it might be most advisable to take for the effective carrying on of the work of the legation in the event of a prolonged absence on your part being necessary.

It is, I think, desirable that you should take an extended leave of absence so that you can enjoy the complete rest which your recovery requires, and which your services to Canada, both at home and abroad, have amply earned. It is also most important that the representative of Canada at Washington should, particularly at this time, be someone who will have the complete authority and status of a minister. This I have reason to believe can be arranged without impairing your own status as a minister in Canada's diplomatic service.

I much hope that procedure on these lines may serve to relieve your mind of all present anxieties and enable the government at a later date again to avail itself of your exceptional talents wherever they may be utilized to the best advantage.

With kindest regards to yourself and with every wish for an early and complete restoration of your health,

Believe me,
Yours very sincerely,
W. L. Mackenzie King.

Loring C. Christie, Esq.,
Rockefeller Institute,
New York, N.Y.

I should have said at the outset that His Majesty the King was of course duly advised of the wishes of the government with respect to the appointment of Mr. McCarthy to Washington, and has been pleased to signify his approval of the appointment and of the course it was proposed to adopt with respect thereto. I mention this because a procedure somewhat different from that which is customary has been adopted in the case of Mr. McCarthy going to Washington. As a rule, a new minister presents the letters of recall of his predecessor and his own letter of credence. But as Mr. Christie will remain a minister, although absent, it has not been thought necessary to have Mr. McCarthy present any letters of recall or letters of credence. The President of the United States and the Secretary of State are agreed that an oral communication by Mr. McCarthy on his arrival, to the president who understands the special situation and approves of the arrangement contemplated, will suffice. Mr. Roosevelt, who, as I have already mentioned, knows Mr. McCarthy very well, has informed me that he will be only too pleased to receive Mr. McCarthy with the full authority and status of minister the moment he arrives in Washington, without any special letter of credence from His Majesty the King. The arrangements for Canadian representation at Washington I hope are of a character which will meet all the needs of the situation at the present time. I trust they may also prove of benefit to the health of Mr. Christie, who is an exceptionally able and faithful public servant.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Prime Minister has made some very interesting announcements. I cannot suppose that the advance notice of the appointment of Mr. McCarthy that I gave here the other day was unknown to the Prime Minister, because it had already been announced in the Toronto newspapers, but I do think the Prime Minister has made a very good choice.

I am pleased to know that he has created Mr. McCarthy a privy councillor. I had hoped that he might give consideration to the suggestion which I made in perfect good faith, that it being the most important post in our diplomatic service, he might see his way clear to raise the new minister to the rank of ambassador, because I do think that would enhance his importance in Washington at least one degree. The Prime Minister has not seen fit to do that, and of course I make no further comment.

Since he announced the appointment of Mr. McCarthy as privy councillor, I have been wondering whether consideration has been given to the suggestion, made to me at all events, that our high commissioner in Australia, for instance, should be made a privy councillor. I am told that it not only carries something with it as a matter of dignity but carries with it certain rights of access to the Prime Minister or the cabinet in person. I just mention this in passing because I understood that it has been the practice on previous occasions to make our high commissioners, as well as some at least of our ministers abroad, privy councillors. The former Prime Minister made Mr. Howard Ferguson a privy councillor, also Mr. Herridge, and I am thinking of my friend C. J. Burchell, the high commissioner in Australia. Could he not be made a privy councillor? I am not going to carry the suggestion any further than that.

With what the Prime Minister said about Mr. Hume Wrong I concur. I have had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Wrong in Washington, and from the efforts he made to assist me as a private individual, I learned of his competence as an official. I can say the same thing for Mr. Mahoney. He knows his way about in Washington; he is a valuable official of the Canadian legation there, and I am indeed pleased to see this recognition given to him. I think it is perhaps somewhat long delayed on the part of Canada to a man who has served this country so well. He was sent down there by Sir Robert Borden, if my recollection is correct, at a time when we had no actual representation in Washington, and during the last war he did useful work for Canada, as I am sure he has done since.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad my hon. friend has again mentioned the question of the creation of an embassy at Washington. May I say to him that I am far from being averse to a step of the kind being taken. I am only too happy to recognize the fact that our views in this particular are much the same. I unfortunately labour under this difficulty, that whatever I do is certain to be looked at from different angles, some of them quite the opposite of what I would feel was justified. I have had to ask myself again and again what would be the reaction, in this country and overseas, if we were to create an embassy at Washington at the present time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It would be good with me; that is all I can answer.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Now that my hon. friend is with me I shall pursue the matter further.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Prime Minister will be able to see what the public think about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What I have been most anxious to avoid, particularly at this time of war, was any question being raised which might give rise to general discussion as to what might lie back of any particular step. While I have never even replied to the insinuations that because I was a stalwart Canadian I therefore could not be equally staunch as a supporter of the British empire, I have carefully endeavoured to avoid taking any steps that might lead to misunderstanding and misrepresentation. I have just had to ask myself the question, how would some people in this country view a step which would create an embassy at Washington at this particular moment? Personally I feel that there are the strongest reasons why we should have an embassy at Washington. I believe in the equality of status of all the self-governing nations of the British empire. And the fact that we have had a legation at Washington rather than an embassy has been due not to any inferiority complex, but rather to a sense of proportion in the beginnings of our diplomatic services.

I shall explore the matter further, but at what time it may be best to take the step that has been suggested I think will have to be carefully considered.

As to the creation of privy councillors, in common with my hon. friend, I should be happy to see a number of our friends recognized as members of the privy council. I feel however, that that is one particular office which should be reserved as largely as possible for those who have had immediate experience or large experience in matters of government which, as I have said, Mr. Churchill feels should be the relationship to entitle anyone to that position. I talked with Mr. Baldwin when he was in Canada about the position of privy councillors in England. He said to me that in his opinion there was no position which should be as closely guarded as that of appointment to the privy council, that it would lose its character altogether if men, simply because they were appointed to one office, should feel that because they got that office they should therefore get the other.

It is not any lack of appreciation of the fine qualities of the men who represent us as high commissioners which causes me to hesitate to do for one what I could not do for all, or probably would be called upon to do for all, were I to make a recommendation in any one direction. I feel that the position of high commissioner in itself is a very honourable one, and I am sure that today anyone holding that office would at all times have access to the government of the country to which he might be sent.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman, without having any desire to delay the committee, there is a matter which I should like to bring to the attention of the Prime Minister and the committee. While it may not be entirely in order on this item, I do not see any other under which reference could be made to it. To me this matter is of considerable importance and I have discussed it already with the Prime Minister.

The Lord Mayor of London has established a fund known as "The Lord Mayor's Air Raid Distress Fund." This fund has the support and blessing of the British government, and through it appropriations have been made to Coventry, Birmingham and other cities, and to the women's voluntary society for the purpose of providing relief to the victims of enemy air raids. The British government is placing more and more reliance upon this fund for the relief of distress in devastated areas, and contributions are urgently required from all parts of the world. The shipping difficulties, as well as the immediate urgency of the need, make it essential that contributions should be in the form of money to enable the purchase of articles which could not promptly be sent overseas. Contributions from Australia have been on a generous scale. The cities of Melbourne and Sydney have already sent grants of £200,000 each, and additional contributions from those sources will be forthcoming. I do not know whether the commonwealth as such has made a contribution.

Canadian contributions have not been on anything like the same scale. I believe the Toronto Telegram did establish a fund, and the results achieved in the city of Toronto have been quite remarkable. Something between $300,000 and $400,000 has been voluntarily subscribed and transmitted overseas. On February 12, I went to see the Prime Minister and suggested to him that, since the distress is so great, he should ask parliament to make a special appropriation to assist the great work of the Lord Mayor's air raid distress fund. I had hoped that a special appropriation would be made in the main estimates, and I was greatly disappointed when this was not done.

In the past, appropriations have been made by parliament to assist in the relief of victims of earthquakes, fires, et cetera, outside Canada, and this constitutes a precedent which might well be followed in this case. On January 18, 1940, an order in council, P.C. 220½, was approved authorizing the issue of a governor general's warrant in the sum of $100,000 to provide funds to be placed at the disposal of the consul general of Finland in Canada for the purchase and transport of Canadian foodstuffs for the relief of the people of Finland. I believe this to have been a commendable action, and I think it constitutes an additional reason, if any were needed, why this government should ask this parliament to make an immediate appropriation for the purpose I have indicated. The amount of the appropriation which might be made is a matter for discussion, but in my opinion it should not be less than $1,000,000. Of course, that would be a matter for consideration and discussion after the principle had been adopted. Having made this suggestion privately to the Prime Minister, I am taking this opportunity of bringing the matter to the attention of the public. I wish once more to urge upon the Prime Minister with all the emphasis at my command that he accept my suggestion.

One of the reasons which prompted me to make this suggestion was an instance that occurred recently during a trip I was making to the west. Upon entering the dining car one night I was assigned to a seat at a table at which were seated a small child and a little old lady. Naturally we got into conversation and she told me her story. She had been bombed out of her home in London on three different occasions and had gone through the bombings from the beginning of the war until November. She tried in every way to get out of Britain, haunting the steamship offices, but at all times she was met with the same response, that there were no vacancies for her or anyone else. One day she happened to be in a shipping office when she heard that someone had given up a passage, and she said she would take it without knowing whether it was to Australia, India, South Africa or Canada. It turned out to be to Canada. She had been to Montreal and was on her way to the coast when I met her. During the course of our conversation she told me something of the destitution and privation being suffered by the people of bombed London. I then and there resolved that I would bring the whole matter to the attention of the authorities of Canada, and I am suggesting now what I think is the worthy thing to do under the circumstances.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition has just said, he called on me at my office and brought to my attention the circumstances which he has just narrated to the committee and made the suggestion that the government should consider making an appropriation of $1,000,000 or some other amount to aid in relieving distress arising from air raids in Great Britain. I said to my hon. friend that I appreciated his motives and shared his feelings with respect to the desirability of relieving distress, and that from the government's point of view it was all a question of how best to effect the end which we shared in common.

Canada's war effort need not be restricted to contributions that come from the federal parliament. Contributions may come from the provincial legislatures or from municipalities, and there may be contributions from individuals. I am using the word "contribution" in a very broad sense. I told my hon. friend that I would bring the matter to the attention of my colleagues in the cabinet and see that it received careful consideration there. In a word, the view that the cabinet took of the matter was this: that under the war appropriation bill a contribution is being made from Canada's treasury of at least $1,300,000,000 which is immediately concerned with the war effort. It might seem a simple matter to add another million or so to that amount but if we were to do so we would be establishing a precedent which perhaps would lead to many requests for donations to other special objects. We would, moreover, be departing from what seems to have been the method adopted in other parts of the empire in making contributions for this particular purpose. In London, for example, there is the Lord Mayor's Fund. In Montreal there has recently been opened a fund with which Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth has graciously consented to have her name associated. My hon. friend has referred to what has been done in Toronto. He has spoken of Australia, but has told us the contributions were made by the cities of Melbourne and Sydney.

If I am not mistaken, the city of Ottawa made a contribution a short time ago. It is a form of relief which, if given through the municipalities, appeals immediately to the citizens generally. That would seem to be an avenue through which contributions might be made to this end, which contributions in the long run would amount to as considerable a figure as anything that the federal government itself might contribute. I venture to say that if I were to announce to-night that the federal government was going to make a contribution to this particular fund, immediately it would be found that many persons in the municipalities who otherwise would have contributed to the fund would say: "Oh, well, the federal government is making a contribution, so why should we?" Similarly, municipalities which might be anxious to associate their efforts with the efforts of other municipalities might feel that the dominion government was making a large contribution and, therefore, that it was not necessary that they should do so.

I am giving to the committee the view which the members of the government took of the matter, we being just as anxious as my hon. friend and all other hon. members to contribute to every phase of the war effort to which we could justifiably make a contribution. At this time when a campaign is in progress urging the people of this country to invest in war savings certificates, I think many persons would feel that, since that campaign was gathering up small contributions to help meet the very large obligations which the federal government has assumed, we would be more justified, in relation to this particular purpose, in leaving it to the municipalities to supplement what the federal government is doing.

I do not say that the government will not consider the matter further. If I thought that the House of Commons generally took a different view from that of the government I would very gladly ask my colleagues to reconsider the decision which we have reached. I have given briefly to hon. members the point of view which we entertained. While the matter need not be regarded as finally closed, that is the present position of the administration towards the suggestion my hon. friend has made.

Mr. ADAMSON: This afternoon the Prime Minister quoted the qualifications for an imperial privy councillor as given by Prime Minister Churchill. He stated the qualifications which Mr. Churchill had asked that an imperial privy councillor should have. In view of the fact that the question of an imperial war cabinet has been raised, it would seem to me that conversations must have taken place or communications must have passed between the government of the United Kingdom and the Canadian government respecting the setting up of an imperial war cabinet or an imperial privy council. Would the Prime Minister be good enough to give us more information on that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I indicated, I think on Monday, that there had been communications on the subject of an imperial war council both in Mr. Chamberlain's time and since Mr. Churchill succeeded to office, but there has been no invitation extended to the prime ministers of the dominions to come to London for such a purpose. Such communications as have been received have indicated that in the opinion of his majesty's government the time has not yet arrived for the calling of such a conference. Something of that nature may be called at a future time, but up to the present the British government have not thought it advisable to ask the dominions to send their representatives to an imperial war council.

In the statement I made in the house a week ago on Monday I was seeking to make clear why I attach, so far as my own position is concerned, particular attention to the prime minister of the country being in immediate association with his colleagues when he gives any decision that affects empire affairs, if that can possibly be arranged. I sought to make it clear that from the point of view of effective communication the agencies that we have to-day are such that we feel that, while to all appearances there is not an imperial war cabinet to-day, in reality there is such, I say this because the British government, I assume, asks our opinion on, I should say, most of the matters which they regard as important to the dominions and certainly on all of those matters on which our opinion would be asked if the head of the government were at a council table in London. As the situation is now, we are able to give a reply immediately to any communications of the kind for the simple reason that the cabinet is together in Ottawa; I can consult my colleagues in a very few minutes and we can reach our decision in no time, unless the matter be one that requires considerable discussion. In that event it is possible to get the consensus of view much more quickly than could be done by cabling from England to get possibly one set of views here and then trying to reconcile them, say with different opinions held by the government representative in London.

Mr. COLDWELL: In the annual report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs there is a little note on page 10 about which I am curious. It reads:

> On September 6 a treaty amending in respect of Canada certain provisions of the Anglo-United States treaty for the advancement of peace of 1914 was signed by the Canadian minister and the Secretary of State.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will recall that at the time William Jennings Bryan was Secretary of State in the United States, the treaties referred to were made. I am informed that the original treaty negotiated by him applied to Canada as part of the British empire. The present treaty is in the name of Canada.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask the Prime Minister on what basis young Canadians are selected for service in the Department of External Affairs? We seem to have recruited a number of remarkably able young men, one of the ablest perhaps being the acting under-secretary of state, Mr. Norman Robertson, who sits before the Prime Minister at the present moment, and who is a distinguished graduate of our university of British Columbia. I think it would be of interest to the committee if the Prime Minister would tell us in what manner these young men are chosen. There must be many bright young Canadians who would be only too glad to get into the service of this department. Under what conditions can young men enter this branch of the service?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Department of External Affairs is one part of the general civil service, and admission to the department, if I may use that expression, comes about in the same way as it does in other departments of government, namely, upon examinations which are fixed by the civil service commission. The department makes known its needs by applying to the commission; those who wish to enter the department send in their applications. When the time comes for an examination they take the examination. As I understand it, the examinations are not confined merely to those which are written. There are oral examinations, and the deputy minister of the department has acted with other members of the public service as an examiner at oral examinations with a view of sizing up some of the qualifications of candidates which might not be apparent through the written examination.

The department does draw candidates from all parts of Canada and from all of the universities. Care has been taken, I believe, by the universities to make it known to students that there are opportunities in the government service in the Department of External Affairs.

The work of the department is pretty generally known. Those who are taking courses such as economics and political science at the universities and the young men and young women who are interested in foreign affairs send in their applications to the department. I suppose that hardly a week and never a month passes when I do not receive some communication asking how an individual can get into the department; and the same is true, of course, to a much greater extent with the deputy head. The department has a large waiting list of names of those who desire to try the examinations, also a list of those who have passed; and as opportunity arises, those who have passed the examinations are drafted into the service.

I think I ought to say, and I am sure my hon. friend would wish me to say, that the late Doctor Skelton, having held at one time the position which he did at Queens university, having taken the interest that he did at all times in students, made a point of endeavouring to discover young men in different parts of the country who would be well suited to the Canadian public service. He did what he could to encourage the best of them to try the examinations and, as far as he could, enlisted their services subsequently.

I should like to add that I agree with my hon. friend in all that he said about the acting under-secretary of state. I congratulate his university upon having sent to the public service of Canada one who lends distinction to the university as well as to himself.

Mr. CHURCH: The Prime Minister has given an account of this famous department of his, the Department of External Affairs. I have read all the discussions in Hansard during the many years since this department was established, and in my opinion its establishment is one of the many reasons why we have the present war. Away back at the time of the treaty of Versailles the government of the day set up this department. In an address on May 26, 1938, I gave a summary of the circumstances of its origin and the functions proposed for it, and its history and the separate acts proposed under it.

Immediately after the great war the League of Nations was established as a part of the treaty of Versailles. Great Britain agreed to this at the behest of President Wilson, and the league was established, but without obtaining the ratification of the senate of the United States, and they refused to endorse it.

The Canadian government proceeded then to make and sign treaties separately, and so signed the halibut treaty. They insisted on a separate seat at the League of Nations; they claimed the right to separate representation at Washington and a separate embassy in the United States, for what purpose? To appease Washington. I would be the last person to say anything against the government in Washington, but Washington is quite capable of looking after its own affairs; that is a primary function of good government on the part of our kinsmen there, to protect and look after their own interests, first and last. I would that Canada would look after its own affairs as successfully.

As regards these amateur ambassadors whom we send over the seven seas, I have consistently opposed that policy. Who instructs them, and what is Canada's foreign policy? I am the only member who has opposed separate embassies and the dividing of Great Britain's representation at Washington and other capitals in the seven seas; and I did so because I believed that it would inevitably lead to division and drifting away from the mother country. We have seen the results. Hitler was thus led to believe that the dominions would not back up the mother country. In 1914 a similar thing happened, in the days of the kaiser, when we were slow to see the way the great dominions were drifting away from the empire.

As I look over the items of expenditure, which have increased herein by leaps and bounds, I ask, what are the functions of these so-called diplomats and who instructs them? They are just a lot of amateurs and only learn by experience. The ablest diplomats we have had in the history of the British empire are the permanent civil servants sent out by the foreign office; I will give the committee some names. Instead of the type of politician whom we have had representing us for the past seven years, Britain had its ablest ambassadors at Washington before and after the great war, men like Lord Pauncefote, Sir Esme Howard, Sir Robert Lindsay, and the war-time ambassador, Sir Cecil Spring-Rice, who was succeeded by two British cabinet ministers and politicians with no diplomatic experience, Lord Reading and Sir Auckland Geddes. True, the papers did not write up these skilled diplomats I first named as they do the politicians appointed.

I have opposed and still oppose the principle upon which this vote is based of dividing

Britain's representation. Are we or are we not a part of the British empire? If we are, why do we seek, as we have sought ever since this department was created, to divide Britain's representations in external affairs. That sort of thing is very largely what has caused this war. It led to trouble as soon as the department was created. We have heard much talk about "Canada a nation". Yes, it was a nation, as I said ten years ago, on the front pages of United States magazines and at five o'clock teas and ten o'clock dinners at Washington. We were a nation, all right, then, but we were a pauper in actual performance of paying for a fleet to defend our shores. What happened? We sent a whole lot of novice ambassadors down there, with the result that the politicians in the senate and house of representatives put it all over them in diplomacy. Now we are dumb, dumb as an oyster; we have been afraid, during these past three or four years, to say one word about what is going on in the senate and in congress, criticizing Britain and her dominions at the seat of government, and so have contributed something to the conditions which led to war. Canada has kept silent and not replied to all the four years' attacks there on the mother country before this war.

As I have said, one consequence of the creation of this department was to divide Britain's representation, and to lead Hitler to believe, as once the kaiser believed, that the dominions would not support the mother country any longer. It is a phase of separatism and isolation from the mother country, with the result that for a year or two prior to the present war the dominions were a drag on Great Britain. I say this advisedly. For the last three or four years, as this discussion has come up, I have given my personal opinion. A great French prime minister once said "You can never deal with Great Britain with regard to any treaty, because she has always to consult five or six overseas dominions, with the result that when the case has been studied, they can never reach any agreement." What he stated has proved to be correct.

Take the case of Japan, our old and faithful ally. I notice that part of the present vote, item 37, for these various embassies relates to Japan. What happened with Japan? To appease the United States the government has driven Japan into the German orbit by the Washington treaty of 1921. During the great war Japan looked after the whole of the Pacific ocean, enabling Britain to turn her back on the Pacific. Japan looked after China, the Indian empire, the six hundred miles of Canada's western coast, and as far east as the gulf of Aden and the entrance to the Mediterranean, with the result that as far as Canada is concerned, our interests, including our shipping in the Pacific, were safeguarded.

In the great war to which I have referred, Germany kept the whole civilized world at bay for four and one-half years, although we had then as our devoted allies Italy and Japan, and, during part of the time, the United States and Russia.

This is going to be a long drawn out war and diplomacy will play a very important part in it. We have seen how, largely by diplomatic means, Germany has swept through the Norwegian and the Baltic countries, the Netherlands, the low countries and others. The speed of it shocked the people of the United States and Canada.

I repeat that I am and always have been opposed to the principle on which this vote is based. It divided our empire. It drove Japan, for thirty years our faithful ally, out of the alliance. Two years ago, when these estimates were up for discussion, we declared that Canada's defence and external affairs policy were based on two things: first, home defence, and, second, to protect our neutrality provided a foreign foe invaded our territory on its way to attack the United States. These were the two cardinal principles. Take Italy. As a result of our becoming a nation overnight we passed sanctions against Italy with respect to Ethiopia, and then all of a sudden, in three months' time, those sanctions were rescinded, with the result that Italy, an old ally and a loyal friend of ours, was driven into the German orbit. We did propose a few years ago to establish another embassy in Italy, but it was not consummated.

With regard to the other part of the discussion, I suggest that we have here another means of separating our representation in the action that has been taken in respect of the present French government. The British government has recognized the provisional government of General de Gaulle as an ally, and Australia followed three months ago in the recognition of de Gaulle as an ally, asking the Vichy representative to go home. Canada is divided on the question. Here we find Britain with one policy and Canada with another. Australia and New Zealand have a different policy from ours, and side with Britain. Vichy is doing Hitler's work and bidding and we should close it up in Canada.

A part of this vote is for the purpose of maintaining a sort of dominion embassy in Dublin to Eire. In my opinion, the Canadian people are opposed to this idea. We are spending $30,000 of this vote on this particular work, while our shipping is in a very precarious state owing to the actions of German submarines and bombers in the vicinity of Irish ports on the west and northwest coasts of Ireland. We are spending, I say, a considerable part of this vote for the maintenance of a sort of embassy in what is not a British dominion but a separate republic, and a neutral. Why should we spend money over there, while Britain has her hands tied behind her back by the loss of the use of these bases, and shipping and tonnage are being sent to the bottom of the sea? Many ships of the merchant marine have been sunk, our brave sailors drowned, and altogether our shipping faces a grave menace. We should close our embassy in Eire, in protest. It is not in the public interest that we should spend money in a neutral country which is not a British dominion, but doing Hitler's work, and the lights of Dublin and other cities enable Hitler to attack Wales and England.

Further, I believe that we should have a change here with regard to the Vichy government. Let us follow Britain in this matter. We cannot blow hot and cold in these matters. No one knows how many ships of Canadian and British register have been ruined in consequence of lack of proper protection by the right to use these ports in this war, ports which in the war with Napoleon caused damage at the back-door.

Coming to the United States, in connection with this particular vote, which is a large one, I would point out that for nearly two years we have been able to get along without a permanent representative there—almost since the war started. It was a great mistake to open that embassy, because it led to considerable friction between the mother country and the United States before and after the last war. We appreciate all that the people of the United States and their splendid president have done for us, but we must not rely to too great an extent on others. It is safer to rely on ourselves. We must not forget that a year ago we depended upon France and the Maginot line. Everyone said that the Maginot line would hold until Britain and the dominions were prepared, and it failed. We are now depending on the United States for protection this year, as on France last year. I suggest that it would be better for us to depend more on the mother country and on the dominions in the present battle of Britain, both in the old country and in the Mediterranean as help from America may come too late. Mr. Knudsen shocked congress by telling them that it would take two years to get munitions and two years to train men, and in the meantime the war is becoming a grave menace to the empire. No one knows to whom this country will belong even at the end of this year.

I have great respect and admiration for the people of the United States; my respect for them is second to that of no one in this house. At the same time I believe in the policy laid down by Sir John A. Macdonald when he said, speaking in 1844 at a nomination meeting in the city of Kingston, that the present and the future of the people of Canada should always be wrapped up in the mother country, and our maintenance of the British connection forever.

I have been opposed to the policy of giving away air bases. I fail to see why air bases should have been given away from Newfoundland all the way down to British Guiana, bases which the United States have wanted for a hundred years and only got when they found the empire in peril. This move would not have been needed had not the finest army, navy and air force been scrapped in order to please pacifists and those who believe in collective security. An armed Britain would have prevented war. The giving away of these bases has been very much opposed in Britain. Some say that it was done at the suggestion of Canada. If so, then I say that Canada acted with very poor judgment in urging that it should be done; because, after all, the Channel islands and Somaliland have been ceded, and now all the bases from Newfoundland, the key to the St. Lawrence, right down to the gulf of Mexico have been handed over under a ninety-nine year lease—practically a freehold—in exchange for fifty obsolete ships and some munitions up to now paid for on the cash-and-carry plan.

This particular policy will in the end drive Britain out of the western hemisphere in a hundred years, and I am opposed to it as a policy of handing over to the United States parts of our empire to pay for tools. It is not in the interests of the people either of Canada or of the empire at large, and I submit that it has come about as the result of our having separate embassies, and of scrapping the finest army, navy and air force the world ever had, to please the pacifists.

With regard to Rhodes scholars, I have nothing to say against them. In fact, I know most of those from the Canadian universities and I am sure they are good men. But Cecil Rhodes did not intend that the principles which some of them advocate should ever be applied to the empire or expect to see the day when such a separatist drift would start. In my opinion, some politicians sent by us as ambassadors have caused harm in connection with these foreign legations of ours. They do not understand anything about diplomacy and have had no training. A good diplomat never makes speeches but works hard. He sticks to his work like the great men I have named.

Good diplomats are not written up by the press as the politicians were at Washington. Such men as Salisbury, Palmerston, Lansdowne and Sir Edward Grey were ambassadors for the whole empire, making friends for the British people throughout the world, with the result that when the last war came we had four or five allies, now against us.

I have been opposed to the whole principle on which this vote is founded. I have seen the result of this policy, and all that I have said on this subject since I entered this house has been vindicated. In the days of the Roman empire, the Emperor Caligula appointed his horse as a diplomat and ambassador. I suggest that we do not train in Canada diplomats fit to go and take over such work. We have seen the result in Japan. Britain has been driven out of that country after she has spent large sums of money there. We have seen the result in Russia. They never moved a finger to help Czechoslovakia. When Germany started to march, Russia always stood still and urged the rest of the world to fight Germany. We see the result of this separatism, dividing Britain's representation all over the world.

The vote at present under discussion is a very large one, and I have opposed it. We have a legation at Washington; we have also a great many commercial and trade agents in the cities of the United States. There is a great deal of duplication in this dual representation abroad. Our embassies were washed out and had to leave France, Belgium, Holland and many other places. We have started with respresentatives in three more countries of the British commonwealth: Australia, New Zealand and south Africa, and dear knows where it is going to end; all to show that Canada is a nation.

When the war broke out, we had no army, no navy and no air force; just as in the war of 1812 we were in complete dependence on the mother country for all the freedom and civilization that we enjoy to-day. But for the British fleet and air force, since this war started, the whole American Atlantic seaboard would be blackened out. We have been slow to give any praise to the people of the mother country for what they have done for us. I have great admiration and respect for the great President of the United States and for that country, but instead of depending on them and our legation there we had better take notice of the handwriting on the wall and depend on ourselves the way Britain does, because up to the present hour there is no one to fight the enemy but her. Up to this hour she has paid on a cash-and-carry basis for all the munitions she has received. What is the necessity for Canada having this separate representation along the lines indicated? Simply to show that we are a nation. But we know in our hearts that we are not; we are Canadians. All parties in this chamber know that if Hitler came here, we would not have any party; he would treat all parties alike. All the freedom we have we owe to the mother country. The United States also knows in its heart that for two hundred years it was the protection of Britain and its loans from 1840 to 1940 that built up that republic and its great cities.

There are two sides to this question. I have always opposed the principle on which this vote is based; it has never been in the interest of the people of this country; it has led to untold trouble. The League of Nations union is one of the most mischievous organizations we have in the British empire. It represents the line of thought that led to the war. Now we are in the war and the time has come to close our ranks. We are grateful for the help given by the handing over of the fifty destroyers, although some were old and obsolete and some have to go back for repairs. It was, however, a very kind gesture, and the people of this country expressed their gratitude for that help. But the help is really very little, and it has been paid for. While help is now coming to a greater extent, it is hoped it will not be too late.

Why do the government not instruct our minister to Washington to take up this question of America's help to Canada in munitions and tools? If Canada is going to spend all this money on the Atlantic and the Pacific and across Alberta to protect the shores of the United States why should not the United States come across and pay Canada for some of this war work? As I said last Thursday, as I read the lease-lend bill in the congress reports, it applies to Canada and other dominions, and I read the opinion of the attorney general of the United States that we could get this help. It applies to any of the dominions that are fighting for democracy. Under that bill I believe that if application were made, Canada could get a great deal of help in connection with the joint defence scheme, and on our efforts to protect our neutrality. A joint defence board has been appointed and one representative of the External Affairs department is there; I object to the United States part of the board getting all the details of Canada's defences and what we propose to do, tabling the correspondence and plans in the United States senate before this high court of parliament knows a word about it.

If Britain and the dominions stand together, we shall win this war. From 1923 to 1937 under the premiership of MacDonald, Baldwin and the rest, led by the pacifists, the army and the navy were largely scrapped, capital ships were reduced from seventy-five to fifty, the definition of a capital ship changed. They would not build destroyers, and the vote for the army, the navy and the air force was reduced in one year by £5,000,000. We shared the responsibility for that. By this famous statute of Westminster, this empire-wrecking statute, Canada is supposed to look after all her coast-line outside the three-mile limit, and these are some of the causes that led to this war. If we extend this separatist embassy principle, it is going to destroy the whole British empire. New Zealand and Australia have exempted themselves from some of the main clauses of the statute of Westminster and are closer to the mother country.

We see what this statute has done in the case of the south of Ireland. We see how Britain gave up her bases there, and what difficulty and destruction it has caused, what loss of British ships and British seamen and Canadian seamen. They abolished the Neutrality Act, abolished the office of lord lieutenant, abolished appeals to the privy council, removed the king's head from the stamps and coins and set themselves up as a republic. That is a sample in one dominion of the results of this policy of separatism and drift from the empire.

I have great respect for the Prime Minister; he is working hard; he has given a great deal of thought to these problems and deserves great credit for the work he has done. But this policy of drift from the empire has been very fateful to the empire because unconsciously it led Hitler to believe that the dominions would not support Britain. The Prime Minister was over to see him one day and had a talk with him, and very kindly gave us a full account of his visit. I was glad to see him go over there, I do not know Hitler myself; I have never had the pleasure of his acquaintance. I did meet Von Ribbentrop when he was a social lion here and appeared at all social and sporting functions in Canada. He took away with him some good tips about this country.

A good many hon. members have been to Geneva; the former representative of Grey-Bruce in this house proposed that I should be sent to the league, but fortunately I was not sent and would not go if I were. The hon. member for Selkirk had a little trip there; I was pleased to see him go. But that cry "The league, the league and nothing but the league", and collective security, are responsible for the present troubles of this world, and threaten in this war the destruction not only of Britain but of religion and civilization, because Britain is fighting for her very existence. Last year we depended on France; now we depend on the United States; but in fact our fate is dependent on the battle of London, on Britain and on ourselves. If we stand together and depend on ourselves we shall win the war.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I notice the item in connection with the legation in Paris has been reduced from $75,000 to $12,000. How many are still attached to the staff of the former legation in Paris?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister, Colonel Vanier, is not at the present time serving the legation; he has taken on other duties at the request of the government in respect of the permanent joint defence board. Mr. Dupuy, who was next in rank, is chargé d'affaires of the French legation. His headquarters are in London at the present time, but he is serving also as chargé d'affaires of the legations to Holland and Belgium. He has associated with him a stenographer and a messenger. That is the extent of the legation staff at the present time.

My hon. friend will notice that the government asks for the appropriation in a lump sum. This is to make it possible to transfer members of the diplomatic service from one post to another, as occasion may arise. We are following the practice of the United Kingdom in that regard. I doubt if any year could have illustrated better the desirability of that form of appropriating money for the diplomatic service than the year which has just passed. I say that because we have had to move men rather rapidly from one part of the world to another.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Force majeure.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Because of circumstances beyond our control. At the present time the other French legation is down to a minimum.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Could the Prime Minister give the committee any information respecting the number of Canadians in France at the time of the occupation? How many Canadians are still in German-occupied France?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That information was given us last night.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the hon. member will look at my statement in committee last night, he will find all the information I am able to give under that head.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to ask some questions respecting our representation at Dublin. I have a special interest in our high commissioner there. He is a friend of many years' standing, and a jovial Irishman. I have, however, often wondered just where his qualifications to become a diplomatic representative at Dublin arose, and why there was any necessity for a representative at that point. Then, what were the qualifications of the former hon. member for Bow River to become secretary of that legation? Why was he appointed to that post? What is the cost of the Irish legation, and what is it doing? So far as I know, there has been no publicity respecting any of their activities, and I should like to know if at this time when, as the Prime Minister knows, there are grave misgivings respecting the attitude of the government of southern Ireland in connection with the war, they are a useful function of this government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: One of the reasons why Canada has appointed a high commissioner to the Irish Free State is that the Irish Free State has appointed a high commissioner to Canada. At the time of the appointment by the Irish Free State hope was expressed that Canada might reciprocate. We have felt it wise policy to have representatives in all the other dominions. I believe my hon. friend will agree that, apart from all else, it would have been somewhat invidious if in our representation within the commonwealth, we had left out any one of the dominions.

The reasons, however, for appointing the high commissioner to the Irish Free State were the same as those which prompted us to appoint high commissioners to other parts of the commonwealth, namely, to have some one at the capital of each who would be in touch with members of the government and who would be in a position to bring to the government's attention matters of Canadian concern, and to inform the government in Canada of matters of interest occurring in the country to which the high commissioner may have been sent, also to look after the interests of Canada and Canadians generally.

May I make one or two observations respecting the services rendered by the high commissioner, Mr. Hall Kelly, and the secretary of the legation, Mr. Garland. While publicity has not been given to reports received by our government, the information we have received from that source has been of value. Through the reports we have received from our high commissioner and his secretary we have been in a position to assess the situation in Ireland itself in a manner we would not have found possible had we not had the inside information given us.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the Prime Minister be good enough to tell us the terms of the assessment? I should like to know what Ireland is doing, and how it affects us in the war effort.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend would hardly expect me to discuss the domestic affairs of any other part of the empire. In fact he himself has indicated there are internal difficulties in Ireland with which the government of Ireland itself has to contend. We should not be helping the situation there were we, in this parliament, to begin to discuss the affairs of Ireland. That is only a general statement. It is, I believe, applicable to the affairs of any country.

Then, as regards the secretary of the legation, may I say that as hon. members well know, Mr. Garland had exceptional parliamentary experience. Those who sat in the house with him must have realized that he was one of the ablest of the members in the house of that day. The government has endeavoured to show its breadth of view in not restricting its appointments to members of one party, or of carrying on public affairs in a party spirit—a procedure of which we are sometimes accused.

Mr. Garland was not a supporter of the government; he was an opponent of the administration.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would not say that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, yes, he was.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would not say that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And a very formidable one.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A source of timely help in trouble.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As I recall, he was the one member of his party whom we on this side of the house considered most effective in debate.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He was a good debater; I admit that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sure the committee generally agrees that in the appointment of Mr. Garland as secretary an excellent choice to that office was made.

A few minutes ago the leader of the opposition heard one of his supporters from Toronto describe the qualifications a successful ambassador should have—the type of men who existed in the days of Palmerston and Canning. Among the other qualifications mentioned was that of being able to make friends. The leader of the opposition has just said that Mr. John Hall Kelly possesses that qualification in fine measure.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A very jovial man.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no doubt Mr. Kelly's genial personality has enabled him to get information which could not have been obtained by anyone less genial and less genuinely Irish in some of his characteristics.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It becomes almost a truism to say that we are going to face difficult days. Speaking in the house only a short time ago, the Prime Minister himself said that experts were agreed that not only was there a possibility of an attempted invasion of Great Britain, but that synchronized with it there was the probability of attacks on Gibraltar and Singapore. No one knows just to what extent the area of the war may spread. Thoughtful people in Canada of necessity must be somewhat concerned, if the war stretches over a large enough area, as to whether or not parts of Canada may be exposed, not so much to the danger of invasion but to the danger of attack by occasional raiders of different sorts.

In view of what I have said, I should like to ask the Prime Minister two questions, knowing that the answers can be given in only a limited way. I should like to know, first, whether the plans for the proposed Alaskan highway have been completed, whether any work has been commenced, and, if so, on what financial basis between Canada and the United States it is being carried out. When will the work be completed?

My second question has reference to the plans formulated by the joint defence board. Again we cannot expect the Prime Minister to make any statement as to where there may be defence projects. I do say, however, that the House of Commons has a right to know that certain plans are being proceeded with. The joint defence board travelled across the country, midst the fanfare of trumpets, and I believe the people would be reassured if they knew the plans were being carried into operation. If they are, we should know something of what the financial arrangements are as between Canada and the United States, whether work has been started or will be commenced in the near future, and approximately what it will cost the Canadian people and the people of the United States of America. Those are two matters in connection with which the Prime Minister might make a statement. I realize that he must use discretion in giving out information, but he should be able to tell us enough to assure this committee and the country that adequate steps are being taken to arrange for mutual assistance on the part of Canada and the United States in the event of certain contingencies arising in the near future.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not know whether my hon. friend was in the house last evening, but at that time I was asked a similar question and sought to reply. My statement will appear on Hansard of yesterday. I referred to the work of the permanent joint defence board and also to the government's attitude toward disclosing plans which have been recommended by that board. I did not refer specifically to air bases on the route to Alaska, but I might say to my hon. friend that the government is proceeding with the work of establishing bases in accordance with the recommendation of the joint board.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I was referring to the Alaska highway rather than to air bases.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps I could give what information I have. Pursuant to recommendations of the permanent joint defence board, the Canadian government have arranged to provide suitable landing fields complete with lighting, radio facilities, meteorological equipment and housing for personnel at Grande Prairie, Fort St. John, Fort Nelson, Watson Lake, White Horse, Prince George and Smithers. These fields will provide all the necessary ground facilities for planes travelling from the United States or Canada to Alaska. They will be valuable for commerce as well as for defence purposes.

I have given that statement because it has some bearing on the other matter. The joint board did take into consideration defence problems on the Pacific coast as well as on the Atlantic, and these bases are being established in accordance with the recommendation of the board. The board made no recommendation with respect to the Alaska highway. I believe my hon. friend knows that this matter has been referred to commissions which are inquiring into the matter at the present time.

Both the Canadian government and the United States appointed commissions to examine into this question of the proposed Alaskan highway, and an interim report was made in April, 1940. Since that time further reconnaissance surveys have been made covering possible routes in northern British Columbia and the Yukon territory. A meeting of the Canadian commission is to be held within the next few weeks, which will be followed by a joint meeting of the two commissions to consider further the general problem. In the meantime the Canadian government has arrived at no decision as to the advisability or otherwise of constructing the proposed highway.

The other matter raised by my hon. friend had to do with an assurance that definite action was being taken in connection with the recommendations of the permanent joint board. I can give him the most positive assurance on that point. The board has made many recommendations to the government, some of which have been referred to the Department of National Defence, and others to the Department of National Defence for Air and the Department of National Defence for Naval Services. With possibly one exception, and I am not at all sure that that has not been dealt with, all the recommendations, so far as I am able to recall, have been approved by the administration and steps taken to carry them out.

As to financial arrangements between the two countries, that question does not arise because each country makes provision for the work to be done within its own jurisdiction. The work to be done in Canada will be paid for under the War Appropriation Act, and such work as is being done in the United States will be paid for out of appropriations by the government of that country. I do not think I need say much more than that. My hon. friend realizes that I cannot refer to particular projects, but I can say that they are quite extensive.

As an illustration of what is being done, I would refer hon. members to something which evidently has not been noticed by some of their number. At the present time there are United States troops in Newfoundland. They are helping to defend the United States coast if it needs defence, and they are at the very front of our own country. In the event of Newfoundland being invaded, I leave it to the committee to surmise what action they would take. I understood the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) to say that the United States were doing nothing at the present time in connection with this war. I give this as a concrete example of the kind of steps that are being taken in a very practical way by United States soldiers to take their place at one of the bases, which I thought I heard the hon. member for Broadview say should never have been transferred.

Mr. GREEN: When the house met eight days ago, the Prime Minister tabled the report of the special committee on orientals in British Columbia, which report was dated December, 1940. One recommendation by that committee reads as follows:

That, both for purposes of civil security and in order to deprive persons hostile to the Japanese of a constant and effective ground for complaint, there should be a registration of the Japanese population of British Columbia. (Suggestions for the procedure to be adopted are attached as appendix B.)

The method of reregistration set out in the appendix is that in addition to the information contained on the ordinary registration card for Canadian residents, the cards used for this reregistration should have a space for a small photograph of the holder, together with his description and his national status, whether Canadian born, naturalized or Japanese. It suggests also that the reregistration should be in charge of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I should like to know if that recommendation by the committee is being followed by the government and, if so, when the reregistration will be completed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The recommendation has been approved by the government and steps have been taken to proceed with the registration immediately. Preliminary steps have already been taken and I am not sure but that the actual registration has begun. If it has not, it certainly will be within the next day or two.

Mr. GREEN: The reregistration is to be completed as quickly as possible?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. REID: Will this registration include children as well as other members of the family?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am under the impression that children will be included, but at the moment I cannot say positively.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I read what the Prime Minister said last evening with reference to Canadians in German occupied France, but I could not find any reference by the Prime Minister to the conditions that prevail at the points where these Canadians are. I have in my hand a copy of the British Hansard which contains a full statement given by Mr. Eden of the conditions under which the 4,000 British subjects in occupied France are living. It was pointed out that the British government was in touch with the United States Red Cross and the United States embassy in Paris, and apparently they had a good deal of information. Has this government obtained similar information?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the report of Mr. Eden which my hon. friend just read will give him about all the information we have. Canadians are not concentrated in any one place as Canadians, but they are together with other British subjects, and whatever Mr. Eden has said with reference to British subjects in the occupied areas in France will apply equally to Canadians who are there.

Mr. BROOKS: Do I understand the Prime Minister to say that the registration of Japanese will apply only to British Columbia? If so, why should there not be a registration of Japanese all over Canada? Why pick out only one province?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Japanese population in British Columbia, as my hon. friend knows, is quite large in relation to the total population of the province. The Japanese in other provinces in Canada might be looked upon more as individuals. They are pretty generally known wherever they are. I feel that the purpose of the whole inquiry in British Columbia was to meet a British Columbia problem rather than one that was of equal concern to other provinces.

Mr. GREEN: Is the reregistration to be carried out exactly in the manner recommended by the special committee?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is, as my hon. friend knows, a standing committee which has been appointed to follow up the work of the commission which made the inquiry. The standing committee has made one or two modifications, I am told, of some of the recommendations, and to the extent to which they have made such modifications the original plan would be modified.

Mr. GREEN: May we know what the modifications are?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am informed that one is thumb printing in connection with the registration.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): May I ask the Prime Minister whether in the event of a Canadian trade mission going to South America again it will also visit central America? The reason why I ask the question is this: the highway to Alaska has been mentioned, and central America is building a highway connecting with south America which will link up with the Alaska highway. I know that the people in central America are friendly to Canada. Is the government sending a trade mission to central America?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The original programme was for the trade mission to go to south America only, but I agree with my hon. friend that central America deserves quite as much attention as the countries of south America with respect to matters of trade, and I have no doubt it will be visited by a similar mission at some early date.

Mr. NEILL: To go back to the Japanese for a moment, would the Prime Minister indicate what steps will be taken to ensure that all Japanese will be registered? It is alleged that a considerable number of Japanese are in British Columbia illegally. I think the number alleged is greater than the actual number. Suppose there may be a comparatively small number, say two or three hundred. A previous investigation indicated that there might be only about one hundred Japanese in British Columbia illegally, but very few steps were taken to remedy that situation. There is now to be another registration, and there will undoubtedly be a number of Japanese who have reason to fear that investigation. Is there any way by which it will be known that every Japanese will be registered? The obvious thing for those Japanese to do who are illegally in the country would be to abstain from registering. What steps will be taken in that regard?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Every Japanese will have to have a registration card to identify him. I doubt very much if any Japanese would be able to continue in any kind of work in British Columbia without having a registration card on his person. Without it he would get into difficulties in short order. The Japanese population in the province would be pretty generally known to the authorities there.

I think I ought also to say this. As my hon. friend knows, there are many of the Japanese nationals who feel very keenly about not being regarded in the same light as other nationals, and they are only too anxious themselves to lend assistance to the federal government in seeing that all Japanese are registered in order to protect their position in the community. They are rendering valuable assistance to the government at the present time in this work.

Mr. NEILL: I can understand that those Japanese who are legally in the country, and they are a large number, will surely make it their business to register, but I cannot conceive that they will go out of their way to give information against those Japanese who have illegally entered the country, because whatever may be the opinion of the Prime Minister or of the government here, we in British Columbia are firmly convinced that "once a Jap always a Jap." The words "being naturalized" are just like a snowflake on a river. It is a mere gesture on the part of the Japanese to secure some privilege such as a fishing licence or something of that kind. The Prime Minister says that they are pretty generally known to the authorities. That might be true where there are twelve

Japs, let us say, in a village, but it would not be true of a larger place, nearly all Japanese.

The Prime Minister also says that if they were not able to produce a registration card they would not be able to continue in business. In the last war, white men and all others had to be registered, and to make sure all were registered you had to produce your registration card when you bought a railway ticket and other things of that kind. Nothing of that sort so far as I have heard has been recommended in the report of the committee. Those who can qualify will get their registration card, which they will be proud to show as evidence of their all-rightness, but those who are illegally in the country will not go near the place to be registered. Why should they? If, subsequently, they want to purchase a railway ticket or something of that kind and cannot get one without producing a registration card, they will borrow one from a friend. That is a common trick.

There was a regulation made that any Japanese who had served in the great war and could produce his military discharge could get a fishing licence without being subjected to the quota restriction which applied to the ordinary Japanese. What did they do? Every Japanese with a military discharge goes fishing. He does not really. He may be running a cigar store, but he will farm out his fishing licence to another Japanese, who produces the borrowed discharge. They are all alike; you cannot tell one from the other. So it was the practice to peddle out his licence. Every Japanese with a military discharge obtained a fishing licence for some other Japanese. Occasionally they are detected. If it is obvious that they have obtained the licence illegally, it is taken away from them. But that peddling goes on all the time.

I had not intended to bring this subject up at all for various reasons connected with diplomacy and because of the statement which the Prime Minister made earlier in the session, that anyone who made any suggestions dealing with the subject of Japanese in British Columbia was more or less disloyal or at any rate would be regarded as doing it solely for political effect—a thing which some of us in British Columbia do not appreciate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wish my hon. friend would quote any statement I made to that effect. He surely has misunderstood the statement I made if he interpreted it as meaning that any member of parliament could not say what he pleased without being regarded as disloyal. I have made no statement of the kind.

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. NEILL: I was not prepared to speak on this subject to-night, and I rose only because the subject came up. The Prime Minister's statement will be found in Hansard No. 3, I think, reporting the proceedings on the third day of this session, which began on the 7th of November. The Prime Minister most distinctly stated that he would regard it as highly undesirable if any members made any remarks to excite in any way displeasure with the Japanese. He said he wanted the house to understand it was not just a casual or careless remark which some man might make, because that was not so harmful, as the rest of us knew that such statements were born only of a desire for political effect—it was that remark which I did not like—but that when it went to Japan it was represented as a statement, not of some careless, reckless, unworthy-of-confidence man here, but as the decided opinion of the Canadian parliament; and that was what he did not like.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that that is quite different from saying that any hon. member was disloyal. I made no reflection on the loyalty of anyone.

Mr. NEILL: Neither did I.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say further that I believe events which have occurred since I made the statement I did in this chamber show how wise was the statement to which my hon. friend alluded. He knows, as every hon. member knows, the critical nature of the situation which exists to-day between the British commonwealth of nations and Japan. I am sure that any word of counsel which I venture to express in the interest of the empire as a whole is quite different from an endeavour to restrict any hon. member from making statements which in his judgment are in the public interest.

Mr. NEILL: I am quite willing to leave it until I look up Hansard to see exactly what was said, but naturally, being more directly interested than the Prime Minister, I have an exact recollection of it. I was wrong, however, in saying that it was suggested I was disloyal. What was indicated was that the statement was highly undesirable because it gave the wrong impression; that we here understood it was merely the claptrap, for political purposes, of an individual, whereas in Japan it gave a different impression.

There is one other thing—I would not ask, it is useless; but I would protest. We are dealing with the composition of a committee of four, one of whom is known to be so violently pro-Japanese that it is a matter almost of common scandal in British Columbia. I notice that two people wrote to the newspaper asking how it was that we in British Columbia allowed a man who expressed openly the views that this man does, who is so particularly one-sided, to be employed in one of our public institutions. His remarks and his attitude at all times are so absolutely pro-Japanese that I suggest it was as unwise, undesirable and unfair to put him on a committee which would deal with anything of this kind as, to be quite frank, it would be to put on that committee one who holds such strong views on the other side as I do. I did not seek that position, nor was I put on the committee; but it seems to me that to give twenty-five per cent of the representation to one so entirely biased that his attitude has become almost a scandal, was a most unfortunate proceeding.

With regard to the Prime Minister's remark as to what has occurred since the views which were expressed in the early part of the session, I cannot recall anything which happened since then which would lead me to change my opinion. I have seen things happen. I have seen the opening of the Burma road, which certainly was not a friendly action towards Japan; yet I have not noticed any particular reaction on that account against the interests of the empire on the part of Japan. We have seen the United States take a drastic stand in a certain matter, but it also has not met with any undesirable repercussions; in fact, it seems to have had a good effect in the east, because it showed that the white man was going to be on the job.

Mr. ROWE: And what happened in the British house to-day.

Mr. NEILL: We see the same thing going on in Great Britain. Britain's action in opening the Burma road is about as good an illustration as one can have on that point. I am firmly of opinion—it is only my poor opinion, but it is founded on long experience—that, in the words of Kipling:

> You cannot breed a white man in a brown or yellow hide.

And you cannot let the brown man boss you. The white man must be dominant; his word should go. If you adopt an attitude of complaisance or anything which is suggestive of subservience to the brown man, he thinks you are afraid of him. The countries of the world have not been won for the white race by adopting an attitude like that. I still think that we should have taken a firm hand with the Japanese and all the native races, and, as a consequence, they respect you.

Mr. MacINNIS: I rise for two purposes. First, I would not like the committee to suppose that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is expressing the attitude of the whole of British Columbia in connection with the matter under discussion. Second, I want to say that I listened to the statement referred to which was made by the Prime Minister earlier in the session, and it is not often I have heard him say anything which has pleased me so much.

In my opinion, the attitude which a few—a very few—people in British Columbia have adopted towards orientals is a disgrace to Canada. I have said that this attitude is that of only a very few; maybe I am wrong, but if many hold it, I have not met them.

About two years ago the city of Vancouver, because of the same kind of agitation, which has been going on for quite a number of years, and particularly since the war with China began, asked the provincial legislature for amendments to the city's charter to allow the city to discriminate against orientals in the matter of trade licences. When these proposals came before the municipal committee, Mr. Perry, the provincial member for Prince George, told the Vancouver city delegation that if they would substitute "Jew" for "Japanese" or "oriental", there would be no difference between what they were asking for and what the nazis had already done in Germany and were doing in the various countries over which she had got control.

There is one thing of which we lose sight. The Japanese and the other orientals are here. They are in British Columbia, and it is impossible to deport them. They are no longer Japanese or foreigners; they are Canadians, and we cannot ship them off somewhere else; whether we like it or not, they are here. The obvious thing to do, in my opinion, is to seek ways to make loyal Canadians out of them. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni says "Once a Japanese always a Japanese". My friend and I are of Scottish descent, and I may say with equal truth, "Once a Scotsman always a Scotsman". The Japanese are no different from ourselves in their reaction to life and to the things around them.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): The hon. member is an optimist.

Mr. MacINNIS: If we are to have harmonious and friendly relations between the oriental population and the rest of our British Columbia citizens, we must stop discriminating against and abusing the orientals. We must find some common ground on which we can work, and I think it can be found. Is there any reason, if we should get into difficulties with Japan on the Pacific coast, why the Japanese in British Columbia should be interested in helping Canada, after the way in which we are treating them? I am satisfied that if we treat the Japanese and our other oriental citizens aright, we shall get their loyalty, because they are no longer orientals in the accepted sense of that term. They would feel as much out of place in Japan as we would. I know them, speak to them; I visit them and have them in my home, and I have not the slightest doubt that what I say is correct. If we are to avoid the troubles that other countries have had with racial minorities, then we must take a realistic view of the situation in British Columbia and attempt to make these people feel at home among us. We will secure their loyalty by fairness and kindness and by the practice of those other attributes which we exercise in our relations with other people. Otherwise we shall have trouble. I appreciate most sincerely what the Prime Minister said on the occasion to which reference was made.

Mr. REID: In view of the turn the discussion has taken, I think I should express my views on the question, because it agitates the minds of the people of British Columbia. I do not altogether agree with the last speaker when he places those of Japanese origin in the same category as other nationals who have come to Canada or whose children were born here. I differ from the Japanese in that my first allegiance is to Canada. Therein lies the crux of the entire question, because no person can owe allegiance to two countries at the same time. I warned the house of this, before the committee that sat here dealing with the Japanese vote. In answer to a question of mine it was admitted by Japanese that they owed allegiance first to Japan, and so long as every Japanese born here is registered in Japan and is looked upon as a Japanese national he cannot be truly a Canadian. Hence my objection to them as a class. They are not an assimilable race and are different in their outlook from any other nationals in Canada.

Mr. GREEN: I do not wish to take up the time of the committee discussing this question, but I would point out to the Prime Minister in all seriousness that the quickest and the only way in which he will ever get the Japanese problem in British Columbia started on its way to a solution will be to prevent further immigration. I hear the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) say "Hear, hear". He agrees with me, and every member from British Columbia knows that the moment further immigration is stopped we can begin to solve the question. Not only would that benefit the white people in British Columbia but it would also be to the advantage of the Japanese who are living there. I suggest to the Prime Minister that under war conditions such as we have at the present time no nation could object to an order in council being put through under the Immigration Act to stop further immigration. Immigration is not extensive at the moment anyway. I make that suggestion as the quickest way to get this problem started on the way to a solution. Furthermore, the present is the time to do it. If the Prime Minister will take that step, I think he will find there will be a rapid abatement of the ill feeling between the white population and the Japanese in British Columbia.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What my hon. friend proposes is an exclusion act.

Mr. GREEN: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is what it is. My hon. friend knows that there is possibly nothing in this world that the Japanese as a nation would resent more strongly than that. If he wanted to precipitate serious difficulty with Japan, the thing to do would be to introduce an exclusion act and try to have it passed. I agree about limiting the numbers, and the fact is that they have been limited to something under one hundred a year.

Mr. GREEN: One hundred and fifty.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The specified possible total may be one hundred and fifty, but the actual numbers that have been coming in have been under one hundred. The number has been down to something like sixty. It is due to the Japanese to say frankly that they have lived up to the undertaking which they gave with respect to limiting the number. It will be said, "How do we know that some men have not got in surreptitiously?" No one can say definitely that some people have not come in surreptitiously, but the purpose of the registration is to discover persons of that kind.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) asks how we can make perfectly sure that we have discovered every man. It seems to me, really without giving substantial reasons for the statement, it is like chasing one's self round a tree to look for some means of creating the impression that there are many Japanese in the country whom no one can discover. I may be wrong, but I cannot see how the standing committee supplementing the work of the commission who have already inquired into the matter, and who are free to make any suggestions they like, should not be able to follow up effectively the purpose for which the commission was created. My hon. friend made one practical suggestion, namely, that when a man goes to buy a ticket he should be asked to show his registration card. I will pass that on to the committee and they can consider the suggestion that every Japanese who goes to buy a ticket shall be asked to show his card. That can be done, if necessary. There are many ways in which registration can be established.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I do not want the committee to labour under the impression that the hon. member for Vancouver East represents in any respect the views of the people of British Columbia so far as the Japanese situation is concerned.

Mr. MacINNIS: So much the worse for them.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: He voted to give them the franchise, putting them on an equality with any white man. No one in my riding is in favour of that. I am as friendly to them as he is, and I may say as a matter of fact that when I came to this house the first time the Japanese gave me a wedding present. But no man can rise in his place here and say that he represents the opinion of British Columbia on the Japanese situation when he is in favour of giving them the vote even though it be used against Canada's participation in the war. That is nonsense. This problem can be solved. I am not worried about the exclusion of the Japanese or anyone else, but we can solve the problem in a very simple manner so far as British Columbia is concerned: Ship them all to Toronto.

Mr. NEILL: The Prime Minister was quite right when he said that he had been instrumental in cutting down immigration to 150 including men, women and children in any one year, and I give him credit for that. I know the number was reduced from something as high as 1,700. There was a thing called a gentleman's agreement that stank to high heaven, which was in force previously, and the Prime Minister was the means of reducing it to sensible and interpretable proportions. Before that, a Jap would come along and tell the agent that he was under the gentleman's agreement and the immigration man would say, "Go on." When I asked why no check had been made the answer I got was, "I never saw the gentleman's agreement."

The Prime Minister reduced the whole thing to terms of law, written agreement, which was put under the Immigration Act. I know that the number is much below 150 owing to conditions in Japan, and I believe that since the question has been made the subject of law, in that act, immigration is less than what it used to be. It used to be an open door and I admit that there are not very many coming in now. But as one member from Vancouver said, if we had stopped them from coming in at all, it would have done a great deal to soothe the popular ill feeling against them. We have enough to contend against now in their birth rate, which is thirty-eight per thousand as against eighteen or nineteen per thousand in the white races.

As the hon. member for Vancouver East says, all they want is to be left alone and they will take care of themselves. Yes, they will, as they did in Hawaii where they dominate the legislature, because there they have votes. The principles which the hon. member for Vancouver East entertains, and those of the party to which he belongs, are the very reason why there is only one representative of that party in this house to-day from British Columbia. It is simply because they let it be known that they were in favour of giving votes to the orientals, and they would vote to let more Japs in and take the quota off fishing, et cetera.

I think the hon. member for New Westminster mentioned that there was a committee of this house, called the industrial and foreign relations committee, that met here some years ago, and we received a delegation from the Japanese in British Columbia. It consisted of one lady and three men, highly educated college people, far better educated than I am or ever can possibly be, and they made a very fine impression. They were picked of course. They explained how terribly they felt; they said their heart felt bad, and they put their hand on their belly, they said it grieved them so much to feel that they could not vote. At that very time we were contemplating passing a law to compel the white people to vote because they were not voting in sufficient numbers. These Japanese talked along those lines and made a good showing. They had it all prepared of course; the brief was prepared by a clever white lawyer in Vancouver—more shame to him—and it was full of holes. But they went over big.

Then we had the privilege of asking them some questions. There is a peculiarity about a Jap when he is pulling off a gag like that; while he sticks to his text and what he is coached to say, he gets along fine, but there is a sort of innate naiveté about them, and when you ask a Jap a straight question, he is very likely to tell the truth. One man was a college professor from some place in the United States, and we asked him about a question which is known to everyone in British Columbia, the system of having two schools. They come out of our white schools at about three o'clock and cross the road to a Japanese school where they learn the language, and the culture they call it, but they mean loyalty to the Japanese emperor whom, as you know, they worship as their god. We asked this man about this thing. Some of the younger Japanese there had rather soft pedalled on it, said there was not much of that schooling going on now, and I asked this older man, who had been out of the country for some time, what he thought about it. He said there had been a suggestion made among some of the older men to do away with this dual school business because they felt that it excited indignation among the whites, and he said—it is on record—that "we the older ones thought of doing away with it, but the younger ones, the second generation, were against it; they wanted to keep on their association with the old country."

Then I asked him about this system of two nationalities at once. They can get naturalized here, and at that time, some years ago, they still remained Japanese. Those who were born here in Canada had to register with the Japanese consul and they could go back to Japan and still be Japanese. We made so much talk about it that they introduced a rule that under certain conditions and by getting the consent of the Japanese government a Jap could actually get naturalized here and really alienate himself from Japan, but it was on one or two conditions. One was that he had done his military service—and when they have done that they have pretty well got him. Also, if he went back to Japan for a certain period, it may have been three months—no, it was less than that—if he stayed there for that period he actually became a Jap again. I said, "This is kind of convenient, isn't it, having two nationalities?" He said, "Yes, it is quite handy."

I have here an extract from the House of Commons debates in the old country. It is always held up to us that we must not take any definite stand against the Japanese for fear they might not like it and it might cause embarrassment to the old country. But this is what took place in the British house on October 10, 1940. A man named Mander asked the under-secretary of state for foreign affairs—

> —whether, in view of the approval recently given by the United States government for the export of cargoes up to one million barrels of oil to Japan he will consider the advisability of making representations to the American government for concurrent action between the British and American governments to prevent the further supply of oil to Japan.

The under-secretary of state for foreign affairs, Mr. Butler, said:

> His majesty's government understand that the prohibition placed by the United States government on the export of oil relates only to certain grades. They are and have been in touch with the United States government on this matter.

Mr. Mander: May I take it that both governments are determined to refrain from supplying to Japan everything that they possibly can which is of a warlike nature?

And someone else said:

> Can my right hon. friend assure us that the same sentimental policy which was adopted towards Italy will not be repeated in the case of Japan?

And Mr. Butler replied:

> His majesty's government can be relied upon to adopt the best policy as each circumstance arises.

There was more of the same thing. But they have no hesitation in speaking quite frankly in the British house regarding the Japanese situation, and I do not think we should be so afraid of doing it here. It is generally found, when we have spoken up, so to speak, that it has had a favourable repercussion.

I must join with the other members from British Columbia, with the single exception of the hon. member for Vancouver East, and say that I am absolutely convinced that those hon. members have voiced the sentiments of the great bulk of the people of British Columbia. That is what we are here for. They talk about its being a political question; the Japs have no votes, but the white people are absolutely opposed to giving further concessions. We are all pledged to that. Take a bold stand and it will stand us in good stead not only with the Japanese but with every native race in the world.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not wish to prolong this discussion. The last part of it is a sad commentary on itself. I am wondering what we are fighting for in Europe to-day. The hon. member for Fraser valley and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni stated that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation lost votes in British Columbia because of the position we took with regard to orientals. I never asked anyone to vote for me because of my racial prejudices. I would not appeal to anyone for his franchise on his racial prejudices. I have not the least doubt that before Hitler got his people into the reichstag, many of them got there by demonstrating their hatred of the Jews on the public platform. Our friends from British Columbia are doing that to-day. They say that we are losing and have lost ground. As a matter of fact, at the last federal elections in British Columbia we polled more votes than ever we did before. Let me tell my hon. friends this, that after I brought the oriental situation before this house in the session of 1936 there was not much said about the oriental question in the last election, and there will not be in the future. This is not a political issue at the present time. It is first of all a question of social justice, and in the second place a question of dealing in a statesmanlike way with a problem which we cannot shift from ourselves to somebody else.

Let me repeat we are not going to solve the problem by discriminating against the Japanese. It has been proved time and again that the more you discriminate against a race, the more that race multiplies.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is a well known fact that people with a low standard of living increase much faster than people with a good standard of living. That is definitely the case. Every discrimination practised against the orientals among us will in turn reflect itself in a harder struggle to exist among the lower-paid white workers in our society. That is the situation with which we are confronted. Do not let us think we are going to get away from it by making fun of it. I say again that this discussion, conducted in so light a manner at this time, is a reflection on this chamber.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like to make a correction, because neither the hon. member for Fraser Valley, nor any other member from British Columbia, said he hated the Japanese. The hon. member for Fraser Valley did not say that the hon. member for Vancouver East lost votes because of his stand. I frankly admit that when the hon. member for Vancouver East is elected, it is a reflection on us, because we have lost the votes.

I have often heard that the rich get richer and the poor get poorer, but I have never heard that making a political speech in any way increased the birthrate.

Item agreed to.

42. A compromise payment in discharge of claim submitted by the government of the United States of America on behalf of the late Robert Fulton Cutting, executor of the estate of McEvers Bayard Brown, $3,836.68.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Will the Prime Minister explain this item?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. The Cutting case is a claim by the executor of the estate of McEvers Bayard Brown against the province of Quebec. The late Robert Fulton Cutting was executor of the estate. Claim was maintained in the superior court, the court of king's bench and the Supreme Court of Canada, and ultimately carried to the judicial committee of the privy council. It was for the repayment of succession duties illegally exacted by the province of Quebec. The trial court gave judgment for the repayment of the principal sum with interest. This decision was upheld by the court of king's bench and by the Supreme Court of Canada, and the judicial committee refused leave to appeal. The province paid the principal, but has refused to pay the interest. The refusal to pay was originally made by the Taschereau government, and its position has been followed in turn by the Duplessis government and the Godbout government.

The United States government supported this claim and ultimately maintained that there was a proper claim against the Canadian government by reason of denial of justice. Negotiations were under way with a view to the submission of the United States claim to arbitration. By reason of the following facts: (a) That the expenses of arbitration, even if successful, would far exceed the amount involved, (b) that there was not much prospect of success, (c) that, in the event of failure, the expenditure would be much heavier and would establish a dangerous precedent the government agreed to a compromise arrangement.

Under the compromise, it was understood that payment by the Canadian government would not be construed as a concession that the circumstances were of such a nature as to create an international obligation. The government undertook to include in the estimates an item of $3,836.68.

This item should have been included in the estimates for the last session of parliament, but action was deferred by reason of negotiations with Quebec, in which it was thought that there might be some prospect of this claim being dealt with.

I am sure my hon. friend will forgive my reading the particulars I have given. I did not have them all in mind.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Where is the international obligation? Certainly the Prime Minister has not shown any international obligation. If anything was proved, it was proved that it is the province of Quebec which ought to be carrying this obligation. There is no basis in the statement made by the Prime Minister for the statement that there is an international obligation. There is, of course, evidence of a compromise and evidence of expediency, but there is no legal justification, on the basis of a legal obligation, in the statement the Prime Minister has made. It is a compromise as to the amount, and the Prime Minister has stated quite clearly that it is being paid in the first instance as a matter of expediency. He has indicated that it would be cheaper to pay than to fight.

I have often met clients like that. I have never encouraged them, but I have had to give them the option. That is not a good basis upon which to make a payment. If there is a bona fide legal obligation, then let us by all means pay it. If there is no legal obligation, then let that obligation rest where it belongs. The province of Quebec which received and kept the money, had to return it, under the authority of a judicial decision, and refused to pay the interest. I believe that is the point in the Prime Minister's statement. But to say that the other taxpayers in Canada must repay the obligation of one of the provinces is too thick altogether, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend knows that the United States cannot look to the province of Quebec.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I quite agree.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It has to look to the dominion. This is an obligation the dominion did not wish to have hanging over its head in its relations with the United States.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is expediency, too.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. The decision has been reached as a result of very careful examination by the legal authorities.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the Prime Minister give me an opinion from the Department of Justice stating that there is a legal obligation on the Dominion of Canada to pay this sum of money? If he will do so, and if it is based on any decent principle at all, then I will certainly withdraw any opposition I may have. But until he does that, as a matter of principle I do not see how we can agree to the payment of this sum.

Certainly, if the statement by the Prime Minister as to the facts is correct—and I assume it is absolutely correct—then the obligation is that of the province of Quebec, and that province should be made to pay it. If we pay it, it should be with the understanding that we have the right of redress against the province. We should take an assignment of the claim. I suggest to the Prime Minister that if the government pays this sum, it has a chose in action against the province of Quebec. It should take an assignment of the claim and test out in the courts to ascertain whether or not the province should pay us. The government has the right of redress, and can withhold the money from the province of Quebec out of the grants made by the dominion to that province.

Do not let anyone say that I make this statement because it applies to the province of Quebec. I would take exactly the same position if it affected any other province, and I believe in taking that position I am on safe ground. I offer this suggestion in good faith, as a way out for the government. Let us take an assignment of this claim from the public executor of the estate, and then let us proceed in the courts of the country to decide whether or not we must pay the amount.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The full amount involved is only $3,836.68.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But I suggest there is a principle involved.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think by the time we proceeded to take action in the courts the expenses would be greater than the amount recovered.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I put it to the Prime Minister: Is there not a principle at stake?

Mr. CHURCH: Notwithstanding the fact that we are spending all this money, the United States are breaking their bargain and we are still in the appeasement market. I hope no more of these items will appear in the estimates.

With the consent of the committee, I should like to revert to item 40 for a moment. With the critical financial situation facing us at the present time, I cannot understand why we should be spending $3,000 for publications of the League of Nations and a grant to the League of Nations Society in Canada. This latter society is patterned upon the League of Nations Union in the old country. It was started in November, 1920, as a non-party organization to make the work of the league known throughout Canada and the empire and to win popular support for the work of the league. But it gradually passed under the control of pacifists, high-brow internationalists, prosperous socialists, cosmopolitans and high-brows, with the result that from 1931 on in England it became increasingly anti-government. It became a great supporter of pacifism and collective security and attempted to convince the people of Britain that they did not need a navy, an army or an air force. I object to our spending all this money upon literature which mostly finds its way to waste-paper baskets. It is an insult to the soldiers who are serving overseas to have an item like this in the estimates. Surely we can have a holiday from league meetings until the war is over.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the Prime Minister give some undertaking in connection with the matter I raised? There is a principle at stake. I did not raise this question just for fun.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I give my hon. friend the undertaking that I shall direct the attention of the Minister of Justice to his remarks and ask the minister to take such action as he thinks is advisable.

Item agreed to.

Canada's contributions to maintenance of external organizations.

43. The expenses of the League of Nations for 1941, including secretariat, international labour organization and permanent court of international justice, $120,330.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I do not understand why we should be expending this amount of money upon the League of Nations. Would the Prime Minister make a statement?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Possibly I can save time by giving my hon. friend at once such particulars as I have about the present situation. This item covers not only the work carried on by the league, but also matters connected with the international labour office and the permanent court of international justice. All of these bodies have suffered a certain amount of restriction in their work. The league itself has fallen on evil-days, but some of its services and other organizations still have their place in the world, and we believe that by making our contribution to its continued existence and the carrying on of that part of its work which is being done on this continent we shall be serving to some extent the purpose for which the league was intended, helping at any rate to keep that agency alive for better days.

The vote provides for Canada's contribution for the league as assessed in the league budget for 1941. This is about 80 per cent of the amount voted in 1940. The total league budget, however, has been reduced to approximately one-half of the budget of 1940 and one-third of that for 1939. This substantial reduction is not proportionately reflected by a reduction in Canada's contribution, but this is explained by the fact that it was not possible to assess any contribution for 1941 from nine member states whose territories have been occupied by Germany or the soviet union since the outbreak of the war. The proportionate contribution assessed against other member states which have suffered greatly by war, including France, China and Finland, have been cut in half for 1941. In addition, three other states, Spain, Hungary and Peru, have given notice of withdrawal from the league, which will take effect this year.

In consequence of this, the total budget of the league organizations have been greatly reduced and a larger proportion of the total has had to be met by Canada. Since conditions prevented a meeting of the league assembly during 1940, the budget for 1941 was prepared by the supervisory commission of the league which met in Portugal last September. This committee was appointed by the assembly to supervise the administration of the league. Special powers were given to the supervisory commission at the last assembly because of the difficulty of holding international meetings in war time.

The vote includes the Canadian contribution to all the international organizations of the league. Nearly one-third of it will go towards the expenses of the international labour office, which at the invitation of the Canadian government has temporarily transferred its operations from Geneva to Montreal. Slightly over one-third will go towards meeting the expenses of the league secretariat. At present a very small staff, under the acting secretary general, Mr. Lester, remains in Geneva. A group of financial and economic experts, under Mr. Loveday, has moved with the approval of the Canadian government from Geneva to Princeton, New Jersey, where they are carrying on their valuable activities at the institute of advanced studies. The total strength of the secretariat in Geneva, Princeton and elsewhere has been reduced to 100 of all ranks in 1941 from 688 in 1939. A small proportion of the Canadian contribution, about one-twentieth, goes to the permanent court of international justice which normally sits at the Hague. The court has not been able, for obvious reasons, to act during the last year, and the sum provided for it in the league budget represents the irreducible minimum to maintain it in existence. Virtually all the remainder of the league budget, nearly one-third of the total, is devoted to the contractual obligations of the league pension fund and to meeting a deficit incurred in 1939.

The number of states listed as members of the League of Nations is 48, of which three will cease to be members during 1941. Several states, however, which are not members of the league are active members of the international labour organization, including the United States, Brazil, Chile and Venezuela.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How many countries are not contributing at the present time which would be contributing under special circumstances?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As stated previously, it was not possible to assess any contribution for 1941 from nine member states whose territories have been occupied by Germany or the soviet union. The proportionate contribution assessed against other member states which have suffered greatly by the war, including France, China and Finland, have been cut in half for 1941. In addition, three other states, Spain, Hungary and Peru, have given notice of withdrawal from the league, which will take effect this year.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What services are now being performed by the permanent court of international justice, and where are its headquarters?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just sufficient to keep the court in existence at the Hague. The members of the court have been scattered, but the physical court is still at the Hague.

Mr. JAQUES: I agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) with regard to the League of Nations. So far as my studies have carried me, it seems to me beyond question that in the past the league has been fundamentally anti-democratic. The league failed because it was a league of governments and therefore a league of central banks. We have heard a great deal about foreign relations; we have heard of the diplomats on the world stage, but we have not heard anything about the forces which control the strings by which these diplomats are made to dance.

It is said that we are fighting for democracy which has been defined as government according to the will of the people. In the last twenty-five years we have had two major wars and twenty years of economic depression, bankruptcy, unemployment and so forth. It is fantastic to believe that those conditions have been according to the will of the people either of this country or of any other. I could fill Hansard with quotations from various authorities to prove what has been behind the power of all governments for the past twenty-five years, but I shall content myself with a few quotations at random. I remember a former deputy governor of the Bank of Canada saying this a few years ago—I forget the year but I put it on Hansard. He said that in some countries the policy of the central bank agrees with that of the government, but no self-respecting central bank would accept from its government a policy with which it did not agree. Is that democracy?

Let me read a statement made by Sir Josiah Stamp. He said:

> Never in the history of the world has so much power been vested in a small body of men as in the federal reserve board (of the United States). These men have the welfare of the world in their hands, and they could upset the rest of us either deliberately or by some unconscious action.

Is that democracy?

Mr. Ludwell Denny, an American banking authority, in his book "America Conquers Britain", published in 1930, says:

> All nations must tremble before our federal reserve board. High money rates in the United States of America early in 1929, for instance, forced an increase in the official bank rates at once in England, ten European countries, in two Latin-American countries, and two in the far east; and in almost every case that action restricted business and brought suffering to millions of foreign workers. That blow hit Britain hardest of all.

Is that democracy?

Speaking in the congress of the United States in 1931, Mr. L. T. McFadden, who at that time had been chairman of the committee on banking and currency of congress for the fourteenth year, said:

> I wish to emphasize the fact that international finance is almost exclusively German. The federal reserve board and the federal reserve banks have pumped so many billions of dollars into Germany that they dare not name the total.

He continues:

> Do you know that Germany has been lending our money to soviet Russia as fast as she could get it out of this country from the federal reserve board banks? Do you know that she is the author of Russia's five year plan, that she has armed and supplied soviet Russia with our money? Do you know that Germany and soviet Russia are one in military and industrial matters?

I mention that because up to the time that Russia more or less joined up with Germany and partitioned Poland, our socialist friends were under the delusion that there was a distinction between Germany and Russia. But, as I said last session, I think it was, the only difference between Germany and Italy and Russia is the difference between three eggs. You may say that Germany is a hard-boiled egg, Italy a scrambled egg, and Russia, if you like, a fried egg. I would add a fourth egg, and that is finance, which is a rotten egg. But they are all eggs and nothing but eggs. You will get nothing but eggs out of any of them. There is no difference between them as history has now proved.

Mr. McFadden, again speaking in congress in 1932, and speaking of his own country—remember, I am quoting a member of the United States congress—said:

> We have in this country (the United States) one of the most corrupt institutions the world has ever known. I refer to the federal reserve board and the federal reserve banks. This evil institution has impoverished and ruined the people of the United States.

Is that democracy?

Again, Arthur Kitson, an English economist, writing in the English National Review in March of 1925, said:

In the November issue of the National Review I outlined the plot conceived by certain German-American Jewish financiers for dominating the world under the currency system known as the "gold standard", which is being carried to a successful issue with the aid of certain of our London bankers at an astonishing rate of speed.

In a footnote to the article Mr. Kitson added:

It is worth noting how unanimous our anglicized German financiers are in desiring the reestablishment of gold in this country.

And he named Sir Felix Schuster, Baron Schroder, Mr. Otto Kahn, Fruhling Goschen, Kleinworth & Co., and so on.

I could continue these quotations from authorities which no one in this chamber can deny, but I think I have given enough. I do not want to take up too much of the time of the committee.

I should like now to quote something as to the causes of the war which hon. members will not get from any publication of the League of Nations. Addressing the Alberta legislature in 1934, Major Douglas said:

Just as I told them in Ottawa in 1923 exactly what was going to happen in 1928, so I tell you now in 1934 that before 1940, if you have not changed the financial system, it will change and probably eliminate you.

And further, in the same address to the legislature, he said this:

There is no doubt whatever that the perfectly easily understood economic urge towards war comes primarily from the working of the financial system at the present time because of this necessity for overseas markets in order to provide purchasing power from these overseas markets. There is practically no room for discussion that the next war will almost inevitably destroy what we know as civilization. And there is very little doubt that the next war is only two or three years ahead unless something is done to prevent it.

The failure of the League of Nations has not been lost sight of by this unseen power which I have briefly quoted. There is a general movement throughout the civilized world towards centralization. We see it in Germany and we see it in the so-called democracies. Everywhere there is an idea of centralization of power, of government, of business. Democracy surely entails decentralization. A democratic government, since it is a government according to the will of the people, must rest on the broadest possible basis, and therefore any movement toward centralization is not democracy, it is making for dictatorship. I believe it is true to-day to say that there are but two political philosophies: democracy, which entails decentralization, and totalitarianism, which means centralization. Totalitarianism includes, of course, all brands of socialism, nazism, communism and fascism; all are of the same breed, and all intend the same thing—the centralization of power away from the control of the people.

As I say, there is a movement everywhere towards centralization. One development of it in Canada and in Great Britain at the present time is what is called federal union or "union now." Under this scheme the democracies, sovereign nations, would surrender their sovereign power over their armed forces, finance, fiscal policy and the judiciary. If that were done, what would be the status of this House of Commons? It would be reduced to less than a parish council.

That this is no pipe dream, or any figment of my imagination, or even anything new since the war, is evident from this quotation from one of the pioneers of the idea of federal union. I refer to Professor Arnold Toynbee, who has been closely identified with the Royal Institute of International Affairs. Speaking at the fourth annual conference of Institutions for the Scientific Study of International Relations, held at Copenhagen in June, 1931, he said:

In plain terms, we have to re-transfer the prestige and the prerogatives of sovereignty from the fifty or sixty fragments of contemporary society to the whole of contemporary society—from the local national states by which sovereignty has been usurped, with disastrous consequences, for half a millennium, to some institution embodying our society as a whole.

In the world as it is to-day, this institution can hardly be a universal church. It is more likely to be something like a league of nations. I will not prophesy. I will merely repeat that we are at present working discreetly but with all our might, to wrest this mysterious political force called sovereignty out of the clutches of the local national states of our world. And all the time we are denying with our lips what we are doing with our hands.

I might add that one of the fundamentals of this idea of "union now" is a world currency based on gold. I will go further and say that that is, if not the whole, certainly the main purpose of this idea of "union now." I would ask, after the very fine words of the Minister of Justice last evening with reference to the people of Great Britain and the sacrifices they are making to preserve their liberties, is the price of their physical liberty to be economic slavery? Because that is what the gold standard means and always has meant.

It is international slavery and nothing else, and I say that is the main purpose of this idea of federal union or "union now."

I can speak for this group and for social crediters all over the world, that we stand absolutely on the sovereignty of the British commonwealth of nations, because we know that the crown is the symbol of individual liberty and justice. Instead of surrendering our sovereignty to international racketeers, international money-lenders, we should strengthen the sovereignty not only of Canada but of every nation comprising the British empire, by restoring to it the absolute control of the issue of currency and credit, so that it shall be impossible in future to make the statements as to the real control which I read when I started my address.

Finally, I should like to quote from a speech made by His Highness the Aga Khan. I do not think anybody could put it better, or improve on the time and place in which he made his remarks. Speaking at the Nelson Day dinner of the navy league in London, England, in 1934, the Aga Khan said, in regard to the question of arming the League of Nations with a police force:

> There are innumerable technical objections to the creation of an international force under the orders of the League of Nations, with which I need not weary you to-night. But behind all these, I see two fundamental difficulties. One is, that the league itself includes too many wolves in sheep's clothing—or, shall I say, watch-dogs with an occasional hankering after a bit of mutton for themselves—to be likely ever to show an effective unanimity in suppression of the meat-eating habit. The other difficulty, and that to my mind goes even deeper, is that no mechanical scheme, even if constructed for such a desirable object as maintaining the peace of the world, can command those deep-rooted instinctive loyalties for which nations are prepared to risk their fate, or individuals their lives. These loyalties are, for us, centred not in Geneva, but in that British crown which is the symbol of our ordered freedom and of those institutions and traditions which are of the very essence of our being. More than that, our loyalty to the Crown is no narrow local or racial emotion; it has grown with the expansion of England to be the common and mutual loyalty of a world-wide empire which is, in fact, a league of nations, but one that has grown and not been artificially put together. It is a league based on the enlargement, not on the suppression of patriotism. It is a league that in the hour of danger showed that it could summon a million men from the ends of the earth with the appeal: 'Who dies if England lives?' It is a league, in fact, that is capable of action.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not intend to wander far from the item under discussion, but I do feel that, as one who has always believed and believes more firmly to-day than ever, that the only form of security for a nation like Canada, and for other nations small or great, will ultimately be found to be in the realm of collective security, I could not sit here to-night and hear the hon. member for Broadview and the hon. member who has just taken his seat express the opinions they have expressed without rising in my place and saying something on the other side.

We are witnessing to-day as a matter of fact the results of the break-down of collective security, and ever since the Polish boundaries were guaranteed in March, 1939, feverish attempts have been made by our own great commonwealth to rebuild some form of collective security. We have sought allies and have failed to find them. One by one we have seen nations who, had they stuck together, might have withstood Hitler ere he rose to power, fall under his domination.

It is all very well to say that we must get more decentralization. I listened to the hon. member for Wetaskiwin. He said that we needed more decentralization, and then he spoke of the sovereign power of the British Commonwealth and the sovereign power of Canada. I am wondering just what he means by decentralization. Where is the decentralization to lie? In the nation?

Mr. JAQUES: No, in the people.

Mr. COLDWELL: In the province? In the town, in the village, or, as he suggests, in the people?

Mr. JAQUES: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: What does he mean by the people?

Mr. JAQUES: The individuals.

Mr. COLDWELL: Then I say that we shall go back to the days when duelling and murder were rampant, because the individual has achieved security in his community by reason of the fact that he has achieved a measure of collective security through the community of individuals. It seems to me that in this war which we are fighting we are learning the lesson that, had we been able to maintain a league of nations backed by the proper authority and the proper amount of power to enforce its will, we might not to-day be where we are. I want to say to my hon. friend and others who think like him that, when this war is over, we shall again attempt to build some form of collective security, otherwise we shall witness recurrent wars in the days to come.

I should like to ask these gentlemen who talk about decentralization and who oppose the idea of collective security, what is their alternative? What alternative do they offer? None whatever. I quite agree that behind some of these moves there have been great capitalist institutions, great financial powers and all the rest of it. But I think that at this time we do an ill service to our democracies in belittling the amount of democracy we have; for, after all, though we have not complete democracy in the country in which we live or in the commonwealth of which we are a part, or in the nations which to-day are fighting the totalitarian powers, yet to my mind we have at least an amount of democracy that is worth preserving, an amount that is worth struggling for and fighting for. Therefore I do not like to hear men in this chamber and across the country denouncing the democracies and comparing them to a degree with Hitler. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken is a member of the social credit group. I have read the advice which was given the social credit party in the province of Alberta by the gentleman to whom they pay $6,000 a year, a gentleman by the name of Byrne. What does he say about society? He says that society is like a pyramid. The people on the outside are the circumference, and at the top there must be one directing mind. That one mind must give orders and all must take instructions right down to the outer fringe.

Mr. JAQUES: He never advocated that.

Mr. COLDWELL: My hon. friend says that is not so. I will tell the committee what I will do. At the first opportunity I get I will read into the record the report of that gentleman's address and that will settle the question. I will read just a few paragraphs to illustrate what I have said. May I say this, that there is not a province in Canada where there is greater control from the top than in Alberta, where one man controls the thinking of a great mass of people.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): He is a great man.

Mr. COLDWELL: He certainly fills a great amount of space, if that is what the hon. member means.

Mr. HANSELL: That is not funny at all.

Mr. COLDWELL: It may not be funny but you asked for it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is not true.

Mr. COLDWELL: I saw him here.

Mr. HANSELL: He does not control thinking; he leads.

Mr. COLDWELL: If we are going to struggle for our democratic institutions, then let us place before us something that is better than the kind of thing we have been and are enduring at the present time. I am persuaded that we shall never achieve peace in this world until the common people of the earth, through organizations that will arise out of their own agony, their own blood and their own toil, set up some form of international organization that will be able to control the international buccaneer and international aggressor, and that is what the League of Nations was formed to do. The League of Nations failed, they say. The League of Nations did not fail; it was the statesmen of the world who failed the idea behind the League of Nations. That is the tragedy of to-day, and the sooner we learn that lesson the sooner perhaps in the days to come will our people build something that will protect them from these recurrent wars.

Mr. JAQUES: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: I wish to point out to hon. members that I have given a great deal of latitude. A great deal was said which was not pertinent to the item before the committee. A line must be drawn somewhere.

Mr. JAQUES: I have tried to follow the line since this debate started, but it seems to me that that line is a complete circle; it has boxed the compass.

The CHAIRMAN: We must try to break the vicious circle.

Mr. JAQUES: I do not expect to convert with regard to his political views the hon. member who has just taken his seat, but I cannot let pass his remarks about an old and very valued friend, Mr. L. D. Byrne, who has been the victim of so many sneers because he happens to receive this $6,000 a year. The remarks attributed to Mr. Byrne by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar are exactly the opposite of the views that Mr. Byrne holds. I know Mr. Byrne intimately.

Mr. BLACKMORE: So do I.

Mr. JAQUES: And we share common knowledge and common loyalty to the ideals of social credit. The very basis of the philosophy of social credit is the freedom of the individual.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The rules do not permit the discussion of the merits or demerits of social credit at this time. The hon. member was just addressing himself to the principles underlying social credit. That has no connection with the item under discussion.

Mr. JAQUES: Then let me rebut a statement made publicly casting a reflection on a valued civil servant of the Alberta government.

The CHAIRMAN: I am afraid the remarks by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar arose from the great latitude that was given to the hon. member who now has the floor. I must ask hon. members to stick to the rule, which says that we must address ourselves to the item before the committee.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then I submit, Mr. Chairman, that you drew the line at the wrong time. You should have stopped the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar.

The CHAIRMAN: I would wish to adhere to the rules at all times, but by the unanimous consent of the committee on many occasions some latitude must be given. But the chairman must draw the line somewhere.

Mr. JAQUES: Well, Mr. Chairman, this item deals with the League of Nations, and surely the League of Nations deals with political philosophy. If it does not, it does not deal with anything. I only want to make a remark on a certain political philosophy, and it is this, that the views that Mr. L. D. Byrne holds are the opposite of those attributed to him by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. He has never said and never written that he believed that power must be from the top down. The exact opposite is true. We hold and preach, and have preached for years, that it is the privilege of the people to decide policy, to demand results; it is the duty of their government to obtain those results for them, if that government is a democratic government. It should obtain those results by instructing the necessary experts to bring them about. That I say is the exact opposite of the ideas attributed to Mr. Byrne by the hon. member who has just taken his seat.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Just a word regarding this collective security. I think we could find in Hansard several occasions on which I have taken strong issue with those who were dreaming of the impossible ideal of collective security. In 1936 and 1937 we trusted ourselves to collective security, and the result is that we fell into a state of unpreparedness which allowed aggression to raise its frightful head and put us in danger of being swept from the earth. Right in the presence of disaster we have men rise in this house and talk of collective security. I am amazed. If the British empire and individual members of the British commonwealth of nations and the United States had depended upon themselves and made their walls strong and not bothered about collective security, depending upon people who were utterly undependable, we should not to-day be in grave danger of being destroyed as an empire. I say, what has been throbbing in my being ever since I came to this house, that we as Anglo-Saxon people and the peoples associated with us in our government must look to ourselves and the God who guides us for our defence and strength in this world; we must not depend on other nations; we cannot depend on them; they will fail us in our hour of need. It is well enough to be ready to cooperate with other nations, well enough to get all the help we can from them. But we have failed, dreadfully once; let us never in the long history which awaits us fail again.

Item agreed to.

Canada's contribution to maintenance of existing organizations.

44. Portion of expenditure of the imperial economic committee and the imperial shipping committee, $4,675.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I should like an explanation as to the division of that amount between the imperial economic committee and the imperial shipping committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: These are two committees which have been established for many years by the empire governments, all of which make a contribution towards their work. The governments of the empire accepted the recommendations of the imperial committee on economic consultation and cooperation that the dominions should share the financial responsibility of the joint services to be carried on, instead of leaving it to be borne wholly by the United Kingdom. The cost of the imperial economic committee is met by a fund to which the participating governments contribute on a scale recommended by the imperial committee on economic consultation and cooperation in 1933. This fund since October 1, 1933, has been £20,200 a year. The imperial economic committee in the financial statement and forecast for the period April 1, 1938, to March 31, 1943, foresaw that the work at present in view would make it desirable to increase the fund to £22,000 a year. The imperial economic committee portion is £22,000, the imperial shipping committee £2,000; total £24,000. Canada's share on the scale recommended in the report is £3,840. In 1940-41 we were asked to make provision for 50 per cent of our normal contribution, and the amount submitted for 1941-42 is 25 per cent of the original amount.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Has the imperial shipping committee to do with the registry of ships under British or Canadian registry? What is its function?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is an advisory committee on questions of shipping policy; it has not to do with registration.

Item agreed to.

Administration service.

1. Departmental administration, $121,925.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This item is not to be carried. As I said last night, we wish to call items in one or two departments, so that on Thursday or Friday, if we so desire, we may take up the estimates of those departments.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

87. Departmental administration, $154,440.

PASSPORTS AND VISAS

REVISION OF REGULATIONS, INVOLVING CLOSING OF CERTAIN OFFICES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before the house adjourns, I should like to give certain information with respect to the revision of Canadian passport regulations, involving the closing of certain offices.

In view of the heavy falling off in applications for passports it has been decided to close the branch offices at Winnipeg, Toronto, Montreal and St. Stephen, New Brunswick, which were opened in July of last year to relieve the congestion due to the avalanche of applications which suddenly descended on the Ottawa office. These branch offices will be closed on March 15. A considerable financial saving will thus be effected without inconvenience to the public.

Unless there is a further drop in applications the branch passport offices at Vancouver and Windsor will be kept open for a further period and an office opened at Moncton to replace the office at St. Stephen which was less conveniently situated to deal with applications from the various parts of the maritime provinces.

All applications for passports made after March 15 should be addressed to the Canadian passport officer, Ottawa, or if the applicant resides in the Windsor district, in British Columbia or in the maritime provinces, to the acting passport Officer at Windsor, Vancouver or Moncton.

New Canadian passport regulations will come into force on April 1, abolishing the present special passport valid for travel to the United States and making certain changes in the regular passport which will thereafter be the only passport issued.

The special passport for travel to the United States only was issued last summer when it was thought the requirement might prove to be a temporary one. As, however, there is no present prospect of a relaxation of the regulations and as under war-time conditions the strictest care must be taken in the issue of passports to avoid them being granted to improper persons, it has been considered advisable to discontinue issuing the special passport for travel to the United States. Other factors leading to the decision to discontinue the special passport were that the system of issuing two passports—a regular passport and a special passport for the United States only—gave rise to considerable confusion in the public mind and complicated considerably the keeping of records. Moreover, it represented a departure from the recognized international practice, Canada being the only country to issue two passports.

The changes in the regular passport cover two points—the period for which the passport is issued and the fee. The unsettled conditions and stricter supervision of international travel arising out of the war have made it advisable to reduce the period for which passports are issued, thus enabling more frequent checks to be made. It has been decided to make the initial period of validity two years instead of five years as at present. Passports will be renewable for four periods of two years each instead of for five years as at present. The passport fee will be reduced from $5 to $3. The fee for each renewal will be $1.

It will be noted that these modifications do not change the maximum duration of the passport or the maximum fee that is paid, maximum duration remaining at ten years and the maximum fee at $7.

The new passport will be valid for travel to the United States and any other country or countries to which the applicant desires to travel, except, of course, countries with which Canada is at war.

Passports already issued will, of course, remain valid until the date on which they expire.

A day or two ago the leader of the opposition asked me if I would hold up my announcement respecting passports, in order that consideration might be given to the proposed closing of the office at St. Stephen. The hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Hill) is similarly interested in that particular office, and would like to see it continued.

May I say the business there hardly justifies keeping it open. These are days when we have to seek economies. My colleagues and I have considered the matter to which the hon. members have directed our attention, and after giving it the best possible thought we feel that we must do as I have announced.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): The matter of expense is not important. The work is done by the collector of customs, at no additional expense. I believe the only extra expense involved is that of the services of a stenographer. I am sorry the Prime Minister has not considered favourably the request made. It is not a matter of local pride. It is one of convenience, because this point is a funnel for motor traffic entering the United States. People come there without passports, and have been able to obtain them at that point. Otherwise they would have to travel right back to Moncton.

Mr. STIRLING: Will there now be no local facilities for those people living close to the border in various parts of Canada, whose custom it has been for shopping and entertainment purposes, to slip across the line and back again the same evening?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am informed this will not affect the position of those persons to whom the hon. member has referred. Since mention has been made of tourist traffic, I would remind hon. members that passports are not required of people entering Canada from the United States. United States citizens have a distinct advantage when visiting our country. The freedom from passport requirements saves them considerable trouble.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It has a curiously adverse effect on the tourist traffic.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, February 26, 1941.

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. POULIOT—EDITORIAL IN OTTAWA JOURNAL OF FEBRUARY 25

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. Since Saturday last there is not a name or an epithet which can be found in any ordinary or slang dictionary which has not been levelled at the member for Témiscouata by the "N.G." press. Naturally the paper with the richest vocabulary is the Ottawa Journal. This paper had an editorial covering half a column about me, but that was under cover. In the issue of February 25 there is a report by Mr. Norman MacLeod, the British United Press correspondent, which reads in part as follows:

> Actually, Conservative members said, the official opposition party abandoned any hope it had for union government after the recent speech by Jean-François—

At this point the report is continued on page 12:

> —Pouliot, Quebec Liberal member, in which he assailed union proponents.

This shows that this paper published falsehoods under the cover of truth.

MR. CHURCH—SPEECH OF MEMBER FOR TRINITY ON FEBRUARY 20

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to correct a statement made in the most interesting speech delivered by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) on Thursday last. One page 858 of Hansard appear these words:

> The hon. member for Broadview suggested that something should be done in connection with the amalgamation of our railroads.

What I actually said is to be found on page 856, where I referred to the duplication of our railways and went on to say:

> Why could not something be done in that regard to eliminate wastage, as has been done in Great Britain and in the United States?

The second point I wish to raise is this. In the Toronto Star of last Friday appeared an article entitled "Let Opposition Open Seats for Supermen." In this article it is stated that the hon. member for Trinity said that I said that the government should give the country "a real war administration." The article then goes on to quote further the words of the hon. member for Trinity as follows:

> If it is proposed that members of the government resign in order that mythical men from the outside may come in, the opposition is in a position to demonstrate its bona fides by certain of its members resigning in order that these great men may be brought in in their places. This would show that hon. members opposite really mean what they were saying.

I used no such words as stated by the hon. member. What I did say will be found on page 855 of Hansard, as follows:

> —that consideration should be given to uniting all parties in the country and in the house so that we may have a real war-time national government. I think the party system is one luxury we can do without during this war; there has been altogether too much of it. A great many people think the government is conducting a Liberal war, and that our war effort is not being carried on in the non-partisan way it should be. There is some element of truth in that suggestion, I am afraid.

It will be seen that the words are quite different. I may say that the hon. member made a most interesting speech.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

*FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL—SPECIAL TAX CREDITS AND DEPRECIATION ALLOWANCES

Mr. DESMOND:

1. How many (a) individuals, (b) partnerships, (c) corporations, have applied for assistance by way of special tax credits and/or special allowances for depreciation or depletion under the Income War tax Act and/or the Excess Profits Tax Act?
2. What are the names of each such individual, partnership or corporation who have so applied?
3. What is the nature of the business carried on by each such individual, partnership or corporation?
4. How many of such applications have been granted?
5. What is the nature of the tax credit relief or other concession which has been granted to each such individual, partnership or corporation?
6. What is the estimate of the amount by which Canada's supply of foreign exchange will be increased as a result of each such grant of assistance or concession?

Mr. ILSLEY: This question is being answered, but I should like to point out that the hon. gentleman did not amend his question to substitute the War Exchange Conservation Act for the Income War Tax Act and/or the Excess Profits Tax Act. I have answered the question as if that substitution had taken place.

1. (a) 1, (b) 0, (c) 15.

2 and 3. It is not considered in the public interest to disclose the names or the nature of business of those making such applications. The War Exchange Conservation Act, chapter 2 of the statutes 1940-41, section 8(2), provides for the tabling of all agreements in parliament within fifteen days of entering into such agreement or, if parliament is not sitting, within fifteen days after the opening of the next session of parliament.

4. None to date. Several agreements are now in various stages of negotiation.

5 and 6. Answered by No. 4.

EMPLOYMENT OF CIVILIANS AT AIRPORTS

Mr. SENN:

INTERNED ALIENS—DEPORTATION AFTER THE WAR

Mr. ROY:

1. Were aliens in Canada who have been interned during the present war permitted to retain possession of their property?

2. Will they be subject to deportation on the cessation of hostilities or shall we allow to remain in Canada members of the fifth column who have been or shall be interned for the duration of the war?

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Under the consolidated regulations respecting trading with the enemy, 1939, the definition of "enemy" includes "any person who has been detained under the defence of Canada regulations during the period of such detention". The property, therefore, of any such person for the period of detention is vested in the custodian of enemy property.

2. Information is not available as to the number of interned persons who may be subject to deportation under the immigration laws as they stand at present. This inquiry raises a question of government policy which, obviously, cannot be settled until the termination of hostilities.

CANADIAN ARMY—ENLISTED MEN PAID AS TRADESMEN

Mr. WINKLER:

1. Are any of the enlisted men in the C.A.S.F. receiving pay as tradesmen, such as carpenters and so forth?

2. Did recruiting officers receive authority to offer the going pay as tradesmen in order to induce men to enlist?

Mr. RALSTON:

1. The financial regulations and instructions for the Canadian active service force on active service provide that warrant officers, non-commissioned officers and men employed as tradesmen in capacities and under such limitations and conditions as are authorized by the minister, shall, if qualified and approved by the officer commanding the unit to which they belong, be entitled to receive tradesmen's rates of pay.

2. No instructions authorizing recruiting officers to offer tradesmen's rates of pay as an inducement to men to enlist have been issued by the Department of National Defence.

ANGLIN NORCROSS COMPANY—CONTRACTS

Mr. LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency):

1. Have any contracts, without tenders being called for, been given to the firm of Anglin Norcross Company, Limited, for national defence works in the city of Quebec or at Valcartier?

2. If so, (a) on what conditions are such contracts awarded; (b) what is the total amount of such contracts; (c) why did the government not ask for tenders from local contractors?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes. A general construction contract was awarded the Anglin Norcross Quebec Limited, 892 Sherbrooke Street West, Montreal, Quebec, for a small arms ammunition factory for the Quebec arsenal at St. Malo, Palace Hill and Valcartier, file 4-1-129, P.C. 3320, which included reconstruction of the St. Malo shops, the construction of additional buildings at St. Malo, Palace Hill and Valcartier, the installation of the machinery and equipment and the construction of all works and services required for the completion of the undertaking.

2. (a) The contract was awarded on the basis of cost plus a fixed fee. Included as items of cost are plant rental at the rate of 3 per cent per month, which is the usual rental provided in such contracts, and a service charge of $6,000 a month to cover the cost of the work done in the contractor's Montreal office as follows: (a) Estimating quantities and preparing building material; (b) purchasing construction materials; (c) arranging and awarding sub-contracts; (d) expediting deliveries; (e) accounting, invoices, pay-rolls, monthly statements; (f) financial arrangements, invoices, tax reports, insurance, etc.; (g) employment services. The amount of the fixed fee is $35,000, and covers salaries of the contractors, executives, office rent, a proportion of the Montreal office expenses and profit.

(b) The total estimated expenditure on the original project is $2,500,000, which was required to double the productive capacity of the arsenal for ·303 ammunition. Since this was awarded, and upon request from the United Kingdom for a still greater arsenal output, a further extension of this contract is planned, to the amount of $2,700,000, making a total estimated expenditure on the Anglin Norcross Quebec Limited contract of $5,200,000. The increase of the fixed fee payable to the contractor is $17,500, making a total of $52,500 as the fixed fee for the original contract plus the extension.

The foregoing represents only one part of the total extension necessary to the Quebec arsenal, the total estimated expenditure being $10,000,000, comprising $5,200,000 (Anglin Norcross Quebec Limited) as heretofore stated, as the estimated cost of the construction work herein reported, and $4,800,000 to cover the cost of machinery, engineering expenses and certain other construction work not covered by the Anglin Norcross Quebec Limited contract, and which will be awarded to local contractors.

(c) The work covered by Anglin Norcross Quebec Limited on the original contract ($2,500,000) was so complicated and so urgently required that, after consultation with the officers in charge of the arsenal, it was considered impracticable to prepare plans and specifications and to call for tenders in the usual way. Not only were new buildings to be built, but extensive alterations and extensions to existing buildings were required, as well as a large amount of mechanical work of a special nature that could not be contracted for on a unit price or lump sum basis. To ensure the completion of all phases of the work at the proper time, the recommendation of the department's consulting engineers was taken, that all the construction work be entrusted to a single firm having adequate personnel experienced in this kind of work and immediately available.

For the additional work made necessary by the increase in the capacity of the arsenal, for which provision has been made in the amount of $2,700,000, the arsenal authorities were insistent that the contractor already engaged in constructing the factory buildings and installing the equipment therein should also construct the extensions to such buildings and complete the installation of the additional machinery in the buildings being constructed by him and the extensions thereto. In their view, the employment of other contractors in these buildings at the same time would have resulted in confusion and delay and have unnecessarily interfered with the arsenal output.

For the balance of the expansion to the Quebec arsenal not covered by work already contracted for by the Anglin Norcross Quebec Limited, it is proposed that plans and specifications for the construction work be prepared by local architects, and the construction contracts awarded to contractors in the vicinity who are able to tender. The amount of such work will be substantial.

Mr. ROY:

1. Is Mr. Adjutor Savard in the employ of the dominion government as French publicist for the war savings campaign?

2. If so, how much is he being paid for his services?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. No. (However, it is understood that he is employed by the Canadian publishers' war finance committee. This committee, which is similar in function to those committees which played an important part during the war loan campaigns of the last war, was set up by Canadian publishers to assist the Minister of Finance in connection with the advertising and publicity aspects of the war savings campaign. A voluntary offer of the publishers to provide this type of cooperation in Canada's war effort was accepted by the minister but responsibility for the organization rests solely on the publishers themselves. The government has had no voice in the selection of the committee or its sub-committees or its employees but has agreed to recoup the committee for its out-of-pocket expenses.)

2. Answered by No. 1.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT—EMPLOYEES

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

How many appointments have been made to date in connection with the Unemployment Insurance Act, and what number of employees is it anticipated will be required in order to administer said act?

The unemployment insurance commission reports that its procedures and plans have not as yet been developed to the point where an accurate estimate of the number of employees which will ultimately be required to administer the act may be made. During the hearings before the special committee appointed by the House of Commons to consider the unemployment insurance bill in July, 1940, an approximation was stated to be in the neighbourhood of 3,000 employees.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

QUEBEC PROVINCE MILITARY TRAINING CAMPS

Mr. ROY:

1. Were any representations made to the government for the establishment of military training camps in either or all of the following counties: Hull, Pontiac, Wright, Labelle, Chapleau and Gaspé?
2. If so, by whom were these representations made and what action was taken?

FOREIGN EXCHANGE—RETIREMENT OF CANADIAN LOANS

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth):

How many United States dollars were used by Canada in each of the years 1939 and 1940 to retire (a) Dominion of Canada loans; (b) loans on Canadian enterprises owned by or carrying the endorsement or guarantee of the Dominion of Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: Order for return.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) why this question should not be answered rather than made an order for return?

Mr. ILSLEY: It applies to two departments, Finance and Transport. That is the reason.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not see where Transport comes in. However, the minister may be right.

DEBERT, N.S., AIRPORT AND MILITARY CAMP

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. What acreage has been acquired for the Debert airport and military camp, (a) airport; (b) military camp?
2. From whom were such lands secured, stating, (a) the acreage from each party; (b) the prices asked by each party, (c) the amount paid or offered in payment?
3. What has been the total expenditures for drainage, stating, (a) the quantity of tile or drainage or sewer pipe purchased, (b) from whom such pipe was purchased and the delivered prices for each size?

Mr. RALSTON: Acquisition of the land and titles thereto has not yet been completed. A number of properties are still under negotiation. The Department of Munitions and Supply is interested in the third part of the question, so I think it ought to be made an order for a return.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL WAR SERVICES—PERSONNEL

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

1. What are the names of the personnel of the department of war services?
2. What are their respective duties and salaries?
3. What was their occupation and address at the time of appointment?
4. Who of them have had previous active war service?

Mr. GARDINER: Order for return.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This question certainly applies to only one department and I object to its being made an order for return. The question should be answered.

Mr. GARDINER: It would be a fairly long answer. The staffs are spread right across Canada from Vancouver to Halifax, and it would take some time to get the information compiled. I think this should be made an order for return.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think so. The basis of an order for return is that more than one department is interested.

Mr. GARDINER: There are other reasons.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But that is the main reason and the one I have always heard urged in this house. I know that the government has considerable authority in this matter, but I do know that private members are entitled to get the answers to their questions on record unless there is some primary reason why that should not be done. I have heard that alleged by hon. gentlemen opposite when they were sitting over here.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As my hon. friend is aware it is for the government itself to decide whether it will have a question answered immediately or be made an order for return, and the government takes the responsibility for its decision.

5. What other types of aeroplanes are being made in Canada and what has been the production of each up to the 1st of February, 1941?

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn):

For a copy of the report submitted by S. Cuddy, Esq., supervisor of short weights to E. O. Way, director of weights and measures, under date of October 13, 1939.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, the report in question is confidential, and in my opinion it is not in the public interest that it be released.

Motion dropped.

WAR REFUGEES AND PRISONERS OF WAR

Mr. ROY:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the government of the province of Quebec and the dominion government, since the beginning of the present war to date, with respect to war refugees and prisoners of war.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am informed by my colleague the Secretary of State that he does not recall any exchange of correspondence between the government of Quebec and the dominion government with respect to the war refugees and prisoners of war, since the beginning of the war. Apart from that, however, I do not think that correspondence with respect to prisoners of war should be brought down at this time. In that circumstance, the order would not pass.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the Prime Minister state as a matter of fact that there is not any correspondence?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot say as a matter of fact, but I asked my colleague the Secretary of State if there was any, and he said that as far as he could recollect he had not any. However, he might refresh his memory. Even if there is, I do not think it would be proper to have it brought down.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We can debate that later on. Could we not let the motion stand until it is ascertained whether there is any correspondence?

Mr. POULIOT: I ask the leader of the opposition to rise to speak, and not to speak while sitting. Let us have manners—good manners—in the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Friday, February 21, consideration in committee of a resolution to provide sums not exceeding $1,300,000,000 for the year ending March 31, 1942, for the carrying out of measures consequent upon the existence of a state of war—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Vien in the chair.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Under this heading I should like to bring up a matter which particularly concerns the war effort of Canada and should come under this bill. I am speaking as a member of this house, as one who lost his brother in the last war, and as one who is himself a returned soldier. On February 19, the leader of a party for whom I have always had the greatest admiration, made this statement: I quote from Hansard, page 838:

Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury): It is a rhetorical question; the Prime Minister can answer later if he wants to. The fact is that Australia is on the field of battle, and Canada is not.

Mr. Mackenzie King: I deny that absolutely. Canada is very much on the field of battle.

Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury): Tell that to the marines! The people of Canada know that we are not in Libya. We have a few airmen in England; we have men in training in England.

Speaking as a member and as a returned soldier, I resent that, not only on my own behalf, but on behalf of all the returned soldiers in Canada, for whom I believe I may speak. I do not know in what regiment the leader of the opposition served in the last war, but I served in the 29th battalion. I speak for every returned soldier in Canada, and for the mother, the father, and sister and brother of every soldier we have in the present theatres of war. I wonder what contribution the leader of the opposition thought he was making to this war effort when he cast such an aspersion on the Canadians who are in England and other theatres of war to-day. Do not forget that we have nurses over there undergoing bombing raids and taking all kinds of risks. On their behalf and also on behalf of all our constituents, let me say that if this is the type of leadership we are to expect from a so-called national government, the returned soldiers of the last war and the men who are in the front line in the present struggle do not want those people as leaders of any government during the continuance of this war.

Mr. HOWE: I have been asked on several occasions to make a statement on the situation affecting war production in Canada with particular reference to the aircraft industry, and with the consent of hon. members I will do so at this time.

In discussing the work of the Department of Munitions and Supply, perhaps I should first say a word about the department itself. It is a popular sport to criticize the department, and the criticism from some quarters is nothing short of abusive. In an editorial which I picked up to-day I saw the department described as the "cumbrous, amorphous and overloaded department of munitions and supply, reaching the breaking point." I think it is fair to the men who are carrying on the work of the department to say just a word about it from their point of view.

The department has been charged with all the purchasing for the army, the navy and the air force, and has to carry out all military construction work in Canada, with the exception of some work carried on by the army by day labour, and also to purchase for the government of Great Britain, the governments of Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and India, and two or three governments outside the empire.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is, purchases in America?

Mr. HOWE: Purchases in Canada. That work has grown to very large proportions; I am not denying that at all. I doubt whether hon. members have any real idea of the proportions to which it has grown, but I illustrated it a day or two ago when I said that whereas the first Bren contract, which was regarded at the time as quite considerable, called for 5,000 guns a year, the house would not believe me when I informed it that the present contracts with the Bren company called for a production of 97,500 a year or 19½ times the original number. And yet people have to be convinced that this is so—the very people who every few days make the charge that nothing is being done by Canada in organizing the productive capacity of the country.

Anyone who will take a railway journey through the maritime provinces will see our railways in that section taxed to capacity. The ports of Saint John and Halifax are overtaxed in the effort to move the products of Canada destined for war areas. Anyone who takes that trip should think back and reflect upon the fact that this situation is due to the productive capacity of the country organized for war.

As to whether the department is cumbrous and amorphous, I looked up the dictionary to make sure that I had the right meaning of the word "amorphous." I find that it means shapeless or unorganized. Is the department unorganized? I have here an organization chart which is kept up to date for each month. It shows the direct relationship between the branches of the department, to whom they report, and by what channels they reach the minister for such decisions that have to be made. I wish to place this chart on Hansard.* It might be interesting to hon. members.

As to whether the department is reaching the breaking point, I read in the press daily that my health is breaking down, that I am close to the breaking point, though personally I have not noticed anything of the kind. My own view is that I should be the first to notice such a thing. Others may think I should be the last to be aware of it, but I know that the Prime Minister keeps a very careful eye on the work of all departments and I am perfectly sure that if I were past or even near the breaking point he would so advise me and assign me to less onerous duties. That is his responsibility, and I have not the slightest doubt that he will discharge it. I want no sympathy for myself. I did not ask for the job of minister of munitions; it was assigned to me. I took it because I thought it was my duty to do so, and I intend to fill the position until I am asked to assume other duties or to step down. If in carrying out the duties of the office I break down, that will be no one's loss but my own.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The country's loss.

Mr. HOWE: I ask for no sympathy on that score. As to whether the department has reached the breaking point, to my mind the Department of Munitions and Supply is just as virile and as able to carry on to-day as it was when I took over. We keep it alive by constantly infusing new blood into it. Not a month passes but we ask a prominent executive, some man who has established his ability as an executive in Canada, to take over some of the work of the department. In the last month we have asked four prominent executives to lend us their services. One is Mr. Harry Carmichael, who left a position carrying a very large salary as vice-president and general manager of General Motors Corporation of Canada. We requested him to work for the Department of Munitions and Supply without salary. We have taken in Mr. R. C. Berkinshaw, general manager of Goodyear Tire and Rubber company. We have taken in Mr. Brown, an important executive of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, and Mr. Joseph Piggott, one of the most prominent contractors of the country—all giving full-time work without salary. I doubt whether they would have left these important positions to join a department that is "cumbrous, amorphous and reaching the breaking point."

I do not wish to stress this point but I think I speak for the many executives who have left prominent positions in civil life to work with the department when I say that we ask for no sympathy so far as the personnel of the department is concerned.

It has been said that we are working without a plan. The leader of the opposition said that while Mr. Purvis knew exactly where he was going, the Department of Munitions and Supply was working along from day to day without a plan and without an objective. I have here two letters that are interesting on that point, though they are not of importance otherwise. One is addressed to Mr. Fairweather, the director-general of the economics and statistic branch, by the head of the planning branch of the British purchasing commission in Washington. It is dated February 5. I quote:

Dear Mr. Fairweather:

It is only in the last day or so that I have had an opportunity to go over the figures you brought down from Canada last week. The more I study them, the more convinced I am that you have given us just what we needed. Mr. Purvis and Mr. Monnet are both very well satisfied.

I shall probably be sending you teletypes from time to time in connection with some of the details as we go deeper into the figures, but the information in your tables is ample for our purposes and gives a comprehensive picture of the entire Canadian effort.

May I thank you for all the trouble you took in preparing the tables and bringing them down to us.

I was sorry that you were not able to stay longer in Washington.

John S. Guest.

There is another letter from Mr. Guest dated February 18:

Many thanks for your letter of February 14 with supplementary forecasts of deliveries of certain items from April-December 1942.

We realize fully that the projection of output shown on your quarterly tables assumes that the capacity continues to be employed on repeat orders and that it makes no allowance for output from new capacity not yet under construction.

Your annual figures for maximum potential output do take account of such possible new capacity. The possession of both of these sets of figures greatly adds to the value of each. We anticipate that our forecast of United States deliveries will be ready by the end of next week, and we shall be glad to send copies up to Mr. Howe.

Notice that; ours is in, and the other is coming.

In discussing our aircraft production, I wish to be exceedingly frank as to how it stands. I think hon. members should bear in mind that all we can do in the Department of Munitions and Supply is to organize industry as efficiently as possible, and to place the work that we are required to place with the firms best able to do it, having in mind their other commitments. If an industry is capable and is working along lines for which it has been organized, we invariably find that that industry is able to meet and in many cases to exceed our expectation. If we are dealing with an industry which has been newly created, one which has little background and has expanded rapidly, we are not able to forecast accurately what that industry will do. I have in mind the aeroplane industry, which in 1937 was practically nothing, but which to-day employs about eighteen thousand people. We study the situation and base our plans upon what we think an industry ought to do. Obviously we are not able to predict with the same degree of exactitude that we can in well-organized industries, or in connection with a substantial industry performing in its own sphere.

Again, we have reliable industries with established production reputations coming into production on articles the manufacture of which is entirely strange to them. There again predictions are apt to be unreliable. If someone would like to read another view on this point I suggest he might be interested in reading an article by Mr. Charles F. Kettering, president of the General Motors research corporation. I might add that Mr. Kettering is credited with having improved methods of automobile manufacturing to an extent greater than any other man living. The title of that article is "Guns are not Windshield Wipers," and it appears in the Saturday Evening Post—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What?

Mr. HOWE: —the issue of January 18. It is a warning, particularly to the automobile industry in the United States, that when they step into the manufacture of aeroplanes, guns and aeroplane engines they are stepping into a field unknown to them, and that they will not have a background of twenty years of progress to guide them. It advises them not to make too optimistic promises. We find that borne out in the production situation as it is to-day.

In Canada we have ten major divisions of production. Of those ten divisions, seven are fully up to or ahead of schedule. Three are not up to schedule and are not in as good position as the other seven.

First I refer to personal equipment, the general buying of clothing and articles used by the troops. As is known, we had difficulty in the early days of the war in bringing that industry up to the production level required. There is no difficulty to-day. We are well ahead in every branch of that industry.

As to the construction industry; in the last building season we tested that industry in a way in which I believe it had never been tested before in Canada, and it met every demand made upon it. As hon. members know, so far as the air training programme was concerned we did two years' construction in one, and we carried on a great amount of work in other branches of the service. No difficulty there.

In regard to shipbuilding, when our naval programme was under consideration we made a survey of the shipyards in Canada, and an estimate of the production we could obtain from those shipyards. I can report that those forecasts have been greatly exceeded; we have a much greater output of shipbuilding than we had forecast at the time we laid down our programme.

In the matter of mechanical transport, there we have a well organized industry, one of the best organized in Canada, and one of the most efficient. It was able to turn its facilities over to the manufacture of mechanical transport and universal carriers. It has met every strain put upon it. That industry in Canada has been so efficient that Great Britain has not found it necessary to enter the great market across the line for the purchase of motor transports.

In the matter of chemicals and explosives we have lived up to every prediction. Our first huge explosive plant was brought in two months ahead of schedule, and to-day not only is it producing at capacity, but it is producing about twenty-five per cent over capacity. The balance of the programme is well up to schedule. No plant is seriously behind schedule, and there are several plants well ahead. So that we have nothing of an adverse character to report in connection with chemicals and explosives.

Shells and shell components. Here again we are well up to schedule. We had in Canada a great number of manufacturing plants that had made shells during the last war, and which were able to step quickly into production at the beginning of this one. They have been able to maintain every promise we exacted from them when we placed our shell orders. The same applies to components—that is fuses, time fuses, gains, and all components which go into the finished loaded shell. That work is well up to schedule, and there again I can think of no situation which should be called to the attention of the committee as being out of step. I might say that we are producing to-day about 350,000 shells a month, a million every three months.

With respect to steel production, we have made a tremendous expansion. If I were to give the figures for steel production in each of the last three years I believe I would have hon. members correcting me again, and making the suggestion that I must be mistaken. Since the war started we have greatly enlarged the potential steel capacity of Canada, and that industry is producing as much as, in fact more than, we ever expected of it.

Alloys production. Here again we have stepped up the industry to ten or twelve times its pre-war capacity. Plants have been coming in from time to time, and production is fully up to schedule.

Small arms ammunition. Here again we are meeting with great success. The production of small arms ammunition constitutes one of our largest programmes. Each plant has come in either when scheduled or before scheduled. The quality of the ammunition is exceptionally fine. I think we are making to-day about 80 per cent red label ammunition, as against about 40 per cent on orders placed at the same time in the United States. "Red label" ammunition means ammunition used in aircraft. It must be of the highest quality, and is especially tested for that purpose.

Now we come to the branches of the department which are not fully up to schedule, the first of which is aeroplanes. As I said a few moments ago, here we have a mushroom industry which has expanded rapidly, an industry with no background in this country, whose only designing talent has been that created in this country in the last few years. We have been taking new men into this industry in tremendous numbers, giving them brief training and putting them in as production mechanics. I intend to give a comprehensive statement of what has been accomplished, and I do not think Canada has anything to be ashamed of in that connection, though I am frank to say that we cannot predict what will be done in this industry with anything like the accuracy with which we can predict developments in other branches. As a matter of fact our predictions for every branch of the aeroplane industry have been somewhat too optimistic.

Then we come to tanks and universal carriers. As I have said, these universal carriers are up to schedule. Production was a bit late in starting, but to-day it is what we anticipated. I think the programme actually was about two months late in starting, but I do not believe there will be any great difficulty in regaining that lost ground, because it is going exceptionally well. In the matter of tanks we have reliable industries, with wide backgrounds of manufacturing experience, undertaking an operation with which they are totally unfamiliar; with which, as a matter of fact, everyone in this country is totally unfamiliar. The main contractor for the infantry tanks is the Angus shops of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and we have drawn freely on the best mechanical talent of that company. We have other first-class manufacturing shops working with them in the manufacturing of components, and we are going to get tank production shortly. Just when that will be it is hard to say. They are well ahead in regard to components, but as yet they have not delivered a finished tank, nor were they expected to do so until next month.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the minister will allow me, do they undertake to make the complete tanks, or just parts?

Mr. HOWE: The tanks of which I am speaking are being made completely in Canada except the engines and transmissions. We were able to buy the engines and transmissions from stock in the United States under conditions which made it undesirable to establish production in this country for the quantities we would be likely to buy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree with that.

Mr. HOWE: We are making armour plate, and I may say that in this manufacture an immense amount of research has been undertaken. We were not able simply to go out and order armour plate as we would order any other kind of steel; we had to develop a process for annealing it, and we had many failures before we finally arrived at a successful product. To-day, however, we are able to manufacture in Canada all the armour plate that will be used in our tank programme.

Then we come to the cruiser tanks, which are a joint design by the British and United States governments, and in which our own designing staff also has had a hand. In connection with this work we were aware of the difficulty in obtaining complete plans for the manufacture of our infantry tanks. Over twelve hundred drawings are involved in the manufacture of the infantry tanks, and we had great difficulty in assembling them all. When finally we had assembled all the drawings there seemed to be, we found a good many missing links which had to be supplied by the designing staff of the Angus shops. We decided to profit by that experience, and in the case of the cruiser tanks we made arrangements for design and supervision by the principal contractor for those tanks in the United States, the American Car and Foundry company. This company has taken a very substantial part in preparing detailed drawings for all tank production, and we are paying a small fee to the company for special attention to Canadian production, particularly to make sure that we get the plans as quickly as they are furnished to anyone else. I may tell hon. members that as yet we have not all the drawings for the cruiser tank, and neither has anyone else. This design was talked about six months ago and pretty well decided upon; and I say this in order to draw attention to the length of time it requires to develop complete plans for a piece of military equipment such as a tank. However, work is proceeding. That production in Canada is in the hands of our best contractors, and I believe we will produce cruiser tanks as soon as and as efficiently as any other manufacturer.

A great deal has been said in the newspapers and in this house with regard to a report by Mr. H. R. MacMillan, head of the war-time requirements board, on the aeroplane industry. Mr. MacMillan and his board were asked to make a survey of all production in Canada, particularly for the use of the Minister of Finance in preparing the bill now under consideration, and for the information of the war cabinet of the government, as to the state of production in this country as viewed by that board. Mr. MacMillan obtained the assistance of Mr. Harry Carmichael, whom he brought from General Motors for that purpose. Mr. Carmichael obtained the services of Mr. Breech, vice-president of General Motors of the United States in charge of aeroplane production. I hold that report in my hand. It is a bulky document. I would have no particular objection to reading it all, with the exception of the section on guns, which I am sorry to say contains confidential information which I am not at liberty to give to the committee, since it is information with regard to types. I would be prepared, however, to place the complete report in the hands of the committee which will sit in camera to discuss matters of this kind.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With the reservation to which the minister has alluded, will he say whether copies of that report will be made available to members of this house? If he tells us that the part relating to guns is confidential and cannot be produced, certainly I would back him up in that position, but are we entitled to see the other part of the report and could it be printed?

Mr. HOWE: I know of no reason why the report, except for the section on guns, should not be published in the Votes and Proceedings. Probably I will hear from the service branches about this, since they are perhaps more closely associated than I am with the confidential side of it, but I will take one more look at the report and perhaps consult them. It could be published with the possible deletion of a few figures they may consider confidential.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the MacMillan report include the Breech report?

Mr. HOWE: So far as I can find out, Mr. Breech never made any report other than a verbal one. He consulted with Mr. MacMillan and Mr. Carmichael. I asked Mr. Carmichael if he had a written report and he told me he had not seen it. Mr. MacMillan had not seen it, and I have not seen it. I cannot say anything more than that, but I am sure that there is no report.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Has the minister not seen a letter from Mr. Breech to Mr. Sloan, president of General Motors? My information is that copies are in the possession of one or more of the ministers.

Mr. HOWE: I can assure my hon. friend that a copy is not in my possession. I have never seen such a letter. If there is such a letter I would be very glad to have someone show me a copy. I have never seen any such copy. Perhaps my hon. friend would say where he gets his information because I shall ask Mr. Sloan.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The stock answer would be, " it is not in the public interest."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not know anything about this matter, but there is no reason why we should not try to ascertain the facts. If there is such a letter, that seems to be a perfectly proper proposition.

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member said that there was a copy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He asked the minister if he had heard that there was.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to refer to a well known rule of the house, that an hon. member has no right to refer to a communication unless he is prepared to table such communication. The hon. member has referred to a communication and he should table it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He did not say that he had such a letter, he asked the minister if there was such a letter.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Innuendoes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You can make your own interpretation of it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Anything by insinuation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not know of any one more capable than the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) at that.

Mr. HOWE: This report is dated January 27, 1940. I call the attention of hon. members to the fact that it was prepared while I was away from Canada. I had no knowledge that the report was to be prepared and I had no hand in its preparation. A copy was given to me at the same time as a copy was given to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), and I have no information to report other than that. There is no hand of mine in this report. I shall read the aircraft section, which starts at page 10:

Aircraft. Anticipated production for Canadian account of various types is as follows:

(a) Anson's. Production might not start until after July, 1941, and might reach only 200 to 300 in 1941, but if carefully reorganized at several key points and if time lost by failure of sub-contractors can be recaptured, 1941 production might be doubled and production January to March, 1942, might be 300 to 400, or a total of 800 to 900 by March 31, 1942.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

I may say that I consulted with Mr. MacMillan as to what key points he had in mind. There has been considerable reorganization, and we have a good deal of hope that we shall be able to pick up some of what he calls "lost time" in that connection.

Bolingbroke. Apparently production difficulties have been surmounted, and, unless unforeseen stoppage arises in supplies or components, contract will be completed by December 31, 1941.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What was that contract? What type of plane and how many?

Mr. HOWE: Bolingbroke bomber. I shall give the figures later on because I intend to go fully into production.

Noorduyn. Manufacturing technique the furthest advanced of any Canadian plant. Unless held up by non-receipt of ordered materials or components will complete 210 Harvards by March 31, 1942, 56 Norsemen by September 30, 1941.

Vickers. It seems well in hand and subject to causes beyond their control will complete their contracts January 31, 1942.

Boeing aircraft. Plant building will be finished March, 1941. They should complete 14 amphibians by March 31, 1942.

National Steel Car. Lysanders on order for Canada should be finished March 31, 1942.

Fleet. Trainer production by this company is on a smooth running production basis and should finish—404 fleet 16B by March 31, 1941, 200 Fleet 60 by September 30, 1941.

De Havilland. Trainer production here also on smooth running production basis. Their order should be completed—554 Tiger Moths by September 30, 1941, and 135 Menasco Moths by June 30, 1941.

Now come details of the orders which we have placed on behalf of the British government:

Canadian Car. Manufacturing difficulties have been surmounted. If delays arise they are likely to be due to British causes, changes in design, delay in receipt of necessary goods or drawings. Production of 600 Hurricanes is expected to be completed by July 31, 1941.

Canadian Associated Aircraft. Delays have been numerous due to new designs, non-receipt of essentials from Britain and divided management. If no more delays, 160 Hampdens should be completed by March 31, 1942.

I may say that this was the first company in Canada to undertake war orders in substantial volume. It is a company which was formed by the trade itself and is controlled directly from Great Britain. The general manager was brought to Canada from Great Britain. Up to this time the Canadian government has had no hand in the operations of this company. It is rather interesting to note that with one or two exceptions the companies making up Associated Aircraft are those to which my hon. friend said the contracts should be given if handed over to the trade.

Mr. RALSTON: The company was formed two years ago.

Mr. HOWE: I shall give a history of the company presently.

National Steel Car. Manufacturing difficulties have been overcome. The order for 116 Lysanders should be completed by December 31, 1940.

The potential aircraft manufacturing capacity should be considered from various aspects:

(b) Efficiency is considerably less than in the United States on large machines, such as bombers, and is somewhere near the United States on smaller planes, such as primary trainers. This is due to newer industry on small volume production.

(c) After the joint air training scheme and the Royal Canadian Air Force are stocked up, say the middle of 1941, the annual Canadian demand will drop to something like: primary trainers, 150; twin engine, 150; single engine trainers, 150; fighters (all types), 300 or less.

The Canadian aircraft building industry as at the present constituted far exceeded this market and the numerous existing units cannot live on the above prospective Canadian market.

(d) Canadian aircraft producing companies are naturally behind the United States of America companies in engineering and plant layout and management. The situation is analogous to the early days of the Canadian motor car industry and to other industries in Canada, whose domestic market is much smaller than the United States domestic market.

The new aircraft engineering ideas, the new production ideas are coming from the United States.

(e) The Bolingbroke bomber is consuming 60,000 man hours. Fairchild hope to get it under 40,000 man hours. A bomber, 50 per cent bigger, is budgeted at 20,000 man hours in the United States, and expectation is 16,000 man hours.

(f) The situation therefore is: Canada already has surplus aircraft production capacity but requires some planning to arrange to use it economically.

H. R. MacMillan,
Chairman.

That is everything in the report relating to aircraft. My hon. friend has put out a press release saying he understands that the MacMillan report recommends this and recommends that. The Financial Post is buying space in other newspapers to say that the MacMillan report recommends this and recommends that, and there has been a stack of editorials all across Canada stating that the MacMillan report recommends this and recommends that. Hon. gentlemen now have the MacMillan report. I am going to dwell on that aspect at more length presently.

I promised hon. members a complete report, and I will run over the various companies in order to give the position.

The Boeing Aircraft of Canada have had since the war programme started—

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the minister give the location of the company in each instance?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. Boeing Aircraft of Canada, Limited, is at Vancouver, B.C. Since the war started, they have had orders totalling $9,276,000. They have delivered aircraft to a value of $2,054,000, and they have orders outstanding totalling $7,222,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister is giving the information in terms of dollars and cents, but not the units.

Mr. HOWE: How would you like to have it?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The units delivered.

Mr. HOWE: The first contract was for eleven Blackburn Sharks, built for the Canadian government. That contract has been completed. The eleven Sharks have been delivered. On March 14, 1938, they got a further order for six Sharks. That order has been completed. That makes seventeen. On August 13, 1940, they were given a contract for the partial manufacture and complete assembly of fifty-five P.B.Y. amphibian flying boats at an estimated cost of $4,400,000. The P.B.Y. amphibian is one of the newest and largest types of war machines in use, and I can say on the basis of a special report made by an expert very recently that Boeing are well up to the production schedule which they undertook to carry out.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is the minister able to tell us how many units under this contract have been delivered? If he cannot, it is all right.

Mr. HOWE: I can tell you—none. The reason is that it takes anywhere up to eighteen months to get into production of that type of aircraft.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Quite so.

Mr. HOWE: At the time the original contract was placed, the number of employees at Boeing was sixty-one, and the number at present employed is 825.

In addition to the contracts for complete planes, Boeing has been doing a great deal of work on components. It has been building spares, wings and ailerons, for the Anson programme, and that work is well ahead.

Canadian Associated Aircraft. This is a purely British company and we will assume that it had expert management—as contrasted with the indifferent management by the Department of Munitions and Supply. The original contract was for eighty Hampden planes. On November 16, 1938, two and a half years ago, the progress schedule was two aeroplanes on December 31, 1939; four, January 1, 1940; and four a month down to March, 1940; then six in March, and six a month up to August, 1940, in which month production was to step up to eight a month.

On July 18, 1940, a revised schedule for the delivery of Hampden aircraft was made as follows: A schedule was prepared based on flight testing, because the contractor had no control over shipping dates. That is, they put out a new schedule by which they would flight test their planes. The first delivery was set back to July, 1940; one in July, two in August, three in September, four in October, five in November, and eight in December—a much more modest schedule.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was there a change in design?

Mr. HOWE: Changes in design are being made in connection with every aircraft. That schedule was stepped up to eleven in January, 1941; fourteen in February, and fifteen in March.

On August 27, 1940, this company was given an order for another eighty planes of the same type, so its orders to date are for 160 planes. There is no use in giving very much more of this. Up to date this company has shipped to England eight aeroplanes, and I think they have two more flight tested and ready to deliver.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a British contract?

Mr. HOWE: It is a British-owned company and this is a British contract. I once again say that the owners of the company in Canada are the aircraft men who thought that we should disband Federal Aircraft and put it in their hands.

Canada Car and Foundry company are, I think, the leading aircraft builders in Canada at the moment. They have had, up to this time, contracts of a value of $29,574,000. They have delivered to a value of $5,715,000, and there is outstanding $23,859,000 worth.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How many of these were for the Canadian government and how many for the British government?

Mr. HOWE: All these orders were placed by the Canadian government. Some of these planes were ordered for Canadian account, but when Britain was having difficulties in obtaining sufficient planes we turned our order over to Britain. The output of the plant has all gone to Britain although the early orders were placed for the account of Canada and for use in Canada. To date I think all the planes have gone forward to Britain.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. JACKMAN: Were they engined in Canada or sent over to be engined in Britain?

Mr. HOWE: They use an engine not made on this continent, and they were sent over to Britain without engines.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Did the contract call for a unit price?

Mr. HOWE: No; a target price.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is the basis of the contract for these planes?

Mr. HOWE: I would prefer to come to that later. I have a long way to go yet and the afternoon is wearing on, but I shall be glad to lay the contract on the table. Substantial deliveries have been made under this contract. I think they are delivering at this time at the rate of between twelve and fifteen aeroplanes a week, or better than two a day, which is pretty well up to schedule.

Canadian Vickers Limited. This firm have had contracts of $5,989,000; they delivered planes to the value of $2,664,000, and they have outstanding orders in the amount of $3,253,000. The original contract was for four Deltas, and those four were duly delivered. They have got a contract for two Stranraer boats.

Mr. MacNICOL: If I might interject, it would be more helpful to the committee if they knew in each case, assuming the information is available for the public, what aeroplanes the minister is referring to. For instance, Canada Car and Foundry company; is the plane a Hurricane, or what?

Mr. HOWE: A Hawker-Hurricane, yes; and the other is a Northrop Delta. The first contract was for four of those, which were duly delivered. The second contract was for two Stranraer flying boats, which have been delivered. There was another contract for four Deltas, which were duly delivered; also a contract for three Stranraer flying boats, and another for nine Deltas, all of which were delivered. Next, a contract for six Stranraer boats, three of which have been delivered. A contract for another twelve Stranraer boats, which are not delivered; and since then a contract for another eighteen Stranraer boats.

The de Havilland Aircraft Company of Canada, Limited, have had contracts of $8,068,000. They have delivered to this time finished planes in the amount of $2,028,000, and have outstanding $6,040,000. All these planes are Tiger Moths, and the company is well ahead of schedule. I cannot state, without doing some addition, exactly how many they have delivered, but substantially the number is about 350 to 400, and they have a large number to deliver.

Fairchild, manufacturing the Bristol Bolingbroke, have contracts totalling $12,150,000, on which they have delivered in the amount of $2,692,000. They have further deliveries to make of $9,457,000. I might add that this company have been given an open order for planes up to the end of 1942, with the understanding that they will advise us six months ahead when additional firm orders are required, and that they will be authorized to buy equipment at that time. To date, they have delivered nineteen aircraft, and it is stated in this telegram, February 24th, aircraft to be delivered on March 1st, and at the rate of fifteen per month thereafter. That, I believe, is the latest information on delivery from that plant—fifteen per month.

Fleet company had orders in the amount of $11,165,000. They have delivered to the amount of $3,292,000 and have outstanding orders of $7,872,000. They are making two types of planes. One is the Fleet primary trainer, "Fleet Finch" as it is called, and deliveries of that are substantially up to date. The order, I believe, was for 404, and practically all have been delivered. Fleet undertook some time last June to build an advanced trainer called the Fleet 60. The trainer at that time had been fully designed and fully test flown, and delivery was to be made beginning November, 1940. The first plane is yet to be delivered, but I am told that the manufacturing is well in hand and that deliveries will start early in March. But there is a case in point, where a firm which started with a plane that had been designed and test flown was three months late in its initial delivery. I may say that that is our experience, that we have never had an initial delivery at the time that was promised by the industry or by the time we thought we reasonably could expect to have it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister wants to be fair to these industries, I suppose. In the case of delays such as that, would he indicate whether there were changes in design, difficulties in getting the drawings of the new designs?—because I am told that in most cases that has been the cause of the delay.

Mr. HOWE: In this case it was a plane designed by the Fleet Company of Canada itself, and everything has been under the control of the Fleet company. I know of no such cause of delay in this case. But of course, on planes of British design, where the designs have come from England, there have been endless delays and great trouble on that account.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was one of the causes of the delay with regard to the Avro Anson?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, it has been a very serious cause. I will discuss that one separately; it has had sufficient publicity to deserve it.

National Steel Car has orders up to the present time of $19,868,000. They have delivered up to date $3,965,000, and have orders outstanding of $15,902,000.

Mr. JACKMAN: That includes the British orders?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. These are largely Canadian orders. There is a British order in there of 150 Lysanders.

Mr. JACKMAN: There is a pre-war order, I take it.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: Would the minister let us know exactly what he means when he says that "planes" or "aircraft" are delivered? Does he mean the fuselages with the wings? In some cases orders would also include the engine and the instrument board and other accessories which are vital to it. Could he be more exact in the terminology?

Mr. HOWE: I mean by "aircraft" delivered that they are delivered as they are ordered to be delivered. If they are ordered with engines they are delivered with engines; if they are ordered without engines they are delivered without engines. Generally speaking, if a plane is built for British account it is built without the engine. Obviously if it uses a British engine it would be foolish to ship the British engine over to this side for installation and then back to England. If it is ordered for Canadian delivery, of course it is delivered with the engine. That is also true of the training craft.

Mr. NICHOLSON: On page 922 of Hansard the minister stated "The first plane has been flown but it has not been delivered." Would the minister please advise the committee just what parts of the plane were made in Canada?

Mr. HOWE: If the hon. member will permit me, I will give complete information on that when I come to the Avro Anson.

One of the attacks which has been frequently made on the department is that National Steel Car corporation cannot work to capacity because it has no orders. They say National Steel Car are using only half the plant, and they feel badly about it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Who made that charge? I never did.

Mr. HOWE: It has not been made in this house but it has been made in editorial comment and in articles, particularly in the Financial Post, that only half the capacity of the National Steel Car plant was being used.

With $19,000,000 of orders, many of them outstanding a long time, nothing being very recent, I do not think there is room for complaint. I will admit that we called upon them to do a good deal of odds and ends, assembling planes built in the United States and building components; nevertheless the output of finished planes has been very disappointing and there is no foundation for the charge that they have not been given work to keep their facilities fully occupied. The orders amounted to $19,800,000 and the finished products represent only $3,900,000. Therefore the charge that there is not sufficient work there hardly stands up.

Mr. JACKMAN: I presume the minister will tell us of the difficulties in some of these plants. I hear rumours that in the early days National Steel Car had to work under more severe labour regulations than the other aircraft plants. Is it the minister's intention to discuss these complaints now or later?

Mr. HOWE: I shall be glad to answer all the questions I can, but it is news to me that the labour conditions in that plant are different from the conditions in others. I am sure it is not true.

Mr. JACKMAN: I am not saying now; but in the early stages the limitation of hours was greater in the National Steel Car plant than in other plants, with the result that National Steel Car lost a great many of their skilled workers to the other aircraft companies.

Mr. HOWE: I should like to carry on without interruptions, if I may. We are in committee and questions can be answered later.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I appreciate the minister's desire to proceed without interruption, and I will not be a sinner in this respect. The charge made with respect to the National Steel Car and others was not confined entirely to the Financial Post. Does not the same thing appear in the Winnipeg Free Press?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, let us name them all.

Mr. HOWE: I should be glad to name them all if I knew them all, but they come so thick and fast and I have not my catalogue with me.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You have one catalogue with you.

Mr. HOWE: Next we come to Noorduyn Aviation. This firm was started on the training programme and it is referred to in Mac-Millan's report as very efficiently operated. I am sure it is. They have contracts for about 45 Norsemen, planes used in training and transport work, and 210 Harvard trainers. That is a standard single engine advanced trainer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is an intermediate trainer.

Mr. HOWE: It is an advanced trainer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They call it an intermediate trainer.

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps so, but it is supposed to be the most advanced single engine trainer. We call it advanced, but that does not matter. Here again we have a company that has been working very efficiently since their first contract. The first Harvard contract is dated December, 1940, but the actual arrangements were made in May, 1940. It is the first of the advanced trainer contracts and they expect to be in production on Harvards by November. The first Harvard has been delivered in the last few weeks.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That contract was not given until after June.

Mr. HOWE: No, it was before June. We always anticipated Canadian production of a certain number of Harvards. We bought some in the United States and some here for British account.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understand they were trying to get contracts for two years.

Mr. HOWE: They got their first real chance on Harvard production. They were chosen as exclusive contractor for Harvards and they have an efficient operation. They are coming into production and we expect that they will do well.

That covers the manufacturing field. I shall be glad to answer questions at another time, but just now I wish to discuss the much maligned Anson programme, the history of which is this. As hon. members know, it was never contemplated, when the air training programme was drawn up, that Canada would provide any advanced trainer aeroplanes. The expense of the plan was to be borne largely by Canada, with some help from Australia and New Zealand, and the British contribution was to consist in the furnishing of all aircraft needed in training, with the exception of primary trainers—that is, the Fleet Finch and the de Havilland Moth. Therefore in the early stages no plans had been made for providing any intermediate or advanced aircraft in Canada. Britain specified that the payment would be in kind and that such aircraft would be shipped to Canada, the only exception being in the case of the Harvard trainer. Britain had no exact equivalent of that trainer and therefore purchased some 600 aeroplanes in the United States for shipment to Canada to fulfil their obligation, arranging for Canadian production of 210 planes of the same type in Canada. However, Canada's responsibility in the matter of planes was confined entirely to Fleet Finch primary trainers and de Havilland Moth primary trainers. Orders were duly placed for these trainers and they have come forward on schedule. These trainers were well within the capabilities of these two firms and there has been no delay in delivery.

After the fall of France the situation changed entirely. We were notified out of the blue that for two months at least Britain could not ship any trainer planes to Canada and that at the end of two months she would consider whether it would then be possible to ship trainer planes to this country. That threw upon the department of munitions the responsibility for suddenly purchasing planes sufficient to carry on the work of the joint air training plan. The first step was to protect ourselves on engines. I went to the United States immediately, the day after the cable arrived, and I was able to purchase for Canada complete production of one United States engine factory, which undertook to enlarge its facilities to produce engines to meet the schedule that we had to provide in order to pick up the air training plan and safeguard against complete failure. These engines are being delivered on schedule. They are about even on schedule now, and that purchase really did more to save the situation than anything done at that time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the Jacobs engine?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. We have under contract about 5,000 of these and every one will be required. Then as a temporary measure we bought some second-hand twin-engine planes in the United States. We bought anything we could buy that was serviceable, and we tried to buy it at a fair price and bring it into Canada, to tide over the immediate situation.

We then began looking to the long range situation. We were able to arrange production for a certain number of aeroplanes in the United States to tide us over until we could bring in Canadian production. We looked at the twin-engine trainer situation and decided that we could not do better than to use the Anson plane as a twin-engine trainer, with the understanding that it must be redesigned to fit Canadian construction methods if we hoped to get any production whatever, and having in mind the fact that the air force asked for certain modifications of the plane before it was produced in Canada.

At the same time, as I have said, we arranged for the production of the Fleet 60, which was of Canadian design, which had been test flown in Canada at that time, and which we hoped to have in production in November. We also did what we could in Canada to step up production of the Harvard plane, and to advance delivery of the first planes on that order. We provided for extension of the plant, and other facilities which we hoped would have that effect.

Our main task, however, was to provide 1,500 Anson trainers, and provide them in time, so that the temporary situation we had worked out in connection with the delivery of United States planes would bridge the gap, and as a result we would have no break in the air training programme. At that time we were faced with the fact that the aircraft industry in Canada, a much smaller industry than it is to-day, were fully engaged with pressing work of their own. De Havilland at that time was going full-out in the production of Moth planes, which were badly needed. Fleet was going full-out in the production of primary trainers. Both these plane companies were working on the largest orders in their history. Other plants were not at that time organized to a point where we could go to them and say, "We want you to arrange for the quick production of 1,500 Avro-Anson planes.

We studied the situation very carefully at that time. Mr. Sanderson was then in charge of aircraft production for the Department of Munitions and Supply, and Mr. Bell had just been brought into the department. After very careful examination, and on their recommendation we decided that the only practical way of organizing that huge production in Canada was to form a wholly government-owned company which would take the responsibility for the redesign of the aircraft, which would apportion construction of the planes among the industry—going outside the usual aircraft companies, because they at that time were loaded up—and which could break new ground in bringing in additional capacity in the industry to produce the planes.

The result was that a company with headquarters at Montreal was formed. The first president was Mr. Ralph Bell. Associated with him as directors were Sydney Dawes, president and managing director of the Atlas Construction Company; Blair Gordon, managing director of Dominion Textiles Company and other companies; Russell Smith, secretary-treasurer of Canadian Industries Limited; Miller Hyde, of the firm of MacDougall, MacFarlane, lawyers; Allen Aiken, director of Price Brothers, with the president of the Aircraft Construction Association, itself, as general manager.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the name of the company about which the minister is speaking?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Federal Aircraft.

Mr. HOWE: I have a very bad memory for names. I should remember that man's name, because I have had enough dealings with him.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the minister cannot remember, it is all right.

Mr. HOWE: I am talking about Federal Aircraft.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The first general manager of Federal Aircraft.

Mr. HOWE: Organization proceeded. It was soon obvious that Mr. Bell could not act as president of the Federal company in Montreal, and as director of aircraft production in Ottawa. With that in mind, I offered him a choice of one position or the other, and he chose to stay on as director general of aircraft production in Ottawa. His place in Federal Aircraft was filled by Mr. Ray Lawson of London, who had an excellent record in similar types of manufacturing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What types of manufacturing? He was a printer, a lithographer; that is what he was.

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps so.

Mr. MacNICOL: London, England, or London, Ontario?

Mr. HOWE: He was director of an imposing list of manufacturing companies. In fact I notice my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Rowe) chose him as a director of his company at the head of the lakes. He is also a director of the Royal bank. I assume the hon. member (Mr. Rowe) chose him for his manufacturing ability.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a good recommendation, but it does not say he could make aircraft.

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps not; but none of these men could make aircraft, and there were very few men in Canada who could.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think that is correct.

Mr. HOWE: That is what one has to contend with when dealing with a mushroom industry.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): An efficient and reputable character.

Mr. HOWE: I now remember that the name of the first general manager was Mr. R. J. Moffett. The first promise of delivery we obtained from this company was given in the middle of November. I might say that the company was formed on July 19, 1940.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before the minister proceeds, would he please make it clear that Federal Aircraft Limited, itself, was not a manufacturing company?

Mr. HOWE: I will explain that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They were not to make planes at all.

Mr. HOWE: I will explain that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They were to help forward the effort, and to supply certain materials and parts—very important parts. Let us have that whole picture so that the public will know it.

Mr. HOWE: I am coming to that, but I am trying to get the company formed, first.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is nothing to laugh at.

Mr. HOWE: According to my notes, the company was formed on July 19, 1940. The first promise of delivery—and I would ask hon. members to remember this—was made in the middle of November, 1940. I was pressing for some indication as to when we could expect deliveries to begin. At that time Federal advised the minister, "The first Anson will fly in March, and substantial production by June or July."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister say there is a contract between the company and the department?

Mr. HOWE: That is right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Let us have a consecutive statement.

The CHAIRMAN: I would point out to the committee that the minister has the floor and has already requested that there be no interruptions. While he has the floor, no one may interrupt him without his permission.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All right.

The CHAIRMAN: The minister has requested that he be allowed to make his statement.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Very well.

Mr. HOWE: This was a wholly owned government company. Its purpose was to take from the government the responsibility of placing orders for aircraft production, and placing orders for assembly. In other words, it was just to mobilize the industry to produce Anson aircraft planes. That is the intention of it, although its first job was to redesign the Anson plane.

I think its first and most serious mistake was that the magnitude of that job was underestimated. It was only in the later period when that was discovered, and when the general managership was put in other hands, that we finally got the design to a place where the subcontractors could go full-out on certain parts of the operation.

My hon. friend said this company was not set up to manufacture aeroplanes. That is true, but strong representations were made to me by the president and his board of directors, on the recommendation and I think on the insistence of the then general manager, that Federal should be permitted to run a small manufacturing operation of its own in the city of Montreal in connection with the operations of the company. The reasons advanced to me were that in aircraft design it was necessary to be able to follow the designing work with the actual manufacture, and I was advised that this could not be done as well in another plant. I was also advised that it was desirable to have the company itself build its first flying mock-up, as it is called, of the final craft, complete with engine and propellor, so that its performance could be tested. I agreed to that somewhat reluctantly, because I was very anxious that the government itself should keep away from manufacturing problems. I brought the entire board of directors to Ottawa at the time and tried to convince them that they could accomplish the desired results in another way. However, they were insistent, and to-day they have a small manufacturing operation of their own, building Anson fuselages in Montreal. This small operation is carried on in rented premises and is not important in regard to the entire programme.

The company has carried on, and a great number of subcontracts have been awarded. Direct subcontracts were let to Boeing of Vancouver, MacDonald Brothers of Winnipeg, Canada Car and Foundry of Montreal and Amherst, Cockshutt Plow of Brantford, Massey Harris of Toronto, de Havilland of Toronto, and Ottawa Car and Aircraft of Ottawa. Arising out of these contracts there is a vast list of component manufacturers, as naturally there always are in the aircraft industry. I have here perhaps twenty or thirty closely typed sheets of names of manufacturers producing components.

The work taken on by this company was of great magnitude. I think it is fair comment to say that in the early stages the directors were a bit at sea. They had to rely pretty well on Mr. Moffett, the general manager, who, as I have said, was head of the aircraft industry at that time, and whom I had always heard mentioned as the number one aeroplane designer in Canada. He had been formerly employed by Vickers, and I think was responsible for bringing Vickers into the manufacture of the Stranraer flying boats and the Delta. I do not wish to cast any aspersions or in any way reflect on Mr. Moffett's work, because I know he gave the job every ounce of energy he possessed; but it turned out, as I think Mr. Moffett would agree, as it often does, that while he was a first class designer he was not a good executive, and perhaps the directors did not realize this as soon as they should. However, he was released and the change was made. The directors went to the Canadian Pacific Railway and secured the full-time services of its chief mechanical engineer, Mr. Newman. I know little about Mr. Newman's designing ability but I will say that he is one of the best executives I have seen in action since I have been connected with this particular work. Mr. Newman has pulled this affair together in what I consider a marvellous way, and to-day I believe the Anson programme is well on its way.

As I have said, both within and without this house people have blamed the non-delivery of Ansons for the fact that our air training programme is somewhat short of twin-engine trainers. In our most optimistic moments we never expected that we would get any substantial production of Avro-Anson planes until March; and in our calculations endeavouring to cover the field we had never dreamed that we would get Canadian-built Avro-Ansons until that time. The first promise of the company, made as I say in November, after they had a chance to look over the job, was that they would fly a plane in March and make substantial deliveries in June and July. I have every reason to believe that this promise will be carried out. That was also Mr. MacMillan's view. He said it might be a little later than July, but that if we took a few steps which he recommended they should do better than that. Those steps have been taken, and I think we will do much better; but there again that is only my own statement. I do not wish to bind the company to anything more than the promise they made in November, 1940, that there would be substantial production of Avro-Ansons in June and July. A Canadian built Avro-Anson has flown, with a Jacobs engine and a Canadian-built propellor.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was just a plane assembled here, was it not?

Mr. HOWE: There were certain English components in it; it was part English and part Canadian. The flight was made to try out certain components, particularly the Jacobs engine and the Canadian propellor. The flight was eminently satisfactory, and we have no doubt that this programme will pull itself together and that we will get aeroplanes about according to our expectations of last November.

We should place responsibility where responsibility is due. At various stages of our experience with aircraft we thought we knew the demand and made our plans accordingly. When the air training agreement was entered into in December, 1939, we thought we knew the requirements of Canadian production in connection with that programme, and we proceeded to contract for them. In June we had new obligations placed upon us, and we thought we understood the extent of those new obligations. We thought then we had the schedule under which the various schools would open, and we thought we knew when planes would be required from this department. Well, as hon. gentlemen know, due to the energetic prosecution of that plan by my colleague the Minister of National Defence for Air the programme has been greatly speeded up; new schools have been brought into operation six months ahead of schedule. This has meant, of course, that they require planes six months sooner than we had expected, and I may admit that we have had our troubles in keeping up with that advanced schedule. We have never complained. I hope I shall always be the last to attempt to slow down any of my colleagues in getting on with this war. I never say it cannot be done; I always say, "We will give it a try," and that was what I said to my colleague when he consulted me about speeding up his scheme. I said, "We will do our best. I do not think it will be too bad. We may not give you all the planes, but I think we can keep you going," and I think we have done that up to this time.

A short time ago the minister for air said he was on the ragged edge for twin engine trainers. So he is, but it will not be long until we will have Canadian production in ample volume, so that will be a temporary condition. I suppose for the next three or four months he will be rather short of twin engine trainers. I do not think he will ever be very short of single engine trainers, and if it is necessary to do so it is not a serious matter temporarily to change over some of the schools from twin engine trainers to single engine trainers. Nevertheless, that condition exists. I am the first to admit it, but I should like hon. members to be fair enough to see that the problem has changed from time to time, as war problems always do and always will. War is an abnormal condition; the tide of war changes from day to day, and our service ministers must take that into account.

There we have the Anson programme as it stands to-day. I think that is a reasonably complete statement on it. At a later stage in the committee I shall be glad to answer any specific questions. I wonder if, in the light of what I have said, my hon. friend will say that his press release is a fair statement of the position? This is an extraordinary statement which appeared in the Montreal Star and which I understand is a reprint of the press release of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson). I do not know on just what date it appeared, but it was the day following the statement in the house. The report reads:

> At the request of the minister on or about the 7th of January the manufacturers submitted to the acting minister an unanimous recommendation as to what should be done. I have not been able to get a copy of this report, but I understand it urged:

The four recommendations are then set out. Then the exact wording of the letter is quoted. This indicates that my hon. friend did not prepare this statement himself.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no quotation of my remark.

Mr. HOWE: It urged:

> 1. That Federal Aircraft, Limited, be dissolved;
> 2. That de Havilland Aircraft of Canada be asked to manage or administer, for the Department of Munitions and Supply, the Avro-Anson project, taking over the personnel, materials, records, etc., of Federal Aircraft;
> 3. That de Havilland Aircraft assume responsibility for engineering and procurement of materials;
> 4. That the Department of Munitions and Supply take over the contractual and financial obligations and the financial functions of Federal Aircraft.

Let me read the letter to see if my hon. friend sees any difference.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I believe the minister wants to be fair. I do not see any sign that I was quoting from an original copy, and I did not do it. What I said was this:

> At the request of the minister, on or about the 7th of January, the manufacturers submitted to the acting minister an unanimous recommendation as to what should be done. I have not been able to get a copy of this report, but I understand that it urged:

I then epitomized them.

Mr. HOWE: This is what the letter said. We will see how much my hon. friend epitomized them. The letter reads:

Following the request of the Acting Minister of Munitions and Supply for the opinion of the undersigned as to how the Anson project can be expedited, the following unanimous recommendations are submitted:

1. Federal Aircraft Limited to be dissolved;

2. de Havilland to be asked to manage (or administer) for the department, the Anson project, taking over the personnel, material, records, et cetera, of Federal Aircraft Limited forthwith;

3. de Havilland to assume responsibility for engineering and procurement of material;

4. These functions of de Havilland not to include the taking over of Federal Aircraft Limited's financial obligations (other than for material) or financial functions or contractual obligations; all of which the department can handle best.

5. Contracts for components, etc., made henceforward to be with the department.

I do not see any difference in the language.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Number five is not in mine, and the others are exactly the same.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend can epitomize by leaving out number five.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not have it in.

Mr. HOWE: I know my hon. friend did not have it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am content to stand on my statement. I should like to have the letter produced.

Mr. HOWE: I propose to table all three letters.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has the minister the report or statement which was presented to the acting minister?

Mr. HOWE: I have just tabled it.

Mr. MacNICOL: And which is quoted in the January 7 issue of the Financial Post. Does the minister say that the statement of January 7 is wrong?

Mr. HOWE: I say that it is absolutely correct, word for word. I continue with the report from the Montreal Star:

I understand the matter was given attention by the chairman of the war-time requirements board, and a leading executive in aircraft production in the United States was asked to come to Canada to investigate the situation and to give his advice, and I am informed that his views were in agreement with those of the Canadian manufacturers and confirmed the hopelessness of the Federal Aircraft situation in its present state, and that, on the basis of this report, the chairman of the board recommended to the government that Federal Aircraft be abolished.

My hon. friend admits that that is a very slender foundation for that, apart from the Financial Post.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I have the best authority for that. I have it from one of the executives.

Mr. HOWE: Who was it?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is my business. I am not going to divulge his name.

Mr. HOWE: Does my hon. friend mean one of the three men who have been named, Mr. MacMillan, Mr. Carmichael or Mr. Breech?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not name anyone.

Mr. HOWE: Surely I am entitled to that information. He is an executive of what?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): One of the executives of the aeroplane manufacturers.

Mr. HOWE: He would not know, unfortunately.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He would if he talked to these people.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend got it in a rather devious way, at least.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I object to that; I got it in a perfectly honourable way.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend got it second or third hand at least.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I could not see Mr. MacMillan. If he had been here I would have seen him.

Mr. HOWE: Does my hon. friend think he would have told him?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think he would have been frank and honourable with me.

Mr. HOWE: From the inception of the Department of Munitions and Supply the executives and employees of that department have taken an oath of secrecy that they will not divulge the business of the department to others. I hope and believe that Mr. MacMillan would not have violated his oath of secrecy. The report goes on to say:

He went on to make a forecast of production which is considered by aircraft manufacturers to be a little short of fantastic.

The forecast that I made was the forecast given me in November and it was confirmed by Mr. MacMillan in his report, to which reference is made. The firms were requested by me to answer three questions:

1. Will the taking of the steps you recommended, in your opinion, accelerate the production of Ansons in Canada, and, if so, to what extent?

2. On what facts do you base your opinions in this regard?

3. What guarantee can you and your group give as to a date when substantial deliveries of Anson planes will be made, provided your recommendations are adopted?

That is true. That is exactly the letter I wrote. Then my hon. friend was advised of the joint reply.

I wonder if it is good business to publish reports of that kind based upon that type of information? What has been the effect of the report? It has seriously disturbed public opinion across Canada in connection with the whole aircraft industry. Statements have been made that our aircraft industry is bogged down, that we are making no contribution whatever. I do not think those reports are justified. What effect has it had upon the seven gentlemen who are giving their time without recompense as president and directors of Federal Aircraft Limited? What effect has it had upon Mr. Newman, who left his job with the Canadian Pacific Railway to give his full time to this work as general manager? These gentlemen tell me that they find it very difficult to hold their staff together. The members of the staff were quite certain that they would soon be out of a job and a good many resignations were handed in by key men.

What has been the effect of this upon Mr. MacMillan? Let us talk about Mr. MacMillan, since his name has been mentioned a good deal. Before he left Ottawa he remarked to me that he was being sabotaged, and I agreed with him. The story was put out that he had quarrelled with me when as a matter of fact there has been no quarrel. At any time when we were both in Ottawa Mr. MacMillan has been in my office every day since my return, and we have discussed many problems. He has made certain recommendations all of which I think have been accepted in whole or in part. He went to Vancouver to attend the marriage of his daughter and I understand he is now on his way back to Ottawa. But suppose the report had been true; suppose we had had a quarrel. Mr. MacMillan did not resign, and I am the head of the department, and as long as I have the responsibility I am going to assume the authority.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the minister allow me a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I will ask it later.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. HOWE: Does anyone suggest that a senior executive can quarrel with me and still continue to work with the department? I set the policy of the department, and if any executive does not follow it, he has no option but to resign. And what has been said puts Mr. MacMillan in the position of having quarreled with me, of having disagreed with my policies perhaps entirely, and still carrying on his work! No such thing ever happened, but from all the press statements could any other conclusion have been drawn?

Let us see what else was said. I have seen one or two typewritten copies of what purported to be intimate conversations between Mr. MacMillan and one of his friends. One of these copies went into two or three newspaper offices and finally was the foundation of an editorial in the Globe and Mail. I do not believe these conversations ever took place. The executive of a department takes an oath of secrecy about the affairs of the department. That has been done since the beginning of the war. It was made obligatory by order in council, a copy of which I have in my hand. We have forty or fifty executives of the class of Mr. MacMillan—heads of large corporations—all working anonymously in the department, all under an oath of secrecy and all carrying out their oath. What position does it put Mr. MacMillan in with his fellow executives in the department when he is headlined in the newspapers about talking to this man and that man, and about secret memos of conversations? Does it improve his position in the department or with the people of Canada? I do not think it does. If he were the kind of man he is being represented to be I do not think any member would suggest that he should stay in the department. And I want him to stay in the department because I am sure he is not that kind of man.

I could go on and indicate other methods of sabotage that have been used on Mr. MacMillan, but I do not think it is necessary. Anyone who reads these articles on Mr. MacMillan will agree that they do not enhance his power to be of use to the Dominion of Canada in the present circumstances.

The history of Mr. MacMillan is this. I asked him to come to Ottawa last June to take a very responsible job in the Department of Munitions. He took on the job of timber controller. Within a week or two after he took hold, we were faced with an acute situation with respect to timber and it required a good deal of organizing to produce the necessary timber. Mr. MacMillan did that job splendidly, and I have had occasion more than once, speaking in this house, to comment on the work he did as timber controller to bring about our objective.

Later our statistics branch, which is charged with the duty of looking ahead with respect to our war production so that it can advise us of possible shortages of material, labour supply and all the problems that must be envisioned to plan our course intelligently, decided that their work should be widened by the establishment of a committee to take in every department of government which had information which they thought was necessary to arrive at their conclusions. The result was that the war-time requirements board was formed in my department, with Mr. MacMillan as chairman, reporting to myself, and comprising representatives of the Bank of Canada, the Department of Finance, the Department of Labour and the three service departments. After he accepted the chairmanship Mr. MacMillan decided that he wanted to make it a full-time job; he resigned as timber controller, and has been carrying on the work of the board ever since.

There is hardly a paper published which has not stated that Mr. MacMillan said this or said that about the work of the board. With Mr. MacMillan on that board are eight or nine responsible senior civil servants. Does anyone think it improves Mr. MacMillan's relations with his fellow members on that board when this sort of thing gets into the newspapers before the board has had a chance to report or even to find out what the chairman is doing in certain directions? I think not. I think the job of sabotaging Mr. MacMillan has been fairly successfully done, but I hope he is able and big enough, and I think he is, to live it down and to continue to carry on the very useful work he is doing for this government and for Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the minister now allow me a question?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, certainly.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does he suggest that at any time I or any other hon. member attempted to sabotage Mr. MacMillan in any way whatsoever?

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend in his newspaper statement said that he understands that Mr. MacMillan—at all events in the house my hon. friend used Mr. MacMillan's name.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, I have, but not by the widest stretch of the imagination was there any suggestion of sabotage.

Mr. HOWE: But what is the implication? The hon. member referred to a secret report that Mr. MacMillan made as chairman of the war-time requirements board to the war committee of the cabinet and told what the contents of the report were. Is that a reflection on Mr. MacMillan or not, that he would put in a secret report the contents of which would be on the street before we had seen it? I would say that that constitutes a reflection on Mr. MacMillan.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think so for a minute. Perhaps it is a reflection on somebody else.

Mr. HOWE: The newspapers had it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They had it long before I had it.

Mr. HOWE: Discussing the question of sabotage, there have been vicious editorials in the papers based not on fact but on hearsay, street rumours, private conversations with somebody in the government. I want to say that every reporter in Ottawa has access to my office. I am willing to hold a press conference any day that a sufficient number of newspaper men would like to meet me. I do not think the press gallery will accuse me of holding back information at press conferences so long as it was information that I could furnish without giving away secrets that were not mine. I always talk freely at press conferences and to reporters who ask me about specific problems. But there has grown up quite a feeling in the press that any rumour about the department of munitions is worthy of publication. The leader in that has been the Financial Post. The Financial Post, not satisfied with its own circulation, is now purchasing space in other newspapers to print statements which I think I have shown to-day to be absolutely false. It was the Financial Post that attempted to stop Bren gun manufacture in this country before the war. I have no comment to make on what the Financial Post prints in its own paper, but when it pays money to buy space in other newspapers, as I understand it is doing, to make untrue and damaging statements against the Department of Munitions and Supply, I think I am right in suggesting that that is not being done for philanthropy.

I make this charge, and I do it after careful consideration with a full knowledge of the facts of which I speak: the number one saboteur in Canada since the beginning of this war is the Financial Post of Toronto.

I have taken up a good deal of the time of the committee. I have other material here, but having spoken for about two and a half hours I think perhaps I have done my day's work. I thank hon. members for the patient hearing they have given me. Before sitting down may I say that I shall be glad to amplify any statement I have made if any hon. member would like me to do so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): First, will the minister be good enough to table the letters to which he referred and which he promised he would table? Secondly, I should like to say this, that if the minister had been as frank in days gone by with the Canadian public as apparently he has been to-day—and I do not at the moment at all question his frankness; for I do not know the facts—I am sure that a very large part of the newspaper campaign about which he complains might have been obviated.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that the minister was in England when this campaign started—stabbing him behind his back when he was serving his country on a mission overseas.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not know when the campaign was started.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was started when the minister was in England. The purpose was to stab him behind his back, when he was absent from the country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why lecture me about it? I didn't start it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: You referred to the campaign.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Certainly I referred to the campaign. It was as a result—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not lecturing my hon. friend. I am stating the facts about the campaign against the minister.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Prime Minister can make his speech later. If we are going to have the rules applied to one, let us have them applied to all. I was making what I thought was a mild observation, that if the minister had been as frank in days gone by, in respect to the question of production, as apparently he has been to-day—and I am not questioning his frankness to-day because I do not know whether he has told us the whole truth or not; time alone will tell; I am accepting his statement as it is—a great many of the things of which he has complained to-day might have been obviated. That is just a trite observation.

I do not intend, of course, to follow the minister with any degree of precision in the lengthy statement he has made. That would be impossible, especially for one who, like myself, has no special knowledge of the aircraft industry. That is speaking frankly. I was pleased to see that in the opening part of his remarks the minister enumerated certain spheres of production in his department which are functioning well. That ought to be true, after eighteen months of war effort. Surely by that time, after an expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars and the assembling in Ottawa of some of the best executives in the country, that ought to be true.

May I pause here to say that never at any time, at any place, in any connection have the members of this party, or myself, or anybody connected with us, thrown the slightest aspersion upon the dollar-a-year men and other high executives whom this ministry has brought to Ottawa. On the other hand, I have complimented the minister upon the character of some of the men he had brought into the department whom I knew, and in particular this very gentleman, Mr. Ralph P. Bell, whom he made the first president of Federal Aircraft Limited. I think I know him as well as the minister does, and I have been more than anxious that his reputation should not suffer through his connection with Federal Aircraft. I will not go any further than that. The minister knows that.

Mr. HOWE: Yes. The hon. member said so in the past in the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, I certainly did, and I said privately to the minister that I was very anxious that Mr. Bell should be given a chance to do a job.

With respect to these gentlemen from one end of Canada to the other who have left their businesses and have come to Ottawa to give their time and their war effort to the government, I have taken the same position whenever an attack has been made upon them. Frankly, there has been but little attack made upon them in this house. I am glad to note that, with one or two exceptions, all confined to followers of the ministry of the day, there has not been the slightest attack on the character, the ability, or the operations of these men. My hon. friend from Essex East nods towards the far corner. I do not recall any attack having been made upon any of these gentlemen by any hon. member in that corner.

I am glad to know that neither by word, by innuendo or by any other method has there been the slightest attack made upon any of these gentlemen by any members of our party. On the contrary, I have gone out of my way to call the attention of members of the ministry, in confidence, from time to time as the occasion arose, to attacks which have been made by members supporting the government upon some of these high executives who have come in here. We had an explosion last week. We do not need to recall it. On the order paper to-day, in the name of a government member, is a series of questions relating to another man who is giving his whole time to a very important matter relating to the war effort of the government. Those questions are asked by one of the Liberal members from Toronto. I do not know all the truth of the matter, but I would say this to the members of the ministry, that when you ask a man of the standing of Mr. Cottrelle to come into the service of the government, without salary, that man's reputation should be preserved and defended against attack and calumny, because he cannot answer here.

Mr. HOWE: Right.

Mr. ILSLEY: Hear, hear.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Therefore, no blame can attach to this party, at all events, in connection with attacks on the executives and others with whom the minister is surrounded. I suggest to him that to assert that there has been sabotage by any person in this part of the house is absolutely false, and I repel the suggestion if it is intended.

I am not constituting myself a defender of newspapers. Believe me, that is too big a job for me. If the minister is wise he will watch his step when he attacks the newspapers. My experience has been that no matter how just your cause may be, how strongly right may be on your side, or how pure your conscience, the newspapers will always have the last word. Therefore I think it is a work of supererogation to attack them.

Mr. ROWE: Never attack one unless you own one.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I don't want to get into the newspaper business any more than the government wants to get into the business of aircraft manufacturing. I have a very wholesome respect for the newspapers—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Because they have the last word.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —because I have many years of experience; and I pass that philosophy on to the minister. He is, perhaps, not quite so old as I am.

Mr. HOWE: Getting on.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He has not been in public life as long, perhaps, as I have been, but if he will take it from me, it is much better to suffer in silence than to go ahead and fight those fellows when you cannot fight on your own ground.

Now, coming down to the immediate subject matter of this debate this afternoon, it arises, I assume, quite properly out of what I thought was a harmless and innocent statement which I was endeavouring to make in this house on February 20, at the request of the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black), who was greatly disturbed over the production of Avro-Anson aeroplanes as it affected his own community. That was the basis of the statement. I should much prefer that he had done it himself, and I want to assure the committee—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): After all, I do not know why there is laughter over that. The hon. member for Cumberland is a very fine member of this house. He is an old schoolmate of mine. My association with him goes back over a period of forty-six years and there is nothing he might ask me to do, short of dishonour, which I would not attempt to do for him.

An hon. MEMBER: He would not ask you to do anything dishonourable.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course not. On the theory that there had been a falling down in the production of Avro-Ansons especially by Canadian Car, if you will, and more particularly because it affects industry, labour and the well-being of the town of Amherst, which the hon. gentleman so ably represents in this house, and the air force of our country, I undertook to ask the government on February 20 certain questions which I based on a statement which I had reason to believe was true. And after the minister's analysis this afternoon I find that there is only one error of fact in the statement I made—only one. What was the statement I attempted to make on the afternoon of February 20, and which I was barred by the minister himself from making, and under the rules, to which I bow? After the first two paragraphs which I was allowed to read I was stopped. The request I made was for the purpose of asking the Minister of Munitions and Supply to make a public statement with respect to a matter of vital public importance, namely, the present unsatisfactory state of aircraft production in Canada, and particularly with respect to the alleged failure—"alleged" failure; that is a fair description—of the government wholly owned corporation, Federal Aircraft Limited, to function. That was the basis of my statement. I went on to say that I preferred to do it in this way rather than in another way. Perhaps I was wrong. Innocence will make mistakes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am very innocent about the method of approach in this house. The Prime Minister laughs at that. I wish I had his astuteness in political manoeuvres; I would be sitting there and he here. And I am paying him a high compliment indirectly.

Mr. POULIOT: The word "innocence" has several meanings.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I went on to say:

Federal Aircraft Limited was set up by the minister as a government-owned corporation to coordinate the construction of Avro-Anson planes—

That may not be the full statement of its set-up but it was one of the primary reasons for setting up the corporation, as the minister's statement to-day will bear out.

—and it assumed certain important functions with respect to procurement and later the manufacture of certain essential parts involving an expenditure of $50,000,000.

That has not been disputed and I am assuming that the minister is in agreement. He nods his head.

But for some reason or other unknown to the public, the efforts of this corporation have not produced results.

The minister's statement to-day bears out that general statement.

Mr. HOWE: It has produced all the results expected at this stage.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is a difference of opinion.

Mr. HOWE: They have not produced aeroplanes but they have produced results.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I may have one opinion and the minister another, and maybe his is better than mine. It ought to be, because he is assumed, of course, to have more knowledge than I could possibly have with regard to this matter. I will tell him this, however, that the statements which have appeared in public are based on statements made by the manufacturers themselves, and I understand they are prepared to stand by every word they said.

Mr. HOWE: That is not what they tell me.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am told one story, the minister tells another, and the newspapers another, but that is the information I have. Before I get through I intend to make some further observations with regard to that. Just now I am dealing with my own statement.

I am advised that around the end of the year, the acting Minister of Munitions and Supply—

The Minister of National Defence for Naval Affairs (Mr. Macdonald) was getting his feet under the table, I suppose, in the absence of the minister, and learning something about the operations of a huge department, which must have been an overpowering job for any new man to undertake.

—requested an opportunity to discuss aeroplane production problems with manufacturers interested in Anson bombers—

Is that true? I believe it is. I have never heard it denied. The minister is here and he will say whether that statement is true or false. I have no doubt it is true. The minister remains silent, and therefore—

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): What is the question?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I asked whether early in the year he did not request an opportunity to discuss aeroplane production problems with manufacturers interested in Anson bombers.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): In answer to my hon. friend's question, there was a discussion between the manufacturers of component parts of Avro-Anson bombers, on the one hand, and myself on the other. Whether I requested it or they requested it I am not sure. They came to Ottawa and requested to see me and I spent an hour or two with them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The substance of what I say is correct. I am not concerned whether they came to the minister or the minister went to them. Whatever the modus operandi may have been, the minister met them.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Quite so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, and they discussed aeroplane production problems at first hand over the plight of the Avro-Anson programme. My information is that this was the subject matter of the discussion and that the minister:

. . . requested the manufacturers to give him their specific suggestions as to how this situation, which was the responsibility of Federal Aircraft Limited, might be remedied.

That, I assume, is true. No sabotage about that; nothing improper in the statement with regard to that.

Mr. HOWE: I was not accusing my hon. friend of sabotage.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I thought the minister came near it. If he did not mean it, then he shivered on the edge of it.

Mr. HOWE: I said that MacMillan said that he was being sabotaged, and I said I shared that opinion, believing that the way in which his name was being used was a form of sabotage.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I got the inference, perhaps wrongly—and I am not very thin-skinned—that the minister was suggesting that I had sabotaged Mr. MacMillan, which of course is quite wrong, quite false. I had a good deal to do with Mr. MacMillan when he was timber controller. I want to say this to the minister, that I have not seen Mr. MacMillan personally on business since he took the position of chairman of the war-time requirements board. I have met him in the dining room at the Chateau Laurier, where we have had meals together—on more than one occasion—and where we chatted about everything. We avoided any business references, but I think if I wanted to see Mr. MacMillan he would see me.

Mr. HOWE: You suggested if you had seen him he would have told you all about it. I hope you never asked him to do that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In the light of what the minister has said about the question of oaths—and I had forgotten about it—I would not suggest for a minute that Mr. MacMillan would break his oath any more than I would suggest that the minister would break his. It may be I was wrong in having that impression. At all events I want to convey the impression that my relations with Mr. MacMillan were absolutely clean and above board. They always have been, and, I hope, always will be. On one occasion he was good enough to help a friend of mine in connection with a very important business transaction regarding timber. A question of United States exchange was involved. My friend is eternally grateful to Mr. MacMillan, and so am I.

But that is not the point at this time. These manufacturers—I am not sure how many there were, but I understand there were six—interviewed the acting minister at his request on or about January 7, and submitted to him a unanimous recommendation as to what should be done. I have not a copy of that report, but I was told what was in it. According to the minister's statement this afternoon I was not given the fifth item, but I was given the four items, which I put in my statement, and which the minister repeated here to-day almost verbatim.

Mr. HOWE: May I say that if my hon. friend did not have the facts he was the only one in Canada who did not. Every newspaper did.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I give my word I did not.

Mr. HOWE: Every newspaper man has had it. It was part of the contents of a paper, signed by Richard Guthrie, a man I do not know and have not been able to trace.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not know him either—never heard of him.

Mr. HOWE: Neither did I.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But these are the four recommendations which were made to the acting minister. There was a fifth to which the minister referred, but I cannot recall what it was. This is what I understand their recommendations were:

(1) that Federal Aircraft Limited be dissolved; (2) that de Havilland Aircraft of Canada be asked to manage or administer, for the Department of Munitions and Supply, the Avro-Anson project, taking over the personnel, materials, records, et cetera, of Federal Aircraft; (3) that de Havilland Aircraft assume responsibility for engineering and procurement of materials; (4) that the Department of Munitions and Supply take over the contractual and financial obligations and the financial functions of Federal Aircraft.

That is to say, the government was to assume responsibility for its own baby. There was a fifth, but I do not recall what the minister said it was. At all events I never had the statement in black and white, and I cannot say. The minister to-day, however, admits that that is a true statement of the position.

Mr. HOWE: I said that by an odd coincidence it was in the exact language of the letter.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This certainly was published more than once in the newspapers. Did not Mr. Grant Dexter send this to the Winnipeg Free Press? Was it not published there?

Mr. HOWE: I do not know.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It was in the Financial Post and in quite a number of newspapers. It is a matter of common knowledge that this happened, and what the contents of the letter were. I do not know who gave it to the press; I have not the faintest idea. I have not, and I never had, a copy of it. But I was seized of the contents of it.

This document was signed by the chief executives of the six corporations under contract with Federal Aircraft to manufacture these planes. The statement goes on to set out the names of those companies, as follows: Canadian Car and Foundry, Ottawa Car and Aircraft Limited, National Steel Car Corporation, de Havilland Aircraft, Boeing Aircraft of Canada, and Massey Harris Company, Limited.

I should like to be corrected if this is not a correct list. If there are any more, I should like to know who they were. That was their recommendation to the minister. I pause here to say it is my understanding that their reason for making these recommendations was that Federal Aircraft, notwithstanding the character of the management, had failed to arrive at its objective, and that these companies were being held up not only in the procurement of parts, but with regard to a multiplicity of things including supplies, materials and parts which Federal Aircraft was to have supplied to them.

But the biggest hurdle which had not been overcome was that of engineering data. I am told that the procuring of engineering data for planes was a very important part of the operations of Federal Aircraft, that there were more than twenty thousand blue-prints for one of these engines, and that there was great delay. I have some evidence that such is the case.

That may be excusable. As the minister has said, this was a new, mushroom enterprise in Canada. I refer to the construction of aircraft, and this type of aircraft particularly. It may have been excusable. But the delays were there, and these men were held back in the production of Avro-Anson aircraft. We were not told very fully to-day just what the causes of the delays were. It may be that personnel was not available—I do not know. That was what I was asking the minister to give to the House of Commons to-day—a factual, true statement of the whole position. That is what I asked for.

Is that an offence? Has the day arrived in Canada when a member of this house cannot rise in his place and ask the minister for information? If so, then of course we have reached the fascist state. But from the partial revelation made by the minister this afternoon, I find the government is not adhering to that policy to which it has heretofore adhered with regard to the question of production in terms of units.

Mr. HOWE: What is that?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In respect of aircraft production the government has departed from the strictly rigid policy which has obtained heretofore of not giving to the house and to the country statements of production in terms of units. We have been deluged with statements of production in terms of dollars and cents which to the layman, I suggest, do not mean anything but taxes.

Mr. HOWE: I may say that I am quite willing to give figures for anything produced for Canada which is not on the list of the things for which we have been asked to keep production figures confidential—and most of these planes are in that position. I shall be glad, if my hon. friend wishes to ask me, to give the production figures per unit, per month, going back as far as he likes. I have them here.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then this debate will have been worth while. We have not had the information. We have been consistently denied it; and one of the points upon which I have dwelt on more than one occasion in this chamber has been the fear of the government to tell us what they are doing with our money.

Mr. HOWE: I never have been asked for detailed figures on the production of planes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not for the production of planes, but I have asked for a statement, generally.

Mr. HOWE: I have said—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I will sit down.

Mr. HOWE: Time and again we have received cabled requests from the foreign office not to give production figures on a great many items. Our own forces also do not like this information to be given out. Since, however, the training programme is well under way, there is no great secret about it, and I shall be glad to give production figures for the training programme.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Now we are making a little progress. If the ministry cannot give all the details of the production in terms of units because of the request of the British government I will be the last man to ask for it; but they do it in Australia.

Mr. HOWE: Maybe so; they are not producing very much.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, that is a matter of opinion. I suggest they are a little bit ahead in aircraft production.

Mr. HOWE: Oh, no.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would think so.

Mr. HOWE: They are over here trying to buy some planes from us.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a matter of opinion, of course. Now I am trying to get a further statement, brought right down to date, about production in Australia.

Mr. HOWE: Get the number of units.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I will, if they will give it to me. It has been cabled for; I think it will be obtained, and I shall be glad to table it in the house.

Mr. HOWE: Let me see it when it comes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I will.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? I should like to preface it by making a statement—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, no; I don't think so. It is five minutes to six now.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): It will only take one minute.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Do not make the statement; just ask the question.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): The aircraft industry feel that the whole industry was included in the statement of the hon. gentleman the other day in regard to bogging down, and I do not think he intended that. I believe he intended to refer only to Federal.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is that? I was referring only to Federal.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): Did my hon. friend mean last Thursday that the whole aircraft industry of Canada had bogged down, or was he just referring to Federal? I think in fairness to himself and to the industry that might be cleared up.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course if the hon. gentleman had read my statement it would be quite clear to him I was only referring to Federal. I am glad to answer that question. I had no reference at all to the aircraft industry as a whole.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): Thank you very much.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): As a matter of fact I happen to know that for years before there was any action by this government the aircraft industry was trying to get the government interested in aircraft production in Canada, and in Avro-Ansons, without success. They were clamouring to get into the business.

Mr. HOWE: Never Avro-Ansons.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister took a view to which I am not unsympathetic. I am trying to express what I think was in his mind, and what to a cautious man like myself would be quite reasonable: Should we foster the building up of an aircraft industry in Canada in peace time? That is one of the first questions the minister would have to ask himself. I have often wondered whether, if Canada were starting over again, it would foster the manufacturing of motor cars in Canada. I have often asked myself that question, though I know that in certain quarters it is not popular even to ask it. I will say this, that we fostered this industry at great cost to the consuming public of Canada.

Mr. MARTIN: And with great advantage.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We did not start General Motors in Canada. Both parties are responsible for the fostering of the motor car industry in this country.

Mr. MARTIN: Thank God we have it to-day.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, I think that is the justification; but if we were starting over again in peace time would we commit ourselves to the expenditure we have had to make to build up the motor car industry in Canada? While I am on this point let me say that I agree with the hon. member's statement; thank God we have it to-day, because this is the one industry in Canada that has functioned.

Mr. HOWE: What does my hon. friend mean by "the one industry"?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am singling it out as the one big industry that has produced great results.

Mr. HOWE: There are many others.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Shipbuilding.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think the shipbuilding programme is at all comparable to the motor car production. The government itself is operating $14,000,000 worth of motor cars of all kinds in Canada to-day. It has been the biggest buyer of motor cars in the history of the country; and to-day it has so many cars on hand that it does not know what to do with them. If you go up to London I am told you can see a whole field full of new motor car units.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): They are in and out every day.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are lying in a field, never used.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): They are being moved in and out all the time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the hon. gentleman just keep his peace? He can make his statement later on.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I live a little closer to London than my hon. friend does.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is just an aside, in any event. I am going on with this statement, signed by these companies, to which I have referred. Then I understand that the matter came to the attention of the chairman of the war-time requirements board, and that he brought in a man from Detroit. There may be some difference of opinion here; if there is an incorrect statement in what I am saying I will be the first to acknowledge it, but at all events that much is true and has been corroborated by the minister to-day. The chairman of the war-time requirements board brought in from the United States a leading executive in aircraft production, Mr. Breech, head of one of the divisions of General Motors, to investigate the situation and give his advice. I am informed that his views were in agreement with those of the Canadian manufacturers, and confirmed the hopelessness of the Federal Aircraft situation. The minister did not traverse that point, but that statement is made to me by the head of one of these aircraft companies.

Mr. HOWE: I will say that statement is absolutely false.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I will say this—

Mr. HOWE: I do not say my hon. friend's statement is false; I say the information given him is absolutely false.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All right; let us investigate that. The statement was made by this gentleman to these men, and the minister was not present.

Mr. HOWE: Quite so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All right. This statement was made to me by one of those gentlemen who were present, when the minister was not; and he tells me that this man did make that statement. I am going to leave it there, but if I call a witness in court I take the man who was present, not the man who was not present. Surely that is elementary.

There was a little interlude here this afternoon with respect to a question asked by the hon. member for Lake Centre. I am going to ask the Minister of Finance if he has a copy of a letter said to have been written by Mr. Breech to Mr. Sloan of General Motors.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Did he ever have it?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. The first I ever heard of it was this afternoon.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All right. I don't know anything about it—

Mr. HOWE: Then why talk about it?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am asking the question of the minister; I was told he had it. He gives me his word, and that is the end of it. I do not know whether there was ever such a letter.

Mr. HOWE: If my hon. friend gets hold of it will he let me see it?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, I will promise that. Will my hon. friend do the same?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, I will.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All right; we will have reciprocity. I cannot possibly finish by six o'clock, so I think perhaps we had better report progress.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What will be the business to-morrow?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: To-morrow Mr. Speaker leaves the chair without question put on going into committee of supply, so we will take up supply, I hope at an early stage in the proceedings, the supply being that of the Minister of Justice and later that of the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will we not go on with this discussion to-morrow?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I think we have had enough of this for a short time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I thought this was very urgent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, perhaps it is less urgent that it was.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.
