I do not intend to go into the details of our military preparations which have been made so expeditiously and so adequately. I have tried to gather information along this line from the most authentic and authoritative sources, and I am glad to say that the factual recitations of the different ministers correspond absolutely with the information I have gleaned. I do not think anyone in this dominion can say that Canada is not contributing adequately, especially when he reads the pronouncements of the great statesmen of England and of other men who have to deal directly with this war effort, of men who have jurisdiction over the forces that are standing between tyranny and democracy. All these men express not only surprise but admiration, and render plaudits at the expeditious manner in which this contribution has been made. Surely this should be sufficient to make everyone confident that this government and this country are doing their bit, contributing not only the full commitments, but in many instances being far ahead of schedule.

I should like to refer to one other matter which may be regarded as being to some extent localized, or it may savour somewhat of criticism. If it was my intention to criticize, I do not know just where I should direct my criticism. I refer to what I regard as the maldistribution of our military projects. I understand that the selection of military sites is left to our war experts and that such selections are made with due consideration to the economic and strategic importance of the site chosen. Unfortunately certain sections of the dominion feel that they have been more or less penalized, and such is the case with the constituency which I represent.

The citizenship of my constituency is descended from French and Scotch forbears, with just enough Irish to make the racial mixture sparkle. In my constituency are to be found men who are as loyal as any in this great dominion. We have people just as ardent in furthering our war effort as any others, just as tolerant of the taxation burden. It may be because we are not economically and strategically located, but the fact is that we have had but a small part of the industrial projects having to do with our war contribution. I want to bring this matter to the attention of the responsible departments.

The people of my constituency are usually employed in fishing and farming, but last year the fisheries were a failure. To aggravate that economic condition, two mines, one a gypsum mine employing 100 men and the other a coal mine employing 200 men, were closed down for some reason or another. This left our people in a rather serious economic condition. If it were not for their pride and tolerance, I believe we would have to have in certain sections of my county what could be characterized as a relief measure.

At Port Hawkesbury the town owns a ten-acre field upon which aeroplanes have landed in emergencies. Adjoining that wide-open space are acres and acres of level land. It overlooks the strait of Canso, which should warrant its strategic importance. The town of Hawkesbury is willing to give this field to the government gratis. I feel that this is one proposal which should be brought to the attention of the experts in charge of the selection of sites, and if they should decide that it would not be suitable for a landing field, why not put up a large barracks there to house from 9,000 to 10,000 soldiers? It would make a splendid training ground for the troops, and even if the government did not want to train troops there, it would be a splendid place for the soldiers to play football and run foot races, which would be much better for them than being around the cities in beer parlours and such like. I bring this matter to the attention of the minister concerned and I ask the government of Canada to look into it and see if something cannot be done to allow our good people to participate in at least a fractional way in some of this war work.

[Mr. McGarry.]

As I said before, our people are tolerant, and I think the civilian population of Canada as a whole is tolerant. I believe that they know what the results of war will be. I believe that they regard war as I do and as every sensible man does, that they look upon it as the greatest crucible in the world into which is cast all the organized institutions of civilization and all the established institutions of national politics. They realize that no nation will be the same after this war, that the changes which will take place in the belligerent countries will obtain identically in the neutral countries. They do not know what the end of this war will be. They do not blame Britain or Canada for going into this war. There was nothing else for Britain to do. If she had offered no resistance to the fiendish and infamous programme of the dictatorial tyrants; if she had stood idly by and allowed them to run their fiendish course, the honour of Britain would have been betrayed and the trust of our dominions in her would have been put to shame. If Hitler and his hordes proved triumphant, our day of sorrow would soon follow and we would have nobody to assist us and very few to lament our fate.

So I say that our people to-day are tolerant and their hearts are in this cause. They are looking upon this conflict not as one of flesh against flesh but as one between two ideologies. On the one hand we have democracy, which accords to our people the prerogatives of freedom of the press, freedom of thought, freedom of action, freedom of assembly and the right to live decently. On the other we have dictatorship, which denies these prerogatives to the people. The purpose of the dictators is to trample down civilization and to destroy everything that is spiritual in man. That is the crisis we are up against. That is the crisis which the people realize that we are up against, and they are meeting it with the proper attitude. They are looking upon it as the greatest tragedy of carnage that ever obtained in this world, and the very ghost of that tragedy hovers over our own homes. Is it any wonder, then, that we Canadians who have enjoyed the prerogatives of democracy are calling up every reserve of strength and courage, of faith and fervour, in order to combat the tyrannical aggression of these satanic hordes who have gone mad with the lust for world domination? We who are Christians know that the Creator of all things is still in His realm and that He will see to it that eventually, although possibly not in our way, all will be well with the world.

In closing, I make reference to one matter which the previous speaker (Mr. Weir) mentioned, namely, free transportation for our soldiers. I am in favour of free transportation for our soldiers on long leave, such as Christmas leave, or, say one leave a year. When a soldier leaves his home he sacrifices his job, his civil liberties and the comforts of home. He goes out for what purpose? To see that we shall not be molested but that we shall remain free. We have men who are engaged on the railroads, who remain at home; they are not sacrificing their homes or their jobs or any of the liberties they have always enjoyed, but they are entitled to free railway passes not only for themselves but for their wives. This government has to contribute financial support to the railways, and I would say to the government, let the railways pay for their keep, and let us transport our soldiers home on long leave free of charge.

On motion of Mr. Abbott the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 10.58 p.m.

Tuesday, November 26, 1940.

The house met at three o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR OPPORTUNITY TO DEAL WITH QUESTIONS AND MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I would ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) if to-morrow he would be good enough to facilitate the answering of questions and the passing of formal motions for the production of papers, as he did a week ago.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think it can be arranged for to-morrow.

TRAFFIC CONTROL

PROVISION FOR SAFETY OF PEDESTRIANS CROSSING ROADWAY IN FRONT OF PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): May I direct the attention of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), who unfortunately is not here at the moment, to the danger, to pedestrians passing along the esplanade in front of these buildings, from, shall I say, thoughtless motorists. I had an experience of this kind to-day, and I have heard of others. If it is necessary to put a policeman on that esplanade to prevent people from driving too fast, let us do it; but I think something will have to be done. One of the senators was seriously injured the other evening, though at that time of course visibility was very poor. The incident to-day, however, was in broad daylight and I am not as agile as I once was. I should like to ask the minister if he will do something about this.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REFERENCE TO NEWSPAPER ITEM SETTING OUT QUALIFICATIONS REQUIRED OF RECRUITS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): During the course of the debate yesterday at page 379, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka) drew attention to an item appearing in the Edmonton Bulletin with regard to the recruiting of constables for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, containing these words:

Applicants must be single, of British racial origin.

Since this matter already has been commented upon by a section of the press I desire to make a statement concerning it.

Section 34 of the rules and regulations of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police reads as follows:

All candidates must be British subjects.

I desire to state that any British subject who has the other necessary qualifications may be enlisted in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, whatever may have been the racial characteristics of his forefathers. The commissioner, whose attention has been called to this item, is investigating as to who is responsible for the phraseology which appeared in the newspaper, which certainly is equivocal.

I may add that regulation 34, which requires that applicants must be British subjects, has been in the regulations since the inception of the force.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Monday, November 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Brooke Claxton for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Blackmore.

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (St. Antoine-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, it is now some two weeks since we listened to the speeches of the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Already they have received well-merited congratulations from all sides of the house, but for two reasons I should like to add my word of congratulation as well.

The first reason is that both speeches were of an exceptionally high order. The second reason is a more personal one. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton), who moved the address, is an old personal friend of mine and a former classmate at McGill University. We were both members of what we at any rate considered the famous class of law 1921; and in addition to some other outstanding characteristics, over three-quarters of that class consisted of men who had just returned from serving in the last war. Hon. members may not be aware of the fact that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George was the only member of our class who held the Distinguished Conduct Medal, awarded to him for gallantry while serving overseas. In addition to providing two new members for this House of Commons that class had a further distinction, in that it furnished the first governor of the Bank of Canada in the person of Mr. Graham Towers. I would hasten to add that even twenty years ago Mr. Towers showed the sound judgment which has characterized his subsequent career when he decided at the end of his first year in law to abandon the hurly-burly of the legal profession for the more dignified calling of banking and finance.

As hon. members are aware I represent a constituency which is predominantly English-speaking. I should like to associate myself with the views expressed so eloquently by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George in respect to the attitude of the province of Quebec in the present war. I have lived in Quebec all my life. My father, my grandfather and my great grandfather lived there before me. I think I know the people of that province, and I could not do better than echo the words of my hon. friend when he said that there is no group in Canada who are more loyal Canadians, no group in Canada more loyal British subjects than the people of French Canada.

During the course of his remarks he touched briefly upon some of the problems of war finance, and it is with that subject I should like to deal briefly to-day.

In his admirable speech last Thursday the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) outlined the principles of war finance of the present government. He said that those principles had received the overwhelming approval of the Canadian people, so far as there can be said to exist a public opinion on principles of war finance. I feel that this is an exceedingly important question, and one concerning which there should be discussion. In the last few days various hon. members have dealt with the subject. I shall deal with it from a viewpoint perhaps slightly different from that of hon. members who sit in the far corner of the house.

We all realize that money does not win wars. Wars are won by men and by the production of materials, and in modern warfare, while men are no less important than they ever were, I think it is fair to say that materials and machinery have become more important. War machines are not created by money; they are created by the joint application of labour and capital, in this instance represented by plant and equipment, applied to raw material.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Without money?

Mr. ABBOTT: I said that money did not create them. I was going on to say that if men and materials do not exist no amount of money in the world can bring them into existence. So that it follows, if I am correct in my reasoning, that money and finance must take second place to men and materials.

Nevertheless, while finance must take second place, it plays a very important part in the productive process upon which the effective prosecution of a war depends. If it is clumsily or unwisely handled it can seriously impair that productive process, and set up strains not only during war days but after the war is over. The problem therefore of war finance is not that of winning the war but rather that of seeing to it that the war is paid for by methods which cause a minimum of disruption and distress both during and after the war.

At various places in the press and elsewhere I have noticed references to the policy of pay-as-you-go, and one would be led to believe that that policy was deliberately chosen and that there was an alternative. Mr. Speaker, except to the extent that we may have foreign assets on which we may realize or obtain foreign credits, we must pay as we go. It is entirely automatic. The choice which we have lies only in the way in which the burden is imposed and distributed among the different groups of the community. The choice therefore between methods of war finance is not a choice between a greater or a lesser burden of sacrifice on the nation as a whole. That burden is fixed—not by finance, but by the number of men and the quantity of material required to fight the war.

In spite of all that has been said by hon. members in the far corner of the house, I believe, in fact I am certain, that the total output of a nation necessarily has a limit. Of course that output may be increased by improved organization and efficiency; nevertheless the limit exists. In peace time we are accustomed to a level of production which is below capacity. We all recognize that, and we have seen it over the last ten years. It is difficult to adjust our views now to a different situation. I assume however that in war time we will raise our production to the maximum which our resources and our organization will permit. We will export all we can spare, and we will import what we must have. Then if from our total production and the amount of our imports we take away our exports and the requirements for war purposes, it is obvious that what is left is the amount available for civilian consumption.

Therefore as I see it the problem is one of apportioning the available things, and the labour to make them, between war needs and civilian needs. And our war effort should never be described as a maximum effort so long as we are taking it easy on the civilian side. If we are to divert to war purposes the maximum amount of our production we must cut down civilian consumption. That seems to me unanswerable. It is just as clear as the case of a man who spends a substantial part of his income to build an air raid shelter. He may save his life and that of his family, but he must do without the comforts and luxuries he might otherwise have.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. SPEAKER: The question may be permitted only with the permission of the hon. member who has the floor.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Would the hon. member enumerate the commodities on which we must cut down?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am coming to that later.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Let him make his speech.

Mr. ABBOTT: In the matter of distributing the burden, the government or the state can be only the directive agency. It is not a fairy godmother, as so many people seem to think. And, if I may paraphrase Mr. Lincoln's words, wars are fought by the people and for the people. Every person in this country must realize that he is receiving part of his wages and part of his salary in the form of armaments and national defence. The man who does not reduce his purchasing power, or who increases it, is simply obtaining something for nothing at the expense of somebody else in the community.

The task confronting the Minister of Finance is that of transferring civilian resources and civilian production to war purposes, and to choose between the different methods of distributing the burden among the different classes of the community. As the minister pointed out in his admirable speech, there are three main methods of distributing that burden. The first is taxation, the second is borrowing from genuine savings, and the third is inflation. All three are means whereby the citizen who has purchasing power in his pocket or in his bank account is compelled or induced to part with a portion of it to the government for war purposes.

Taxation of course takes purchasing power once and for all. Borrowing takes away a certain amount of purchasing power, but it leaves the lender with the expectation that he will be able to exercise that purchasing power at a later date, perhaps at the expense of some other group in the community which has not saved during the war.

The third method, namely inflation, as we all know permits the citizen to spend as much as he did before, but sees to it that he does not get so much for what he spends. The Minister of Finance must balance the proportions of taxation and borrowing. I think it is recognized that in a war of this kind it is not practicable to raise the entire cost by taxation as we go along. But whatever method he adopts, whatever proportion he decides should prevail as between taxation and borrowing, the difference between the national income in the hands of the public and the amount of goods available for civilian consumption must be made good, either voluntarily or by the enforced renunciation of spending.

May I illustrate with a concrete example. The figures which I shall give are purely arbitrary, although they do bear some relation to the actual facts. Let us assume for the purposes of argument that the national output of goods and services has a value in terms of dollars and cents of $4 billion. The other day my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) said that he thought $4½ billion was too high. I think it is too low, but I have taken $4 billion knowing that it will not alter the principle of the example which I intend to give. We have a total output of $4 billion, and the government takes $1½ billion of that for war and ordinary administrative purposes. By the process of simple subtraction, this leaves available for civilian consumption, $2½ billion.

For the purposes of my illustration I shall eliminate the question of external assets, because we are not, generally speaking, a creditor nation. The national income will be the same as the national output, $4 billion. Assume that the government takes $1 billion in the form of taxation; then we have left $3 billion. We have $3 billion in the pockets or the bank accounts of the public, with available goods and services to the value of $2½ billion to meet it. If the public refrains from trying to spend this extra $500 million and saves it, of course the problem is solved, but if it does not, if it insists on spending it, the law of supply and demand will operate and prices will rise. In the case of the example I have given, the increase will be 20 per cent; if the public saves half, prices would rise 10 per cent. But in any case prices will rise until the money in the hands of the public equals the value of the goods available for purchase or consumption.

This initial rise no doubt would cause little disturbance. Generally speaking, the resultant profits from such a rise would go to a restricted class of people, the manufacturers, traders and so on, and it would probably be fairly easy to get at least a substantial part of that back by taxing that restricted class. But the increased prices are bound to result in a demand for increased wages. Such a demand is bound to be successful in part, although it will never catch up with the increase in prices. This in turn will result in the necessity for further increases in order to maintain equilibrium. It must be remembered that the government will have to continue to make its purchases of materials and war supplies at the higher prices. This will mean in turn more money in the hands of the public.

Of course the government, which has control of the banking and currency system, can always find the cash with which to pay for these purchases of internally produced goods. So the inflationary process goes on. Everyone agrees that inflation is the most disastrous method of financing a war. By the process of inflation governments can secretly and unobserved confiscate a substantial portion of the income of its citizens. While such a process impoverishes many, it may enrich or increase the wealth of some. Lenin is supposed to have said that the best way to destroy the capitalistic system was to debauch the currency. I do not know whether he actually said that, but I am sure that if he did, he was right.

Perhaps one of the most serious results of inflationary finance is the fact that those who have to bear the heaviest burden are impoverished, and quite naturally as a result they entertain serious and dangerous feelings of grievance. I do not think it is unfair to say that the rise of the nazi regime in Germany was due, in part at least, to the violent hatred engendered among large classes of the population against the Jews who were alleged to have been the profiteers of the German inflationary period. It is interesting in passing to note that the nazis are using an inflationary technique in the occupied countries of Europe. Instead of carrying on the outright theft of foodstuffs and raw materials which they find in these countries, they are practising a form of looting by paying for these materials with a paper currency which will have a less than doubtful value in the future. This would seem to be a modern method of debauching the conquered.

Against all the disadvantages of inflation, there is one outstanding advantage, or perhaps I should say temptation. Inflation is politically easy. No one has to take any responsibility for it and no one ever takes any responsibility. It never appears in any budget resolution and parliaments are never asked to approve it. It is nature's remedy and, as Mr. Keynes says, if nothing else is done, it just happens.

In a long, costly war the restricting of civilian consumption by taxation and by borrowing is both unpleasant and distasteful. But it must be realized by the public that it is the war itself and not the method of financing the war which determines the price which must be paid by the community as a whole. There is no magic way of making such payment. If we choose inflation, we should do it with a knowledge of the grave risks we are running. We should do it with the knowledge that we are still making the same sacrifice, but are running the risk of incurring all the evils which inflation is bound to bring and which inflation has always brought in its wake.

Mr. JAQUES: What about deflation?

Mr. ABBOTT: The ideal thing would be to have neither inflation nor deflation but stability, and that is what we have. What I have been saying is not, of course, of such importance, nor will its truth perhaps be apparent in the early stages of this war before all our unemployed men and resources have been absorbed. But when that time arrives, and in my opinion it is arriving very rapidly, then it will become of vital importance. While statesmen or politicians can give leadership in these things, in the final analysis, under our democratic system, it is public opinion and the people that must prevail. In order to avoid inflation we must practise the old-fashioned virtue of thrift; we must eliminate luxurious non-essentials in order that we can release as much of our production as possible for war purposes. We must avoid all expenditures, both public and private, which are not directly connected with winning the war, with keeping our economic machine functioning or with maintaining the health, skill and strength of our people.

Mr. JAQUES: You have been saying that for twenty years.

Mr. ABBOTT: We will probably keep on saying it for another twenty years. We must be ready to pay just taxes gladly. We must buy government bonds and war savings certificates. Some people believe that it is possible to control public spending by a system of rationing and price-fixing. The Minister of Finance dealt with that very fully, and in my view at least, very satisfactorily the other day.

The principal objections to a form of general rationing—perhaps I should interject that some form of rationing and price-fixing may well form part of a plan of war financing—lie in the great diversity of the needs and tastes of the individual. In the case of certain articles, such as bread, bacon, tea or sugar, rationing may not cause great hardship, although even in those things the needs and tastes of the individual vary very considerably. But when you go down the list of the thousand and one things that people use and buy—clothing, shoes, dental and medical services, etc., it is obvious that not only the tastes but the needs of individuals vary considerably and that it would be absurd to issue a ration ticket to each individual for identical quantities of a particular commodity or service. It would require in addition an enormous police force, involving an enormous waste of man or woman power, to see that such a plan was enforced. It would have to be tied in with a policy of price fixing; but general price fixing unaccompanied by restriction of purchasing power would undoubtedly have the effect of increasing the pressure of consumption and facilitating the conversion of money income into the use and depletion of valuable resources, and if the supply for civilian consumption were restricted it is almost certain that shortages and unfairness of distribution would result.

It is highly improbable, Mr. Speaker, that wealthy individuals or corporations will become any wealthier in this war. If there are any such cases they will be very rare indeed. I think we can take it for granted that those, both individuals and corporations, in the medium and higher income brackets will be taxed to the highest possible extent, and I for one hope that they will. To me the major issue is going to be whether the mass of the people make their sacrifice by savings and lending to the government or whether they have their purchasing power taken away from them by inflation. In my view at any rate, as compared with the orderly limitation of spending by taxation, according to accepted standards, and by borrowing from genuine savings, either voluntary or enforced, the unregulated impact of currency inflation inflicts hardships all the greater because their consequences cannot be calculated and because they are unfair in their incidence.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition, in his speech two weeks ago, charged the government with imposing tremendously heavy and oppressive taxation, and he went on to say that there was no equality of sacrifice in the 1940 budget. He did not elaborate that theme, although I recall that he and all his supporters voted in favour of the amendment to impose a 100 per cent excess profits tax. But whatever he may have meant, to me in the sort of war which we are fighting to-day it seems sheer nonsense to say that the taxes imposed in the 1940 budget are oppressive.

I listened the other day to the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) describing conditions in his part of the country, and I heard the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) a little later describing similar conditions. I have heard it, of course, from western members on all sides of the house, and while I may and do disagree with some of those members as to the causes of those conditions and where the blame should attach, none of us I think will deny that those conditions exist. Surely my hon. friend does not believe that people who are living under those conditions can be expected to make further sacrifices and be further taxed for the costs of our war effort. I think it is fair to say, in view of the abnormally low prices of primary products and the tendency to fix those prices which exists, I gather, from the report the other day of the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Gardiner), that the farming community of this country are already paying a substantial amount of unrecorded taxation. I do not see how we can ask them, nor should they be asked, to make further sacrifices.

Taxes must follow the direction in which expenditure is flowing, and we all know that war expenditure is flowing largely in the form of salaries and wages in the industrial centres. I am convinced that it is from that class of our population that we must expect to get the main portion of our tax revenue and the main portion of our savings and borrowings by the government, whether those savings are, as I said before, voluntary or compulsory.

So far we seem to have got along very satisfactorily. I have no desire to assume the role of a prophet, but I cannot help feeling that if this war lasts as long as I believe it will, and if we are required to make the sacrifices that I believe we shall have to make, we may have to resort to a system of enforced saving such as that suggested by the well-known economist J. M. Keynes. If we do, I hope and I believe that the people of the country will accept it and accept it willingly as a part of the sacrifice and the contribution which we must make in order to win this war.

In his magnificent speech delivered in this house two weeks ago to-night the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) reminded the house that the only limitations the government was prepared to place on Canada's war effort were those imposed by the extent of our resources, both human and material, and by our capacity for sacrifice. Everyone in this country must realize, Mr. Speaker, that this war cannot be won without sacrifices, and that means sacrifices on the part of all the people of this country, not on the part of some alone. I am not one of those who believe that inflation, the most unfair method of financing the war, is inevitable. I believe that we can, that we must and will take the hard way.

Moreover, I am not unduly apprehensive as to what our position will be after the war is over. We shall still have our fertile soil, we shall still have our forests and our mines. We shall still have our skilled workers, and our productive facilities will presumably be largely expanded. I cannot believe that it is beyond the ability and the character of the Canadian people to see that the post-war Canada will be both a better and a happier place in which to live.

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, referring first to the hon. members who moved and seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne, may I content myself with merely observing that I believe they have now been sufficiently eulogized in this house for their addresses, and I will just say "amen" to what has been said.

In examining what was contained in the speech from the throne, we noticed that there were no particular suggestions to which we could direct our observations and our criticisms; consequently we were in the difficult position of having to wait until the ministers made their statements, or, as they have sometimes been called, their essays, to this house.

It is the right of every member to make observations and criticisms, and no one relishes the inference that in so doing he is actuated by any particular bias. We are here to represent the Canadian people as a whole. We must accept the statements which have been presented up to the present time to this house, and presumably we are supposed to be satisfied with the limited information which we have been given. We hope that we shall receive also a statement from the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty). In part, or, let me say, to the greater extent, I myself am not satisfied with what we have been told.

We have been informed of the vast expenditures which, as all the people know, are evident on all sides. But the public are still without the more definite information for which they supposed this parliament had been called. If we were able to get more definite information, and if this house were to continue to sit until we got it, the public would have considerably more confidence than they feel at the present time. To the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) let me say that every one of us realizes the tremendous responsibility which he carries, but our desire is to share that responsibility with him, and considerable regret has been expressed across Canada that he has not followed in this regard more in the footsteps of Britain's man of the hour, Winston Churchill. It has been said that the statement made by our Prime Minister savours too much of lip service. Perhaps that is true, perhaps it is not; but in this hour of crisis he seems to have left most of the burden to rest upon the war committee of the cabinet and other members of his government.

I deem it my duty to point out briefly some of these deficiencies as I see them. I do not do so as a carping critic, and I hope they will be accepted in the constructive spirit in which I am presenting them. Our desire, and I am sure it is shared by all the people of Canada, is to stop the aggressor and drive the enemy ultimately to cover. We desire to join together all the forces which we can assemble to set free the peoples of the world, to give them liberty to worship and to speak as they will.

In the brief time at my disposal I intend to make a few references to some statements which have been given to this house. My first reference will be to certain remarks of the minister who combines the portfolios of agriculture and national war services (Mr. Gardiner). If his speech is carefully read it will be seen that it is divided into three parts. I prefer to deal with them in the reverse order to that in which he presented them.

We all were proud and pleased to have the first-hand information which he gave the Canadian people, telling of the heroic fortitude of the people in the motherland, who are our kith and kin. We rejoice at their courage.

We heard also a report of the minister's activities and contacts with the government of the United Kingdom so far as the sale of Canadian products is concerned. It is quite evident that they desire to purchase from us. I was quite pleased to hear the hon. member who just preceded me (Mr. Abbott) emphasize the fact that already our farmers have made a tremendous sacrifice. It is about time, if we are to believe that this house, in particular in these days of war, is not a partisan body, that members of all parties rose and expressed their opinions as freely as the previous speaker has done.

Great Britain desires to purchase from us. We wish to do business with her. There has been briefly outlined in this house the financial strain to which Britain is going to be subjected. Already we see references to it in the press. As a Canadian, I say that the time has come when, if they cannot pay, we have got to give. We have to find every possible way to meet this emergency, even though, as I have said, we have to provide from our own funds. Great Britain has long kept open the channels of the seas. To that achievement we, in spite of what has been said by the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald), have contributed but the widow's mite. We must do more in that respect.

As regards the third portion of the minister's remarks, I believe it would have been better left unsaid. Somebody remarked in days long ago, whether writing in prose or poetry I do not know, "Use what language we will, we cannot make ourselves anything more than we are". I did not like the political references made by the minister at the beginning of his remarks; it seemed to me that they cast a cloud, so to speak, over the rest of his speech. Canada must have more vision at this time. At the beginning of the session the Prime Minister assured us that there would be no partisanship, and I think we are all agreed that partisanship should not form any part of our war effort at this time. I urge upon the Minister of National War Services that he be very careful not to cast any doubt upon the ability of industry to do its part in this war. A rather damaging inference has gone across the country. I have already received information as to the results of it, and I urge upon him to be careful and to take steps to see that it does not occur again.

I further ask the minister not to discredit in any way the ability of our workers to do their share in this conflict. There is an inference throughout the country in pegging of wages of our workers. I say to the minister, "Peg costs in Canada before you start to peg what the man is earning by the sweat of his brow". I think we might direct to the minister's attention some of the references that are just off the press, printed in the Canadian Congress Journal, under the editorship of Tom Moore, a man who is recognized for his ability. I commend these references to the minister and ask him to read them carefully and inwardly digest them.

I have received many letters, and other members of the house have no doubt received such letters, with respect to the cost of administration in Ottawa at the present time. I therefore urge upon the minister, before he allows any reflections to be cast upon the industrialists or workers or anyone else, that he make sure that his house here is set in order.

The minister has told us of the continuing reduction in prices to the farmers of Canada. This subject was referred to a few minutes ago by another speaker. We all desire to sell as cheaply as possible to Britain; undoubtedly Britain needs our aid in every respect. But our farmers must exist, the same as any other class in the country, and as Minister of Agriculture the hon. gentleman should see to it that our farmers receive every possible consideration at this time. I wish to associate myself, in part at least, indeed, with all that was said by my deskmate the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon). In the approach that is being made to the farmers they find that they are not receiving proper consideration. This has been referred to in the house on previous occasions by many speakers. The pegging of prices continues and multiplies. The announcement made in connection with bacon will have to be accepted by the Canadian farmer, but these same farmers cannot understand why at this time the cost of bran, shorts, middlings and other feed products for their live stock continues to climb, with the country full of wheat, and with the price of wheat pegged. These are things that the farmer cannot understand.

If I were to take time to read one of the comments from a farmer who shows me distinctly that his actual profit on ten acres of wheat is $35.12—and it is worked out in a very careful way—the minister would realize the difficulty which the farmer faces. The payrolls of industrial workers are reaching high levels, and we know that they are working for it. Raw materials and finished products are climbing. When the farmer goes to buy his implements for farming, what does he pay? He is between two fires, and it is high time that something definite be done to relieve the situation.

We are told that the British government does not want our fresh fruits and vegetables, and properly so. Perhaps they are not a requisite over there at the present time. Perhaps they will take only a limited quantity of canned fruits and vegetables and basic products of the farm. I associate myself not only with what the hon. member for Peel has said, but with the remarks of the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling), who points out the position of the fruit and vegetable growers of Canada. They are between two fires; sales are limited in the United Kingdom, and yet, as the hon. member for Peel has said, we are allowing something like $18,000,000 worth of fruit and vegetables to come in from the United States. Hansard will give the exact figures, but I believe that is the quantity that has come in thus far.

An hon. MEMBER: Twenty-four millions.

Mr. LOCKHART: An hon. member corrects me. At any rate, it is many millions. I wish to impress upon the Minister of Agriculture the position of the Canadian farmer. I repeat, he is between two fires: no market over there, for obvious reasons, while at the same time this great influx of commodities into Canada is permitted. The possibility of a market in the United Kingdom is limited, and the home market is taken away to this extent. One of the first duties of the minister is to continue his efforts, because under the special provisions of the trade agreement with the United States there is no reason in the world why the situation cannot be frankly laid before the government of that country; and, judging from their attitude in every other respect, I do not see why great things cannot be accomplished at this time for the benefit of the farmers and producers.

Mr. HOMUTH: He is not a Minister of Agriculture but Minister of War Services.

Mr. LOCKHART: Well, I want the Minister of Agriculture and of War Services, and of all other departments with which he is associated, to do the best he can in this matter. He represents the Minister of Trade and Commerce in Great Britain in some respects. I suggest that he take the Minister of National Revenue, or some other authority, to the United States with him, as apparently he did when he went to the old land.

There is something else he might do under the authority of the Minister of National Revenue. He could not only give some protection to the Canadian farmer but, in conjunction with the Minister of National Revenue as his proxy, he could see what might be done about keeping some $6,500,000 worth of United States periodicals out of Canada. Our foreign exchange must be protected, and I fail to see that all these periodicals now being admitted into this country are an essential service. So I direct the attention of the minister to this possibility of saving exchange.

[Mr. Lockhart.]

Now I pass on to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), who I am sorry is not in the house. I appreciate, however, that he is away giving even greater service to our cause. I congratulate the minister on his frank admission of some of the deficiencies in our war effort. He has told us that many things are lacking, and has promised that this situation will be remedied as quickly as possible. Yesterday I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) rush to defend the withholding of information concerning Bren guns. Well, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding anything the hon. member may say, the general public expected the minister to give us complete information in regard to this important matter, without any explanations from any other hon. member of this house. The minister referred to certain units that had been enlisted as machine gun units. After many, many months of delay they were demoted, as they called it, and made into infantry units. They did not enlist as infantry units, and they are continuing to beg for machine guns with which to train. The minister has made it clear that not a great deal of this equipment is available, but his words will give some encouragement to these men, who now hope that some day they may be placed back in their original category.

Then I come to the question of the thirty day training, though I do not want to say very much about it. I have given rides to many scores of soldiers on our highways, and only last Saturday one chap said to me in this regard, "Well, at last that joker has been taken from the pack, anyway." Certainly we want trained soldiers, and I commend the minister on his statement that now these men are to be given training that will fit them to take their places beside our other soldiers in the main line of defence, which is across the sea.

Then I would ask the Minister of National Defence, or his associate, who I believe is acting in his place, to look into the food rations being issued to some of these units. I would also ask the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Gardiner), who seems able to handle a great many jobs, to take on the task of seeing that properly trained cooks are supplied to these units. I could give some specific instances if I wished, but it is only necessary to go into these training centres and hear what the men are saying in order to learn the situation. I could give some glaring instances, but I would prefer to give them in private to those in authority.

The Minister of National War Services has a real job to do, and I will ask him either to do the work seriously himself or to find someone who is competent to help him.

Then there is the question of free transportation for soldiers, which rests squarely on the shoulders of the Minister of National Defence. This matter has been referred to many times in this house, and I should like to add my word as well. Surely if we want the highest possible esprit de corps among the limited number of men who have been enlisted so far we should try to make this Christmas and New Year's the happiest possible occasion by giving them some form of free transportation in order that they may get home to their loved ones; some of them, perhaps, for the last time. So that with all the sincerity I possess, I urge upon the minister that he give this suggestion his very earnest attention.

The announcement made by the Minister of National Defence that in future all officers will have to come from the ranks will create more good feeling, I believe, than he may conceive at the moment. Many of the ordinary soldiers will tell you what they have been up against in this regard. I hope that what I am about to say does not apply to any hon. member in this house; but if any hon. member has used his influence to have incompetent young men in their teens put in charge of some of our real volunteer soldiers; if he has used his influence to get preference for these young men, openly and before the world I say to him, "Shame." I have heard that charge made on more than one occasion, but now the minister has made it abundantly clear that if this practice existed in the past it will not be tolerated in future.

There is just one other mystery upon which I should like to comment. Who will stand in his place in this house and say that to-day our front line trenches are not on the English channel and along the shores of the Mediterranean? No one even thinks otherwise, but I want to recall a statement that was made in this house not so very long ago, in which we were told that the Canadian parliament would decide to what extent, if any, Canada would participate in this war. I think all hon. members will recall that statement. Then if we turn to page 200 of Hansard for this session we find a question which was asked and answered; hon. members can look it up for themselves. And the minister hastened —yes, hastened—in reply to the question asked, to assure some unseen minority, a handful of men, wherever they may be in Canada, men who were once described as those who wanted to run to the bush in the event of an emergency, that notwithstanding anything connected with the extension of the training period they would not have to serve outside of Canada. I have no thought but to condemn anybody who does not recognize that our front line of trenches is on the English channel and in the Mediterranean. I have no apologies to offer when I make that statement. Consequently I regret the minister's taking so much trouble, as recorded in Hansard, to bring out so clearly the point in question. I wonder how our volunteers, who, for reasons which I am not at liberty to express at the moment, are discontented, would take such utterances.

Then, we find another echo in another chamber of this building. From that chamber we are told that we were doing all England expected us to do. Mr. Speaker, I happen to come of British stock, and I believe I share that characteristic, one of which I am justly proud, with most other hon. members in the chamber. Members of my family have gone to south Africa, Australia and New Zealand, the same, I am sure, as the relatives and friends of other hon. members have done. The world knows it, the people in other countries know it, the people of our sister dominions know it, the people in Canada know it—and I believe I could produce correspondence to prove that England made no effort to restrain them. Therefore I cannot understand why the voice of this government echoes in another chamber the statement that there was a limitation placed upon Canada.

Some day history will reveal the facts. Some day the excuse given in this chamber that it is not in the best interests of Canada that we be told anything will be exploded, and at last the information will be forthcoming. Historians will then write the history of Canada, and at that time I believe it will be found that the Canadian people, not through any fault of their own, were retarded in their efforts to defend the empire. I believe it will be shown that this country had the same opportunity as the sister dominions had to do its work, and that it would have done that work had it been given the opportunity to do so. The communications I receive from friends and relatives in those countries, and what I learn from personal conversations, do not fit in with the reports which have been given the house, and which continue to be echoed. Yet we cannot get official information. Some day we will get it. Some day the historians will record the actual position in which Canada found herself.

I must hurry on. Hon. members appreciate the observations of the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power). We appreciate his observations respecting the air training plan—retarded again, perhaps, for reasons which we do not yet know. Nevertheless a valiant effort is being and has been made, one which has accomplished great things in the development of the air training scheme. We know that the gallant behaviour of the small number of Canadian airmen who so far have gone overseas will be reflected many-fold in the work of the men being turned out in the Royal Canadian Air Force. Hon. members on this side of the house encourage all that work. We are behind the minister in his efforts. I do not think there is a Canadian citizen who is not proud of what has been done up to the present time, or who would refuse in the future to do anything within his power.

Apparently the time has come when we may speak of our navy in terms other than those of ratings and officers. While in the limited opportunity they have had, our seamen have accomplished much, still greater things are looked for, and it is our hope that we may take our rightful position alongside the motherland in sweeping the seas clear of enemy craft. But I did not like the press comments of a few days ago, one in which the political inference crept in. An attempt has been made to explain it away, but the Canadian public are still smarting under the inference, and their annoyance is felt at a time when the nation is pressing for realities.

May I say a word respecting the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). Hon. members appreciated his extensive statement in which he outlined the huge expenditures which have been made. We have to win the war, and we have to find money to finance it. We have to provide our men with the necessary equipment. However I would suggest that the minister would do well to read an article appearing in the Canadian Unionist of October, 1940, in which we find the following statement:

> One hundred Canadian industries are being financed by the government in order that they may engage in war production.

These are the words of workers. It continues:

> Twenty-five of these plants are new. These one hundred industries are financed from the public treasury; they are nominally owned by the state, but not one of them is operated by the government.

That procedure has been explained. Then, it continues:

> All of them are operated by private companies for private profit under contractual conditions.

Labour is just a little disturbed. Labour expected that at this session we would have more information as to how those contracts were developed, and how they are to be operated. We still have no information, although labour is asking for it. The people of Canada are still asking for it; yet we have almost reached the stage of adjournment, and we have not received it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but before he leaves the question of war services may I ask him if he has made a statement to the effect that in some way the effort of Canada has been retarded? I did not quite follow him.

Mr. LOCKHART: That is the impression which has gone abroad. If the minister will permit me to say so, that is the general impression throughout Canada. The general impression is that the progress of Canada's war effort has been retarded for some reason or another—some reason we cannot find. We cannot get the information, and for that reason labour, industry and everyone else is still seeking information. Yet, we have not got it, despite the fact that we are drawing close to the time for adjournment. That is the inference I want to make.

There is another aspect of this matter to which I should like to refer. Only a few days ago a soldier and a gentleman stood up in this House of Commons to offer criticism of the government and make certain statements. I repeat that he is a soldier and a gentleman, and anyone who heard him speak will acknowledge that he is. While it is true that certain words which were used have been deleted from Hansard, I think someone owes this courteous gentleman and soldier an apology for allowing this language to be broadcast through the country and in the press. I associate myself with what the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White) had to say. From first-hand knowledge I know that many of his statements are true. Some day we will be able to get information about those matters which were touched upon briefly by the hon. member.

It is to be hoped that the Minister of Munitions and Supply some day will give us more information about the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. We are hoping that that will happen, and the Canadian people are hoping that that will happen. Someone says that perhaps it is a pious hope. Some day when we are able to get answers to the questions we may ask we will be able to learn why the minister has so persistently hung on to this particular branch of service to Canada.

The Minister of Finance made a very careful statement to this house, and we appreciate what he said. It has been said that it took a Churchill to awaken England, and I think the facts presented by the Minister of Finance will awaken the Canadian people to a realization of what they are up against. We are hoping—it may be a pious hope—that when the estimates come down we will find that the Minister of Finance has seen fit to eliminate all unnecessary services and the payment of salaries to men about whom we can obtain very little information. Such expenditures should be eliminated. Economy in administration at this time will give the people more confidence—I assure the minister that that is the feeling abroad—than anything else he can do in this emergency.

I join with the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) in his remarks about organizations being quite willing to help in our war effort. I know of service clubs by the tens, of men's and women's organizations which are looking for some leadership. They are floundering around looking for something to keep them busy, and I urge upon the government the wisdom of utilizing their services.

Last year we heard insults thrown across the floor of the house at the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) in connection with the construction of tanks. Surely any hon. member who is not politically biased will admit now that every statement made by the hon. member in that connection has been proved to be true. The evidence is here, because we are now producing tanks. Let us face the facts. Let us be fair to Canada at this time. I urge all hon. members to get up and express their own opinions.

I want to associate myself with the references which have been made to housing. The housing situation is urgent, and not only in the military centres. There is an article in the Canadian Congress Journal entitled "Housing in War-time" which I direct to the attention of the minister. We are informed that home improvement loans have been discontinued. There are scores of young married men and older men who are just recently in receipt of permanent pay envelopes. Many of them are ready to make the necessary improvements to their homes, but they have no facilities to borrow from private enterprise. They are not able to borrow from the government. There is also the inference in the press that the National Housing Act is to be further limited in its scope.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to have to inform the hon. member that his time has elapsed.

Mr. LOCKHART: May I have a minute to complete my remarks?

Mr. SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): We have been consenting for ten minutes now.

Mr. LOCKHART: Does the Minister of Justice object?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Far from it. I simply said that we had been waiting ten minutes already.

Mr. LOCKHART: Housing is urgently needed in many centres, as has been stated by labour men. There are a number of middle-aged carpenters and mechanics who could give service in this connection, but in no other way. I urge upon the minister the utilization of every opportunity of assisting in the construction of homes and thus preparing for peace. Home owners constitute the greatest asset that Canada will ever have in times of peace. We all hope that peace will ultimately come; it must come. Surely we have not forgotten the effort and sacrifice of the last war, and I believe we are all fully conscious of what effort and sacrifice will be necessary in this war. Surely the bloodshed and sacrifices of the past, surely the sacrifices that will have to be made in the future will make us decide that, God giving us grace, we should bend our energies towards seeking a perpetual peace. If we strive for peace in the true spirit we will find that the rewards of peace are eminently greater than those of war.

Canada needs leadership, and I urge upon the Prime Minister and the war committee of the cabinet the necessity for seeking out what lesser Churchills there may be in Canada to-day. There are many of them. I believe that our Prime Minister is sincere. We all remember his words at the beginning of this session of parliament. I know that he is not seeking epitaphs, but he may not live to see the end of this war, though we all hope that God will spare him to see it. But we have observed the leadership in the motherland, and our Prime Minister has a war-time duty to perform. When history is written we trust that the same words will be said of our Prime Minister and his war cabinet as were said by Dorothy Thompson of Churchill in one of her broadcasts. I think her words should be spread on Hansard, Mr. Speaker, if I may have permission to read them. In her "Salute to Churchill" she said:

> But around you, Winston Churchill, is a gallant company of ghosts. Elizabeth is there, and sweetest Shakespeare, the man who made the English renaissance the world's renaissance. Drake is there, and Raleigh, and Wellington; Burke is there, and Walpole, and Pitt. Byron is there, and Wordsworth and Shelley. Yes, and I think Washington is there, and Hamilton, two men of English blood, whom gallant Englishmen defended in your parliament. And Jefferson is there who died again, the other day, in France. All the makers of a world of freedom and of law are there, and among them is the Shropshire lad, to whom his ghostly author calls again: Get ye the men your fathers got, and God will save the queen.

And when you speak, Churchill, brave men's hearts everywhere rush out to you. There are no neutral hearts, Winston Churchill, except those that have stopped beating. There are no neutral prayers. Our hearts and our prayers say, "God give you strength, God bless you." May you live to cultivate your garden, in a free world liberated from terror and persecution, war and fear.

I urge upon the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, that he consider no partisan views in the selection of his men but that he give us Churchills in Canada to-day.

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the membership of this house, it seems to me, while it has not an equality in function, certainly has an equality in responsibility. Whether it be the Prime Minister or members sitting in the remotest parts of this chamber, all of us, representing as we do definite areas of our population, have a definite responsibility to express not only our own views but at a time like this the views of those whom we represent in this house. Therefore I offer no apology for taking part at this late date in the debate.

We have heard it said by hon. members opposite, particularly those sitting in the middle of the groups to your left, Mr. Speaker, both during this session and last—and there has been a reflection of it throughout the country, not so much at the present time but still articulate enough in certain quarters—that because we are at war this country should have a national government, that because we are at war the Prime Minister should go outside this house and enrich his cabinet with men of extraordinary ability. Mr. Speaker, a government can never be too strong, but I wish also to say to this house that an opposition can be too weak. The crying need in Canada to-day is for a strong opposition, and if I may respectfully suggest it to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) in the same vein in which he made his suggestion to us on this side of the house, if we can stand enrichment by importations from the outside I think, without making any personal references, that the opposition too could stand importations from the outside.

Mr. HOMUTH: But you need it much more.

Mr. MARTIN: I have no doubt that my suggestion will not meet with agreement on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite because when a similar suggestion was made from the other side of the house it did not meet with agreement here.

[Mr. Lockhart.]

In his address to the house last night, while I do not agree with everything he said, the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), speaking as he did as a private member, did give expression to ideas which I share. I know it is difficult for the ministry at this time, when it is deeply engaged in the tremendous task that faces it, to carry out a greater division of work among all members; nevertheless I do feel that the membership of this house, and the members themselves can lead in that respect somewhat, might be put to more advantageous use than we seem to be at the present time. Committees of the house might well be given the opportunity of considering measures which do not require the immediate decision of the executive.

I propose to-day not to make an omnibus speech but to confine myself to one or two points which I think are important and which I believe have thus far been overlooked. But before coming to these I think I should say that so far as I can judge public opinion in the part of the province from which I come there is a strong demand, or shall I say a strong desire, that those in our armed forces should upon proper conditions be given free transportation. There is also I think a strong demand that the men in our armed forces, not only those in the Canadian active service force but those who are serving in Canada, should not in respect of their military income find themselves taxable for income tax purposes; and the same applies, it seems to me, to the defence tax.

Having said these things I should like to come to the serious indictment made yesterday by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) in his speech to the house—and we should recall that he is the chief critic of the government in defence matters. His speech was characterized by his usual good temper, but it did not lay the government open to any serious charge excepting in one particular. He said:

> The measure of Canada's effort last winter was the measure of the government's policy at that time. Now we are told that Canada is making everything. If Canada under direction to-day can make everything, Mr. Speaker, under similar direction she could have made everything last winter, or begun to do so.

That is a serious indictment, and I do not think it should be allowed to go without comment. Associated with that observation was the statement of the hon. member that since the government is the brain of our war effort it must accept responsibility for the difference between the present intensification of our war effort and that of say the first six months of the war. I could say to him with equal justification, although I offer it only because he has raised the question, that if during the period from 1930 to 1935 the air force of this country had not been seriously cut by a wave of economy, our air force would be in a stronger position than it now is.

Lord Barnby spoke in the House of Lords on July 31, 1940, in respect of the indictment to which the hon. member for Yale has given expression. He said:

There is no point in recrimination or in reviewing the past except, as the Prime Minister said, with the object of fortifying us in our determination for the future. Comparisons are odious in so far as they are made with other parts of the empire, but it is certain that, had the United Kingdom followed the policy of making a greater call, at an earlier date, on Canada's productive capacity, it would have been answered and it would have inspired the Canadian people and impelled the Canadian government to make efforts on their own part much greater than they did, instead of being lulled into an appearance of inaction by the meagre demands which this country made upon them.

Those words, coming from members of the administration of the day, surely should be placed on Hansard along with the words contained in the indictment of the hon. member for Yale.

Again, consider the words of Viscount Caldecote, uttered the same day and in the same debate:

I repeat that the very fullest use is now being made of every possible capacity that there is in Canada, whether it is existing capacity or capacity that must be created, that can come into production before January, 1942.

Surely those two statements serve as an extenuating circumstance in respect to that indictment and are a direct lie to the observation of the last speaker that this government, for some reason or another, when the world finds itself facing the greatest test of all time, is retarding our war effort.

Mr. HOMUTH: Is this an excuse or an apology? How about 1937?

Mr. MARTIN: Now, Mr. Speaker, after that echo from the Rocky mountains I should like to come to another point.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) spoke in Fredericton on October 9, and I have before me a clipping of his speech as reported in the Saint John Telegraph Journal of that date. He was talking about his speech at Toronto, to which I shall make no reference other than to what I think he owes this house in respect of that speech and the three other speeches to which I intend to refer. He said, according to this report:

I have not a word to take back in connection with my Labour day speech at the Canadian National Exhibition at Toronto. I wanted to warn the Canadian people that the Ogdensburg meeting was just blatant publicity for something which had been going on for three years before Mr. King came into power. The Conservative government previous to 1935 had sent military aides to the United States, but the conversations had been kept secret.

In respect of that statement, one should attach to it the query put by the hon. gentleman, that in respect of the Ogdensburg conversations the Prime Minister owed the country the obligation of stating what commitments had arisen out of those conversations. One could equally ask, what commitments arose out of the informal relations between our military officers and those of the United States before 1935 in respect of the very same matter?

Somewhat along the same line but with a special variance, in the Halifax Herald of October 10, the leader of the opposition is reported as follows:

. . . the "Ogdensburg conversations" with the United States in which much had been made of defence plans for the two countries. Those plans were not new, but had been developed several years ago in great secrecy and had been pigeon-holed by Mr. King after he had taken office.

Mr. HOMUTH: Hear, hear.

Mr. MARTIN: Someone says, "hear, hear." I do not know what is the justification for saying that the results of these informal meetings were pigeon-holed, but I do not believe that that was the case. And then, to come to the crux of the matter, the hon. gentleman said in this house, when he spoke on this address in this debate:

Now I turn to our relations with the United States. After the Ogdensburg meeting there was set up a joint defence committee and, to say the least, it has been functioning with great publicity. I have never condemned the Ogdensburg conversations. In the speech I made in Toronto I said it was capable of a high and noble purpose, and I believe so yet. But I thought I should sound a note of warning to the Canadian people that what was transpiring at Ogdensburg with great and blatant publicity had been carried on before with profound secrecy.

And then he adds:

And my colleague (Mr. Stirling) told that to the Prime Minister when we visited him on August 20.

The leader of the opposition is an older man than I am, and I trust that he will not think me impertinent if I suggest to him that, if these quotations really represent his true view in respect of the Ogdensburg conversations, the deep implications of that accord and these discussions he has yet failed fully to appreciate. Why should we not tell the world that this country and the United States entered into a joint defence agreement? Hitler and Mussolini, and their ally in the far east—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the hon. member allow me a moment? Will he be good enough to tell this country if there were any commitments as the result of Ogdensburg? Because I tell him I cannot find out whether there are or not.

Mr. MARTIN: Well, obviously I can only take the words of the Prime Minister.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What did he say?

Mr. MARTIN: I do not know whether there are or not, but I do abide by the words of the Prime Minister. And I will come to that in a moment. Why should we not tell the world? At Havana the American republics met and agreed in the face of the totalitarian adventure upon a certain programme. That was announced to the world. Why should we not announce it to the world, as indeed the British Prime Minister took occasion to refer specifically to it in the British house, that Canada in her fight against totalitarianism, in her intimate relations with the United States, has been able at this time to bring the United States closer and closer to Britain? Why should we not tell the world that the United States and ourselves, in consultation with Britain, are prepared to resist in so far as we can here at home any aggression on their part? And then, to say that the collaboration with the United States is of no value to Britain at this time is to misinterpret the full significance of the conversations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Did I ever say that?

Mr. MARTIN: I am suggesting that the hon. gentleman has misinterpreted the implications of these conversations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is just the hon. member's interpretation, not my interpretation.

Mr. MARTIN: No, because of the statement of the hon. gentleman that what was concluded at Ogdensburg was no more than a confirmation of what had been going on in secret for years, and that certainly, I suggest, was not the case. I suggest to him that the Ogdensburg conversations go away beyond the old type of staff conversations to which he had reference. I suggest to him further that the extensive coordination of defence between these two countries involves important political implications, certainly a circumstance which was not present in the conversations which were conducted before 1935. I suggest also to him that the accord brings home to Canada the implications of the new continental plan put forward at Havana and intended as a bulwark against the dictatorship countries. Is this accord not a corollary of the determination of the United States to integrate her policies with those of other American states in the face of the present world emergency? Does not the accord involve, now or later, the outlet for Canadian wheat and other produce deprived of former markets?

I suggest that defence and economic policies are inseparable. Furthermore, it seems to me that this accord brings home to us the need of our maintaining our independence within the British empire vis-à-vis the United States, particularly in view of the determination of that country to bring about collaboration for the effective defence of the whole continent. Moreover, as I read the accord, it will coordinate our use of standards and of equipment for the maintenance of our first line of defence, which, as the hon. gentleman who preceded me said, was formerly the Maginot line and is certainly now the English channel, our second line of defence being here at home.

It seems to me that the Ogdensburg accord will have the result of preventing anyone from justifiably denying that, together with our recognition that our first line of defence is the English channel, Canada's best guarantee of maintaining her national existence is the frank admission from the beginning that our defence must be worked out in cooperation with the United States on the basis of a single continental defence policy; and these arrangements of continental defence should be pursued in consultation with Britain, with whom at this time we are one.

I have no doubt that this last statement of mine will be construed as placing emphasis on Canada rather than at this time on the problem that faces Britain in Europe. That suggestion has been made with regard to the observations of the Prime Minister in contrast with what the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) said. But, Mr. Speaker, words can be twisted in any way. All of us in this house, no matter what our views may have been in the past, recognize that if Britain falls, if our first line of defence falls, that will have for us the most serious form of repercussion; but in going closer with the United States in seeking a common understanding with her and, through her, I suspect with other countries on this continent and in South America, are we thereby alienating ourselves from our chief ally, Britain? Are we not bringing them closer within the sphere in which we originated and in which we propose to stay? I doubt very much if the observations made in another place with respect to Mr. LaGuardia's method of informing the public are calculated to improve the relations between our two countries.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would it not be wise if he restrained himself once in a while?

Mr. MARTIN: That is Mr. Roosevelt's job and not the leader of the opposition's.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, that may be true, but it is rather sickening to me.

Mr. MARTIN: It comes with ill grace for us to make comments of that kind when we are doing everything we can to let the people of the United States understand the nature of our problem so that they can give us, as they are giving, every possible assistance in this hour of our trial.

Several members from various parts of the country—from the west, from the maritime provinces and from Quebec—have applauded the decision of the government to implement in its essentials the Rowell-Sirois report. Coming as I do from the province of Ontario, which seems to be singled out for special reference, for reasons that are not too clear to me, I regret the suggestion that this province is not willing to place the interests of Canada above its own special interests. I believe I speak for the vast majority of the citizens of the province from which I come, certainly for that part of the province from which I come, southwestern Ontario, when I say that we are anxious that when the dominion-provincial conference is convened there shall result from its deliberations a common understanding as a result of which we can go on with a greater measure of unity in Canada. The hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Graham) said he would like us to place ourselves in the position of those who framed the constitution of Canada. I would join with him in that wish, and I think he will find that the largest province of Canada—and it is not because it is the largest—is as much interested as any western province or any maritime province in seeing that the confederation, which is the binding bone of the country, shall not be destroyed or disunited. And if that is true in peace time, surely we are anxious that no loss of effort in our war programme shall take place; we are particularly anxious therefore that the conclusions of the dominion-provincial conference will result in carrying out at least in certain of the essentials the recommendations made in the report.

It seems to me that at this time of war we require certain essentials for victory: First, the maximum of national unity; second, that the money cost of ordinary government functions be as low as possible so as to leave our citizens as much money as possible to pay the enormous costs of carrying on the war; and third, the opportunity of creating conditions as favourable as possible for efficient industrial production to serve the war. In my opinion, the Rowell-Sirois report meets these essentials in a very large measure. For that reason, speaking for myself, speaking I am sure for those whom I represent in this house, I say that we sincerely hope that above the interests of any province will come the interests of Canada, and that we shall not re-make confederation but re-oil it in its effective workings, so that our country may go on to greater and greater achievement and glory.

I do think—and this is only a personal view—that the collection of income and corporation taxes, succession duties, administration and unemployment relief by a single authority is what this country wants and what I trust it will receive. I am interested in unemployment because my constituency is largely an industrial one. We have had a constant shifting of responsibility between the provinces and the federal government for the past ten years. Unemployment and problems kindred to it are national and we should deal with them through the national authority. We should thus be able to handle the problem in the light of its national and not of its provincial aspects. I trust that hon. members who have complained of the absence on the part of Ontario members of references to the adoption of the Rowell-Sirois report, and other members from the province of Ontario, will subscribe to the view I take. Much as we love our province we love Canada more.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), speaking in this debate in reference to the general observation made by the Prime Minister, said that the time had come when we should make a clearer definition of why we are fighting. That demand has been made in England of the government, composed of Conservatives and of members of the English Labour party. Mr. Churchill, I presume, spoke as head of the government, in his own name and in the names of Mr. Morrison, Mr. Bevin and Mr. Attlee, when he said that the time had come not for bowing to that public demand but rather for instilling in the minds of the people that, in so far as the clear aim of the war was concerned, it was a definite and worthy one.

The danger in the sort of suggestion that has been advanced by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is this. He leaves the impression that in the absence of a clear definition of war aims our people may be led to the belief that all we are fighting for is to remove Hitler, and that then we shall not be able to have our people follow us. I do not agree with that. I believe a distinction should be made between the aims of war and the aims of peace or, if you will, between what we are immediately fighting for and the kind of world we hope we shall have after the war is over.

There is no misunderstanding or difficulty as to why we are fighting. We are fighting for one thing, and I believe that justifies the terrible sacrifice the world is prepared to make. We are fighting that above the law of nations shall come the law of God. We are fighting that free men and women may be allowed to live their own lives within certain restrictions. We are fighting that no nation, no matter what its form of government, shall be permitted to plunge an innocent people into misery and death simply because its leader says so. The other day I came across a statement which I had never seen before, which I think clearly indicates the reason for this war, not the kind of world that we are hoping will result from the war but the immediate justification for the war, and it is just as great in its spiritual quality as any justification could be. Here is what Hitler said to Herr Rauschning:

> I am the greatest German who has ever lived. Mankind led by the German race is now in a period of transition, just as it was when men first began to pass from the ape-like into the human stage. Now, they are passing from the human into the superhuman stage. I have preceded them. In so far as there is a God in this world, I am he.

Surely that sums up the reasons for this war. The assumption underlying any demand for war aims would be this, that we could trust Hitler and Mussolini to give the working people of the world, the common man and the common woman, an opportunity to make their way in life; to give them security. No one knows better than the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar how difficult it was for me to rise in my place in September of last year and vote, together with other hon. members, that this country should go to war. But I say that this world would not be worth living in if we had to undergo another siege of barbarism as we know it under Hitler and Mussolini. Surely the job is not only to get rid of these two men, but more particularly to get rid of the instincts of which they are the product; then, after we have done that, go ahead and try to rebuild an international organization, upon Hitlerite ruins, if you will; go ahead and deal with such questions as the accessibility of raw materials, equality of opportunity, and so on; go ahead and restore

Czechoslovakia, France, the low countries and all the other subjugated nations, and in our own countries have domestic policies that will give new hope and new vigour to our people.

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. member is giving war aims now.

Mr. MARTIN: No; I am giving peace aims.

Mr. COLDWELL: I agree with those aims, and I hope the government will.

Mr. MARTIN: I am giving peace aims, but I say that to confuse the aim of this war with peace aims is to misinterpret the real force, the real conflict, of the two ideologies that are now striving one against the other. For what are we fighting? We are not merely fighting Hitler. When we have got rid of Hitler, of Goebbels and of Goering, we shall not have got rid of that thing for which the German people have been the philosophical prey for two hundred years. We do not forget that there was a Kant, a Beethoven and a Bach, but we know there was a Frederick the Great, a Bismarck, a kaiser and an Adolf Hitler. We also know that until such time as we can rid a potentially great people of those abuses of false power, there can be no hope, no decency, no civilization in the world.

In this house I represent, as do many other hon. members, a constituency in which there are a large number of French-speaking people, of whom I am proud to be one. French-Canadians, as well as English-Canadians and citizens of central European origin, have their first loyalty to Canada, within the British commonwealth of nations. But it would be unnatural for them not to have a deep affection for the humanism of France, and the fall of France has left the French-Canadian people in my section of the country particularly, I think, with the desire to associate themselves with remarks of the kind made to the people of France by the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and by Mr. Winston Churchill, who on October 21 spoke to the French people in their homes, in high and low places, in these memorable words:

(Translation)

> Good night, then: sleep to gather strength for the morning. For the morning will come.
> Brightly will it shine on the brave and true, kindly on all who suffer for the cause, glorious upon the tombs of heroes. Thus will shine the dawn. Vive la France! Long live also the forward march of the common people in all the lands toward their just and true inheritance, and toward the broader and fuller age.

That is one of our war aims, the restoration of France and all these other countries, but let us not confuse that aim with the immediate provocation that has brought us to arms.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I know those whom I represent in this house would want me to say that while there will be dark days ahead, bringing with them ruin and death, there will be brighter days. The enemy is not invincible. He has been strong but also he has been fortunate. The day of reckoning will come. Then our forces will go from Dover, from Folkestone and from Croydon across the green fields of France, through her villages, her towns and her cities, mellowed by time and civilization, on into the heart of Berlin and of Berchtesgaden. They will go on not to the heart of Rome, for that eternal city belongs not to Caesar but to God; they will go on to the heart of the Palazzo Venezia, standing as it does opposite the monument to Victor Emmanuel, and to the heart of that also. By these various penetrations the victory will be sealed, and free men and women and their children will cry out, "Liberty and Christianity shall not perish from the earth."

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, as has been repeated several times, we have been summoned so that an opportunity might be accorded for the fullest consideration and discussion of Canada's war effort, and to discuss the national problems which the war has served to intensify or to create. I think we will all agree that this is a big order. I believe it will be also agreed that this has been one of the dullest and most ineffectual sessions imaginable. I see very little in the way of results. I wonder why.

Does it not appear ridiculous to try properly to discuss Canada's war effort before we have had statements from the responsible ministers and before we have had access, through our various committees, to factual data and contract material? Ministers have been giving their reports, one each day we have been sitting, and still, three weeks after the opening of the session, those statements are not complete. How can we expect a full consideration of the problem without these two essentials, and without the full reports of all the ministers?

By this time, however, sufficient information has been given the house to indicate certain definite trends—and some of them I fear are not very good ones. The first is the wholesale recruiting of a noble army of controllers from organized industry in Canada. About thirty-seven boards, committees, bureaux and panels have been set up, and if we read through their personnel we might conclude that we are reading "Who's Who" in Canada's big financial and industrial interests.

In the most important department of government, that of munitions and supply, these people have been taken in and clothed with all the power of state. The administration has geared big business into government officialdom. I should like to warn the administration now that the same tactics and plans were followed in Great Britain, and they failed. I suggest the reasons are obvious—not that we are charging unpatriotism, but man is naturally a creature of his own environment. Unfortunately for the common people in Canada, in recent years big business has become almost a law unto itself, and its representatives are nourished and trained in the atmosphere of greed and selfishness. Profits are the big thing to them. Dividends, the ruthless wiping out of small opposition, cut-throat competition, even restraint of production are encouraged, so long as they bring big profits.

What we now require is efficient production and, above all, the delivery of goods. There should be no patronage and no profit. Industry, finance and labour should be working together in this great effort so ably outlined by the last speaker. Has there been a complete change of heart in these men who represent big business? I believe that it was the armament business in Europe which was largely responsible for our present plight, and that Germany was armed because there was money in it. I believe that France was betrayed because there was money in it. Has Canadian big business become repentant, since its conduct in September, 1939, when it refused to touch our contracts, when profits were limited by statute to 5 per cent? Has it suddenly decided that profits are to be only secondary from now on?

These men find themselves in a rather impossible position. Their loyalties are divided. In the past they have subscribed to the creed that "patriotism is a very fine sentiment but that it must not be allowed to interfere with our sacred duties as the trustees of our shareholders." We do not believe in these sudden conversions; they never last. But we will have to remember that, if we are going to be successful, that motive must go. It was that greed and profit motive which ruined Canada in the time of peace. That is what brought unemployment upon our country, and made it necessary for us to spend a billion dollars upon relief. That is what turned one million of the eleven million people in Canada to relief lines, and caused us to have a forgotten youth without opportunity, and to have starvation in the midst of plenty.

We in this group have pleaded for the taking over of the essential industries, under experienced supervision and efficient control. That had to be done in Great Britain. After they passed their mobilization act, they went to work and did it. I believe that ultimately we, too, are going to have to do it. We repeat that plea to-day. It was only after that was done in Great Britain that they performed the miracle in production with which they thrilled the world. They are equalling to-day the accomplishments of that great man, Mr. David Lloyd George, in the days of the last war. Assure the people of a square deal; assure them of some equality in the sacrifice, and you will make the greatest contribution toward a united people.

The signs of what is happening may be revealed by an article which appeared on the front page of the Regina Leader-Post of November 15, 1940, under the name of B. T. Richardson. It is in these words:

> Reports heard in Ottawa indicate that chaotic conditions are threatening along the industrial front unless a large measure of broad and intelligent planning is applied to war industry, because shortages of labour, of industrial capacity, of power and of raw materials have appeared. The situation that is developed is due basically to many branches of industry, all well loaded with large war contracts, competing without regard to any central plan for the sinews of production.

Is it not significant that the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) rose in his place in the house on November 20 and, after giving the membership of the board, stated that it had been appointed on Friday, November 15? This appointment was made fourteen months after the war began. It is said to be a board to coordinate the war effort with regard to the requirements and sinews of war. Does it not seem obvious that it should have been one of the first boards to be appointed?

The actions of some of these war-time boards in western Canada are subject to some question. If one were to review briefly the history of the grain trade in the west, he would find that for years the grain exchange exploited the western farmer. In my humble opinion, the amount of money they took from western agriculturists is about equal to the debt which now weighs so heavily upon those people, and which threatens to crush them entirely. It amounts to hundreds of millions of dollars.

Trying to solve this problem, the people organized their pool elevators and pool organizations. After years of struggle and fighting they built up a tremendous organization for the purpose of handling grain. At the present time they handle almost fifty per cent of the wheat delivered at country points, in spite of the fact that they have much less than 50 per cent of the elevators built in that western area. The government control boards, by the very simple operation of alloting cars for the handling of grain to those country elevators in proportion to the elevator space at those points, instead of on the basis of the business handled last year by the companies at those points, have compelled many of the growers to use the facilities of other companies.

It is most important that a cooperative pool organization should keep its membership at the highest possible point. So, to save any loss of customers, they spent millions of dollars in order to provide this year extra temporary storage space. In spite of that, we find that the percentage of the grain handled by them to October 31 of this year had dropped to 40·8 per cent, compared with the 45·51 per cent which they handled last year, and the percentage handled by them had been increasing for a number of years. This experience causes some alarm. The greatest threat to profiteering industry is the cooperative, and we do not like to see these cooperative organizations being sabotaged in this manner. I hope before this session is completed we shall have further legislation to stop this kind of thing, and I hope we shall have no more of the type of legislation passed at the last session to impose the processing tax.

It will be remembered that when the resolution was before the house we were assured that the millers and bakers would absorb this processing levy, which would amount to about $7,500,000 on 50,000,000 bushels of wheat. Before the bill got through the house and became law, the millers were simply made the collectors of the levy, they having to collect it from the purchasers of the flour. The levy being passed on to the bakers, we then found the bakers boosting the price of bread by one cent a loaf. Immediately the price control board came into operation, as it should, and stopped the increase in the price of bread, and the bakers were told to sell their bread at the same price they had charged previously. Had that not been done, the bakers would have stood to profit by about $12,000,000, which is considerably different from a loss of about $7,500,000. This figure is based upon a consumption of 50,000,000 bushels and the fact that about forty loaves of bread can be made from one bushel of wheat. A few days after the house adjourned last August, an order in council was passed rescinding the order of the price control board. Apparently we shall have to be constantly on the alert to see that the price of this commodity does not rise.

The second thing which the people of Canada are asking this parliament to do is to see that during this war the money they pay in taxes is not wasted. Investigation of these matters is quite impossible until the different committees are functioning. I should like the government to tell us why the public accounts committee is not functioning. Contracts are being awarded by the thousands, and we have been told by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) that about $500,000,000 worth have been let in Canada. The public accounts committee should be reviewing the war expenditures and the type of contracts that have been let, as well as the organization of the new government plants and any other plants to which the government has lent money. All we have had made available to us are the contracts let to September 1, 1940, which information is contained in several volumes, most of them containing over 600 pages. What do we learn from them? We learn that a number of new companies have been organized, and the parentage of these companies should be the subject of investigation. Opening a volume at random, I find the following at page 235 of the record of contracts awarded to the end of July:

Name of contractor: Kenwood Mills Limited, Arnprior, Ontario.
Commodity: Blankets.
Date of order: July 15, 1940.
Delivery: Commencing August 10, 1940, or sooner, at rate of 3,000 or more weekly, completed September 30, 1940.
Destination: National defence inspection room, 138 Queen street, Ottawa, Ontario.
Amount: $99,123.75.
No. of order in council: 3965.

What is the price being paid per blanket? What quality of blanket is being furnished? This information is not given. The Minister of Munitions and Supply has said that we may ask any question we wish, but does he want 200 of us to ask him questions about each one of these thousands and thousands of contracts? We should have this information. This public accounts committee has not been functioning. One of our duties this session should be the reviewing of these contracts. That is what the people want to know. I understand that this committee has not functioned for years, but the people want to know these things now. This information will fortify their faith; it will go a long way towards clearing up the mystery and suspicion that surround government action. I think it is the duty of every hon. member to demand that as a representative of the people he be told the facts.

In spite of the fact that agriculture is in its present terrible condition, the agriculture committee is not sitting. I understand that this committee has not sat for at least eighteen months. Last session we were promised a health committee, but I do not see that committee in the list of committees we were given the other day. The railway committee is not sitting, nor is the committee on marine and fisheries or the committee on banking and commerce. There have been no sittings of the committee on mines, forests and waters. This information should be public property. The facts which could be brought out by these committees should be brought out now.

We in this group have been attacked during this session by hon. members who should know better. We cannot say, as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) can, that we are surrounded by a galaxy of constitutional lawyers. But we can say that we are fighting for humanity, that we are fighting in order that the people of this country may be given an opportunity to live decently and well. We are still fighting for freedom and democracy. We have been trying to build up an order of society in which cooperation may live. We are pleading for social security. We do not mean security for the upper groups in any community, or for the middle class or for those in the lower brackets; we are pleading for social security for the whole community. We are fighting the battle of those who toil and suffer, of those who, while they produce the wealth of the country, find themselves in a disgraceful condition of unemployment and insecurity. Lack of opportunity has existed for many of these people simply because they have been dispossessed.

There now exists in the minds of many people the suspicion that intimidation and discrimination are being practised in connection with the enforcing of the defence of Canada regulations. There is still much to be desired from those regulations. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) stressed this point. The other day I was pleased to hear the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) voice his approval of the suggestions which had been made, and I feel quite sure that his opinion will have considerable weight with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). But I should like to quote what he said as reported on page 309 of Hansard:

We hear these regulations attacked, sometimes with much vigour, on the ground that they are not in accordance with British justice—great stress is laid upon that phrase. They are attacked in the press and elsewhere, and

I wonder whether those who attack the regulations on that ground are aware that, so far as the internment of subversive elements is concerned, our regulations are patterned precisely upon the British regulations as they exist to-day.

I should like to point out to the hon. member that our regulations are not analogous to the British regulations, particularly British 18b which corresponds to our section 21. I would point out the difference to him. There is a difference between the British regulations and ours, and I offer the suggestion that an early review and an amendment of these regulations be made in order to remove some of the evils which exist in their application in their present form. That is most imperative. The first consideration that I should like to suggest is that a sufficient number of committees be set up to deal properly with the large number of cases that are passing before those responsible for review, and that provision be made to assure that objecting persons have sufficient factual material to justify their charge against the accused.

Let me give a concrete case of abuse. It is a case that occurred in this very city last summer. On the 6th of July a certain Ernie Myerhoffer, a resident of this city, was arrested on the allegation that he had said something in contravention of regulation 39. Bail was set, but being poor he could not pay it and he had to remain in gaol. The unfortunate part was that it was the 30th of July before his case came up for review. The hearing lasted only a few minutes because the only witness for the prosecution upon whose information the arrest apparently had been made had no evidence to give. He had not heard the accused use the language in question, let alone the particular statement he was alleged to have made. The crown attorney apologized to the magistrate and the case was dismissed. But in the meantime that poor man's family had been evicted from their home, and hardship had been suffered. Such things are disgraceful and should not occur.

I am going to repeat the recommendations which have been made by others and which, I think, should receive serious consideration by the government. First, there should be an enlargement of the reviewing committees in order to satisfy the public that there can be no discrimination. Second, there should be a widening of the scope of the information to which the accused may have access so that he might know his crime and the charge laid against him, and the evidence so far as that is possible.

I want to pay tribute at this time to that portion of the Canadian press—I am afraid it is mostly in eastern Canada and mostly west of here—which has fulfilled one of the great functions of a free press, that of the defence of liberty when it sees it attacked. We do not seem to have that kind of press in certain parts of the west, but elsewhere when there has been a great duty to perform in Canada there have been editors of newspapers who in their press and in their position as editors have seen fit to draw attention to the serious defects in the defence of Canada regulations. They seem to realize that democracy can be maintained only so long as the people have faith that the ends of justice are being properly served.

One of the national problems which this war has served to intensify is agriculture, and I want to tell this administration that the country feels this severely. Other industries are booming. Every report in financial papers and industrial magazines shows a tremendous upcurve in industry. Agriculture alone is forgotten and kicked down. I would recall to the Prime Minister his words which appear at page 48 of Hansard of this session, when he was speaking of what Hitler's regime would be like were he to subjugate this country. He said:

> Their economies will be economies that satisfy the greed of their masters; their farmers will be peasants, and their workers, slaves.

Let me inform the house that to-day thousands of farmers in Canada are peasants and thousands of our workers, slaves. There is every evidence of a determined effort in certain mining and industrial areas in the east to keep the workers slaves. There seems to be a determined effort to prevent the organization of unions. It seems to me that if those who are opposing the organization of unions would look into the facts, they would find that where labour is organized there are fewer strikes and more peaceful and efficient operation of industry than where labour is not organized.

With regard to agriculture I have seen a great people in the west, a free people ready to make their contribution to the world and already making it, turned into a peasantry under the actions of the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) both in the west and in Ottawa. Things look extremely desperate for the people in the west now, and they are feeling the full force of the policies or lack of policies of this administration.

The report of the Minister of Agriculture on his return from Britain was a slap in the face for many people who had put their trust in him. Agriculture is a national problem for Canada, and it is a calamity for many people engaged in it, particularly in the west. We find that in the average community the whole economic structure is slowly collapsing. Doctors are moving out of many districts. Store-keepers can no longer advance credit to keep the people producing, and the producers under a lower standard of living are moving out. The ordinary social activities of many disctricts have largely ceased. Schools in many parts are becoming mere slum schools. The municipalities are so hard pressed that they are forced to prevent the farmer from selling his crop until the municipality has seized its share. The municipalities have their taxes hypothecated by the banks; then they have to go back to the banks in order to borrow more money to carry on their ordinary activities, and the bankers direct their policies—the amount that shall be spent on relief, how much shall be granted to a school district, how much shall be made available to the municipality to carry on. Mortgage and machinery companies cannot collect their accounts in many areas this year. They cannot get blood out of a stone. They could not make the farm pay by running it themselves, and so they just add on the interest and wait for the break to come.

I am fearful that if agriculture in the west becomes a business proposition where profits can be made out of the growing of grain, many of our farmers will find that they are no longer possessors of their land. I would remind the house that 90 per cent of the farms in Saskatchewan are mortgaged, and less than 5 per cent of the farmers of the province are out of debt. Crops in Saskatchewan have been meagre for years because of lack of efficient machinery and power, and the land has become weedy. The consequence is that the homes are suffering deterioration. In less than 1 per cent of the farms does one find buildings with much paint on them. Clothing is scarce, and the farmer who in better times carried life insurance finds that this, too, has gone. He can no longer protect himself against hail. Medical and dental attention is required in the family in about three out of five cases. This year there is a harvest, but what the farmer can get from his crop on delivering his first quota will in many instances, scarcely pay for the cost of harvesting.

The Minister of Agriculture, after visiting the mother of parliaments, says on his return to Canada, "Why should the government change its policies with regard to agriculture? The policies are Liberal; they were endorsed in peace time by the farming population when proposed in 1935; they were put into practice for four years and endorsed in war time no later than March 26 last." His crowning contribution to the house in this time of stress was to gloat over his power to create unemployment among those who had presented themselves as candidates for the opposition. I wonder whether that is, if I may use the words of the Prime Minister, the "armour of God," with which the administration is clothing itself at this time.

Speaking last Friday, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) said this:

> I hope that what I have said this afternoon will not be construed as an argument that all the wheat growers are in a happy position to-day and that little need be done for them. They are not unmindful of the responsibilities that Canada is assuming, and although the 70 cents per bushel advance payment may not give many farmers even a meagre profit over cost of production they are accepting this as part of their contribution to the war effort.

And he ends with this remark:

> We are undertaking to see that they do not bear an unfair share of the burden.

I should like to remind the minister that he has there made a great promise. I wonder whether he realizes the full significance of it.

The growing of grain at a loss in the west means that a debt is being piled upon these people which they cannot surmount. Making that contribution at this time may mean, in a few years from now, the entire loss of everything they possess. Unless you give them protection; unless they obtain some form of moratorium; unless the seizure of their homes by mortgage, finance and machine companies is stopped, the contribution which they will have to make will be the loss of everything they possess.

I was glad to get the minister's promise. We in the west, particularly our farmers, have been promised a great many things. In fact, to many of these people Canada is really now a land of promise. They were promised lower prices on machinery, but they did not get lower prices. For a number of years they have been promised real debt legislation, dollar wheat, interim payments and final payments. Township 23 in, I think, range 5, was promised a bonus on March 26 last. I should like to know from the Minister of Agriculture if that bonus has yet been paid; it was not paid last July. There must be a moratorium placed on debts, a parity price fixed for those commodities which the farmer is growing, a payment on his stored grain, and some of those payments which were promised to him less than a year ago. If that is done, there will be some recovery. There will be a recovery of homes, which is important, a recovery of hope, which is of more importance, and a recovery of morale, which is of the greatest importance. Our population will then be able to make an effective contribution to the war.

Many young men in the farming areas were unable to make homes for themselves. Several years ago it was announced that they would be allowed a payment of $5 a month; that grant was given to them so that they could go out and work and make homes for themselves. That was the way in which this government treated the young men who were to constitute the next generation of a great Canada. And they read in the records of this house that ex-members of this parliament were to be granted $200 a day and their expenses.

Consider the situation of a young man, say about twenty years of age, wondering what he can do towards the building up of Canada, and in love with the girl over on the next farm. He finds that he cannot make a living; his father cannot help him to get started. So he goes out to work for a neighbour at $5 a month paid by the government; and when he learns that some other person, now a member of this house, is to receive $200 a day, he starts to figure up what that person could earn at that rate in a month and finds that it amounts to $6,000. He then starts figuring out, "How long would it take for me to make that much?" and he calculates that it would take him just 1,200 months at his then rate of pay, working twelve months a year. In other words, in one hundred years from now, when he is 121 years old, he will be able to celebrate his birthday by coming home, marrying the girl with whom he is in love, and living happily ever afterwards.

This young man, however, now finds out that his country needs him. He is willing to fight for his empire when he sees it attacked, and to-day he is in the army, the navy or the air force. As he lined up to go to camp, he wonders again whether his services are going to be appreciated. If he is successful in passing the medical examination, which many years of privation have made it difficult for him to do, he is sure at least of sufficient food and clothing. He is now in camp, Christmas is approaching, and he wants to go home on leave; yet he finds that under existing regulations his transportation will cost him anywhere from $30 to $50, depending upon the distance to his home.

I spoke during July on this matter, and I have been pleased to see that since that time hon. members in all parts of the house have been advocating that something be done in this regard. These men are giving everything; they are willing even to sacrifice their lives. Are we in Canada not prepared to show at least as much appreciation as is expressed in this small concession? I feel sure that the administration will do something, and I am going to leave it at that. I hope that it will not be confined to Christmas leave. I hope they will see to it that our railways will carry free of charge any member of our forces when he is on official leave.

May I refer briefly to another matter before I close?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I am sorry to have to remind the hon. gentleman that his time has expired.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: With the permission of the house I will finish, briefly, what I had to say. In the constituency I represent there are several Indian reserves. I was called upon by some of these Indians to meet representatives from the reserves, and I found that conditions were rather terrible. On one reserve, namely the Gordon reserve at Punnichy, there are fifty families of Indian farmers of whom, I believe, less than sixteen are producing sufficient of any commodity to keep themselves alive. Trapping, fishing and hunting, which used to form a large portion of their means of livelihood, are almost gone. The health, education and morale of these people are low. There are some fine people on these reserves; there are fine qualities of character which are capable of development if these people are given a chance, but there is no one to present their case. No one will speak for them; they have no votes. Last winter there was a tragedy at the school in that reserve. I hope the minister responsible will take the first opportunity to look into the matter of the reserves in that area and improve the conditions which now exist.

In conclusion, I would say this. I agree with what Mr. Ernest Bevin said recently, that "one of the biggest factors contributing to this war was the failure after the last war to erect an economic structure of society which was based on humanity." I wonder whether we are going to learn anything from that. I submit that we should be seeing to it that we plan and start erecting such a structure in Canada now.

Mr. W. B. MacDIARMID (Glengarry): I should like to say a few words with regard to the problems of the farmers in my district. I wish I had some of the oratorical ability of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier and also some of the foresight, diplomacy, tact and gift of repartee of Sir John A. Macdonald, so that I might place before this house the problems that beset our farmers at this time.

In my opinion food was the chief factor in the winning of the last war, and lack of food was the cause of the collapse of Germany. The food blockade of enemy countries and the production of food in the allied countries constituted one of the chief means of winning the last war, and we are all of the opinion that the same means will be responsible for victory in this war.

There is one thing on which, I believe, this house is unanimously agreed, and that is the winning of the war. We all want to win the war; I do not think there is any disagreement on that score. And we all want to win it as speedily as possible and with the smallest loss of life not only to our Canadian soldiers but to the soldiers of Britain who are fighting for the freedom and the liberty of the world.

These soldiers of ours are fighting against the savagery and barbarity of Hitlerism. If Hitler were here to-day, how many of us would be living? I would have been shot days ago, or perhaps months ago. None of us would be living if we dared to express our thoughts against the government in power or against those directing our affairs. We do not appreciate our blessings. We rise in our places in this house and argue and criticize, but if we were under Hitler it would be execution for us. That is one reason why, I say, we do not appreciate the work of our soldiers and the work of this government.

This government was elected on the platform that it would carry on the war. Its members were elected from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and the people having elected the government, the government is responsible and it should carry on. It should carry out its platform, and I cannot see why all of us cannot concentrate and cooperate with the government to that end. Let the government carry out their promises and, if they do not, then we can do the same to them as was done to the last war government. These are the views of a newcomer, one who is inexperienced and unable to express himself as he would like.

A noted general once said that an army cannot fight on an empty stomach. The morale and courage of any people who have been bombed incessantly for the last few weeks and months cannot be maintained as it should be if those people, and especialy the women and children, are hungry. Therefore it is our duty to produce food and send it to them to the limit of our capacity to do so.

That is the problem we have to deal with in my constituency. Our farmers are of Scottish and French descent for the most part, and I do not want any member to rise in his place, either on this side or on the other side of the house, and tell me that I do not grow wheat or raise cows or hogs or produce milk. I have been raised, and I practise my profession, among these people, having lived among them all my life, and I am qualified to discuss their trials and their problems. Our farmers work from early in the morning until late at night, twelve months a year. I can vouch for this because in my night visits in the practice of my profession I see lights burning in their barns hours before daylight and long after dark. They are patriotic and loyal, and many of our farmers' sons are now in uniform.

The trouble with our farmers is that they have to pay too much for the commodities they buy in comparison with the prices they receive for the produce they sell. In my district the majority of the farmers depend upon milk and hogs. The production of milk in the winter months depends upon bran, middlings and feeds of that sort from the west, and prices of these articles have risen very high. It is said that the reason is that the millers have unlimited quantities of the best flour in the world, but they cannot send it to Germany or to France. They cannot unload it, and so they raise the prices of these necessary foodstuffs which our farmers require. Thus our farmers are penalized.

Last year our farmers were not receiving $1 a hundred for cheese. They were getting 87 cents and now they are getting $1.10. Mr. Singleton, the agricultural representative, said that the farmers should produce more, that they should produce all that they could, because the old country needed our cheese. How will they produce more if they do not receive more for their milk? It is a serious question in my constituency.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MacDIARMID: As I have said already, Mr. Speaker, our farmers are having great difficulty in maintaining the production of milk and cheese, which is so necessary at this time. Our farmers are very loyal and patriotic. Many of them in my constituency come to me with their problems. One or two have been widows, with only sons twenty-one years of age, who were running their farms. If these boys have to take military training, the work on those farms cannot be done, and production will be lessened. As you know, farmers work on schedule. The other day I heard an hon. member ask what was schedule. To us it means on time. I know at least one farmer who has a clock in his barn. His cows are milked at a certain hour at night and a certain hour in the morning, and it is necessary that all these matters be attended to by experienced people.

If there is no one to take the places of these young farmers when they are taking military training, production will suffer, because to-day no one wants to go on a farm and feed cows, clean stables and so on for the wages the farmers can afford to pay. It is utterly impossible to get any help. With the wages being paid in the munitions factories it would be foolish for a man to work on a farm for a dollar a day and his board. And then, when he works in a factory, he is through at five o'clock in the afternoon.

This is one of our great problems. I understand there are to be no exemptions from military training. What is going to happen, then? These widows to whom I have referred are unable to do the work on their farms. What are they to do? They have asked that the military training of their sons be postponed, but I would suggest to the government that if they want to maintain the production of milk and cheese they should adopt some regulation which would permit these men to stay on the job.

That is one suggestion I have to offer. Another would be that in view of the high cost of winter feeds, such as middlings and bran, that are necessary for increased production, the farmers should be given an increased premium on both cheese and pork, in order to stimulate greater production. Only last Saturday a farmer was in my office. He said he had sold six pigs and that he had to take a cut of $10 each in the grade. Another man told me that on each of seven pigs he was cut $4.50, which took away all the profit. Perhaps that does not seem very much to some hon. members, but it is a good deal of money to the farmer.

Another matter into which I think the government should inquire is the exorbitant prices farmers have to pay for their machinery. Just a few days ago one farmer told me that he had paid over $400 for a binder, while another said that he had paid over $300. Those machines are used for only a few days, and then are put away in the shed. The same thing applies to mowers; all these machines cost three or four times their old prices. I cannot see any reason for such tremendous increases in the cost of these implements which the farmer has to buy in order to carry on his work, especially when many of them are used only for a short time during the year. So I think this government should take some steps to reduce the cost of the machines the farmers have to buy. If that cannot be done, the government should increase the prices of the commodities the farmers produce, in order to make up for the increased cost of the articles they have to buy.

I agree with the hon. member who said that it was necessary to have our boys properly equipped and trained before sending them overseas. I would add that we do not want our boys to go over there with paper-soled shoes, the wrong rifles, the wrong ammunition, and without proper training. In the last war I think some of our men were sent overseas before they were ready. I do not blame the government of that day, because they did what they thought was best, but I know personally of many fine young Canadians who were sent to France in the last war with insufficient training and improper equipment, and who simply became living targets for the guns of the huns.

Last winter I received a visit from a soldier, a private, who also served in the last war. I asked how the equipment compared, because we had heard so much criticism in that regard. He showed me his boots and said, "These boots are wonderful. You cannot get anything better." Then he showed me the warm clothing, the socks and so on, and said there was no comparison between the equipment he received in the last war and the equipment issued in this war. That is a concrete case; I know what I am talking about, and am not repeating anything from hearsay.

Another hon. gentleman said that our first line of defence was in England. I think we will all agree with that statement. But would it be good military tactics to have only one line, with no second and third lines behind? I do not think so. I believe the Pacific and Atlantic coasts of this country should be fortified, because we do not know what may happen. I do not know personally, but I believe the government are doing just that without saying anything about it, and I think they are wise in doing so.

We have heard the statements of the various ministers, and I do not think any men, no matter where you chose them, could have done better work. We have heard criticism of them—very weak criticism—pointing out what should have been done two or three years ago. But what government would have dared go to the Canadian people at that time and say, "We want $500,000,000 to spend on armaments here," when France, Belgium, Denmark and all the other countries did not themselves know enough to start fortifying? Would it not have been ridiculous for a country with ten or twelve million people to take steps to protect the countries of Europe from themselves, when they were doing nothing at all about the matter?

It has been said also that from 1930 to 1935 the defence estimates were reduced. I believe the government then in power acted for the good of the country in reducing those estimates; they helped keep our taxes reasonably low. So I do not think we can criticize them for what they did, just as they should not criticize this government for not having done certain things three or four years ago.

As I said earlier in my remarks I have carried on my practice in three agricultural constituencies, Glengarry, Stormont and Prescott. I have been among these people all my life and I think I know them pretty well. I have heard something said in this house about starvation. I have never seen anyone die of starvation through lack of food. I have seen people die through starvation arising from some malignant disease, or through some wasting disease which would not permit them to assimilate food, but I have never yet seen anybody die of starvation from lack of food. Those who say that we are undernourished and are not fed when, in fact, we have plenty, are giving Canada a bad name. I know our farmers and other residents, if they knew what was happening, would never allow anybody to go hungry or to be cold. The people in my community would not rest if they thought there was anybody among them starving or cold. I know the residents of my constituency, and I know that they are composed of both Scotch and French.

We have heard it said that people in certain districts of Canada do not receive proper medical care. I know of medical men in my district who have attended people for years without any remuneration. They believe, as I do, that if the Almighty has given them strength to practise the medical profession they should go out to heal the sick and to relieve the ills of this land, whether or not they are paid for it. I believe, along with those medical men, that they should go out and do good by attending the needy, when it is necessary so to do.

Time and again I have had occasion to ask services from doctors in this city of Ottawa. They have always helped, and they have not been paid for it. Then, medical men in Montreal have given service when patients were not able to pay. Some who speak are very much exercised about the condition of people in the wide-open spaces, people who are far removed from civilization and medical attention. Well, if we look at it from the other side of the picture we might ask ourselves this question: Is it not criminal for a young man to take his bride away from civilization, and attempt to rear a family under those circumstances? I do not think we should blame the municipal, provincial or federal authorities, if those people wish to take a chance. If I choose to go on a hunting expedition and get hurt, I should not blame the authorities if they have not the proper medical attention for me. That is up to me, entirely. The Lord has given me sense and has given most people sense, and we ought not to attribute our difficulties to any government if we are not looked after, under those circumstances.

As one hon. member has said, we in the House of Commons are friends; we want to cooperate. If Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who was at one time the revered leader of the Liberal party, and if Sir John A. Macdonald were in this chamber to-night, facing each other in this time of stress, as the representatives of the two great races in Canada, I am sure they would cooperate, no matter which one was in office. I believe they would both put their shoulders to the wheel to do their best for Canada by submerging all political aspirations and ambitions. I believe that should be done by those who sit in this house to-day. Criticism is all right, but at this time I believe we ought to cooperate.

Possibly I am not speaking according to Hoyle, but I do not believe any party, whether in office or not, should now support the enactment of legislation which would entrench them at a time of any future election. Neither is it the time for any political party which has been travelling under an assumed name to revive, resuscitate and rehabilitate itself. Neither is it the time for any party to have passed any social legislation which would not be in the best interests of the country.

Mr. J. G. TURGEON (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me one point which has arisen directly from the fact that Canada is at war is that parliament is coming back into public esteem. People and newspapers that urge to-day that parliament should be sitting constantly, only a short year or two ago were regarding parliament as a public nuisance, a device through which the money of the taxpayers could be wasted. The participation of a member in this supposed waste of the money of the taxpayers was measured by the time consumed by him in speaking to the House of Commons upon public matters; costs were calculated in dollars and cents.

I believe any person who is truly in love with British principles and the British system of government will not only welcome this change but be delighted by it. In totalitarian governments there is no such thing as public opinion. In a government such as we have in Canada public opinion is the most sensitive and at the same time the most vital force in a government, whether legislative or administrative.

There are many phases of public opinion I should like to discuss this evening. Time will not permit my discussion of all of them, but for a moment or two I shall deal with something which for several generations has been close to the aspirations of the Canadian people. It is true that it has been discussed so much at this session and throughout the country during the last six months that it would be worn threadbare now, were it not for the richness of its texture and for the fact that it has been and will be the most strengthening force in Canada's conduct of the war. I refer to what on many occasions has been eloquently described as unity of thought in Canada. It is my personal conviction that this is a unity of thought and action which will continue to abide with us when war is over, and when the problems of peace are before us for solution.

Like every other hon. member who has mentioned the matter of unity among those of different race and language, and like many thousands of people throughout the country I give the greatest credit and express the highest appreciation to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) for the work they have done in bringing about this condition of unity not only between Ontario and Quebec, but among all phases of our population, whether they be divided economically, as by classes, geographically, between the east and the west, or by race and language, as are the people of Quebec and those in other parts of Canada.

Addressing for the moment hon. members from the province of Quebec, and speaking as one who knows well the Pacific province in the extreme western part of Canada, I say that in the work he has done in bringing to a head all the efforts which have been made toward unity of purpose, the Minister of Justice has certainly touched the heart-strings of the people in British Columbia. Continuing my talk to hon. members from Quebec I say that no man excels the Minister of Justice in public estimation in British Columbia despite the fact that he comes from the French-speaking, French-thinking province of Quebec.

But to these two men whose actions I extol, all credit is not due. There has been leadership which has brought about certain results, but leadership comes from inspiration. I should like to take a few minutes of the valuable time of this house in attempting to discover the root of the inspiration which has brought about this leadership. Many years ago when the wars on the north American continent were finished, this country which is now ours was born in a manifestation of true British justice which at the same time was a stroke of imperial genius. It was Lord Acton who said in an essay on freedom that the greatest thing in a hundred years of progress on the part of the British people was that true freedom which recognized and gave liberty to others as a matter of justice and charity, not merely in satisfaction of a claim of right. That was the spirit which animated the people of Canada. That is the spirit which gave birth to this country before the British colonies of north America united as the Dominion of Canada.

While I am dealing with this particular spirit of liberty, which naturally embraces good will, tolerance and the absence of bigotry, may I take a few moments to relate my own experience? I do this not for the purpose of speaking of myself, but as one of a minority to pay a tribute to the great majority that exists in Canada. I do this for the further purpose of refuting what a great political philosopher once said, that democracy was the most cruel of all forms of government, because the minority was always in the power and under the control of those who happened to be in the majority. My experience is the exact opposite; it tells only of good will and the lack of anything like intolerance.

Thirty-four years ago I went to the then new province of Alberta and settled in a district which happened to be one hundred per cent English-speaking and about ninety-nine per cent Protestant in religion. The people there knew that I was at least partly French because they had trouble in pronouncing my name. They knew that I was Roman Catholic in religion because when we were successful in having a priest come in, we celebrated mass in my home, except on those occasions when there were more than my little home would accommodate. We then celebrated mass in the Masonic hall.

Six years after my arrival I was elected to represent those people and to speak for them and in their name in the legislature of Alberta. To show that this was not just an accident, may I say that in the late fall of 1921 I went to British Columbia, not knowing a living soul in that province. To-day I represent in this house the district of Cariboo, which is overwhelmingly English-speaking and nearly overwhelmingly Protestant in religion. I have won elections and I have been defeated; but never on any occasion, either in Alberta or in British Columbia, have I lost a single vote because of race or religion. It is a great pleasure for me to-night to have this opportunity to speak as one who is in a double minority, as it were, and praise the freedom and the love of tolerance of those who form the majority in Canada.

Many matters having to do with public opinion naturally arise during a debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I listened the other day to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), and I have listened to others who followed him, directing the attention of the ministry to the fact that there has been a concentration of industry in central Canada in connection with our war effort. It is stated that the people of the maritimes and the far west have not been treated fairly. I do not bring up this matter for the purpose of adding to the complaints or to the denials; I rise simply to say to the Prime Minister and to his colleagues that I believe that what they are doing is being done by reason of the fact that time is an element in the supplying of equipment, aeroplanes and munitions, that I believe that all these things are required, not for themselves alone but because they are needed in a hurry. Therefore I stand here without hesitation and say in the name of my constituents that if that is the reason why there has been this concentration of industry, then continue that concentration.

I speak now on behalf of a constituency which has received nothing whatever from the war effort of Canada. Our young men are enlisting and the moment they sign up they are whisked away to the coast. Our grain growers have been told that they cannot sell their grain because the war has destroyed their market. No industrial effort has been started in my constituency. But if the desire is, as I sincerely believe it is, to help people who are harassed and beleaguered in the old country, then I say, continue.

While the criticism which has been offered may be justified, I am reminded of the fact that a new doctrine of justification is finding birth in the minds of some who are ready to speak without reflection and reckon with the consequences only after they see the results of the impact upon public opinion of what they have said. This doctrine holds that criticism is justified because this government is supposed to be a one-party government. Leaving aside for the moment any comments that might be made on that thought, I think I am right in drawing this inference: If we had what is usually called a union government, then there would be no criticism. If the basis for the justification for criticism is the fact that this is a one-party government, then the establishment of a union government would eliminate all criticism. Then that which has been proclaimed from the Atlantic to the Pacific about the majesty of parliament would disappear immediately.

I understand that preparations are again being made to exert further pressure to bring about a union government. I intend to say nothing about that beyond throwing out the suggestion that whatever good points there might be about a union government, and doubtless there would be some, it is a good thing for the people of Canada that when the opportunity presented itself and advantage was taken of it by this government to make those excellent arrangements between the United States and Canada which were made at Ogdensburg, there was not included in the the Canadian government at that time any public man whose philosophy of politics and whose past made it impossible for him to participate in any closer or more intimate relations with the United States.

Mr. HOMUTH: Whom does the hon. member mean by that?

Mr. TURGEON: I mean several, and when my hon. friend asks the question he knows exactly whom I mean or he would not be disturbed by my statement.

Mr. HOMUTH: I am not disturbed at all.

Mr. TURGEON: But if it was a good thing for Canada, Mr. Speaker, how magnificent a thing it was for the people of the British isles! That reminds me that to-day because of certain criticism which has been directed against the Ogdensburg agreement entered into between the Prime Minister of Canada and the President of the United States, a feeling is gradually developing against the construction of joint defence works in the two countries.

Naturally time will not allow me to go fully into the question of joint defence works, but first let me throw out this warning. Ever since the beginning of the war we in Canada have tried to convince the people of the United States of the danger that would be theirs if, by any chance, Great Britain should be defeated, and of the danger which would be theirs if, by reason of the downfall of Great Britain, Canada should be invaded. To-day Great Britain as well as Canada are asking for still further aid from the people of the United States, aid which is required by the people of the British isles who with such sublime courage and against odds unparalleled in military history are withstanding an aggression unequalled in brutality in the whole history of the world. The warning that I give not only to this house but to all newspapers and public men is, let us say nothing and do nothing that might lessen the enthusiasm of the people of the United States in their effort to help us and the British people on the other side of the Atlantic ocean.

History will write much of the right hon. the Prime Minister and most of it will be good, but no deed of his will be written of more proudly than the one he has accomplished during the last few months by bringing the people of the United States, the people of Canada and the people of Great Britain closer together. I say to those of us who are married men with families that when we have passed and gone and the history of these times is being read, our children will be proud that their parents had the opportunity and the privilege of sitting in parliament with the Prime Minister to share his toils and his trials, and by their friendly advice and constructive criticism help to shape his policies and to put Canada in the position in which she is to-day.

In connection with the joint defence works by Canada and the United States, and having particular regard to what was said a day or two ago by Lord Lothian in connection with the financial position of Great Britain, I wish now to make a suggestion to the ministry, which, because of its nature, I make to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie King). It is this. Every dollar that Canada can provide for munitions and equipment and the other commodities which the people of the British isles need so direly to-day, must go to that effort. There must be no diversion except such as may be absolutely essential. Our aim must be to help the people on the other side of the Atlantic ocean.

Canada is a gold-producing country, and I suggest that these two ministers give consideration to making an arrangement with the United States, that rich country which to-day is in possession of nearly all the gold of the world, whereby she will make available to this dominion a credit, not in terms of money, but in terms of ounces of gold, to be drawn upon by us in payment for the cost of construction of any joint Canadian-United States defence works that may be undertaken.

I further suggest that the liquidation of this obligation should commence when the war is over, and that each year there should be set aside from the gold production of Canada a certain percentage of our output in order to extinguish that obligation which we shall have incurred to the people of the United States. Someone asked me when I was making this suggestion at Regina some weeks ago whether I meant by that to give the United States a mortgage against our gold production. Naturally not. But when you borrow money—and states are continually borrowing money in war and peace—you arrange for a sinking fund and set aside year by year a part of your income in order to make certain that the debt will be extinguished. That is all I am suggesting in connection with our production of gold, that every year there be set aside a certain percentage of our gold production so that in course of time the total debt will be extinguished. I suggest, naturally, that it be a non-interest bearing debt and that a certain amount of our gold production be earmarked for the purpose of a sinking fund.

This other thought I throw out in that connection. When the last war was over, Great Britain found it impossible to pay off her debt to the United States except by way of trade and commerce, which the United States did not find it convenient to accept, and a feeling of tension, strain and bad will grew up between the two countries. We do not know, you and I who are here to-day, what is going to be the economy of Canada or of the United States or what is going to be the economy of the world when this war is over and peace once more is shining upon us. We do not know what the price of gold will be then. It may be much higher or it may be much lower. But if our indebtedness to the United States is in terms of gold by weight, there can be no possibility of strain or ill will arising because we owe them gold, just as we might owe them any other commodity.

It may be suggested that the neutrality act will make this suggestion of mine impossible to carry out, but my opinion is that the neutrality act would not make a credit in terms of ounces of gold impossible. But even if it did, I still feel, by reason of what has been taking place in the last few months, that the people of the United States are ready to-day to advance such a credit to us in order that we may pay for our share of joint Canadian-United States defence works. I also feel that when the necessities of the motherland grow greater, the people of the United States, having gone with us part of the way, will be glad to go the whole distance, and that we shall have no further trouble in carrying on the work for lack of a credit or the provision of money.

In that regard I should like to say a word of commendation to the Prime Minister and also to his colleague the Minister of Finance, with reference to the statement made by the Prime Minister a couple of weeks ago, that only physical and moral capacity to sacrifice and to produce would be the measure by which we would determine our help to the people of the motherland and our efforts to defend ourselves. I have here a statement, which probably hon. members have seen, made by Colonel A. A. Magee, president of Barclay's bank. In speaking to the bank shareholders he says, among other things:

> The pressing problem at the moment is the placing of the war effort upon the most efficient basis within our power. The maintenance of the value of the Canadian dollar and the prevention of price inflation are of economic significance, but subordinate to the essential function of contributing to the utmost towards the winning of the war.

I have quoted that statement because that same man, president of Barclay's bank, is executive assistant to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston); and that determination, expressed so wisely and so well by the Prime Minister, to let nothing interfere with Canada's effort to help, has permeated all departments of government, as is indicated in the statement of the president of Barclay's bank. I congratulate the government upon it.

One thing disturbs me. I am afraid there is not existent in Canada to-day that realization of what this war means to us, without which a proper determination to win it cannot be built up. When I say that, I do not want any confusion of thought. I do not mean that there is any lack of confidence in the government, because I know that in the history of parliamentarianism no government has held the confidence of the people of Canada in spite of war to a greater degree than has the government which is in office to-day. What I fear is that we have not paid sufficient attention to what is going on in people's minds.

We have been talking about this being a war for democracy. There is no truer lover of democracy in this House of Commons than I am; but I remember, as all hon. gentlemen here do, that the same thing was said during the last war, and we all recall the expectations which were built upon what was said at that time but which did not work out. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to every person who hears my voice, that while it is true that we are fighting for democracy, we are fighting for life itself. Just imagine what would happen to us in Canada if by any mischance the people of the British isles should fail in the defensive struggle which they are waging against Hitler and Mussolini and their other actual and potential friends! Imagine what would happen to us! We are fighting for life. We are not fighting for democracy; we are fighting for national existence, for the life of the individual as well as for our life as a nation; and that is the truth which, it seems to me, should be brought more vigorously home to our people.

May I say a word, not of censure, but by way of asking whether it is wise to-day to demand, as some hon. members have done, that instead of prosecuting the war with all our force, we should get into a conference with the other nations of the commonwealth and our allies to determine what our war aims will be. Do those hon. members feel away down in their bosoms that their suggestion is a wise one? We cannot determine what our war aims will be, except in the general sense.

Therefore, in closing, Mr. Speaker, may I say through you, particularly to those hon. members who are asking for a conference or a council so that war aims can be determined and expressed, that if we win this war properly—not as we won the last war, and how much could be said on that—with the help of all peoples of British stock and of the people of the United States, and with the help of the glorious people of the little kingdom of Greece, and any others who may join her and ourselves—if we win the war properly, as I pray God we will, because winning it incompletely would not be much better than losing it, then we shall have a democracy such as man has only dreamed of and has neither seen nor experienced before. We shall have a democracy in which the class distinctions which have been imposed upon us in the progress of our industrial and agricultural eras will be washed away. We shall have a democracy in which the arrogance of race will no longer be permitted to subject the peoples of neighbouring states to a condition of slavery. We shall have in Canada and the other free nations of the world a democracy in which man will be distinct and free because he is a human being. Those are the peace aims and the aims for the end of the war which I hold and which I express to the house to-night, speaking, as I said at the beginning, for myself and my constituents of Cariboo.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I want to add a few words to this debate, which has now been carried on for nearly three weeks, in speaking to the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), and reading as follows:

> And this house further regrets the failure of the government to adopt a monetary policy that would permit a maximum war effort without either increasing debt or reducing the standards of living below that necessary for maintaining maximum efficiency;

Furthermore this house is of the opinion that a continuation of the present financial policy will further destroy the precious liberties so essential to, and recognized as being inherent in a true democracy.

Since the address in reply to the speech from the throne was moved, we have heard quite a few speeches—some good, some not so good—a very much diversified line-up, and all purporting to be given with honest intentions. During the last war, I believe, the same condition existed. People were shocked at things which happened during that war, as a number of us are shocked at what has gone on since its conclusion; and when the next war comes, as it surely will unless conditions are changed, those who come after us will again be shocked at what we are doing and what we shall have failed to do at the conclusion of this war.

Looking back over a number of years to the time when I left my native land, I can remember several hard things which were said about the people of the country of my birth. The same things are being said to-day about people belonging to other nationalities. Before anybody here or anywhere else in Canada ventures upon such ground, I suggest that he get the facts.

Last night we heard an able address from the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka), who spoke on behalf of the Ukrainians and other minorities in Canada. Those who were not here to listen to his speech would, I suggest, do well to read it in Hansard. Knowing the Ukrainians as I do, and having the honour to represent quite a number of them. I compliment the hon. member upon his address in their behalf, and I add my own words to his. The Ukrainians are misunderstood to a great extent simply because people do not take the trouble to find out anything about them. I have been a neighbour to Ukrainians for a number of years and I have also gone through districts in which there were few people but Ukrainians. It is true that the older people who came from the old land and slaved to make millionaires of some people in Canada, do not speak English as well as some of the rest of us do, but that is no fault whatever of theirs. I can imagine several members of this house going to a foreign country and trying late in life to learn the language.

With regard to the young Ukrainians, those in school, university or business, I can say that we of the English-speaking and French-speaking races have nothing at all on them. They are pretty intelligent and industrious. Moreover, as far as I have been able to find out, they are honest, which is one of the main things, I believe, in getting along. I said one of the main things in getting along and someone says, "humph." I am not surprised to hear that, because quite a few people across Canada are saying the same thing when we talk about honest dealings in connection with our war effort.

I have received several letters suggesting incidents that are occurring throughout the country. In connection with the war effort, we were told by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), when we came here a year ago last September, that people who profiteered would be classed as belonging to the underworld. I am sorry to say that to-day we have quite a few who belong to that category, according to the Prime Minister's statement.

Last night the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) gave an address. On previous occasions we have also had addresses from the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) and the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). I am glad to say that the Liberal party has at least some men who have backbone enough to rise in their places in this house and express their convictions. There are several men here representing constituencies who do not say a word from one end of the session to the other. In the few years I have been in the house I have known that to be true, and I have often wondered whether the people who vote for these members on election day know just what is being done on their behalf. If a man is dumb he has no business here, and the sooner the people realize it, the better it will be for all concerned.

A number of speeches have dealt with the war, and mainly with the war. I am not going to say very much about the war to-night. I do not like war, and I hope that something will be done after this slaughter is finished to prevent another such war from occurring.

Industry, banking and several other subjects have been discussed, and a number of other questions have been left untouched. I will touch upon one or two and offer a few suggestions. One matter that should have been looked after twenty years ago is the position of the returned soldiers who came back after the last war. On other occasions I have spoken of their condition, particularly that of the men on the land. I have produced figures showing that for a number of years, perhaps ten or eleven years, there has not been collected from the soldier settlers enough to pay the interest on their loans and meet cost of administration. On their behalf, therefore, I suggest that the government do something about giving them free title to the lands they hold at the present time.

These men went overseas and offered everything they had. They were ready to give their lives, and that is the most we can offer. They came back and, instead of being treated as the government had promised, before they went overseas, that they would be treated, we find that deals characteristic of the underworld were put over on them. I say characteristic of the underworld and I know what I am talking about. I know of instances in my own neighbourhood. Somebody made blood-money out of the deals and these men were made to suffer and are continuing to suffer. This matter is under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), who is in his seat. I ask him to take particular note of the condition of the soldier settlers and of their present financial standing. He is reading a paper, but I hope he will take note of the matter anyway.

The question of old age pensions is one that must be dealt with. The people in England are paying very heavy taxes and they have reduced the age limit. We are still on the seventy-year basis, allowing $20 a month, provided the recipient has no other income. If he has an income, the amount is cut down, and if he happens to have a little house in town or anything of that kind, he must sign it over to the government. Therefore the picture is not a pretty one. Our laws make it impossible for these people to accumulate anything in their working days to carry them over the period when they should enjoy a holiday in the later years of their lives, and I suggest that at the earliest possible opportunity the government bring down a measure reducing the age limit and increasing the amount of the pension.

I notice that some of the soldiers who have been overseas in this war have come back. They went away A 1 and were discharged because they were no longer fit, and now they are refused a pension. We are starting now to deal with the men who are coming back. Let us deal justly with them. We are creating precedents; let them be just. We have heard many appeals being made to have Christian principles upheld. I say, let this government, the spokesmen for the upholding of Christian principles, put these principles into effect at once.

A number of our young men have enlisted. Many of them from western provinces are at present stationed in Ontario. Christmas will shortly be here and a number of them will get leave. Three waaks ago one of my neighbours, a young man with a wife and four children, who because of economic conditions could not make a living on the farm and could not get work to keep himself and his family, was forced into the army as a last resort. He has a wife and four youngsters in a little town outside Edmonton. He came here on a week-end leave and telephoned me, and I had a talk with him. He wanted to know whether they were going to get free transportation home for Christmas, or on their last leave before going overseas. I told him that members belonging to all parties in the house had spoken in support of this suggestion, but that I did not know just what the government were going to do. I hope that, as has happened in other instances, public opinion on this matter will become strong enough to compel the government finally to yield. I believe there are enough people across Canada who want these men to have a free trip home to justify that action being taken. In this particular instance this young man, even if he gets a return ticket for half fare, will have to pay no less than $47.80 in order to get home to see his wife and family. I believe we have plenty of railroad crews and trains. Let us make use of them. Do a little extra bookkeeping; that is all it amounts to.

I should now like to get back to hogs for a little while; I mean the four-legged ones. Not very long ago the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) returned from the old country, and according to his own speech he brought home the bacon. I do not believe, however, the farmers of Canada thought he brought home the bacon as far as they are concerned. I have in my hand a news item dated Toronto, November 18, as follows:

> Hon. P. M. Dewan, Ontario agriculture minister, in a statement to-night described slumping hog prices, due to the price reduction in the new Canada-United Kingdom bacon agreement, as "hard medicine" for Ontario farmers. Western farmers stood to make a "reasonable profit" with their stocks of low value feed grain, he said.

I notice that Mr. Dewan holds the same opinion as a number of gentleman farmers in this house. Because grain prices are low in both eastern and western Canada, these experts with figures calculate the cost of raising hogs and say that the farmers should be able to make a profit. They all seem to lose sigh of the fact that grain is being produced at far less than cost of production. Apparently it is not enough to lose in producing the grain; we are supposed also to lose when we come to sell bacon. Under the old agreement grade A Wiltshire sides sold for $18.01 per hundred at seaboard; under the new agreement the price is $15.82. But the minister told us that because he was able to get rid of so many more hogs, the new prices would compare favourably with the old rates. This means that if the farmer this year is going to get as much money as he got last year, he will have to feed several extra hogs. I do not think this is very good business for the Canadian farmer.

In many matters our Prime Minister and this government try to follow the example of England. Over there they subsidize the farmers, and I would suggest that the same thing be done here in connection with the raising of hogs and the production of several other commodities. I do not object to giving our goods to Britain; that is part of our contribution, but I do not think the producers should take the rap. I believe the country as a whole should bear that burden, because when the war is all over and the taxes have to be paid, the farmer will be caught both going and coming, and will have to pay a double share of taxation.

We find that the cheese men also are not satisfied. I quote another Toronto dispatch dated November 20:

> Directors of the Ontario Cheese Producers Association to-day endorsed the sale of cheese to Great Britain announced by agriculture minister Gardiner but took the stand that the price is out of line with present cost of production. . . .
> A special committee was appointed to draft a memorandum, incorporating views of the producers, to be presented the minister. The committee, it was understood, will suggest that government assistance be considered for the producers in the form of a subsidy.

I wandered away from the hog question, but cheese is not very far from hogs in any event.

I should now like to refer for a moment to an article which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press last week. I do so because time after time fifth columnists have been referred to in this house, and I wish to put the Free Press in that category to-night, not only because of the article I am going to quote but because of other articles published which have not been fair to the producers of Canada. This article states:

> Mr. H. H. Hannam, president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, is indignant and declares that the Canadian farmers will also be indignant over the reduced price for bacon fixed in the new bacon agreement.
> Indignant against whom? Not against Great Britain, Mr. Hannam hastens to explain. Then the indignation must be directed against the Canadian government. On what grounds? Obviously on the ground that the Canadian government did not say to the government of Great Britain: Pay the price that our distinguished and patriotic Canadian, Mr. Hannam, president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, demands, or go without bacon.
> No doubt Mr. Hannam will resent having the matter put thus crudely; but is it not pretty much to this that it boils down? A man big enough to hold his position ought to be able to look at this transaction in its entirety, instead of from a narrow angle. Thus examined, it might be found to have a great many good points. But Mr. Hannam is in the business, in which he is not alone, of trying to stir up grievances in the hope of being able to capitalize on them later on. It is a discreditable business. Also dangerous.

As president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, Mr. Hannam represents a number of the producers of Canada. The Free Press, in accordance with its old practice, now seeks to disrupt that farmers' organization. The Free Press, and those who contribute financial support, see what would be the result if Canadian agriculture were organized and educated as it should be. I believe the statement I have read is an unfair one for this newspaper to make. A number of farmers subscribe to the weekly edition of this newspaper, and I would suggest to them that if they want truth they should subscribe to a publication that tells the truth. I hope this will be read by a number of those farmers.

I heard and have read the wonderful speech that was delivered by the Minister of Agriculture on November 14. He made quite a number of statements, with some of which I agree and with some I do not agree. During the discussion he had this to say—and it would be amusing, were it not so very expensive:

> I shall continue to fight the battles of the farmers of Canada. No adding to or taking away from duties or prestige will remove my life-long association with and love for farmers and farming.

I heard of a man at a meeting, who rose to support a motion he had voted against the year before, say, "Some of you may wonder why I am now supporting the very thing I opposed a year ago? At that time," he said, "I had a reason; now I have lost my reason." I believe that applies very well to the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. GARDINER: I think just the same as I did a year ago.

Mr. FAIR: The minister knows quite a lot about wheat—some say he grows it; I do not know. On April 5, 1939, however, he is reported to have made the following statement at page 2623 of Hansard:

> It has been proven over and over again that twenty bushels to the acre of wheat can be produced at a cost of from 30 to 40 cents a bushel. We have had a great deal of discussion about the cost of producing wheat. It costs a certain amount to work an acre of land whether you get any wheat off it or not; it costs a certain amount to harvest it if you do get any wheat off it. It has been proven over and over again, I say, that twenty bushels to the acre of wheat can be produced at a cost of from 30 to 40 cents a bushel. For every bushel a man gets over twenty his costs per bushel decrease. When he has a crop of twenty bushels or more per acre, his other crops are usually good in proportion.

Mr. GARDINER: Read it all the way down.

Mr. FAIR: I have only forty minutes; the minister may read it later on.

Mr. GARDINER: It would not mean the same thing if the hon. member read it all.

Mr. FAIR: I might say to the minister that he has denied it time after time. Anyone, however, who wishes to read it will find the whole quotation at page 2623 of Hansard for April 5, 1939.

Mr. GARDINER: If the hon. member read it all, it does not mean what he is now saying, but what he is going to read.

Mr. FAIR: If I had plenty of time I would read the whole thing, but I have only forty minutes.

Then, on November 14, 1940, speaking again in connection with wheat he said:

> It is generally admitted that 70 cents advance at Fort William, which nets the farmer about 50 cents a bushel, does not cover his total costs of production and therefore does not maintain him as a contented producer. If he is to receive more money, it must come from the sale price of wheat, or from the taxpayers of Canada, or from both.

Then again at page 2530 of Hansard for August 2, 1940, we find the following discussion between the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the minister:

> Mr. Coldwell: This is Professor Hope's conclusion:
> "Conservatively it would probably require with average yields a farm price for wheat of average grade of about 90 cents, with coarse grains in proportion to maintain a reasonable level of living and service the present debt on western farms. It would require somewhat more than this to restore the farming community to the condition of 1931."
> This is the comment of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar:
> The conclusion is quite obvious. It is clear that it will require not a Fort William price, but an average farm price of 90 cents a bushel to maintain even the standard of living we now have.
> Mr. Gardiner: We all agree with that. Why discuss that at greater length?

I draw particular attention to this, because it has taken the minister only five years to admit it.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member has read it so often I know it by heart.

Mr. FAIR: The minister said:

> We all agree with that. Why discuss that at greater length?

The man at the meeting had lost his reason; I believe the minister has done the same thing. We have been told that when a man loses his reason, he first seeks to destroy his very best friends. I believe that is true of the minister in the present instance. He has loved the farmer so much that he set out in 1935 to destroy him. He has sought to do so through the policies he has set out since that time—and I am referring particularly to his programme in connection with wheat.

When this government took office in 1935, the farmers were receiving an initial payment on their wheat of 87½ cents a bushel. At the same time we had an advisory board composed of seven members. Because of the minister's love for the farmers, I would have expected him to make certain recommendations to the government. After a short time we find that by order in council the wheat board was put out of operation. That was a board set up under statutory authority, but by order in council it was declared inoperative unless the price of wheat went below 90 cents a bushel. In that way the farmers were deprived of the benefits they derived from the operations of the wheat board.

After a while we find that the price was cut down to 80 cents a bushel—again because of the minister's love for the farmers. Later on, it was cut down to 60 cents—but possibly because of an election in the offing it was raised again to 70 cents. Therefore the net result was that we had the government to thank for an increase of 10 cents a bushel in the price of wheat.

I do not agree with that policy, and I say that the government should do something drastic about it. The farmers are not protected in the prices of articles they have to buy. So far as I am aware, we are now paying higher prices for farm machinery than we have ever paid before. What is the government doing about the matter? A House of Commons committee investigated the price of farm machinery, and the Saskatchewan legislature carried out a further investigation. But nothing is being done about the matter. Therefore it is up to this government, having control over that industry, to do something about it.

I might make mention of a number of other points, but I fear I have not time to deal with them. There are many points to be considered in connection with the wheat problem.

I admit it is a serious question, but before any solution is reached, it will have to be attacked from an angle different from that from which it is being attacked to-day.

The minister is very good at figures, provided they are not checked. Because we had a surplus of wheat on November 14, he proceeded to look ahead five years, to cut down our yield, to raise the consumptive capacity of other countries, and as a result according to his figures he would have a shortage within five years. Had there been an increase in our carry-over, I am sure we would have had a drop of three or four cents a bushel in the price of wheat, had it not been pegged. I have seen that happen before. But because it is on the other side of the ledger we do not find any appreciable increase in the prices offered on the Winnipeg exchange.

Before I forget it, I should like once more to ask the government to follow the example set by the British government in connection with the Winnipeg exchange. This government is careful to do as the British government is doing in some respects. The action was taken by the British government shortly after the war started, and if it was good business for them, why in the name of common sense is it not good for Canada? Perhaps some of the friends of the exchange who happen to sit in the government might not enjoy things quite as well if the grain exchange were closed.

The farmers to-day no longer resemble the goose that laid the golden egg. Until they are more prosperous, there shall be no prosperity in Canada.

We have heard a great deal about unity, but in many instances I think it is just so much trash, as the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) said yesterday. I think we would be well advised to stay away from these nice phrases and get down to business.

I agree with the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) when he says that in order to solve the wheat problem it will be necessary for the four large wheat exporting countries, New Zealand, Australia, the United States and Canada, to get together and arrive at an agreement setting export quotas for each country. I do not contend that production should be restricted, because weather conditions may vary and we do not know when we may have a shortage of wheat. But restrictions on deliveries of wheat could easily be agreed upon, based upon previous years' experience. Should we have a long crop, then our farmers could store it on the farms; should we have a short crop, they would then have ample crop insurance.

[Mr. Fair.]

The government should get away from the idea of telling us that there is no money with which to pay a decent price for wheat. At the present time we are spending for war purposes, for purposes of destruction, something like $3,000,000 a day, but we cannot find any money to subsidize wheat production, or the production of cheese and bacon. I am not speaking now just for the farmer of western Canada because I realize that conditions all across the country are not at all satisfactory. Anyone who has listened to the different speeches delivered during the past three weeks will readily recognize that fact.

I submit that the government should take over all grain handling facilities. As has been pointed out, the grain companies are making large profits, particularly out of the storage of grain. The situation being as it is now, the farmers are compelled to put grain into the elevators and keep them full in order to obtain a little money with which to carry on. The government is spending millions at the present time to set up war industries and have them operated by people experienced in those particular lines of business, and there is no reason in the world why the same principle could not be applied to the storage of wheat. Wheat is just as vital, if not more so, to our war effort. The government should pay a price of not less than $1 a bushel for 2,000 bushels from each farmer. If a farmer had less than that, he would receive this price for all his crop; if he had more, he would receive this price for 2,000 bushels and sell the remainder at world market prices. To-day world market prices are ruinous to the agricultural industry. Being ruinous to agriculture, they are ruinous to Canada.

There have been a number of complaints this year about the grading of grain. The question of cracked wheat has come up time and again. Under the present set-up, if No. 1 grain is three per cent or more cracked, the grade is reduced to No. 2. On certain occasions the farmers cannot prevent grain from being cracked and they are robbed of a grade, which means three cents a bushel in addition to dockage, which may amount to three per cent or more.

The question of tough and damp grain is an important one in my province. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) has done something to solve this problem, and I should like to give him credit for that. I think we would be giving him credit for many other things were it not for the fact that the rest of the government seem to be against his doing more. He cannot do just what he would like to do.

He knows the conditions and I think he, having lived in the west for a number of years, would do what was right if he were permitted to do so by his colleagues. As I said, tough and damp grain is causing quite a little worry to the people of my province. As I understand the regulations, when a man has delivered his quota of dry grain, in order to get cars in which to ship his tough grain he must sign that it is tough. Although the moisture content may be just above the dry line, he is deprived of the right to get straight grades for his grain. I believe this is why some farmers hold back their grain and take the chance of having it spoil.

Time and time again we have been told about the millions of dollars that have been spent in western Canada, and some seem to consider this as a kind of relief. If we take the figure of 90 cents a bushel at the farm, which was agreed to by the Minister of Agriculture on August 2 of this year, as a basis, the Canadian wheat growers have contributed approximately $220,000,000 in losses on growing grain this year. This is the contribution which has been made to the railroad companies, the elevator companies, the banks, the mortgage companies and all other industry in Canada. This fact has not been brought out before, and I now bring it to the attention of those who seem to think that the government has been doing too much for the west. I ask them to go back to 1930, take the costs of production through the different years and compare them with the amounts received by the farmer. I believe the result will take away the smiles from their faces. They will see that western Canada has contributed far more to the Canadian economy than it has been given credit for.

I suggest to the government that they take heed of some of the financial programmes which have been brought to their attention by this group. I suggest that they forget all about imaginary inflation, or go to the dictionary to find out just what it means. It seems that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and his advisers have not yet learned the real meaning of inflation. The people should learn more about money because money controls the life of Canada to-day. In the past, shortage of money has retarded our war activities, and I believe that the money managers are to blame to-day for the western farmer not being able to get an advance on his wheat on the farm. When I say that money controls the life of Canada, I think I am quite right. I have only two more words to say and I ask the government to investigate their meaning—they are "social credit."

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I must first congratulate the mover (Mr. Claxton) and the seconder (Mr. Jutras) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne upon the manner in which they performed their duty, and more especially must I commend them for the appeal they made for unity and their exhortation of the Canadian people for the utmost effort and sacrifice to win this war.

I must now pay tribute to the people of Great Britain for their courage and fortitude and determination to put down, in the words of Mr. Chamberlain, this evil man, this abortion of deceit. We shall certainly profit by their example.

I wish also to pay tribute to the women of Canada for the splendid way in which they have set to work in Canada's war effort, and more particularly I would pay a tribute to the Conservative Women's Association of my own riding of St. Paul's for the excellent work they are doing in connection with the Red Cross. They have been incorporated under the War Charities Act and are working night and day in connection with this work.

The speech from the throne advises us that we have been summoned at this time in order that opportunity may be accorded for the fullest consideration and discussion of Canada's war effort and of national problems which war has served to intensify or create, and that we shall be fully advised of Canada's cooperation with the United Kingdom and of relations with the United States. The speech also told us that measures would be submitted to the house such as seem necessary to his excellency's advisers for the welfare of the country and for the prosecution of the war to the utmost of our strength.

Up to date no measures have been submitted to the house, and certainly there has not been the fullest opportunity accorded to examine and discuss Canada's war effort. To my mind the debate as it has progressed has been more or less futile, and we shall really not get anywhere until the house gets into committee of the whole and actual measures are before us.

The people of Canada want leadership at this time. They do not want any soothing syrup, but that is what they have been getting here. We came here to get the information which the public are demanding but which the government attempts to give to the people of Canada only by way of statements by the various ministers. Under this procedure it will be almost impossible to arrive at the full implication of the facts, and there can be no opportunity for constructive criticism in this regard until we get into committee of the whole on definite measures brought down by the government.

Most of what has been accomplished by the present procedure could have been accomplished simply by the ministers handing their statements to the director of public information for dissemination to the members and the press. But now that we are here, I think all the ministers should make their statements. The Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud), and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson) should each make a statement, because the house would like to know just what those ministers are doing, and then when we come back in perhaps two months' time we shall be able to cross-examine the ministers across the floor of the house.

No doubt a certain amount of useful information has been obtained and a great deal of constructive criticism has been offered. But one thing that worries us is that the government are not seeking the help of every member of the house. The idea that the government can do no wrong seems to be the ministry's main thought, and they get very touchy when they are criticized. They do not seem to understand that the members of the opposition criticize the government without thinking of politics at all. I suppose the government are so steeped in politics themselves in their war effort that they cannot conceive of anybody feeling otherwise, but I assure them that we as an opposition are just as fervent, in fact more fervent in our desire to forward the prosecution of the war than any member of the government or anybody else.

The government of the day have, however, decided to carry on Canada's war effort in this partisan manner, and on their shoulders must rest the responsibility and the blame for all the sins of omission of which they may be guilty, and we as an opposition must also measure up to our obligations as such. I predict that when the history of this government's partisan war effort is written and the facts come to light, it will not be the pretty picture that we are led to believe. If it should so happen that any serious reverses come or that the war is unduly prolonged, this government will go down in history as wilfully negligent in not utilizing to the full the services of every member of the house regardless of his political colour. The government are fighting a Liberal war and the public know it; that is one of the main reasons for the lack of confidence which the people of the country have in the government to-day.

The truth is that the government's great concern up to date has been political success, success in partisan politics. It has corralled all sources of public information so far as the war is concerned and keeps them under its thumb just as rigidly as any dictator would. The press can get information only through the government, and the government can punish if the press offends.

I must give a clean bill of health to the radio corporation; nevertheless the radio is being used at the present time as an instrument of this administration, and it is being used ruthlessly and to the full to help the administration politically, day in and day out. That is a misuse of the radio. There are far better uses to which the radio can be put than that. Not only that, but the misuse of the radio in this way makes the public suspicious that we are not doing everything we can to fight the war, that, instead, we are only fighting political issues. This uneasiness and suspicion in the minds of the public is soothed by various reports of one kind or another which are given out from time to time by the director of public information. Certainly all is not as it should be, and it is the duty of every member of this house to use his prerogative and criticize. There is nothing like honest criticism to spur a government on to further effort, and as a matter of fact there should be no further effort possible. It ought to be a full-out effort that we are making now.

We have been told that the government have a long range programme and that they have been working night and day planning to put it into effect, but certain circumstances belie that statement. For example, since the beginning of the war we have had a camp at Camp Borden, and all this time we have known that there would be a tremendous number of men there. At the present time the number is between 16,000 and 17,000. About two weeks ago 239 men were in hospital, and there were no orderlies to look after them. Their food had to be prepared by only four men. The patients who were in bed had to get up and fetch their own food, or, if they were too sick to move, it was left to one of their comrades who was not so sick to get it for them.

The regimental doctors endeavoured to make some provision in their own lines for sick cases. But that was not what it should be under conditions of that kind. The doctors have had to fight all the time in order to get proper hospital accommodation at Camp Borden. The first result of their efforts was that a seventy-five bed hospital was provided. Why should they have had to fight for something which is so necessary? In a place like that, a good-sized hospital is necessary so that one can cope with contagious diseases by ensuring proper segregation. I understand that at last a hospital of a thousand beds is to be built. But when one considers that it is usual to make arrangements on the basis of five per cent of sickness in a camp of this size, it does not look to me as though there had been any planning so far as that phase of the work is concerned. We have been at war fifteen months, yet only a short time ago was it decided to build this hospital.

Moreover, there are five ambulances up there, and they have travelled 150,000 miles taking to the city of Toronto those sick men who could not be accommodated at Camp Borden. Again, there is no operating room. Who ever heard of a town of 16,000 or 17,000 people not having hospital accommodation and a proper operating room? In cases of acute appendicitis and of fractures of various kinds, rest is essential, and yet it has been necessary to convey men suffering from these ailments all the way to Toronto before they could be medically treated. This does not look to me like planning. The record in these cases has been good, but that is due, no doubt, more to good luck and medical skill.

Another case of lack of planning has been brought by me to the attention of both the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) and the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), and I understand that something is being done about it, although much time has gone by. Take the case of a man in the Canadian active service force who becomes sick and is put in category E: that means he is discharged from the army. Until recently there was not administrative machinery to take care of that man and his family during his disability.

To cite an actual case, a man had to return to his home town and, with his family, go on relief in that town; not only that, he had to accept charity for medical attention. There was no planning there that I can see, although I understand that some arrangement is being made to take care of conditions of that kind. Is the morale of the people being maintained when that sort of thing is going on? It certainly is not. It is quite true that the Department of National Defence refers a category E case of that kind to the Department of Pensions and National Health for treatment, but it cannot be denied that in many instances, during the course of the treatment, the soldier or officer has been informed that he has been discharged from the Canadian active service force as of a given date, and notwithstanding the fact that he requires prolonged treatment, he receives no pay and his family are destitute.

It must be expected that members of the Canadian active service force will require hospital treatment for disabilities which, to use the wording of the act, cannot be attributed to service as such; nevertheless these men should be retained on the army strength until such time as the treatment is completed, and then, if it is decided by medical authority that they are unable to meet the requirements of the existing medical standard, naturally they would be discharged from the force.

Let us not forget the experiences of the men who fought in the last war. It is only reasonable that care should be taken to prevent pensionable disabilities from increasing, as well as to reduce by proper treatment the amount of pensionable disability. Certainly it is in the public interest that this should be done. But I do not think any men who require treatment should be discharged from the army until such time as the pension commission has given a ruling. Why should men and their families suffer during that time from lack of income?

The men who served in the last war fought to make Canada a place for heroes, not only heroes of war, but heroes of everyday life, to live in. We have always been able to find money enough to provide for railway deficits and for public works at election times. But when it came to the claims of the men who served overseas, of their dependants, and of their widows, it was always necessary to fight in order to get a little more for them. It was invariably pointed out how much such a measure would cost, how much more the people of Canada would have to pay. At the present time we are not thinking very much about what the people will have to pay; that is not the first consideration.

At this time men and women are fighting for Canada, and we must give them something more than lip-service. We need to remember those lines in Binyon's "Ode to the Fallen"; I think it might be well if every hon. member would realize their significance:

> They shall grow not old, as we that are left grow old:
> Age shall not weary them, nor the years condemn.
> At the going down of the sun and in the morning
> We will remember them.

Let us see to it that we remember them. Let us not forget as we forgot last time.

I wish to touch for just a moment on the question of leave with transportation for the soldiers. The question will be a serious one this winter. Other hon. members have made suggestions on this subject. Soldiers should be given leave periodically. It might be easier to give leave more frequently to those who are closer to their homes. I suggest that leave be awarded on a basis which will allow the soldier a period of five days at home. I do not wish to suggest how often leaves should be given, but a system of this kind would make for happier families and a more contented corps of men while these men are on this side of the water. Certainly they should have five days at home periodically and their fares should be paid there and back.

There is another matter to which I should like to refer, although it may seem a small one. All of us are able to get three hundred cigarettes for a dollar for the soldiers overseas, but some of these soldiers have no friends at home, or at any rate not many, who can send cigarettes to them. I have received several letters from them, and it seems odd to me that these soldiers cannot purchase overseas the cigarettes they require for the same price at which we can send them from here. Let me quote from a few letters:

> The purchasing of smokes in this country is certainly beyond the buying power of the Canadian troops. The prices are as follows: Cigarettes, per package of 20, one shilling and sixpence; tobacco, one-sixteenth of a pound, one shilling and threepence.
> For the boys who are fortunate enough to have friends or relations in Canada, this course is overcome to some extent. This position, however, only represents a small percentage of the troops. Could you not do something in parliament so that Canadian troops could purchase smokes at or near the price for which they can be purchased in Canada?

That is not unreasonable, and I am surprised that the government has not done something about it before. I quote from another letter:

> Luxuries, smokes et cetera are expensive here, just about out of the regular sapper's reach for regular consumption, except on pay day or the day after.

Cigarettes at the present time are hardly in the category of luxuries. They are almost a necessity in the army. I commend this thought to the government, and I suggest that they see to it that the purchase of cigarettes be put within the reach of these soldiers.

We hear many stories about lack of equipment. I would be the last one to criticize the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) when he says that we will supply Britain first and do without, ourselves. This is right, but surely small quantities of equipment can be allotted to various units for training. One can hardly understand why there should be a shortage of clothing in Canada to-day in view of the statement of the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) in the House of Commons on July 30, 1940, at page 2118 of Hansard, where he is reported as having said that production of boots and shoes had been stepped up to 30,000 pairs a week and that production of battle dress was reaching 20,000 suits a week, blankets being produced at a rate of 30,000 a week, and so on. Then, again, on November 20, as reported at page 265 of Hansard of the present session, he gives production figures for battle dress blouses, trousers, blankets and so on. One can hardly understand, I say, why, if these figures are correct, there is a shortage for any of the troops in Canada at the present time.

The public must know more about what is being produced. I accept the minister's statement when he says, as reported at page 258 of Hansard, that a recent cable from the dominion's office in Great Britain stresses the importance of carefully guarding production figures for munitions and aeroplanes. I accept that statement as coming from the dominion's office, but I should like to know the origin of it and who instigated it. I cannot reconcile that cable with the information that comes over the radio from time to time. The other evening all hon. members heard, I have no doubt, the announcement that the United States bomb sights had been delivered to Great Britain and that arrangements had been made for the exchange of bombers, how many bombers and engines were moving from one place to another, and so on. A short time ago we were advised by radio of the exact number of aeroplanes delivered to Great Britain in a certain month from the United States.

We have been told by the minister, or rather a statement was made to the press as to how many tanks were being made and how many more will be made in the future; and then the Minister of Munitions tells us that 25-pounders will be made in a Quebec gun plant in October. I quote the Toronto Daily Star of August 22, wherein he is reported as having made a statement in that regard. As a matter of fact, more information can be obtained from United States papers than in this House of Commons. Let hon. members read any of them and they will see.

Of course the public are interested in knowing what we are going to produce, but what the public want to know is what we are producing and what we have delivered. Everything in the way of production seems to be in the future. All one has to do is to read the minister's statement to come to the conclusion that he is trying to do a great deal more than any one man can accomplish. The minister admits, or he admitted to me the other day, that he is working fifteen or sixteen hours a day. There is no fact-blindness here as far as the minister is concerned; but if he thinks he can do all his jobs as efficiently as these jobs ought to be done in war time, he is certainly suffering from an acute case of fact-blindness. I know he is endeavouring to correct his mistakes from time to time, and he is served by a number of fine men. But in some of the others we have not the same confidence.

There is no doubt about it that the minister is a splendid administrator of the department that has control of broadcasting. I think he is a splendid man for that job, but he must have relief from some of the other jobs he has at the present time. The minister is also policy-maker and cabinet liaison for the most gigantic industrial programme ever undertaken in Canada. If anyone asked him who was the boss of this or that department, he would say, "I am". He is trying to be the administrative head of that programme, actively conducting and controlling the biggest of all big businesses. What he should have is an outstanding business executive who will be given full power to deal in a non-partisan way with the coordination of this biggest of all big businesses—war supplies.

I come now to the thirty-day training scheme. To my mind, in the present set-up it is a colossal waste and nothing more or less than a political sop to the public. It has become necessary because of lack of leadership on the part of the government in the past. If the facts of what would be required of Canadians should Canada become involved in the war had been brought home to the public in days gone by, and if since the beginning of the war, in the words of the amendment moved by my leader (Mr. Hanson, York-Sunbury), the government had not continued to soothe the Canadian people regarding the war effort of the nation, thereby creating a false sense of security when a clear-cut call to action is desperately needed, I say that this scheme would not have been necessary. If the government had not done this but, instead, had faced realities, this proposed expenditure of $50,000,000 a year for this short-time training would not have been needed. There is no doubt that the thirty-day training scheme has done some good. A holiday always does a man good, when it is spent under good conditions, with good food and good discipline; but it is rather an expensive holiday as far as the country is concerned. Let us face the facts. The Minister of National War Services (Mr. Gardiner) said in the course of a radio speech:

> . . . in one year from now a man will be needed to use every gun, operate every plane and drive every truck made, and in the front line of battle.

Think that over. What confusion there must be in the inner circles of the cabinet concerning the major strategy to be followed in connection with this war! Certainly we see signs of the indecision and lack of leadership which has characterized this government ever since the outbreak of war. To reach this conclusion it is necessary only to read a few extracts from recent speeches. On November 12 the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) declared that the first duty of each part of the empire was its own local defence. Then he proceeded to say :

> That is the policy we have pursued from the beginning, the policy that we are pursuing to-day, and the policy that we intend to pursue so long as we are responsible for the administration of Canada's war effort.

That is his policy, and he says nothing about preparing to man every gun, operate every plane and drive every truck in the front line of battle. Three days later the Minister of National Defence, enlarging on what had been done in Canada, said:

> And let me remind my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), who seemed to think that we were attaching too much importance to Canadian defence, that I stressed in July that our front line was the island fortress of the British isles. . . .
> I can say to the house that those principles on which we were working then are the principles we are working on to-day. Any change has been only to emphasize more than ever the vital interest we feel in helping to hold and strengthen that front line on the English channel.

Certainly that seems to me a different policy from the one enunciated by the Prime Minister. A little later the Minister of National Defence went on to say:

> The war committee of the cabinet has had the matter of the length of the training period under review repeatedly in connection with the man-power problem, and we are now considering the further step of lengthening the training period to four months and reducing the aggregate number of men to be called from civil occupations in the year. . . .
> Such an extension of time and reduction in numbers ought to help to prevent undue disturbance in industry.

This seems to be a sort of half-way measure, but again it is a different policy. Now I come again to the statement of the Minister of National War Services, made over the radio on November 17, in which he took an opposite stand. He said:

> I think it would be wise to stop much of this talk against military training for men who are making planes, munitions, arms and ships and remember that in one year from now a man will be needed to use every gun, operate every plane and drive every truck made, and in the front line of battle.

Then he went on:

There is no reason for making these machines unless we provide for their being operated.

I hardly agree with the minister there. I believe we are making some of these machines for the air training scheme as well as for Great Britain, but I shall follow that up later.

As Minister of War Services I would say after seeing Britain in action it will take much longer to train a soldier than it does to train labour for plants. . . . Factory managers who contend they cannot produce to capacity without interfering with the training of men may have to be told by someone, just as they are being told in Britain, that they, as factory managers, are not good enough for war time.

This seems to be a clear-cut enunciation of another policy. In other words, we have three policies, coming from the Prime Minister and two cabinet ministers. Certainly there appears to be some confusion. I believe the Minister of National War Services is a realist; at least he says he has first-hand information, and he tells us that within a year a man will be needed to use every gun, operate every plane, drive every truck in the front line of battle. When are we going to start training these men so that they may be ready a year from now? Time is of the essence; he says so. He tells us, after seeing Britain in action, that it will take much longer to train a soldier than to train labour for factories. What is the policy? It seems to me the government should lay down some clear-cut policy as to just what they intend to do.

In an interview the minister is reported to have said in effect that the war would be won, not by bombing from aeroplanes alone, but by a great mechanized army, well equipped, taking the offensive and marching into the enemy country when the time arrives. We have 50,000 troops overseas, one division on the Atlantic, one division on paper on the Pacific, and some in training. How many troops will it take to support those we have overseas? What is our ultimate aim? What is the policy of the government so that Canada may be able to do her share when the right time comes? These men cannot be trained in one month; they cannot be trained in four months. It will be criminal if we are obliged to send half-trained troops overseas to man these machines. I urged last session that we should start retraining older men and women, and that some effort should be made at once to take steps to assist industry so that the younger men, who would be needed for these implements of war, would be available for training.

Then the minister told us that factory managers who contended that they could not produce to capacity without interfering with the training of men may have to be told by some one, just as they are being told in Britain, that as factory managers they are not good enough for war time. I wonder whether all the blame can be attached to the factory managers for not being good enough for war time? Is the Department of Labour living up to the emergencies of war time? There must be full cooperation between these factory managers and the Department of Labour.

At the present time the minister is having a controversy with Mr. Sanderson of Fleet Aircraft Limited. In an announcement to the press the minister said he would not back down and that all the men involved in the controversy will have to train. Mr. Sanderson is not the only man who is very much upset about this thirty-day training. What, I ask, is the most important thing to-day? Is it not the production of aeroplanes? Certainly that is what I have been led to believe. In conversations with other manufacturers, who have not complained, they have explained to me that this interruption for thirty days is a serious matter, that it slows down the production of aeroplanes. To my mind nothing should be allowed to interfere with this production. I think factory managers should know something of what they are talking about.

There must be some clear-cut differentiation, which, so far as I am concerned, I have failed to find, with respect to getting the greatest efficiency out of both our workmen and women and those men who are to become part of the army. This policy must be decided and announced so that preparations may be made accordingly. There is no use in putting this off. The more aeroplanes we make and the more pilots we train, the greater will be our help to Great Britain. When she has clouds of aeroplanes and bombers, the closer will come the day of the break-up of the enemy. When that day comes, we must have trained men. The people of Europe to-day are getting fed up with war, so we are told, and I say that the government should put the pressure on now.

The Minister of Munitions and Supply has pointed out the difficulty of obtaining materials, and particularly metals such as steel. He has mentioned, too, the situation with regard to labour. He, along with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), have urged the people of Canada to refrain from the purchase of articles which contain those metals and materials, and in that way to lessen domestic consumption. Do Canadians really think that this government is sincere in its request when it continues to flow steel and labour, and no doubt other materials, into the construction of the Montreal terminal? How can the government justify such action on its part?

We have also been urged to conserve Canadian dollars; and still we have steel coming in from the United States for this job. How can that be justified? How can anyone reconcile in his mind the government's request for the conservation of dollars with its being such a flagrant offender in the wastage of those dollars? It just does not add up.

Something must be done with regard to the increased adverse balance of trade, which amounts to about $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 monthly. Where do we obtain the funds to buy United States magazines? When one considers the covers and contents of some of those magazines, he wonders why people buy them. Does anyone believe that many of these magazines entering this country from the United States do anything to help Canada's war effort? I believe the funds spent in the purchase of these magazines might very well be conserved.

Another matter with which I wish to deal at this time is one which I believe at a time like this is of the utmost importance. I refer to the necessity of installing as quickly as possible a powerful shortwave radio broadcasting station with a volume of possibly 50,000 watts. Canadians are well liked in Mexico and in South American republics such as Chili, the Argentine, Brazil, Peru and several others; but they have very little opportunity of visiting those countries. It is almost impossible to do so in war time. Friendly relations must, however, be maintained. For purposes of trade it is important that we maintain connections with those countries, and we should have facilities for broadcasting to them. We know that in these days they are having their minds poisoned by German and Italian propaganda broadcasts. Up to now, on account of their friendly relations with this country and with the United States there has been a certain amount of resistance to those broadcasts. If, however, one hits hard enough or often enough in one particular spot, he will wear down that resistance; and that is what the foreign broadcasts may do.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. member that he has exhausted the time at his disposal.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Just a few minutes more, and I shall have finished.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I shall assume that the hon. member has unanimous consent.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): We must have some way of counteracting those foreign broadcasts. For that reason, if for no other, it is vital that as quickly as possible Canada should install a shortwave broadcasting station.

Let us consider another angle of the problem. What would be the result if anything happened to the British Broadcasting Corporation. They are now broadcasting to those countries to the south of us, but I am wondering what would happen if their programmes were either completely or partly shut off. It seems to me that as part of her war effort Canada might help Great Britain by erecting a station such as I have suggested. This should be done quickly. Under the frequency reservations provided by the Berne conventions, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation were allotted ten bands. I have the details here, but I shall not take time to place them before the house. With the exception of one which is not much good, through lack of use by us and encroachment or squatting by others, these have all been lost to Canada.

I am told on good authority, however, that we might use the 25 metre and 31 metre bands, and the use of those bands would permit us to reach practically any point in the world. The installation, with directional antennae, would cost about half a million dollars, if we act quickly. That is not very much money for something which is practically a necessity. The cost of installation is increasing; that is the trouble. I cannot urge this too strongly as a war measure of the first importance. Not only is it of importance to Canada, but it is a way whereby we may give assistance to Great Britain by providing her with a duplicate system.

I have only one more point to bring out—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I understood the hon. member had leave to continue for only a few more minutes. He has now spoken for more than five minutes over his allotted time.

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the applause of hon. members of the opposition, because I realize it is for me. I was almost going to suggest that it was eleven o'clock, because I did not know whether or not the bands were going to be brought into play. I want to be brief, because I understand another hon. member is to follow me.

I am not going to be selfish in my praise and mention merely the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. On the contrary, I am going to praise all hon. members who have made speeches. I think most of them have been very good. Most have been constructive. If a member cannot be critical and at the same time constructive, I do not think he should be elected at all.

I was particularly interested in the observations of the hon. member (Mr. Ross, St. Paul's) who immediately preceded me, because he gave me something to talk about. He pointed out that this was not an ordinary session, but rather that it was a session of campaigning. From what he said I can well understand why he called it a campaign session, because he took special pains particularly to praise the war effort of the good ladies in his constituency who are working for the Red Cross. It is obvious that he is beginning his campaign already.

The hon. member who preceded me accused the Liberal party of playing politics. During my short term in the house I have come to the conclusion that each and every member in it, and particularly the lady member, is a good fellow, irrespective of party. I note the hon. member said that we are steeped in party politics, and that the party to which he belongs is as keen to win the war as we are. I wish I had time to tell him something about the partisan politics of the Liberal administration in British Columbia—because every appointee has been a Conservative.

When the hon. member states that the war effort of his party is as keen as that of ours, I shall give him credit for his statement. In that connection I shall read the observations of a member who, although not the house leader of the Conservative party, is the organizer for that party in Canada. The Vancouver Province, the Conservative paper of British Columbia, quotes that gentleman in its issue of October 21. We of the Liberal party do not claim to possess all the patriotism there is in the world; we do not contend that we are the only people who want to win the war; we do not contend that we are the only people who can win the war, but possibly the present organizer of the Conservative party has a greater right than we. I intend to quote him.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is he the organizer?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am promoting the hon. gentleman. I quote:

John R. MacNicol, president of the dominion Conservative association, took the federal government warmly to task Saturday.

And again:

Mr. MacNicol affirmed the Conservative party's central objective was to win the war. "And we're going to win it," he exclaimed, "because God is on our side."

That is from the Vancouver Province. I wonder who was on their side for the last ten years. Reference has been made to lack of preparation for this war, but personally I do not think any government can be blamed for lack of preparation prior to a war. The people are to blame because they allow no government to prepare properly. There is one member in this house who can claim more credit than any other member. He does not happen to belong to the party to which I belong, but I want to congratulate the hon. member for Saskatoon City (Mr. Bence) upon sending into oblivion the worst detriment to Canada's war defence we ever had, the former hon. member who said, "not one dollar for national defence."

Certainly mistakes have been made in the past, and no doubt many will be made in the future. Do not think I am not going to criticize the government for some of the mistakes they have made. They had better not make them again in the future. In my opinion many of the mistakes that have been made could have been eliminated had more attention been paid to the elected members of parliament rather than to the so-called dollar-a-year men who are cluttering up the streets of Ottawa. That is about all they are doing. We have been elected, rightly or wrongly, by the popular vote. We should be taken more into the confidence of the government; our advice should be asked more often instead of the advice of some of these men who could not be elected in British Columbia to the office of pound-keeper. They are responsible to no one, and in many instances they are not responsible at all. I could quote what other members from British Columbia have said in this regard, especially the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Mayhew) and the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), but I shall not take up further time.

I think a member should criticize his own government, but he should do it in a fair manner. I do not intend to take up the time of the house by talking of someone who has not a pair of socks or has only two shirts. I was in the army for a number of years; I have been out of the army for a number of years, and I still have only two shirts.

I have another suggestion to make, one which may not be popular with private members. This house should be kept in almost continuous session. It would mean a financial loss to members from the far west to be kept here, but we asked to be elected to represent the people during war time and we should be ready to stay here. In this connection, I should like to quote two people. It has been quite popular this session to quote a gentleman who is probably the greatest living statesman, present company excepted. I refer to the Prime Minister of Great Britain. Many other members have quoted Mr. Churchill, and I should like to quote his opinion on the continuous sitting of parliament even when it is not known when a bomb may drop into the chamber. This is what he said:

I urge the House of Commons not to lose sight of its democratic duty of giving guidance to the nation and, if necessary, correction to the executive.

In other words, the Prime Minister of Great Britain is asking the members to offer guidance to the executive council. He continues:

To-day, in inaugurating this new session of parliament, we proclaim the faith and sincerity of our resolve to keep vital and active, even in the midst of our struggle for life, even under fire of the enemy, those parliamentary institutions which have served us so well . . . and which have proved themselves the most flexible instruments for securing progress, carrying forward at the same time the traditions and glories of the past which, in this solemn moment of world history, are at once our proudest assertion of British freedom and the expression of our unconquerable national will.

The Prime Minister of Great Britain contends that the House of Commons there should be in almost constant session. I should now like to quote the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King). I got a little applause from my left when I quoted the last gentleman and I may not get so much from that direction this time. In my opinion the Prime Minister is the one and only man in public life in Canada to-day who can continue to keep this country unified under present conditions. I give that as my own opinion, but it is the opinion of one representing a constituency which came back into the Liberal fold in the last election for the first time in fifteen years.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is a long time.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I will be here for a long time; do not worry about that. This is what the Prime Minister said, as reported on page 43 of Hansard:

We face a future unknown and unpredictable. We cannot tell what calamities may strike us before the present year is ended or what perils may be upon us in 1941 or 1942. Failure to view the situation as a whole, and to take account of all conceivable possibilities, might be fraught with the gravest dangers. There must be no surrender to the insistent clamour of those who refuse to look beyond the problems of the moment.

I ask hon. members to notice his words as reported on page 43:

I have sometimes felt that, forced as we are to deal with questions arising from day to day, we lose a certain perspective of the trend of events.

That is the reason why I say that this house should be kept more or less in constant session, irrespective of whether it pleases us as private members. That is a Liberal principle, at least the one upon which I was brought up, that we must have parliamentary rule at all times.

Personally I think the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) has made excellent progress so far. As I said before, I am not concerned about mistakes which have been made in the past provided they are not repeated in the future. I think I can say quite modestly that I know something about war, having served through the last one. My sympathies are certainly with the present enlisted men. But I do not think the Department of National Defence has made sufficient use of officers and non-commissioned officers who served in the last war, for training purposes at the present time. I think the government has made a tremendous mistake, and I sincerely hope the Minister of National Defence will see that this is corrected.

Second, I do not think the government is paying enough attention to the value of highways as a part of our national defence effort. Each month I receive a book containing details of contracts worth millions and millions of dollars which have been awarded in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. In my opinion a few million dollars should be spent on what I believe is a most necessary defence measure, that of having a trans-Canada highway. On the Pacific coast, and I know something about it, we are served by two railways and no roads. If a certain country went to war with us, those two railroads would be put out of action within twenty minutes. Would it not be wise for the government of the day, as a national defence measure, to use some of these millions to build the Agassiz-Haig road and to complete the Princeton highway. Hon. members can make up their minds that if war was declared on Canada, our two railways could be put out of action by any twenty-year old boy within twenty minutes. Then there would be no way to get supplies to the defence works that have been built on the Pacific coast. I think not the slightest attention has been paid to that fact by the government.

My hon. friend who preceded me apparently does not think very much of the thirty-day training plan. I think the camps have done wonderful work and I am proud of the way in which the boys have been trained out in my riding. True, they are not soldiers, and nobody ever suggested that one could make a soldier in thirty days. I had the privilege and pleasure of serving with some boys not of my own unit but from Toronto, and one could not make a soldier out of them in four years.

One suggestion I would make to the government in this connection is that we are going to lose all the benefit of this thirty-day training if we do not make greater provision for the boys continuing their training in the non-permanent militia units or in active service units. I urge the Minister of National Defence to create more militia units and more active service units. We cannot turn loose these young men who have had thirty days' training and expect them to retain all they have learnt and to retain their interest in the army. In my district there is no opportunity whatsoever for an old soldier or a young boy to join either the militia or the army. This government must accept responsibility for that, and it is a grave responsibility. Therefore I strongly urge the Minister of National Defence to create more active service and non-active service units so that these boys can continue their training.

I want to say a word about the discontent that is growing among the soldiers in Canada. There is nothing that breeds discontent more among soldiers than the fact that they are not on active service. Perhaps when they get into the front line they will wish they were not on active service. At all events a soldier in camp is apt to become discontented, and nothing is more likely to breed discontent among the soldiers than the fact that we are saying to them: We cannot afford to give you a free pass on the train to go home and see your family. In my opinion that is ridiculous. We own one of the railroads, and the other railroad presumes that it owns Canada. It is time we should show it that it does not, and I strongly urge upon the government that now is the time to show the boys that we really appreciate their efforts.

The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) and the member who preceded me criticized the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Gardiner) for allegedly suggesting that a factory manager might have to be changed if he could not get the action required in connection with some of the boys taking their training in camp. I am tired of hearing about these poor boys in the factories. Many of them are making more money than they ever made in their lives before, while the boys who have joined up are getting $1.30 a day to protect the boys in the factories. I would suggest to the hon. member for Parkdale that if we taxed some of those immense war industries in his riding and the city of Toronto which are making more money than they ever made before, we could easily find the money for free transportation for our soldiers.

Unquestionably someone fell down with regard to the huts at Nanaimo. I understand that this mistake has been rectified, but it should never have been permitted to happen. We produce in British Columbia 53 per cent of Canada's lumber production, and we have the largest coal mines in the Dominion of Canada. Yet we have more unemployment in British Columbia than in any other province. Whoever it was that was responsible for the blunder in connection with the huts at Nanaimo should have been not only fired but interned.

The time to prepare for the return of the soldiers of this war is to-day, not to-morrow. We all know that tremendous mistakes were made after the last war by both parties; I do not say intentionally, but we ought to take steps now to see that those mistakes are not repeated. I think the private members of the house should be called in to serve on committees where they could give the benefit of their experience in deciding what should be done to look after the boys when they come back, because I warn this house and the government that the conditions which have existed for the last twenty years will never be permitted to exist in the twenty years following the present war.

Moreover, I think it is high time that the government took into consideration this mere pittance of $20 a month that we are giving as a pension to the aged. That amount should be increased. Surely if $20 a month were required to feed an aged person before the war, it ought to be obvious that with war prices, the sum of $20 is not sufficient to-day. A man or woman seventy years of age cannot use that money to advantage in the next world, so let us give them an increase now at a reduced age limit.

I wish to speak for a moment or two now of the junior employees of the civil service, and I can safely do so because there are no civil servants in my riding. I think I am the only person in the riding who has a government job. The federal government is expected to set an example to the employers of Canada, and we as members of the federal house are supposed to set an example to the provincial houses and to municipal governments in our treatment of our employees. Yet in the civil service there are junior employees in the city of Ottawa receiving $55 a month on which they are trying to live away from home. We expect them to live as decent Canadians on $55 a month. We should be ashamed of ourselves, and as a private member I am ashamed of myself. I take my breakfast in a little restaurant—I live in a room because every apartment is taken by these one-dollar-a-year men who clutter up the city—and in that little restaurant I see these girls, junior employees in the civil service, making a breakfast of a cup of coffee and a cigarette because that is all they can afford; and at supper I see them having a bottle of coca-cola and a cigarette because they are getting only $55 a month to live on. This government has nothing to be proud of in that fact, and I am not particularly proud of having to go back to my constituents and say that as a government we are paying $55 a month to boys and girls to live on. I hope the government will tell some of their $30,000 a year treasury officials that a girl cannot live on $55 a month.

I come from a rural riding, and I should like to speak for a minute on rural conditions in my riding. We have received absolutely no benefit from war expenditures. Like the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Turgeon), I am not complaining particularly about war industries not being located in my riding, for it is not particularly suited to the establishment of such industries, although during the last war factory after factory in British Columbia were turning out munitions; but to the best of my knowledge we have not a solitary one turning out munitions for this war. I read in the paper to-day that somebody had suggested in the house that these ships which were being built on the lakes should be sent down to the St. Lawrence before they were frozen in, so that they might be completed and delivered. We have shipyards on the Pacific coast which are working at only half their capacity, and it never freezes there. Let the government give us orders for some of these ships it wants built, and we will build them.

With regard to milk, it may surprise some hon. members to know what the price was in September, 1939. In my riding milk is paid for on a butter-fat basis, and prices are set by pooling the price return of fluid milk, canned milk and butter and cheese. The price in September, 1939, was 35 cents a pound butter-fat; in September, 1940, it was 37 cents—up only 2 cents. That is after one year of war. I hope some of these great industrialists in the east will listen to that. But the price of bran in November, 1939, was $27 a ton, and in November, 1940, it was $29, or up $2. Is the dairy farmer getting anything on that?

For grade A large eggs, in August, 1939, we got 26 cents a dozen; in August, 1940, the price was two cents down, while the laying mash cost 10 cents per hundred pounds more. We are sending lumber by the thousands of cars monthly to be shipped from the Atlantic coast, and the cars come back empty. The farmers of the prairies have millions upon millions of bushels of wheat which they cannot sell; yet we, as a "race" or some other classification, have the stupidity to let those cars come back empty instead of taking the grain out to the Pacific coast to be used. We could profitably produce another $5,000,000 worth of eggs. I want the house to remember this. Last year we exported only $90,000 worth of eggs from British Columbia. We could produce profitably for export $5,000,000 worth of eggs for Great Britain if we got a reasonable rate on our grain.

I recently heard an hon. member from Ontario, I believe it was the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser), remark that the west was getting all the grease at the expense of Ontario. Possibly the west is getting the grease, but I want to point out to that hon. member that the industrial centres in Ontario have been getting the gravy for the last fifty years. I do not wish to depreciate in any way the efforts of the wheat grower to secure justice in this house, but there are also farmers in the maritimes and in British Columbia who should have equal consideration. I hope that the prairie farmers get their just dues.

We are making a new effort in my particular district. I am glad that the minister concerned is here. I am sorry that the Minister of Agriculture and of National War Services (Mr. Gardiner) is absent from the house at the moment—not that I want to have any argument with him, because I notice that a number of my hon. friends on the left have tried that. We are endeavouring in my riding to establish bulb-growing. Those who are familiar with the subject know that it takes from five to twenty-five years to become established in the bulb industry, and some of the bulbs may cost $100 or $150; that is your initial stock; the bulb has to be divided and re-divided, and you gradually build up until you get an acreage large enough to enable you to ship bulbs. That may take from five to twenty-five years, according to the amount of capital.

As I have said, we are trying to establish that industry in British Columbia. In no way will it compete with farmers elsewhere. There never was a time, when, owing to world conditions, it was so practicable as at present to establish ourselves in this line. While our farmers are establishing themselves, striving to gain an existence and to become independent, they depend to a great extent on the sale of cut flowers. This year they got the magnificent sum of 4 cents a dozen for cut daffodils, out of which they have to pay for cultivating, cutting, packing and freight. I hope the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) is taking this in, because he is going to have a long interview with me the day after the house rises, when he will not be so busy. The farmer gets 4 cents a dozen, and what have we done? We have allowed him an exemption up to $500 from sales tax on cut flowers and bulbs, and if he sells $501 worth the 8 per cent tax is applied and he must pay $40.08 sales tax. I know that this war has to be paid for, and I understand that the primary reason why hon. members are here is to find ways and means of winning the war and paying for it. But I suggest that it is not sound economy, it is not to the best interests of Canada, to force men who may become established in this line into the industrial centres by taxing them to pay for the war effort, when there are other ways of doing it.

There is one thing I want to suggest before I close. I do not know how much time I have, but I do not believe anyone else wants the next five minutes, so I will go on. We have in British Columbia a tremendous number of unemployed. We are not reaping any of the benefits of war industry. There is one way whereby the government could aid us, provided we have the resources we are reported to have in the Turner valley. I understand—I have never heard it contradicted by reliable authority, and I am speaking not of these dollar-a-year men, but of independent, reliable men—that we have enormous quantities of gas and oil in the Turner valley. At the present moment one thing Hitler is worried about in connection with his war effort is his supply of oil, and every hon. member knows that the greatest worry the British government has to-day is to protect its oil supplies. If we have the oil in the Turner valley, in my opinion now is the time, not after the war reaches our shores, to pipe it to the Pacific coast. We have the men; we are preparing at the coast for the time when the oil will be there; and we have the material.

One other item before I close, and I want the minister to bear this also in mind. I am sorry that he is sitting in the back row, but I hope that he can hear me. We talk about conserving exchange, and I listened with a great deal of interest to a discussion by two hon. members on foreign exchange. I admit that I do not know anything about the subject, but I do know a little about common sense. In the city of Toronto to-day is a lady whose husband is serving in the bombing section of the Royal Air Force—serving in our defence. About two weeks from now that lady will have a baby, yet her husband cannot send any part of his cheque out here to pay for her keep. Did one ever imagine anything so ridiculous? The reason is the foreign exchange regulations. I could cite a dozen other cases. Surely the minister does not know what is going on. If he does, does he think it is fair that a man who this very night is flying a plane to defend us, cannot send part of his pay to his wife, and that at such a time she has to depend on charity? A man working for a Canadian firm in London whose wife is in Toronto cannot pay her a portion of his wages owing to the rules governing foreign exchange. These are facts. I am perfectly sure the minister did not know them or they would not be allowed to exist.

Mr. ILSLEY: The Canadian government does not stop a remittance of that kind.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am glad to have the minister's explanation. But I am sorry to say that no later than last Sunday this lady in Toronto could not get her money. I can give her name.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not this government that is responsible.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I know, it is the British government. But am I to be told here that we are a part of the British empire, and yet we cannot find some way to avoid this lady being compelled to subsist on charity? What are we here for if we are not part of the British empire? It is to face such questions that we as members are assembled here, and as long as I am a member of this house I shall never be satisfied to offer any alibi or any excuse when the wife of a man who is flying a bomber to-night in defence of London and of ourselves has to depend on charity.

On motion of Mr. Hanson (Skeena) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Ilsley the house adjourned at 10.53 p.m.

Wednesday, November 27, 1940.

The house met at three o'clock.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours that this house has appointed the honourable the Speaker and Messieurs Adamson, Aylesworth, Black (Chateauguay-Huntingdon), Bruce, Cardiff, Casselman (Grenville-Dundas), Castleden, Emmerson, Eudes, Farquhar, Fontaine, Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont), Gershaw, Goulet, Graham, Green, Henderson, Howden, Hurtubise, Jaques, Jean, Lizotte, Macdonald (Halifax), MacKenzie (Neepawa), MacKenzie (Lambton-Kent), Macmillan, Marier, Martin, Mayhew, Moore, Poirier, Pouliot, Purdy, Raymond, Reid, Rickard, Ross (St. Paul's), Shaw, Telford, Thauvette, Warren, Winkler, Wood and Woodsworth, a committee to assist his honour the Speaker in the direction of the library of parliament, so far as the interests of the House of Commons are concerned, and to act on behalf of the House of Commons as members of a joint committee of both houses on the library.

Motion agreed to.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours that this house will unite with them in the formation of a joint committee of both houses on the subject of the printing of parliament, and that the members of the standing committee on printing, viz., Messieurs Bercovitch, Bertrand (Terreboone), Blanchette, Bourget, Casselman (Grenville-Dundas), Castleden, Chambers, Chevrier, Claxton, Cloutier, Corman, Damude, Denis, Dubois, Durocher, Edwards, Emmerson, Esling, Evans, Ferland, Fleming, Fraser (Peterborough West), Furniss, Goulet, Grant, Green, Hallé, Healy, Hlynka, Hurtubise, Kuhl, Leader, MacDiarmid, MacKinnon (Kootenay East), MacLean (Cape Breton North-Victoria), McGregor, McNevin, Mills, Moore, Mulock, Nicholson, Purdy, Rhéaume, Ross (St. Paul's), Sinclair, Sissons, Soper, Tucker, Tustin, Weir, White, Whitman, Winkler and Wood, will act as members on the part of this house, on the said joint committee on the printing of parliament.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL RESOURCES MOBILIZATION

AMENDMENT OF PROVISIONS OF ACT RESPECTING EXEMPTION FROM LIABILITY TO SERVICE

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 4, to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Speaker, this bill is complementary to the one I introduced a few days ago amending the Militia Act, and will have the effect of preventing the exemption of conscientious objectors. It will amend the National Resources Mobilization Act by striking out therein the reference to conscientious objectors.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUSPENSION OF SPECIAL ORDER, TO PROCEED TO QUESTIONS AND MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the house I move:

That consideration of the special order relative to the debate on the address to His Excellency be suspended until the house has proceeded to the orders respecting questions and notices of motions for the production of papers standing on the order paper.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

WAR MATERIALS AND SUPPLIES—CONSTRUCTION CONTRACTS

Mr. FAIR:

What is the number and value of war contracts, by provinces, awarded to individuals and corporations by the Department of Munitions and Supply and its predecessor purchasing bodies from September 1, 1939, to date, for (a) war materials and supplies of all kinds, (b) construction contracts?

Mr. HOWE: Answered by the minister, page 244 of Hansard, in reply to a question by Mr. Hazen, M.P., and page 262, Hansard.

DEBERT MILITARY PROJECT

Mr. PURDY:

1. Is the government aware that as at November 14, the civilian employees on the Debert military project had not been paid for the two-week period ending October 31, and that previous pays had also been seriously delayed?

2. If so, has this matter been adjusted since the above date?

3. Will steps be taken to ensure that in future payment will be made within 5 days of the closing of the pay periods, i.e., 15th and end of each month?

Mr. POWER:

1. It is the practice of the Department of National Defence to pay civilians employed on military projects on the 1st and 15th of each month. However, at present, conditions at Debert are somewhat abnormal in that about 4,000 cheques have to be issued each pay day. Pay lists have to be checked and defence tax calculated for each individual payment. This does not allow of the cheques being issued in less than ten days after each pay day. Actually it means a delay only in the first pay.

2 and 3. See answer to No. 1.

BUREAU OF PUBLIC INFORMATION—STAFF

Mr. BENCE:

1. What are the names of the persons employed in the bureau of information?

2. What is the salary and/or allowance of each such person?

Mr. GARDINER:

1 and 2.

Name	Salary	Allowance
G. H. Lash	Nil	$10 per day
Claude Melancon	Nil	$10 per day
W. Herbert	$4,800 per year	Nil
George Hambleton	$3,000 per year	Nil

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION—SASKATCHEWAN COMMUNITY PASTURES

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

1. How many community pastures are operating in Saskatchewan under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act?

2. What is the rate of fees for each animal kept in these pastures?

3. How many cattle have been lost through disease while in these pastures for each of the years 1938 and 1939?

4. How many cattle have been lost through theft from these pastures for each year since they commenced operation?

5. What provision is made to recompense the owners of cattle lost by theft while in these community pastures?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. 52.

2. 49 pastures: monthly rate—cattle 35 cents; horses 50 cents. Summer season rate—cattle $1.75; horses $2.50. Winter season rate—horses $2.

3 pastures: monthly rate—cattle 30 cents; horses 40 cents. Summer season rate—cattle $1.50; horses $1.75. Winter season rate—horses $1.50.

3. 1938—4; 1939—5.

4. None.

5. The dominion does not assume responsibility for cattle lost by theft.

S.S. "NEW NORTHLAND"

Mr. McGREGOR:

1. Has the government chartered the New Northland from the Clark Steamship Company Limited?

2. If so, is it a charter party, or under what arrangement is this vessel being used by the government, and what subsidy or remuneration is being paid for it?

3. What service is this vessel performing for the dominion government?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City):

1. The vessel was chartered by the British Admiralty.

2. It is not expedient for this department to publish information with regard to the use to which the Admiralty have placed this vessel.

3. Answered by No. 2.

MINES AND RESOURCES—PUBLICATIONS

Mr. McGREGOR:

1. Have publications been distributed by the Department of Mines and Resources since January 1, 1939?

2. If so, why were these publications not distributed by the king's printer in accordance with the Public Printing and Stationery Act?

3. Has the government taken any action on the recommendation of the auditor general in his report for the year ending March 31, 1940, page 174, that these publications should be distributed by the king's printer?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. Yes.

2. Publications of the Department of Mines and Resources are being distributed by the king's printer but it has not been considered practicable to place distribution in his hands exclusively. Requests for technical information can best be dealt with by persons familiar with the particular subject. Frequently explanations and data supplementary to that contained in departmental reports are necessary and can only be supplied by technically qualified departmental officers. Some publications are sold or distributed at points away from Ottawa, for example historic site booklets which are sold at the particular sites described in the booklets. National parks literature of a general character is distributed by the national parks bureau to which requests for copies of such literature are normally addressed. Such pamphlets are also used to reduce correspondence.

3. No. The policy which has been in effect for many years is being continued.

ILE D'ENTREE, MAGDALEN ISLANDS, LIGHTHOUSE KEEPER

Mr. ROY:

1. Is Mr. D. K. McLean, lighthouse keeper at Ile D'entree, Magdalen islands?

2. If so, what is his annual remuneration?

3. Is he performing any other duties?

4. Does he receive a pension as a returned soldier?

5. If so, what is the amount of such pension?

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. Yes.

2. $1,980, out of which he is required to provide for the services of an assistant.

3. So far as the Department of Transport is aware, he has no employment other than his position as lightkeeper.

4. Yes.

5. $24 per month.

*TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

Mr. HANSELL:

1. What is the total estimated cost of the federal coast to coast highway?

2. What has been the total annual expenditure on this highway since the commencement of the project?

3. What part or parts and mileage of this highway was built each year?

4. What is the total estimated mileage of the survey?

5. How many miles of this highway have yet to be completed?

Mr. CRERAR: The federal government has no coast-to-coast highway project under construction. I assume that what was in the mind of the hon. gentleman in asking this question was the federal government expenditures on the trans-Canada highway. If my hon. friend will reflect, he will realize that the matter of roads is wholly within provincial jurisdiction. The other portions of his question would come under this answer. However, for the information of my hon. friend and of the house I might state that at various times in the past assistance has been given to some of the provinces toward the cost of road projects which, when linked up, would go to make a coast-to-coast highway. The government has no information as to what the total costs of these projects would be, although it could furnish information as to what the federal government has advanced up to the present time. A section of what will be a trans-Canada highway was built by the federal government in British Columbia under an agreement with the province, the section running from Golden to Revelstoke. Also the portions of the road constructed in Banff and Yoho national parks would be a wholly federal expenditure.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE—YIELDS NOT ACCEPTED BY COMMITTEE OF REVIEW

Mr. MARSHALL:

1. What awards were made under the terms and provisions of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act covering yields not accepted by the committee of review?

2. Were any awards made where hail was the cause of low yield? If so, where and under what conditions?

3. In what townships were overpayments made and unrecovered as at November 1, 1940, and what were the circumstances regarding these overpayments?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Awards were made as follows where the committee of review recommended that no award be paid:

	No. of Townships
Manitoba	14
Saskatchewan	62
	96

The following townships were placed in a higher award category than was recommended by the committe of review:

	No. of Townships
Manitoba	9
Saskatchewan	15
	29

All the above awards were duly authorized by the Minister of Agriculture under the terms of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. The changes from the committee's recommendations arose as follows:

1. From appeals, supported by affidavits as provided by regulation 4c under the act.
2. From further review by departmental officials, based in some instances on the receipt of additional information.

2. Yes. Hail was accepted as a cause of low yield in respect to all awards under section 3 of the act—emergency year assistance.

3. Overpayments wholly or partially recovered as at November 1, 1940, were made to one or more individuals in each of the following townships:

Forty-one of the outstanding overpayments, amounting to $6,969.24, resulted from persons being paid who were later found to be ineligible.

Twenty-four of the outstanding overpayments, amounting to $970.45, arose from errors in computation in the P.F.A. office.

Eight of the outstanding overpayments, amounting to $348.96, originated from release of cheques by the treasury office before township eligibility had been confirmed.

WAR MATERIALS AND SUPPLIES—PURCHASE AND MANUFACTURE IN CANADA

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

1. Are the following being manufactured in Canada: (a) Lee-Enfield rifles, (b) Colt and Browning aircraft machine guns, (c) two-pounder anti-aircraft guns and carriages, (d) 25-pounder quick-firing guns and carriages, (e) 40 mm. Bofors anti-aircraft guns, (f) 3·7 anti-aircraft guns and mounting, (g) 20 mm. Hispano Suiza aircraft guns?
2. Have any of these been produced and delivered?
3. How many of these have been manufactured in Canada?

Mr. HOWE: Answered by the minister, pages 264-265, Hansard.

*ESTABLISHMENT OF FRENCH-CANADIAN MILITARY COLLEGE IN PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

Mr. LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency):

Will the government establish in the province of Quebec a French-Canadian military college similar to the one already existing at Kingston, Ontario?

Mr. POWER: This involves a question of policy. Should the government decide to establish a military college in the province of Quebec, this policy will be announced in due course.

*CANADIAN FORESTRY CORPS

Mr. NICHOLSON:

In view of the reported lack of sawmills in Great Britain to cut the available home grown timber, has the government considered the feasibility of increasing the strength of the Canadian forestry corps beyond the twenty companies which have now been raised?

Mr. POWER: This question involves a matter of policy. This matter has been the subject of discussion between the British and Canadian governments, and the number of units mobilized was arrived at after consultation between the two governments. The question of mobilizing further companies is a matter of policy which will be announced in due course.

*FREE DISTRIBUTION OF APPLES IN NORTHERN SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. NICHOLSON:

In view of the large surplus of apples, has the government considered free distribution of apples in northern Saskatchewan where the frost has ruined wild and domestic fruit crops?

Mr. GARDINER: It will be difficult to answer this question because of its wording. It is not anticipated that there will be a large surplus of apples this year. Therefore, the matter referred to has not been given further consideration.

*ALASKA HIGHWAY COMMISSION—TABLING OF REPORT

Mr. HANSON (Skeena):

1. Has the joint Alaska highway commission presented a report to the government on its findings?
2. If so, will it be tabled?
3. Has a decision been arrived at as to when construction of this project will be started?
4. If so, what route has been chosen?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): This question has reference to the report of the joint Alaska highway commission, and I should like to supplement my answer to the question by tabling the report of the commission at this time.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Might I ask the Prime Minister when the reports of the joint Alaska highway commission will be made available to the members of the house? I know that one copy has been tabled.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The report has not been printed. My hon. friend will probably have to consult the report in its typewritten form. If I can accommodate him in any way by lending him an extra copy, I shall be happy to do so.

*SCHNEIDER-CREUSOT COMPANY—MR. SCHNEIDER

Mr. DUBOIS:

1. Is the government aware that one Mr. Schneider of the Schneider-Creusot Company of France had business connections with a Canadian firm in 1939-40?
2. If so, what is the name of such firm?
3. What is Mr. Schneider's first name?
4. Is the said Mr. Schneider the same individual who was interested in the Skoda factories in Czechoslovakia in 1939?

Mr. HOWE: The government has no information regarding any of the points raised in this question.

*CHAPLAIN GENERAL OF THE CANADIAN SERVICES

Mr. COLDWELL:

What action does the government propose to take in the case of the Chaplain General of the Canadian forces who, on November 20, 1934, according to press reports, extolled Mussolini and expressed a readiness to be one of Hitler's followers?

Mr. POWER: If my hon. friend will permit me to say so, I think his question is probably informative and perhaps provocative rather than inquisitive. The government is not aware of the press report referred to. The appointment of Colonel, the Right Reverend Bishop Wells as principal chaplain, Protestant, was decided upon last October after full inquiry into his qualifications, and nothing which has since occurred would indicate that any error of judgment was made in his selection. The Right Reverend Bishop Wells is now overseas. He saw service in the South African war and in the last war.

TRADE BETWEEN CANADA AND JAPAN

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River):

1. Has the government taken the necessary steps to stop the importation of goods from Japan into Canada?

2. Has the government taken the necessary steps to stop the exportation of all war supplies from Canada into Japan?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. No.

2. Under section 290 of the Customs Act and under the War Measures Act, a system of control for exports to all countries has been established. The policy of maintaining an absolute priority of Canadian supplies for the requirements of Canada, her allies and those countries whose economic and industrial resources have been made available for the prosecution of our war effort, has been in force since the outbreak of hostilities. Information regarding certain commodities, export of which is being restricted accordingly, was given to the house on November 12.

SMALL ARMS LIMITED

Mr. McGREGOR:

1. Where is Small Arms Limited located?

2. Who financed the construction of the plant for Small Arms Limited?

3. Who are the officers of Small Arms Limited?

4. Is Small Arms Limited under the control of any other company?

5. If so, what is the name of the company?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Long Branch, Ontario.

2. The dominion government.

[Mr. Howe.]

3. President and General Manager, G. S. Braden; vice-president, Paul Bourget; secretary, Robert Flavelle; directors, N. P. Peterson, Jas. I. Simpson.

4. No.

5. Answered by No. 4.

WAR CONTRACTS—PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

Mr. LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency):

1. What is the total amount of contracts awarded in the province of Quebec since the outbreak of war?

2. What was the total amount of the contracts awarded, since the outbreak of war, (a) in Quebec city; (b) in Quebec-Montmorency county; (c) in Levis county?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Refer to Hansard, page 262.

2. Refer to Hansard, page 244, Mr. Howe's reply to Mr. Hazen's question.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY—SENATOR E. S. LITTLE

Mr. LOCKHART:

1. Is Senator E. S. Little engaged in any work for the Department of Munitions and Supply?

2. If so, what are his duties?

3. What living or other allowances are paid to him?

Mr. HOWE:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Answered by No. 1.

REPATRIATION OF CANADIAN SECURITIES IN THE UNITED KINGDOM

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. What arrangements have been made with the British treasury for the disposition of some sixty Canadian stocks, bonds and debentures requisitioned in the United Kingdom this month by this government? Are they to be repatriated?

2. Are the said stocks, bonds and debentures to be turned into dollars?

3. Is the entire operation to be undertaken through the Bank of Canada?

4. Upon repatriation, what particularly does the government propose to do with (a) Canadian National Railways' 4½ per cent guaranteed bonds, 1951; (b) Canadian National Railways' 4½ per cent guaranteed bonds, 1956; (c) Canadian National Railways' 4½ per cent guaranteed bonds, 1957; (d) Canadian National Steamships' 5 per cent guaranteed bonds, 1955; (e) Grand Trunk perpetual 4 per cent consolidated debenture stock; (f) Canadian National Railways' (G.T.P.) 3 per cent mortgage bonds, 1962; (g) Canadian National Railways' (G.T.P.) 4 per cent sterling bonds, 1962?

5. What plans have been made by Canada regarding all other Canadian corporation and industrial stocks requisitioned in the United Kingdom?

6. What is the total dollar value of securities to be repatriated under this operation?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. The Canadian stocks, bonds and debentures listed in the recent vesting order issued by the treasury of the United Kingdom are to be repatriated, as indicated by the Minister of Finance in the House of Commons (Hansard, page 282). The Canadian government has made arrangements with the government of the United Kingdom for the purchase of the Grand Trunk 4 per cent perpetual consolidated debenture stock, payment of interest on which is guaranteed by the dominion. The other securities are being sold as opportunity offers, and the sales are being effected on behalf of the treasury of the United Kingdom under the supervision of Mr. T. Carlisle Gifford, representative of the treasury, who in turn is represented in Ottawa by Mr. G. I. Stewart. The Bank of Canada is acting as adviser. It is understood that any bona fide bids to purchase these securities are being considered by the representatives of the treasury of the United Kingdom, that every effort is being made to obtain fair prices for these securities and that particular care is taken to ensure that security markets in Canada will not be disturbed by these transactions.

2. Yes.

3. Answered by No. 1.

4. The question in respect to the Grand Trunk 4 per cent perpetual consolidated debenture stock has been answered by No. 1. As regards the remaining securities referred to in paragraph 4 of the question it is probable that the United Kingdom authorities will be requested not to make any sales except to institutions owned by the dominion government.

5. Answered by No. 1 and No. 2 above.

6. For reasons related to the orderly and effective marketing of these securities, the treasury of the United Kingdom has never made public the value of securities delivered to the treasury under vesting orders. Because of the fact that the Grand Trunk 4 per cent perpetual consolidated debenture stock will not be offered in the market, the objection to publication of figures does not apply. While the amount of this stock owned by residents of the United Kingdom is not yet known, the Minister of Finance estimated that the vesting operation should eventually result in the transfer of about $109 millions to British account in Canada (Hansard, page 282). It may safely be anticipated that the total value of the other securities concerned in this question will be substantially less than the amount of this Grand Trunk stock.

HINCHCLIFFE, SASK., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. Did the Post Office Department notify the branches of the Canadian Legion at either Preeceville or Endeavour, Saskatchewan, of the intention to appoint a new postmaster at Hinchcliffe?

2. Did the Post Office Department write to J. Ross Barrie of Pelly, Saskatchewan, on July 19, 1940, asking him to recommend a suitable person for the post of postmaster at Hinchcliffe, Saskatchewan? If so, for what reason?

3. Is it customary for the Post Office Department to write to defeated government candidates in connection with recommending suitable postmasters?

Mr. MULOCK:

1. No. But in accordance with the usual practice a notice was sent to the provincial command.

2. Yes. To obtain a nomination.

3. Yes. Where revenue of the office is under $3,000.

*DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS—PEACEFUL PICKETING

Mr. COLDWELL:

In view of the answer of the Minister of Justice at page 258 of Hansard, will the government give immediate consideration to the amendment of the Defence of Canada Regulations, so that labour's right to peaceful picketing may not be restrained?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The matter referred to in this question is before the courts, and when a decision has been rendered the question of whether it is advisable to amend the regulations will be considered.

Mr. CHURCH: Is it not the rule that the Minister of Justice who is the Attorney General of Canada shall not be asked to give legal opinions in the house?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The hon. member is quite right.

REPRESENTATIONS AS TO BOMBING IN TERRITORY OF AXIS POWERS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the government made any representations to the government of Great Britain respecting the bombing by Britain of cities and other parts of any territory of the axis powers?

2. If so, what were they, and when were they made?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

*SUGGESTED COMMITTEE ON WAR EFFORT AND SUBVERSIVE PROPAGANDA

Mr. CHURCH:

Does the government propose to move the appointment of a select committee of the house to (a) investigate and report any subversive anti-Canadian and anti-British propaganda in Canada; (b) to report on Canada's war effort, and how more direct and immediate aid can be afforded to enable Britain to take the offensive in the battle of Britain and other European war areas?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government's intentions in this regard will be made known in due course.

DOCTOR E. W. STAPLEFORD

Mr. QUELCH:

1. Is Dr. E. W. Stapleford employed in any department of the government?
2. If so, what is the annual salary paid to him?
3. What are his duties?
4. What allowance, if any, does he receive for expenses?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Yes.
2. $5,000 per annum.
3. Director of the division of voluntary services, Department of National War Services.
4. None. Actual expenses when travelling on business of the department.

PURCHASES OF COAL

Mr. HANSELL:

1. How many tons of coal were purchased from the United States by the Canadian National Railways during 1939 and 1940?
2. How many tons were purchased from other countries?
3. How many tons, and what was the actual cost per ton of this coal delivered at (a) Halifax, (b) Saint John, (c) lake ports?
4. Was any of this coal imported by rail? If so, how much, and what was the actual cost per ton?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. Coal purchased from the United States for Canadian National railway lines in Canada: 1939, 1,055,375 net tons; 1940 (to October 31), 1,546,080 net tons.

2. Coal purchased from other countries for Canadian National railways in Canada: 1939, from Canadian mines, 2,916,645 net tons; from British mines, 706 net tons; 1940 (to Oct. 31), from Canadian mines, 2,759,462 net tons; from British mines, 30,793 net tons.

3. Deliveries by water to various ports:1939, Halifax, nil; St. John, nil; Midland, 72,771 net tons; Depot Harbour, 21,190 net tons; Fort William, 235,797 net tons; 1940 (Oct. 31), Halifax, nil; St. John, nil; Midland, 65,720 net tons; Depot Harbour, 21,307 net tons; Fort William, 215,987 net tons.

4. United States coal imported by rail: 1939, 724,802 net tons; 1940 (to October 31), 1,243,066 net tons.

Note: Re prices, Questions 3 and 4:

As the railway management feel it is not in the railway interest to do so, it has not been the practice to make public prices paid by the management for materials and supplies, though such information is made available to the standing committee on railways and shipping if requested.

RACIAL ORIGIN OF OFFICERS AND MEN ENLISTED FOR ACTIVE SERVICE

Mr. HLYNKA:

1. What is the total number of enlistments for active service in Canada at the present time of the following racial origins: (a) Anglo-Saxon; (b) French; (c) Ukrainian; (d) German; (e) Polish; (f) Jewish?
2. What number of each of the above six groups on active service are there in each of the nine provinces?
3. What is the total number of officers on active service in Canada of the following origin: (a) Anglo-Saxon; (b) French; (c) Ukrainian; (d) German; (e) Polish; (f) Jewish?

Mr. POWER: I have replies from all three of the service departments and they all agree that this information is not available in the form requested. To obtain the information would entail a search of all these service files and the diversion of a considerable staff from its regular duties. It would mean looking through the documents of every soldier, sailor and airman. If the house requires it, we may get the information next year some time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

SULPHATE OF AMMONIA

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. How much sulphate of ammonia was imported into Canada during 1939?
2. How much sulphate of ammonia was produced in Canada during 1939?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1. Sulphate of ammonia imported into Canada during the calendar year 1939—3,217 tons.

2. Sulphate of ammonia produced in Canada during the calendar year 1939—129,865 tons.

IMPORTS OF CORN

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. What amount of dutiable corn was imported into Canada during 1939?
2. What amount of duty free corn for manufacturing purposes was imported into Canada during 1939?
3. What was the value per bushel of the duty free corn imported for manufacturing purposes?
4. What is the amount of corn now held in storage in Canada?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1. Dutiable corn imported into Canada during the calendar year 1939—2,310,279 bushels.

2 and 3. Duty free corn imported into Canada during the calendar year 1939—For distillation, 250,000 bushels, 51·1 cents per bushel. For starch or cereals, 1,824,417 bushels, 57·1 cents per bushel. Corn, n.o.p., 3,484,296 bushels, 57·2 cents per bushel.

4. Corn in storage—November 24, 1939, 6,445,966 bushels. November 22, 1940, 3,920,439 bushels.

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT OFFICE ACCOMMODATION

Mr. CHURCH:

On account of the congestion and lack of adequate office space and housing accommodation in Ottawa, will the government give consideration to having a survey made (a) of office space needed now and in the near future in Ottawa; and (b) to see if part of the government's own offices and that of government commissions and boards cannot be moved to Toronto, Hamilton and Montreal, where space is available, so as to afford better accommodation, and in the interest of efficiency and economy in government?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I think this question might be answered by assuring my hon. friend that the government is giving continuous attention to the subject of office space and housing accommodation in Ottawa.

Mr. CHURCH: Might I ask the Prime Minister what he means by "giving continuous attention" to the lack of office space and housing accommodation in Ottawa? Is it like the attention the government is giving to free fares for the soldiers and soldiers' insurance? There is great congestion in Ottawa.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The answer means just what it says. The government is giving attention to the matter of space and accommodation and to the difficulties of congestion in the city, etcetera, and in that connection is taking account of opportunities here and elsewhere in seeking to meet the situation.

Mr. CHURCH: Are not some of the offices provincial and doing concurrent work?

PROPOSED NAVAL COLLEGE

Mr. GILLIS:

1. Is the proposed naval academy referred to by the minister for the training of officers only?

2. Will (a) ordinary sailors and (b) sea captains be eligible to take training in this academy?

3. Will the minister state just what class of applicants will be eligible to enrol?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): The matter of the type of training to be given, the standards of admission, and other like questions are now under consideration.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

GOLD FROM BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River):

Has the government obtained any gold from any source from British Columbia during the last two months? If so, from whom?

Mr. ILSLEY: Return tabled.

GOVERNMENT PURCHASES OF BUILDINGS IN OTTAWA

Mr. BOUCHER:

1. What buildings in the city of Ottawa have been purchased by the dominion government since September 1, 1939?

2. From whom was each such building purchased?

3. What was the purchase price in each case?

4. What amount of floor space is available in each such building?

5. For what purpose is each of these buildings being used?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Return tabled.

ORDNANCE AND ADMIRALTY LAND, QUEBEC CITY

Mr. MacKINNON (Kootenay East):

1. What ordnance and admiralty land in the city of Quebec is occupied by civic authorities?

2. What is the extent of such land?

3. What is the value of such land?

4. What revenue does the government receive from such land?

5. Has any settlement been arrived at with the civic authorities for the payment of said land.

6. If not, why?

CONNAUGHT RIFLE RANGES—CONSTRUCTION AND IMPROVEMENTS

Mr. BOUCHER:

1. What was the cost of construction and improvements to Connaught rifle ranges?

2. What is the total acreage?

3. To what use were the Connaught rifle ranges put last year?

4. To what use will they be put during the war?

Mr. POWER: Return tabled.

GOVERNMENT LEASE OR PURCHASE OF VESSELS

Mr. CASSELMAN (Grenville-Dundas):

1. How many vessels, if any, of 1,000 tons or less, has the government purchased or leased from private individuals or companies since September last?

2. Who were the vendors of these vessels?

3. What was the purchase price in each case?

4. What was the lease price in each case?

5. What was the nature of each of these vessels?

6. How many of them were yachts or pleasure boats?

Mr. POWER: Return tabled.

Mr. CASSELMAN (Grenville-Dundas): This question, which has been passed as an order for a return, is a repetition of a question which was asked in the previous session and was not answered. I would ask to have substituted for the words "September last" the words "September 10, 1939."

WAR MATERIALS AND SUPPLIES—PURCHASES IN AND OUTSIDE CANADA

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

How many of the following have been produced and delivered to the government for the Department of National Defence, (1) by Canadian factories, (2) from outside of Canada: (a) pairs of boots, (b) suits of battle dress, (c) blankets, (d) pairs of braces, (e) service shirts, (f) greatcoats?

Mr. POWER: Return tabled.

JUDGES

Mr. McGREGOR:

1. How many judges are there in Canada paid by the federal government?

2. How many judges are there in each province paid for by the federal government?

3. What are their salaries?

4. How many retired judges are there on superannuation?

5. How much do they receive from superannuation?

6. Do the judges do any other work such as sitting on royal commissions?

7. If so, how much do they receive for sitting on royal commissions, (a) in salary; (b) living allowances?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Return tabled.

TAXES—COLLECTIONS SINCE 1935

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

What amounts were collected in each fiscal year since 1935 from the following taxes: (1) income tax: (a) individual, (b) corporation, (c) five per cent tax; (2) sales tax; (3) special excise tax; (4) excise tax on cables, telegraphs and telephones; (5) excise tax on railway accommodation; (6) excise tax on matches and lighters; (7) excise tax on cigarette papers and tubes; (8) excise tax on motor vehicles; (9) excise tax on tires and tubes; (10) excise tax on toilet preparations and soaps; (11) excise tax on cigars; (12) excise tax on sugar; (13) excise tax on playing cards; (14) excise tax on wines; (15) stock transfer tax; (16) other excise taxes collected by revenue stamps; (17) excise duty on spirits; (18) excise duty on malt; (19) excise duty on beer; (20) excise duty on malt syrup; (21) excise duty on cigarettes; (22) excise duty on cigars; (23) excise duty on tobacco; (24) customs duties, less drawbacks and refunds?

Mr. ILSLEY: Return tabled.

[Mr. A. C. Casselman.]

EAST CALGARY SUPPLY DEPOT—CONTRACTS FOR BUILDINGS

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River):

What is the government's contract price of each of the buildings at the supply depot (Nos. 11 and 2) in east Calgary?

Mr. POWER: Return tabled.

FEDERAL REVENUES AND PAYMENTS ON LOANS TO PROVINCES

Mr. LECLERC:

1. What were the ordinary and special revenues of the Dominion of Canada during the years 1936, 1937, 1938, and 1939?

2. What amount was contributed by each of the provinces during the above years?

3. What is the population of each province?

4. What amounts are required for the following: (a) ordinary administration expenditures; (b) interests on the debt of the dominion; (c) national railways deficits to be met?

5. What amount was contributed by the federal treasury to each province of the dominion during the above years: (a) in regular grant; (b) unemployment relief contribution; (c) unemployment relief works; (d) loans to provinces; (e) advance payments made on wheat in each province?

6. Were the loans referred to in section (d) of previous question refunded?

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE—CHAPLAINS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Who are the chaplains on full time and part time serving the Royal Canadian Air Force in No. 1 air training command at Toronto, and where are they located?

2. What are the number of men enlisted by denominations in this air command?

3. On what principles are these appointments made, and is consideration given to the number of men enlisted according to denominations in making these appointments?

4. Have any representations been made to the government in the matter by any heads of clerical organizations in Canada?

Mr. POWER: Return tabled.

CASUALTIES TO SOLDIERS IN CANADA

Mr. CHURCH:

1. How many airmen have been killed in Canada while in training since this war started, and where?

2. Were any coroner's civilian inquests held into the causes thereof, or only military inquests?

3. How many soldiers were killed on troop or other railways while serving in Canada, (a) Canadian National, (b) Canadian Pacific railway?

4. What inquests were held into the causes thereof (a) by civilian authority, (b) by military authority, or (c) by the board of transport commissioners?

5. Will any findings or reports herein be tabled?

6. How many soldiers were killed and injured in each military district on the highways by motor cars or in other accidents?

Mr. POWER: This question will stand as an order for return. I should like to point out to my hon. friend that it will not be possible to produce the documents referred to in question No. 5, "Will any findings or reports herein be tabled?"

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Coroners' reports are public documents, and they should be available.

Mr. POWER: The department has no control over civilian inquests, or coroners' investigations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The department should have a copy.

NATIONAL REGISTRATION

Mr. HANSELL:

1. What was the total cost of the national registration?
2. What was the total cost of registration in each constituency apart from printing, etc.?
3. What was the total cost for printing, stationery, etc.?
4. What was the total number of people registered?

Mr. GARDINER: Return tabled.

LEASE BY GOVERNMENT OF PROPERTIES IN KINGSTON

Mr. MacKINNON (Kootenay East):

1. Is the dominion government the lessee of properties at 202 Johnson street, and 156 King street, Kingston, Ontario?
2. If so, from whom are they leased?
3. What was the cost of reconditioning each of these properties and rendering it suitable for government occupation?
4. What rent is being paid per month in each case?
5. For what purpose is each property being used?
6. Did not the government own other property in or near the city of Kingston which would be equally suitable for the purpose for which either of these properties is being used?

LEASE BY GOVERNMENT OF PROPERTIES IN PORTSMOUTH, ONT.

Mr. MacKINNON (Kootenay East):

1. Has the government acquired the property known as Calderwood at 188 Union street in the village of Portsmouth, Ontario?
2. If so, when, and what was the purchase price?
3. What is the acreage of this property?
4. What is the total of expenditure made by the government on this property since it was purchased?
5. To whom is the property leased at the present time?
6. What is the period or term of the present lease?
7. Who is occupying the property at the present time?
8. How long has he occupied the property?
9. What rent is being paid per month for this property?
10. Is this property suitable for government purposes?
11. If not, why?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suggest that to pass this question as an order for return is not a very fair way of disposing of it. The answers to this question and the two immediately preceding would be very short.

Mr. POWER: Had the question been worded, "Is the Department of Naval Affairs or the Department of National Defence the lessee of properties, or has either one of the departments acquired certain property," it would have been a simple matter to answer the questions, but they are asked with respect to the dominion government generally, so that all departments would have to be circularised before an answer could be given.

NATIONAL RESOURCES MOBILIZATION—MEN CALLED UP BY PROVINCES

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many men have been called up for training under the National Resources Mobilization Act?
2. What are the particulars by provinces?

Mr. GARDINER: Return tabled.

J. N. BAYNE AND H. S. CARPENTER

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Are the following persons engaged in war or government service: (a) J. N. Bayne, (b) H. S. Carpenter?
2. If so, in what departments, and by whom were they recommended?
3. What does each receive by way of (a) salary, (b) expenses?
4. Were both of these persons formerly in the employ of the government of Saskatchewan? If so, in what capacities?
5. Are either or both in receipt of superannuation or retirement allowances from the province of Saskatchewan? If so, in what yearly amount?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

NATIONAL RESOURCES MOBILIZATION ACT

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved:

For a copy of all rules and regulations issued by order in council or otherwise under the Wartime Service Act, 1940.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Speaker, it should read, "under the National Resources Mobilization Act" instead of "under the Wartime Service Act, 1940". A return partly answering the question has been brought down and it is the balance of the information that I am requesting.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With that amendment, there is no objection.

Motion as amended agreed to.

PERSONS RELEASED FROM INTERNMENT

Mr. G. R. BOUCHER (Carleton) moved:

For a return showing the number of persons in each of the following categories: Germans, Italians, communists, National Unity party, who have been released from internment since July 27, 1940.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, as I said the other day, a return has been made as required under the regulations as revised by the parliamentary committee last year. I have consulted the officials of the department with reference to this question, and I am of opinion that it should be referred to the committee which is going to sit again this session to consider the regulations. If it is found advisable that the information should be made public, I would have no objection, but in the meantime I think that in the public interest the matter should stay as it is.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I suggest that in the return which the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) filed, the number of internees in the different categories was shown—not the names but the numbers. The corollary seems to me to be that we should have the numbers of those released in the different categories—not the names but the numbers. The department has this information and it is readily available. The only point at issue, as I see it, is the advisability of doing it here publicly or doing it in camera in committee. I am all for publicity, and I ask the minister to be so.

Motion dropped.

REJECTIONS OF ENLISTED MEN SINCE SEPTEMBER, 1939

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale) moved:

For a return showing a comparative statement of the number of rejections, for medical reasons, of men who enlisted in the Canadian army since September, 1939, as compared with a similar period of the first great war.

Mr. POWER: Mr. Speaker, I see no very great objection to the motion provided we are able to furnish my hon. friend with the information, but I think he himself will recollect that during the last war this question of rejections on medical grounds was a rather controversial one; and I fear that I would not be able to obtain in the files of the department such information as he might consider accurate. I should not like to undertake to ask the officers of the department to go over all these old files, and so I would say "yes" to the first part of the motion and "no" to the second part.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. BRUCE: My object in asking the question was to be able to answer statements made in this house as to deterioration in the health of our people. I hoped that it would have been found that there had been no deterioration in the health of our people since the last war.

Mr. POWER: I quite agree with my hon. friend that such statistics would be extremely valuable, but I doubt that they are available.

Motion as amended agreed to.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY—CONTROLLERS

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

For a copy of all orders in council appointing and prescribing the powers of the controllers in the Department of Munitions and Supply, together with a copy of any regulations or orders made by such controllers and/or by the war time industries control board.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

Mr. CASSELMAN (Grenville-Dundas):

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the governments of Canada, United States and the province of Ontario or between any officials of the said governments from January 1, 1935, to the present time, referring to: (a) a double-stage development of the international section of the St. Lawrence; (b) a single-stage development of the international section of the St. Lawrence.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may say to my hon. friend the member for Grenville-Dundas that I am informed with respect to this matter that such exchange of views as there was took the form of conferences and was not by correspondence and that there is nothing to bring down in the way of correspondence. I assure my hon. friend that if anything can be found it will be brought down. But that is the information that I have.

Mr. CASSELMAN (Grenville-Dundas): Possibly I can ask a question which will direct the right hon. gentleman's attention to the point in which I am interested. Is the government of Canada in possession of a document signed by Doctor Hogg, chief engineer of the hydro electric power commission, supporting a single-stage development of the international section of the St. Lawrence, as opposed to a double-stage development of the St. Lawrence?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall have to inquire so as to be perfectly sure of the reply, but I will give my hon. friend an answer to-morrow.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

PERMANENT JOINT BOARD ON DEFENCE

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, memoranda, agreements, and other documents passing between the government of Canada or any officer thereof and the government of the United States or any officer thereof, during the years 1936 to 1940 inclusive, regarding the joint defence of Canada and the United States, together with a copy of all leases, if any, of bases or of any territory belonging to Canada, in connection therewith; and also a copy of all correspondence, etc., exchanged between the government of Great Britain or any officer thereof and the government of Canada, within the said period, relating to the same matter. Also a copy of any orders in council in connection therewith.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend and to the house it will be observed that this return asks for documents regarding the joint defence of Canada and the United States. Obviously, any correspondence or documents relating to that particular subject could not be tabled without the consent of the United States government. That would have to be obtained in the first instance. I think, however, hon. members will see that neither the government of Canada nor the government of the United States would wish to table at this time any information which would likely be of service to the enemy. Certainly correspondence which relates to the joint defence of Canada and the United States would be viewed in that light, and it would not be advisable, I think, to have any such brought down.

I might say to my hon. friend that during the conferences which have been held in the United States it was neither suggested nor contemplated by either government that any bases in Canada would be leased to the government of the United States. There may be some documents in the nature of records that might be tabled. I will have a search made, and if there are any such I will seek to oblige my hon. friend by bringing them down, but, beyond an order in council or two, I doubt whether there is anything which could be tabled at this time.

Mr. CHURCH: May I say to the Prime Minister that I see no reason why all this correspondence should not be given the people of Canada in the form of a white paper. With regard to his references to Washington, most of this information has already been published down there; one can find it in the records of congress and the senate, press interviews and statements issued. But the people of Canada are on the whole totally ignorant of most of these matters of defence and foreign affairs.

On July 10 I asked the Prime Minister regarding this, when the debate on the estimates was in progress, and he said that the government had no commitments or understandings of any kind with any government wheresoever. Within a month or so after that discussion on the estimates and on a bill, it was found that there was another agreement made at Ogdensburg which has in it nothing that is new, because it simply lays down what the Prime Minister said before, that the two cardinal principles of our defence policy are home defence and the protection of our neutrality, and if our good neighbours next door know the facts I can see no reason for withholding them from the Canadian public. The fifty newspapermen got them when they were here; they were supplied with information, and some of the information appeared in their newspapers. I see no reason for the objection to the text of the motion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says that some of the correspondence has been published in the United States. If that is the case I certainly shall see that any such correspondence is immediately tabled. I imagine what my hon. friend has in mind is a statement given out at Ogdensburg. I gave this statement to the house and it is already on our Hansard. I shall also take steps to ascertain whether there is other correspondence which the government of the United States is prepared to have tabled. I will go just as far as it is possible to go in the matter, but I certainly will not go to the length of tabling any information which might be of service to Germany at this particular time.

INTERNMENT CAMPS—MENUS

Mr. NICHOLSON:

For a copy of the menus provided for German prisoners of war in an internment camp in Canada covering a one week period.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I am sorry I cannot give that information to my hon. friend because there is no menu.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE—NUMBER OF CASUALTIES AND ACCIDENTS IN CANADA

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

For a return showing, month by month, the number of deaths, crashes and serious accidents to Royal Canadian Air Force personnel which have occurred since the commonwealth air training plan was put into operation in Canada.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE—FINDINGS OF COURTS OF INQUIRY

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

For a copy of the findings of all Royal Canadian Air Force courts of inquiry held in each case of serious accident since the commonwealth air training plan was put into operation in Canada.

Mr. POWER: I have some doubt whether it would be in the public interest to permit such a return. I have consulted with the officers of the department and they are unanimously of opinion that no such documents should be produced.

Mr. CHURCH: Are any civilian inquests held?

Mr. POWER: I have already answered that.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF MAIN ESTIMATES, 1941-42

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to remind the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that on Wednesday last, November 20, I requested the government to give consideration to the question of bringing down the estimates for the next fiscal year before the house adjourns for the long vacation, which, it is intimated, will continue until February 17 next, some ten weeks. Is the Prime Minister in a position to make any announcement in this regard to-day, and if not, will he do so before the house adjourns?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I may say to my hon. friend that the estimates will be brought down immediately on the reassembling of parliament after the adjournment, but it will not be possible to have them brought down before. I would remind my hon. friend that the estimates are for the fiscal year 1941-42, which begins on April 1, 1941, and he, I am sure, will be the first to realize that it is desirable, if the estimates are to be as accurate as possible, that the government should take advantage of such opportunity as it may have in the interval of an adjournment to have them revised with the utmost care.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The answer is, no.

[Mr. Castleden.]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

QUESTION OF DISCLOSING UNIT PRICES OF MATERIALS SUPPLIED TO MILITARY DISTRICTS —GARBAGE CANS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. G. POWER (Associate Minister of National Defence): If I may be permitted to give the result of my inquiries into the seamiest recesses of the slimy question of garbage cans—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I didn't say "slimy," I said, "prosaic."

Mr. POWER: It appears that there was a great deal of misunderstanding in the departments, and perhaps my hon. friend and the departments were at cross purposes. I may take some little time to give the full explanation of this, and I will ask the house to bear with me while I do so.

The first question answered in the return brought down on Wednesday last was:

How many garbage cans have been ordered for use in military camps?

My hon. friend, I think very properly, when the reply came that such articles had been ordered in the month of January, said they could not have been ordered in the month of January because military camps were not thought of at that time. The reply should have read, a total of 26,000 for all army purposes—for army purposes generally and not military camps in the sense of training camps. The reply did not so read and my hon. friend had a right to object. The total was 26,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am really interested only in the question of unit prices.

Mr. POWER: I am coming to that, but I wish to have the whole thing cleared up. Ten thousand have not as yet been delivered. The next question was:

From whom were they ordered, and at what price?

As is the custom when the operations of two departments are involved, the answer which it was proposed to submit on behalf of the Department of National Defence (army) was sent to the Department of Munitions and Supply, through whom these goods were purchased. I may say in passing that at the time the purchase was made it was the Defence Purchasing Board of Canada. That was in September 1939. That reply, after being vented, so to speak, by the Department of Munitions and Supply, was returned to the Department of National Defence with this comment:

The answer meets with our approval, except that the answer for section 2 of the question should not give unit prices, and we would prefer that you kindly have these deleted from your answer, with the notation, "It is not in the public interest to give unit prices on any commodity." This follows the policy which we have adhered to on all questions of this kind. When we give the quantity, we do not give the unit price. When we do not give the quantity, we will give the total amount of the contract.

This is signed by J. A. Marsh, purchase investigator of the Department of Munitions and Supply, but I hasten to add that though in this, as in many other things, Mr. Marsh was not in entire agreement with me on questions of policy, he was acting under instructions received, so that I am not ascribing any responsibility to him. However, I have now the reply:

Through the Department of Munitions and Supply.

Large:—

Canadian John Wood (Vancouver) Ltd.—600 at $3.95 each.
Great West Metal Products Ltd.—1,500 at $3.65 each.
General Steel Wares Ltd.—6,900 at $3.82 each.
General Steel Wares Ltd.—2,000 at $3.95 each.
Collins Never Fail Products—2,000 at $2.60 each.

Small:—

Canadian John Wood (Vancouver) Ltd.—300 at $2.74 each.
Great West Metal Products Ltd.—650 at $2.50 each.
General Steel Wares Ltd.—5,050 at $2.05 each.
General Steel Wares Ltd.—7,000 at $2.10 each.

The next question was:

How many were sent to each military district?

The reply to that question has, I believe, already been tabled. The next question was:

When were they shipped to each military district, and when did they arrive?

The answer is:

Various shipping dates from 1st January, 1940, to date.

It really should be February 1, onwards. It will be impossible for us, without very much work, to get the shipping date, when each separate order was shipped to each district.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would not ask it.

Mr. POWER: The next question is:

Were they put into immediate use or were they stored?

That is where the great question of interpretation arises. In the minds of the people in the office of the Master General of Ordnance, when the order has been given and delivery made and the goods shipped to each district depot, it is considered that the goods are in immediate use. They do not check up with each unit that may require a garbage pail, as to whether each unit has one garbage pail or two or a dozen. I am advised that we could, if it were necessary, find out exactly how many were actually in the local depot stores. The district in which my hon. friend is interested is No. 7. So far as headquarters are concerned, however, they say that the goods are put to immediate use when they have been delivered to the depot stores of military district No. 7. I have a long report on that but I do not think I need read it.

The next question is:

If they were stored, where were they stored?

Some immediately in use were handed over to the units—it might be the army service corps or the infantry.

Those not immediately in use were stored in district ordnance depot. If details are required these can be furnished.

That answers all the questions asked, I believe.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The only point of the interrogatory I put was on this principle: Were we to get unit prices? The minister has given certain information. Am I to understand that is to be the practice in future? If so, it is quite satisfactory to us; but if the government takes the attitude, which the Department of National Defence apparently took in the first instance, that parliament and the public are not to have unit prices on any commodity even so prosaic as garbage cans, then we take sharp issue, because we think the public ought to know. That is the whole point of the inquiry.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Since the Department of Munitions and Supply and its policy have been mentioned, I may say that the only purpose of the department is so to conduct its business that tenderers quoting can have reasonable protection in respect of information which might be supplied to their competitors. In a private transaction where tenders are called for, where a large departmental store such as Eatons is buying, any firm can quote on the understanding that its competitive position is protected; that is to say, if it quotes a special price for special reasons, that is a matter between that firm and the buyer. We should like to prevent blanket questions being asked in the house—questions such as, for example, "What are you paying for cloth?" The answers to such questions might be of advantage to firms in the same line of business who might wish to obtain that business and to secure the competitive position of the fortunate contractor.

I have made it quite clear at all times to our staff, however, and I think they understand it, that if anyone wishes to know about a particular transaction, so far as we are concerned we are quite prepared to bring down full information. If hon. members would like to know the price on a certain contract for shoes made at a certain plant—what the unit price was—we would be prepared to answer the question; but to ask what we are paying for all shoes bought is to put a question which we would naturally object to. In other words, if it is a specific question about a specific transaction we desire to give the fullest possible information; if it is a blanket question having for its possible purpose the benefiting of unsuccessful tenderers, putting them in a position to know how to tender the next time, we object. Our only purpose is to conduct the business of the department as efficiently as a large private firm would be able to carry on the same sort of business.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have no desire to debate the matter, but I wish to leave this query with the minister and ask him to think it over. In view of his statement, I am wondering whether, in the expenditure of public moneys, it is desirable that information of the widest kind should not be given to the public. I am afraid his statement will be subject to misinterpretation.

With regard to this particular instance, I knew nothing about this matter until the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Hatfield) called my attention to it. He was not looking for information to aid any competitor; he had no such idea in his mind.

I should like the government to give some further consideration to this question whether in the expenditure of public money there should not be the widest publicity as to prices. I am going to leave it right there. We will all think it over. There may be very sound reasons why the policy enunciated by the minister should be carried out, but at the moment my mind runs the other way.

SHIPPING

QUESTION OF CANADA'S PROVIDING SHIPS TO ENABLE FREE MOVEMENT OF TRADE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Cardin) a question in connection with the shipping board. It arises out of an address broadcast over the radio last night from London by Right Hon. Ronald Cross, Minister of Shipping, in which he said that the rate at which England is now building ships does not make up for losses due to the submarine menace and air raids on shipping.

Would the minister make a further statement in a day or two if he is speaking in the present debate, either as Minister of Public Works or as Minister of Transport in charge of shipping about Canada's stand?—because there is a very grave disaster threatening. Mr. Cross made an appeal to the United States of America and to the dominions to come to the help of the mother country in providing ships so that Britain will not be starved out and that trade may move freely.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Public Works and Minister of Transport): The question raised by my hon. friend involves a question of policy on the part of the government. I would ask him to let the question stand as a notice.

PICTORIAL POSTERS

INQUIRY AS TO USE IN PUBLIC PLACES IN CONNECTION WITH WAR EFFORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I noticed in the cafeteria a number of British posters. It is charged that Canadians are not taking matters relating to this war seriously. In the last war these pictorial posters were used widely and to good effect in public buildings, railway stations, hotels and schools. They have proven very effective in England and I would ask if something could not be done about using the same methods in Canada.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of National War Services): The matter referred to is at present not only under consideration but certain actions have been taken in regard to it by the bureau of information.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

INQUIRY AS TO DECLARATION OF CROP FAILURE AREA IN SASKATCHEWAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I wish to ask the following questions of the Minister of Agriculture:

1. Has the Saskatchewan government applied to have a crop failure area declared in that province under section 4 of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act?

2. Have investigations been made by the federal Department of Agriculture showing such claim to be justified?

3. If so, is it the intention of the government to declare this area a crop failure area within the meaning of the act?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The answer to the first question is yes.

As to question No. 2, the investigations by the board are not yet completed.

The answer to question No. 3 is in accordance with that to No. 2.

ORDER IN COUNCIL DECLARING 1940 AN EMERGENCY YEAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture. Has an order in council been passed yet declaring 1940 an emergency year, and if so will it be tabled before the house adjourns?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, the order in council has been passed. I will see that it is tabled.

CEREALS IMPORT COMMITTEE

QUESTION AS TO PRESENT REPRESENTATIVE IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce who is acting in Canada for the British cereals import committee at the present time?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Answering offhand I would say that the British cereals import committee, acting in connection with wheat purchases, is in touch with the wheat board.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not the point. Who is representing them?

Mr. MacKINNON: There is nobody that I know except the wheat board.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Tuesday, November 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Brooke Claxton for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Blackmore.

Mr. W. K. ESLING (Kootenay West): This unusually long debate prompts a reference to the comment of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) regarding the rules of the house, with particular bearing on the time limitation on speeches of private members. If it is proposed to have a committee appointed to discuss changes in the rules it is to be hoped that the time limit will not be abolished, because in the years since the rules were last amended, in 1927, there have been but few occasions when a private member could not touch the highlights in the debate on the address or in the debate on the budget within the limit of forty minutes. If we were all gifted with the ability to speak as rapidly as, for example, the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), when he is in high gear, we could get through our speeches in much less time.

As to the reading of speeches, I know it is unpleasant for you, Mr. Speaker, to have to call the attention of a private member to the fact that he is transgressing the rules, but perhaps if the rules are to be amended it might be made optional whether a private member reads or speaks from notes. It is not always easy for an inexperienced member to speak offhand. He is able to make a more impressive speech, and perhaps a more aggressive speech, if he reads it. Then too a private member is somewhat at a disadvantage in comparison with a minister, because a minister has his publicity staff to prepare his notes, put them in sequence and so on, and he has his private secretary. A private secretary is of real value if he can write a speech for a minister to fit any occasion and also be responsible for his minister's political if not his spiritual welfare.

This session was called for the purpose of permitting the ministers to give to parliament and to the country at large a review of the war activities of each department of the government. It must be admitted that there has been given very little that had not already been broadcast or published through the bureau of information or through the various other publicity agencies. I should like hon. members to ask themselves, have the ministers given to this house any new information in connection with the war beyond the fact that commissioned officers must come up from the ranks and that there is a possibility of extending the term of training under the National Resources Mobilization Act from one month to four months?

There have been criticisms and there have been comments and suggestions and complaints from private members, and perhaps the government may be disposed to take action, particularly in connection with suggestions which are not given in a critical spirit. Take for example the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Gardiner); in connection with the calling of men to the training camps he might be disposed to let it be known that Canadians who are attending universities in the United States, sometimes by reason of the fact that they desire special courses at a university or are taking advantage of scholarships, may be permitted to take their training course after their studies are completed. Word went out to all of them, and the parents were caused considerable trouble because those students were told to report for medical examination. It interferes with their studies, and more than that they are under a heavy expense if they have to come home. Further, the local banks vouched for these boys, and they had to secure from the foreign exchange board permits to cover their tuition. When we refer to a matter, part of which is connected with statutory legislation and the other part with regulations, we realize of course that the statutory legislation must be complied with.

But may I cite the case of a young man who gave up a service station and enlisted in the 111th battery. That battery was transferred to Edmonton. No sooner had it reached there than he was sent to hospital, where he remained for one month. After hospitalization he was discharged from the army and was given a warrant for his transportation to the place of recruiting, namely, Nelson, British Columbia, a distance of 600 miles. The whole journey would require about 30 hours. Despite the month he spent in hospital at Edmonton, no sooner did he reach his destination at the point of recruiting than he was again taken to hospital for another month. After discharge from that hospital he went to his home and was again taken to hospital for a period of four months.

The point I make is that this man, whose condition was such that he had to be hospitalized for six months, was given a warrant for his fare, but no provision was made for a berth or meals. That man had to sit up for almost thirty hours. If one travels on the trains to-day he will meet many commissioned officers. Possibly they pay part of their expenses out of their own pockets, but we do know that they have comfortable accommodation. We know they take their meals regularly. While a commissioned officer may be of greater importance from the standpoint of the military code, the fact remains that a buck private is just as human and should at least have some consideration.

That boy has asked reimbursement for his hospitalization, and he is told that there is no provision for such reimbursement. I refer to this case particularly because I know similar instances will undoubtedly develop. I suggest that when a man is in such poor physical condition it is not unreasonable to provide him with at least a berth and meals. Let me ask any member of the government or any hon. member if he would permit or expect his son to make such a trip without such provision.

May I now speak briefly about taxes. At the last session the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) brought down the heaviest taxation budget in the history of Canada. The people accepted it with good grace, and they are expecting even heavier taxes in the next budget. They will accept them with good grace—they will always accept taxation with good grace, so long as there is no evidence of profiteering, patronage or a lack of business ability in the operation of the various departments. I suggest however that the minister ought to give serious consideration to taxation by the provinces. Relations between this government and the legislatures in the provinces are such that, regardless of the report of the commission on dominion-provincial relations, it should be in a position to persuade the provinces to curtail their expenditures. To-day in British Columbia, on the eve of an election, they are bringing down the heaviest budget in the history of the province, in the face of the greatest revenue the province has received. Is that any evidence of cooperation with this government? Not the least.

Many times in the house we hear the statement that the government should conscript wealth. Of course it should. The budget shows that the Minister of Finance has not overlooked that fact. I took the trouble to obtain figures from the financial authorities of the three western provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. When we consider the taxes in the higher brackets of the federal and provincial governments, what do we find? We find that in British Columbia the combined provincial and federal taxes of a man with a taxable income of half a million dollars—and there must be such men, because the government makes explicit provision for them—left that man only $4,000. In Alberta the combined taxes amount to $3,000 more than his half million income, the result being that he owes somebody $3,000. Coming to Saskatchewan we find a little more leniency; the man in question would be left $14,000. But it must be remembered that he has still to pay his defence tax. Then, in addition, such people must have their city residences, and must pay municipal taxes. They must pay for the upkeep of their homes, and we look to such people for generous contributions to patriotic and war service funds, and for the purchase of war bonds.

There is only one thing to be done: The minister must use his persuasive powers on the provinces to cut down their expenditures during the war. What may happen? It could easily happen that a man in this high bracket —and those in lower brackets are bearing the heavy burden proportionately—would say, "Well, if I have to pay out my income in taxation I might as well sell my securities, and I would not then have to pay any tax." Such a thing could happen, and when it does the government will have to take emphatic steps in some direction.

I should like to return to the observations of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) respecting the western provinces of Alberta and British Columbia, which are to be placed under the Pacific command. It is a matter of regret that the headquarters are not to be established on the mainland instead of on the island. The location indicated involves additional expense, and the delay which will be caused by the necessity of travelling ninety miles by water each way. The distance to travel would be greater than that required were the headquarters in Vancouver, for instance. The people in southeastern British Columbia feel that perhaps their distance from headquarters has been responsible for the districts of Kootenay West and Kootenay East being overlooked. Evidently this prompted the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. MacKinnon) to make emphatic representations to the minister and to the departmental officials in connection with the apparent lack of interest in that portion of the province.

These two districts cover considerable territory, because they stretch to the Alberta boundary. We feel that had headquarters been located in Calgary rather than on the island, the attention to the needs of the section would perhaps have been more generous. As the hon. member for Kootenay East showed to the minister and his officials, during the last war these districts gave to the dominion the 54th battalion and the 225th battalion, while in this war four batteries have been raised and all removed to points quite distant for training. This district has also given a number of husky stalwart loggers for the forestry battalion but we have not a single unit in the district. The people have given of the best of their manhood and they feel that the district is neglected.

There are a number of voluntary defence corps throughout the district which have been sponsored by branches of the legion. These units are made up of from 200 to 250 men and are located in Trail, Nelson and Rossland. The men turn out two hours a night for three and four nights a week and are under the direction of officers who served in the last war. They are forced to use wooden guns which are baited with a bit of lead, but they go through with their drills nevertheless. They are the finest specimens of young manhood that could be found anywhere. Many of them are keen to get into a permanent unit, but when they write down here they are simply told that there is no provision for such a unit because no equipment is available. They do not ask for equipment; they are perfectly willing to continue just as they are. But they do want a little recognition from this government. They do not ask for uniforms, they do not ask for rifles, but they are not satisfied when there is no one to whom they can report. They are getting no credit for their efforts and they see no future in what they do. I am going to appeal to the minister from British Columbia (Mr. Mackenzie), the gentleman who represents that province in the cabinet. He is supposed to place his stamp of approval or disapproval upon anything relating to the province, so I make a personal appeal to him to use his good offices with the different departments to see if something cannot be done toward establishing a permanent infantry unit in Kootenay East and Kootenay West.

I come now to the Minister of Finance. He is the motive power behind this war effort. Without his energy, without his ingenuity in raising funds, the rest of the departments would not be able to function. Just in passing I would refer to the importunities which he and the rest of the government have made over the radio to the children of this dominion to save their pennies for the purchase of war stamps and war certificates. Our country must have been deeply impressed last evening when it was announced over the radio that the government—I suppose we might say that this is a contribution to the war effort—was going to do away with the printing of Christmas cards for the ministers. Is not that a magnificent gesture? I find that there are six ministers who have been in the habit of having their Christmas cards printed at the printing bureau at the expense of the country.

Mr. REID: They are not all Scottish either.

Mr. ESLING: We have heard pleas for economy, we have heard requests that everyone should get behind our national war effort, but I intend to run the danger of being considered a nuisance by attempting to show the minister and the government how they are permitting legalized pillaging of the people of the Dominion of Canada, and how the government itself is contributing money as well as legal sanction toward this end. I intend to appeal first to the Secretary of State (Mr. Casgrain), then to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and then to the Minister of Finance, because each of them has had a word to say in this matter. I am going to refer once more to the Canadian Performing Right Society. Hon. members may laugh if they want to, but I intend to give the ministers certain facts which are of interest to the taxpayers of Canada.

What is the Canadian Performing Right Society? It is a subsidiary of the picture producers and another similar society in the United States. Previously it was connected with various associations on the continent of Europe, but most of those have passed into history. This society has nothing to do with literary copyright; it deals only with musical copyright. The author or composer of a piece of music should receive every dollar to which he is entitled, but this society should be treated the same as any individual. An individual who composes a piece of music must pay $3 for a copyright. In this case the society is on a par with the individual, because it must pay the same fee. However, when an individual registers an assignment of a copyright, he pays $1 whereas this society pays nothing.

When the society started in business in Canada it was necessary to have certain assets, and the parent society in the United States assigned to the Canadian society 2,500,000 pieces of music. No one in this government or in any other government knew whether the United States society was the owner of that music. I am not saying that the blame should be placed on this side or the other side; I simply say that there is inequality of treatment in connection with this tremendous number of assignments. The government was given to understand that this action was necessary in order to protect the Canadian composers of music, and an arrangement was made whereby the society was permitted simply to fill out a card stating that this or that was their piece of music and file it with the commissioner of copyrights. There is no indication whatsoever of ownership, and I say that the Canadian Performing Right Society should be made to show, before it is permitted to collect one dollar of licence fees, that it owns the music for which it collects its royalty. There is nothing unreasonable about that.

Then take the matter of our contributions. The broadcasting stations pay to this society about $100,000 per year. Those contributions are made in the aggregate by all broadcasting stations. We have to thank the late Secretary of State for the appointment of an appeal board. Were it not for that board, which keeps these people within limits, dear knows what the public would be paying to-day. Last year they attempted to collect from the broadcasting stations $188,000, but the appeal board limited them to $98,000. This year they are trying to collect $210,000, and we have to wait for the appeal board to review the matter.

Also, these tariffs of fees are printed at government expense in the Canada Gazette. If you want to read something thrilling, read that tariff published by the Canadian Performing Right Society. Why should the taxpayers pay for the publication of their tariffs of fees which are intended to be charged and are allowed by the appeal board, any more than the government should print free of charge in the Canada Gazette telephone or telegraph or any other tolls?

Mr. REID: It is just a racket.

Mr. ESLING: It is a legalized racket. The time has come when the government should take a hand in the matter. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation do not seem to worry about it. They have paid to this society $136,000 in the last five years. I suppose that this coming year they will pay them in the neighbourhood of $41,000. But we come back with the statement, "Well, we are obligated; we are signatories of the Berne convention." Does anyone in this house suppose that European countries, all of which are signatories to the Berne convention, are going to send any money to authors or composers in England or in Canada? As a matter of fact there are no Canadian members of this society.

I know that this is a dry subject, but I wish the government would appoint two or three men to go into it and show how the people of Canada are being imposed upon, how the public exchequer is being drawn upon, and how the people are victimized in the collection of these fees under threat of legal proceedings. It is time something was done. I say, pay them every cent which belongs to them, in respect to music to which they can prove ownership, and beyond that let us call a halt. Let us withdraw from the Berne convention, at least until the world gets on an even keel: we can then start anew and find out if there is any merit in the Canadian Performing Right Society; if so, the government will countenance the authority which it enjoys, under a dominion charter, to collect these fees.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is it not a fact that many of the writers of poems and songs for which fees are collected have been dead for generations?

Mr. ESLING: That is the very reason, Mr. Speaker, I say that this society should be required to stand on the same footing as an individual. What has it done? Go back for ten years. Does this indicate any sign of a legitimate operation, that in ten years it has actually paid for the registration of eight copyrights with the commission, and it has paid one dollar each for the registration of twenty-eight assignments? Those are its only evidences of ownership. As I say, it merely files a card, but no evidence of ownership, and it puts on the bottom, "Canadian Performing Right Society." I contend that they should pay for every piece of music for which they propose to collect from now on and for which they have collected in the past.

The Prime Minister, in referring to the rules of the house, also commented on the opposition. He suggested that conditions might arise whereby there would be more groups on this side of the house than there are at present, and that the leader of each of these groups would claim precedence in the conduct of the proceedings. It is inequality in the administration of justice and general discontent which are responsible for groups on the opposition side.

I have just referred to one matter of inequality, and I am now coming to another, the matter of the Doukhobors. You cannot carry on a democratic government with one law for one section of the people and another law for others. You must have uniformity. First of all let me say that the Doukhobors who live in Saskatchewan are quite different from those who live in British Columbia. Those in Saskatchewan are largely concerned with the cultivation of the soil. They take their part in public life. They belong to municipal councils, and they aspire to various public offices. The Doukhobors in British Columbia are a people totally apart from Canadians. They take no part in anything, they do not obey the laws, they have been a source of more trouble to this dominion than any other nationality within its borders. They have committed incendiarism, they have bombed buildings and made all sorts of trouble, and the truth is that neither this government nor the provincial government is capable of coping with them. This government is afraid. The provincial government is afraid. Why? They are afraid of the consequences; they fear an uprising.

At the time of the national registration, through the ingenuity and initiative of the registrar, the majority of these Doukhobors were registered. But they were given to understand that they would not have to participate in warfare.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question. Does he think that we as Canadians have made a real study to try to understand these people?

Mr. ESLING: That is a reasonable question. But does the hon. gentleman not think that forty-two years is a sufficient time in which to make that study?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Yes. Has it been made; that is the question?

Mr. REID: No one can understand them.

Mr. ESLING: I presented to the government and to its officials a petition from the Canadian residents in the Slocan district of West Kootenay where these Doukhobors are largely located. A group of them have not registered. Of about 5,000 living there, more than 4,000 have registered. But British-born Canadians are protesting against the fact that they must send their boys overseas, perhaps never to return; they must send their boys to training camps, while these husky Doukhobor boys simply remain in the fields carrying on as usual, or getting into jobs which are vacated by those who have gone overseas. Our people ask, is there any justice? Is there to be one law for one person and another law for another? I ask the government to take action in this matter.

What happens in British Columbia? Doukhobors have lost their lands by a court order giving title on foreclosure of mortgages to two companies. The provincial government was afraid to take any steps, fearing that there might be more fires and bombing. I do not blame them particularly, because I understand the circumstances. However, the provincial government had to do something, and what did it do? It passed a law at the last session of the legislature providing half a million dollars to reimburse the two mortgagees, and then they proposed to deal with the Doukhobors individually. Does anybody come to the assistance of a Canadian farmer when his mortgage comes due and he is in danger of being evicted from his land if he does not make payment? Not much. But these Doukhobors, who do not conform to the law at all, are a law unto themselves. They are above and beyond all Canadian law.

Let me pass now to the Minister of Finance under whose jurisdiction the Canadian Farm Loan Board comes, and I turn to him having in mind the consideration that is shown to the Doukhobors. What consideration is being shown by the Canadian Farm Loan Board to a soldier to whom I shall now refer? There is in my district a soldier who served five years in the last war. He has a wife and five children. On December 1, 1939, he was indebted to the Canadian Farm Loan Board in the sum of $44.21. He received a notice from the board telling him that if he did not pay this $44.21 on December 1—a few days from now—the board will commence foreclosure proceedings. Is there any equality before the law when we look after Doukhobors who are not in harmony at all with our system of living, and when a soldier settler with a wife and five children—a soldier, mind you, who has kept up his payments regularly for the past ten years and has paid his taxes and his insurance, and everything that he owes—is threatened by the Canadian Farm Loan Board under this government that if he does not pay $44.21 by Monday next the board will commence foreclosure proceedings? I leave that to the Minister of Finance, and I ask him to assure this house and this returned soldier that he will see that the farm loan board does not take this summary action that is threatened.

Mr. BRUCE McNEVIN (Victoria, Ont.): May I digress first to congratulate the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling), who has just preceded me, upon his remarkable vitality and alertness of mind.

My next thought is to extend my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Claxton) and to the seconder (Mr. Jutras) of the address. The mover succeeded in this House of Commons as representative of the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George a gentleman who had had a long and honourable career in public life. It is true that I did not at all times agree with the policies which he supported; he represented a different party, but I do not think I could pay a finer compliment to the mover of the address than to say that he offers every promise of equalling if not surpassing the distinguished career of his predecessor.

I also wish to congratulate heartily the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras) upon his notable contribution to the debate. His remarks I believe will be an inspiration to the people of his native province and indeed to those far beyond its confines.

Before entering into a general discussion of the questions in which I am particularly interested I should like first to make my position abundantly clear on two questions which have arisen in this debate.

First I am prepared to support any suggestion, no matter from what section or group in this House of Commons it may come, which in my opinion will assist our war effort.

Secondly, while we have many important domestic problems facing the people of Canada, they must at all times be considered secondary in importance to the prosecution of the war.

It is my intention to support the main motion now before the house, thereby endorsing the government's policy of a total war effort limited only by the productive capacity of our farms and our factories, and expending in the cause of victory all our natural resources, and utilizing the strength and valour and forbearance of our people of all classes in support of our armed forces.

There is one event which has occurred within recent months which to my mind is outstanding. I have in mind the appointment of a joint committee on defence upon which both Canada and the United States have representation. In the period covering a number of years leading up to this accomplishment, it is true that very many Canadians prominent in the public life of the country made substantial contributions in connection with this matter, but I am sure that the contribution of the present Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) remains paramount above all others. To my mind it marks him as the greatest Canadian not only in his time and generation but since confederation. Across the line, it is true, many prominent citizens also made a worthwhile contribution to bring to full fruition this commendable accord, but I am sure we are all agreed that none of these contributions compares with that of the present incumbent of the White House, President Franklin D. Roosevelt. To put it modestly, I believe it marks him as the greatest American since the days of Abraham Lincoln.

I would like now to review briefly our preparedness for war. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) the other day gave to the house figures indicating that as of the last of October there were in the Canadian army a little over 300,000 soldiers. I am not surprised to hear that a number of these soldiers are impatient because of apparent inactivity in what might be described as actual warfare; but we must bide our time, strengthen these various units, intensify the training and keep up to date with every possible type of equipment in order to be fully prepared for whatever eventuality may arise in the dominion or in any other sphere of the conflict.

I believe that the numbers and the condition of these troops give the Canadian people a feeling of security and indeed of pride when we remember that approximately 50,000 of the men are across the water in a number of fields of activity, standing beside the British soldiers and other empire soldiers and other troops, including the valiant Greeks. I am quite sure that the extent of these forces has not passed the notice of the dictators who are oppressing innocent and helpless peoples.

In connection with our air force we have a personnel of 36,071. When we consider the surface development of aerodromes, the various types of construction, the almost unlimited amount of equipment necessary to train, equip and service this force, as well as the other obligations in connection with the empire training plan, it is indeed a phenomenal development.

I might refer also to our naval strength—1,620 officers and 11,653 men, manning 155 ships. These officers and men have already clothed themselves with glory, as our British sailors have done for hundreds of years, maintaining for the motherland, and still holding to-day, the mastery of the seas.

The point I wish to bring out in connection with a summing up of the strength of the Canadian forces is that we have a total of 349,344 men under arms. In the last war, after four years and a few months, at the conclusion of hostilities we had sent into actual combat 346,531 or approximately 3,000 soldiers less, taking all classes of the forces, than we have now combined in these three branches of our defence forces.

When we consider this question from the standpoint of equipment, I do not think I could give a better example than a personal reference, if the house will pardon me. Early in the month of October, 1938, I entered the place of business of a gunsmith in one of the large cities of Canada. I asked him to show me some rifles, and he handed me a 30-30 Winchester, manufactured in the United States. After looking it over and discussing it with him I said, "Have you a Canadian rifle?" He said, "Oh no, we have never made any rifles in Canada except Ross rifles and they were not satisfactory". I asked him. "What about a ·32?" He said, "No." I asked him what about a ·22, and he replied, "I would not be sure; we may manufacture a complete ·22 in Canada but some of the parts may come from the United States or elsewhere". Suppose however we grant that a ·22 rifle was completely manufactured in Canada. Remember that this was in October, 1938. Now, when you consider the machine guns, naval guns, anti-aircraft guns and war equipment that are now being produced in Canada, or are in process of production, can it be definitely proved that the war record of this government has been desultory or ineffective? I say not.

I want to pass to one of our most important domestic problems. I refer to the increasing inequality between farm income and farm expenses. According to a table issued by the bureau of statistics the index of the cost of living on the farm in Ontario from spring until fall of 1940 increased from 87·2 to 89·2. In that same period the index of wholesale prices of farm products fell from 72·1 to 62·7. Of course there is a seasonal decrease which has some influence on those figures, and a certain amount of that decrease will be recovered. Nevertheless it shows the trend, and it illustrates the difficult position of the agricultural industry. I am fully aware that due to war conditions the markets for certain lines of farm products have been substantially curtailed. It is also true that there has been a tremendous expansion of demand for war equipment and manufactured goods related to the war effort which has given a great impetus to the manufacturing industry, and these are factors contributing to this situation.

The agricultural industry might be subdivided into two or more classes. We have for example the sugar beet producers, the tobacco producers, the honey producers and the fruit and vegetable producers; these might be called specialized types of production. Due to climatic or other considerations the production of these commodities is more or less restricted. Then we have the general lines of production, such as wheat, cattle, dairy products and pork products. It is my intention to confine my present remarks to the latter group.

In former discussions in this house I have made my position upon the wheat question abundantly clear, and I have no reason to change my attitude on that important question. I have a great deal of sympathy for the operator of a small or moderate-sized farm in western Canada, whether he is engaged in mixed farming or grain farming or a combination of both. I believe his problems are very much the same as those of the farmer in eastern Canada. What I have strongly objected to is the payment of wheat bonuses without limitation. I still adhere to that objection. It is not my intention for the moment to press the point further except to refer to the suggestion made in the course of this debate by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross), who suggested the payment of a straight $5 an acre bonus for all summer fallow in western Canada. Would that mean that there would be no difference in the payment in a year when they had a bumper crop in western Canada and a year when they had a crop failure? Would it mean that a man with a thousand acres of fallow would receive ten times as much as a man with a hundred acres of fallow? I cannot see it in any other light. It embodies the principle that to him who has much, much is given; to him who has little, little is given, and to him who has nothing at all, nothing is given. I cannot subscribe to such a policy.

Referring to the cattle industry, it is in a comparatively fortunate position. For this I believe that the present administration is entitled to a good deal of credit, because the Canada-United States trade agreement has been of great benefit to the cattle producers of Canada. I am speaking of beef cattle production.

I do not believe there is any line of agricultural production that is so exacting in its demand on the operator as dairy farming. For the purpose of my argument I am going to divide dairy farming into four classifications: first, producers of whole milk for urban consumption; second, producers of whole milk for the manufacture of concentrated milk and milk powder; third, production of cheese, and fourth, production of butter.

So far as the producers of whole milk for city trade are concerned, in many sections they are in a slightly better position than the general run of milk producers. The milk powder and concentrated milk industry of course pays a smaller price but takes the entire supply, and that type of production also enjoys some advantages.

Coming then to cheese, as it has been said that steel is the barometer in the metal trades, so I think cheese may be called the barometer in the dairying industry in Canada; because over long periods of time the price of cheese has a direct bearing on the general price level of all dairy products.

One question that is much in the public eye just now is the price of butter. From January 1, 1939, to October 1 of the same year, Canada produced 240,070,881 pounds of butter.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Could the hon. member state how much vegetable oil was imported in the same year?

[Mr. McNevin.]

Mr. McNEVIN: I believe those figures are already on the record; therefore it will not be necessary to repeat them.

Taking the next period in 1940 we find there was produced in the same months 237,012,992 pounds, which is a decrease of 3,057,889 pounds. Going back over the distribution in that same period in 1940, namely from January 1 to September 30, we find there was an increase in the distribution of butter over the same period in 1939 of more than 9,531,000 pounds. So that we have there a difference of over 12,000,000 pounds, and that factor has been responsible for the increase in the price of this commodity.

I would be the first to seek to curtail any movement whereby we might permit the speculator to make substantial or large profits out of any food product. However, in connection with this matter I believe we must be most careful to see that any action taken does not tend to deprive the butter producer of Canada of a reasonable or substantial price, in the light of all the circumstances affecting the situation. Because, Mr. Speaker, for the last ten years the butter producers of Canada have received a grossly inadequate price for this commodity. Therefore I would caution against undue interference along the lines suggested.

If we take one hundred pounds of milk it will produce approximately twice as many pounds of cheese as pounds of butter. So that if we take the price of cheese at seaboard, or at Montreal, as being 14·4, we find that that gives approximately 28·8 for butter fat, or for butter. However, it must be remembered that that is the summer price, when production costs are lower. It costs much more to produce butter fat in the winter time, and I do not think that 35 cents, or perhaps the odd cent more, could be considered a high or exorbitant price for butter. What I do say is that in the spring, summer and fall months it would not be in the best interests of all concerned greatly to increase the production of butter or to decrease the production of cheese, because we have an unlimited export market for cheese, and a non-existent export market for butter.

There is another point which has some bearing on this matter. The by-product in the production of butter fat, namely skim milk, is worth more than the by-product from the production of cheese, namely, whey. This brings me to a further question, namely, that of hog prices, and the bacon agreement between the Canadian government and the food board in Great Britain. I am prepared to say that I believe this lower price offers but a small opportunity for any profit for the hog producer. However, if that is the top price the British food board is prepared to pay—and we have great sympathy for Great Britain and her financial position—then to my mind the matter is settled so far as that part of it is concerned.

I have before me a table which sets out the prices prevailing under the former agreement and those set out under the new agreement. I shall deal with only one part of these figures, and will ask the indulgence of the house to have the complete table placed on the record.

It must be understood that the British food purchasing board paid a flat price at the port for these pork products, and that these schedules of prices according to grades were worked out by the bacon board, upon which producers, packers and the government had representation. However, turning to the class of grade A-1, covering Wiltshire sides of 55 pounds to 65 pounds, we find that under the old agreement the price was $17.70. It must be remembered, however, that in the price there had to be provision for storage charges. That was the price which prevailed from January 1 until May, at which time it was reduced to $17.20, and then again on July 22 it was increased back to $17.70. I shall not detain the house by reading further figures but will turn now to the new prices. In addition, in connection with payments on the former basis, it must be remembered that 72 cents per hundred pounds was deducted and placed in a fund. I shall deal with that later in my observations.

Taking the same classification of 55 to 65 pounds, under the new agreement we find that the price for the A-1 grade is $16.10, or approximately $1.60 less.

The tables in detail, showing the comparative prices to which I referred, are as follows:

I should like now to deal briefly with deliveries of hogs for the past two months. The following figures will show total deliveries in Canada of graded hogs:

Date Week of—	Number of hogs
October 10	113,450
October 17	119,567
October 24	135,912
October 31	157,260
November 7	151,668
November 14	155,592
November 21	152,443

I place those figures on the record to show the substantial increase in deliveries over that period of time.

During the passing of estimates of the Department of Agriculture in the last session, and again in this debate, there has been discussion regarding the disbursement of the fund set up by this deduction of 72 cents. During those weeks of heavy deliveries, approximately a million dollars of that fund was paid out to maintain higher prices than would otherwise have prevailed. It is usually admitted that farmers market hogs at least twice yearly. If a farmer delivered hogs in the early part of the season, the deduction would apply. If hogs were delivered in the period referred to, he would benefit from the fund.

I will not attempt to forecast what the general situation will be during the coming year, but it might be of interest to hon. members to know that from January 1, 1940, when the bacon board commenced operations, to the end of the first bacon contract, the average price at Toronto for live hogs was $8.76. During the same period the average price for hogs purchased by thirteen packers in Ontario was $11.69 dressed weight, or $8.76 live weight. During the week of November 23 the price of hogs at Toronto was $10.75 dressed weight and $8.10 live weight. This is the first week of operations under the new agreement. Certain other factors enter into this price. There is no deduction for administrative charges and the bacon board is absorbing the cost of storage, and so forth. These things would have to be balanced against the reduction in price. While I would not want to make any prediction as to what will happen, it looks as though the price of hogs during next year will average somewhere in the vicinity of eight cents. This prediction may be too high; I am not prepared to say.

There are a couple of additional items which I desire to discuss. During the course of this debate concern has been expressed as to the possibility of our democratic institutions falling into decay on account of the application of the defence of Canada regulations. There is no member in this chamber more anxious than I to protect and preserve—even widen the scope if possible—of our democratic institutions and hand them down intact to future generations. If there seems to be difficulty in a person interned under these regulations securing a fair trial within a reasonable length of time, then provision should be made to give such person that trial.

I should like to make this further suggestion. If we look back into British history to the time of Cromwell, we shall find that some of the then limited freedom in the British empire was curtailed, but still that period saw a growth and enlargement of the very system under which we now live. As far as I am concerned, if free speech means the right to criticize the war effort and the government, to offer constructive suggestions and so forth, I am all for it; but if that privilege is going to be used to undermine the morale of our people and to interfere with the successful prosecution of the war, then I say that to that extent we shall have to see that it is curtailed. If freedom of the press means criticism of the government and its war effort, violent if you like, and the urging of improvements in connection with our forces or other parts of our war effort, then I am all for it; but if it means the printing of insidious propaganda to interfere with that effort and to break down the morale of our people, then the best thing to do is to suggest to these people that they had better get into the Red Cross and do something to help it along. If they cannot be persuaded to do that, then they will have to be dealt with by some other means.

In conclusion, I should like to return for a moment to the conflict in which we are engaged and make one observation. The dictators are fighting a war of conquest and aggression while our forces are fighting a battle to preserve their national existence, which means their homes and their firesides, their wives and their families. We are putting everything we have into the conflict. Our ultimate goal is victory. The road may be long and rough and the end at times obscure, but we approach it with the attitude of mind that victory can and will be won.

Mr. L. E. CARDIFF (Huron North): Mr. Speaker, I do not think anyone doubts the sincerity of the remarks which have been made by most hon. members on both sides of the house in connection with Canada's war effort, and I hope that what I say this afternoon will be garnished with the same sincerity of purpose. My only reason for rising in my place is to offer some suggestions that may be acceptable to the government in the carrying on of our war effort. As a preface to my remarks, let me state that what I have to say is based on practical knowledge gained from a lifetime in agriculture.

In the county of Huron we have about 10,000 farms, and in addition we have a number of manufacturing establishments, an important lake harbour, a number of grain elevators and flour mills, and some of the best salt wells in Canada. We have some of the finest roads and highways in Ontario. Yet the county is free from debt and has no outstanding debentures. Few other counties in Canada can boast of such good results from a pay-as-you-go policy. I take a great deal of pride in the record of my county, because I can claim at least some credit for its present financial position.

I believe every hon. member should voice his opinion with regard to our war effort. In doing so, perhaps the suggestions I offer for the improvement of this effort may be acceptable to the government. Having sat through one whole session and having come into the second I have arrived at the conclusion that lawyers and doctors and professional men do not possess all the brains there are in this fair land of ours. I have heard in the last few days many inspiring addresses delivered by private members on the government side, and I venture to say there are a great many more who, given the opportunity, would offer helpful and inspiring thoughts that could well be made use of in this hour of need.

The rural people realize that the present crisis calls for more sacrifice and effort; they are ready and anxious to do all in their power to forward victory. It is still too obvious that the allied governments undertook to fight this war as an economic war, and with money, while the enemy used guns and ammunition. Hitler knows no law other than brute force and destruction. Tanks, not sterling; machine guns, not foreign exchange; sabotage, not dollars, is his method. Surely we are living in a land of make-believe and sleight-of-hand from some government members when they pretend to assume in this dark hour that trade will move through normal channels and that customary surpluses in several lines of our Canadian production will find a market, thus permitting production to command fair and reasonable prices. Farmers have divorced themselves from the profit motive, and are actuated only by a determined desire to serve in the front ranks of production. Farming to-day is a business, and just as in other industries, farmers must have sufficient income to cover overhead, defray expenses, and maintain the institution.

During this war, Canadian exports will largely be confined to Great Britain, the United States and South America. The demand for shipping facilities will restrict our exports to Great Britain to a minimum. We do know from experience, however, that if this conflict proceeds, all our production of foodstuffs will be in demand, but in the meantime our warehouses are full. At present the farmers have to assume the burden of these surpluses, and carry their share of war-time taxation. At this time of emergency I contend, Mr. Speaker, that these are problems that should be faced by our federal government. Non-perishable surpluses such as wheat, beans, pork, are in my opinion as good as gold in war time. There is nothing that will put heart in a man like a full stomach, and there is nothing that will weaken the morale of any nation like starvation. We all know that armies travel on their stomachs, and so I say again, pile up surpluses of non-perishable goods and keep the people working, make the currency circulate, and back it up with gold and with the storage of non-perishable goods. Non-perishable products are as good as gold in war time, and better. Beat the enemy at his own game. Only those who accept defeat are defeated. We must never be defeated.

I often wonder just what the reaction would be in Canada if we were subjected to the conditions that exist in England. I feel sure we could take it. I hope not but we may have to take it. Just ponder that in your mind.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, now that we are giving assistance to industry for the manufacture of necessary war materials, that immediate consideration should be given to agriculture, in order that we may achieve full production, under proper guidance and with the responsibility on the government for such surpluses as may exist from time to time. Such a plan can work for agriculture in the same manner as for other industries if practical men are chosen to frame and administer the necessary legislation. Our agricultural resources, properly organized, can and will play a vital part in this nation's war effort. We as farmers wish to serve and sacrifice equally with all other people of this dominion, but we ask that politics be thrown aside and that when the government establishes committees for the administration of agricultural problems their personnel include practical farmers, men who will know whether the proposed policies and programmes are feasible. Do not forget that when you are helping agriculture you are helping every man, woman and child in Canada.

First, in regard to agriculture we need a clean-cut federal government farm programme as to what products are needed during war time. In other words, take the farmer into the department's confidence and let him know the facts so that production can be maintained on an even keel.

Second, the majority of the farmers are dissatisfied with the present set-up in regard to bacon. There has not been, nor is there now, any control over the production of bacon. That has resulted in over-expansion and has disarranged marketing. Some kind of bacon production code is needed for the farmers, and then full returns from the packers of the old country price.

Third, we need a more effective and cheaper method of selling farm machinery priced in relation to farm production.

Fourth, we should have federal supervision over health standards of animals sold at community sales. Many cattle and hog diseases are being spread in healthy communities by outside animals brought in without inspection and sold in healthy areas.

Fifth, we must have an increased use for army purposes of Canadian apples and honey, pork and beans.

Sixth, there is the old story regarding domination of live stock marketing by a group of powerful packing house plants in Toronto, resulting in the farmers having little or no say in the marketing price of their animals. The sale of cattle and hogs direct to plants each week satisfies a large proportion of the packers' needs, which means that they are not keen to bid on lots in the union stockyards, which is supposed to be a competitive market. Marketing plants in their present set-up and yearly profits need government investigation.

Seventh, I would ask the minister why Ontario was not represented on the Canadian bacon board when Ontario produces one-half or more of the total production of hogs in Canada. Further, I would ask why the bacon producers of Canada were penalized by the government through negotiations with the United States which allowed large quantities of United States bacon to come in here to offset the fur trade of Canada. I do not think that was fair to agriculture.

Coming from a rural district, might I say that our people are willing to make any sacrifice within their power to preserve the institutions of democracy and to bear any burden of taxation imposed by the government just as long as that government by its actions and through its policies demonstrates to the people of Canada that the moneys so collected are not being wasted on people and profits as a reward for their party adherence. I could cite a few cases, but I will just warn the government that it will be they who will have to answer for some of the unnecessary appointments that they are making.

We have heard many complaints from farmer members of this house and, I am glad to say, lately from some hon. members who are not farmers, as to the way the government is allowing farmers to be imposed upon. We never did get a fair deal from any government, least of all from this one, but no one has ventured to tell the reason. To my mind the reason is a simple one. Campaign funds are much more conveniently collected in thousands of dollars than in smaller amounts, with the result that the big interests, paying larger amounts in campaign funds, look to the government for special assistance and get it. I should like to direct a few questions on this point to the government. I do not know the answers, but I should like to know. Did the sugar interests subscribe to their funds? Did the vegetable oil interests subscribe? Did the bacon interests subscribe? I could name many more. Such contributors get consideration, in many cases against the judgment of those who are in control. But those in control have no alternative; they are bought out, body and soul, before they ever start to function. I contend, Mr. Speaker, that this practice places governments in a position where they just have to do certain things, whether they want to or not. It is a system detrimental not only to the farmers of this country, but to the small industrialists who try in vain to compete and make a living.

I do feel that we as members of parliament should protest against the practice of importing into this country fruit and vegetables in ever-increasing volume, notwithstanding the restricted exportation from Canada to the United Kingdom. The war has forced the United Kingdom to restrict imports of tobacco and to stop further purchasing of Canadian canned fruits, vegetables and soups. Why should we not act in a similar way to protect our farmers? We shall be forced to promote a larger consumption at home to take care of the surplus created through the restriction of exports. I might go on to give the figures showing the increased imports from the United States, but I do not think this is necessary, because the figures have been submitted to the government; they already have the information. I wish only to place myself on record as registering my protest on behalf of the vegetable and fruit growers of Canada.

At this late hour I can only reiterate what a great many other hon. members have asked, that free transportation be granted our enlisted men who are on official leave for the last time, and I believe it would not be asking too much to recommend free transportation for Christmas leave as well. Surely our soldiers deserve this consideration. I would like to impress upon the minister the importance of this request.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), during his address on November 14, as reported at pages 108 and 109 of Hansard, referring to unemployment, stated that there was unemployment for practically all the defeated candidates of the opposition side of the house. May I remind the hon. gentleman that such was not the case so far as the defeated members on the government side were concerned. We find some of them being placed in very unnecessary jobs at large salaries. Why should so much money be spent in advertising the war effort of this government? If their efforts were one hundred per cent genuine, it would not require government heelers to advertise its programme. God forbid that we should have government heelers to contend with, on top of our all too heavy war responsibility.

We appreciate the efforts of the minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) in this government. From a personal standpoint he has, perhaps, done all that any one individual could do; I believe he is very sincere, but it is not enough. What we as agriculturists need is as much protection as other industries get, and surely we deserve it. The Prime Minister in his address talked about steel. True, "we need steel", we cannot get along without it, but is there any hon. member who would put forth the argument that steel is more important than food in winning the war? Long after the need for steel has declined, food will be in constant demand.

There is another line of thought which I wish to develop at this time. It has to do with our war effort so far as the distribution of grain, coal and gasoline is concerned, which is a vital matter, to my mind, in war time. We have a condition in Goderich harbour that I would like to draw to the attention of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), in regard to the surgings of vessels in the harbour under stress of wind and disturbance.

Last winter there were fifteen Canadian grain carriers wintering in the harbour. I have a record stating the surgings of these vessels which were under observation for two days when a northwest and west wind was blowing strong. There were other vessels lying loaded at the Western Canada Flour Mills wharf which are not included in this survey. Several storms occurred while these boats were in process of laying up for the winter. The first was a very strong gale starting in the southwest and shifting to northwest and north.

On December 7 and 8, when several vessels sustained broken cable moorings, bits and shocks, and otherwise bumped themselves along the wharves, there was no knowledge of any of the other vessels having come in contact with the harbour bottom. Again, on December 21 and 22, a northwest and westerly gale produced a great surge in the harbour with similar damaging results to steamship moorings. These storms, while altering from normal to intense velocity, did not seem to be worse than those experienced in previous years, but the harbour surging was apparently greater, which could only be attributable to a great flow of water to the entrance from the breakwater to the pier mouth, and thence to the inner harbour. It may be reasonable to assume that, with the deepening of the entry channel to approximately 26 feet, much greater volume of seas will roll through, especially during westerly and southwesterly gales, and this flow, walled off to a great extent by the shoaling on the north side, accelerates the volume of seas towards the harbour.

It has been suggested that the area behind the northwesterly breakwater be sloped down to permit the surge to roll up and expend itself on this shoaled area rather than be abruptly buffeted below, or the upper portion of seas spilled back into the walled channel. Then, too, we have considered where and to what length could be located an additional or extended break-wall to break up and divert the seas before they reach the entrance to the channel; and to this end, Captain Robinson, a mariner of much experience in handling large vessels into various ports, has made a sketch which I have here for inspection. I hope that the government will take the necessary steps to have this entrance to Goderich harbour taken care of at the earliest possible day, as we would not like a recurrence of this condition.

The minister must be impressed, I am sure, of the value of Goderich as a national port to the grain trade of Canada in the movement of Canadian western and American grains from the point of origination to the milling, feeding and exporting outlets in Ontario and eastern distributing points. May I briefly show you that the following quantities of grain have passed through our elevators from 1929 to 1939. I do not wish to take the time of the house to read the figures, but I have a copy, and I ask that it may be put on Hansard:

Year	Bushels
1930	6,388,875
1931	7,526,388
1932	4,346,086
1934	5,985,025
1935	5,805,585
1936	7,539,130
1937	4,883,586
1939	10,881,490

To this must be added an approximate 2,500,000 bushels per year which is received by the Western Canada Flour Mills in Goderich. You will notice the years between 1930 and 1937 were lean years; there was not the volume of grain that there was in 1938 and 1939. Additional to grain is the freightage of coal, gasoline coming in, some interior accumulations of products outward bound, all of which is water-moved tonnage. A careful computation of the revenue to the Canadian railways and Department of National Revenue, shows that the eleven-year period at Goderich produced revenue as follows:

Canadian National Railways....	$4,900,000
Canadian Pacific Railway.....	4,400,000
Customs revenue—coal and grain passed on last year, 1939, the only record available.....	874,279
Total revenue.....	$10,174,279

Thus you will appreciate that the dependable revenue afforded through our ports warrants requisite attention to developments, maintenance and safeguarding of the facilities which will provide safe and prompt access to Goderich harbour for any fully-loaded steamer under all weather conditions. I trust the minister will give these imperative requirements merited attention.

There are many thousands of Canadian women who, although outside the public eye, perform vital war duties in their homes, maintaining the health of the rising generation and assisting Canada's internal economy in their daily purchases, devoting their spare time to the corporate work of groups and organizations. I believe we have come to the time when these women's groups will have to be initiated into industry, and in my opinion the sooner the better. It might save considerable confusion if the time ever came when a good many of our industrialists were taken away from their jobs and sent overseas.

I would like to conclude my remarks with an extract from a speech I made during the course of the election campaign, as follows:

> Our primary duty as farmers is to the empire. Our brother agriculturists in Great Britain are desperately fighting for freedom's cause. They have left their fields and farms to be tended by the women of the nation. No sacrifice we can make for them is too great. We here hardly realize there is a war, but the time will come when Great Britain and her allies will need the products from our farms and fields. It becomes our duty not to think in terms of profit, gains or barter, but to stand shoulder to shoulder behind the cause and behind our men who are offering their all.

This was spoken several months ago and our people have risen nobly to the emergency. Our county has voted $27,000 for war purposes. They also purchased an airport site for over $10,000 as a county project and have since leased it to the government at a dollar a year. That is all that we have got out of it. It is not like the dollar-a-year men advertised around here in the last few days. Another $10,000 has been given to the Red Cross Society, and $7,000 has been set aside for patriotic purposes. More can be had if it is needed. Such is the spirit of our people in Huron, such is the spirit of Canada, such is the spirit of the empire; and with God's will we shall win for democracy.

[Mr. Cardiff.]

On motion of Mr. McLarty the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF AGREEMENT WITH BRITISH GOVERNMENT RESPECTING BACON

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the right hon. gentleman who is leading the house (Mr. Lapointe) to ask his colleague the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) if he would be good enough to table the bacon agreements, in pursuance of his undertaking of Thursday, November 14—page 101 of Hansard. We think these agreements ought to be tabled before this debate is concluded. While he is about it, will he be good enough to ask his colleague to table last year's bacon agreements, which have never been tabled.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I shall be pleased to convey my hon. friend's request to the minister.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East) the house adjourned at 5.48 p.m.

Thursday, November 28, 1940.

The house met at three o'clock.

STANDING COMMITTEES

ALBERTA PROVINCIAL BANK—STANDING ORDERS—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. W. H. GOLDING (Huron-Perth) presented the first report of the standing committee on standing orders, recommending that the proceedings taken last session in respect of the presentation of petition, the filing of draft bill, and the publication of notice relative to the proposed incorporation of the Alberta Provincial Bank, be accepted as sufficient for the present session; and moved that the report be concurred in.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I am not sure that I understand precisely the meaning of this report as it was read. Would it do any harm to have this motion stand until to-morrow?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Motion stands.

PRINTING—CHANGE IN PERSONNEL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the name of Mr. Dupuis be substituted for that of Mr. Cloutier on the joint standing committee on printing.

Motion agreed to.

MIGRATORY BIRDS

PROPOSED CHANGE IN OPEN SEASON ON DUCKS, GEESE AND SNIPE IN THE YUKON TERRITORY

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 5, to amend the Migratory Birds Convention Act.

He said: This bill consists of a short amendment to the Migratory Birds Convention Act. Under the act as it stands, the closed season on the migratory birds mentioned in the amendment is in force until September 1. It is proposed to have the open season commence on August 15.

These migratory birds, such as ducks, geese and snipe, begin to migrate from the Yukon around the first of August and are practically all gone by September 1. The result of the present provision is that the sportsmen of the Yukon are practically prohibited from shooting these birds.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

THE WAR

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT AS TO PRESENT POSITION

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in my view, in the view of many hon. members of this house, and I feel quite certain in the view of many people in Canada, the war situation in Europe is more serious to-day than at any time since the fall of France. The virtual destruction of the cities of Birmingham, Bristol and Southampton, the loss of shipping as evidenced by press reports, and in particular the utterances of the Marquess of Lothian, his majesty's representative in the United States, particularly with respect to finance, indicate the seriousness of the position. Therefore in my view the Prime Minister should make a statement to the house and the country, if not to-day then not later than to-morrow, and tell the country just what the exact position is; because it will be understood that he has access to information which we have not. Let him tell the house and the country how serious the position is or, if we are wrong in our views, how good the position is; and especially I would request him to indicate what further, if anything, Canada can do at this juncture towards aid and assistance, whether it be in men, materials, supplies or equipment.

I am very serious about this, Mr. Speaker, and I ask the Prime Minister to give consideration to it. I do not expect him to make an immediate response, but I do feel that the situation to-day in the theatre of war over there is just as serious as it was at the time of the fall of France, and we are all very uneasy about it. I do not wish to be taken as an alarmist. The situation may not be as bad as I feel it is, but at any rate a statement from the Prime Minister would have a quieting effect upon the people at this time.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would say to my hon. friend that I have had in mind making a statement to the house before adjournment with respect to the situation. I should like to have a little time to think over what it would be best to say. I agree with my hon. friend in his view that the situation is a serious one. I think anyone reading the press would gather that opinion. I would also say that such information as the government itself is receiving the press would appear to be reflecting accurately. Any statement that I may have to make will be practically in accord with what has already appeared in the press.

I may have something to say to-morrow about further proceedings before we adjourn.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

STATEMENTS RESPECTING ADJOURNMENT TO FEBRUARY 17—DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): The Prime Minister has just referred to the adjournment. He has given notice to the house that when we do adjourn it shall be until the 17th of February. I would like to suggest to the Prime Minister that in my view that is too long. The Prime Minister knows the commitments of the government much better than I or the country can know, and having regard to the fact that the dominion-provincial conference is to be held beginning at a date about the middle of January, it may be necessary to take that long adjournment. But may I suggest to the Prime Minister and the members of his administration that we do not adjourn definitely to the 17th of February but rather that we follow the formula which was incorporated in the resolution of August 3 last.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. We are now on the orders of the day and I do not see why the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) should be permitted to make statements to the government at this time. There will be another opportunity for him to do so, and I am sick of listening to his sermons. I would ask the whip of the Conservative party to keep quiet. I am sick of these little sermons by the leader of the opposition at the beginning of each sitting. He has to give a lecture or make suggestions to the government all the time. He is at liberty the same as any other hon. member to ask questions of the government on the orders of the day, but to make suggestions is an entirely different matter, and I ask, Mr. Speaker, that he be made to conform to the rules.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: I am not afraid of the howling or the groans.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): After that little interlude, may I be permitted with the consent of the house to complete briefly what I had to say?

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member has not unanimous consent. I object.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I was indicating that I think it would be desirable that when we adjourn—

Mr. POULIOT: Sit down, please, I ask for your ruling on the point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I gather that it is the sense of the house that these statements should be made by the leader of the opposition. He is dealing with a subject which is in the minds of all members of the house, and while I would not say he is strictly in order, yet I feel it is the sense of the house that he should make these statements and that the Prime Minister should reply to them if he thinks proper.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I shall not take much more of the time of the house to finish what I have to say, and I hope I shall not offend the sensibilities of any member, least of all the member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). I was going to suggest to the Prime Minister that he adopt the formula of August 3 last, which would I think be satisfactory to all.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I say to my hon. friend that if he will look at the Votes and Proceedings of yesterday he will see that I have already done what he has suggested. I had my motion amended so as to read:

That when this house adjourns immediately after the conclusion of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, it stand adjourned until Monday, February 17, 1941, at 3 o'clock, p.m., provided always that if it appears to the satisfaction of Mr. Speaker, after consultation with his majesty's government, that the public interest requires that the house should meet at an earlier time during the adjournment, Mr. Speaker may give notice that he is so satisfied, and thereupon the house shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am corrected; I was not up to date. I predicated what I said on the previous notice of motion, and I am glad to see that the Prime Minister has anticipated my suggestion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I had intended when the motion came before the house to give hon. members the reasons for fixing as I did the 17th of February as the date for reconvening. It may perhaps not be out of place if I say just a word at the moment because in the minds of some there may appear to be reason for believing that the government is unduly delaying the time of reconvening.

I would point out first of all that two or three ministers will be absent from Canada during the month of December. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) will be in Britain throughout the month of December. The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) also will be going to England for the purpose of conferences with the British government. I assume it will be some time in January before he will be able to be back in Ottawa.

The conferences that will be held in London by the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Munitions and Supply with different members of the British government will be important conferences, and legislation which may be introduced later, certainly the appropriation bill and the estimates, will in some measure be based upon the information obtained at that time.

I would also remind the house that the Christmas and New Year recess comes within the period of adjournment. That is a time when it is usually difficult to have all members of the cabinet together to discuss important matters. After continuous sittings that have lasted only a month there will be many matters held over pending adjournment which will require the special attention of ministers and of the cabinet before the ministers disperse even for a day or two at the Christmas season.

With respect to the conference with the provinces, the government has had to take into account and naturally would wish to consult the convenience of the different provinces, and the date fixed for the conference, the middle of January, was the earliest that could be arranged having in mind the views expressed by some of the provinces as to a date that would be convenient to them.

I cannot say how long the conference will last, but it may be advisable not to try to conclude its proceedings too hurriedly, but rather to allow plenty of time in order that some phases at least of the report may receive detailed consideration, if there is not time for consideration of all phases. I should think that the government would be wise in keeping the last fortnight of January pretty largely for matters pertaining to the dominion-provincial conference.

That leaves the month of February. It is true that I fixed the 17th as the date, but the 17th is a Monday. If we were calling a new session it would be called to meet on the Thursday, which would be the 13th. A fortnight will leave the government little enough time to confer after the conference with regard to the many matters that we wish to conclude before parliament reassembles and to bring before the house when it meets. Experience has taught me that it is better to have an extra week by way of preparation than to assemble at an earlier date and be running a little bit behind all the way with proceedings thereafter. I have tried to shape matters in a way that I thought would both before and after parliament reassembles best suit the convenience of members as a whole.

I might say that I gave notice when I did as to the probable time of reassembling because many members had inquired of me how long it would be after the conference before parliament would be reassembling. I thought that the sooner members generally could be advised as to the date, the better it would suit their convenience. I would also remind hon. members that we are not yet through this portion of the session. We have not reached the end of the debate on the address, and there are one or two matters, of which I shall have a word or two to say to-morrow, which will require further time and attention on the part of hon. members.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): At this time?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: At this time, yes. For these reasons it seems to me that the date which has been fixed, everything considered, will be found eventually to serve best the convenience of the house, as well as to meet the obligations of the ministry while in particular the resolution as drafted will meet the views of both my hon. friend and myself as to the procedure which should be followed.

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

REFERENCE TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE OF LAWS RESPECTING NATURALIZATION AND DEPORTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): A day or two ago the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) stated in the house that a special committee would be set up again this year to consider the defence of Canada regulations. That action is taken, I believe, as a result of a recommendation made by the committee which considered the same subject in the last session. But the special committee which sat last summer also recommended that the laws relating to naturalization and deportation should be considered by a special committee if one were set up at this present session. I should like to know whether it is the intention of the government to refer those two subjects also to a special committee.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): As my hon. friend knows, matters concerning naturalization come under the Secretary of State (Mr. Casgrain), and matters concerning deportation are under the immigration branch of the Department of Mines and Resources. But I have communicated with my colleagues the Secretary of State and the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), and I am authorized to tell my hon. friend that when a motion is made for the appointment of that committee, the reference will include the two matters he has just referred to, in accordance with the wish of that committee as expressed in its report.

TRAFFIC CONTROL

PROVISION FOR SAFETY OF PEDESTRIANS CROSSING ROADWAYS IN FRONT OF PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Public Works): The day before yesterday the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) referred to the control of traffic around the parliament buildings, and complained about careless driving on the part of some people along the esplanade in front of the buildings. The control of traffic around these buildings is under the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as a result of an order in council which has been passed. I do not see that any serious reflection can be made on the manner in which the mounted police carry on their duty. It may be that certain people are not ready to obey the orders and that the constables are not there to watch them when they disobey the law.

At all events the matter was taken up with the mounted police, and, as a result of the representation and discussion that took place, one additional constable has been appointed in order to watch more closely the traffic around the parliament buildings.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Thank you.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

QUESTION AS TO MEMORANDUM BY DOCTOR HOGG SUPPORTING A SINGLE-STAGE DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend the member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Casselman) asked me yesterday if I could ascertain whether there was a document signed by Doctor Hogg which was in the nature of a memorandum with respect to a single-stage development of the international rapids section of the St. Lawrence. I am informed that there is no such document in the department. This morning one of the members of the staff communicated with Doctor Hogg, and he mentioned that there is no such document on his part anywhere.

I might add, however, that it is a fact, as was intimated in the press notice which was published in all Canadian papers on January 25 of this year, that the engineering advisers of the two governments are prepared to recommend a controlled single-stage scheme which differs in some respects from both the single-stage and the double-stage schemes which were chiefly discussed some years ago.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

HOLIDAY LEAVE AND TRANSPORTATION FOR SOLDIERS UNDERGOING TRAINING

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): In pursuance of my own question, and in view of inquiries I have received from anxious parents who, as Christmas is less than a month away, anticipate sending extensive Christmas gifts to their soldier sons if these soldiers are not to be allowed to come home, may I ask whether the government can give some intimation now as to whether these men will be allowed to return home, as has been suggested in this house, under a more liberal provision with respect to transportation? I have received four or five inquiries in the matter.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister of National Defence for Air): The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) has stated on several occasions the policy with respect to Christmas leave. Christmas leave will be granted for a period of six days. I am not familiar with the details. With respect to free transportation, it is not the intention of the department to provide free transportation during Christmas leave.

Perhaps some confusion may arise on account of the dual role which I am now endeavouring to fill. My statement that arrangements have been made for leave of six days' duration applies to the army. So far as the air force is concerned we are making no special arrangements whatsoever for leave. The men have to get on with their training.

DAYLIGHT SAVING TIME

INCONVENIENCE AS AFFECTING RAILWAY TRAIN SCHEDULES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): A communication I have received, the substance of which I believe is concurred in in other urban centres, intimates that the continuation of daylight saving is causing some inconvenience as regards train times in the cities. Can the government say whether or not the present arrangement is to be discontinued?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): It is not the intention of the government to discontinue the present regulation affecting daylight saving time. It was put in force as a very important means of saving electric power. As a matter of fact it is accomplishing a saving of about 190,000 horse-power, which represents a considerable number of man-hours and a considerable productive capacity for the war industries. It is felt that the public, while somewhat inconvenienced by the change, will be willing to make the slight sacrifice involved in order to make this power available to our war effort.

Mr. LOCKHART: In the light of the statement made by the minister and the apparent value of the present arrangement, could we not make it general all over Canada and have train schedules revised accordingly?

Mr. HOWE: The purpose for which the measure was passed would not be further served by extending the area. In view of the fact that my hon. friend prefaced his first question by saying that the public were greatly inconvenienced, I see no purpose in further inconveniencing the public without some definite gain to the war effort.

Mr. LOCKHART: A revised railway schedule would perhaps solve the difficulty.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF PUTTING ACT INTO FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. H. McGREGOR (York East): Could the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) give us any idea as to when unemployment insurance will be put into effect?

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour): I cannot give any definite date. The commission is working on the regulations, the transfer of employment offices, and various other matters necessarily incident to the introduction. But at the present time I am unable to advise as to the definite date on which contributions will be required.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Wednesday, November 27, consideraion of the motion of Mr. Brooke Claxton for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Blackmore.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I believe I shall best meet the wishes of this house if in the statement which I am going to give this afternoon I refrain from dealing with all aspects of the labour situation, but deal only with those that are definitely related to our war effort.

The importance of the part which labour plays in production of war materials and equipment in a mechanized war was so well expressed by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) in this house a week ago that it is unnecessary for me to repeat it. He pointed out the accelerated tempo of productive activity now existing in this country, and explained that that tempo will increase until, in the period which he estimated at eight months, the maximum of our productive activity will have been attained. The point at which that maximum is so attained and the limitations by which it is restricted will doubtless be determined largely by the availability of labour. For that reason the problem of labour supply is a vital factor in our war achievement.

It will, of course, be recognized that there are necessarily limitations to the productive capacity of any country comprising twelve million people, but within that maximum limitation it is our duty to ensure the very greatest possible production and to develop our man-power capacity to the maximum degree of efficiency. This war imposes that definite imperative. It should, too, be borne in mind and appreciated that when we reach that high point in our production so envisaged we would be producing as much, per capita, as any other country in the world.

I know that it is unnecessary to deal with many matters which are as well understood and appreciated by members of this house as by myself. It is needless, for instance, to deal with the matter of the various problems which must arise from turning our country from a peace to a war basis and developing the economic participation which war necessarily entails.

In addition, I do not have to remind this house that prior to the war we were emerging from the world's greatest depression, accompanied by the unfortunate incidence which such a depression brings, not alone on the efficiency of labour generally but peculiarly upon skilled labour as well.

Labour in general in depression times loses some of its skill; it has not the same incentive; it becomes blunt; and in addition many of our highly skilled workers returned to the United Kingdom where they felt a wider field of opportunity was open to the particular skill which they enjoyed.

Nor will I deal to-day with a strange phenomenon, namely, that notwithstanding the increased industrial activity there are still, according to the latest available figures, 52,500 employables receiving unemployment aid, to which figure must be added those unemployed who are not in receipt of relief. The degree of employability of those employables receiving unemployment aid must be seriously questioned, but notwithstanding that the paradox exists.

A similar situation exists in the United Kingdom, and the paradox has been referred to by Sir William Beveridge, chairman of the advisory committee on unemployment insurance, and explained in the following words:

> The explanation of this paradox of mass overwork and mass idleness in war time is not far to seek. War, while it abolishes some types of peace-time unemployment, such as that due to cyclical depression, enormously increases another type. This is the qualitative unemployment due to the labour demanded being of one kind while the supply available is of another kind. War adds a new type of unemployment which may be described as bottle-neck unemployment, arising from the fact that the demand for labour is never a demand for labour alone, but for labour in conjunction with particular machines and particular raw materials.

This statement of Sir William Beveridge, too, explains the circumstance that in June of this year there were in Great Britain, when the maximum of war effort was admittedly being put forth, 800,000 unemployed registered.

This paradox of unwilling idleness of many citizens in the midst of the great demands in war is surprising, but it is a definite fact. Bad in itself as a waste of strength, it is even worse psychologically, as suggesting to those who are being urged to additional efforts and sacrifices that these cannot really be required.

But the cure of unemployment in war is not as easy as the statement that it exists. It raises technical problems of great complexity; it involves necessarily the intimate cooperation of service and supply departments and the ministry of war services and of the ministry of labour and of the educational authorities; the organization of man-power is in the last resort a replanning and reorganizing of our whole production. The state is compelled to exert a dynamic control in the interests of the community and with the supreme object of maximum production of war requirements.

The fact, therefore, that we still have unemployed in Canada does not mean that we can face the future with complacency. Our margin of reserve of skilled and semi-skilled labour is growing steadily less; and our returns of unemployment among members of trade unions show that in this class there exists the lowest unemployment figure in many years; it stands to-day at 4·4 per cent. In addition, unemployed registered at employment offices and suitable for employment in industrial war work has gradually decreased from a total of 25,500 on July 15 to 19,443 on October 15.

Taking the skilled trades alone, we find that during the same period the number of those available decreased from 11,767 to 6,345, a decrease of nearly 50 per cent. In the metal trades alone in this larger group we find a decrease from a total of 6,361 available in July to 2,950 available in October, a decline of nearly 55 per cent in this important available labour supply for industry.

I do not suggest that there is existing at present a general shortage of labour. There is not. But I do suggest there are certain specialized branches of labour in which this shortage to-day exists and which, unless adequate measures are taken to deal with its growth, will produce a situation and create a condition which will be extremely difficult to meet.

[Mr. McLarty.]

Having endeavoured to paint a reasonably fair and accurate picture of the situation as it affects labour supply, there are only two observations I desire to make:

1. While the shortage of labour generally is not yet acute, a shortage of tool and die makers and mechanics generally is imminent, if not already at hand in some occupations.

2. In the second place I would point out that two methods are being followed to ensure the maximum use of available labour and the training of additional skilled labour: the first is by governmental action; the second is by industry itself.

Referring to the first, governmental action, it will not be necessary in this connection to deal with the circumstances existing prior to the last session of parliament. For this reason I will not discuss the work of the dominion-provincial conference which was held shortly after the outbreak of war, the purpose of which was to secure an effective registration of skilled and semi-skilled labour available to our war industries. This resulted in a list of over 30,000 of our citizens being prepared, and this list has been kept up to date and is at present available.

Nor is it necessary for me to deal with the supply of professional technicians, a canvass of which was originally initiated by the Department of National Defence, and was undertaken by the Engineering Institute of Canada, the Canadian Institute of Chemistry, the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy, and various other professional institutes. The result of the canvass so made by these societies was later made available to the government through the work which was undertaken by Doctor Tory, and thereby over 15,000 names were made available in the technical section and afforded a reservoir of the highest skill in this highly important branch of war industry. Over 2,500 of these technicians have been referred to employers in answer to requests, and many more of them have been utilized in positions where their ability and training will be used to the best advantage.

The general problem of labour supply resolves itself into three parts:

1. What has been done.
2. What is being done.
3. What it is proposed to do.

I would first like to tell the house what this government has done in connection with the basic training and development of expert labour during this war.

Through an expansion and redirection of the youth training programme and through the use of funds voted by parliament for that particular programme, and drawing upon the war appropriation, the energies and work of this branch of the Labour department were all developed to the end of promoting our war work from the outset. During this past summer every one of the sixty-four technical schools in Canada possessing the required equipment and the necessary instructors was utilized for the purpose of promoting the training in war work of the young people of this country.

To-day our annual rate of training is in excess of 26,000 trainees per year, and this number is being constantly augmented and increased.

In the four months' training, which is the average time afforded, young men of this country are being given an education which will form the basis of the technical work which they are called upon to perform. The training so provided comes under two main categories:

1. The training which is being done in the aircraft mechanics' course for entry into the Royal Canadian Air Force will develop 6,000 trainees per year at the present rate of training.

2. The training for work in the war industries will produce an additional 24,000 basically trained workers per year.

We are, of course, hopeful of exceeding this objective, and every effort is being made I believe to bring this about.

This programme has been and is being carried out by the Department of Labour in cooperation with the various provincial governments in Canada. And might I here pay a tribute to the provincial governments for the wholehearted and loyal cooperation which they have afforded in connection with this work. It has, of course, been necessary for the dominion to increase its contribution to the carrying out of this programme.

It has, for example, given to the province concerned an additional $100 for each trainee who has completed the course in the air mechanics' class and who has been accepted by the Royal Canadian Air Force. It has been necessary also for the dominion government to absorb a substantial amount of the expense involved in the use of the vocational schools throughout Canada. But I believe that without exception the provincial governments have cooperated wholeheartedly in connection with both the air training classes and the general training of workers who will take their place in our war industries.

May I make one further remark? There are, I am advised, some of these young men who have taken these courses and who are prepared to enter into industrial employment but are reluctant to do so because they feel that their primary duty is to join the active fighting forces of Canada on the land, on the sea and in the air. This should not necessarily be so. No inferiority complex should be created. The young man who devotes himself to industry, who endeavours to promote productive activity, who works at making bullets, is as vital and as essential as the man who fires them.

A few nights ago in the course of this debate the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) suggested that of these trainees there were approximately 25 per cent who were not placed in productive employment. Naturally his information would be based upon a certain definite time. This is a continuous thing, Mr. Speaker, and if his information were based on a certain time he might well be correct. But that is not the situation to-day. Of those who were in the summer training in our vocational schools—and I would like to make it clear to the house that that training is not limited to the summer but is going on and increasing to-day—over ninety per cent have been placed in productive activity. There are certain trainees who were trained in what might not be regarded as highly industrialized areas. It has been necessary, and this government is paying the transportation expense to take those men from those areas which are not highly industrialized and place them in industries where they are most badly needed. And the suggestion has been definitely made to me that within the space of two weeks practically one hundred per cent of the men who have received that training will be definitely in the employment of industry.

There is too, sir, a second and very vital consideration, and that is to the extent to which industry itself has been willing to undertake and participate in the training of men for war-time industry. The duty of industry in respect of this important work was emphasized some months ago. Speaking in this house on June 17 last I pointed out that while the government might do its share in the basic training of skilled mechanics, the primary responsibility in regard to this accelerated training rested upon the shoulders of industry itself.

A canvass has been made of industry by the national labour supply council to determine the number of additional employees which will be required in carrying out the war work and the number of men which each industry is training for this purpose. While the number being trained is somewhat disappointing, there is definite evidence that industry is now co-operating both with the vocational schools and in providing the necessary training in their own plants. I am confident that with this co-operation the training of workers will greatly increase during the next few months.

In addition the government has appointed and is appointing officials whose duty it is to facilitate cooperation between employers and the trainees in vocational schools, as well as to promote and increase the training being given in essential industrial plants. The work in this regard is being increased as rapidly as circumstances permit.

Might I give an instance, a rather interesting one, of an experiment which was carried on by one industry which is engaged in shipbuilding in the maritime provinces. A little time ago they placed an advertisement in fifteen newspapers, spread from Winnipeg to Calgary. They advertised for mechanics skilled in the manufacture of ships. The result of the advertisement was that they had applications from 227 skilled men. They selected from that number those which they required. The advice which I have received from the president of that company indicates that most of those men, who received their training in the old country, are highly skilled mechanics, I believe in the highest class of shipbuilding work, namely platers. In addition, while they are not foremen in the plants, each of these men selected is capable of training from ten to fifteen other men in the less skilled work, thereby carrying into effect a plan which will be essential if we are to keep a labour supply for our war industries. That is an example of an industry, on its own initiative, undertaking to train the necessary measure of skilled labour it requires. I believe the example might well be followed by a great many other industries in Canada; and while perhaps it is not being followed along the same line I am convinced that every war industry is endeavouring in some way to increase the volume of skilled labour available for employment.

On June 19 last the government appointed the national labour supply council, equally representative of labour and industry. That council has as its chairman Mr. Arthur J. Hills of Montreal. There are five representatives of labour and five of industry, and an equal number from each of alternate members.

This council has been extremely helpful. I have already referred to the canvass of industries which it has made to determine future labour requirements and the training being afforded by each industry. It has, too, prepared a list of reserved occupations; and has been of assistance in maintaining in industry those workmen whose importance in industrial work is greater than it would be in the military forces. It has in addition promoted a greater mutual understanding between labour and industry.

In addition it was this council which recommended to the government that the matter of labour supply was not one with which a particular department alone was concerned, but that it required the cooperation of a number of departments. For that reason a committee of labour coordination was set up under the chairmanship of Doctor Bryce Stewart, deputy minister of labour. The other members are:

Doctor W. A. Mackintosh—Department of Finance; Colonel George S. Currie—Department of National Defence; Major-General L. R. LaFlèche—Department of National War Services; Mr. R. J. Waterous, K.C.—Department of National War Services; Mr. H. B. Chase—Department of Munitions and Supply; Mr. Arthur J. Hills—Chairman, National Labour Supply Council.

Mr. JACKMAN: If a list of reserved occupations has been set up, is it the intention of the government to honour that list?

Mr. McLARTY: That matter, Mr. Speaker, is receiving definite attention by the committee the personnel of which I just mentioned. No doubt what action will be taken by the government will depend on certain factors. It must be remembered, for example, that in the army itself nearly forty per cent of the men have to be skilled mechanics, because of the nature of present day mechanized warfare, and I have no doubt that a fair balance will have to be maintained between those drafted into the army and those left with industry.

The duties and responsibilities of this committee are of extreme importance. It has for its general objective the determination of labour required, especially in skilled occupations, for the war effort, and the devising of ways and means of meeting these requirements. In the determination of these labour requirements, the demand from three main sources must be satisfied: the recruiting services, government agencies giving civilian employment, and firms working on government contracts. I might deal with these individually.

1. The demand from the recruiting services, such as defence, the naval and air services, will be enlisting men. The total number of men to be enlisted during the next six months' period, the skilled occupations necessarily included and the number of men in each is being ascertained.

2. The demand from government agencies giving civilian employment. Men will be taken on for work in the arsenals, shipyards, the construction of airports, and other direct employment under the government. The total number and the requirements in the skilled trades for the next six months is made available to the committee by the departments concerned.

3. The third demand, namely from government contractors and sub-contractors, is no doubt the greatest of the three. The matter of enticing of skilled labour by employers, which, if allowed to continue, would have produced a chaotic situation in industry, has already been dealt with by order in council on the recommendation of the committee. The labour needs, more especially for skilled workers, of all firms on government contracts are being ascertained and placed before the committee. These returns give the skilled occupations and the numbers required in each for the next six months or until present commitments are completed.

The data thus secured will give the committee some measurement of skilled labour requirements at present and for some months ahead and will indicate in what occupations and locations the labour is needed. This information is being supplemented by reports from all departments of government concerned. As soon as the enlistment of a quota of men, or a new governmental project or a new contract, is decided upon, the committee is to be advised so that the necessary labour may be determined and measures to secure it considered before the project is launched.

In addition this committee is engaged in the determination of the present labour reserve; and various possible sources of labour are being canvassed to learn the number and location of required workers available.

This is being done through the following channels:

1. Through trade unions. The unions which have members in the occupations required are being asked to furnish the committee with lists of unemployed or partially employed members or members working in non-essential industries, or men with required skills now employed in other occupations.

2. Through the use of the provincial employment offices. The cards of the active files in the employment offices are being examined to discover applicants in the required occupations or in allied occupations, and the result of this survey is available to the committee.

3. The same procedure as has been adopted in connection with the employment offices will be followed in connection with the national registration cards as and when they become available.

4. The approximate dates upon which firms can complete their commitments is being given to the committee so that new contracts may be given them without any call on the labour market, so that if new contracts are not assigned them some part of their labour force may be used elsewhere.

The committee, too, is taking steps for the conserving and augmenting of the labour supply by the following methods:

1. In the recruiting policy they are endeavouring to ensure that men in the required occupations should not be recruited unnecessarily, and any already with the forces not being used in their trades should be returned to war industries as needed. A survey of the number of enlisted men in Canada in the scarce trades is being undertaken and the results made available to the committee.

2. Apprenticeship. As a rule apprenticeship training covers too long a period to afford any important increase in the number of skilled workers in the emergency. Intensive instruction may speed up the completion of courses and make a number available to industry somewhat sooner. The character of the instruction is being checked to ensure that so far as possible the men are being trained in the required occupations.

3. Pre-employment training in technical schools, to which I have already referred. A survey is being made to ascertain that the training is being directed to the scarce trades; that it is not putting undue stress on theory; that the men are being trained in a short range of skills rather than all the skills of an occupation; that the facilities are being used in shifts in order to train the maximum number; that there is proper cooperation with local industry for use of plant equipment, and to ascertain when students will graduate and in what numbers.

Mr. GREEN: In connection with the matter of training, has the government any plan for training middle-aged men or training women for industry, or for training men who have been discharged from the army? Perhaps the minister was going to cover that point later, but he did not mention it in connection with his training plan.

Mr. McLARTY: Consideration definitely is being given to that point. We are training a limited number of middle-aged men, but the number is not at present great.

Mr. GREEN: At the moment practically all the training being done is of youths?

Mr. McLARTY: I think that statement would be generally correct, although we are now endeavouring to train some of those who are older. We are investigating the possibility of securing instructors. If I may say so the bottle-neck of the plan has been the shortage of equipment and instructors. In other words, we are training all that we can possibly train, given the number of instructors available and the equipment which we can obtain.

Mr. GREEN: Is there any training of women for industry?

Mr. McLARTY: So far the Department of Labour has not trained any women as part of the project. Of course, industry itself is doing some training.

Mr. CHURCH: Has the minister made any representations to industry about these forgotten men, the men of forty-five years and over? In the Toronto district no one will employ them. Has the minister made any arrangements to take care of the thousands of men who joined the army and then were turned adrift after three or six months because of some medical disability?

Mr. McLARTY: I think my colleague, the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), will have some proposal to offer in connection with the latter part of the hon. member's question. As to the first part of his question, I would not want to say that definite representations have been made to industry to employ older men. I think that is something which industry will have to take upon itself. As demand increases and the supply diminishes, industry will almost automatically be required to take on older men and women.

Mr. CHURCH: Will relief be continued through this winter for the two classes of persons I have mentioned?

Mr. McLARTY: That question covers too much ground to be answered offhand, and I should not want to make any commitments in connection with it. This is a matter of government policy which will have to be considered thoroughly before any answer could be given.

Mr. GREEN: Would it not be possible to train some of these women and middle-aged men in the technical schools, along with the youths?

Mr. McLARTY: The difficulty in that connection is in obtaining the necessary number of instructors. So far there has been no lack in the number of trainees offering themselves. If a shortage of trainees should develop, then training could be given to those middle-aged persons who could perform useful service.

Mr. GREEN: If that were done you would get away from the conflict with the forces. The forces want the young men; they do not want middle-aged men.

Mr. McLARTY: Quite true. The committee is considering the training of older people.

4. The fourth step that the committee is taking has to do with training in industry. Government contractors with proper facilities may be required to train stated numbers of workers in the scarce trades as a condition of the contract. This training should take the form of upgrading. Jobs should be broken down, and the trained mechanics should do only the most skilled part of the work. The rest of the job should be divided among a few others nearest to him in line, each of whom should be broken in on his part of the job with a few weeks' training. Others behind them should move into their places, and so on through the plant. New employees should be taken on at the lower levels and moved up as rapidly as their abilities and the circumstances permit.

A survey is being made to determine plant facilities for training in the required occupations, the instructors available and how their number may be increased, and the number of trainees that may be graduated in a given period. This survey will be first applied to war industries and then to others if deemed advisable.

5. Training by federal government agencies. To meet their needs for skilled workers in the navy, army and air force, the arsenals and shipyards through the departments concerned must undertake to upgrade men as required of industry.

6. Transfer of workers. Provision to facilitate transfer of available workers to points where they can be placed must be made. I have already dealt with this transfer of trainees.

Mr. GREEN: The government pays the transportation?

Mr. McLARTY: That is correct.

7. A survey has been initiated to determine the number and locations of employees in the scarce trades now attached to non-essential or depressed industries who could be drawn into work on government contracts if that should become necessary.

8. Recruiting of women for industry and war auxiliary to the services. The extent to which women may be substituted for men in war industries should the need arise is being studied with a view to provision for their training. As men are upgraded into higher jobs many women might be employed on jobs at the lower levels. Similarly in non-war industries, upgrading would release skilled men for war plants and, in many, women could be taken on to replace them.

9. Labour priority for war industries. A survey is being made to establish a list of the non-essential industries which employ labour in the scarce trades and to determine the number of such workers employed. It may be found necessary to deny such industries the right to engage any additional men required in the essential occupations and, secondly, to transfer some of their skilled labour to war industries.

This gives some picture of the wide duties and functions of this committee. Its personnel is, I believe, the surest guarantee of its efficient performance of its difficult but exceedingly important task.

This brings me to another important function of this committee upon which it will have to report but which, being a matter of policy, becomes a direct responsibility of the government. We are all aware that to-day all our citizens are called upon to make sacrifices—sacrifices which will be all the greater as the war progresses and time marches on. This is a total war, and the primary duty of government in the matter of sacrifice is to see that it is equally distributed.

Many will plead that they are making more sacrifices than their neighbours. But our world to-day is inspired by those who bear their heavy griefs with patience; it pays little heed to those who parade their petty grievances with impatience.

In Canada to-day our war effort depends on two great services—our fighting services and our producing services. Each is essential, each is interdependent, and each is determined to back the other to the utmost degree. But maximum production depends on the most efficient possible use of the human and material resources at our disposal. Manufacturing plants must be well equipped with modern tools and machinery and skilled men and women. They must operate to capacity within the limits of sustained efficiency. Wherever possible they must operate on two or even three shifts and in many instances production is continuous so that operation subject to another day being finished even on Sunday is necessary.

These conditions do not obtain generally in peace time, and it is but natural that the transition to war-time conditions raises problems concerning relations between employer and employee, principally the problem of remuneration for work done. In peace time, when the supply of labour has been plentiful, the tendency has been towards a shorter day and working week. That purpose has been twofold; originally to reduce fatigue and provide leisure for recreation; and later to spread the work and reduce unemployment.

The working day has been reduced to eight hours generally and the week to forty-four hours. Provision exists for the working of hours in excess of those outlined above, under special conditions, and overtime rates of pay have been established. These rates usually provide for payment of rates fifty per cent higher than straight time and in the case of work performed on Sundays, one hundred per cent higher. These last are punitive rates, designed to discourage the working of a seven day week. We must now give careful consideration to the question of the application of such punitive rates when war conditions have practically eliminated the reasons which originally necessitated their introduction. In the case of work which has to be performed on Sundays, some employees will be so employed but if they are given another day off during the week instead, it would be hard to defend the payment of punitive rates for Sunday work.

To-day we are approaching the point where, even generally speaking, a labour shortage will exist, and under the circumstances we must consider the question of lengthening the standard working week from forty-four hours to forty-eight or even higher, as the new basis for calculating what overtime rates shall be payable. We have reached the point at which, instead of planning to spread the work, we are actually seeking workers to man our rapidly expanding war industries.

With the distressing news concerning havoc wrought by the enemy in such centres as Coventry, Birmingham, Bristol and Southampton still ringing in our ears, and with the Minister of Shipping admitting that sinkings are going on at a greater rate than replacements, I suggest that this is no time for us to be thinking of maintaining standards which do not take into account the urgency of the situation.

In considering the possibility of lengthening the working week we appreciate that this involves the possible temporary—I should like to emphasize that, Mr. Speaker—the temporary relinquishing of certain standards which labour has established over the years. The only excuse for asking that these temporary concessions—and it must be admitted that they are temporary and for the emergency period only—be considered is that we must win the war, and sacrifice is unavoidable.

Mr. MacINNIS: The minister says that these concessions will be temporary. May I ask if it is the intention of the government to make that definite by legislation?

Mr. McLARTY: No. So far as I am aware the government has no such intention.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It has the power now by order in council.

Mr. McLARTY: We could do it but it will not be necessary. If you start from the fundamental basis that labour is willing and anxious to cooperate, you do not need legislation; you do not need to wield the big stick to get them to do it. I am going to read three resolutions before I get through to show—

Mr. MacINNIS: The minister misunderstood me. Labour will be willing to make the concessions, but after the concessions are made will labour have to go through the same fight as they have had over the years to get those rights restored? In Great Britain every concession is registered, and it does not come into effect until it is registered.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. If the hon. member wishes to ask a question he may do so with the minister's permission.

Mr. McLARTY: I can answer that quite readily. In the order in council passed by this government on June 19, in which we made certain observations as to what we considered was the best method of preserving the best possible relations between industry and labour in war time, we made it very clear that any concession made by labour in this emergency period would be for the emergency only. In his address a couple of weeks ago to this house the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) reinforced that statement of policy by stating that when labour was making these concessions it was our definite duty when the emergency was over to see that labour did not suffer as a result. I do not think there can be any question about this government's attitude.

If lengthened, the working week must not be made inordinately long, as experience has taught us that beyond certain limits, fatigue more than offsets any advantage gained in production as a result of longer hours. The present working week is short of the point at which fatigue becomes a factor, and it may be found desirable to lengthen progressively the working week as the available labour supply diminishes.

Should these steps be found desirable, the sacrifice involved will be offset to a very large extent by increased incomes due to steady work and longer working hours, and by the controls adopted which have effectively protected all from unduly increased living costs. A study of workers' incomes in certain industries reveals the fact that where wage increases have been ten per cent since the outbreak of war, actual incomes have increased much more, and I suggest therefore that it is a problem of adjusting labour standards in the war effort by rational and logical approach on the part of all concerned.

The interest of the public in the situation is a very definite one indeed, exceeding in some cases the interest of the employer. This interest is, of course, evident from the fact that the government is the principal buyer, and in addition because of the policy which the government has followed to prevent the exploitation of war-time needs by any form of profiteering. One of the means to this end adopted by the government was to require all those who tender on government orders to do so on the basis of existing prices for labour and material, the government undertaking in some instances to protect the contractor against increases in either labour or material. This has saved the taxpayers of Canada a considerable amount of money.

I should like to put on Hansard—I am reminded of it by the question of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis)—one or two resolutions to show the attitude of labour and the cooperative viewpoint that now exists. Here is a resolution from a group of working men which indicates clearly their attitude of cooperation and willingness to accept their share of sacrifice in making common cause against the enemy. It is from the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers in Toronto, and reads:

> That we notify all employers of our members we have decided to temporarily suspend the provision of our now existing agreement, which limits the hours of work, and will work eight hours per day, six days per week at straight time, during the present crisis, these to be between the hours of 8 a.m. and 5 p.m. on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday (holidays not included). It being distinctly understood that our agreement, as at present constituted, shall remain unchanged and the suspended provision shall immediately, at the end of this crisis, automatically become effective.

A few days ago a friend of mine was talking to the general manager of a large industrial plant. He asked the general manager if they were experiencing any difficulty in stepping up their production. The general manager replied that they were not. They called a meeting with their employees, told them the facts of the situation, and asked for suggestions. The outcome was a voluntary arrangement whereby employees in that plant are working at more than prescribed hours per week for straight time wages.

I could give a great many examples, Mr. Speaker, of plants in which the same thing is happening. But the point is, when it is suggested that this be done by some arbitrary method, that the best way to do it is by mutual local agreement, and this method has been followed in a great many instances.

I have here another resolution passed by the carpenters' union of the city of Regina:

> Therefore be it resolved that we, the carpenters of Regina, represented by the above mentioned local union, do hereby promise, from this date and until this present war is won by the British empire of which we are proud to be a part, "to work on government war work only for straight time for ten hours each day and for six days per week, including Sundays and holidays, for the rate of wages as set out in the agreement and signed by all parties concerned" for all carpenters and for all carpenter work.

I merely give these, sir, as typical illustrations of the willingness of labour to cooperate voluntarily.

There is, sir, a right way and a wrong way to deal with and adjust every problem of human relations. It has been urged upon the government that by some fiat, by some ukase, we should order labour to do certain things in the matter of wages paid or hours of labour worked. There might be conceived some circumstances in which the government might be required to take such action. But those circumstances do not exist to-day. What labour is looking for is not regimentation but direction. It has made that abundantly clear. Dealing as we are with a cooperative body, why should such action be necessary? That is the wrong way.

I was interested in reading a report of the remarks made by the Minister of Labour in Great Britain, in the House of Commons yesterday, in which he said:

> Had we applied conscription of labour in the manner suggested, we should have made direct for defeat. Compulsion does not give the desired result.

The right way is to assume that this is fundamentally labour's war, and that being so, that labour—organized and unorganized—is willing to contribute its maximum effort in this critical time. It involves a definite consultation with labour, a testing-out of the viewpoint of labour. The use of the big stick is unnecessary when we are all engaged in a common purpose. I am convinced that that is the right way. And I am equally convinced that if we adopt it, it will redound to the benefit of the Canadian people during war time, it will be of definite assistance in the aftermath of war, and it will immeasurably promote the happiness and prosperity of our Canadian people.

Mr. BRUCE: May I ask a question of the minister? I did not wish to interrupt him while he was giving his excellent address, but when he was dealing with the difficulty of obtaining instructors for the technical schools I wondered whether anything had been done to enable the release for that purpose from the army of men who are skilled mechanics. I have been told that our technical schools in Toronto could train two to three times as many young men and women as they are doing if they had sufficient instructors. Has anything been done in that regard?

Mr. McLARTY: Nothing definite has been done in that connection. It is receiving consideration at the present time, along with the problem of withdrawing those who might be more useful in industry than in the army. One practical thing we are endeavouring to bring about—I cannot say that it has been definitely done—is to obtain highly skilled employees of the railroads who have been retired, so as to utilize them as instructors. We know that it will not be difficult to interest them, and we hope to be able to use a great number of them if they are available.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In the matter of the enlisted man, as I understand the position now, it is left to the man himself to say whether he will ask for his release, and without that the army officials cannot act; they cannot peremptorily take him out of the army and put him in industry. Is that not the position to-day?

Mr. McLARTY: The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) is dealing with a matter on which others are probably better qualified to speak than I am, but my impression is that his statement is correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The man himself decides.

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): First, I want to congratulate the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) on a very enlightening address to this house. An address like that is the sort of information which this house wants from the ministers who have the responsibility of carrying on our war effort.

I wish also to congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, on the attitude you have taken with respect to the reading of speeches in this chamber. I would hesitate to interrupt a speaker who is reading a speech, to draw the fact to your attention, but on several occasions I have spoken to you personally, because I do feel the practice is unfair. In my opinion the same rule should apply to cabinet ministers. I say that in fairness to the private members of this house. Cabinet ministers should not be accorded any more consideration, except on occasions when, for example, they are making some statement which deals with a new policy, or dealing with some matter of international importance, or reading exhaustive figures. I congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, upon your attitude in this respect, although I think that, as regards new members—and we can leave this to your judgment—they should be given more leeway in their maiden speeches than those who have been in the house for some time and have previously taken part in its debates.

Before I enter upon the general subject matter of my remarks, I feel constrained to make emphatic reference to something which has happened in the last two or three days. I refer to the decision announced by the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to defer action against the Transradio press service. To my mind this is a serious matter. A few days ago the Dies committee in the United States issued a white paper in which they showed that this service received some $44,000 for the purpose of broadcasting nazi propaganda throughout Canada and the United States. It was as a result of this disclosure that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's governors decided to appoint a committee and take action. I believe they have now referred it to a subcommittee. I am sorry that they have not taken definite action and ruled these people off the air. We have enough to contend with in this country without having that insidious nazi propaganda going over the airways of Canada, and I hope that the minister will decide to take definite action in this matter. It is a serious thing. Propaganda of this kind can do a great deal of harm to our war effort.

There is no one who would at any time question the courage of the men in our army, our air force, and our navy. The fact that they are in the service is sufficient evidence of their courage. But we must have courage in other places in this country. We must have courage in this house. We must have courage in this government,—courage to do the things which are necessary to the war effort, courage to pass such laws as are necessary to give the greatest help we can to the mother country in this hour of extreme peril. I feel that sometimes we are inclined to soft-pedal some of our responsibilities because of some political effect that action might have on portions of our population. That thing must not be. Here in this house, and particularly with the ministers, there must be courage to face these issues as we have never faced issues before.

I have heard during this debate rather alarming things from some hon. members. Two or three, for example, have referred to an undergrading of wheat going to the elevators in western Canada. For many years I have heard these charges; I do not know whether they are true or not, but statements to this effect have been made on the floor of the house. It is a serious matter. Goodness knows the farmer gets little enough for the products he raises. If undergrading is going on, the government should have the courage to have it stopped and to see to it that wherever cases of the kind can be traced, farmers are reimbursed for anything out of which they have been cheated.

The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling) made the statement yesterday that many of the British Columbia Doukhobors have not registered, that they defy our laws. There can be no neutrality in Canada in regard to the war. We are either for our war effort or against it. If there are in any community in this country people who are not prepared to play their part, this government and the authorities must take action against them. Any man in my district who failed to register—and there have been a few—has been taken into court and fined, or, if he cannot pay the fine, he must go to gaol. They tell me that some of these people would be glad to go to gaol. Well, perhaps gaol is too good for them. If so, they should be put in an internment camp and made to work. At any rate, they should be compelled to live up to the laws of Canada. These are some of the things in which we must show courage, particularly at a time such as this.

The other day I was amazed when the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) raised a question with reference to the men who had been arrested at the Chrysler plant and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) stated that it was under an order in council passed by the government that this plant had been declared a protected area. The hon. member for Cape Breton South inquired whether the Department of Justice had ordered the arrest of these strikers, and the reply of the Minister of Labour was:

> My information is that the arrests were made by local and provincial police, under the instructions, not of the dominion government but of the Attorney General of Ontario.

These men were arrested because of the violation of a law passed by this House of Commons. The police officers, whether they be municipal, provincial or federal, are sworn to uphold the law. This law is our responsibility; it was passed by the government of the day. It was under this law that these men were arrested. Let us, then, take responsibility for it. Let us show that we have the courage to stand by the things which we believe are necessary in our war effort.

I have been particularly pleased during this session to listen to the tolerant speeches which have been made. Only on one or two occasions have there been speeches that savoured perhaps of politics. I do wish however to associate myself with the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) in his mild, yet, I think, deserved criticism of the government or of some members of the government who, when we offer certain criticisms of the government, are inclined to yell something across the floor of the house to the effect that we are sabotaging the war effort. I realize it only comes from two or three sources, but it is rather unkind, because there is not a member of this house who is not definitely behind the government in everything it is willing to do in this war effort.

I wish to refer for a moment to one-third of the speech made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). I have a very high regard for the Minister of Agriculture. No one loves a political battle more than I do; no one will fight any political battle harder than I will; and I like to hear the Minister of Agriculture, at other times than the present at any rate, when he is making very strong fighting speeches. I say, I like to hear him, and therefore often, when we have dented the armour of the government, I have watched private members turn their faces pleadingly to the Minister of Agriculture, waiting for the moment when he will get up and rescue the government from the criticisms of the opposition.

The Minister of Agriculture referred to the election of March 26 and rather prided himself on winning his riding and on the fact that the government had come back with such a large majority. Perhaps we are all willing to admit that at that time the war efforts of this government were considerably beclouded—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Were there any?

Mr. HOMUTH: Of course, what there were. But later on in the following session a certain truth came out that more or less substantiated the stand we had taken. The people of the country are not interested in political speeches; they do not want political speeches. We are at war. Let us therefore fight our political battles when the proper time comes, but while we are at war, let us show that tolerance that has been so prevalent throughout this session, and let everyone do his utmost to further our war effort.

There are rumours. We all hear rumours, rumours that are sometimes disturbing, and in my opinion if the government were a little more frank with the people many of these rumours would disappear. Greater frankness will dispel these rumours, and that is one thing we must make sure of. I have listened carefully to the minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power), the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) and the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). One of the unfortunate things I find—and it is more prevalent in some departments of government—is that we still have our peace-time set-up, and our peace-time set-up is not good enough. Some of these men cannot adapt themselves to the war-time tempo and when problems arise which the minister feels perhaps are too much for him to handle he creates another board. Board after board has been set up in Canada and I doubt whether a member of the cabinet can get up and tell us how many boards there are operating in the city of Ottawa and throughout the country. The question is: Are these boards coordinating their efforts, and are they doing the job they are intended to do? How many of these boards are clashing with each other in the work they have to carry out?

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) the other day told us of the great need for money. We all agree with him. There is an old saying that if you take care of the pennies the pounds will take care of themselves. We have wasted a lot of money in this war effort, and I say this not in any spirit of criticism. What I have to say to-day is said entirely because I wish to assist in every way I can and to help the government in its war effort. But we have wasted a lot of money because we have retained for many months the peace-time set-up which was disastrous to the work we had to do in preparing for this war. At the beginning of the war—and to some extent this is still taking place—goods manufactured hundreds of miles from Ottawa were shipped into Ottawa for inspection and shipped back to the very town or city from which they came, to be distributed to the troops. I have seen cloth from a mill hundreds of miles from this city sent here for inspection and shipped back to within two blocks of the mill to be made into overcoats. It was the peace-time set-up that was the cause of the waste of so much money. I say to the government that if they would look into many of these smaller things they could save far more money than they are getting in from their war savings stamps.

I have seen ten trucks waiting at the freight shed to take a load a distance of half a mile, and they took two loads in a day when two trucks could have taken ten loads in the day. These are things for practical men to deal with, men who have the ability to organize, and they could be the means of great savings to this government.

The people are being taxed as they were never taxed before, and what they are being taxed to-day will be almost nothing in comparison with what they will have to pay in the future. They are not complaining, and they are not going to complain, but they do ask whether the government is getting a dollar of value for every dollar spent. In so many areas they have seen such waste of money that they become a little suspicious of our war effort.

The Minister of National Defence spoke of the building of barracks. I have no hesitation in saying that was one of the most extravagant jobs ever carried on in this country. By letting the contracts to local contractors, who would have bid on them and put them up in just as quick time, there would have been a saving of hundreds of thousands of dollars. But the army went ahead and built these things and the carelessness and waste of money and time was enormous. I say to the government that this peace-time organization is no good. Get the best men you can get, particularly practical men, men who know something about these jobs, not men who have sat behind mahogany desks in offices but superintendents of plants, builders and men who can be very useful to this government and are only too anxious to be so.

For the first time in the history of this country, I suppose, we had a civilian as master of the ordnance. On several occasions I went to see him with certain suggestions which I thought would save the government money and also save foreign exchange. I never knew a man in a government office more responsive to suggestions than Mr. Chester was. Sometimes within a week the new order went out and the change was made, meaning an immense saving to the government. Now I understand Mr. Chester is leaving, and I think a newspaper man is coming to take his place. Mr. Chester is a practical man; I am sorry he is going. I believe that those of us who have had associations with him, who know of his ability and what he was able to accomplish, are entitled to an explanation from the Minister of National Defence as to why that man is leaving the service of the country.

Now for a moment I should like to deal with finance, and particularly with the last war loan. I was very much interested in what the Minister of Finance said the other day. But I do believe, as my leader and other members of this house believe, that the last war loan was not the success it ought to have been, in spite of the fact that we may have received thirty or forty million dollars more than we asked for. We did not get the money from the sources to which we were appealing. I believe that right in the middle of it the government changed its mind as to its policy in raising money. Prior to the war loan being advertised prominent men from one end of this country to the other received a telegram from this government asking if they would cooperate and organize for the purpose of selling the war loan. I venture to say that in every instance the government got a reply expressing every willingness to cooperate, just as men were willing to cooperate in the last war. But that was the last these men ever heard of it. They were never called into conference; they were never asked to get together and organize. Apparently after sending out the wires the government decided to sell the war loan through the brokerage houses. So that in every village and town and city in this country every insurance agent, anyone at all who knew a brokerage house, could write in and ask for the privilege of selling the bonds. There was no enthusiasm stirred up; there was no local committee, nothing done to encourage the people, particularly those with the smaller savings in the banks, to participate in this loan.

I hope that when subscriptions to the next war loan are being asked from the people of this country the government will go back to the system we had in the last war, when prominent men throughout the country held public meetings, stirred up enthusiasm, brought home to the people their responsibility to subscribe; also that it will be in such denominations that people can buy $50 and $100 worth, as they did in the last war, and that they shall be able to get them through the offices of the industries with which they work.

An hon. MEMBER: And get six per cent.

Mr. HOMUTH: My hon. friend says six per cent. I am sick and tired of hearing about the percentage being paid on the war loan. I have enough confidence in the people of this country to feel sure that if they have to lend their money for nothing they will do it, if only we give them the leadership.

Another suggestion I want to make to the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National War Services is in respect to our Red Cross and allied services. In our town—I think we were the first town in the country to do it—we put on a joint drive last year. We assured the people of our municipality that they would be asked only once in the year to subscribe to these various war services. We linked the Red Cross, the Salvation Army, the Knights of Columbus, the Y.M.C.A. and local requirements all together. Our people, knowing that they were not going to be asked to subscribe to some different service every two or three months, contributed exceptionally well, oversubscribed what we asked for, and thus we were able to take care of our allotment for all these various services. The government should give leadership in seeing that that same thing is done throughout this whole country. It has worked exceptionally well, and many municipalities are taking it up. Why the Red Cross object to it I do not know, but I understand there is an objection. It has worked well, and people subscribed freely; whereas if you make four or five appeals in a year they get tired of the continuous pleading for money. I suggest that the government give leadership in this matter.

I thought perhaps this afternoon the Minister of Labour would make some reference to what was said by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in his broadcast a week ago last Sunday night. I thought perhaps the Minister of Munitions and Supply would make some reference to it. Apparently this famous master mind from Saskatchewan, who spent most of his life on a farm or teaching school, tells his fellow ministers, the heads of industry in this country and the great mass of industrial workers just what should and can be done so far as trained industrial workers are concerned. He went to England; I believe he was away for six weeks. So far as he could he settled all problems with regard to wheat, pork, cheese and fruits. He did all those jobs; he did a little travelling round the country; he inspected the ruins; I believe he had an audience with his majesty. Undoubtedly he was invited out for luncheon and dinner on various occasions. I do not know whether he slept at all, but certainly when he returned he gave us to understand that in the course of the time that elapsed between leaving here and returning, he had done all these things and, in addition, had become an expert on industry. He told us that industry in this dominion needed to have only five per cent of its employees skilled workmen.

Mr. McCANN: He did not say that.

Mr. HOMUTH: Yes, he did.

Mr. McCANN: No; that was in Great Britain.

Mr. HOMUTH: He said that was all we needed here, or in any event that certainly was the inference. Of course he says things he does not mean; in fact, sometimes I think he does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. CLEAVER: He is not alone in that.

Mr. HOMUTH: The lone voice from Halton is heard again. I do say, however, that the statement the minister made was serious, and both industry and labour are wondering whether the remarks of the Minister of Agriculture represent the considered ideas of the government of the day. Men who have spent three, four or five years as apprentices; men and women who have spent two or three years learning, and then gone on for many more years before becoming absolutely efficient in their jobs, want to know if that is the attitude of the government. Is that what the government thinks of skilled labour in this country?

The Minister of Labour himself comes from a district in which there are industries employing highly skilled men, doing some of the finest work; industries in which nearly every employee is highly skilled. The Minister of Labour knows the statement of the Minister of Agriculture is not correct. Therefore I feel that before this debate is over, some member of the cabinet ought to clear the air. If the Minister of Agriculture made that statement on his own responsibility, without giving the matter adequate consideration, let him admit it. Everyone makes mistakes; we are all bound to make them, but this seems to me rather a serious mistake. I come from a highly industrialized county, and I can say that the heads of our industries have been only too willing to cooperate in every way with the Department of National War Services, and have been willing to do everything possible in order to permit their men to take military training. They feel, however, that a policy or idea such as this will be disastrous to our industrial set-up and to the tempo of industrial life in Canada.

For a moment I should like to deal with a particular activity in my own riding. I was interested in what the Minister of Labour said about the training of youth. I do not think in this country there is a youth training scheme that has done as good work as is being done at the Galt aircraft school. Here I should like to pay a tribute to the minister of labour of Ontario, who is doing a wonderful job there. As a result of his practical knowledge of industry and labour, and of this sort of work, he has built up at Galt a school which has turned out about 1,100 aircraft workers now employed in the aircraft factories of this dominion, as well as about 1,000 young men who have taken their places in the air force. That school started in September with 200 men. The next class numbered 300; these were for the air force only. The third class numbered 613. Every time they have been asked by the government to double the number of students they have done so, and I believe the government might ask them once more to double their number. I believe they are able to do so; I think they have the necessary instructors with which to carry on. I would suggest that the number of students be greatly increased, because this is one of the sources from which we are obtaining not only our air mechanics but also the skilled workers for the various aeroplane factories in Canada.

I am told by industrialists who have taken these boys into their plants that within three months these boys are as far advanced in machine-shop practice as an ordinary boy taking three years of instruction in a technical school. That of course is because of the intense training these boys receive. I feel that a few more of these schools throughout the country would do a great deal towards looking after the boys who are coming out of school who are too young for the army but who may be able to supply the great demand for skilled labour that is gradually becoming felt.

There is however one disquieting rumour which I have heard on more than one occasion. It is that the government has been considering the erection of a factory for the purpose of training these students. I do not know whether or not that is true; I hope the minister will tell us. I hope it is not true, because we have throughout Canada hundreds of factory buildings that could be utilized for this purpose. I feel that perhaps in our war effort we are putting into bricks and mortar too many dollars that we ought to be putting into the things we require to fight this war. I travel across this country two or three times a year, and I know something of the various industrial centres. There are those who say that it does not matter how much money we spend in our war effort; that if we lose the war, our money will be gone anyway. Well, I say it is not so much a question of how much we spend but how we spend it. We are not going to lose the war; we are going to win it, but in whatever we do now let us have some sort of planned national economy. Let us make use of the vacant factories there are down in the maritimes, in Quebec, in Ontario and throughout western Canada. We have vast quantities of gas and coal in Alberta and in Saskatchewan, and we should make full use of all these things which are requisite to industrial production.

Instead of building up vast industries as we are doing—I am rather fearful of the millions and tens of millions which are being put into new factories—we should spread out this work. I understand that the capitalization of these industries is to be wiped out in a period of five years. We should attempt to decentralize industry; we should spread out this work through all the cities, towns and villages of this country. If that were done, we would be doing much to help our national economy when this war is over. Where there is a concentration of industry in a few centres we accentuate the housing difficulties. The first thing we know we shall be building shacks for the workers and their families to live in. If there is such a thing as war-time prosperity, how much better it would be to take this prosperity to all our cities, towns and villages. We could thus take advantage of housing and factory accommodation that is available and provide the farmer with a local market, which he does not get with the concentration of industry we have under the present set-up.

The minister should have given us some idea of how all these plans are working out and of just what arrangements were being made with regard to profits where an industry is already established and is being given millions of dollars with which to build additions. These are matters which we should watch very carefully. This house should be given some explanation of them, and that is why I had hoped the estimates would have been down before this. If we had this information it would not be necessary to interrupt the ministers when they are making their statements.

I appeal to the government to give hon. members and the people throughout the country an opportunity of serving in this war. When the government decided to hold a national registration, they came to the members of this house for help, and every member responded. They went home and did their utmost to see that the registration was carried out properly. Give us something to do, in connection with either a war loan or some other activity. There are no politics to-day. The only politics we have now is the winning of this war. When the war is won, then we can go back to the political battles we have had in the past.

We are spending $100,000,000 in this war compared with every $10,000,000 we spent in the last. This is a tremendous amount of money to be spending. Unfortunately in every country there are people who, regardless of its dire need, regardless of how freedom is being threatened, are prepared to take advantage of the times and become rich at the expense of their country. There are undoubtedly some such people in Canada, and we should be very careful in making these tremendous expenditures. I have always abhorred the word "scandal," and in my political career I have never resorted to its use or to personalities of any kind. Perhaps one of the worst things that could happen in our war effort would be to have a scandal develop. I ask the ministers to do everything possible so that, whatever expenditures are made, the Canadian people will feel assured that such expenditures are being made properly and that no opportunity is being given to those vultures who are so often ready to feed at a time like this.

Nothing could be more devastating to our war effort than to have something like that happen. I am a Conservative, I believe in Conservative policies, and when the time comes I am going to fight to put my party into power. But now we are Canadians; that is the only term we should know. If any hon. member should learn of anything at all suspicious, he should go to the minister concerned and tell him the story. Then, if there is anything to the rumour, the minister will have an opportunity to clean up things. Mistakes are bound to be made, but I think that hon. members should see to it that such matters are brought to the attention of the particular minister who is responsible. It should be done quietly. These things are bound to happen and we should be most careful. I say to the government that so long as they carry on and do everything they possibly can, I am behind them and will do everything I can to assist them in their war effort.

Mr. L. P. LIZOTTE (Kamouraska) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, in rising from my seat I recall having read somewhere in the Bible—a book which has no secrets for my reverend friend the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor)—that there is a time to speak and a time to remain silent. I fear that the hon. members of this house will tell me, now that the Christmas adjournment is approaching, that this is a time for me to remain silent rather than to speak. However, seeing in front of me and around me such examples of eloquent loquacity—especially my good friend the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot)—I cannot resist the pleasure of saying at least a few words during the present debate. Besides, as the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) has said, it is proper that, as the representative of a certain section of the population, a member of the House of Commons should give utterance to his views and those of his constituents. In keeping with my life-long habit, I shall be brief.

I cannot let this occasion go by without adding my congratulations to those which have been so justly offered to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Both hon. members represent a minority group in their respective provinces. Both do so with distinction. I particularly congratulate my excellent friend the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras), whose truly French name is frequently encountered in the province of Quebec, on the good French accent he has retained in the English-speaking province where he lives.

During the last session, when I was a newcomer, I was somewhat struck by the morbid irritability which prevailed in this house, especially on the opposition benches. I wondered whether our parliament was always the seat of a war of nerves. I am ready to believe that the tragic events then occurring in Europe with lightning speed were to a certain extent the cause of this nervousness. Those who did not share the government's views, the members of that party which at the recently held general elections had been weighed by the people and found wanting, were loud in their cries that our war effort was worthless, that the defence of the country was poorly prepared, that the government was slumbering instead of rushing to arms and sending Canadians to do battle—they knew not where, but, anyhow, across the seas, even if England did not need them.

I was glad to see that the government was not letting itself be impressed by this rash criticism. Indeed, amid those loud cries and passionate appeals, those who presided over the destinies of the country continued to work calmly and silently, as is proper in war time, devoting all their energy to the task of ensuring the security of the Canadian people.

Today, to the utter amazement of our opponents, who can hardly credit their eyes or their ears, we are witnesses of the prodigious, indeed the miraculous effort accomplished by the government in order to provide our country with the necessary armour to fight victoriously on land, on sea and in the air, and to help Great Britain to win this war which is the war of all those who cherish their traditions, their civil and political liberties and their physical and moral existence.

I listened with deep attention to the speeches recently delivered by the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Gardiner), the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power), the Minister of National Defence for Naval Affairs (Mr. Macdonald), the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), and, to-day, to the speech of the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty). They have given us detailed statements—as detailed as is possible in time of war—of the prodigious efforts put forth and the magnificent results obtained. I was satisfied and deeply impressed.

I then read their statements as recorded in Hansard, and as all those who have taken the trouble to do so, I became convinced that they had, in less than one year, written glorious pages which more advanced countries would be proud to have written in several years.

The government having put forth an effort greater, in my opinion, than our means justify, those who publicly proclaim that we have not done enough must be utterly lacking in responsibility and generosity. Our prodigious effort will continue, and glorious pages will still be written by those to whom the Canadian people have entrusted the preservation of their security, their democratic principles and their liberty.

Mr. Speaker, a question frequently brought up is that of national unity. It has been broached on many occasions in recent months and again during this session. We must never cease thinking of it. So far, in spite of our prodigious effort, in spite of the enormous sacrifices laid on the Canadian people, the national unity which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) have striven so hard to build up has been preserved. May the government ever continue to direct its policy, to steer its course, towards that goal, that promised land of the Canadian ideal—national unity. May the government ignore threats and intimidation and carefully refrain in its war effort from moves—those who hear me and will read my speech will understand what I mean—from moves capable of destroying in a single day the work of many years and the national unity which the leader of the party at present in charge of the affairs of the country has, in cooperation with the recognized leader of the province of Quebec, spent his life in building up.

The mobilization act was voted by the representatives of the province of Quebec as by those of the other provinces. We all understand, in Quebec as in the other provinces, that it is our bounden duty to defend our mothers, our wives, our children, our homes and our land. Therefore, the people of Quebec, just as the people of the other provinces, have agreed willingly and even enthusiastically to lend their sons for military training for the defence of Canadian territory. They will likewise agree to give them to the country when the country will be in danger. But the people of Quebec, who are attached to their land, object to all uncalled-for zeal likely to prove unnecessarily harmful, especially to the farming class, the class which interests me most, since my constituents are mostly farmers. There is some talk of amending the regulations made under the mobilization act with a view to extending the training period from one month to four months. The members of the house will not be called upon to deal with this question, but I humbly urge upon the government to take steps to see that agriculture is not harmed and that the farmers and farmers' sons are not taken from the land where their services are required. It has been suggested that the farmers would be trained during what is called the slack season. But, Mr. Speaker, there is no such thing as a slack season of four months in farming. And should the farms be deprived of the labour required to operate them, confusion will set in and agriculture will be seriously inconvenienced.

I have sufficient confidence in my leaders and in the government which I have always supported and will continue to support to know that they will carefully consider this problem and see that this difficulty does not arise.

I fully agree with the view expressed by the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McDiarmid) on Tuesday last in the following words:

> In my opinion food was the chief factor in the winning of the last war, and lack of food was the cause of the collapse of Germany. The food blockade of enemy countries and the production of food in the allied countries constituted one of the chief means of winning the last war, and we are all of the opinion that the same means will be responsible for victory in this war.

I am sure, therefore, that the government will not take amiss the humble suggestion of the humblest of representatives of a rural constituency. I am confident that the necessary measures will be taken to avoid harming the agricultural class and the country's food production.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, the people of Quebec have insisted, still insist and shall ever insist that the sacrifices they have accepted to make must be voluntary and must remain voluntary. Besides, this attitude is general throughout all the provinces of the dominion. On that condition and that condition alone will the old province of Quebec continue to give its men to the country for the defence of Canada and voluntarily send many of its sons for service overseas, for it is a fundamental tenet of our democratic belief that freedom should be defended by free men and that it is free men who can best defend the empire which protects us and our own country, Canada, whose interests we wish to safeguard first and above all.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, owing to the fact that I was qualifying at Dundurn military camp for a commission in the Canadian Army, it was not possible for me to hear the speeches made by the mover and the seconder of the address. I have, however, read their speeches, and I want to offer to both those gentlemen my congratulations upon launching this debate on so high a plane.

My remarks will naturally divide themselves into two main themes: first, some of the problems inherent in our war effort; and, second, the need of an agricultural programme to prevent the complete economic collapse of western Canada.

The first and most pressing matter with reference to our war effort is the lamentable shortage of essential equipment for the fighting services. No useful purpose can be served at this time by dwelling unnecessarily upon some of that lack, nor by drawing a picture which can serve only to give comfort to the enemy. Nevertheless I, with every other member of this house, have a responsibility to the men who are in the fighting services. I had the privilege for several weeks of living with some of the men who are training for the purpose of fighting in defence of freedom. I cannot speak too highly of the instructional personnel or of the morale of the young men who are being trained. But I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that excellent instructors and enthusiastic youth are not enough when men are asked to drill with obsolete Springfield rifles which cannot even be fired, when artillerymen are working with imitation guns hewn out of trees, and when many of these units have had their only contact with modern equipment consist of fleeting glimpses of a Bren gun being whisked from unit to unit and from camp to camp.

As I pointed out to the house last year, this is a delicate subject, both for the members of the opposition and for the administration. There are questions which we cannot ask in this house without arousing fears and suspicions, and, believe me, sir, that is the last thing I want to do. At the same time we dare not refrain from asking certain questions, lest we be derelict in our duty to the men whose lives may be jeopardized through lack of that equipment. That is why I asked the government last year to consider the appointment of a committee of the house to which confidential information could be given from time to time regarding the progress made in securing equipment very much as was done in Great Britain yesterday, where a secret session of parliament was held in order to give information about the organization of the army. The government has not seen fit to comply with that request. We have, therefore, no alternative than to raise these matters on the floor of this house.

To say the very least, the supplying of war equipment has been far from satisfactory. We ought to be told, for instance, why it is that we are not in production of the Lee-Enfield rifle in the Dominion of Canada. We are told that we shall be in production in 1941—which means that by the time we have been at war for a year and a half or two years we shall be producing that most elementary of all weapons, the infantry rifle.

This house has a right to know when we shall be in production of anti-tank guns. I am told by those who are in a position to know, that the anti-tank rifles with which Canadian troops are now being trained are about as effective as pea-shooters and as obsolete as the bow and arrow. When do we expect to be producing an effective anti-tank gun, and in what quantity?

We should be told what steps are being taken by the government to produce Bren light machine guns in other plants than the John Inglis factory—either in other private plants, or in government arsenals, as the British are doing in the Woolwich arsenal. From time to time glowing reports have been given to the effect that the production of the Bren machine gun was far ahead of schedule. But until recently it has been almost impossible to get figures. The other day the minister gave them to the press, but not to the house. The statement is that we are to have 1,750 light Bren machine guns by next March. May I remind the house that the contract which was drawn up with the John Inglis plant in 1937 called for 1,000 light machine guns by the 1st of April, 1941. But the government's announcement means that by next March we shall be 750 guns ahead of a peacetime schedule which was drawn up four years before.

I am not blaming the John Inglis plant. If we take into consideration the fact that they started from nothing, they have probably gone into production as quickly as possible. But I would suggest that the fact that by next March we are going to be able to equip fewer than thirty-five infantry battalions, fewer than 35,000 men, when we have 150,000 men in training in Canada—and that is on the basis of only one light machine gun to a section—indicates a sorry example of muddling and inefficiency. The house has a right to know whether the government contemplates putting other firms or some of the other government arsenals into the production of the Bren machine gun.

The committee which I suggested should be set up ought to be given information about the production of 25-pounders. So far, I understand, we are not producing any. Above all, we have a right to know something about the real facts as to aircraft production in Canada. Some of the glowing statements issued to the press about the number of aeroplanes being produced each month omit to tell the public that, of course, these are planes without engines. There is a growing feeling among men who are acquainted with the aircraft industry that something is seriously wrong. I am told by experienced pilots that the Boeing aeroplane is one of the four best aircraft in the world. If that is true, why is the Boeing aeroplane factory in Vancouver being allowed practically to close its doors? I came down in the train with aircraft mechanics let out of the Boeing plant because the plant officials said they could not get sufficient raw materials and, therefore, must curtail production. Surely there is something wrong there. Further, may I refer the house to the Malton plant near Toronto owned by the National Steel Car Corporation. This is said to be one of the best equipped plants in the country. The Canadian government's original educational contract was for twenty-eight Lysander planes. This plane, it is said, is regarded by authorities today as being the best army cooperation plane produced, and the need for mass production of these planes is most urgent. As I understand it, the educational contract called for the first planes to be completed and delivered by November, 1939, but up to December, 1939, only twenty-four of the twenty-eight had been completed for delivery, and the last four were not finished until March, 1940. Since January, 1940, three contracts for Lysander planes have been begun, but prior to October 5 not one Lysander plane under the new contracts had been completed for delivery from the Malton shop.

Hon. members have a right to know what is wrong. Men who have worked in that plant are enthusiastic about its equipment, but in the last few months at least a dozen key men have quit their jobs, among these men being the plant manager, the chief plant superintendent, the chief plant inspector, the erection and shop foreman, the machine-shop foreman and the plant's test pilot. The estimate given to me is that the employee turn-over at Malton during the past year has been from 75 to 90 per cent, and that more than 900 men have quit their jobs in the plant during the past six months.

I have a great deal more information about that plant, but I refer to it now merely to point out that there ought to be some representative body of this house to whom such information could be given and before whom such matters could be discussed. Let me tell the government now that the people of Canada are in no mood to stand for bungling and inefficiency, and that we in this house have a responsibility to see to it that the men who are going to risk their lives in defence of democracy are getting the very best equipment that human ingenuity and skill can produce.

Mr. CHURCH: And proper leave at Christmas.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Last year I suggested to the house and to the government that the public accounts committee or some similar body representative of all parties in the house ought to be allowed to examine war contracts. This has not been done. It is true that the Department of Munitions and Supply have issued long lists of contracts, but they have neither meaning nor value, because they are not classified and do not give the amounts obtained or the unit prices. It is of little value to any member to know that the government has spent half a million dollars in buying boots unless we know what the boots cost per pair and the basis upon which the contract was let. After the experience of the last war, it is only natural that the Canadian people should be suspicious on the question of war profiteering; and the government, for its own sake and for the sake of the morale of the public, ought to bend over backwards in handling this matter.

Something has already been said with reference to sessional paper No. 121 tabled in this house on November 20. There are two significant facts about it. One is that, so it is said, it is not considered in the public interest to give unit prices on an order of 26,000 garbage cans ordered by the Department of Munitions and Supply earlier in the year. That is quite a number of garbage cans and they ought to hold a great deal of garbage. Since then, we have been given the unit prices, but I would call attention to the explanation of the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). He says that the reason why they are reluctant to give unit prices is that competitors will see what the figures are. Well, do we not want competitive bidding? Do we not want to buy articles at the lowest prices at which they can be purchased on the market? Why should the house not be given unit prices on any of these commodities except with regard to those of secret design? The second and more significant fact is that, of the 26,000 cans ordered, 20,950 were ordered from General Steel Wares Limited—four-fifths of the order—and the assistant general manager of Steel Wares Limited is or was Mr. G. K. Sheils, deputy minister of the Department of Munitions and Supply.

I suggest that this sort of thing does not make for confidence and enthusiasm on the part of the Canadian public, who have been bled so often in days gone by. Therefore, at the risk of wearying the government, I will repeat the request I made last year: first, that the government consider setting up a committee to receive information with regard to the success that we are having in producing war material; and, second, that the public accounts committee or some other committee be allowed to examine war contracts.

I know the government does not like criticisms of this sort and is inclined to view them as a personal reflection. No such reflection is intended. I would remind the house that a year ago in the French chamber of deputies similar criticisms were met with indignant denials and soothing assurances that all was well. We know now that all was not well. A similar set of conditions obtained in Great Britain, where for years Mr. Winston Churchill was a voice crying in the wilderness against mismanagement and incompetence; but his criticisms were labelled unpatriotic and subversive, and were taken by some cabinet ministers as a reflection upon their personal integrity rather than as an indication of their unfitness for the positions they held. That attitude should not prevail here.

If all is well in our war effort, then the government should not hesitate for a moment to make the facts available, if not to the house at least to a committee of the house. And if all is not well, then we had better find it out now rather than wait until our house lies in ruins about us. In France and the United Kingdom it took a series of reverses to bring the people to their senses. Surely in this country we can learn by the experience of others and not wait until catastrophe jolts us out of our complacency. If there is a bottleneck somewhere; if lack of certain essential equipment is due to the organization of the Department of Munitions and Supply, then that department ought to be overhauled and overhauled immediately, because the Canadian people will hold this government and every member of this house responsible if they discover that incompetence, bungling or partisanship has caused us to do less than we ought to be doing in the prosecution of the war.

In dealing with Canada's war effort I wish to add my voice to those of others who have asked the government to give free transportation to members of the Canadian active service force. I hope the statement of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) will not be taken as final. Coming down on the train, I met a young man from Nanaimo, British Columbia, who for over a year has been a member of a forestry corps which is now stationed at Valcartier, Quebec. He has been away from home for a year. He finally got his furlough, but found that, to go home, it would cost him about $100 for travelling and incidentals. Only the fact that some friends sent him the money made it possible for him to go home and see his wife and family.

The unit in which I am especially interested is the first battalion of the South Saskatchewan regiment which is now stationed in Toronto. I have over a score of letters from men in that unit and units similarly situated telling me there is being circulated among the men a list asking whether they want to go home for Christmas or New Year's, and the answer is invariably the same: "It does not make any difference because we cannot afford to go home anyway." It would cost these men at least $35 to $50 for transportation, and on a soldier's pay, particularly if he is married, he cannot possibly raise that money.

I would remind the house that some of these men will be going overseas shortly, and the forty-eight hours' embarkation leave is not enough to allow them to go home; thus for many of them this Christmas or New Year's leave will be the last opportunity they will have of being reunited with their families prior to crossing the ocean and facing all the dangers of war. Surely the government which is finding money for so many other things can see to it that these men are able to go home and spend what for some of them may be their last Christmas with their loved ones round the family hearth.

I wish now to deal with a problem which is the very opposite of that of the fighting forces. I refer to individuals across this country who are known as conscientious objectors. I have never been a pacifist. As hon. members know, ever since coming to this house in 1936 I have advocated economic, and, if needs be, military sanctions against aggressor nations. I have never been a pacifist because I believe that, in the Christian concept of society, "those who are strong ought to bear the burdens of the weak", and that those who have the strength and the will are responsible for defending the helpless and the weak from injustice and oppression. For that reason I have never been able to accept the pacifist philosophy.

But while I do not agree with the pacifists I am prepared to fight to the death for a man's right to be a pacifist. The right of conscience is as old as Christianity, which has taught through the centuries that we must render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and unto God the things that are God's. Christianity has taught that the individual has a right to determine where his duty to Caesar ends and his duty to God begins. Some of us in this house are descendants of the Scottish covenanters, of whom it was said:

> They counted their faith so grand a thing
> They scorned to yield it to a king.

The reason why we are opposing Hitler to-day is that he has denied that right of conscience, and has said that the will of the state is supreme over the will of the individual. We do not believe that. But we cannot defeat Hitler by emulating Hitler.

In the regulations set out under the National War Services Act there is a provision for conscientious objectors. It is regulation 18, which reads:

> Conscientious Objectors
> 18. (1) Any man who, from the doctrines of his religion, is averse to bearing arms or undertaking combatant service, may apply for an order deferring or postponing his military training indefinitely, provided that it is established that such man conscientiously objects to the bearing of arms or the undertaking of combatant service and—

I draw the attention of hon. members to that word "and", which I think ought to be "or".

> —is prohibited from the bearing of arms or undertaking combatant service by the tenets and articles of faith in effect on the first day of September, 1939, of any organized religious denomination to which said man aforesaid, in good faith, belongs.

Mr. DUPUIS: May I ask the hon. member a question, to help the house to understand? Could he give a list of the denominations that are conscientious objectors?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I could, but I do not propose to take the time to do so.

Mr. DUPUIS: The house would perhaps allow the hon. member to do that.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I draw this to the attention of the house because in the city of Saskatoon a group of young men appeared before a government tribunal and were refused the right of exemption, not because they could not establish that they had conscientious objections to bearing arms, but because some of them did not belong to a church which prohibits the bearing of arms. Most of them belonged to the United church, I think one to the Anglican church.

I am asking the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Gardiner) to consider in this matter three things: first, that regulation 18 should be amended to give the individual the right of exemption because of his conscientious scruples, irrespective of the stand of any church to which he might or might not belong; second, that the minister should consider the advisability of giving to divinity students studying for the Protestant ministry the same right of exemption that may be given to those in any other religious order; and, third, that a list of alternative non-combatant services be set out and that training be given along these lines for those who have conscientious objection to the bearing of arms, because I do not believe that in this hour of crisis any man has a right to exemption from service, but I do believe that he has a right to determine what service he can conscientiously perform.

I turn now to the defence of Canada regulations, as having an important part in our war effort. I recognize, as must every hon. member, the need for taking strict measures against espionage and sabotage if we are to prevent our country from being undermined. At the same time I must insist, as have other hon. members, that these regulations shall not be used to repress freedom of speech or of the press or to interfere with workers or farmers who are seeking to organize with a view to bettering their economic standard of living. I am in accordance with the suggestions of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) and the views of the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen).

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask a question? Has he given any consideration to the question of the entire suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, so far as internees are concerned, under the defence of Canada regulations? That is very important.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): As the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) will perhaps remember, in the discussion last year of the defence of Canada regulations, when the committee was being set up to study them, we objected to that right being taken from internees. We contend that it is so easy in times like these when we are all naturally susceptible to some hysteria, to let our fears of fifth columnists become a screen behind which we allow reactionary forces to destroy some of the very things for which we profess to be fighting.

I have a concrete example that I wish to place before the house. I have a brief here from the legal counsel who was concerned with this case and who, I know, would be glad to place this material personally before a committee of the house.

A short time ago relief recipients working for the city of Regina went on strike. Consequently, the relief committee of the city council and some members of the council invited a delegation of three from the relief recipients to interview them at the city hall. At that meeting there were none present except the delegation of three, the relief committee of the Regina city council and the officials of the provincial government interested in relief matters. Therefore there was really no one there except those definitely interested in the submissions to be made by the delegation from the relief recipients.

The three men submitted their case, the first two members of the delegation putting forth their claims for wages and work, and the third member, Mr. Florian Stephan, drawing particularly to the attention of the committee how the relief recipients felt about the relief situation. As soon as that meeting was over, two members of the Regina city council went to the police station and laid a charge against Stephan under the defence of Canada regulations, more particularly under that section which deals with the making of inflammatory statements with a view to causing disaffection towards his majesty. No summons was issued, but this man was arrested and thrown into gaol.

The only evidence put forth by the crown at the trial was that of a very third-rate stenographer who took notes of the speech. She admitted that she did not get down correctly the statements made, and that she had not had a great deal of experience as a stenographer. Mr. Hark MacPherson, chairman of the relief committee, admitted on the stand that there had been the friendliest atmosphere possible at the meeting and that he saw nothing in the speech that would alarm or disturb him. Other witnesses gave evidence to the same effect. The members of the relief recipients' delegation swore on the stand that the speech given by Stephan was quite different from the copy under which he was charged. I have a copy here of what he is alleged to have said; and in spite of the fact that the witnesses declared that it did not represent a fair report of his statement, personally I can see nothing wrong with it.

Mr. DUPUIS: Were there any other witnesses to the contrary at the inquiry?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Not to my knowledge. I should like to take this opportunity of reading this statement to the house It is a little lengthy, but I think it necessary to read it in order to state the case fairly. This is taken from the evidence; it is a certified copy. Mr. Stephan is alleged to have said:

> The only thing I wish to state, and I want you people to take this seriously. These people who walk off these jobs did not do it for fun, and do not underestimate these people. It is a serious matter to them. They have suffered to an extent where continuance was unbearable. I know, and everybody knows, that since this war we have been pinched, and millions made by certain people in the war. Therefore, there is an attitude among those people. These people have nothing but suffering, and they are prepared to suffer much more in order to get the elementary basis of living, and they are not getting it, and I can say that they are willing to suffer much more in order to gain. They will insist upon this. They were free once. In plain words, they are fed up by being demanded by rules and regulations, for when a man is earning his money, for God's sake give him that money and let him be free. That is the general opinion of the people, and they believe they earn everything and get nothing for it. There is a lot of sentiment and sympathy, in the way of donations of a department store already received. There are a number of grocers and stores who have shown favour, and feel that we have a just case. And the people who have suffered are willing to suffer more and knowing of the support of the average man and citizen in this city, they are prepared to continue and carry on. I do not wish this as a threat, but just realize the gravity of the situation and how they feel. They know you can use a strong arm, but I know they are absolutely sincere and I know that is their stand with no idea of threat and I sincerely hope some agreement can be made.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is that the complete statement?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That is the complete statement, as I have it from the counsel. For making that statement, a nominal fine of $10 and costs was imposed on Florian Stephan; a conviction has been registered against him, and he has been photographed and finger-printed like a common convict. Apparently his only crime was that he made an appeal to the relief committee of the Regina city council to prevent schisms and divisions among our people, pointing out that there was need of a better feeling between employer and labour, and that those who exploited the common people were doing far greater disservice to the state than the fifth columnists themselves. Surely it is indicative of the road along which we are travelling when a man whose only crime is seeking to get better conditions for himself and his fellow workers can be hauled into court, merely by some local body under the authority of the provincial attorney general, without any representation having been made to the Minister of Justice or the federal government. I would not like that in Germany, Mr. Speaker; I like it a great deal less when it happens in my own province. On behalf of our group I wish to say that we will continue to demand that these regulations be amended. We do not want to make it easier for the fifth columnists. If we had our way we would make it a great deal harder for the fifth columnists, but we desire to make sure that innocent people cannot be prevented by these regulations from exercising those prerogatives which, under democracy, belong to every citizen of the state.

Mr. DUPUIS: Is what the hon. gentleman read a transcription by the stenographer?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That is the transcript submitted to me together with the brief of the counsel.

Mr. DUPUIS: A transcript by the stenographer?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes, a transcript by the stenographer, submitted to the court as evidence.

I come now to the second part of my remarks, which have to do with agricultural policy. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if you would call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was asking the house to give consideration to a programme for western agriculture. Before continuing with my remarks, I should like to refer to a rather sneering reference which was made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to members of this group. He said that only one of us had ever earned his living on the farm. Surely the Minister of Agriculture is not going to pose here as a farmer who has turned politician. Those of us who come from Saskatchewan know perfectly well that he is really a politician turned farmer. As a matter of fact, the Minister of Agriculture began his public career as a school-teacher. It was only when he had entered the Saskatchewan legislature that he took up farming, which he has used ever since as a shield for his other activities.

[Mr. T. C. Douglas.]

Mr. TRIPP: Was he not a farmer before he was a politician?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Not to my knowledge, except that as a boy he probably lived on the farm. I should like, however, to tell the minister that there is no disgrace in not having lived on the farm. In my opinion, the only disgrace is to have been elected by farmers and then, after coming to Ottawa, to have turned round and sold them out, as they have been sold out for the last twenty-five years.

The minister said that his agricultural policies were endorsed by the farmers in the last federal election. If there is any man in the government who ought not to mention the last federal election, it is the Minister of Agriculture. He represents Saskatchewan in the cabinet, and Saskatchewan was the only province where the government came out of the election with fewer seats than they had before. They went into the election with seventeen seats and came out with twelve. No small part of that reduction was due to the same minister and his policies. An examination of the results from the rural polls will show that the minister was ignominously defeated by the farmers of his own constituency. He was rescued by the vote of the town people and by the fact that a third candidate was kept in the field to split the vote. The minister says that he was elected by agriculture, but the fact is that he was elected in spite of agriculture. In my opinion, agriculture in this country is important enough to deserve the full time and exclusive attention of one minister of the crown. I do not think the Canadian farmer will take well to the fact that he is represented by a minister who is half-time Minister of Agriculture and half-time Minister of National War Services. From now on we shall have to call him "minister of half and half".

The problem of agriculture divides itself into two parts: First, there is the problem having to do with those who have no crops, and, second, there is the problem having to do with those who have crops.

Like most western members I was delighted when the Minister of Agriculture announced that 1940 would be declared an emergency year under section 3 of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. That is excellent, and I hope the government will accede to the application of the province of Saskatchewan to have a crop failure area declared under section 4 of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. There are in Saskatchewan somewhere between 170 and 200 townships which ought to qualify under that section of the act. If they do not qualify, then the people living therein will have to come under section 3, which means that they will receive 50 cents an acre less by way of bonus. But what is more important, they will receive no benefit from the $200 minimum which applies only if a crop failure area is declared.

I would remind the government that there are people who will not get the bonus, and there are others who will need some assistance until they do get the bonus, especially if it is as late as it was last year. In many districts the people cannot get relief because the municipalities in which they live cannot afford to pay their 20 per cent share. I still think there is need for an emergency relief fund to provide for people who cannot be taken care of by their local municipalities.

I should like to say a word about those people who have a crop. The acting leader of this group, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), has already outlined an agricultural programme and I intend merely to touch upon it. The first suggestion was that the government should make an interim payment on the 1939 wheat crop. Farmers of western Canada were led to believe that they would get this if the present government were elected. Second, I urge that consideration be given to paying an advance for wheat stored on the farms. I would remind the government that in the latter part of July and early in August of last year the groups in this corner and the official opposition advocated such an advance being made. Replying to us, the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) is reported as follows at page 2420 of Hansard:

> I say to them once more that the government are not unsympathetic to the suggestions they have advanced.

As reported on page 2421, I put the following question to and received the following answer from the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon):

> If the minister will get up and say that the farmer will get a cash advance on the grain which he is not able to sell to the wheat board I am prepared to stop debating the matter.
> Mr. MacKinnon (Edmonton West): All I can say is that the wheat committee of the cabinet is seeking a solution right along the line indicated by the hon. member for Weyburn.

We left here with the impression that something of that sort would be done. Nothing of that sort has been done, and no reason has been given why it could not be done. We heard the other day from the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the farmers had a reserve of some $100,000,000, but this wheat is not a reserve. This wheat represents frozen assets; it represents money which the farmer cannot get; it represents goods which he cannot sell. But in the meantime his debts are going unpaid.

Third, we advocated the closing of the Winnipeg grain exchange during the war. Fourth, we advocated the handling of all wheat through the wheat board and, fifth, the bringing down of an agricultural policy for the handling of the 1941 wheat crop. I am in agreement with the suggestion made by other hon. members in this and other opposition groups that it might be wise to have a higher initial payment on a limited quantity of wheat, and then lower the price to a fixed minimum, as the amount of wheat increased. In other words, allow the farmer to deliver his wheat at a graduated price. This would encourage the farmer to produce a certain quantity of wheat, but would not encourage him to overproduce.

I hope the government will give some consideration to this problem, because to ask the farmer to continue to produce wheat at a price which is admitted by the government itself as being inadequate is to ask western Canada to assume almost certain economic bankruptcy in the next few years.

I should like to close my remarks with just one more observation. If this war has done nothing else, it has given a new sense of dignity to the common man. Speaking over the radio the other day, J. B. Priestley said:

> It is not the British ruling class, which wobbled and whined for years until Herr Hitler was firmly established, that has aroused the admiration of the world, but the common people of Britain, who have come out of their sleep not only to defend such liberties as they already have but also to demand more liberty.

I think that is true. I think we have come more and more to appreciate the common man, the sailors who sail the sea and the people who work in our factories. We are beginning to realize the courage, the endurance and the high idealism of the man on the street. I think we all realize that this war cannot be won unless we have the support and enthusiasm of the common people.

Mr. CHURCH: How are we going to get that when the government refuses to give Christmas leave to the soldiers?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am very much in sympathy with my hon. friend's recommendation for free transportation for the soldiers. I do not think the government could do anything which would go further toward raising the morale of the personnel of our fighting services than to carry out the recommendation of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). In the winning of this war morale is one of the all-important factors, and that morale can best be maintained by dealing with the very things I have mentioned—fair prices for the farmer, better working conditions for the common people, the rights of labour to organization and collective bargaining.

These are difficult days through which we are passing. I remember two years ago listening to a professor friend of mine in the city of Chicago who had spent some time with Doctor Charles Beard, the great American historian who wrote the "Rise of American Civilization." One night my friend said that he and another professor walked home with Doctor Beard and one of them asked him, "How long would it take you, Doctor Beard, to write and tell the world what you have learned from a lifelong study of history?" "I could do it," said Doctor Beard after thinking for a minute, "in three years." He walked along for a while and then said, "I could do it in three months." A few moments later he said, "I could do it in three days," and finally he said, "I could do it in four sentences." He wrote those four sentences down, and I pass them on to this house.

The first one was: "Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad." I ask the house to think to-night of some megalomaniacs who have plunged the world into war and bloodshed and tears.

His second sentence was: "The mills of the gods grind slowly, yet they grind exceeding small." I ask this house to think how the forces of righteousness and justice have triumphed down through the ages in spite of opposition and betrayal.

His third sentence was: "The bee fertilizes the flower that it robs." I ask this house to think of China to-night and of all the other countries that are being despoiled and robbed and which, even yet, out of their hour of tragedy, may find the dawn of a better day.

His fourth sentence was this: "Sometimes, if it is dark enough, you can see the stars." I submit that out of the darkness through which this country, in common with other parts of the world, is passing, we may see the stars, and two of those stars are the dignity of man and the worth of human brotherhood.

Mr. D. KING HAZEN (St. John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has spoken of the earnestness of the Liberal government's war effort, and other ministers of the crown have told us of the rather slow growth of our armed forces, but no minister of the crown has told us whether the government has a policy of coordination of our war effort based on a strategic plan. I think the members of this house should be informed whether or not the government has a policy of coordination among the war departments responsible for the development of our army, navy and air force based on a strategic plan. If the government had no such policy, I would suggest that it give the matter its very earnest consideration.

We are now, I believe, in a position to take a clearer view of our military situation than we were when the house adjourned on August 7 last. The battle of Britain, or rather the first phase of that battle, has been fought and the attempt at invasion has for the time being been defeated. It must now be apparent to all of us that if this war is to be brought to a successful conclusion, it is of the utmost importance that we obtain superiority in the air. That is essential. Up to the present time I believe we have not obtained parity in the air, despite the wonderful achievements of our heroic air force.

The Right Hon. Winston Churchill, speaking in the British house on the 5th of this month, said that Great Britain was on the road to parity in the air. It will be noted that he did not say that we have achieved parity in the air. Then he added that superiority in the air was indispensable before we could gain victory. That being the situation, it seems to me that the government at the present time should direct its major effort to the development of our air force. The development of our air force should be given priority, and if any conflict of interest arises between the demands of our army, our navy and our air force, the government should insist that the requirements of the air force be given first consideration, that the department presided over by the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) be given the right of way. I came across an extract from an article published recently in the Winnipeg Free Press which has some bearing on this matter, and I propose to read it to the house. I quote:

> Is Canada doing the right thing in spending almost two dollars on her army for every dollar spent on the air force? The big army school of thought seems to dominate our military thinking. Is it wise that this should be so? Has the government thoroughly thought out all the implications of our present war plan in relation to the broad needs for victory? Under what circumstances do they envisage the need to have a bigger army than air force? Is it for the defence of our own shores? Or is it to contribute the needed infantry and mechanized divisions for the land attack on the continent of Europe envisaged by General Crerar, our chief of staff, in a recent address?

When all is said and done, our material resources and our man-power are not unlimited, and ever-increasing demands are being made upon them. If these demands should result in any conflict of interest between the different branches of our fighting forces, in my opinion the demands of the air force should have first consideration.

I am not unmindful of the importance of the services that have been and will be rendered by our army and navy, but I submit that at the present time our greatest effort should be directed to the development of our air force and that this effort should not be hindered by any demand by our army or by our navy.

I should like to draw the attention of the government to the waste that has been going on in the construction of military camps in New Brunswick. I believe some waste is going on in some of the other provinces. This matter was brought to the attention of the government by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) when he spoke in this debate, and I thought that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), when he replied, treated that matter with less seriousness than it deserved. The day after I returned to Saint John on the adjournment of this house in August last, I was approached by a man whom I knew but slightly, the manager of a local insurance company, who told me that he had just got back from the camp at Sussex and that he was shocked at the waste that was going on there. His chief complaint was that the lumber which was going into those camps was planed on the four sides.

A day or two later I had a visit from a prominent farmer, a thoroughly practical man from Elgin, in Albert county. He told me that he had been to the camp and that the waste which was going on there was terrible. He said that the specifications required the lumber which went into the huts to be planed on four sides, and that this meant that after the lumber was manufactured in some mills it had to be loaded on trucks, carted away to other mills where it was planed, reloaded on trucks and brought back to the camp at Sussex. He told me also that the water system and the sewerage system for those huts were laid down in two different trenches, when, he said, one trench would have been sufficient.

I visited the camp at Sussex. The Minister of National Defence has told us that the camp, which consists, I believe, of 148 huts, is costing $1,800,000. While I am not a builder or a contractor, I could see no reason why the lumber which was going into the camps had to be planed on four sides, and I believe that thousands of dollars have been needlessly expended because of that requirement. The matter, I submit, should be investigated.

The Minister of National Defence told us in the course of his speech that he had obtained a very competent engineer and that this engineer, with certain officers from the quartermaster-general's branch, was going to visit practically all the camps for the purpose of making a comparison between the cost of the camps which were put up by contract and the cost of the camps which were put up by the engineering service of the army. I suggest to the minister that he employ a competent architect and a competent accountant to make an investigation, without any officers from the quartermaster-general's branch, for the purpose of ascertaining what waste has resulted from the unnecessarily high specifications which were called for by the army in relation to those huts.

I realize that waste in war time is unavoidable, on account of the haste with which work has to be done. But there should be no waste as a result of stupidity, and it seems to me that when the army calls for too high specifications in connection with the construction of huts which will be needed for only a comparatively short time, there should be a check-up and the practice should be stopped as soon as possible.

One of the unfortunate consequences of this extravagance is that many people visited these camps when they were in course of construction and saw the waste which was going on, and their reaction was: "The government tells us to save our money and invest it in war securities, but why should we lend our money to the government to be wasted in this manner?" That is one regrettable result of wasteful expenditures by governments in war time.

I thought it possible that this waste was confined to one or more camps in New Brunswick. But the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling), who addressed this house the other day, spoke of the waste and political patronage which accompanied the erection of the camp at Vernon, British Columbia. We may be right in concluding that there has been waste in all the camps constructed throughout the dominion by the government for army purposes.

Another matter to which I should refer is political patronage. My information is that the practice still continues. I know that some members of the government—the war committee, I believe—issued last summer a statement to the effect that there was to be no more patronage in connection with war contracts. That was a very proper statement, and I believe that the ministers were sincere when they issued it, although I am not prepared to say that staunch party men, such as they, are not apt at times to be influenced both consciously and unconsciously by political motives. But make no mistake about it, in spite of that statement political patronage has not ceased to exist. Political patronage continues. The political machine is very difficult to control, and it has not been controlled. The unfortunate result is that people in this country still speak of the effort we are making as a "Liberal war." That is much to be regretted, but until we have some form of union or national government, that opinion will continue to exist. I submit that it is a very strong argument for some form of union or national government, despite the fact that when it is brought about, the Prime Minister may run the risk of being "stabbed in the breast."

I had intended to speak this evening about free transportation for soldiers going on leave, but so many members have done so already, all of them being of opinion that soldiers going on leave should be given free transportation, that I will not elaborate on the matter. From what was said to-day, apparently the government cannot see its way clear to grant this concession, but I hope it will be able to reconsider its decision. If it cannot, I suggest that it give attention to reducing still further the price soldiers have to pay for their transportation; and if that cannot be done, at least let the government consider the desirability of arranging that, when soldiers go on leave, the paymasters of their units will give them advances, which can later be gradually repaid.

The only other point to which I wish to refer in connection with soldiers' leave is that the matter was brought to the attention of the house and the government last May by two hon. members who sit on this side, and the then Minister of National Defence, Mr. Rogers, promised it his consideration. But evidently nothing was done, and the only decision which has been arrived at, the one reached lately, is that soldiers are not to be given free transportation when they go on leave. I think that is very much to be regretted.

I intended also to bring to the attention of this house the suggestion of a further reduction in rates on letters and parcels which are sent to our soldiers overseas. But that matter has also been brought to the attention of the government in the course of this debate, and I will not enlarge upon it. I would urge that the government give the matter further consideration and that, if at all possible, a reduction be made in the postage on parcels that are sent to our soldiers overseas.

I would urge also that the government expedite the handling of mail both to and from these soldiers. I am under the impression, from my own experiences, that civilian mail to and from Great Britain is handled with greater expedition than the mail sent to our soldiers or the letters they send back to us. I understand that the government have this matter under investigation and I hope they will take such steps as will ensure that mail to and from the men overseas is delivered more promptly. It is a continuing source of uneasiness to parents, wives, children and, I fancy, to the soldiers themselves that mail is not delivered more promptly.

While I am on this subject I would suggest that the government see to it that the parcels which are sent to our soldiers overseas are given better protection and are delivered to the persons to whom they are addressed. Too many parcels disappear in the mail, not through any enemy action but from other causes. They do not reach the soldiers to whom they are addressed. Not long ago I received a letter from a private serving overseas in an infantry unit. In this letter, which is dated September 29, he says:

> I have not received a parcel yet and I know some were sent on August 1. We have had parcels sent from home, cigarettes especially, and have been here two months and none of us have received any cigarettes yet.

This matter was evidently preying on his mind, for later on in his letter he refers to it again. He says:

> I have not received a parcel yet and I know some were sent on August 1.

He continues:

> Here is a good chance for you to go to town on better protection for mail and parcels.

I do not know whether I am "going to town", but I do urge the government and particularly the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) to see to it that better protection is given parcels sent overseas to our soldiers.

I have discussed one phase of this letter; may I refer to it from another point of view. The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) this afternoon called attention to a certain excess of zeal that had developed under the defence of Canada regulations. He told us about a committee of three, representing the unemployed in Regina, having conferred with the relief committee and with the Regina council. One of the people on relief made a speech outlining to the council and the relief committee the feelings of the men who were on relief, and the result was that a charge was laid against him under the defence of Canada regulations. He was brought before a magistrate and fined ten dollars. That is not what the defence of Canada regulations were intended for.

The other evening the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen) told us how the provincial police of Saskatchewan had gone from house to house—I do not know what authority they could possibly have—collecting copies of a leaflet which had been distributed, and which contained a synopsis of a speech she had made on the budget in this house at the last session.

Freedom of speech and freedom of the press must be preserved in Canada. The defence of Canada regulations should not be taken advantage of and should not be carried out stupidly. Read any ordinary English newspaper like the Daily Mail and you will see from time to time the severe criticism that appears in it against the actions of the British government. Free speech is permitted in England, as this letter which I hold in my hand will show—I propose to read it into the record. It is written by a private serving in a Canadian infantry unit overseas. He is a married man, and before the war he made a living working longshore, driving a truck, doing whatever he could. Sometimes it was pretty hard to get a job, but he did the best he could to support his wife and family. He says:

> Was to London for a week-end and was in Hyde park all p.m. and until twelve then had to walk to Union Jack club in an air raid and sleep on the floor of the club.
> I believe we have talked of free speech in Hyde park and now I'd believe any story I heard of Hyde park. Can you imagine a country practically an armed camp yet a speaker with a red flag preaching communism unmolested, a Sinn Feiner from Ireland calling Churchill anything but a gentleman. A speaker freely admitting that he was a fifth columnist, and would be as long as capital crucified labour as at present. A speaker from the bureau of information, a woman on moral and sexual hygiene, and religious sects of all sorts . . . a Catholic priest. Then, the cream of the crop, an Abyssinian prince, educated at Oxford, he had about 3,000 people for an audience and kept them singing, laughing or crying, as he willed. He is often quoted in the press and referred to as "Prince Brotherly Love". He wears a colourful costume and turban, carries a union jack over one shoulder and a tricolour over the other, and he kept waving them at the other speakers and shouting "There's enough red in this flag for anyone". He told jokes that he made up himself. One of his remarks was "The best flag on earth, the sun never sets on it and wages never rise under it". Another was "Hitler says we are starving here, we're rationed on everything yet no one is hungry," then said he was dry and in a minute he had about a bushel of sweets and even a bottle of pop, then he says "and Hitler says we're starving".
> While this crowd were in one end of the park, bombs were dropping at the other end and no one moved away until midnight.
> I have met a lot of people who have moved out of London, homes lost, business men who have been ruined yet all are cheerful and determined that Britain must win.

In the speech from the throne we were told that the government intended to introduce measures at this session of the house "for the prosecution of the war to the utmost of our strength." What these measures are, we do not know. Although three weeks have passed, the order paper remains a blank. Apparently the government have no legislation ready for us. They are proceeding in this matter with the same lack of energy that they displayed during the first eight or nine months of the war. The powers that have been conferred on the government by the War Measures Act and the orders in council passed under its authority, together with the National Resources Mobilization Act passed at the last session of this house, have given the government almost dictatorial powers. The government have been given power to carry on this country's war effort "to the utmost of our strength", with one important qualification to which I shall refer in a moment. The government has been given power, to use the words of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin) in the eloquent and powerful speech he made in this house last June, the broadest blank cheque ever given to the executive of any parliament for the administration of public affairs and for the security of the nation.

What steps does the government propose to take under the great powers that it now possesses and has possessed for five or six months? How does it propose to organize our resources? To what extent does it propose to organize them? We have had only a limited and partial answer to these questions. We have not had a full answer. We do not know to-day how or to what extent the government proposes to mobilize the resources of this country under the great powers it now possesses.

We do know, however, that it is not the intention of the government to have conscription of man-power for the army or the navy or the air force for what we all realize to-day is Canada's first line of defence.

Mr. CHURCH: It is coming.

Mr. HAZEN: The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) said the other day that he stressed in July last that our first line of defence was the island fortress of Britain. But it is not the intention of the government to have conscription for our first line of defence; it proposes only to have conscription in our own peaceful country and its territorial waters.

In a Canadian Press dispatch from Montreal of August 14 last the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is reported to have said in a broadcast over the Canadian Broadcasting system that he recalled a radio address he gave in June in which he declared himself against conscription of man-power for overseas service, and added, "I repeat this evening, overseas service remains voluntary."

How the government, in the light of what has happened, can reconcile a policy of voluntary service overseas with the fact that our first line of defence is overseas and that if our first line of defence falls, we shall be in the greatest jeopardy, is something I have never been able to understand. It is lacking in logic; it is lacking in realism, foresight and energetic leadership.

We know that the government does not intend to mobilize the man-power of this country for service where it is most needed, in the actual theatre of war, but we do not know in any detail how it proposes to organize the resources of the country under the great powers that it possesses. Hon. members want to know and the country wants to know when, how and to what extent the government proposes to use the powers that have been given to it.

The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) in the excellent speech he made here some days ago in this debate said:

> Great Britain will need every possible assistance that we can give her and it is our solemn duty as a freedom loving nation to give her our maximum aid.
> For this reason we, as members of parliament and representatives of the people, will wish to know, not only what progress has been made with our war effort—and we are proud of its increasing momentum—but, what is perhaps even more important at this stage of our war effort, we will wish to be informed as to what has not yet been done and what must still be done. Are there any deficiencies in our war effort? If so, what are they and what steps can be taken to remedy them? Are we running short of efficient man power in our war industries? If so, what efforts are being made to train men for special purposes? Is our war effort being restricted in any manner by financial considerations? If so, in what respect and how can these restrictions be removed?

These are all pertinent questions, to which we should be given candid and detailed answers by the government. Soothing words of reassurance that would leave us with a false sense of security are not satisfactory; they are not good enough.

Furthermore, we are not satisfied with the information, verging on political propaganda, that is handed out week by week by the director of public information. We are told week after week that so many contracts totalling so many millions of dollars have been awarded by the Department of Munitions and Supply, and the contracts over $5,000 are listed. We are told also that so many construction contracts totalling so many more millions of dollars have been let. But we do not know in many instances, in fact in most instances, whether these contracts are being carried out, whether the orders are being filled, or what prices per unit are being paid for the goods bought. And we are never in these releases or anywhere else, as far as I know, told in any detail of any delays or difficulties that the government is experiencing in equipping our armed forces. By reading these releases that come to us from week to week we would be soothed into the happy frame of mind that the government has no difficulties and no problems. The policy adopted would appear to be that the idea must be created in the mind of the public that the political party that is carrying on this war is making a perfect job of it.

Mr. CHURCH: A fine way to fight Hitler!

Mr. HAZEN: That is a dangerous policy and a policy that should be changed. The government have not made and are not, by any means, making a perfect job of our war effort.

The Minister of National Defence told us in the course of his speech that statistics regarding the rate of production and delivery of various items in connection with our war effort should not be made public, because to do so would furnish the enemy with information which he might spend millions of dollars to obtain. Then, in reply to some pertinent questions by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), he said that no rifles will be manufactured until about the middle of July next, and that the production of 25-pounders will not be as early as expected but that a considerable number will be forthcoming in July, 1941. I am sure we all hope that these expectations will be realized, although the policy of better late than never is not a good one in war time. I am a little puzzled, however, as to why the minister should have furnished the house with this information, after telling us that the enemy should not be supplied with free information of this kind.

One subject upon which the Minister of National Defence did not touch during the course of his statement is the state of preparedness of our defences on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. He did not tell us what steps, if any, had been taken to rebuild, modernize and improve those defences; nor did he tell us whether they are fully equipped with coastal artillery, anti-aircraft guns and searchlight batteries. Whether he omitted this information by accident or design, I do not know, but these are matters of importance. I trust that the development and equipment of these defences have been carried out, and that they are now in proper order.

The minister informed us also that he expected to visit the United Kingdom before long, in order to consult with the authorities there on matters of common interest. I am sure we all hold the Minister of National Defence in the highest regard; we wish him a safe voyage, and we hope and expect that his visit to England will result in furthering the war effort of this country.

In the course of his able address during this debate the leader of the opposition referred to a paragraph in the speech from the throne delivered by the deputy of the governor general when parliament was prorogued on November 5. The paragraph to which he drew attention stated that the measures taken by parliament during the session which was then being brought to a conclusion, had in view the immediate task of sharing more completely in the defence of Britain and securing our own country more effectively against internal subversion and external attack. The leader of the opposition said that these words were significant in that for the first time in Canada since we entered the struggle first things had been put first, that for the first time the government had recognized that the defence of Britain came first, and he congratulated the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) upon the words that had been used.

The Prime Minister, however, rather to my surprise, was critical of the remarks of the leader of the opposition. He said that he failed to see where the statement differed in any particular from the policy of the government as it was stated at the very outset of the war and as it had been followed since that time. He went on to quote from a broadcast he made on September 3, 1939, in which he said:

> On Friday last the government, speaking on behalf of the Canadian people, anounced that in the event of the United Kingdom becoming engaged in war in an effort to resist aggression, they would as soon as parliament meets seek its authority for effective cooperation by Canada at the side of Britain.

That, he said, was the government's statement of policy before Britain herself had gone to war, and it was the policy the government had pursued ever since.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the words "effective cooperation" may be construed in a variety of ways. To many people who heard that address the words "effective cooperation" may have meant defending our own shores and furnishing supplies to Britain, for which supplies we would be well paid; a merely perfunctory, safe and profitable cooperation. To others who listened to that address "effective cooperation" may have meant not only what I have just stated but also a moderate and voluntary effort, without any conscription whatever.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to inform the hon. gentleman that his time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. HAZEN: May I just finish what I was saying?

Mr. SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. HAZEN: "Effective cooperation," to others who heard that address, may have meant whole-hearted and energetic participation in the war, such as we saw in the war of 1914-18.

But in the broadcast of September 3, 1939, the Prime Minister did not explain just what he meant by those words, and it is probable that we shall not know what he meant until the correspondence that passed between Canada and Great Britain before we entered the war is tabled in this house. We have been told that this correspondence, important though it is, will not be made available to us at the present time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand that the hon. gentleman has unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. HAZEN: I should like to complete the point I am making.

Mr. GOLDING: How many pages more?

Mr. HAZEN: You may not like it very much—

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman has unanimous consent, he may continue.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. SPEAKER: There appears to be a desire that the hon. gentleman should conclude the point he is making.

Mr. HAZEN: The Prime Minister has told us that his government has always followed the same policy, that it has always held the same position. If that is so; if there has been no change in his policy since September, 1939, all I can say is that many of the people who voted for him, aye, and some of the members who sit on his side of the house to-day, failed to understand what he meant by that policy. For instance, last June, in this house the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix) said:

. . . Mr. Speaker, I urge that we abide by the policy advocated by the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King during the last elections, namely a voluntary and reasonable measure of participation, without resorting in any way to conscription of man-power.

On the same occasion, speaking in the same debate, the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) said:

Mr. Speaker, I should be remiss in my duty if I failed to protest at once against the plan for mobilizing our man-power and wealth announced by the right hon. Prime Minister. This new policy is in glaring opposition to the electoral platform of the re-elected government. There was to be nothing but a moderate, voluntary and free war effort, we were told. I referred to that platform in this house on May 23 last. I was then speaking in defence of the Prime Minister, who was being harassed on all sides by the opposition.

The Prime Minister says that he has always pursued the same policy, but here is a member on his own side of the house who says that this is a new policy, and another who asks the Prime Minister to abide by the policy which he enunciated during the last election and says that this policy is in glaring opposition to the electoral platform of the re-elected government. All I can say is that these gentlemen all appear to be intelligent men, and it is unfortunate that there should be such a difference of opinion in connection with a policy which should be clear to all of us.

Mr. THOMAS FARQUHAR (Algoma East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say just a few words. This debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne is now drawing to a close, but before a vote is taken on the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) I should like to draw attention again to its wording. It says in part:

We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that this house regrets that the government has continued to soothe the Canadian people regarding the war effort of the nation, thereby creating a false sense of security when a clear-cut call to action is desperately needed.

When that amendment was moved by the leader of the opposition, I wondered what arguments would be brought forward by the members of the opposition in an effort to prove the truthfulness of the statements contained therein. I have listened to the debate in this house from day to day; I have read Hansard each day in order to make sure that I had overlooked nothing, and I ask any hon. member to show me where one argument has been brought forward which would prove in the slightest degree the truthfulness of the statement contained in the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition, that the government is continuing to soothe the people of Canada.

On the contrary, much has been said which would go to prove that the opposite is true. After listening to the statements made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the ministers of the various departments, I feel sure that there is not a member of the opposition but believes in his heart that the statements made in the amendment are far from the truth. I would go even further and say that the leader of the opposition himself does not believe that those statements are true, and I am quite sure that the people of Canada do not believe them. Had the leader of the opposition the information which he now has, I am quite sure that he would not have moved the amendment.

It is not unusual for the leader of the opposition to make statements in and out of the house which put him in wrong with his own followers and which lower the prestige of the party which he represents. I am hoping that he is not making another mistake at this time. Notwithstanding all the misstatements which the leader of the opposition has made, I still have a great deal of respect for him. I also hold many of his followers in very high regard because they are splendid fellows. In the light of all the information which we now have; in the light of all the facts which the ministers of the various departments have given us, I am going to ask the leader of the opposition to reconsider the statements which he has made and withdraw his amendment. If the leader of the opposition is the man which I give him credit for being, he will rise in his seat and withdraw his amendment.

Mr. W. F. KUHL (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, at a time when there is so much sorrow abroad in the world one is somewhat less inclined to be critical of those who are in places of great responsibility. Some of the members on the government side have expressed sympathy for the ministers, suggesting that they have been doing a great deal of work. No doubt they have been busy, and a good deal of credit is due them for that, but if there is anyone in this country who should be sympathized with, who should be given credit, it is the common people. They have endured much during the past years of depression and yet have come forward quite willingly to make every sacrifice they have been called upon to make, indeed, they have made sacrifices which I consider are absolutely unessential. Yet they have come forward to offer their services in a hundred and one different ways.

The ministers at least have security, even though they may have to work hard. Should they suffer ill health, they are able to secure the best medical attention, but that cannot be said of the people of Canada at large. As I said, in times like this one is inclined to be rather less critical, but when one sees an enemy within the gates getting away with murder at a time when the common people are in a life and death struggle with an external enemy, one would have to be made of stone not to cry out against the monstrous injustice which is being done.

The enemy within our gates to which I refer is the money power. I know there are those who scoff at the suggestion of the existence of a money power, but was it not the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself who suggested in the campaign of 1935 that there was a money power? Was it not he who said that if he were elected to power he would do battle with the money power? If there is no money power, then the Prime Minister was deceiving the people. If there is a money power, then what happened in the battle? It is quite obvious that the battle never took place. The Liberal party pulled up the white flag before ever there was a battle.

I am inclined to believe that there is a money power. Every great leader who has attempted to do anything for his people has come into conflict with this monster of iniquity, the money power. We all know the conflict which Abraham Lincoln had with this money power, and how he paid with his own life. During the debate last year, I quoted some statements of Abraham Lincoln, where he said that he was fighting two enemies, and I should like to refer to them again. I believe that is the position in which the common people of Canada find themselves. They have not only an external enemy but an internal one as well. Abraham Lincoln in the American civil war is reported to have said:

> I have two great enemies, the southern army in front of me and the financial institutions in the rear. Of the two the one in the rear is my greatest foe.

I am sure no one will suggest that Abraham Lincoln did not know what he was talking about. There is a money power at work in this country of ours, gnawing at the very vitals of this nation. There is in Canada an internal dictatorship just as diabolically wicked as the one with which we in the empire are in armed conflict. The people of Alberta have sent the Social Credit members to this parliament because they have come to the conclusion, not only as a result of studies they have made but from actual experience, that there is a money power, and they have sent us here to do all in our power to fight this money power.

I wish also to say that the people who have sent the Social Credit members here are just as loyal citizens of Canada as any other people who send Liberal or Conservative members or members of any other party to this house. In fact I am quite persuaded that if the Canadian people were permitted to know the truth about money, banks and banking, a much larger number of social crediters, or at least of those who support monetary reform, would be sent to this house. But the sad fact of the situation is that the common people are prevented from getting the truth about money and about banks and banking. Millions are used by the bankers to defeat monetary reformers, to confuse the thinking of the people and deceive them into believing that which is not true.

We Social Credit members here intend to fight this money power as long as there is breath in our bodies. We are criticized quite frequently as being cranks on the subject of money and for talking about nothing but money. I suggest to the house that there is no more important subject that parliament could discuss than money. Every solitary thing that is discussed in this house hinges on money. Listen to any and every member talk and you will conclude that there is only one thing lacking, and that is a proper monetary policy. Every member, whether he is discussing war or peace problems of this country, admits or implies that the physical requirements are here to solve almost any problem. There are, of course, limitations in endeavouring to supply war equipment, but generally speaking every member admits or implies by what he says that physically there is nothing lacking, thereby implying that the only thing that is lacking is a proper financial policy. Consequently I do not think we are out of order in harping on the subject of money in season and out as long as we are here. In that connection I should like to quote a passage from Arthur Kitson in which he points out the enormous importance of the subject of money. He says:

> The money question is the greatest moral and social question which mankind has ever had to consider. It concerns the lives, fortunes and happiness of every human being in society and of generations yet unborn. All other questions sink into insignificance compared with this one.

I agree with that statement one hundred per cent.

The hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. Abbott) in speaking the other day—and no doubt he was making his remarks particularly for the benefit of members of the Social Credit group—said: "War machines are not created by money." That was just another sample of the straw men set up by those who try to refute the Social Credit argument. Then they knock down the straw man under the pretence that they are destroying the Social Credit argument. The hon. member cannot point to a single instance of a member of this group ever suggesting that money created things. No one ever said that money could create war machines. I do not say it, and none of our group ever said it. But what we do contend is that without money, war machines cannot be built. There is nothing that can be manufactured except through the use of money. In the days of barter when goods were traded for goods it was possible, but in the complex modern age in which we live money is absolutely essential, and without money, even though you have the men and the materials, you cannot bring them together to produce the things that are required. I do not think that can be controverted.

The money system, whatever we use for money to-day, is the heart, the blood, the most vital organ in our national economy. Without it our national life would be paralyzed. It is absolutely impossible to produce things in this modern world without having at one's command an adequate system of money.

I should like to ask those who suggest that money is not our trouble, why have we idle resources and idle men even to-day if there is a need for materials and for skilled men? Many members of the house have indicated in their addresses that there are many skilled workmen and skilled graduates of our youth training schools who are now out of employment. I am sure that every member has correspondence almost every day from people who desire work of one kind or another. If there are idle labour and idle materials; if we still have resources which are not being worked, why are they not being worked if the trouble is not a lack of money? Why is not the idle labour put to work on the idle resources? If factories are running to capacity, why are not men put to work enlarging the factories and plant equipment? If there should ever be a time when we run short of labour, skilled or unskilled, is it not a simple matter to obtain many men from the unemployed ranks in the United States? There are as many people in the ranks of the unemployed over there as there are people in the whole of Canada.

I wish again to emphasize that the one thing lacking in our national economy is an adequate money system. Day after day we have been listening to hon. members pleading with the government to grant soldiers free transportation on their Christmas leave. Why do the government say that they cannot do this? Is it because there is not accommodation in the railway cars? Is it because we have not enough engines or adequate railway equipment? Everyone knows that is not the situation. Trains are running up and down this country half-empty, and if there are not enough cars, why cannot more be manufactured? It is purely and simply a question of finance. What prevents our soldiers from getting free transportation home for Christmas is a financial, not a physical problem. I think it is a shame that young men who are placing their lives in jeopardy for this country should be treated in such a fashion. It is a question of money.

Consider any question which is raised in this house. Take, for instance the provision of storage for wheat. Surely one must concede upon the slightest reflection that that is purely a financial question. Are we without storage facilities because we lack lumber, or labour to produce the lumber, or cement to build storage? We are not lacking in anything physical. Then, why have we all these unemployed, these unused resources, this overripe timber? Every problem connected with this matter of the handling of grain is financial and nothing else.

Or take any other of the numerous agricultural problems which have been discussed in this chamber. I hear our Conservative friends from Ontario constantly bemoaning the fact that vegetables and fruit are admitted from across the border in competition with produce which is raised in their province. Again, is it not a question of finance? There are in this country hundreds of thousands of people who would like to supplement their diet with more vegetables, fruit, fish and poultry. We are doing a great deal of high-pressure advertising. The government tries by these advertisements to induce people to eat more apples, more lobsters, more fish. The government does not have to tell people what to eat. All that is wrong is that they have not the money to pay for these commodities. If the government sees to it that the financial system enables the people to make their demand effective, it will not need to carry on all this high-pressure advertising; it is just a waste of time, energy, and material.

The problem of the maritime provinces resolves itself into one of finance. People in the interior of Canada would like to have the products of the fishermen. They are not using them, not because they do not desire to eat fish or because they do not know about it, but because their purchasing power does not permit them to buy these products.

The people of the prairie provinces would like to have the fruits of British Columbia, and British Columbia wants the grain of the prairie provinces. Why do they not exchange the one for the other? Not on account of physical handicaps; for railway trains are operating every day, many times with empty cars, going from one province to another. There are no physical limitations; the question resolves itself into one of finance and nothing else.

Or consider the question of allowances to the widows and dependents of war veterans. Why should these people not have complete economic security? Have we not sufficient of the amenities of life; have we not the physical resources to take care of these people? No one will deny that we have.

Again, the matter of taking care of those who are not able to take care of themselves resolves itself into a question of finance. The same is true of old age pensions. Certainly we have enough food, clothing and material to maintain and house our aged people. The physical requirements are here; we have every essential to make them comfortable and happy during the sunset days of their lives. It is a question of an adequate financial policy—nothing else.

Consider the health standards of our people. One of the best contributions Canada can make to the war effort of the empire is to put its people in the best physical and mental health that is humanly possible. It is not being done. Why? Because the medical facilities are not there? No. There are plenty of doctors who have not sufficient practice; there are ample hospital facilities and all kinds of services to promote the health of the people; there are plenty of foodstuffs to provide them with diets which will build healthy bodies. The question of the health of the people of Canada is a question of finance—nothing else.

One could go on and enumerate every problem which has been raised by any hon. member in this house; when boiled down to its final essence, each one is a matter of finance and nothing else.

I suggest that the financial problem should not be difficult of solution. If our financial system to-day were dependent upon the minting and circulation of gold as a medium of exchange, we might be confronted with an impossible physical problem. Probably there would not be enough gold. But our money system to-day is simplicity itself. It is nothing more or less than a simple bookkeeping system. Ninety-five per cent of our money is nothing but drops of ink on pieces of paper—the simplest commodities in the world to obtain. This is the most easily operated, most easily controlled and most perfect money system that the mind of man has ever devised. It is almost costless to operate. It is purely bookkeeping. The great and palatial structures which are erected all over this dominion as bank buildings are quite unessential. The amount of materials consumed in administering the financial policy of this country is almost negligible.

Since the financial system in itself is so simple, why should it be so difficult to solve our financial problems? The evils of our financial system lie not in the system itself, but in the method under which it is operated, in the policy which is pursued. Although it is an almost perfect system, the most perfect which has ever been devised, it is one of the most ill-managed and ill-conducted; so much so that, though this Canada of ours, with its sparse population and enormous resources, makes us, physically speaking, millionaires, we have been brought to the verge of bankruptcy, financially speaking only, because of the mismanagement of the money system.

From its very inception the money system of Canada and of every other democratic country has not functioned as it should have done. The purpose of a financial system, as I see it, is to reflect the desire and the ability of the people of a nation to produce and to consume, and if it is not doing that, it is not performing its function. So long as there are idle resources and idle men, the financial system is not reflecting the ability of a country to produce. So long as there is abundance, if not actual, then potential, of goods and services on the one hand, and poverty and destitution on the other, the financial system is not reflecting the ability and the desire of the people to consume. And so long as there are any physical possibilities—I do not care which you wish to name—which are not being realized, the financial policy is not functioning as it should.

Why is it not functioning as it should? I consider that the right to create, issue and put into circulation in the first instance every single, solitary dollar and cent in the country is a crown prerogative. All money that is issued in a nation should be issued by the state. That is the most sacred of all crown prerogatives. But there are members of this house and people outside the house who state that it is not only undesirable but dangerous for the state to issue money, although the exact converse of that is the truth. The state should be the only authority within a nation to create and put into circulation all the money of the nation.

Abraham Lincoln made a statesmanlike utterance on this question of the state issue of money and the prerogative of the crown. He said:

> Money is the creature of law, and the creation of the original issue of money should be maintained as an exclusive monopoly of the national government. Such needs can be served by issuing national currency and credit through the operation of a national banking system. The government should create, issue and circulate all the currency and credit needed to satisfy the spending power of the government and the buying power of consumers. The privilege of creating and issuing money is not only the supreme prerogative of the government but it is the government's greatest creative opportunity.

Will anyone deny that that is as it should be? Yet there are in this house men, including the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), if not stating straightforwardly, at any rate certainly implying that it is not only unwise but dangerous for the state to issue money. I regard that as one of the most shocking circumstances in a democratic country. The state should be creating and issuing every cent of the money of this nation, but we are being told that it is unwise and dangerous to do this. This sacred prerogative of the crown, the most sacred prerogative that the crown can exercise, has been given piecemeal over a period of time to a private monopoly, and this has been carried to the point where parliament to-day has been relegated to the position of merely a pawnbroker for the private money monopoly. That is the position which the government occupies to-day.

In my opinion every person, I care not how high his position may be, or what office he may occupy, who has contributed to this state of affairs and who insists that it should be perpetuated, ought to be tried for high treason —and I mean that. I consider that giving away into the hands of a private monopoly the most sacred prerogative the crown can possess is one of the most heinous crimes that any individual or group of individuals can be guilty of, and in my opinion those persons who have been guilty of this act, regardless of who they may be, are as traitorous as any fifth columnist can be considered.

I should like to support what I have just said by a quotation from a book published by C. Barclay-Smith, entitled "Victory without Debt." He is an Australian and I recommend this book to every member of the house. Everyone should read it not only once but a hundred times; he would be a better man after reading it. At page 34 the writer says:

> When public trustees—that is, the parliament of the nation—finance government requirements by pawning the assets of the country and the future security of the people to the private credit monopoly, thus lowering the tenor of life of every citizen, so far from calling that kind of thing sound finance I prefer to give it its proper name—high treason.

As I have already suggested, the first reason why the financial system in Canada, the policy that is being pursued, does not do what it ought to do is the fact that the crown prerogative is exercised by a private monopoly; and the first thing that should be done is to restore to parliament and to the people of Canada this sacred prerogative. The people of Canada were led to believe that this is what the Liberal party would do if they were elected in 1935. I am quite satisfied that this is the reason why the Liberal party was elected with the majority it received in 1935. The people believed that it would restore to parliament the sacred prerogative of issuing and putting into circulation the medium of exchange. But this was not done. Why? St. James Street probably shouted "boo," and the Liberal party wilted.

I would say the second reason is that the financial policy which is in vogue in Canada does not permit what is physically possible becoming financially possible, for the reason that all money which is issued to-day originates as a debt to the banking institutions. Consequently, anyone who uses bank money—and everyone and every institution must use it—becomes perpetually in debt to the banking institutions. A debt is incurred which can never be paid. Some individuals can pay, but the nation as a whole can never get out of debt to the banking institutions, because it owes more than there is in the community with which to pay back the debt, and that is the reason why public debts, national debts, are never paid off.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): If they paid it back, the banks would go broke.

Mr. KUHL: Money should be created and issued in such fashion that the repayment of a debt is made a mathematical possibility. Under the present system and policy it is not. And the fact that the debts continually increase is sufficient evidence of that.

Another evil which the present policy works is that it obliges the people to pay for things not only once but twice, thrice and many more times. For instance, in public works, a project is completed, a bridge, for example, is built. The community as a whole provides everything physically needed to build that bridge, the community provides all the labour and all the material, and when that bridge is built it is actually paid for. But under the present system of financing, it is not paid for, possibly for a hundred years afterwards. Financially it is paid for several times over. Physically it was paid for when it was completed.

That principle holds true in connection with war. Why should we be paying for the 1914-18 war to-day, if blood and sweat and tears constitute the only cost of a war? All the physical essentials of the 1914-18 war were met at that time, and that war was fully paid for when the war was concluded. And that holds true of the present war. The Minister of Finance has informed us that this war is being paid for as it progresses. Well, that is true; a war is paid for as it progresses. In blood, sweat and tears the cost of a war is provided from day to day as the war progresses. If that is the situation, I want to be told why there should be a debt remaining after the war is over? Why are we told after the war is over that we still have to pay for the war, if the war is being paid for while it is in progress? I should like to hear a discussion with regard to that angle.

The minister says that the government is pursuing a pay-as-you-go policy. I would call it, pay as you go now and after it is over and until you die, and your children and your grandchildren and your great grandchildren continue to pay. That is the kind of policy the government is pursuing; it is not a pay-as-you-go policy, it is a pay-a-hundred-times-as-you-go policy.

The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton), in moving the address in reply, stated that Canadians will be obliged to deprive themselves until it hurts. Well, we in this corner agree to that; if sacrifices are necessary, they must be made. But because of the iniquities of the financial policy which is now being pursued, we are called upon for sacrifices which are unnecessary, and unnecessary sacrifices are iniquities.

We contend that it is possible for this country and the empire to have victory without debt. If we are paying for the war as it progresses, that can be true in a financial sense as well as in a real sense. The only cost involved in financing the war is a matter of bookkeeping, of setting up the appropriate system and conducting it while the war is in progress. All that is involved is the services of clerks and the consumption of ink and paper; outside of that there is no expense. If the cost of banking and the real costs are met during the war, we want to be told why there need be a debt after the war.

I had intended to deal with that question a little further but I see my time is gone. I should like to say something on another question which, however, in a way is related to this. I want to say a few words regarding implementation of the recommendations of the Sirois report. Most hon. members are aware that I have interested myself particularly in Canada's constitutional question; I have spoken on it several times in this house—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I have to inform the hon. member that his time has expired. Unless he has the unanimous consent of the house to continue, he will have to resume his seat.

Mr. KUHL: If I could have about two minutes I could state my point of view.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. KUHL: In connection with the implementation of this report I am quite in accord with the idea that we must have constitutional alterations in Canada; I have so expressed myself on several occasions. I am satisfied that such alterations are long overdue. But I frankly confess that I do not agree with the method employed, this dominion-provincial conference, to settle such a major question. The Prime Minister has represented himself in this house on many occasions as a great protagonist of democracy, but in my opinion this action to which he is resorting in an endeavour to solve a constitutional difficulty is a negation and repudiation of everything he has said on the question of democracy.

I believe the best advice that has been given to us as to the most democratic manner in which to settle this question is that given by the clerk of this house, Doctor Beauchesne, and I recommend it to every hon. member and to every province of Canada. Personally I feel that there is more democracy in one page of Doctor Beauchesne's evidence than in the whole Sirois recommendations.

I would call the Prime Minister's way of attempted settlement of the constitutional difficulty a hole-in-the-corner business, getting the premiers of the provinces or one or two representatives from each province together with the dominion cabinet, is in my view, not the way to settle such an important question. This question involves the whole people of Canada, and they should be consulted. I do not think any premier or any representative of a provincial government, without first getting authority from the people through a plebiscite, has any moral or legal right to come to any agreement as to alteration of the constitutional position in Canada. No provincial government, regardless of what majority they have, in my opinion have any authority from their people to act on this question. If it is going to be done in a democratic fashion the people of each province should first be consulted before any action is taken.

I shall quote a sentence or two of Doctor Beauchesne's suggestion, and leave it at that. I agree entirely with it. Doctor Beauchesne has suggested that this all-important question should be dealt with not by a few individuals but by a constituent assembly. On page 126 of the report of the special committee on the British North America Act he is reported as saying:

> I, therefore, beg to suggest an imposing constituent assembly formed of eminent men coming from all parts of Canada. Provincial conferences, attended by a few ministers meeting behind closed doors, would hardly satisfy public opinion. The debate should be published.

I believe that should be the case in connection with the consideration of this question. He continues:

> I submit that a constituent assembly, chosen by the provincial legislatures and by the House of Commons, representing the main political parties and groups in proportion to the votes given at the last general elections, should meet in session at Winnipeg and discuss the situation from all its angles.

Then on page 128 this suggestion is made:

> The assembly should be convened by provincial proclamations issued in each province and by a dominion proclamation in which it would be clearly stated that the minority rights now guaranteed by the British North America Act should not even be discussed.
> In choosing the delegates to this constituent assembly, due regard should be given to the representation of all classes. Business men, farmers, professional men, scholars and labour men should be represented. Although the dominion would send an important delegation, the assembly should not be a dominion assembly, but rather an assembly of the provinces' representatives in consultation with the dominion.
> There ought to be no government side and no official opposition in such a body, which should work on the lines of coalition. A committee consisting of the premiers and leaders of the opposition in the House of Commons and legislatures would have charge of the agenda and daily order of business which, under ordinary rules, could be adjusted daily by experienced parliamentary clerks. Speeches ought to be recorded by Hansard.

Then there is this last paragraph:

> I would suggest that the assembly do not sit in Ottawa, in order that it may not have the appearance of being dominated, or even influenced, by the dominion power; and, as the western provinces are of such paramount importance in the country, I suggest the best city for the representatives to gather in would be Winnipeg.

I am heartily in accord with these suggestions. I should like to elaborate on them a good deal more, but I have exhausted my time. I recommend a study of these suggestions to all members of this house and of the provincial legislatures. I believe it is only in some manner such as this that this great and all-important question can be settled in the best interests of the people of Canada.

Mr. HECTOR AUTHIER (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, in the course of the debate now drawing to its conclusion, many interesting things have been said. The mover of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton), and the seconder, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras), led the way on the first day with remarkable eloquence.

The government asks for our support in its war policy. The leader of the opposition replies that this policy is only a catch, that the war effort is insufficient and ill-managed, and he invites us to censure the government accordingly. He adds that the government is also deserving of blame for having not given more help to the farmers of Canada.

The leader of the new democracy party has found another reason for blaming the government: he wants to have Canada pay its war costs in social credit money. Let us examine his subamendment, which will be voted upon first. We have just listened to a speech advocating his theory. The money constantly recommended by hon. members in the far corner would simply consist of non-interest-bearing dominion notes printed and circulated in practically unlimited quantities. Were this method feasible, the task of the Minister of Finance would be wonderfully simple. He would no longer have to find lenders nor to levy revenue to pay the thirty or forty million dollars of interest required for each billion dollars spent for war purposes. That would remove a very heavy burden from the shoulders of the taxpayers. Alas! systems that are too simple are not always the best, because they omit too many essential factors. Our national economy is necessarily conditioned by our trade relations with other countries, and we have to protect the value of our money abroad as well as at home.

At no time have our exports and imports reached their present high level. How could we, at this time, be rash enough to forsake the doctrine that is generally accepted in Great Britain and the United States as regards the issue of money? Never in our life as a nation have we been less justified than we are now in attempting risky experiments with money. Let us first win the war, after which we can discuss whatever experiments it might be advisable for us to try, if we are not satisfied with the monetary system then in use.

Winning the war must be our chief concern, for let us not forget for a moment that defeat would bring about the direst consequences for Canada and the world. But, God willing, Great Britain and her sister and allied nations shall not be vanquished.

The leader of the opposition is quite unjustified in suggesting that the government of Canada have not done their duty—their full duty—and that they are merely soothing the Canadian people. One after the other, the ministers of national defence have stated to this house the activities of their departments. What criticism have the honourable members who sit on the opposition side been able to voice? A very weak one. We have been told by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) that we are spending daily three million dollars for our war effort, which is all we can afford to spend. No one has shown that those funds have not on the whole been wisely used or that there was any dishonesty in that regard. Of course, some criticism on matters of detail may have been justified, but, on the whole, necessary war expenditures have been made quite properly. I know that the government have been upbraided by some overenthusiastic members for not having sent to Europe a larger number of soldiers. Those who followed a course so obviously wrong during the last war would like to-day—in order to enhance the interests of their party—to see this government follow their example and take the road leading to conscription. We have heard to-night a speech partly devoted to the expression of such ideas. No, we are not going to make such a mistake this time. Canada shall not send overseas more men than are necessary. The British ambassador in the United States, Lord Lothian, has just stated publicly that his country had no need of reinforcements. "England definitely does not need men," he said on his arrival at New York from London. I have read that statement in the New York Times of last Sunday. Such a statement makes it unnecessary for us to look for any further rebuttal of the Conservative argument on that point.

The leader of the opposition was more fortunate in the choice of his second point, for there is indeed much unrest among the farmers in this country. However, he is wrong in suggesting that the government have done nothing to lessen it. To the members from western Canada who never cease to demand more help for the western farmers, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) easily showed that no government has ever done so much for the farmers in the prairies. I have no wish to criticize him for the help so given. Besides he did good work for the producers of the whole country during his recent trip to Great Britain. But I would ask him to do still more for eastern farmers. I confess that we have in the province of Quebec a great many farmers whose plight is pitiful. Surely there ought to be some way of helping them. I wish to associate myself with those who have asked that these farmers be supplied at a low cost with western grain and grain products so that they may feed their cattle and produce meat more profitably. The freight rates on wheat and grain for consumption in eastern Canada should not be higher than the export rates. Such a policy would be equally fair to western and eastern Canada. Why not use the transcontinental railway from Winnipeg to Quebec, Montreal and Moncton, for the purpose that those who planned and built it had in mind?

As I said, a large number of farmers in the province of Quebec are in a sorry plight. There are, I believe, 50,000 or 60,000 settlers and farmers in Quebec who cannot obtain from their land sufficient income to provide their families with proper food, clothing and education. They are compelled to seek additional sources of income elsewhere, in the forests, the mines, the fisheries and many other occupations. Young men leave the farm at an early age to seek work in the cities where they find themselves out of place and frequently out of employment.

What are the remedies? As it would take too long to go into the question in detail, I shall confine myself to generalities. A more practical and widespread system of agricultural instruction should be adopted and enforced, and more capital should be placed at the disposal of farmers capable of making profitable use of it. The dominion farm loan scheme did not produce the results it should have produced. It could be made more liberal and efficient. The progress of agriculture in the province of Quebec is a question both of education and of finance. Advance will be slow, but that is all the more reason for immediate action. While awaiting the results of a general policy, palliatives could be used, as they were used in western Canada. Why should there not be a minimum price for butter and cheese as there is for wheat? Farmers who sold their butter for 22 cents a pound all through the summer usually discover that its price to the consumer rises 25 per cent and even 35 per cent at the end of the season, as it did this fall.

I am simply suggesting that the government set a minimum price for butter, as has been done in the case of wheat, and ensure its delivery throughout the country without any excessive profits going to the middlemen.

It would also be necessary to consider the setting of a reasonable price for all pulpwood cut by farmers on their own land. To a great number of our settlers and would-be farmers, the sale of such wood is the only available means of livelihood. The central authority could certainly do its share in assisting them by exerting a certain pressure on our railroads whose shipping rates on this product are often much too high. Should these measures require the cooperation of the provincial governments, it will be forthcoming. The premier of Quebec is not only a great orator, but also a very intelligent farmer, as everyone knows. He can be counted on to do his share. If the Minister of Agriculture were to accept my suggestions, he could then boast that never before has a government done as much, not only for the western farmer but for the eastern farmer as well. Our agricultural class needs and is worthy of his assistance. Once again, I know its recovery will take time and effort and a great deal of patience. Like colonization, it is apparently a deceptive undertaking because of the ceaseless difficulties and delays to be encountered, but it is a task that must nevertheless be accomplished since it is essential to maintaining a correct balance between city and country, as well as to the morale of our people and the future greatness of Canada.

I intend to vote against the opposition leader's amendment for two reasons: firstly, his leading premise is evidently without foundation and, secondly, he has suggested no remedy for the agricultural distress he mentions.

I shall continue to have faith in the statesmen who now govern this country, particularly the right hon. prime minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), who has ever shown throughout his long career a deep understanding of the realities of Canadian politics, inspired in all circumstances by a true Canadian patriotism and a great sense of social justice. Under his guidance, the administration will, I trust, take all steps required to improve the lot of our people, that of the good and the humble to whom the prime minister alluded in concluding his first address this session. The performance of this task will in no way hinder their furnishing to Great Britain the fullest measure of assistance we have promised her in this war which she is fighting so valorously and from which she will emerge triumphant and glorious.

Mr. A. H. BENCE (Saskatoon City): Mr. Speaker, upon rising to speak in this house for the first time I should like to take this opportunity of paying a tribute to my immediate predecessor from the city of Saskatoon. The late Reverend W. G. Brown was a man of the very highest character and ability, and one who was affectionately regarded by all those with whom he came in contact, regardless of their political affiliations. He came to this house from no selfish motive, for no reasons of self-advancement, but purely for the purpose of speaking on behalf of those people for whom he had laboured all the days of his life, men and women in destitute and necessitous circumstances. His passing was a great blow to the city from which I come and to this country which he loved so well.

This evening I wish to discuss two matters relating to western economy. I am not a farmer and I do not have that detailed knowledge of farming which can be acquired only by those actually engaged in that occupation, but I did spend some part of my youth on the farm. I am also a resident of the city of Saskatoon, which is the hub of the greatest hard wheat growing country in the world, and I know how vital the production and sale of our wheat are not only to the farmers themselves but to those residing in cities such as the one from which I come. I know how very much concerned we are in the west over the situation that exists out there at the present time. Only a very small fringe of the population of my city is actually engaged in farming, some 1,500 out of about 43,000 people, but every man and woman in my constituency is materially interested either directly or indirectly in agriculture and particularly in wheat and the price of it. The whole economy of my constituency, indeed of my province, depends upon the production of wheat and the money that is obtained for it.

It is bad enough to have to exist in an economy that is dependent upon a price of 70 cents for No. 1 northern at Fort William, which means about 52 cents in my district. That is a price which it is generally conceded is not sufficient to keep the farmer on the land as an efficient producer. I was pleased indeed, as I am sure many other members were, to hear the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) make that admission the other day when he stated in the house:

> It is generally admitted that 70 cents advance at Fort William, which nets the farmer about 50 cents a bushel, does not cover his total costs of production and therefore does not maintain him as a contented producer.

I like those words, "contented producer," because I am convinced that you cannot have an efficient producer unless you have one that is at least reasonably contented. May I express the hope that the hon. Minister of Agriculture will continue to impress that fact upon the house and upon the government of which he is a member?

It is bad enough, as I have said, to have to exist in an economy based on wheat at that price, but it is a very sorry situation indeed when we cannot obtain even that amount of money for our product. I have been listening and watching carefully to learn what statements would be made by the government in connection with an advance on wheat stored on the farm. The two ministers who were mainly concerned with this matter after the house adjourned last August, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon), have both addressed the house within the last week or so. The Minister of Agriculture had nothing to say about an advance on wheat stored on the farm, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce very little indeed. He contented himself, as I recall it, with stating that because the banks felt it was not a good risk, the government had to drop the matter.

The opinion was general throughout this land last August and September that the question of making an advance payment on wheat stored on the farm had already been settled. Indeed, some of us were taken to task because it was claimed that we were insisting upon something being considered which had already been decided upon. In proof of that fact I should like to quote briefly from an editorial in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of August 31, 1940, as follows:

> There has been a great deal of ineffective talk about the problem, a considerable effort to make use of it for political purposes and considerable demanding of things already assured.
> Thus, it is tremendously important that advances be made on the wheat left on farms. That has been recognized by everyone concerned from the start. It requires no emphasis. But away back in July Ottawa had already made the decision to make such advances. Several ministers announced it in the House of Commons and have repeated it since. Yet a vast amount of energy has been used up demanding that which was already decided.

That this feeling was not restricted to Saskatoon and to Saskatchewan is evidenced by a statement appearing in Canadian Finance of September 18, 1940, from which I quote as follows:

> But there have been definite statements from Ottawa that money is to be advanced to farmers on grain held in farm storage and it is generally assumed that the advances will be handled by the wheat board.

In addition to that, the Minister of Trade and Commerce on several occasions indicated most strongly that an advance would be made and that the only question was as to the exact method of working it out. As a result of the statements that were made and of the impression at least that was given, credit was granted in many cases by the merchants, but in many other instances that was impossible because the many years of drought and low prices had left the merchants of Saskatchewan in a position where they could not advance the credit they would like to have done.

I have received a letter written on behalf of the fuel merchants of western Canada pointing out to me that there were many farmers who would be in need of the delivery of coal but who could not purchase it because all the money they had received from the sale of their quota was required to pay immediate expenses—and that was after the quota had been raised to its present level. I quote from that letter, dated September 27, 1940, as follows:

> In the past it has been the practice for a farmer to bring in a load of grain and take out a load of coal—taking delivery from the car and thus saving unloading expense and perhaps getting a better quality of coal; this year, however, he has to utilize the money received from the little grain he can sell for payment of current expenses and this leaves him with little or nothing with which to purchase his fuel requirements. Cold weather will soon be upon us and these people will be looking for fuel; in nine cases out of ten the farmer will have utilized his full quota and he will, therefore, be unable to follow the practice of former years—that of selling wheat and taking out coal—and there are no coal dealers in western Canada prepared to sell fuel to the farmer without money, as their experience in this connection has been too sad over the past years.

Because of the fact that advances were not made a great deal of hardship resulted not only for the farmers but for merchants both rural and urban, and a trade paralysis resulted which never should have been allowed to arise.

The history of what happened after parliament adjourned last August would appear to be that the Minister of Trade and Commerce stayed in Ottawa for several weeks after the date he had intended to go on his holidays, to give this matter the grave consideration which it deserved. He received representations from all parts of western Canada—the prairies in any event—and the Bracken committee was called together, under the convenership of Premier John Bracken of Manitoba, and had a conference with the government and the wheat board. But the result of these representations and of the conference was a very sad one indeed as far as the western farmers and western merchants generally were concerned.

I believe that we should have from the Minister of Trade and Commerce a fuller statement than was given to this house by him the other day, and that he should tell us exactly what happened in this regard. It would appear from Canadian Press dispatches and other newspaper reports, and it was confirmed in part by the minister the other day, that the plan for an advance was cut short, and that one of the main reasons was that the banks were not prepared to make the advances under the guarantee offered by the government through the wheat board. In a Canadian Press dispatch from Edmonton dated September 16, the Minister of Trade and Commerce was quoted as having stated that the wheat committee was ready to go ahead with a plan for advances on wheat stored on farms, under a scheme similar to the home improvement plan, but that the banks were not prepared to accede to this proposition. What I should like to know, and what I believe many of the people of this country would like to know, is, exactly what took place between the wheat committee, the government and the banks, and all the reasons for the refusal of the banks to cooperate. It would appear that the federal government through the wheat committee were prepared to give only a limited guarantee. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is quoted in a Canadian Press dispatch from Edmonton on September 10, 1940, as follows:

> Outlining the efforts made during the past ten days and consultations with prairie province governments, bankers and others to work out a satisfactory plan, Mr. MacKinnon said:
> "There is an inclination by the provinces to put the full load on the doorstep of the dominion. Canadian chartered banks and elevator companies have refused to agree to a plan of advancing loans on the security of farm-stored grain, with a limited federal guarantee."

I should like to know, and I believe this house should know, what kind of guarantee the banks wanted, how high was the guarantee they were requiring, and how far the government and the wheat board were prepared to go in giving that guarantee, because it has never been suggested that the sum which the farmer would eventually get would not be forthcoming. He has been guaranteed his 70 cents advance, and I see no particular reason, although the government may not have the money in hand wherewith to pay it now, that it could not guarantee advances from the banks. There has never been any suggestion that the money would not be eventually paid. Why the government and the wheat board were not prepared to give a guarantee which was higher than the one suggested, namely a similar one to that provided under the home improvement plan, I do not understand. It is quite natural, of course, that the higher the guarantee which was given, the less should be the rate of interest and the less the return to the banks, because, after all, if the guarantee approaches one hundred per cent, there is no risk at all, and the only thing the bank would be entitled to would be a small carrying charge.

There was a second reason which was given, in addition to the one the banks were not prepared to cooperate. The suggestion was made by both the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Agriculture, at the time when these negotiations were taking place, last August and September, that the blame—some blame, in any event—should be placed upon the provincial governments for shirking their duty. It would appear that the dominion government was insisting that the provincial governments should enter into a joint guarantee on wheat credits, with the provincial and dominion governments sharing the risk, but that the provinces adopted the position that the responsibility was wholly that of the dominion. There appeared in the press statements such as the fact that the action of the provincial governments was a virtual abdication of their responsibility over property and civil rights, and a number of statements were given to the press by both of the hon. ministers, indicating that the provinces had not done what they should have done.

What I should like to know, and I believe we are entitled to know, is whether the fact that the provincial governments would not enter into a joint guarantee, was one of the main reasons why the advance was not made. If this is so, I should like the minister to explain why he thinks the provinces have a responsibility in this regard, and how the province of Saskatchewan, owing, as it does, millions of dollars to the dominion government and being in such a precarious financial position as to have difficulty in meeting its bond issues, could add anything by way of a guarantee which would assist the situation at all.

There was a great deal made at that time, particularly by the Minister of Agriculture, of the responsibility resting upon the shoulders of the provincial governments with respect to debt adjustment. It seems to me that the minister entirely misconceived the position. I hesitate to think that he was endeavouring to throw a red herring across the trail, but the whole point at issue was, from where was the money to be forthcoming with which the farmer could buy the necessities for existence over the winter. That was the whole point. It was not at all a question of debt adjustment, because we have ample debt adjustment legislation in the province of Saskatchewan. The whole question was that the merchants could not afford to extend credit to the farmers, much as they may have wanted to do so.

He seems also, I suggest, to have misconceived the position of the creditors in urging that the farmers should be given further protection. The bulk of the creditors are not large corporations and financially independent individuals, but are composed of many small merchants, machine dealers and so on, who have had a very difficult time financing over the years; and it seems to me that there has been too great a tendency in the past to discriminate against these small creditors. Surely those who are sufficiently kind-hearted to extend credit to the farmer because they know that he has to have certain essentials with which to carry on, and who were led to believe that the farmer would get at least a substantial part of his money, are entitled to some consideration. Furthermore the farmer is an honest man and he wants to pay his debts.

My information is that, although the quota has been raised to eight bushels generally and to higher amounts in certain sections, nevertheless farmers in many instances are not able to deliver their quota, for there is no space. It must be perfectly apparent to anyone, certainly to the wheat board, that no matter how high the board raises the quota, it is not going to help the farmer unless he is able to deliver his wheat to the granary. As a matter of fact the wheat board made that admission when they announced, on September 14, 1940, that the quota would be raised from five bushels to eight bushels. This is a quotation from a Canadian Press dispatch of that date with reference to the announcement:

> The announcement stressed that the board could not guarantee immediate storage space in the country for acceptance of this general increase in deliveries but promised a continuation of endeavours to distribute the total available space as fairly as possible.

On November 7, 1940, the Western Producer carried this statement, which is indicative of the situation:

> No Space for Wheat
> Recent weeks have seen the delivery quota increased for numerous stations in Saskatchewan. Some can now deliver 10 bushels per seeded acre, some 12 and some 15. Reports concerning these increased quotas lend an air of optimism to the Saskatchewan picture which is not fully justified. No matter what the quota farmers cannot deliver their wheat unless there is space in the elevators for it. Actually, because of lack of storage space, many farmers are unable to deliver the eight-bushel quota which would at least permit them to pay their threshing costs, municipal taxes along with other pressing dues and secure a few of the essential winter supplies.
> Continued reports show various districts where the quota has yet to give the relief it was designed to provide.

In discussing this matter I realize that there are many who will say, "Yes, there is a problem; there is a certain quantity of wheat still on the farms and the farmers would like to get their money, but, after all, the situation developed somewhat better than we anticipated and we will let it ride." I do not want to be in the position of being accused of threshing old straw, but as far as I am concerned, and as far as the western farmers and merchants are concerned, it is most important that arrangements should be made to provide for an advance on wheat stored on farms. More important than that, however, is the fact that, although from the figures given us the other day by the Minister of Agriculture and those given us by the Minister of Trade and Commerce it would appear that we are going to get rid of a fairly large quantity of wheat in the next few years and that we shall be able to deliver most of the 1940 crop by the end of the crop year, yet I believe that these ministers were too optimistic in their figures, and that the statements they made were not justified by any facts that they could present to the house. It seemed to me, as I listened to them, that there was a good deal of wishful thinking in what they said. I hope their optimism is justified, but even if we accept those figures at their face value, we have to meet this fact, that the whole of the 1941 crop will in all probability have to stay on the farms next winter and the farmers will have to be financed. Therefore, in discussing this matter in the house and out of it hon. members should be in a position to know the facts and to answer the questions that I have postulated this evening. Unless they are in a position to ascertain what the banks are prepared to do, what the dominion government is prepared to do, and what the provinces are prepared to do, how can they discuss the matter intelligently and offer constructive suggestions to the house?

I come now to another point relating to western economy, with which I wish to deal. It would appear that more and more factories are being built in Ontario and Quebec for the purpose of manufacturing war materials. It would appear that more and more industries are being set up for the purpose of furthering our war effort. Hundreds of millions of dollars are being spent in these two provinces, and as indicated this afternoon by the Minister of Labour, although there is not yet a shortage of labour generally, there is a probability of there being one soon. The forecast is that there will be a general shortage of labour and already, I understand, there is an acute shortage as far as some skilled occupations are concerned. Moreover, the suggestion has been made in this house, and at least in one newspaper that I noticed, that women will probably have to be called to assist in manufacturing work. While this is going on, there is at the same time a relief problem in the west.

An hon. MEMBER: And in the east.

Mr. BENCE: I realize that there is one in far eastern Canada, but I am only discussing the question from the point of view of the western provinces. It is true that the relief problem in the prairie provinces was not as great this summer as it had been in many of the years before. It was not as great this fall, either, but there are still many people on relief in Saskatoon, and it is anticipated that the number will be considerably augmented in the next few months, because the work they have been doing has been completed or nearly completed. They have been building air ports and barracks and similar construction, but after the work is done there is nothing further for them to do and they must go back on relief. These works in themselves will not give employment except to the army and navy, and unless we do something to build factories or industrial concerns, which will in themselves provide employment, we shall always have a problem on the western prairies.

Besides relief, there is a tremendous labour force on the farms, and a part of the farmer's product will not be wanted and he will have to be supported by the state either directly or indirectly. This anomaly of a great labour shortage in one part of the country and a great force of labour in another, idle and supported in large part from public funds, should not be allowed to continue without some strenuous efforts being made to correct it.

The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) explained the other day that the reason why so many of the industries for war purposes were being concentrated in Ontario and Quebec was that hydro-electric power made for low cost of production. He did not say that it was essential for efficient work; he did not say that the work could not be done in the west and in other parts of Canada just as quickly and efficiently as in Ontario and Quebec. The point he stressed was that it could be done more cheaply in these two provinces. Speaking to this house last May he said:

> I am greatly interested in just one thing, and that is getting the best material available in the shortest time and at the lowest price.

In the house the other day he said that he wished to conduct his department as he would a business concern. These are laudable sentiments and in a large measure we can all agree with them. One thing he seems to have forgotten is the fact that this is an effort by the whole of Canada and that the whole of Canada wishes to participate in providing essential war materials. I would suggest to him that if we could work out some scheme which, although possibly it would cost the department more money now, would in the long run save money for Canada, it would be a good thing.

We should look at the matter from a much broader point of view, and my suggestion is that at the risk of costing a little more now, so long as speed is not impaired, and so long as the war effort is not impeded, we should make a strenuous effort through the medium of war industry to divert the great labour force in western Canada and in other parts of the country outside Ontario and Quebec, at least in part, from their present occupations into essential war industries. In my own city war work on a smaller scale could be done now, but it may be that it could not be done at a price which would compete with that available in eastern Canada. There is a growing demand in the west to transfer labour from grain production to necessary war work. To bonus non-production, idleness or useless overproduction is economically unsound. We must have a diversified economy throughout our country, not only to assist in the war work but for post-war purposes.

There is an opportunity before us which we must not miss. If we do not take advantage of it now, we shall probably never have it again. The self-sufficiency which the European nations attained after the first great war, and the difficulty of getting a remunerative price for wheat in peace time, should be warning to us to take advantage of this opportunity when we have it. If we plan carefully and establish industries in other parts of Canada—and as I said I am not by any means confining myself to the prairies—in the long run we shall be able to save a great deal of money and establish the economic structure of this dominion on a sound basis. It is imperative that we do everything in our power to iron out the economic sectionalism which besets this country like a plague.

In conclusion I wish to associate myself most strongly and sincerely with those who have raised their voices in this house on behalf of the soldiers with regard to the request for free transportation. The Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Power) indicated I believe this afternoon that nothing was going to be done in this regard as far as Christmas leave is concerned. Well, I trust the government will not make that final. In any event I make this plea, that they do not allow any soldier, sailor or airman to go overseas without first having an opportunity to go and see his loved ones.

On motion of Mr. Gladstone the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

Friday, November 29, 1940.

The house met at three o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUSPENSION OF SPECIAL ORDER, TO PROCEED ON MONDAY WITH CERTAIN RESOLUTIONS RESPECTING WAR EFFORT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has a resolution or two which he would like to introduce on Monday next. The resolutions have to do with Canada's war effort, and I should therefore like now to move:

That on Monday next consideration of the special order relative to the debate on the address to His Excellency be suspended until the house has proceeded with and completed procedure in respect of certain resolutions to be introduced by the Minister of Finance.

This resolution, if accepted, will enable the minister to introduce his resolutions on Monday and, if favourably received by the house, to have them disposed of before the debate on the address is concluded.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there can be I think no objection to the procedure indicated by the Prime Minister, but we have not yet had indicated to us what these resolutions are. If we are to suspend the special order and then proceed to and complete discussion of the matters to which my right hon. friend has alluded before the debate on the address is resumed, should we not in fairness to the members of the house have some indication, even if in the most general terms, as to what is proposed? Under ordinary circumstances the resolutions would have to stand over for one day. I understand that the Prime Minister does not want that, but wishes to have the resolutions proceeded with on Monday. I presume they are of considerable importance, otherwise the right hon. gentleman would not interrupt the course of this debate. We wish to expedite the government's war effort, especially in anything that relates to finance. That is important at all times, but if the Minister of Finance would indicate at this time the nature of his proposals it might be of great benefit, to me at all events.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: All that can be said at the moment about the resolutions is that they relate to trade and taxation. I fully expected that hon. gentlemen opposite and other members of the house might wish after the resolutions were introduced, to have an opportunity of carefully considering them before beginning to discuss them, in which event I had in mind asking the house to agree during an interval to continue with the debate on the address.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That might be just as satisfactory.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe matters would work out satisfactorily in that way. I understand that it is the intention of the Minister of Finance to have the resolutions referred to the committee of ways and means. As the house is aware, the committee of ways and means and the committee of supply have not yet been set up. Standing order 57 provides that the first proceeding after the address has been agreed to is to appoint the two committees of the whole house, the one of supply and the other of ways and means. The standing order reads:

The house shall appoint the committees of supply, and ways and means, at the commencement of every session, so soon as an address has been agreed to, in answer to His Excellency's speech.

If the resolutions are to be referred to the committee of ways and means, before the debate on the address is concluded it will be necessary to suspend that rule.

Motion agreed to.

SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDER 57—COMMITTEES OF SUPPLY AND WAYS AND MEANS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Hon. members will have observed that I had placed on yesterday's votes and proceedings notice to suspend standing order 57 in regard to the establishment of a committee of supply and a committee of ways and means. I would therefore, with the consent of the house, move:

That this house will, at its next sitting, resolve itself into a committee to consider of a supply to be granted to his majesty, and that standing order 57 in relation thereto be suspended.

I shall introduce later a similar motion with respect to a committee of ways and means. Both committees will then be established.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to propose a similar motion with respect to a committee of ways and means:

That this house will, at its next sitting, resolve itself into a committee to consider the ways and means for raising the supply to be granted to his majesty, and that standing order 57 in relation thereto be suspended.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING ORDERS

ALBERTA PROVINCIAL BANK—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. W. H. GOLDING (Huron-Perth): With the unanimous consent of the house, I move:

That the first report of the standing committee on standing orders, presented yesterday, be now concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

WAR MATERIALS

REPORT AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF PLANT IN SASKATCHEWAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). The Regina Leader-Post of November 27 carried a news item to the effect that the government intended to establish in the near future a large war industry in the province of Saskatchewan, and indicated that a decision had been made in that regard. Is the minister prepared to advise the house whether the report is in accordance with the facts, and if so, whether a decision has been arrived at as to where this industry is to be located, and when the work will begin?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I have no knowledge of the subject matter of my hon. friend's question. In saying that, I should also say that it is quite possible that some of our officers are examining as to a location in that province, although I have no information that they are. But any statement that anything definite has been determined is premature, because if a definite proposal had been arrived at I would certainly have heard of it.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

CLOSING OF RECRUITING OFFICE AT FORT WILLIAM —CHANGE IN RECRUITING POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power). I have before me an editorial which appeared in the Times-Journal, of Fort William, stating that the recruiting office for the air force has been closed at the head of the lakes and the official removed to Winnipeg. As this office serves two large and live cities, many towns and villages and a large district around, I should like to know if it is not possible to have this office kept open. I am not suggesting that the Winnipeg officials be moved to the head of the lakes. But may I ask why this office was closed, and how will the district be now served?

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): My hon. friend was good enough to give me notice of this question. What is involved is simply a change in recruiting policy, whereby, instead of asking prospective recruits to come into our offices, we will go out to get them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a change.

Mr. POWER: We propose now that in certain districts our officers shall travel through the towns and villages in the area adjacent to the former recruiting offices and see the people anxious to join rather than have us wait for them to make application for the Royal Canadian Air Force. Amongst the centres which are being closed are Fort William, Niagara Falls and Kingston. Later, as the policy develops, possibly more will be closed.

Mr. McIVOR: Thank you.

COMMANDER CHARLES BEARD

QUESTION OF RETIREMENT OF FORMER OFFICER IN CHARGE OF THE Prince Robert

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): May I ask the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) a question? A good deal of controversy has arisen in the press and elsewhere regarding the "beaching" of Commander Charles Beard, who was in charge of the Canadian ship Prince Robert when it captured a German freighter off the coast of Mexico. If there is some reason for such action and an investigation has been held, is the minister prepared to tell the house and the country the result of that investigation?

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that my hon. friend has asked the question; he gave me notice of it just a few minutes before the house assembled. I understand that there has been some discussion in the papers on the Pacific coast and—more recently—in papers in other parts of Canada as to the causes of Commander Beard's retirement on sick leave. I will endeavour to give my hon. friend the story as best I have been able to assemble it in the short time since I received notice of his question.

In the first place, Commander Beard was retired from the Royal Canadian Navy in April, 1939, some months before the outbreak of war. He was retired as being in category E, and the medical examination at that time disclosed that, while his general physical condition was good, he was suffering from slight cardiac hypertrophy and elevation of blood pressure, which was 200-104, and some rigidity of the lumbar spine. The rigidity of the spine was due, I believe, to an accident which Commander Beard suffered while serving in the Mediterranean in 1920. While in charge of a bathing party, in diving from the deck of a ship he was injured, and that injury still persists. So, in April, 1939, we have him retired on the report of a medical officer who at that time classified him as category E.

In May, 1939, a board was held at Esquimalt to determine whether his injury was due to active service, and that board, after looking at the medical history, offered its opinion that the injury was due to active service. In the same month there was some discussion as to whether Commander Beard would be eligible for pension. That went on for some time. I should like to quote now what Captain Pace, of the Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, testified as to Beard's condition in May, 1939. He said there was: first, hypertrophic changes in the vertebral column, more particularly in the cervical region of the fourth and fifth lumbar vertebrae, and second, arteriosclerosis.

Then there was some discussion as to whether the injuries were due to war services. Captain Pace said that such injuries to the lumbar vertebrae might have been caused by diving; that the arteriosclerosis was trophic change, due probably to his years, and that the strain of his duties as a naval officer would probably tend to advance the arteriosclerotic condition. That is the evidence of Captain Pace of the Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps in May, 1939.

In November, 1939, Commander Beard, war having broken out, was taken back into the naval service and placed on duty with convoy ships proceeding to England. Later he was placed in charge of the Prince Robert and took that ship to sea on her first voyage after reconditioning into a merchant cruiser. From then on, the story runs somewhat like this. The medical officer on the ship expressed the opinion, from his observations of the commander, that arteriosclerotic changes had taken place, that they were serious, and that the commander was suffering from a moderate degree of hypertension. He recommended that some steps be taken at once to establish Commander Beard's physical fitness for service. This is another medical naval officer.

Then another surgeon, Surgeon Commander Johnstone, senior naval medical officer on the Pacific coast, looked into the matter, agreed with the surgeon on the ship, and said that he thought Commander Beard was unfit for further naval service owing to these ailments. That was early in October. Following that, a board was held at Esquimalt barracks on October 23. Two officers sat there to determine whether Commander Beard had a disability, whether it was attributable or not attributable to service. That board came to the conclusion that Commander Beard's injury was attributable to service in the Royal Canadian Navy.

Finally I will quote the opinion of independent doctors at St. Joseph's hospital, Victoria, where Commander Beard went shortly after he was allowed to leave the ship on sick leave. Stuart Kenning, M.D., St. Joseph's hospital, says that Commander Beard showed the following symptoms: Bradycardia; left venticular preponderance, and evidence of myocardial changes as due to coronary changes, and possible coronary thrombosis.

I understand that the report is being circulated on the Pacific coast that the doctors at St. Joseph's hospital have given Commander Beard a clean bill of health. My advice from our doctors here, taking the report of the doctor at St. Joseph's hospital, is that it is quite evident that Commander Beard is not a well man. That is the independent view of a doctor in the hospital at Victoria, who has been cited, on that coast and elsewhere, as having given Commander Beard a clean bill of health. Evidence is on file from several doctors, beginning as far back as April, 1939. The evidence was reviewed by other doctors, and its goes to show that Commander Beard, unfortunately, suffers from high blood pressure and other ailments resulting from that condition.

The opinion is all one way. It is regretted that things are as they are. Commander Beard took the ship out and, as has been pointed out, did a smart piece of work; but I am afraid, if I may venture my opinion as a layman, that the strain of commanding a ship in war time, to a man in Commander Beard's condition, is simply too much and that for his own sake he should not be put in that position, not to speak of course of the officers and men who have to serve under him.

Mr. BRUCE: I thank the minister for his explanation. As a professional man I concur in the view he has expressed.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Thursday, November 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Brooke Claxton for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Blackmore.

Mr. R. W. GLADSTONE (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I have chosen the supremacy of parliament as the theme of my remarks this afternoon. That is the issue that is fundamental in the great struggle in which we are engaged as a nation.

Regimentation is the antithesis of freedom. Situations are rampant in enemy countries, beside which the great disaster portrayed in Tennyson's "Charge of the Light Brigade" pales into insignificance.

> 'Forward, the Light Brigade!'
> Was there a man dismay'd?
> Not tho' the soldier knew
> Some one had blunder'd:
> Their's not to make reply,
> Their's not to reason why,
> Their's but to do and die:
> Into the valley of Death
> Rode the six hundred.

Regimentation in the armies of democracies has been reduced to the necessary discipline. More and more in modern warfare is individual initiative coming to be of paramount importance. True it is that formations must be maintained in air attacks, in tank offensives and in mechanical transport advances, but in the crucial moments pilots and operators must think and act on their own. So it is in democratic government. Party alignments represent certain definite views on such subjects as production and consumption, trade, finance, internal and external relations, and so on. Solidarity is maintained through harmonizing views and interests, by methods of give and take. At all times there is freedom to the individual member to vote according to his best judgment. That is the situation in this parliament of Canada. Canadians have not been and will not be regimented. That is why I have made bold to place on the order paper a resolution for discussion by parliament which reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to the matter of continuous participation by additional members of parliament in the responsibility of directing our war effort and of planning an after the war program for Canada.

My purpose to-day will be to lay the foundation for a discussion on the resolution which I am proposing.

I have secured from the Department of External Affairs a table of the personnel of his majesty's government formed by the Right Hon. Winston Churchill in May, 1940, with the changes of October 31, 1940. I believe this contains valuable information for hon. members, and with the permission of the house I desire to have it placed on Hansard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would not wish in any way to restrict the latitude to be given my hon. friend; I am only too desirous of his being afforded the widest latitude. I think however it is important for me to point out that my hon. friend is now debating a resolution which is on the order paper; according to his own words he is laying the foundation for continued debate with respect to that resolution. Speaking on the supremacy of parliament he probably knows that to preserve that supremacy no hon. member in a debate may discuss a resolution that is on the order paper except at the time the resolution itself is being discussed. My hon. friend's statement, if I understood him aright, was that his speech would be in relation to his resolution. If that be the case I am afraid it would be out of order. I mention this only in case subsequently some other hon. member may feel he has a right to take the same method of debating resolutions in the course of the debate on the address. I should not like it to be thought or said that I had permitted to one of my own loyal supporters a course or proceeding which I was denying to others.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course the Prime Minister's point is well taken. I am sorry, as he is, to seem to restrict discussion in any way, but rules are rules, and I am afraid we are observing them too often in the breach. We ought to agree to observe the rules. It is the only orderly way to conduct the proceedings of parliament.

Mr. GLADSTONE: I desire to keep myself within the rules, and I think it will be found as my speech develops that I shall make some constructive suggestions, offer some criticism in places, and that as a whole my remarks will be of assistance in promoting the efficiency of the administration of parliament.

In view of the objection taken I will pass over one item, which however I think would scarcely have been objectionable. May I be permitted to indicate the extent to which members of parliament participate in the administration in the British houses of parliament? They have a war cabinet of eight members. The ministers number twenty-eight, the parliamentary secretaries twenty-nine; that is, there is a total of sixty-five members of the British ministry. Canada has eighteen cabinet ministers. Ontario has fourteen cabinet ministers, of which two are without portfolio but with salaries. Quebec has fourteen cabinet ministers, of whom eight are ministers without portfolio but with salaries in addition to indemnity.

Let me discuss now the organization that is directing our war effort in Canada. I shall do so under two headings: (1) the cabinet, and (2) the non-cabinet.

Canada is fortunate to-day in having a strong cabinet. Each department of the government is presided over by an able administrator. I shall not have time to speak of the qualifications and work of each minister, but I should like to pay tribute to a few of our ministers who are occupying key positions.

First, the Prime Minister. It is a matter of the utmost satisfaction that we have as our national leader one who has in a large way the confidence of the people of Canada, the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King. He brings to the situation long experience, reliable judgment, and a discernment of trends—shall I say a psychic sense?—that enables him to do the right thing at the right time. Things do not happen by chance with the present Prime Minister; they are well planned, perhaps long planned, and invariably sound.

The Minister of Justice. Here again Canada has reason for great thanks for our fine Canadian Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) —justice administered by a just man. Difficult situations are dealt with in a broadminded spirit, leniently if possible but with the firmness that is imperative in time of war. The Minister of Justice is one of the coordinators of the two races, held in high esteem by Canadians of English ancestry. I am sure the Prime Minister will not mind, having regard to the limitations of his unmarried status, if I say that the Minister of Justice is the most loved man in Canadian public life.

What a triumvirate we have here in Ralston, Power and Macdonald—names that spell ability and reliability; Ralston, the soldier, the lawyer, the business man, the organizer, keen minded and kind hearted; Power, the man who will brush aside red tape and get things done. Here we have men who will face up to Hitler and Goering, with fists clenched, and smite them between the eyes. Then how can I do justice to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe)? To me he seems to have been trained for years for the great emergency of to-day—a skilled engineer, an experienced executive, quiet working and genial. In the last war there was not a man his equal connected with munitions. I might go on and tell of the high qualities of other ministers, but time will not permit. If there be weakness to-day who will say it is to be found in lack of patriotism? If there be weakness to-day who will say that there exist selfish or dishonest purposes? If there be weakness it must be due to an organization which is inadequate to meet the colossal demands.

This brings me to a consideration of the non-cabinet organization. During recent months I have gone about the city from department to department, and I am sure any person who does this must be impressed with the tremendous organization that has been created in many governmental departments. According to reports that have been tabled there has been an increase of some five thousand in the number of persons employed by the government in Ottawa since the beginning of the war, so that now we have some 16,500 persons in the service of the government in this city. It does seem to me that the task of supervising an organization consisting of 16,500 people is a very great undertaking for a cabinet consisting of eighteen ministers. In some ways, and I believe many hon. members feel as I do, it seems like the tail wagging the dog. As I go along the streets I see hundreds of people going to and from work. Just how appointments to these positions have been made, private members do not know, but the feeling is that these are not political appointments, that if there has been anything in the way of pull in connection with the appointments it has been personal rather than political.

A question was placed on the order paper concerning the appointment of a gentleman who happened to be a defeated Liberal candidate. The hon. member who asked that question in all fairness might have asked at the same time with regard to the appointment of other defeated candidates. I believe there are four defeated candidates in the service of the government to-day, two being former Liberals, one a Conservative and one a member of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party. This seems to be a fair distribution.

We have listened to exhaustive reports by various ministers concerning our achievements in this war. Many speeches have been made, some of praise and some of moderate criticism. Taking the debate as a whole it seems to have been exceedingly difficult to find any vulnerable point to attack on the government's record. One of the great achievements that will be mentioned when the history of this administration is written is the establishment of price control, the benefit of which is being realized more and more as the war progresses and which will be of great value in adjusting the situation at the conclusion of the war. The basis of letting contracts is such that it would seem impossible for large profits to be made. Tenders are awarded on a price basis, and, so far as one can ascertain, high prices are not being paid for war materials. The total results so far in connection with our war effort represent a distinct achievement, and indicate very efficient handling of such a colossal enterprise.

Suggestions have been made for strengthening the administration. I should like to advance three suggestions, and in doing so I hope I will not intrude too much upon the resolution to which reference has been made already.

First I would suggest the creation of a department under a head to be known by some such name as Promoter of Economies; second, the establishment of an inner council both in war and in peace; and, third, the creation of parliamentary secretaries.

During the years I have been in parliament my speeches have been few, and those speeches have been directed toward improveing the efficiency of government and lowering its cost. The first time I spoke I made reference to the form in which the estimates for the expenditure of money were presented to parliament. On that occasion I received a great deal of help in the surveys I made of the different departments, particularly from Mr. Watson Sellar, at that time comptroller of the treasury and now auditor general. I am glad to note that following the improvement of methods a few years ago of presenting the estimates to parliament, there comes this year a corresponding improvement in the presentation of the auditor general's report. I suggest that a small expenditure of money, possibly of only $30,000 in a department in connection with the services of a man who could be known as Promoter of Economies, would save to this country at least a million dollars a year. Of course such a man would not be popular—perhaps no more popular than a certain small animal which on occasions intrudes at garden parties. Later however he would be recognized as the friend of efficient employees, and would help lift them out of ruts into better positions. What a useful buffer a person of this type in a position of the kind suggested would be for the government when it was endeavouring to turn down needless expenditures of money.

I should like to make some observations in connection with the formation of an inner council both in war time and in peace time. I am sure it is recognized that a large cabinet is unwieldy, and that it is a distinct advantage, in connection with many matters which may arise, to have consideration and action carried out, so far as possible, by a small group of men. It does seem to me that a prime minister in such an inner council could gather about him some of the best men of the administration. These men should be given the time to have their desks cleared so that they would be in a position to meet members and deputations, and even to go about the country making close contact with the people and learning about living conditions. With their freedom of action these men could function as acting ministers on occasions when ministers found it necessary to be absent.

I should like to make one or two observations respecting parliamentary secretaries. May I be permitted to say there is one weakness in connection with the present system, and that weakness I shall now discuss. When a minister shifts from one department to another it is the practice that his private secretary accompanies him. During his service in the department in which he first served, the private secretary would undoubtedly build up a knowledge of the department and of the people connected with it. In making a transfer to another department this entire experience and knowledge is lost. It would be a distinct advantage if the private secretary, or, in substitution therefor, a parliamentary secretary, could remain in the department in order that there might be an opportunity of his gaining a full knowledge of the affairs of that department, to the great benefit of any minister who might come from another department. In his duties both in and outside the house the assistance of a parliamentary secretary would on many occasions be of great value to a minister.

It is inevitable that in huge organizations, such as that which has been built up in the Department of Munitions and Supply, persons not associated with parliament will at times endeavour to extend favours to friends. This is something it is difficult to guard against, but for which the government must take responsibility.

The hazard of overwork on the part of the ministers is another very important consideration. We can be grateful that that has not happened too frequently in Canada, but I am sure all will agree that every precaution should be taken to preserve the health of the splendid men we have in the administration, so that particularly during these strenuous days there may be no interruptions.

Some times we have heard complaints from hon. members respecting the difficulty about seeing ministers. This complaint, however, I do not regard as serious. I am sure that the ministers are desirous so far as possible of seeing hon. members, and that, despite the heavy load the ministers are carrying, they extend to hon. members every courtesy. Apropos of the difficulty of obtaining an interview, one person has said—and I give this knowing it to be an exaggeration—"One has to ask the clerk to ask the minister's assistant private secretary to ask the private secretary to ask the minister for an interview."

I wish again to emphasize how very fortunate it is at this time that the direction of the country's affairs is in the hands of one so sound and so skilful in planning as is the Prime Minister of Canada. It seems to me the one great achievement which stands out above all others is the relationship brought about between Canada and the United States under the agreement consummated at Ogdensburg. These better relations and this feeling of good neighbourliness have not arisen by chance. They have come about through deliberate policies looking to the cultivation of extended trade, and, in various ways, to promoting good feeling between the two countries. What a wonderful achievement it has been becomes more apparent from day to day as we witness the contribution which in one way or another is being made by the United States to the nations within the British commonwealth in order to help them in their great struggle against the totalitarian powers in Europe.

I have in my hand a booklet—the annual publication of the Colonel John McCrae Memorial Branch of the Canadian Legion. My home city of Guelph, in the county of Wellington, was the birthplace of Doctor John McCrae. On one page of this booklet I find a picture of two soldiers of the present war who are looking at a plaque which bears the words:

Birthplace of Lieutenant-Colonel John McCrae, doctor, soldier, poet: 1872-1918.

On another page there is a picture of John McCrae and Bonneau, his dog, in Flanders. Let me try to give a picture of what I saw at the Remembrance day service on Sunday, November 10, at the Capitol theatre in Guelph.

As the curtain rises a lighted cross appears in the centre of the dark background bearing the words "Lest We Forget." To the left of the cross are the grass-covered mounds of two graves. By the side of one of them is one of our charming young girls, Miss Gray, a daughter of the immediate past president, Mr. Leslie W. Gray. Miss Gray is kneeling beside the grave, placing poppies on it. Two soldiers of the present war come in, representing the army and the air force. One of them speaks to the young lady in French, and she answers, "I am British. This is British soil. This soil is dedicated to Canada as a memorial to the Canadian soldiers who fought in the last great war. This is the grave of Colonel John McCrae."

Then two soldiers of the last great war—the fathers of the two soldiers of the present war—come in at the left, one bearing a lighted torch, which in the course of the ceremony he hands to his son, one of the soldiers of the present war. Then the young lady stands up and recites the famous poem written by Colonel John McCrae, "In Flanders' Fields":

> In Flanders' fields the poppies blow
> Between the crosses, row on row,
> That mark our place, and in the sky
> The larks still singing bravely fly,
> Scarce heard amid the guns below.
> We are the dead. Short days ago
> We lived, felt dawn, saw sunset glow,
> Loved and were loved, and now we lie
> In Flanders' fields.

Fellow members of parliament, the torch is handed to us now to carry on as best we may in the great struggle in which the nation is engaged. May God in heaven give us strength to be equal to our great trust and responsibility.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate in this debate I cannot help expressing my disappointment at the apparent lack of enthusiasm which has characterized this debate since it began. Several members have commented to me in the corridors that interest in the debate seems to be lacking, that the debate is listless, a bit dull, devoid of enthusiasm. Perhaps I shall not add very much enthusiasm to it. I do not altogether blame hon. members. I rather think it is the result of a sort of hush-hush policy which seems to characterize the present administration, and which I think indicates the wisdom of the amendment moved by the opposition with regard to the government's efforts to soothe the Canadian people and create a false sense of security.

Members of parliament are not immune to being soothed. There was an occasion during the present debate when I counted the number of members present. I found that there were only sixteen Liberal members in the chamber, with one cabinet minister. I recognize of course that the cabinet ministers are exceptionally busy men and that because of that we have excused them from constant attendance in the chamber. Nevertheless there were only sixteen Liberals present, and twenty-one opposition members, and at the particular time when I counted them the leader of every opposition group was present.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Who was speaking at the time?

Mr. HANSELL: I will tell the hon. Minister of Justice who was speaking at the time, but before mentioning him I suggest that he is one of the ablest speakers we have in the house to-day. It was the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas). I am not saying that there have not been powerful speeches made in this debate; I know there have been. But I am saying that there is a danger of this house drifting into what the Hon. Leslie Hore-Belisha described recently in speaking of the British house as a "decline in parliamentary vitality."

Moving from the House of Commons to the realm of the Canadian people, I think I can say that the hush-hush policy is having its effect upon the public too. We live in what is supposed to be a democratic country, where we boast of our democratic rights, our liberties and our freedom. I am not belittling these things. I am glad indeed to be a freeborn citizen of a democratic empire. But speaking of political democracy may I say that it appears to me at least that the rights of a democratic people end with the ballot box. Oh yes, we urge our people to go to the polls and vote. We even spend a lot of money in getting cars to transport the voters from their homes to the polls, and sometimes on the way there we tell them how to vote.

Mr. BRADETTE: Speak for yourself.

Mr. BLACKMORE: He is speaking generally for the Liberal party.

[Mr. Hansell.]

Mr. HANSELL: After they have put their ballots in the ballot boxes, the impression gained throughout the country is that they must say no more.

Mr. BRADETTE: Page Alberta.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The Liberals in Alberta.

Mr. BRADETTE: The Social Crediters in Alberta.

Mr. BLACKMORE: They have not got the money.

Mr. BRADETTE: The Liberals are not in power in Alberta.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): But they certainly are in Canada.

Mr. HANSELL: Let me say here that we of this group most sincerely believe that every fifth columnist, every person who makes utterances designed to cause disaffection to his majesty, every person who influences men against enlistment, should be punished. But I add that in a democracy men should be free, absolutely free, to criticize a government in truth and soberness when they feel such criticism is needful. Yesterday the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) referred to the necessity for courage in this house, in this government and in our war effort. I agree with him, and I add, we should have courage to speak freely and boldly in criticism of the government, their policy and their action.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Especially their lack of action.

Mr. HANSELL: Anything which would stifle such criticism, either within this house or outside it, is the very converse of democracy. It seems to me that the government have gone too far in the administration of the defence of Canada regulations. I am not criticizing the regulations themselves but I am raising my voice against a policy which tends to instil fear into a free people. I believe there is a fear which characterizes people in Canada to-day, the fear lest, in talking about politics, talking concerning what the government is doing or not doing, they may turn around and find themselves face to face with a row of brass buttons. I have sensed that in talking to people. This sense of fear is characteristic of a dictatorship; it is the very antithesis of democracy. I think I can go so far as to say it gives the lie to the principle of a land of free men.

I suggest in all seriousness that the government is wrong psychologically in permitting such a condition of fear to permeate our democracy. It may be that through fear, criticism can be stopped; it may be that people may thus be induced to cease talking. But you cannot stop people from thinking. I repeat that the administration is making in this matter a huge psychological mistake. As Mr. J. B. Priestley has said, in writing of the people's readiness for the enlargement of democratic principles:

> They are ready to break Herr Hitler, but they are also ready to break any imitation Hitlers nearer home.

Our administration here appears to have gone too far along this line, and much farther than they have gone in England, where they are in the midst of the struggle. The criticism of the government there is comparatively free. My mother and father are living to-day in an English city which has been bombed a good many times. Naturally I am interested in how goes the battle over there, and occasionally I buy a British newspaper. I must say that I am astonished to discover how free the press of Great Britain is to criticize the government's actions and policies. Mark you, I do not say that they criticize the effort which is put forward to carry on the war, but they are free in their political discussions to take issue with government action and policy. I have here a number of clippings from a British paper. I am not going to read them all, but here is one.

> Disaster, if it comes, will be from weak handling of our affairs.

In another place the following comment appears concerning Mr. Churchill's cabinet changes:

> Mr. Churchill's cabinet changes remind me of a bunch of seedy stage-hands dragging off the scenery from "Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves," and then dumping it in the sunlight outside the stage door. They wait for a few moments, turn it upside down, shove it back on the stage, and then announce that everything is ready for a grand new performance of "Where the Rainbow Ends."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Who said that?

Mr. HANSELL: That is a clipping from the Daily Mirror of October 4.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): New York?

Mr. HANSELL: No, no. This is an English newspaper. I am talking about what is happening in England. Here is another cutting; it is headed, "No-Brains Trust." I do not know whether I need read it all. But in the middle of it, speaking also of Mr. Churchill, this statement appears:

> He has imagination. But he has an odd taste for the retention of failures and fumblers. Others may regret that Mr. Churchill did not make a far more complete reconstruction when he took over from the old No-Brains Trust.

Mr. REID: Does the hon. member think that it is exactly fair, in discussing the defence of Canada regulations, to compare the people of this country, who are of various nationalities, with the people of the old country?

Mr. HANSELL: I will not deny that there is some force in the question of my hon. friend. I recognize that we have in Canada a variety of nationalities, but I believe that persons who come from other countries and are naturalized citizens should be free to criticize the government of the country of their adoption.

Mr. BRADETTE: They certainly have that right and they use it now.

Mr. HANSELL: My point is that they do not feel free now to do so.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Does the hon. member know that things much worse have been written and said about the government and about myself without anyone interfering? Why say that these things cannot be said? This is light literature compared to what I have read about myself.

Mr. HANSELL: I am not saying that they cannot be said. I am criticizing what I believe to be a psychological blunder on the part of the present administration. I make no bones about this since the discussion has arisen. I might refer to the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen), who sits beside me. We all know that the very speeches she delivered in the House of Commons were published—I was not going to mention this. What happened? They were collected by the police. A policeman goes to a door and knocks. A woman comes to the door and she says to herself, "What's this? I have never had a policeman call at my door before." She goes in fear and trembling. The policeman may say, "Have you any pamphlets like this?" If she says yes, he will say, "Let me have them." What is the psychological result? That is what I am asking and that is why I am raising my voice to-day.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): No answer to that, you notice.

Mr. HANSELL: I could go further with these clippings but I have not very much time.

Now I come to a matter which I wish to bring to the attention of the house, and I do not want to be misunderstood. All hon. members, I believe, have received copies of a very clever pamphlet. I am not criticizing it. It is got out by the bureau of information and is known as "The Two Ways of Life."

I am using it as a basis for further remarks along this line. I compliment the government upon it. Whoever was behind it is really a genius. It is well got up, it is attractive mechanically, and it is printed in several languages, but it is very clever politically. I am going to analyse it a little, referring to one or two things as I go along.

On one page of this pamphlet we see pictures of the dictatorship regime, and on the corresponding page we see pictures of the democratic regime as seen here in Canada. On page 6 I find this caption, "Parliament Destroyed," with pictures showing the burning of the Reichstag. That is all right; that is true. On page 7 I find a picture, "Parliament Preserved." The parliament buildings are seen, with the interior of this chamber, and there are some sentences indicating that the Canadian parliament is the symbol and machinery of political freedom. I have no criticism to make about that. Now we come to page 8. Here are some pictures taken in the dictator countries, and the title is, "The Public Gagged."

That is quite right and I think that these pictures will emphasize it. On page 9, coming to Canada, there is the caption, "Free Speech." One sentence reads: "Free speech is essential to democracy." That is correct. On the same page there is another sentence: "Citizens express opinions freely." I will not say that is one hundred per cent correct. When we come to page 10 we find that religion in the dictatorship countries is despised. There are some very good pictures and I think they are true. If there is one thing that is nauseating to the people of Canada and of other democratic countries it is the fact that in the dictatorship countries religion is despised. On page 11 the caption with reference to Canada is, "Religion is Exalted." There is one sentence which reads:

Under the democratic way of life citizens are free to worship according to their beliefs.

That is not altogether true.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the hon. member repeat that?

Mr. HANSELL: The caption says that religion is exalted. There is the interior of a church and there is also a picture of a woman saying grace at the table, with some little children in the attitude of prayer. That is all right; I am not criticizing it. The sentence is that under the democratic way of life citizens are free to worship according to their beliefs.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Hear, hear.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member says that is not true. He ought to enlarge that statement.

Mr. HANSELL: I will explain. I am referring to the defence of Canada regulations, and in speaking along this line I wish it to be known that I have no brief whatsoever for the sect known as the International Bible Students, commonly known as Russellites. I do not believe their literature.

Mr. BRADETTE: Are you in favour of them?

Mr. HANSELL: No, I am not. I am telling my hon. friend that I do not believe in them; I do not belong to them. At home I have a shelf—but I had better not say this or a policeman may call at my door.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No chance.

Mr. HANSELL: In my library at home there is a shelf with books on it which I call my spurious shelf and on it I have some books published by the International Bible Students. That is how much I think they are right. But I am discussing the fact that there is a religious sect that cannot worship as they like.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They can worship but they cannot prosyletize.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): They have not the same freedom that others have.

Mr. HANSELL: Their organization has been declared illegal.

Mr. BRADETTE: And rightly so.

Mr. HANSELL: Under section 39 there are a number of provisions that would indicate that if these people are seen congregated they are liable to prosecution. I am simply saying that in my opinion the defence of Canada regulations in that regard have gone a little too far. I quite believe that if one of these Russellites got up on a platform and declared that men should not fight for their liberties, if he tore down the flag and all that sort of thing, he should be brought to time and convicted accordingly. But I do not see why we should not, under the defence of Canada regulations, permit absolute freedom of worship as one's conscience dictates.

We have some sects that have been referred to before, and I have a very great respect for some of these people. I refer to the Doukhobors. I have a number of them in my constituency. I am not going to say that they are subversive at all, but they do not believe in participating in our war effort. Yet they are allowed to worship as they desire, and they are not declared illegal. I am not saying they should be, but I think there is an unfairness there. Section 39C of the defence of Canada regulations reads:

(2) Every person who after the publication of this regulation in the Canada Gazette continues to be or becomes an officer or member of an illegal organization, or professes to be such, or who advocates or defends the acts, principles or policies of such illegal organization shall be guilty of an offence against this regulation.

(3) In any prosecution under this regulation, if it be proved that the person charged has

(a) attended meetings of an illegal organization; or

(b) spoken publicly in advocacy of an illegal organization; or

(c) distributed literature of an illegal organization by circulation through the post office mails of Canada, or otherwise; it shall be presumed, in the absence of proof to the contrary, that he is a member of such illegal organization.

Now that is dangerous. I am not suggesting for a moment that any administration would go as far as "planting" a member. But where there is freedom of speech in democracy, political freedom, no member in his utterances and criticism of government action and policy should run the risk of being influenced by fear that he may be even "planted". It is not impossible to do a thing like that. I happen to be connected with a small college. I hold rather an important position on the board of directors. Suppose the question arose of my mailing to students a copy of something that the International Bible Students publish, in order that those students may study what this sect teaches. Well, I am not going to do that. Why? Because I fear doing it.

Mr. MacNICOL: Why?

Mr. HANSELL: I may not be right in this, but I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that a member who becomes a political menace to the existing administration could be "framed", and is in danger at least of all the possible force and all the possible intrigue being levelled against him in order to destroy him.

Mr. WOOD: Is that an exhibition of your courage?

Mr. HANSELL: I am letting that question go unanswered. If the hon. member had been through as many dirty, rotten political campaigns as we members in this group have been through, he would not question anyone's courage.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): And some of them got put in gaol for six months with hard labour. Political sculduggery.

Mr. HANSELL: Let me go on further with this little pamphlet. I repeat, I am not criticizing the pamphlet itself. On page 12 we find some pictures with the title "Political Murder". That is right; we know that in dictatorship countries they think nothing of getting rid of political opponents by standing them against the wall and shooting them. On page 13 when it depicts political liberty in Canada it says:

Now, that is a good picture. I notice that the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) is speaking—and by the way he is reading his speech.

Mr. BRADETTE: He is not the only guilty one.

Mr. HANSELL: They did not get all the chamber in the picture; they have cut off this end of the chamber. The only member of these groups shown is the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). That is neither here nor there; but here is a clever touch—I do not think I have seen anything more clever. At the top right-hand corner of this little picture there is represented a clipping from a newspaper. It may be a fictitious one but it is very clever. It says:

Opposition wins another seat.
Toronto, February 15.—A recount of the votes cast in the February 1st election gave the opposition one more seat in the new legislative assembly.

Mr. MacNICOL: They had better take some more pictures.

Mr. HANSELL (reading):

Mr. Justice Campbell supervised the recount, which resulted in a majority of eleven votes for . . .

And there it is cut off.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the idea?

Mr. HANSELL: The idea is this: Of course we have to admit, say the government, that it is possible to elect an opposition member, but the one who is elected is elected by a very slim majority. We are still in harness. They may beat us occasionally, but not by very much.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Wait and see.

Mr. HANSELL: It says on the same page:

Critics of the government serve an important function in the Canadian parliamentary system.

I believe that is so, but here I am going to make a little comment. On several occasions in this house during this present session

hon. members have risen and urged upon the government that it give free transportation to soldiers for Christmas leave. Every time any hon. member has urged that action, whether he be a Liberal member or an opposition member, the Liberal side has applauded the suggestion. Yesterday the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Power), making his announcement for the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), positively stated; "It is no use, gentlemen; our policy is that no free transportation will be granted." That was final. Now, what happens? The hon. member for Weyburn yesterday afternoon urged once again that free transportation be granted. Did I hear applause from all those seats then?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, from here.

Mr. HANSELL: Do not misjudge—yes; the opposition did, but not one Liberal member applauded. Why?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): They were whipped into line.

Mr. McNEVIN: You are mistaken, sir. I applauded.

An hon. MEMBER: There is one who will never make the Senate.

Mr. HANSELL: I compliment my hon. friend upon his courage. But there was a very marked difference between the applause then and that of earlier times when this matter was brought up.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Did my hon. friend say there were only sixteen Liberal members present at the time?

Mr. HANSELL: That is true; sixteen were here, and one applauded.

On page 16 of this little pamphlet we find, speaking of dictator countries, the caption, "Slave Labour in Dictatorship Countries." I think that is generally true. On page 17 we find a Canadian picture with the caption "Free Labour," and one sentence reads:

Recognition of the freedom and dignity of labour is essential to the democratic way of life.

That is true, but another sentence reads: "Canadian factory workers are free men." That is only partly true. Apparently this is a picture of a number of workers leaving a factory. They are laughing and joking; two or three of the men have their hats in the air, while others are waving. It looks as though they were going to a picnic instead of going home from work. That does not matter; it is a good picture, and once more I say it is very clever. But I could substitute another picture for it, a picture I happen to have. My picture shows two or three hundred men trying to get a ride on a freight train.

An hon. MEMBER: Are they soldiers?

Mr. HANSELL: No, they are not soldiers; this picture was taken a few years ago. These men were looking for work but could not find it; no doubt some of them are still looking for it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am only half way through my speech but I see my time is rapidly becoming exhausted; I have been interrupted a number of times.

Another dictator picture appears in this pamphlet on page 20, under the heading "Electoral Slavery". It shows a man in one of the dictatorship countries marking his ballot while another man in uniform stands watching to see how he votes. On page 21 we see another clever Canadian picture, showing three men going to vote. The one dropping his ballot in the box looks as though he might be a clerk in a store. The man behind him looks as though he might be a shoemaker; he is wearing an apron. The third man is dressed in a coat a little too large for him and his bowler hat is coming down over his ears a bit. Well, they are the general type of our working people. Then there is a ballot, presumably a facsimile of an actual ballot. I do not criticize this picture very much, but the first name on the ballot is that of Pierre Blanchette, and the X is marked opposite his name. I think perhaps he was a fairly good Liberal. Next is the name of Mr. Arthur Hamon, a farmer. He did not get the vote. Next is Joseph O'Neil, Eastview, gentleman. He did not get the vote. The fourth name is that of John Thomas Smith, merchant. He did not get the vote either. Mr. Pierre Blanchette, who got the vote, is said to be a barrister; and these men, representing the rank and file of our people, are casting their ballots. You can see the psychology of all this; whether or not it was intended I do not know.

Mrs. NIELSEN: And not a woman's name on the list?

Mr. HANSELL: No.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): If I am not mistaken that is an exact facsimile of the ballot contained in the election law; at any rate these are the same names.

Mr. HANSELL: It may be; I do not say it is not. I have been interrupted a good many times, Mr. Speaker, and I want to remind hon. members that I am not criticizing this; I am pointing out the clever psychology underlying the whole thing. I do not say this is not a good pamphlet.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to have to inform the hon. gentleman that his time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Five minutes more.

Mr. SPEAKER: If it is the pleasure of the house.

Mr. HANSELL: The next part of my speech, Mr. Speaker, deals with an entirely different matter. I regret very much that I have not time to complete it.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Go ahead.

Mr. HANSELL: No; it would take more than five minutes. Therefore I thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will save what I have to say for another occasion.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It was a good speech, anyway.

Mr. R. M. WARREN (Renfrew North): Mr. Speaker, I am just a little concerned now, after seeing how the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) had just got nicely started on his speech by the time his forty minutes expired, as to whether or not I have prepared too much material. I propose to dispense with the preliminaries with regard to the mover and the seconder of the address. I need only say that I endorse the fine things that were said in reference to those two hon. gentlemen and the speeches they made.

I have been greatly impressed with many of the addresses which have been made during the course of this debate, particularly those by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the various members of his cabinet. The addresses to which we have listened contained much valuable information and told a story of achievement and progress in our war effort of which we as Canadians should be proud and for which we have no reason whatever to be ashamed.

I should like to refer particularly to one member of the cabinet; that is, the hon. member for Kingston City (Mr. Macdonald). I have already informed the hon. member that we in eastern Ontario, and particularly we in the constituency of Renfrew North, regard him as rather a special cabinet minister as far as we are concerned. He takes the place of the late Hon. Mr. Rogers, who was taken from us in such a tragic manner and in whom, during his term of office, we of Renfrew North always had a splendid friend, supporter and helper whenever we needed the benefit of his wisdom and advice in carrying on the affairs of our constituency. The hon. member for Kingston City made a most remarkable contribution to this debate. His splendid appearance, his musical voice and his wonderful command of the English language made his address a pleasure indeed to hear.

For just a moment I should like to refer to some of the statements made by the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) concerning conditions at the military camp at Petawawa. The hon. member complained of the climate and of the distance of the camp from any large centre of population. I should like to say to the hon. member that in my opinion the soldiers at Petawawa will not suffer any more during the winter months than they would suffer at times in such districts as Kingston or even Toronto. I know when there is an east wind blowing off the open water toward the city of Toronto, one may suffer a good deal more from cold than he would if he were in the drier climate of a district such as Petawawa.

Then, the desirability of having the camps nearer larger centres is a point which could be argued. I believe some officers in the army would not agree that it is always advantageous to have a camp located outside a large centre of population. At the camp in question we have something which, I am sure, will be appreciated during the winter months, namely, an abundant supply of wood of all kinds to be used as fuel, and which can be supplied for only the cost of cutting and hauling. While that wood may be cut under the supervision of forestry officials, so as to prevent its being slashed down indiscriminately, there will be a good supply of fuel and at the same time the best timber will be left standing. Where there is a hundred square miles of bush there can be no doubt as to there being an abundant supply of cheap fuel for many years to come.

Splendid contributions have been made to the debate by hon. members from all parts of the house. I would refer particularly to a portion of the speech made yesterday by the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth). At page 490 of Hansard he is reported to have said:

> There is no one who would at any time question the courage of the men in our army, our air force, and our navy. The fact that they are in the service is sufficient evidence of their courage. But we must have courage in other places in this country. We must have courage in this house. We must have courage in this government—courage to do the things which are necessary to the war effort, courage to pass such laws as are necessary to give the greatest help we can to the mother country in this hour of extreme peril. I feel that sometimes we are inclined to softpedal some of our responsibilities because of some political effect that action might have on portions of our population. That thing must not be. Here in this house, and particularly with the ministers, there must be courage to face these issues as we have never faced issues before.

I compliment the hon. member for Waterloo South upon that statement; but I believe I would go farther and say that private members in the house ought to keep in mind that we, too, require courage in facing any issue which may come before us in these years of war and peril.

I have been impressed with this fact: In the early days of the session the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) made it clear that it would not be practicable to give free transportation to soldiers. Yet, as was stated by the hon. member for Macleod, from all quarters of this chamber we have heard plea after plea asking for free transportation for the soldiers. Sometimes, when I have listened to those pleas, I have wondered whether they have been made because those who make them know that it is the popular attitude to take. I wonder whether sometimes it is a display of lack of courage, and an indication that we would rather travel the easy path and support the popular proposal. I am sure all hon. members would like to be able to help each soldier in Canada to obtain free transportation to his home for the Christmas holidays. We know that the wives, children, fathers and mothers of those men would be delighted if that free transportation could be given by the government. But when we know that from the government's point of view it is impracticable—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Why?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Why is it?

An hon. MEMBER: Have we not the railways and the coaches?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): We do not know it, as the hon. member suggests we do.

Mr. WARREN: Why keep asking members of the government to do that? Why do we do it? It would appear that those of us who approve free transportation desire to be regarded as good fellows, while the ministers who know that it is impracticable are bad fellows.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): But it is not impracticable; it is quite feasible.

Mr. WARREN: That is the hon. member's view. If, however, he were to ask the military organizations throughout Canada whether or not it is practicable, I believe they would tell him something about the matter.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am sure they would not.

Mr. WARREN: For example, some of those boys would have to be transported all the way from Vancouver to Prince Edward Island.

An hon. MEMBER: What about it?

Mr. QUELCH: All the more reason why they cannot pay their own fares.

Mr. WARREN: Boys who used to work for me on the farm are now in Iceland; then there are boys in Newfoundland and hundreds of them in England; what are they getting? How will they feel, if they are ignored when favours such as these are handed out? Hon. members of the opposition might urge that the expense would not be very great, that it would cost only about half a million dollars. Let me point out that half a million dollars is a great deal of money, and will buy a large quantity of war materials.

Reference has been made by an hon. member to a growing discontent among the soldiers. I am not sure who said it, but I know it was said. In my opinion that is something which might be expected. Any soldier who joins an army when a war is in progress is bound to become discontented if, after months of training and drilling, he does not see action. He wants to get into action, because he knows there is action somewhere. His ambition is to get into it.

I recall that in the early days of the first great war I visited my brother at Valcartier camp. He was one of the 30,000 Canadian soldiers then in training, and one could not have found anywhere a more discontented lot of men. Why were they discontented? Simply because they were afraid the war would be over before they got into it. Our boys have been training and drilling, month after month. And perhaps, if we are to prepare for an offensive in 1942, as we have been told, their training may extend into years. That training is monotonous. They become tired of it, and they want to get into action. Undoubtedly there will be some discontent. But when I hear of that condition I am always reminded of an observation made to me within the last year or two by one of my cousins. He went to England as a lieutenant at the time of the last war, returned as a major, and eventually became a colonel. I believe he reverted to the rank of brigade major and is now again in England. When speaking to a young man who wanted a transfer from one city to another in the air force, he said, "When you join the army you must make up your mind that you are in the army."

There is one consolation for the soldier in a training camp, namely, that every day he is becoming a little more fit for the great test that is to come—and it is bound to come. This war cannot be won until we take the offensive, and if we cannot have that offensive until 1942 there is no question in my mind that at that time these young men will be just as keen, willing and able as the Canadian army was from 1914 to 1918.

To come to another matter, it does not take very much courage to be constantly telling the farmers of Canada that prices for their products are lower than they ought to be. It is the easiest thing in the world to tell the farmer that he is only half paid for his dairy products, his cheese and his bacon, but it is not quite so easy to tell the farmer why prices are as low as they are. Every member of this house knows perfectly well that we have only one market for our surplus bacon and our surplus cheese, and no export market for butter. And who is setting the price? The imputation might be that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is responsible.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Hear, hear.

Mr. WARREN: My hon. friend says, "hear, hear." Yet the Minister of Agriculture was accused a few days ago by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) of bargaining with the British government in reference to bacon and cheese prices. My belief is that the farmers of Canada could have no better representative than the Minister of Agriculture to send to England to bargain with the hard-headed British food control board with regard to selling our products. We must keep in mind that we are not selling in competitive markets. We have only one market. We are the sellers. We are not the buyers. And if we take the attitude suggested by the hon. member for Parkdale that we ought to be giving our products to the British government and the British people rather than selling them, why did my hon. friend say "hear, hear" when I suggested that it was implied that the Minister of Agriculture was responsible for the low prices now prevailing?

Mr. FAIR: Why do the manufacturers not give their products to the British government? Answer that one.

Mr. WARREN: I shall have something to say in a moment with regard to industry.

The hon. member for Victoria, Ont. (Mr. McNevin) in his address dealt, I think, adequately, with the prices of dairy products. I quote his words:

> This brings me to a further question, namely, that of hog prices, and the bacon agreement between the Canadian government and the food board in Great Britain. I am prepared to say that I believe this lower price offers but a small opportunity for any profit for the hog producer. However, if that is the top price the British food board is prepared to pay—and we have great sympathy for Great Britain and her financial position—then to my mind the matter is settled so far as that part of it is concerned.

Hon. members know that the matter is settled. Every member of the house knows the matter is settled. Then why endeavour to create discontent among the producers of Canada by constantly telling them what you and I and everybody else know, that prices are not what they ought to be. There is nothing we can do about the matter. The price is settled for one year so far as cheese and bacon are concerned.

Mr. WRIGHT: The government is subsidizing cheese. Could they not subsidize the production of bacon as well?

Mr. WARREN: During the last few years the government has subsidized the western provinces to such an extent—

Mr. WRIGHT: I am not speaking of the western provinces. Cheese is made entirely in the east.

Mr. WARREN: It is not a subsidy but a premium that is paid on high grade cheese.

Mr. WRIGHT: Then why not on bacon?

Mr. WARREN: The hon. member for Victoria, Ont., gave as his view that winter butter ought not to be less than 35 cents, while milk delivered at a cheese factory at present prices will work out to 28·8 cents a pound for butter fat, and that bacon hogs will work out at about 8 cents per pound live weight on our markets here. All of us know that the farmer cannot make a profit at that price if he is going to pay his taxes and maintain himself as a good farmer. But the price is settled, and if it is settled what can we do about it? The granting of a subsidy as suggested by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) is another matter, and I am not going into that.

So far as eastern Ontario farmers are concerned I think, generally speaking, there is no great spirit of discontent among them regarding prices because they feel that they are working in a world cause, and they will be satisfied if they can be assured that there is equality of sacrifice among all classes of people.

Mr. FAIR: Better read your newspapers.

Mr. WRIGHT: That was not the opinion expressed at the convention of the United Farmers of Ontario.

Mr. WARREN: I might have something to say about that if I had seen it.

The Minister of Agriculture has been criticized for something he said over the radio recently regarding industry. I think that his is the sort of courage which we may need in this country, that of a man who will say what he believes should be said. And if one particular industry wants to defy the government, I say hats off to the minister for telling the management of that industry that if it is not capable of conducting that factory, it may be necessary to do as they do in England, place someone else in charge who can run it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the hon. member will permit me a question, do I understand him to say that any industrialist in Canada has defied the government? The minister never said anything of the sort. All he said was that one industry had objected to the regulations.

Mr. WARREN: Not very much difference.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, yes. Defying the government and objecting are quite different.

Mr. WARREN: I was going on to say, Mr. Speaker, that it does not take very much courage to cater to the spirit of discontent. I have listened to the addresses made in this house by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) and the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), and I felt that there was a tone and tendency in those addresses of catering to or raising up a spirit of discontent. The hon. member for Cape Breton South went so far afield in his remarks that he went all the way up to Kirkland Lake in northern Ontario to criticize a body of public-spirited citizens who had volunteered their services in the cause of law and order in that town.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Whose law and whose order?

Mr. WARREN: Well, the law and order of Canada.

Mr. BRADETTE: In the country of northern Ontario, if the hon. member wants to know.

Mr. WARREN: He goes even farther than that; he makes a trip to Oshawa; and certainly his remarks would have no tendency to quiet any spirit of discontent which there might be, or, as the hon. member for Vancouver East contends, the spirit of discontent which is growing. No matter what part of the house we occupy, a good deal of importance is attached to the attitude which any hon. member may take, and I think we shall be very ill-advised to try to create or foster a spirit of discontent. As an illustration of the importance which is placed on the words of a member of parliament, I might point out that a day or two ago the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) complained that some persons were driving a little too fast past the House of Commons, and as a result an extra police officer is parading up and down all day in the storm to see that no one goes by at too fast a rate. I use that merely as an illustration of the importance of guarding our lips during these years of war and crisis.

It is my firm belief that there is very little discontent in the ranks of labour anywhere in this dominion, and if we can keep free of professional agitators we are not going to have much trouble. We have not forgotten the actions of the professional agitators here in Ontario. We have not forgotten the crowd that sat down in the Vancouver post office for a week or two, or that after that same gang were put in camps, where they were fed and taken care of, they were so ill-behaved that the camps had to be broken up, and the professional leader of that particular gang drifted to Ottawa and tried to raise riots in this city.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): And some of them are fighting for you to-day. Do not forget that.

Mr. WARREN: I doubt if those leaders are. We have not forgotten that that sort of thing is possible in this or in any other country. I might add that in my reference to professional agitators I have no thought at all of, and make no allusion to, the riding of Renfrew North. We did have one agitator there. He ran as the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation candidate and he got 709 votes out of 11,515 polled, so we got rid of him and we have had no other professional agitators. So far as I know, there is no discontent among the labouring element in my riding.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the hon. member infer that all Cooperative Commonwealth Federation candidates are agitators?

Mr. WARREN: Some question was asked respecting labour. I have a statement here which I wish to quote, because the public may not have noticed it in the long address which was given by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). In any event, it is worth repeating in Hansard:

> We have enjoyed splendid cooperation from industry and labour. Margins of profit have been maintained at levels much lower than in peace time. I feel confident that there will be no new millionaires emerging from this war. In my efforts to prevent undue profits on the part of industry, I have the enthusiastic cooperation of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and the Minister of National Revenue

(Mr. Gibson). Organized labour has cooperated in extending working hours and in bringing incipient labour disputes to arbitration.

I might interject at this point that we have received extraordinary cooperation from organized labour. Almost every week union leaders have written in and have asked if certain actions on their part would be beneficial. If we are in a position to write back to the effect that such actions would be beneficial to the war effort, I believe there has been no instance in which such action has not been taken by the organization affected.

There has been as little profiteering on the part of labour as on the part of capital. There seems to be a general appreciation that an increase in wages and the cost of living, and consequent increased cost of production, will in the long run be harmful, and that a balance between wages and the cost of living can best be maintained by seeking stability in both.

Yesterday the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty), in his address, made just as glowing a reference to the conduct of labour.

Another matter to which I wish to refer is the quiet campaign which has been undertaken to undermine the confidence of the people in the Minister of Munitions and Supply and the Minister of Agriculture. That effort has not been confined to this house; we find it displayed in the Financial Post. It will be recalled that the Financial Post is the periodical which started the campaign against the contract for Bren guns. In this it was backed up by Maclean's magazine, and supported later by the leader for the Conservative party in Ontario. They are at it again, quietly of course to begin with. The present object is to get rid of the Hon. Mr. Gardiner as Minister of Agriculture. The acting leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group (Mr. Coldwell) has gone so far as to embody the proposal in an amendment to the speech from the throne. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) is equally anxious that the present Minister of Agriculture should be removed from that particular office. From the point of view of the political future of the parties which those two hon. gentlemen represent, I would be inclined to think they would be particularly pleased if they had the opportunity of attending the funeral of the present Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. PERLEY: I object to the inference. I am opposed to his holding three or four of the portfolios, but I have no objection to the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And the hon. member for Qu'Appelle is not expecting to go to his funeral right away.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Fournier, Hull): Order.

Mr. WARREN: Last year a campaign was started which was intended to undermine the confidence of the people in the ability of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to conduct the affairs of Canada. It went on for some time, but after three or four speeches had been made by Liberal members of the house, that idea was given up. In that connection the only reference which I have seen recently was a suggestion in some periodical that he should be replaced by the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen).

That reminds me that I had a visit from two ministers of the church within the last month or so, and in conversation with them I learned that one of these gentlemen was the son of a farmer and had been brought up in the riding of North Battleford. I was all ears, because I had listened to so many speeches delivered by the hon. member for North Battleford that I had a mental picture of that constituency as being a desert, dreary land covered with shacks, without any attractive homes or farms or groves of trees—a place where not a single soul could make a living. I was pleased indeed to learn from this young gentleman, a minister of the church, that even during all those terrible bad years his father had never asked for or received any government assistance. When I learned this, I breathed a prayer of thanksgiving, "Thank God, there is at least one farmer in that desert land who has been able to make a living from the soil".

Mr. NICHOLSON: Does the hon. member question the accuracy of the reports given by the hon. member for North Battleford in this house? He is questioning the veracity of the hon. member.

Mr. TUCKER: Has she joined your party or have you joined hers?

Mr. NICHOLSON: The hon. gentleman is casting a reflection on the hon. member.

Mr. WARREN: I was discussing the campaign to undermine the confidence of the people in two very useful members of the government. I knew something of the hours of toil, during the early months of the war, of different members of the cabinet. Many of them, I know, were never in their offices in the morning later than nine o'clock and never left them earlier than one or two or half past two the next morning. That tremendous amount of labour which they put into their work in order to get our war machine started is something that ought to be borne in mind. As I have looked at them from time to time I have wondered whether they were likely to break down.

There is now an agitation to replace these men with others who do not know the workings of the machine which has been brought to such a state of perfection. When the suggestion is made that the Minister of Agriculture should be removed from that portfolio, I say to this house that I doubt whether many men would be found in Canada who would recommend such a thing. We believe that there is not a man in the country who understands better than the Minister of Agriculture the various angles of the marketing of farm products, and one of the reasons why he knows the subject so thoroughly is that he always wants to find out everything for himself. I recall a remark I once heard the Hon. Mr. Dunning make with reference to the Minister of Agriculture. Some one asked Mr. Dunning why he had sent Jimmy Gardiner to a certain place and he replied, "You don't send Jimmy; he just gets up and goes". He has travelled east and west, acquainting himself with all the problems of the farmer. I have been in his office time and again when different aspects of the various problems in connection with the marketing of farm products would present themselves and one would not find any angle that he was not familiar with.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Fournier, Hull): I must remind the hon. gentleman that his time has expired.

Mr. WARREN: Would the house allow me to make one further remark?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Another gentleman wishes to make a speech and he will not have thirty minutes.

Mr. G. R. BOUCHER (Carleton): In rising to speak for the first time in this house, I should like to pay a tribute to my late esteemed predecessor who represented the constituency of Carleton. The late Doctor Hyndman was well known to me for the past twenty years as a country doctor and family physician who had the esteem and love of all who knew him. Very early in life, in the year 1935, he entered the House of Commons, and took upon himself the task of looking after the interests of his people with conscientious vigour and sincerity. It is a pity that Providence should have removed from our midst at such an early age one who had the sincerity and the intentions of Doctor Hyndman.

Speaking in the house at this time, I am quite conscious of the responsibility placed upon members in this critical day. As I listened to the hon. member for Renfrew North (Mr. Warren) condemning those who attempted to get something for the returned soldiers, those who attempted to portray to the government the condition of the farmers of Canada, and as I heard him say that it does not take much courage to cater to the spirit of discontent, I must at once repudiate any suggestion that there is any spirit of discontent among our farmers, any spirit that is not admirable. In my opinion, the farmer, more than anyone else, is shouldering the responsibility of our war effort with a valour and loyalty which merit the praise and admiration of this house.

Coming from the constituency which I represent, let me assure the house that the people there are deeply conscious of the difficult days through which we are passing. I believe they have tightened their belts and are prepared to draw them still tighter in order to do everything possible for an aggressive, energetic and whole-hearted war effort. Since coming here, I have observed in the house almost total unanimity in the desire to come to the help of the motherland, and a realization that our first line of defence is the English channel and that we in Canada must do everything possible to further the war effort.

I am, however, rather amazed at the anxiety of the average member of this house, members of all groups, all parties, even of the government party, in their criticism of the cabinet and council for not passing out responsibility, for not harnessing the power of this house and the people of this country in a more courageous and whole-hearted war effort. I believe that to-day the government have made a fair start on our war effort.

They have set up a tremendous organization: I do not know exactly whether it is the case, as the hon. member for Renfrew North just mentioned, that they have brought down the Gardiner machine to do so or not. But I believe, from listening to the debates in this house so far, there is a strong feeling that the government have not gone far enough in the leadership that the times and the occasion demand. There is in this house more power that could be harnessed by the government taking into their confidence the private members. A much greater war effort and quicker results could be produced if the people of Canada were taken more into the confidence of the government and asked to take a greater part in all their endeavours.

Just recently in my own constituency, as in all the constituencies in Canada, the people were called upon to volunteer their services in connection with the national registration. The spontaneity of their offer of assistance was a marvel to the country. Their willingness to cooperate with the government was a tribute to the spirit of the Canadian people.

The same thing would be done with regard to financing, the sale of bonds or any other endeavour that the government should see fit to ask the people to undertake. The government should have more faith in the loyalty and readiness to serve of the people of Canada.

Instead of that, the criticism is that there are too many so-called dollar-a-year men, too many men paid high salaries, too many commissions, too many experts coming to the rescue of the hard-pressed government. There is too big a concentration of our war endeavours in the big industrial concerns. I have listened to member after member voicing the sentiment, with which I entirely agree, that there is too much concentration of war endeavour in the big industries on a long-term schedule. I should like to add my viewpoint that there are a great many small industries, garages as someone said, small factories now existing, which could easily be harnessed to our war effort and could produce those things we want with real expedition and without any long-term schedule. If necessary why should not both be tried? I fully appreciate the fact that we have been in the war for only a year and three months. But as a member of this house it is my responsibility to urge the government to harness every bit of manpower and machine power and use every bit of property we have for the prosecution of this war.

In my own riding, for example, composed largely of farmers, tradesmen and low-salaried civil servants, the only work to be seen on behalf of the war, other than the very small use of the Connaught rifle ranges, is the voluntary service rendered by our people themselves. The wonderful enlistment for army, navy and air force, of our people, the great service of our women's institutes; Red Cross societies; religious, social, fraternal and even political organizations, in making articles required for soldiers under the auspices of the Red Cross give ample evidence of war consciousness. I pay a tribute to the work they have done so far in that regard. Other than that I can see no speeding up of war effort in my constituency, located as it is within sight of these buildings—yes, reaching right into the city of Ottawa to a great degree.

Might I draw to the attention of the government and particularly the Minister of National Defence the fact that located in the constituency of Carleton is the Connaught rifle range, a dominion property composed of some 2,700 acres which cost the government within the last twenty years over $850,000, equipped with buildings, targets, hutments and everything that could be used for military training. According to an answer I have received from the government recently only 952 men were on that range within the last year. They did not tell me how many days they were on it, but from my own knowledge I know it was very few. This asset of the dominion government is good enough to hold a meeting of the Dominion Rifle Association on every year, to have marksmen from all over the country come and practise marksmanship. It is a splendid place for the trainees or even the active service force to take their military training. The government would be well advised to take this into consideration and use this rifle range more than they say they are going to when they say "the same as in 1940", namely 952 men.

This rifle range is of particular interest to my constituency because 2,700 acres of land have been taken out of taxation, producing no revenue for provincial or municipal purposes, and what do we get in return? If that rifle range were used for the purpose for which it was intended to be used, some of our local producers might find a market for their products.

While dealing with that, I would say that the government could go further and buy foodstuffs from the farmers rather than from the big financial concerns. I would like them to take that into consideration. The small arms schools there could be used extensively.

I almost hesitate, in view of what has already been said, to speak on behalf of the soldiers. But if there is one man in this country to whom we in this house should give every consideration it is the soldier who is fighting our battles. The matter of transportation, be it for Christmas or for his last furlough, is the least thing we can do in recognition of the service he is rendering to us. There are so many who have volunteered their services to the government who have been taken away and quartered in different sections of the country far from home and who have not an opportunity to return home on account of their pay of $1.30 a day while their brothers and friends are earning much higher wages outside the army.

Another matter I should like to draw to the attention of the government is the situation of those who left their employment —or some who have not had employment— and offered their services to the country. I refer both to those who were not able to measure up to the requirements for enlistment, who want to serve their country but cannot, as well as to those who have enlisted and those 15,000 who have been discharged for lack of physical fitness. The government has a big responsibility to these two classes of our citizens. I believe a special endeavour should be made to see that they are re-established in civil life, if not in military life, in positions which will enable them to maintain and look after their dependents. Surely they have earned our thanks to that extent. In many instances the dependents of these men are in difficult circumstances, on account of the absence from home of sons and brothers. I have had several applications made to me personally to see if something could not be done on behalf of poor widowed mothers whose only sons were fighting for our country, but who were not given compensation because before enlistment their sons either were too young to work and support them or had not been able to obtain employment which would enable them to do so. These cases merit the attention of the government.

I was alarmed to read of the recent catastrophe in the county of Kamouraska, in which three of the six airmen who jumped from a plane were lost. I have learned also that aeroplanes, Harvards from Winnipeg and Lysanders from Toronto, are being operated without radio equipment. May I ask if this is deemed wise, or whether every aeroplane sent into the air should not possess proper radio equipment with which to follow the beam, ascertain its location and receive assistance in landing. I understand it is a practice of the air force that if an aeroplane gets into difficulties and the men have to jump, flares first should be thrown out in order that the nature of the terrain below may be ascertained; then the aeroplane circles round and those who must jump are given some guidance. What precautions were taken in this instance. I should like to know also what training was given the airmen, before they ascended, with regard to emergencies of this kind. Were they instructed as to what they should do if they had to jump? With what equipment were they furnished? The government owes it to the people of Canada to make public this information, because some inquiries have reached me as to these very points.

This afternoon I should like particularly to deal with that portion of the amendment concerning agriculture. The other day the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) said that in his opinion the farmer was the forgotten man. I do not quite subscribe to that view, but I believe the farmer is called upon to do more for our war effort than any other man in Canada. To-day the farmer is carrying on in an era of increased living costs, higher taxation and higher labour costs. He must even submit to daylight saving, although he does not like it.

I should like to direct attention to a publication with which the government must be familiar. It is printed under the authority of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon), I understand through the agricultural economics branch, and contains information which, I believe, has been overlooked by many of us. It sets out the index figure of the cost of living to the farmer in Canada and the index figure of the wholesale prices of the commodities he sells. It tells a sad story, which, if looked into, would convince the hon. member for Renfrew North that the farmer, instead of being discontented, is long suffering, and that we should take up the cudgels on his behalf.

The article to which I refer gives us this information from 1913 up to the present time. I do not intend to give the figures from year to year, but I am going to give enough of them to portray in a general way how badly agriculture needs some assistance from the government. As the normal year 1926 is taken. The cost of living in that year is set at 100, and the wholesale price of Canadian farm produce is given at the same figure. In 1930 we find that farm living costs dropped to an average of 94·3, but that the wholesale price of farm products dropped to 82·3.

Mr. McNEVIN: Give us the figures for 1932 or 1933, please.

Mr. BOUCHER: I should like particularly to compare 1930 and 1935, but the figures for 1932 were 81 for the average cost of living and 48 for the prices of farm products. In 1935 the index figure for living costs was 81·5, while the average price of farm products was 63·5. Let us come to 1939 and take both the spring and the fall. In the spring of 1939 the average cost of farm living was 82·2, while the wholesale price of farm products was 65·5. In the fall the cost of living was 81·9, while the wholesale price of farm products was 58·4. In the spring of 1940 the average cost of farm living was 87·2, while the wholesale price of farm products was 72·1. This fall the cost of farm living is 89·2, while the wholesale price of farm products is 62·7.

If we analyse these figures we find that since 1926 we have had a decrease in the cost of farm living of 10·8 per cent, but a drop in the wholesale price of farm products of 37·3 per cent. Since the spring of this year the cost of living to the farmer has risen by 2 per cent, but at the same time the wholesale price of his products has fallen by 9·4 per cent. I should like to refer these figures to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). This is a government publication, issued by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in collaboration with the Department of Agriculture, and I think these figures speak louder than any words of mine.

This is not the case in connection with our industrialists or in connection with labour. If we go to a restaurant and buy a meal, we find that prices have increased from 30 to 50 per cent. If we inquire into the price paid for any of the farm products entering into that meal, we find that there has been a decline. But someone may ask: What did the Minister of Agriculture, acting as Minister of Trade and Commerce, do as far as the British market was concerned? He went to England. He did that upon which we would all like to congratulate him. He secured a market in England for our bacon, our cheese and various quantities of our farm products at prices not as big as we would like, but big enough to satisfy us, under the circumstances. The people of Canada, and particularly the farmers, do not want our government to exact the last dollar from the motherland, even for farm products.

The very day the minister announced the prices, upon his return, prices of our produce fell to a point described by a local newspaper as the lowest level reached in a number of years. What are we going to do about this? The government has pegged the price of wheat; it has pegged the price of cheese, but it has paid no consideration to the spread between the price the producer gets and what the consumer pays. As a result of that decrease in price levels, the present spread in price is much greater than it was before the agreement was negotiated. The government would be well advised not to get a better price from England, but to see that the price we do get from England is conveyed properly to the producer in Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Cut out the middleman.

Mr. BOUCHER: Someone says, "Cut out the middleman." I do not entirely agree with that. But I do say, "Cut out the exorbitant profit being paid to somebody." Let us consider the price of pork, or the price of almost any other product the farmer has for sale in the fall of the year. Let us compare the price he receives with the one the middleman receives in the spring, and we soon realize who makes the profit. When the farmer offers a product for sale, the price is low; when that same product is offered for sale by the middleman, the price is high. Certainly our government could do much on behalf of our agriculturists in that regard.

What has arisen from this neglect of the farmer? The last offer of bonds showed that the farmer was incapable of buying them. He had no money to buy them. He cannot hire help, for two reasons, namely, that he cannot pay the salary, and could not secure the men even if he could afford the salary. He is incapable of producing a quality product because he cannot afford to pay for the necessary finishing feeds.

I do not wish to delay the house longer, but it is my firm conviction that one of the best ways of sponsoring our war effort is that of building up the foundation industry of our country, that of assisting the agriculturist first, last and always. Our government could well afford to offer some leadership and show some activity in that regard, rather than spend the whole of its time on the letting of contracts to big industrial concerns.

On motion of Mr. Golding the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 5.58 p.m.

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill No. 6, to incorporate the Alberta Provincial Bank.—Mr. Blackmore.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN PERSONNEL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours that this house has substituted the name of Mr. Dupuis for that of Mr. Cloutier to act on the part of the House of Commons as a member of the joint committee of both houses on the printing of parliament.

And that the Clerk of the House do carry the said message to the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

THE WAR

STATEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER WITH RESPECT TO PRESENT POSITION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have been asked, before parliament adjourns, to speak again on the war in Europe, on the present position of Britain and on Canada's co-operation in meeting the situation with which Britain is faced.

I doubt if there is much, if anything, I can add to the statement I made three weeks ago and to the very complete reviews since made by my colleagues in the government.

The fact, however, that events or the reports of the past week or two should cause the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) to express the opinion that the situation itself has greatly changed within that period of time affords perhaps the strongest of reasons why the house and the country cannot be reminded too often that the present is not a war of weeks or of months, but of years, and that this fact must never be lost to sight in viewing the fortunes of war abroad as they vary from place to place and from time to time. Moreover, as we seek to estimate the significance of our own effort in its relation to the future as well as the present, we must always remember that the demands upon this country and this continent may, a year from now, be vastly different in their application and extent.

As we ponder the magnitude of the struggle and of Canada's contribution, it is more than ever necessary to view isolated events in their relation to the whole, to correlate all the factors of time and place, and to maintain throughout a due sense of proportion and a true perspective. Sunshine and shadow are bound to alternate on the wide horizons of a world war. It is inevitable that there will be periods of success and periods of reverse. We would be foolish if we became unduly elated by an immediate triumph; we would be even more foolish if we became depressed by a momentary loss.

Recently many statements have been made in the press, in parliament, and over the air, by members of the government of the United Kingdom and other leading Britons. Some may seem pessimistic, others may sound optimistic. The truth is, of course, that there are many matters which give us grave concern. There are also many things to cheer us. If statements sometimes sound pessimistic, they reflect the willingness of British leaders to speak the truth, and the capacity of the British people to stand the truth. If to some they appear occasionally almost too optimistic, they reflect the courage, the hope and the determination of the British people and their refusal now, or at any time, to consider the prospect of defeat.

It has been the duty of my colleagues and myself, as it would be the duty of any government, to try to see the war steadily, and to see it whole. We have sought never to lose the ultimate in the prospect of the immediate; always to remember that what may appear best to serve the apparent interests of the present may be of ill service to the future. From the very beginning the policy of the present administration has been to plan, in cooperation with the government of the United Kingdom, for a final victorious outcome of the struggle.

Let me give an illustration, the force of which will be immediately recognized. Had we been guided by vociferous demands that were made at the outset, we would have concentrated our effort, our wealth and our strength on recruiting large numbers of men for service in the army overseas, rushing them across the ocean, with conscription as probably the only method of maintaining large supernumerary armies in the field. That might have served to meet a certain clamour of the hour, but, in the long run, it would have made for disunity in Canada, and in meeting Britain's need, proven to be, in large part, wanton waste. Instead of aiding Great Britain, as we are doing to-day, with our forces in the air and at sea, with munitions, with ships and with other equipment, materials and supplies in ever-increasing measure, we would have placed upon a beleaguered island the added burden of feeding numbers of men not required at the present time.

We did not yield to the clamour. The government, instead, laid its plans for a balanced development of all branches. We built up an air force and a navy, as well as an army. We developed war industries, and we conserved exchange for the use of Britain and ourselves. While planning for the battles overseas, we have also been mindful of our own shores, and the dangers with which they may at any moment be beset as the scenes of conflict change and war's terrors become intensified. This type of planning does not lend itself to display. But it brings real results in the end. As it is inevitable that the war will be long, it is equally inevitable that the results of a sustained effort can be realized only with the passage of time.

While it is true that neither Great Britain nor Canada nor the neutral countries which were invaded foresaw the course of events, it still to-day remains an incontrovertible truth that the broad outlines of British strategy for ultimate victory as planned from the outset are and were fundamentally sound. They contemplated a war, not of months but of years. They envisaged an increase in and the extension of the theatres of military operations. They visualized the necessity, not only of preserving freedom, but the necessity and the obligation to restore it.

From the very beginning, in presenting to this house and to the country the situation as I have had reason to view it, I have tried to speak not from impulse but from reflection. It is true I have not sought to be talking all the time. I have hoped that my words might carry the greater weight because they were not too freely and too frequently expressed. I have attempted, in so far as opportunity has permitted, to assess and to weigh the essentials. In almost every statement I have made about the war, I have said the struggle would be long and hard and terrible. I have told the people of Canada how much more serious the war would be than, in its early stages, many people seemed to realize, or have yet fully realized. I said that it would be a war, not of months but of years; that it would not be confined to Europe, but must inevitably spread to other continents; that at the back of all was the intent of world domination. I said, too, at the very outset that the nations of Europe, by placing their faith in neutrality, would find, as a consequence of their blindness and aloofness, that their own national existence might disappear.

In official pronouncements this house and the Canadian people have been told repeatedly that supremacy in the air was necessary for effective defence, and for the final offence which alone can gain victory. They have been told with equal emphasis that effective blockade, through the maintenance of British sea power, was essential, not only to victory but to survival. Above all, month in and month out, I have said with all the force at my command that freedom on this continent was inseparable from the preservation of British freedom; also that the preservation of British freedom was inseparable from the restoration of human freedom wherever it has been destroyed. I might add that the corollary is equally true. The restoration of human freedom depends upon the preservation of British freedom until the day comes when the forces of freedom, under the leadership of Britain, having mobilized their full strength, march forward to victory.

I have felt impelled to make these preliminary remarks because of the words used by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) on Thursday last in requesting me to make a further statement to the house. My hon. friend said:

> In my view, in the view of many hon. members of this house, and I feel quite certain in the view of many people in Canada, the war situation in Europe is more serious to-day than at any time since the fall of France.

May I say at once, and most emphatically, that such is not my view. My view is rather as I expressed it in my reply to the leader of the opposition at the beginning of the debate on the address. There can be no doubt in the world that the situation for Britain and her allies is much better to-day than it was, not only at the time of the signing of the armistice between France and Germany, but as it developed in the months which immediately followed the fall of France. Even Hitler was not prepared for the speedy capitulation of Norway, Holland, Belgium and France. While the rapidity of those events shocked us, let it not be forgotten that it surprised Germany as well. If we were unprepared for it, so were the Germans. If Hitler's plans had been in accordance with such a schedule, it is easily conceivable that German armies might have landed on Britain's shores. It is possible that the resistance which could have been offered immediately after the evacuation of Dunkirk would not have been equal to the awe-inspiring task imposed upon it.

When France signed the armistice she believed, and most of the neutral European countries with her, that all was over with Britain as well as with herself. The great tragedy is that France did not know the truth. Believing that the enemy was invincible, she preferred surrender to the prospect of annihilation. In the United States, majority opinion was swayed for a time by the fear that Britain would be powerless to withstand so formidable a foe. It doubted her power to resist. The American people were asking themselves whether it might not be more prudent to retain the weapons of war, even though they were so desperately needed by Britain, in order that they might defend themselves against a peril which would become irresistible once the peoples of the British Isles were vanquished.

All that has changed, and changed completely. During the last three months, unsurpassed in the history of Britain, it has become increasingly clear that German mentality has never really understood the British people. Once again the men and women of the British Isles have revealed their dauntless courage and their ability to fight, and to endure, when their freedom is endangered. Like Cromwell's Ironsides, "They know for what they fight."

When we reflect upon the improved position in the Mediterranean, almost unbelievable three months ago; when we recall the transfer of the American destroyers; the enormous increase in war materials which are flowing from the United States and Canada to the island fortress; when in addition to witnessing the fruits of Canadian planning, we have also the certainty of the continuance of the policy of all possible aid to Britain confirmed by the vote of the American people, how can anyone come to feel, in the light of these facts—which are not the confidential property of the government, but all a matter of public knowledge—that the situation is more serious to-day than it was three or four months ago? It is true that the war is increasing in its fury. But it is also true that in the months that have elapsed since the downfall of France, Britain's strength has steadily increased.

The leader of the opposition has specified three things which he says indicate the seriousness of the position, and which evidently justify in his mind the opinion he and some others hold in regard to it. He referred first to what he described as "the virtual destruction of the cities of Birmingham, Bristol and Southampton"; secondly, to the loss of shipping as evidenced by press reports; and, thirdly, to the "utterances of the Marquess of Lothian, His Majesty's representative in the United States, particularly with respect to finance."

Let us see whether the facts with respect to these matters justify the conclusion my hon. friend, and those who think as he does, have reached. Here I hope hon. members will also have in mind what I have so frequently stressed, namely, that whatever is said in the parliament of Canada, while intended primarily for home consumption, may also be not without its influence upon Britain's actual or potential enemies. I shall leave hon. members to judge for themselves what the effect here or in Great Britain would be were word to be sent broadcast from a high source in Germany that, through British bombing, three or more of the leading industrial cities of Germany had been "virtually destroyed."

First, then, as to "the virtual destruction of the cities of Birmingham, Bristol and Southampton." May I say to my hon. friend that, even in the most glaring headlines of the more sensational newspapers of this continent I have seen nothing, and in the accents of the most vociferous radio announcer I have heard nothing, which would justify either the assertion or the assumption that the cities of Birmingham, Bristol and Southampton have been virtually destroyed. Much less will the press dispatches themselves justify a belief in anything of the kind. Certainly nothing in the official reports which have come from Britain to Canada supports such statements. There have been, of course, within the last few weeks, serious air raids upon each of these, and other British cities, notably Coventry. Birmingham is a city of 1,055,000 people, Bristol of 415,000 people, Southampton of 178,000 people. Coventry is a city of 204,000 people. The figures published in the press in the case of Coventry, about 400 dead and 1,800 injured, are correct. I am able to say that the casualties in the other cities are relatively much lower. What is most important, there was, in these raids, surprisingly little damage to military and industrial objectives.

It is true that night bombing presents a problem which has not yet been solved. It is true that darkness, while it denies to the marauder the opportunity of discriminate destruction, adds to his opportunity of indiscriminate murder. Against the successes which the enemy may claim for his ruthlessness, there must be offset what it has cost him in men and in planes. The percentage of British losses, both in the British Isles and in Europe, has been many times less. Moreover, Germany, by pursuing the policy of frightfulness, has greatly challenged the spirit of the British people. In the final analysis the war will be won by national character. By his murderous tactics, Hitler has succeeded in showing to the world that a German victory is impossible.

It is true, as Sir Walter Citrine said the other day in New Orleans, that the continuous bombing of British cities is having an effect upon British industrial output. But the damage to British towns and industry can be exaggerated, just as the damage to German military objectives can be minimized. Night after night for months the Royal Air Force, flying, it is true, much greater distances, in smaller numbers, and carrying fewer bombs, have been nevertheless resolutely following a clear line of effective destruction.

It was announced from London some weeks ago that the bomber command of the Royal Air Force had been following a "master plan" in aerial attacks upon targets of strategic and industrial importance in German and German-occupied territory. A glance at the map will at once make it clear that the area open to attack by British planes is large, it extends in fact from the coasts of Norway to the Spanish frontier, and far inland to the industrial heart of Germany, and that the flying distances are correspondingly great. British heavy bombers have in fact flown single journeys of as much as 700 miles from their home bases, carrying them beyond the heavy industries of the Rhine valley to the important Skoda armaments establishments at Pilsen. They have crossed the Alps to bombard the industrial capitals of northern Italy, at Turin and Milan and elsewhere. They have attacked repeatedly—eighty or one hundred times since midsummer—synthetic oil refineries such as Gelsenkirchen; aluminium factories, railway marshalling yards—that of Hamm is one of the largest on the continent—docks and shipbuilding yards—the port of Hamburg is reported now to be unserviceable —the naval bases at Kiel and Wilhelmshaven, power stations, and a variety of other objectives.

Nearer at hand, since the coast line of the low countries and of most of France fell into enemy hands, the Royal Air Force has smashed repeatedly and relentlessly at the "invasion ports" of Lorient, LeHavre, Boulogne and Dunkirk. In these ports, submarine establishments and concentrations of barges intended for troop transport on a large scale have been steadily attacked, and on at least two occasions the unceasing vigilance and rapid striking power of the bomber and coastal commands defeated German attempts to launch a sea-borne invasion from this part of the channel coast.

I have said that the area open to British attack is large, and that the flying distances involved are great. By contrast, the area for German attacks is much more limited, and, since the channel coast affords nearer bases for German aircraft, the flying distance is considerably less. Partly for this reason, very large numbers of German planes have been employed in recent raids, and it is a tribute both to the fighting skill of British pilots and to the increasing destructiveness of ground defences that so small a proportion of German planes have actually succeeded in penetrating outer defences to attack key targets in Britain. German losses in operational planes have been large, but the more serious loss has been in terms of pilots and air crews. It can, of course, be argued that even numerically, superiority in bombing and fighter aircraft will not provide a guarantee against aerial invasion and aerial bombardment. What is certain is that as British aircraft production, aided by a steady flow of pilots from Canada and planes from the United States and Canada, succeeds in narrowing the gap in effective strength between the Royal Air Force and the German air force, the effect of German attacks upon Britain will be diminished, and the scale of British attacks upon enemy and enemy-occupied territory will be correspondingly increased.

Much the same is true of "the loss of shipping as evidenced by press reports," and of the limitation upon financial resources. To view these factors in their true perspective, their extent has to be measured first of all in its relation to the whole, and, secondly, in comparison with losses and shortages which the enemy has experienced and may reasonably be expected further to experience.

The shipping situation is serious, but that does not mean it has suddenly changed the outlook. It is true that, in recent weeks, shipping under British ownership and control has been lost at a rate greater than the present capacity of British shipyards to build new ships. Nevertheless, thousands of ships remain, and men and supplies are freely carried where allied necessity calls. British shipyards are working at full capacity, and in addition to British shipyards, Canadian, Australian and American shipyards are building merchantmen and other ships for Britain. The House of Commons has already been told by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) that in addition to the naval construction under way in Canada for the British admiralty, eighteen merchant vessels are also to be built here for the British government.

In his speech on November 5, Mr. Churchill spoke plainly about the growing shipping problem. Since then, the British Minister of Shipping, Right Hon. Ronald Cross, said in a broadcast on November 26:

> I am not going to hide the fact that the rate at which we are building ships does not make up for our losses.

Mr. Cross was, however, careful to add that orders were being placed in the United States. The real significance of his words is to be found in the sentence with which he concluded:

> We must have ships. We cannot make too sure of our shipping in the months and years that may elapse before victory is assured. We must have a safety margin.

The result of the frankness of Mr. Churchill and Mr. Cross is reflected in our own present commitments, and in the additional keels that will be laid down every month in the shipyards of the United States and of the British commonwealth.

Let it not be forgotten that Germany, too, has suffered considerable shipping losses. Almost daily we hear of another German supply ship sunk off the coast of Norway, in the North Sea, or in the channel. German shipping and German barges have been bombed repeatedly in the channel ports. The great German shipyards at Hamburg and Bremen, and even in the Baltic, have been visited again and again by the bombers of the Royal Air Force. In the Mediterranean the Italian shipping losses have been heavy. On the high seas, German and Italian merchantmen have disappeared. I do not think they will take any part in the world's commerce until this war is over.

The British navy is still supreme on the seas of battle. Although the British navy in this war, single-handed, enforces the blockade, and although the coasts to be blockaded are more extensive, nevertheless the blockade is proving its effectiveness. Apart from Russia, there are no neutral countries to which Germany can turn with confidence for imported supplies.

The vast quantities of supplies which Britain requires from north America to supplement the deficiencies of her own production must, of course, be paid for, and, when ordered from the United States, they must be paid for in American dollars. The problem of providing United States exchange which faces the British government is a very real one.

To view in its true light the statement by Lord Lothian to which the leader of the opposition has specifically referred, it must be recalled that what the British ambassador said about Britain being near the end of her financial resources and about the need she would have for financial aid, had reference to British purchases in the United States.

The problem of providing United States exchange which faces the British government is a problem which also faces our own government; for we too must provide for vast outlays of United States dollars to pay for our purchases of essential war material. Later this afternoon, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) will propose certain measures which, at this juncture, seem to the government necessary in order further to conserve our supply of exchange for this purpose.

It may help us to view the financial problem in a true perspective if, as with bombing and with shipping losses, we make comparison with the situation as it is in Germany.

While it is true that Britain and Canada are faced with the problem of providing exchange to pay for their purchases in the United States, it is also true that in the United States we have access to the greatest industrial resources in the world.

What is the German situation? Germany, of course, has acquired the industries and resources of France, Belgium, Holland and Czechoslovakia, but outside the borders of Germany and the territories she has conquered she can look to only two important outside sources of supply—Sweden and Russia. The capacity and the willingness of Russia to spare supplies to Germany is very doubtful. In the conquered territories she must keep the workers alive if they are to continue to produce. She must face, too, the ever-present hazard of sabotage.

In many essentials Germany has, through sacrifices of her standard of living and through conquest, made herself self-contained. But, as the British Minister of Economic Warfare, Right Hon. Hugh Dalton, pointed out in a broadcast yesterday, the blockade has imposed upon the enemy "serious shortages of rubber, copper, ferro-alloys needed to harden steel, and textiles." As for oil, Mr. Dalton had this to say:

> So long as the British navy continues to command the sea, including the eastern Mediterranean, as it will; so long as our air force continues, as it will, to bomb the enemy's oil plants, oil stocks and oil refineries; and so long as the enemy continues to fight at all—and he cannot fight without using up oil—then in a period measured in months and not in years the enemy's oil position will be one of great and growing scarcity.

Mr. Dalton also stated that the stocks of supplies looted from the conquered nations had been used, and that, through the blockade, the Germans were "now back where they were six months ago, or worse."

Nor would Germany's position be materially improved even if she could command the financial resources to which Britain still has access. Germany is in fact unable, except at the cost of fighting and the loss of the men and materials of war, to obtain some of the essentials of war.

Despite these weaknesses, no greater mistake could be made than to minimize the economic gains which have resulted from the German conquests. They can be balanced and exceeded only by the economic and industrial resources of this continent. Whatever difficulties of a financial nature we may be facing, Germany is denied all access, both financial and physical, to the potentially decisive North American sources of supplies.

Perhaps, before concluding, I should say one word about the situation in the Balkans and the Mediterranean. As I pointed out at the beginning, we must keep constantly before us the conflict as a whole. The accession under duress of Roumania, Hungary and Slovakia to the axis adds no new strength to the predatory powers. Even if it did, the abstention of Yugoslavia and of Bulgaria has far greater significance.

It will be recalled that in his statement to the House of Commons on November 5, Mr. Churchill mentioned that the balance of forces on the frontiers of Egypt and the Soudan was far less unfavourable than at the time of the French collapse. So far as subsequent information has been made public, it can be said that the British position has been strengthened on all fronts.

The amazing success of the heroic Greek people, reviving as it does the memory of their ancient glories, has not made the European situation more serious than it was. The successes of the Royal Air Force and the British Navy in cooperation with the Greek forces have not advanced the cause of Italy and Germany. The state of affairs in Albania, the disorder in Roumania, and the reluctance of Yugoslavia and Bulgaria, have not greatly aided Hitler in the creation of his new order for Europe.

While what I have said may help us to keep a truer perspective as regards immediate happenings and dangers, what I wish most of all to emphasize is that this is only the picture as it presents itself at the moment, and that no one can foretell to what proportions of danger, peril and frightfulness it may develop at any time. Like the ostrich which hides its head in the sand to escape realities, we shall completely err if for a moment we fail to recognize how appalling is the danger which threatens, not only Britain, but civilization, and be tempted thereby to relax any and every effort to put forth the utmost of our strength.

Above all else, let us remember how formidable is Germany's present military strength. There has never been anything hitherto comparable to it. Let us remember, too, that her great armies are undefeated; that they are equipped with all the machines of modern warfare; that, excepting Switzerland, all of Europe west of the Vistula, and extending from Sweden to Portugal and Spain, lie under her control. Her own resources of factory and of mine, of men and materials, have been reinforced by the material power of the nations which she has conquered; to her millions of soldiers and workmen has been added the man-power of the lands she occupies, however reluctant the men of Norway, of Holland, of Belgium, and of France may be to turn their spears against the breast of freedom. To adopt the graphic words of Mr. P. J. Philip, the Ottawa correspondent of the New York Times, who speaks from knowledge gained in the very smoke of the battle of France:

> . . . we also know, and every man and woman making munitions, and every man in training as private and as officer should remember every morning, that that terrific force of men and machines which broke the French and Belgian armies last May, and sent us scurrying home from Dunkirk is still intact, possibly stronger than ever, and it is that force which we are fighting now almost alone. It is going to take all, that all of us can give, to beat it.

Upon the forces of Britain has been placed the greatest task in the history of the world. She has to watch and fight, she has to fight in the British isles and in the seas that surround them, she has to fight in the Mediterranean, in the middle east, in Africa; she has to watch the far east, in Hong Kong, in Singapore; she has to keep India constantly in mind. Anywhere, at any time, she may find it necessary to send ships and men to meet a new threat to her lines of communication and supply, or to face fresh horrors in some distant quarter of the globe.

This bare recital of facts proves, of course, that the situation is serious, but certainly not more serious than it has been during the last three months. The only difference is that people themselves in all parts of the world are beginning to realize more of the truth. The situation is bound to become increasingly serious as warfare spreads to new seas and shores and as mutual destruction continues, as it most certainly will, with ever-increasing fury. It is wholly probable that we shall witness much of anarchy as well as of war ere the death-grapple between totalitarianism and democracy has told its tale.

No one can say that the world, even now, may not be heading for Armageddon. The one thing that, under the providence of God, may save the world this supreme tragedy is the might of Britain, strengthened, supported and sustained by the power of the British dominions and India, the help of the United States, and such aid as it may yet be within the power of other liberty-loving peoples to give. To use words I have just quoted: In order to overthrow the enemy and to save mankind "it is going to take all, that all of us can give."

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we have all listened with the greatest of interest to the recital which has just been made to the house and country by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). When on Thursday last I ventured to suggest to him that we should have a report from the government as to the war situation, I had in mind, as I indicated, the seriousness of the reports that were coming to us, and I also had in mind the fact that he as the Prime Minister of Canada, being in intimate communication with the mother country, would of course have information which he might deem to be available to the public of Canada in order to give us a true picture of what the situation was. That was the primary idea I had in mind. I asked the Prime Minister to divulge information to the house and the country.

To-day the right hon. gentleman has made a long statement, with most of which I may say we were already familiar through press reports. He has not given us anything of a confidential character—and it may be that he is not able to do so. I make no complaint on that score. Nor do I make any complaint as to the manner of his presentation of the report. He rather scolded me; but I must say what he said on that score left me cold, and I am not going to discuss that phase.

What did I say on Thursday last? I said, as the Prime Minister has quoted:

In my view, in the view of many hon. members of this house, and I feel quite certain in the view of many people in Canada, the war situation in Europe is more serious to-day than at any time since the fall of France.

I then indicated what I have already suggested, namely, that he should give to the house and country such information as was available to him, and which he felt he might with safety reveal to the Canadian people. I went further and said that having regard to the premises which I had laid down I should like him to outline what, if anything more, Canada could do at this juncture toward aiding and assisting the mother country in her war effort, whether it be in the nature of men, materials, supplies or equipment. There has been absolutely no answer to that inquiry.

What was the attitude of the Prime Minister on Thursday last, as contrasted with his position to-day? To-day he told us in emphatic terms that he does not agree with the premises which I then laid down. Well, what did he say on Thursday? Speaking without any notes, and speaking evidently the truth as he then saw it, and expressing the views which were then in his mind, he said:

I would say to my hon. friend that I have had in mind making a statement to the house before adjournment with respect to the situation.

The Prime Minister was of course referring to the war situation. He continued:

I should like to have a little time to think over what it would be best to say. I agree with my hon. friend in his view that the situation is a serious one.

He concurred in that view. He concurred in my statement that the situation was more serious than at any time it had been since the fall of France. Then he continued:

I think anyone reading the press would gather that opinion. I would also say that such information as the government itself is receiving the press would appear to be reflecting accurately.

I suggest, with all due humility, that the two points of view do not agree.

RADIO BROADCASTING

TRANSRADIO PRESS SERVICE—ACTION BY CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) if he has anything further to report as to the attitude of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation with regard to Transradio news? Have they come to any definite decision?

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): My understanding is that at its last meeting the board appointed a special committee to make further investigations and to deal with the matter. Certain official information came to the attention of the board while it was in session which seemed to require special consideration, and it was decided that a committee should deal with the situation.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF AGREEMENTS WITH BRITISH GOVERNMENT RESPECTING BACON

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) if he will table the bacon agreements at once? On November 14, as reported on page 101 of Hansard, I asked the minister if these agreements would be available and he said that they would be tabled as soon as they were in shape. On November 27, thirteen days afterwards, I addressed a question to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture asking when this year's and last year's agreements would be tabled. The Minister of Justice promised to convey my request to his colleague, but these agreements have not yet been tabled.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): There are some features of the agreement which have yet to be discussed with the other parties concerned before it can be brought down. As soon as that is done, both agreements will be brought down.

WAR MATERIALS

REPORT AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF CHEMICAL PLANT IN SASKATCHEWAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply. The Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of November 28 carries an Ottawa dispatch to the effect that the government is considering establishing a six million dollar chemical plant at Bladworth, Saskatchewan. Has the minister any statement to make in connection with this report?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I said in the house a few days ago that I knew nothing about this project. I received a notice of my hon. friend's question a few minutes before I came into the house, and I telephoned to two or three of my officers, but they knew nothing about it. I am afraid I cannot give my hon. friend any information.

WAR BUDGET

PROPOSALS OF MINISTER OF FINANCE FOR CONSERVATION OF FOREIGN EXCHANGE

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I wish this afternoon to propose certain measures having for their purpose the conservation of foreign exchange for the purchase of essential war-time imports.

The house will remember that in the last budget a careful review of our foreign exchange position was given and certain measures were recommended for the purpose of increasing our receipts of foreign exchange and cutting down our use of it for non-essential purposes. At that time it was indicated that certain other measures would have to be adopted as and when circumstances seemed to make them necessary. Some further action has already been taken but the time has now come when other substantial measures are required. In order to enable the house to appreciate their necessity, it will be desirable for me to run briefly over our foreign exchange policies since the war began and to indicate the position at which we have now arrived.

First, however, let us recall the nature of the problem. Foreign exchange means, essentially, the money of other countries, with which we can buy goods in those other countries or make payments to people there. It is not like our own money, subject to the control of our national government. We can only obtain it by selling things to other countries, or by getting payments from them for services rendered, or by borrowing it. We cannot simply go and buy it with our own money. People in other countries cannot use Canadian money for their own internal transactions and naturally they do not want it merely to keep or to hoard—they want it only to buy things in Canada, or to make payments in Canada for services rendered to them by Canadians. Consequently, if we face a shortage of foreign exchange as a result of normal commercial and other transactions, we must bridge the gap between receipts and payments temporarily by using up our reserves of accumulated foreign exchange, for example, our bank balances in foreign countries or our gold reserves, or by selling foreign assets for foreign exchange. We can only reduce this drain upon our reserves, this gap between receipts and payments, either by selling more to those in other countries, or by buying less from them, or by suspending payment of our obligations to them or by borrowing from them. There is no other or easier way. The individual who wants foreign exchange can go and buy it—if he wants more he pays for more—but the total amount available to other Canadians is correspondingly diminished. The country as a whole can obtain more only in the ways I have described.

Formerly, one could freely convert one kind of foreign money into another so that we could, for example, use a surplus of pounds sterling to get American dollars merely by selling the sterling exchange in New York. We used to do that before the war but it is no longer possible. We cannot to-day convert our surplus supplies of sterling into the American dollars we require. For that reason, as you will recall, a large part of our surplus sterling has been used to repatriate Canadian securities held in Britain so that Britain could get Canadian dollars, in exchange for sterling, without sacrificing too much of her precious reserves of gold and American dollars. Because we cannot convert funds from sterling into American dollars, our foreign exchange is now really divided into two fairly separate fields: sterling currencies, including sterling itself and other empire currencies—with minor exceptions—and, on the other hand, what we call "hard currency", including mainly American dollars and the other foreign currencies which in practice we have to buy with American dollars and which we can sell for American dollars. It is the "hard" currencies I mean to-day in talking about foreign exchange. They constitute the problem, and not sterling of which we have plenty from the proceeds of our exports to Britain and the empire.

Turning now to a review of our exchange policies it will be recalled that exchange control was instituted on September 16, 1939, within a week of our entry into the war. It was introduced primarily because the nature of our war-time foreign exchange difficulties—the scarcity of American dollars and the surplus of sterling—was foreseen and it was realized that control would be necessary to solve this problem. Furthermore, and of greater immediate importance, it was vitally necessary to guard against the danger of a substantial outward movement of capital from Canada. Residents of other countries have very large investments in this country, and neither in their best interest nor in ours could a large volume of such investments be allowed to be dumped on the Canadian market under war-time conditions. Even Canadians themselves might have been tempted to invest part of their funds abroad as a personal hedge against the risks of war, or to speculate on the New York market. Any substantial export of capital, whether by Canadians or others, would have had two bad effects, both very serious. First of all, it would have used up our reserves of foreign exchange, as it is necessary to buy foreign exchange in order to export capital. We needed that foreign exchange to buy war-time imports from the United States. Secondly, it would have used up Canadian savings during the war, because someone in Canada would have had to buy the securities or other assets that were sold in order to export capital. We needed all our Canadian savings to help us finance the war.

The foreign exchange control board was established to carry out the control. The success of this control owes a great deal to the efficient organization which has been built up and to the very wholehearted cooperation that has been forthcoming from businesses and individuals both in Canada and in the United States, nearly all of whom have striven to observe both the letter and the spirit of the law.

The general policy followed in exchange control, up to June last, was simple in essence, though necessarily complex in application. It involved no restriction of import or export trade, of tourist trade, of the payment of interest or dividends or other current buisness transactions as distinguished from those on capital account. On the other hand, the board refused to provide exchange for the export of capital from Canada except within certain narrowly prescribed limits, and with certain exceptions for capital that had been invested in Canada after control was established. In order to carry out this restriction of capital movements it was of course necessary to scrutinize all dealings in foreign exchange and foreign trade by Canadian residents.

The board has attempted to avoid placing direct restrictions on the Canadian assets of persons living outside Canada and has not, for example, blocked the bank accounts here of non-residents, but has continued to permit non-residents to transfer them from one to another. It has been necessary, however, to place restrictions upon transactions between residents of Canada on the one hand and non-residents on the other hand, and this has restricted the sale of Canadian securities to Canadians by non-residents.

I should like to interject here that in dealing with the problem of foreign exchange and in administering foreign exchange control, we have tried at all times to accord fair and honest treatment to the residents of friendly countries. The paramount consideration is and must remain the effective prosecution of our war effort; and we have inevitably had to adopt certain measures which adversely affect the interests of non-residents. But we have avoided that type of measure which could be characterized as "taking it out of the foreigner". Callous disregard of the interests of friends who have trusted us would not only be bad in principle; it would be contrary to our own interests in the long run. I hope and believe that when the war is over all who have a stake in Canada, whether they are residents or non-residents, will be able to say that the war burden was fairly apportioned and that Canada is a country with which anyone might be proud to march into the new fields of development and constructive endeavour which we hope will open before us when peace returns.

At the end of April a further important step in exchange control was taken in order to place all our available liquid supplies of foreign exchange—but not such foreign assets as securities—directly under the control of the foreign exchange control board. This was done by the foreign exchange acquisition order which required residents of Canada to sell their holdings of foreign exchange to the board for payment in Canadian dollars. This included the Bank of Canada, which sold its gold and exchange to the board. Those who required a stock of exchange to carry on their normal business were permitted to retain enough for this purpose.

It was as a result of the budget in June last that the first measures were taken to restrict the use of exchange for other than capital transactions. By that time our imports from the United States had increased a great deal and the total payments made in hard currency for imports and other purposes was greater than the supply of hard currency that we were obtaining from our exports, tourist trade and sale of newly mined gold. The means adopted at that time to save exchange were the war exchange tax of 10 per cent on all imports except those from sterling countries, and the special progressive excise tax on automobiles. The war exchange tax, the principal measure, applied to all imports for which hard currency exchange was required and did not attempt to discriminate between essentials and non-essentials. The tax on automobiles applied to those produced in Canada as well as to those imported, but fell particularly upon the more expensive types which were made up much more largely of imports.

In July, shortly after the budget, a further measure was taken in the form of a decision not to sell foreign exchange to Canadians for pleasure travel abroad. We were reluctant to do this, because we naturally wish to promote as much contact as we can between Canadians and their friends in the United States. Nevertheless, at this time the flow of American tourists to Canada was seriously disturbed by the confusion attending the sudden introduction in the United States of strict regulations concerning the entry even of tourists to that country and it was also disturbed by what appear to have been malicious rumours, spread possibly by enemy agents, concerning the restrictions and inconveniences they might experience in war-time Canada. With this reduction in our receipts of foreign exchange from the tourist trade coming on top of our previous scarcity of American dollars, we felt it was necessary to ask Canadians to give up the use of foreign exchange for non-essential pleasure travel outside of Canada.

It is estimated that this measure alone will save us approximately sixty million dollars in a full year, a figure which indicates its importance.

These were the measures taken to restrict the use of foreign exchange. We have also acted on the other side, by trying to increase our supplies of foreign exchange. First, in regard to exports in general, the Department of Trade and Commerce has been persistently searching for markets in the United States and elsewhere for Canadian goods, both primary products and manufactured products. Their efforts in this field are most recently exemplified by the present trip of the trade delegation, headed by my colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) to Latin America and the West Indies. In addition, the foreign exchange control board has gone to great lengths in arranging its controls so as to facilitate export trade as much as possible.

We have also stimulated the provision of exchange by gold production. My own department as well as the Department of Mines and Resources has kept closely in touch with the gold mining industry since the beginning of the war, and has impressed upon the industry the need of maintaining and increasing gold production. Particular provisions were made in the Excess Profits Tax Act to ensure that that tax would operate in such a way as to encourage the expansion of gold production. My predecessor in his June budget speech made a special appeal to the industry to increase its production. Finally, in July, I arranged a conference between representatives of the industry and several other ministers and myself to see that everything was being done which could be done to ensure maximum production, including the recognition of gold mining as an essential war industry.

Finally, and probably most important, we have endeavoured to maintain and extend our tourist trade, which is a very large source of foreign exchange. The work of the Canadian travel bureau has been expanded. A much larger and I think more effective advertising campaign in the American press was carried on. Strenuous efforts were made to coordinate and assist the work of the various organizations in Canada dealing with the tourist trade. And last but far from least we obtained the enthusiastic support of a number of local organizations, which helped a good deal not only to attract tourists to Canada in the first place but to promote realization of the need to see that they enjoyed themselves when they were here. I can assure hon. members that during the next twelve months no stone will be left unturned to assure the maximum receipts of foreign exchange by the promotion and development of this important industry.

The various measures we have taken have held down the deficit between our receipts and payments of foreign exchange but they have been outweighed by the continuous pressure of war-time demands increasing our imports from the United States. During the months preceding the outbreak of war our imports from the United States were in the neighbourhood of $40 million a month. For the past six months they have averaged $65 million, and in October they reached as much as $74 million. Our exports to the United States have increased from a level of around $27 million a month preceding the outbreak of war to the neighbourhood of about $40 million a month in recent months. Consequently, we have now a very large surplus of imports over exports, though the extreme figure of $35 million in October is undoubtedly abnormal. This deficit in our trade with the United States will this year be offset only to a small extent by a surplus on current account with other hard currency countries.

Of course there are other items in our balance of payments on income account which have to be considered in addition to merchandise trade. We are producing and selling to the United States newly mined gold in an amount which will probably reach or exceed two hundred million dollars this year, and I make no excuse for laying it as a patriotic obligation upon our gold-mining industry to increase that amount next year by every means known to the able and experienced operators of that industry. Then we have a substantial net balance of receipts from the tourist trade which is more difficult to estimate. In this connection I may say that the experience of the foreign exchange control board appears to indicate that in the past our net tourist receipts have been overestimated. But even after making a substantial allowance for such overestimate, it is now quite clear that our net credit resulting from this trade during the present year will be substantially smaller than last year. We must, and I am sure we can, do a great deal to increase it by a very substantial amount during the coming year. On the other hand we have a substantial net debit on account of interest and dividends, amounting to something more than the value of our gold production. We have also a net payment of about fifty million dollars to make for freight charges and miscellaneous services.

While the inclusion of these four additional items may alter somewhat the picture presented by the balance of trade itself, nevertheless it is clear that we have a substantial debit balance in our current account transactions with hard currency countries, which under present conditions we cannot hope to see offset, except to a small extent, by the normal credits on capital account resulting from, say, the purchase of Canadian securities by foreign investors.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has the minister made an estimate of what the deficit will be?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. I do not feel that I should indicate that to the house or to the country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We shall have to guess at it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Very careful consideration has been given the question of the desirability or the possibility of giving that information to the house. It would involve stating exactly what our loss per month is in foreign exchange, which it is not desirable to make public.

For a complete understanding of the problem, the current drain on our exchange should of course be considered in the light of existing resources. You will not, however, expect that I should disclose the amount of our accumulated resources of gold and foreign exchange, a piece of information which would be of obvious interest to the enemy. These resources are being used and will continue to be used to ensure that our war effort is at no point thwarted. In the opinion of the government, however, they cannot reasonably be used to facilitate the continuance of non-essential imports. Nor do we believe that we would be justified in mobilizing and liquidating the substantial volume of foreign securities which are owned by our people, until at least a serious effort has been made to restrict our consumption of such non-essential imports.

From this review of the problem as it exists to-day and as it has developed, it will, I think, be clear to all hon. members that we must immediately take further steps to curtail the use of hard currency exchange in the purchase of non-essential imports.

I wish to emphasize, however, that we have no desire or intention in the measures which we must take for war purposes, of implying any permanent change in our normal trade policies, the principles of which are well-known.

I must also point out that while we are temporarily compelled to restrict certain imports from our friendly neighbour to the south, this does not mean that our total trade with, or our total purchases from, that country will be reduced. On the contrary, our imports from the United States will certainly show a large increase next year over this year, and will be larger than ever before in our history. All that will happen will be a shift in the character of our imports—a reduction in non-essential imports for non-war purposes in order to make possible a substantial increase in our purchases of vitally needed war equipment and supplies. We regret the disruption which will necessarily occur in certain established trades across the border, but we are confident that any loss of a direct Canadian market which certain United States producers will suffer will be more than made up by an expansion in domestic purchasing power resulting from our purchases of war equipment and supplies in the United States market.

Having determined that the restriction of imports and non-essential goods is necessary, we must answer two further questions. What method shall be used for this purpose, and what imports shall be selected?

Regarding the methods to be used, the various possibilities have been the subject of study for some time. The method of tariffs or even of the type of tax which was used in the last budget was not considered appropriate for the drastic type of restriction programme which is now required. A second method is that of quota restrictions, which has been used a great deal in other countries, and notably in Europe, but by Canada scarcely at all. This method has much to be said for it when restriction must extend to essential goods and to raw materials which are to be used in industrial processes. In these cases some imports must be permitted and complete prohibition is therefore out of the question. Nevertheless, the use of quotas requires an enormous amount of administrative work and machinery, and a considerable degree of arbitrary action in awarding quotas to various importers. We considered it for a time in connection with a number of products. We have finally decided not to use it in any formal manner but to apply the principle in some degree temporarily in connection with two or three classes of imports which are processed in Canada and where some time will be needed for these processing industries to adapt themselves to other materials. We have decided after much consideration to rely for our major savings upon the method of outright prohibition of a large number of what we consider, and I think the house will consider, imports that are not essential under present circumstances. This method will not require any elaborate machinery for its administration, nor will it involve any discrimination between importers in the awarding of quotas.

The selection of the non-essential imports is by no means an easy task in a country such as Canada which imports so many thousands of things. Our whole economic structure is dependent on the use of imports in nearly all its parts. Therefore it has been necessary to study very carefully the probable economic and social effects of curtailing the imports of the various articles which might be judged non-essential at first glance. In making up the list of goods to be restricted, the following principles have been borne in mind:

The articles prohibited should be such as consumers can legitimately be expected to do without in war time or for which their requirements can probably be met from the durable goods which they already have on hand.

The list should include finished goods rather than raw materials or parts or equipment for Canadian industries so that disturbance to Canadian industry and to those employed in it will be kept to a minimum.

Wherever possible, goods used by the well-to-do rather than those used by the mass of the public should be restricted.

The items should be such as to require a minimum of administrative machinery and action in order to carry out the restriction.

These principles have been followed in making up the list of imports to be dealt with. I may add that the task of compiling the list has been made somewhat easier by the fact that many of our imports of consumers' finished goods represent not essential supplies of the particular items but rather additional, and in many cases, superfluous varieties.

When we are in committee of ways and means I shall move two resolutions. The first of these resolutions precedes the introduction of a bill which will be entitled "The War Exchange Conservation Act." Appended to the resolution will be found two schedules, the first of which is a list of items, based on the tariff classification, the importation of which from all countries, except countries in the sterling area and Newfoundland, are to be subject to restriction. In respect of the items listed in part one of this schedule, no permits will be granted for their importation from hard currency countries. These are the really non-esential items and consist for the most part of finished gods. Part II of this first schedule comprises goods for which permits to import from hard currency countries will be granted temporarily but on a decreasing scale. This list includes, as I shall point out in a moment, several classes of materials which are used by Canadian industries. It is hoped that eventually the industries using these materials can change over to the use either of domestic materials or of other and cheaper imported materials, but it will take time for our industries to accomplish this adjustment, and in the meantime, therefore, imports will be granted but only for normal requirements. It is proposed to restrict the granting of permits only if the possibility of using other materials or materials from other sources has been fully explored.

There has been, perhaps inevitably, a good deal of speculation in recent weeks and months about the measures the government would find itself compelled to take to relieve the growing strain on the Canadian dollar exchange position. These speculations have led to a number of ill-advised and inaccurate forecasts.

I realize, sir, that there will be widespread surprise over the virtual omission of fresh fruits and vegetables from the list of prohibited imports which I am going to table. I realize, too, the difficulties which our fruit and vegetable growers have been encountering during the present year. My own environment, all my life, has been such that I understand and appreciate the problems of the fruit growers. But I should point out to the fruit and vegetable growers, and to members and others interested in helping them, that the measures to be introduced to-day are not for the purpose of assisting any producers, or any industry. They are not designed or intended to protect industry but to protect our exchange position, an entirely different thing.

The government has examined very carefully the possibilities of conserving foreign exchange by restricting imports without undue dislocation of the domestic economy and without jeopardizing the export markets in which we earn the foreign exchange required for the financing of a large part of the national war effort. I may admit frankly that we had been weighing the advantages and disadvantages of including a number of fresh fruits and vegetables in the schedule to the resolution. It was recognized that cheap and abundant supplies of fresh fruits and vegetables have become an increasingly important element in the nation's diet, not only in the months when local supplies are freely available but pretty nearly all the year round. For a considerable part of our off-season requirements, many parts of Canada are dependent on imports from the United States. There are undoubtedly among these imports of fresh fruits and vegetables a certain proportion which can only be regarded as luxuries and a larger proportion which, while not a luxury trade in the strict sense of the term, represents supplies which under war conditions we could, if need be, do without. At the same time we had to remember our imports of fresh fruits and vegetables represent a very important export market for United States agricultural products and therefore an offset and protection to the even larger export outlets which our agricultural products enjoy in the United States.

I freely admit that, from the standpoint of exchange alone, the position of the government in respect of fruits and vegetables was difficult. While we had to weigh on the one hand the exchange that would be saved by the restriction of their importation, we had to weigh on the other hand the inevitable public reaction which there would be in many of the agricultural districts of the United States, the embarrassment this reaction would cause to a friendly and helpful government which has its own problems of agricultural surpluses, and the danger which would ensue not only to our own trade relations with the United States, not only to the market which our trade agreement with that country gives to so many of our primary producers, but to the whole trade agreement policy of the United States, a policy which affects the people of all nations and with which this government has consistently cooperated.

This aspect of the fruit and vegetable question was, I may say, forcefully brought home to us last week by the consequences of the publication of the Canadian Fruit Wholesalers' Association's circular communication to its members. On its publication, the United States government felt compelled to point out that prohibition of the importation of fresh fruits and vegetables would gravely prejudice the position of the Canada-United States trade agreement, and, under it, the tariff concessions assured to certain Canadian agricultural exports. These representations, coupled with the considerations of consumer interest which had made us hesitate about recommending the prohibition of the importation of fresh fruits and vegetables, have resulted in the decision to exclude fresh fruits and vegetables from the schedule which is to be placed before the house. With a deep sense of responsibility we weighed the one set of considerations against the other, with the result that I have announced.

The list of articles which are included in part 1 of the first schedule and the importation of which will be prohibited may be summarized as follows:

Prepared cereal foods; florist stock and cut flowers; processed and canned fruits and vegetables (but not currants, raisins, dates, apricots, or grapefruit juice); preserved fish, oysters and crab; manufactured tobacco; spirits and wines; certain classes of fiction magazines and comics; consumers' paper items; perfumes, etc.; china and glass; silverware; electrical household appliances, stoves, etc; bathroom fittings; automobiles; sporting goods and fishing tackle; cameras; furniture of wood or metal; radios, phonographs; musical instruments; luggage; all finished clothing or wearing apparel; silk fabrics; ornaments; jewellery and precious stones; toys and dolls; and various miscellaneous articles.

I should like to add, immediately, that any of these articles which are the personal property of non-resident visitors to Canada may be brought into Canada by such tourists for their use here, in the same way that such things have always been admitted by our customs regulations in the past.

The second list of articles for which permits will be issued but only in restricted amounts (that is to say, the articles listed in part II of the first schedule) comprises five major categories. These include, first, unmanufactured tobacco; second, automobiles and motor vehicles other than passenger automobiles; third, hardwoods and veneers, and plywood; fourth, raw silk and various partially manufactured forms of natural silk, but not artificial silk or similar synthetic fibres; fifth, all petroleum products.

Let me emphasize again that it is the intention in regard to this second list of commodities gradually to reduce the amount of imports that will be permitted, and it is expected that the Canadian industries using the raw and semi-finished materials on this list will gradually have to adapt themselves to the use of domestic materials or materials from other sources. In the case of tobacco it is expected that the industry will be able to substitute domestic tobacco for the imported types heretofore used. The excise division of the Department of National Revenue will assist in the administration of this restriction of tobacco imports and the adaptation of the industry to the new conditions.

In the case of hardwoods and veneers it is expected that the furniture industry, with the assistance of the timber controller, will be able to replace a substantial part of their imported hardwoods with domestic woods.

In the case of silk we are dealing with a very important textile import, and with a quite substantial finishing industry in Canada. When the imports of silk materials have been brought under control, it will be possible to determine the extent to which the silk industry can switch over to the use of artificial silk in place of natural silk.

With regard to petroleum products the whole matter is much more complicated, but I understand that the oil controller is making plans to ensure that all our petroleum requirements will be imported in the most economical form possible, and plans are going forward to ensure that this will be done without burden to consumers or without discrimination against those distributors who are now using imported gasoline. Permits for the importation of gasoline will be restricted only after equitable arrangements have been made by the oil controller for the supplying of these distributors. Through the control placed in its hands by this legislation, the government will endeavour to satisfy the nation's gasoline and oil requirements for the smallest possible amount of foreign exchange.

The prohibition or restriction of imports will in many cases result in a greater demand for domestic products. We desire, however, to prevent this greater demand from resulting either in an expansion of the domestic industry concerned or in enhanced prices and profits for domestic manufacturers. Whatever element of protection there may be in these import restrictions is accidental and temporary. They are intended to reduce the consumption of imported goods and not to increase the consumption of domestic goods. Let me repeat the warning given by my predecessor in connection with the war exchange tax, that action now taken is peculiarly an emergency measure whose operation will end with the war, and no vested interest in it will be recognized.

In order to ensure that advantage is not taken of these restrictions in order to raise prices of Canadian produced goods, there is to be included a provision in the bill to enable the government to suspend these restrictions, and any duties, upon imports of any commodity in respect of which it is found that domestic producers are raising or maintaining prices unjustifiably behind the protection of this measure, and to enable the government to invoke direct penalties by way of special tax levies on such profiteers.

Mr. MacNICOL: That applies to the whole industry. How would you take care of one individual who enhanced prices?

Mr. ILSLEY: By the penalty of an excise tax. If the hon. gentleman had followed my last words he would note that I said:

> . . . and to enable the government to invoke direct penalties by way of special tax levies on such profiteers.

In the case of a number of the goods whose import is to be restricted, it is particularly desired that domestic protection shall not expand to fill the demand created by the restriction of imports. This group includes the mechanical type of consumers' durable goods. The experienced labour, the steel and certain other materials used in making these products are required for war industries, or will be very shortly. Furthermore, a substantial amount of parts or materials required in producing them are imported. It might, of course, be possible to limit the production of these goods in Canada by direct regulation of the industry. If this were attempted in the face of rising demand, it would, however, involve either higher prices and profits, or else the rationing of these durable goods, which would be exceedingly difficult because individual demands are so irregular. Consequently, we have decided to impose new or increased excise taxes on this type of article. A detailed list of the articles so affected is contained in the schedule appended to the second resolution which I am going to move and which precedes the introduction of a bill to amend the Special War Revenue Act.

I will summarize this list briefly. The excise tax on automobiles will be raised and the new rates will be as follows:

On the value (i.e. manufacturer's price) up to $900	20 per cent
On the excess over $900 and up to $1,200	40 per cent
On the excess over $1,200	80 per cent

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is in lieu of the present rates?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, in lieu of the present rates.

An excise tax of 25 per cent of the manufacturer's price is also proposed on the following items: radios and radio tubes, phonographs, cameras, slot and vending machines; electric or gas stoves, refrigerators, water heaters, light fixtures and lamps; and the following electrical appliances: washing machines, vacuum cleaners, toasters, grills, etc., irons and ironers, coffee makers, curlers, razors and several minor items.

The rates of these taxes are not so heavy that they should curtail production beyond the degree that is and will be required by the labour and material requirements of the Department of Munitions and Supply. In this connection, I should remind the house that a tax of twenty-five per cent on manufacturer's value will amount to a considerably smaller proportion of the retail value of these commodities, as distributors' margins must be taken into account. The demand for nearly all these types of durable consumers' goods, automobiles perhaps excepted, is higher because of higher wartime incomes. Most of the companies producing these articles are already engaged in the production of war supplies and the others will now be enabled to devote part of their facilities and labour force to war work.

I come now to the last of the measures concerning imports, and one which I believe will be much more welcome than the others. It is a measure by which we will be able to assist Britain in a direct and substantial way. The house is probably aware that Britain has been trying to increase its exports particularly to North and South America in order that it may be able to exchange these exports for products from this continent which it requires. British producers have faced special obstacles in export markets in war time because of the higher costs of production consequent upon air raid dangers and other conditions in Britain and also because of the greatly increased shipping freights and insurance costs. From our own point of view, there would be advantages in increasing our imports from Britain at this time, quite apart from the natural desire we have to help Britain in every way possible. We have plenty of sterling exchange to pay for such imports. In so far as we increase our imports we can spare more labour and more money to assist Britain in obtaining Canadian products.

Under these circumstances the government has come to the conclusion that we should wherever possible remove or reduce the tariffs impeding the entry of British goods into Canada. Therefore, we are proposing that all customs duties shall be removed on imports from the United Kingdom of the following list of goods specified in schedule 2 of the first resolution which I shall move:

All cotton items (except those at present free under the British preference).
All artificial silk items (except those at present free under the British preference).
Bituminous coal.
Jellies, jams and marmalades.
Furniture of all kinds.
Gloves and mitts of all kinds, and a number of miscellaneous items.

In addition, this schedule includes a list of imports from the United Kingdom on which the existing duties will be reduced. In this list will be found such items as medicinal and pharmaceutical preparations, soap, earthenware tiles, stoneware and earthenware, table cutlery, bicycles, electric generators, transformers and motors, rugs and carpets, oilcloth and linoleum.

In case some domestic producers should be alarmed at this action, let me remind them once more of the increased costs facing British exporters to Canada. Most of our industries concerned have enjoyed very greatly increased demand because of war conditions and are quite able, I believe, to stand during war time whatever additional competition may be involved as a result of this measure. I might also point out that the goods affected by this action are more in the nature of necessaries than most of the other products with which we are proposing to deal, and the effect of our action in this case should be to increase the supplies available with resulting benefit to the consumer. At the same time our expenditure of hard currency on these classes of goods should be reduced by this action.

There is one other measure included in the proposed legislation which is intended to increase our supplies of foreign exchange rather than to decrease our use of it. I have already referred to the emphasis we have placed and will continue to place on the expansion of export and tourist trade as a means of alleviating our exchange problem. The purpose of the new proposal is to enable the government to take advantage of any special opportunities that may arise to facilitate the expansion of exports that would not otherwise take place. It is extremely difficult to deal in general with the cases we have in mind by legislation, since each case is likely to involve special circumstances and to arise at fairly short notice. We must be prepared and empowered to seize whatever chances of increased trade present themselves. Therefore, the measure proposed is essentially an enabling measure to permit the government on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance, to enter into agreements with individuals or corporations in order to assist them in developing new or expanded export trade that could not otherwise be attained.

The methods to be followed will have to depend to a large extent on the circumstances of each case. We are not requesting the power to subsidize exports. Such subsidies would be useless anyway for increasing exports to the United States, because subsidized goods are subject to special countervailing duties. After due consideration it has been decided that the safest and yet most efficient and economical way to give such assistance will be by arrangements for special allowances for depreciation or depletion of capital assets under our tax laws, such as we are already giving to war industries. As in the case of war industries there are special risks attached to the investment of capital in certain export industries under war-time conditions, and they fully justify, from the viewpoint of the national interest, the more rapid amortization of these investments. Of course, once the assets are fully depreciated, we will gain in our tax revenues by that fact if the assets are still in use. In the instances which cannot be handled in this manner, we request the power to safeguard the potential exporter by the use of credits against future taxes such as was used in the tax credit plan for stimulating private capital expenditures which was introduced in the last peace-time budget. Great care will have to be taken in the use of these powers because we must avoid giving any sort of special assistance or indirect subsidy to our normal export trade, or to export trade which is able to develop without assistance.

While it is difficult to make any precise estimate of the amount of foreign exchange which the conservation measures forecast by these resolutions will save, it appears probable that on the basis of current trade the savings will amount to from $5,000,000 to $6,000,000 a month. It is still more difficult to estimate the receipts from the taxes proposed and I shall not even venture a figure.

The measures we are taking are measures for the conservation of exchange but they have more than a monetary significance. By denying ourselves a wide range of imports and by these reductions and removals of duties on British goods, we once more say to Britain and to the world that we are with her and that we have faith in her ultimate success.

What we have done since the outbreak of war leaves no doubt as to our attitude and our determination. We entered the war as a united nation by the free and virtually unanimous vote of this parliament and we have gone far in the training and arming of a peace-loving population and the speedy and efficient reorganization of our industry for war.

Conscious as we are of our responsibilities as part of the western hemisphere, we say to mankind that we are prepared to go to the very limits of our power and capacity in aid of the people of that island in the North Sea whose heroism has stirred the hearts of all lovers of liberty, that her cause is our cause, that her reverses serve but to rouse our fighting spirit, and that her final victory, whether it be soon or long deferred, will be a victory in which we, the people of Canada, will have a share.

RESOLUTIONS

Mr. Speaker, I wish to give notice that when we are in committee of ways and means I shall move the following resolutions:

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

Resolved, That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Special War Revenue Act and to provide—

1. That Schedule 1 of the said act be amended as follows:

(a) by repealing paragraph 1. (a) thereof and substituting the following:

1. (a) Automobiles adapted or adaptable for passenger use, with seating capacity for not more than ten persons each, valued at
$900 or less	20 per cent
Over $900 but not more than $1,200	20 per cent on $900 plus 40 per cent on the amount in excess of $900.
Over $1,200	20 per cent on $900 plus 40 per cent on $300 plus 80 per cent on the amount in excess of $1,200.

(b) by repealing paragraph 5 of the said Schedule and substituting the following:

5. Cameras, phonographs, radio broadcast receiving sets and tubes therefor.. 25 per cent

(c) by adding to the said schedule as paragraph 6 thereof the following:

6. (a) Electric or Gas Light Fixtures and Lamps and shades, globes and reflectors therefor ..... 25 per cent

(b) The following electrical or gas appliances adapted to household use:

Stoves, ranges and heaters; water heaters; refrigerators..... 25 per cent

(c) The following electrical appliances adapted to household use:

Food choppers and grinders; irons and ironers; washing machines; garbage disposal units; floor waxers and polishers.. 25 per cent

(d) The following electrical appliances:

Vacuum cleaners and attachments therefor; grills, waffle irons, hot plates, roasters, kettles, chafing dishes, food and drink mixers and juice extractors, coffee makers, toasters of all kinds, portable humidifiers, curling irons, tongs, hair dryers, permanent waving machines, razors and shavers.... 25 per cent

(d) by adding to the said schedule as paragraph 7 thereof the following:

7. Coin, disc or token operated slot machines and vending machines; coin, disc or token operated games or amusement devices of all kinds..... 25 per cent

2. That any enactment founded on this resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on the second day of December, one thousand nine hundred and forty, and to have applied on all goods imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on or after that day and to have applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that day.

WAR EXCHANGE CONSERVATION ACT, 1940

Resolved, That it is expedient to introduce a measure to be called the War Exchange Conservation Act, 1940, and to provide—

1. That the importation into Canada of any goods enumerated and described in schedule one is prohibited except in such cases as the Minister of National Revenue in his discretion deems desirable and under and in accordance with the terms of a permit granted by him: Provided however that this prohibition shall not apply to—

(a) any goods imported from, and being of the growth, produce or manufacture of, any country within the sterling area or Newfoundland, except, at the discretion of the Minister of National Revenue, goods composed wholly or in part of silk;

(b) any goods which on or before the second day of December, 1940, were in transit to Canada.

2. That notwithstanding anything contained in the preceding resolution, the Minister of National Revenue may, in his discretion, exempt any goods from the operation of the preceding resolution for such periods of time as he may deem desirable and notice of any such exemption shall be published in the Canada Gazette and the exemption shall take effect on and after the date of such publication or any later date fixed in such notice.

3. That for the purposes of these resolutions "sterling area" means the territories under the sovereignty, protection, suzerainty or mandate of His Majesty (except Canada, Newfoundland and Hong Kong) and such other territories whether or not under the sovereignty, protection, suzerainty or mandate of His Majesty as may be designated by the governor in council).

4. (1) That in the event of producers of goods taking advantage of the prohibition of imports to increase the prices of such goods to the consumer or to maintain such prices at levels deemed by the governor in council to be higher than should prevail, having regard to changes in the cost of production of such goods, the governor in council may, in addition to permitting entry of such gods, reduce or remove the duties of customs imposed upon such goods.

(2) That in the event of any such producer taking advantage of the prohibition of imports as aforesaid, the governor in council may impose upon all the products of such producer, or any of them, an excise tax equivalent to the amount of customs duty which would be paid by such goods if the same were imported into Canada under the provisions of the general tariff and the same shall be collectible as a tax, and the provisions of the Special War Revenue Act as to the collection of taxes shall be applicable thereto.

5. (1) That goods enumerated and described in schedule two, the growth, produce or manufacture of the United Kingdom, when imported into Canada in a manner and under conditions which entitle such goods to entry under the British preferential tariff of Canada, shall be exempt from the rates of duty set out in schedule A to the Customs Tariff and shall, in lieu thereof, be subject to the rates of duty set out in schedule two.

(2) That any enactment founded on this resolution shall apply to all goods enumerated and described in schedule two imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on or after the second day of December, 1940, and to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before the said date.

6. That the governor in council in order to increase Canada's supply of foreign exchange may, on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance, enter into agreements with individuals, partnerships or corporations to grant assistance by way of special tax credits and/or special allowances for depreciation or depletion under the Income War Tax Act and The Excess Profits Tax Act, if, in the opinion of the governor in council, such assistance is necessary in order that an expansion of the exports of any individual, partnership or corporation receiving such assistance may take place.

7. That any enactment founded on these resolutions shall be deemed to have come into force on the second day of December, 1940, and to expire on the date of the issue of a proclamation under the War Measures Act declaring that a state of war no longer exists or on such earlier date as may be fixed in a proclamation of the governor in council.

SCHEDULE 1

Tariff Item Number	Description
	PART I
20	Cocoa paste or "liquor" and chocolate paste or "liquor", not sweetened, in blocks or cakes.
21	Cocoa paste or "liquor" and chocolate paste or "liquor", sweetened, in blocks or cakes, not less than two pounds in weight.
22	Preparations of cocoa or chocolate in powder form.
23	Preparations of cocoa or chocolate, n.o.p., and confectionery, coated with or containing chocolate.
ex 45	Prepared cereal foods, in packages not exceeding twenty-five pounds weight each.
46	Prepared cereal foods, n.o.p.
65	Biscuits, not sweetened.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we have all listened with great interest to the speech made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). May I say to him that, having regard to the advance notices in the press, and what we have heard in the corridors, the proposals are not nearly as important as perhaps I had hoped they would be. I say that because I, too, realize the seriousness of the exchange position, and the necessity for conserving our foreign exchange.

Some very important changes in the trends of business will, of course, be brought about by the resolutions. We have not had an opportunity even to analyse to any degree the items affected, and therefore I hope that unless the necessity is exceedingly great, the government will consent to an adjournment of this debate until the debate on the address is concluded, so that we may have ample opportunity for study.

My first reaction is that these resolutions will be beneficial for the purpose for which they are intended; and such criticisms and suggestions as we may have to make will, I hope, be constructive and helpful, and in no sense be considered as in the slightest degree contravening the government's war effort, which we are desirous to see forwarded with the utmost expedition.

Therefore I beg the leave of the house to move adjournment of the debate. We could confer together as to when it might be resumed. My suggestion is that to-morrow night we should complete the debate on the address in reply, and then we might resume this matter on Wednesday. I should be agreeable to that, if it meets with the approval of the Prime Minister.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): So far as may be possible the government is anxious to meet my hon. friend's views. I believe, however, it would be unwise to attempt to conclude the other debate first. These resolutions are very important, and I suggest that the country should know as soon as possible that they have been accepted by the house.

If it would meet the convenience of my hon. friend, I would suggest that we continue the debate on the address in reply this afternoon, and that to-morrow we proceed with the resolutions. I was going to make the further suggestion that it might facilitate matters and perhaps meet the convenience of hon. members if the resolutions were immediately referred to the committee of ways and means, on the understanding that hon. members would be free to discuss any phase of the matter in that committee. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) would be enabled in that way immediately to answer questions, a course of procedure which it would not be possible for him to follow during the course of a formal debate. If that procedure were followed, I believe it would expedite this week's proceedings.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I say to my right hon. friend that no one has seen these resolutions except myself, and I have just been able to glance through them. They will not be printed and available to hon. gentlemen until noon to-morrow. How can anyone intelligently discuss the principles involved in these resolutions when he has not had time to study them? I do not think we are asking too much when we request that they be allowed to stand over until Wednesday. That would be the usual thing in a budget debate. As a matter of fact more time would be given. The amount of exchange to be saved is not as large as I had hoped, and I do not think the matter is so pressing that we should be asked to proceed with the discussion to-morrow afternoon. If, however, the government insists, I suppose they can force us to go on.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is no disposition on the part of the government to attempt to force my hon. friend or any other hon. member in the matter of time. Would he deem it wise to have the resolutions referred to the committee at once with a view to having a full discussion later?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think we ought to have a discussion on the general principles involved, which discussion may not take very long. It may be that after hon. members have digested the minister's statement they will feel that they have some observations to make. I fancy that some hon. members will be hearing from the country as soon as these particulars are published. We usually do. I do not like to commit myself to permitting the motion to be carried without any discussion. I do not think the matter is as pressing as that. On previous occasions when war budgets have been quite pressing we have allowed them to go through, but I think this ought to be done in a more orderly way. We should study these proposals before we give approval.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Before the motion is put, I should like to say that I support the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson). I think we should be given time to study these proposals and I object to the procedure suggested by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I do this because of what happened during the last budget debate. A similar request was made to which we agreed, but subsequently when it was desired to stray outside the particulars of an item under discussion the Deputy Speaker who was then in the chair reminded hon. members that he could not be bound by any understandings which might have been arrived at between the whips or members of the house. He felt that he was bound by the rules, and therefore the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) and the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) were prevented from discussing certain matters which they wished to bring before the committee. I make this objection not because we wish to delay the consideration of these important matters, with the bulk of which we are in complete agreement, but to ask that we follow the procedure provided for by the rules.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thought I made it clear that I was not trying to impose any restriction on the house. The suggestion I made was made in the light of experience of debate in this house and also, I confess quite frankly, with a view to helping to economize the time of the government and of hon. members. Speaking on behalf of the government I am quite prepared to have matters follow their regular course without any restriction. Perhaps the house would be agreeable to this debate being now adjourned and our continuing with the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

On motion of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) the debate was adjourned.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Friday, November 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. Brooke Claxton for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Blackmore.

Hon. W. E. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, this rather sudden deviation from our usual course emphasizes the tragedy of the present occasion. In resuming the debate which was adjourned on Friday I wish to say that many ably presented and carefully considered speeches have been made in this somewhat prolonged debate. I feel I should compliment the mover (Mr. Claxton) and the seconder (Mr. Jutras) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I realize that their task was not an easy one. I think the house will agree when I say that despite the crisis through which we are passing, the speech from the throne was very vague indeed. It was more conspicuous for what was not in it than it was for what was in it. I do not think I have heard one delivered in this house which told so little of what had passed and indicated so little as to what we might expect in the future.

It is my purpose to avoid as much as possible repeating what has been said already, it is my desire to restrict my remarks more to a discussion of the general principles underlying the government's policies than to endeavour to go into the details of administration and the difficulties connected therewith. I am confident that no old political differences that exist among us can obscure the problem we all face, that of winning the war. Political distinctions may have existed in the past, but I feel that to-day we stand on common ground, facing a common foe with our eyes turned toward one definite goal, namely victory. It is therefore with deep concern and sincere purpose that I even venture to question the policies of the government with reference to our war effort.

As has been said quite often in this house by members of the government and by other hon. members, these are serious and tragic days through which we are passing. I agree with that, but it appears to me that the people throughout the dominion do not thoroughly understand what must be done to achieve victory. I think it was Kipling who said:

> When king and people understand each other past a doubt
> It takes a foe and more than a foe to knock that country out.

I doubt if the people and the government of Canada thoroughly understand each other. We must have this understanding if democracy is to survive this terrific crisis. The hour has come when we must throw off the old mantle of what might be termed political camouflage and don the suit of political truth. I urge the government to take the Canadian people into their confidence and tell them where Canada stands in this far-reaching and devastating struggle.

I realize what has been pointed out on more than one occasion, namely, the tragic dangers that lie ahead, and I cannot help feeling that our people have been to some extent misled in the past. The government's repeated boast of winning the last election is not good enough to meet the present situation and the terrific task that lies ahead of us now. No one within the sound of my voice will, I am sure, say that any of those old-time political slogans have much bearing on our present situation. Those old slogans about economic appeasement, "our status as a nation," the election slogan of "national unity," and the promise of "no conscription," recruiting for "home defence only," the "pay-as-you-go policy"—all these have indeed been convenient mile-posts on a road which, however convenient in times of peace, is of no more use to-day than last week's dream.

This is not a war between two countries. It is not a war even between two great parts of the world. It is a war between two ways of life, a war between freedom and slavery. Many countries which had much greater military preparations than Canada has ever had, and which were much more strongly determined to hew to a line of home defence only, have one after another fallen before that gigantic dictatorial force which has swept fourteen or fifteen countries to ruin and defeat. Let us not fool ourselves, and much less our gallant soldiers by conscripting them to fight for our common defence in Canada when the freedom and the very life of our people depend upon the battles that are being fought by the British forces overseas. We are a nation within the empire. We do not stand if that empire falls, and our first concern must be to fight the battle over there, even if our last effort should eventually be home defence here.

May I suggest that a more vigorous policy for Canada of total war for victory rather than the more popular plan of home defence for Canada would do much to encourage our great friends and neighbours, the United States of America, to enter this war whole-heartedly. The only sure home defence of this British dominion is a British victory and our continued protection by the British navy. Indeed, that is, I believe, the only permanent defence upon which our great neighbour to the south depends. I say, therefore, that Canada's front line of home defence and her front line for victory are one and the same, and that line to-day is in the English channel and in the Mediterranean sea, as has been well said already by many hon. members. If by any chance the battle that is being fought over there were lost—and by the way we are proud indeed that we have noble volunteers in that battle—Canada's next line of defence would lie within the protection of the United States of America. Even our great friend, the United States of America, is rapidly beginning to realize that her only sure hope rests in an all-out victory by the British forces.

May I now be permitted to refer to one or two editorials by an important United States writer. They have appeared in the Chicago Daily News. The Chicago Daily News is a notable paper in the United States and its service is taken by some twenty-five or thirty papers in the United States and by many papers in Canada. Last May, in an editorial headed "The Hour of Decision," it says:

> If these vital interests can best be served by aloofness from any participation in the crucial struggle now in progress in Europe, then we should remain aloof and inactive.
> If, however, our vital interests are involved and we will be critically and perhaps disastrously affected by a defeat of the allies, and a victory for Germany, then indifference to the outcome and pursuit of a policy of rigid isolation not only is cowardly and despicable, but is as well a betrayal of our vital interests.

Then again:

> Here is a life and death struggle for every principle we cherish in America for freedom of speech, of religion, of the ballot and of every freedom that upholds the dignity of the human spirit.
> Here all the rights that the common man has fought for during a thousand years are menaced.
> The time has come when we must throw into the scales the entire moral and economic weight of the United States on the side of the free peoples of western Europe who are fighting the battle for a civilized way of life.

In another editorial published in the same month of May, and headed "Time to Face the Truth," the Daily News says:

> We are already lending aid to the allies: Why?
> Because our own national interests demand it, because it is against our vital interests to have Germany emerge from this war with complete domination of both land and sea in the eastern hemisphere.
> But this is not all. The conquest of Britain by Germany would destroy the British empire. That empire would disintegrate. Canada is a part of it. Lacking the protection of the British fleet, Canada would be unable to maintain its independence. Would we permit it to become a colony of the German empire? We would not. As an act of self-preservation we would forthwith go to the assistance of our northern neighbour, and forcibly prevent German aggression directed at Canada.

To show that the great majority of the people of the United States feel that they are dependent, as I have said, on the British navy almost as much as Canada is, I quote from another article by a writer who knows the foreign situation very well indeed. Writing in September on the warship deal, he said:

> The chief defence of the United States, our real ability to make and keep the Monroe doctrine effective has, since 1823, depended upon Anglo-American domination of the Atlantic.

In the absence of a fleet immensely more powerful than ours is now, hemispheric defence, many experts believe, would have proved difficult.

Britain's contribution to America's sea defence was, until we finally built a great fleet, far more important than ours. It consisted and still consists primarily in keeping any other European fleet from entering the Atlantic ocean in force. This is the importance to us of preventing Britain from going under and, what is equally important, of seeing that the British fleet is in a position to control not only the North sea and the channel, but Gibraltar and the west African route as well.

Germany has now taken possession of the low countries, temporarily at least. But friendship with the United States has remained and is apparent in the present exchange of bases for destroyers which may ultimately save Great Britain and, thereby, conceivably the United States as well.

On November 18, he also wrote in an editorial which is of interest in other respects:

Under the terms of our joint defence agreement with Canada, we have an equally clear right to make our southern fields available to the regular Canadian training plan.

The Canadians may wish later to send some of these pilots overseas to fight for Britain. Thus, indirectly, we would be aiding Britain by training Canadians here. But of course we are already committed to a policy of aiding Britain, and that policy rests wholly on the assumption that by aiding Britain we contribute to our own defence and the defence of the hemisphere.

I wish to compliment the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the government upon having secured a joint defence agreement with the United States, because I realize fully, and I hope the country realizes, that if the need for the home defence of this country arises, we can have no hope except in a joint defence by the United States and Canada. We have heard almost daily from an anxious press and from a large department of governmental publicity that old hackneyed slogan of recent months, "Let Us Face the Facts." I believe, Mr. Speaker, that we must face the facts and tell our people that if the battle of Britain is lost in the eastern hemisphere, the only dismal hope that is left to us of security is in a joint defence of the western hemisphere by Canada and the United States.

Our purpose should be, not to place so much emphasis on home defence but rather to follow the leadership of that great British statesman, the Right Hon. Winston Churchill—"on with the war to victory." I am confident that we can achieve victory, but we can do so only by standing together and looking at our problems realistically. Instead of conscripting a vast army for the defence of Canada, in order to fight only in Canada, when the war is being waged somewhere else, we should rally behind the British in prosecuting the war on the battlefield. I say that in all fairness to the government, and I believe the Canadian people will endorse that view. It is more important to conscript men, if one should wish to use that term, to work in our factories in order to provide the war equipment and munitions essential for the successful prosecution of the war overseas than it is to conscript men on the assurance that they will not have to leave the shores of Canada, that they will merely have to fight in a country where there is no fighting; for we must remember that, as has been said, Canada is a peaceful country; and when the battle comes to Canada the victory is lost. If we want to win the war, if we want victory, then we must not put the emphasis on home defence in the sense of having armed forces over here.

We are thankful for all those noble men who have volunteered to serve their country without any regard whatsoever to government policy. These men have been only partly equipped by Canada. The war has been going on now for fifteen months and we have only 50,000 men overseas. Canada wrote a glorious page in the history of empire progress in the years from 1914 to 1918. The Royal Canadian Air Force, composed of the best air men in the world, is writing as glorious a page in our history to-day. I hope that when the war is over, we shall not be charged with having prepared an army for the purpose of fighting where there is no fighting while we have neglected to support those who are bearing the burden of the struggle. There are other factors of vital concern if we are to achieve victory. The sudden and spectacular deviation this afternoon from ordinary procedure is further evidence of these other vitally important issues; for we see the necessity of maintaining our basic industry, the business and commerce of the nation, and all that contributes to the prosecution of this terrific war.

We are told in history—I do not know what gold standard they had in those days—that war in Caesar's time cost seventy-five cents a head. In Napoleon's time the cost was $375 a head. As nearly as we can estimate, it was $20,000 in the last war, and it is estimated by some leading economists to-day—I have heard many of them talk in this house—that the per capita cost in this war will be $50,000. That being so, surely we can face an additional cost which the government estimates at something like $1,500,000,000 a year. The old policy of pay as you go, which we heard so much about a year ago, and which sounded so politically popular at the time, is of little use to-day. Indeed, it sounds as foolish now as if a man whose house was burning down refused to turn the water hose on the fire until he had paid his water rate. We realize that there are enormous obligations on the government, and these obligations will become still greater. In meeting them it is at times as dangerous to pay as you go and to collect taxes for the purpose as it is to mortgage the future. There is a limit beyond which the government cannot go without completely strangling industry and destroying the initiative which makes for industrial expansion.

Another very important phase of our war policy, has, in my opinion, been to some extent neglected. I refer to the present position of agriculture. The other day we listened to the speech delivered by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). We expected him to bring down some information that would be of use to us. He told us a good deal about his trip overseas and it sounded as if, while he was over there, he had found an old Liberal campaign handbook. He told us that the farmers will be expected next year to produce more for less. He told us that there was an agreement, which he has not yet presented to the house although he has been asked for it on many occasions, which would enable us to sell over $100,000,000 worth of agricultural products.

I agree with my hon. friend, my colleague and desk mate (Mr. Bruce), in what he said the other day, namely, that we should not bargain too much with the old land at this time when she seeks credit from foreign countries. Our government should ask the people of the mother country how much she requires—not how many hundred million dollars worth, but how many pounds of foodstuffs—and how much they can pay for those foodstuffs. If they cannot pay more than eighty cents on the dollar, then let us give them those foodstuffs at that lower price and pay the farmer the difference. We are giving them little that they are not paying for now.

I suggest that this government would be well advised to add to the $1,500,000,000 a year war programme a little more in order to carry on the war properly. We are not encountering the obligations which the old country has to face; we are not enduring the bombing that the people over there have to put up with; we are not separated from our children as they are; we are not paying the taxes that they are paying.

We have wide-open spaces, idle farms that can be made productive; and there is no more loyal class of people in Canada than our farmers, who have struggled through adversity in the years that have gone. Many of these people are from the mother country; others have come from other lands, but they have been assimilated and have come to respect our British traditions. They are proud of the freedom that they now enjoy under the British flag. Well, this freedom must be paid for now; it must be safeguarded; and I submit that if the government is to carry out its full duty in this war, it should make possible the disposal of foodstuffs to the mother country at reasonable prices.

But the government have a responsibility to the great basic industry from which that supply must come, and if they understand the public, as I know that many of them do, they must realize that during the last ten years Canadian farmers have gone through very difficult times. Canadian agriculture might well be called the "loss leader" of Canadian prosperity. Our farmers have produced at cost—and, if they had the capital, they would produce at less than cost—until thousands of farms have slipped away from underneath their feet.

I know what our rural people have endured and are now enduring—great hardships and losses—and I can tell the government that they have been greatly disappointed. Last year they were assured that they would receive certain prices for their products. Several boards were established to safeguard the production of vital foodstuffs for the war requirements of Britain. Some of the boards set up were: the agricultural supplies board, the fertilizer supply committee, the fruit and vegetable committee, the dairy products board and, last but not least, the bacon board. I have no doubt that prominent and capable men were named on these different boards.

The farmer was given to understand, through the bacon board, that he could figure on around nine cents a pound live weight for his hogs. But what happened? The Minister of Agriculture the other day said that the farmers were quite capable of marketing their own products successfully. Yet we find that on these various boards—there are twenty-five or thirty men on them—there is not a single farmer or producer representing our great basic industry. Is it any wonder the farmer now says, with a great deal of justification, that he is the forgotten man in this new type of Canadian politics? I do not wish to suggest that a sop was not thrown out to him. He was told, "We will name a couple of you on the advisory board." But what did that really mean? That board has no authority but sits merely as an advisory board to advise other boards that have the authority.

I would point out that there are many other processors, such as the meat packing interests of Canada, who are named on these boards, and rightly so. The meat packers of Canada should have representation on the board. The canning factories should have representation. But the meat producers of this country have an equal right to be represented on that board with the meat processors.

I want to leave a few suggestions with the Prime Minister, who has extended to me the courtesy of bearing with me for these few minutes. There should be a full-time minister of agriculture. That does not come as an original suggestion from me; it has been put forward by several other hon. members. I say that with all respect for the ability of the present Minister of Agriculture; it is a full-time job. If agriculture is a basic industry of this dominion; if our war effort depends as much on the foodstuffs as on the munitions and war equipment we produce, as we were told by the Minister of National War Services the other day, then the agricultural industry is entitled to the attention of a full-time minister, no matter how capable the present holder of that office may be.

It has also been suggested, and I agree with the suggestion, that the government should give serious consideration to changing the control of the marketing of agricultural products from the Department of Trade and Commerce to the Department of Agriculture. The other day the Minister of Agriculture said that this would not be as good as the dual control which they have at present, but that statement seemed strange, especially in view of the fact that he as Minister of Agriculture had just returned from overseas where he had been trying to market our farm products. It certainly is not in keeping with the evidence and recommendations of the Shaw report of two or three years ago when a group of men were sent to the old country for the express purpose of finding out how this dual control worked. On their return they reported to the government by the Shaw report that they were not in favour of dual control. We have seen many clumsy examples of this dual control, and I am not sure that those inside the government have not seen more than clumsy handling of the department, because I do not believe that at all times it runs as smoothly as may appear on the surface.

I realize that the minister has already told this house that he has secured an agreement for some 112 million pounds of cheese required overseas. I do not intend now to take much time in discussing what might be done in that regard. I have strong convictions as to many things that could be done to help cheese production in this country and the consumption of it elsewhere. I find that the price for this increased amount is going to be something like two-fifths of a cent higher than it was last year. It is going to be 14·4 cents a pound. If there is an hon. member in this house who has had anything to do with dairying, I would ask him, does he not think the government might give careful consideration to the small encouragement that this offers the farmer in producing milk at $1 per hundred pounds—and less, as it represents.

In view of the fact that Canadian farmers received less last year than they were assured for their bacon; that they have been told they are going to receive less this year than last, and that although they are engaged in the only basic industry in Canada that is important to our war effort, that has been asked to produce more for less and pay 13 per cent more for the products they require for the operation of their farms, the government should give careful consideration to the measures for making the farmer prosperous.

May I clarify my position, if it needs clarification. I am not appealing for war profits for the farmer, but I am appealing on behalf of our empire war effort and the war services that the farmer is ready to give, but cannot continue to give indefinitely by producing at less than cost of production. Therefore it is essential to the security that we owe to Britain, essential for the foodstuffs that may be required sooner than we expect, even though we have a few surpluses, to place agriculture in a position where it will have some incentive to produce to capacity. Consequently I suggest that the government, whether it be by way of a subsidy or a bonus —call it what you will—a war subsidy, a war bonus or war assistance, give assurance to the farmers that they will not be asked to produce essential war commodities, the foodstuffs that are vital to our own life, the life of Britain and, indeed, to the life of Europe later on, at less than cost of production, but that they should be on a basis with the munitions manufacturers, on a cost-plus basis rather than a cost-minus basis.

It is unsatisfactory for the farmers in my riding and elsewhere when they know that under our present plan for victory amateur carpenters, some of whom can hardly drive a nail straight, have been getting ninety cents an hour with double pay for overtime, while the farmer is told that if butter goes any higher the price will be fixed. I think it was only the other day the Prime Minister himself assured labour that any concessions they give now will not be forgotten, that they will not lose anything by their contribution to the war effort. With that I heartily agree; the labouring man is entitled to his hire; it is essential for him to be satisfied and that we shall not have strikes but have a real effort on the part of labour to achieve maximum production.

I submit in all sincerity that it is equally essential that the great basic industry of Canada be given some assurance of economic security, not for the sake of the profits the farmer may make but in order that he may give still greater service to the empire and further justify his place in the economic life of this country. That is essential also to the future prosperity of this dominion, because one cannot realize that we have in Canada over 750,000 farmers without realizing also that increased purchasing power in the hands of the farmers generally would go a long way toward solving the very problem with which the government is confronted to-day. Without that purchasing power I do not see that there would be much hope for prosperity even if we did not have a war.

I know there are those who will say that this is a drastic proposal, but we have paid peace-time subsidies on many products. We have fixed the price of wheat; I think it is fixed too low, but I am not going to state the figure that I think should be set. I would ask the government, however, at least to give serious consideration to putting agriculture on a war basis, though not for the benefit of war-time prices. If they think the price is going too high let their boards function in order to keep it at a reasonable level. I know something about agriculture; at least for a long time I have been trying to learn something about it, and I submit that under present conditions we are in grave danger of a curtailment in the production of pork, cheese and other vital commodities. Unless some action is taken or unless these prices rise without governmental action, we may find ourselves unable to furnish the quantities that the Minister of Agriculture has assured Britain.

I hope I have not laboured this point too greatly or delayed the house too long while dealing with it. I had not intended to speak at this length, but I should like to tell the government once more that in my opinion we have placed too much emphasis on home defence and to no small extent have let that idea becloud our real war effort. I believe we must develop, not only in the minds of those who may be conscripted but also in the minds of those who stay behind, the mothers and close relatives, that a man may be just as useful in a factory, producing essential supplies for the carrying on of the war overseas, as he may be while waiting for a war that we pray to God may never come here.

[Mr. Rowe.]

In conclusion, if the government can place agriculture on a firmer war basis and give the farmers greater security than they have at the present time; if we stand together with one common purpose in mind keeping victory first and home defence second, then I am confident that we shall win over there a victory that will make unnecessary Canada's home defences over here.

Mr. J. M. DECHENE (Athabaska): It is with a good deal of diffidence, Mr. Speaker, that I rise to speak at this stage of this debate, which has been going on for quite some time. I am deeply grateful for the opportunity that is given me at this time to be, for a few moments, the voice of a part of Alberta which for the first time in many years is represented in this assembly by a Liberal supporter. In listening to the young members who moved and seconded the address this year, as I listened to those who moved and seconded the address last session, I was struck with the ability displayed by the young men who have joined the Liberal forces. It occurred to me that it must be very gratifying to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), who for so many years has led the Liberal party in this country, to see attracted to the party young men of this type, who can present their ideas to this house and to the country in such impeccable language and with such force and conviction. It must be consoling, not only for him but for the people of Canada as well, to see these young men active in the ranks of the Liberal party, which as a result will remain a living force in the affairs of Canada not only during this war but also after the war is over.

As the lone representative of the French-Canadian race from Alberta may I be permitted at this point to address a few words to my compatriots who form such an important part of the representation in this assembly.

(Translation): Mr. Speaker, allow me, on behalf of my compatriots of the province of Alberta, to bring a message to my colleagues, so numerous and influential, who represent the mother province, the ancient province of Quebec, and the other eastern provinces. While we love the province of Alberta as a well-born man loves his wife, we love the province of Quebec as a well-born man loves his mother. I bring you this message from my compatriots who inhabit an immense area where, in the parishes as in the villages, although the French Canadians are in a minority, the language of their fathers has been religiously preserved and remains in high honour. I thank the hon. members of this house for the generous reception they have accorded to a representative of a part of the Canadian land where our French-Canadian compatriots can use their mother tongue and continue magnificently to defend their rights and preserve the language which has come down to them from their forefathers. I trust that the French-Canadian members from eastern Canada will, when the occasion arises, use the influence which I have just referred to for the benefit of their compatriots from Alberta.

(Text) May I be permitted to say a few words respecting the constituency which has honoured me with membership in this chamber? My constituency runs west from the boundary of Saskatchewan, where it adjoins the one represented by the lady member (Mrs. Nielsen). It follows the Saskatchewan river between the fourth and fifth meridians, and extends to the extreme north of Alberta to a point near Fort Smith, the capital of the Northwest Territories.

Listening the other day to the observations of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) in moving the address in reply, I was reminded that in my constituency even to an extent greater than in his we have a cross-section of the population of Canada. That population was well and ably described the other day by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson). In Athabaska we have peoples from almost every nation in the world who carry on peacefully in that vast country. Some are engaged in farming, some in ranching, some in mixed farming, some in trading and trapping, some in lumbering, some in fishing—all producing a great share of wealth to help this nation while engaged in her war effort. In addition, a large percentage of the young men in that constituency have enlisted in the forces of Canada to fight overseas.

I am not one who believes that democracy will die. I was not pleased to hear the leader of a party in this chamber repeat the unfortunate words allegedly stated by a man living across the border line.

In this session, and particularly during the last session, we have been shown that the people throughout the commonwealth are engaged in a fight described by all as a fight for liberty and freedom. We are fighting not only for freedom of religion and thought, but for freedom by representation in parliament, as exemplified in this chamber. During the progress of the war the Canadian people gave their clear and emphatic decision as to leadership. I have been astounded, however, to note that no sooner had the votes been counted than a number of those who claimed to be the greatest patriots and the greatest defenders of democracy in Canada proceeded to attempt to interfere with the will of the people. There was an attempt to deny the people their right. After they had chosen their Prime Minister and a government formed by him, an attempt was made by some hon. members and through the press—and there is still talk of the kind—to have another man and another government lead the country in its time of war.

I have said that the votes were hardly counted when that happened. The reason given for advocating a change in government a few weeks or months after the election was that the situation overseas had changed greatly since the time of the election. I remember well the words of the Prime Minister at the time of dissolution in January. It was because he felt that the situation overseas would change vastly, because he was convinced there would be a great offensive by the axis powers on the western front, as he declared openly on the radio and through the press, and because he believed a tremendous offensive would be lodged against Great Britain and France, that he considered it expedient to dissolve parliament so that a new government might be formed, and thereby preclude on the eve of an election the possibility of this house engaging in a debate which might become acrimonious. He believed the people of Canada should be called upon to choose a government. The issue was so clear that I found it surprising that any question arose either in or out of the house as to who should lead the government and the country during this time of crisis.

I have made some brief observations respecting Athabaska; permit me another one. In that constituency we have a large number of farmers and, like the hon. member who has immediately preceded me, because of the farm population in my constituency I have a keen interest in what happens to the farmer at this stage of the war and in view of world markets. I could wish only that my voice might be strong enough and have enough authority to reach many more hearers, not in western but in eastern Canada.

I resent keenly the libelling of the province in which I live and in which for almost fifty years I have made my home. I resent the libelling of conditions in western Canada, as preached in this chamber. I know there has been misery and poverty in some places. We must realize that western Canada, compared with the east, is a country of extreme weather conditions. While crops in the eastern part of this country may vary from year to year, the fact remains that in the western part we are exposed to drought affecting not only one part of a province but, indeed, affecting vast territories, as happened in 1937.

When I speak of 1937, despite what has been said by hon. members across the floor of the house, may I say that we in Alberta, and particularly the people in Saskatchewan, are thankful for the rescue of the vast numbers of farmers—nearly 66 per cent of the population of Saskatchewan—through the extremely precious help extended by the government and the Canadian people generally.

It is in that spirit that I approach the matter of farm prices. In the time at my disposal I would find it impossible to discuss in full the production of bacon, butter, wheat, live stock and other commodities of western Canada. The subject would be too great, complicated and diversified to be treated amply in a few minutes. As an hon. member from Alberta, however, I appeal to the goodwill and good feeling of hon. members and other persons from other parts of Canada in effecting a settlement of western problems.

May I repeat what I have said on other occasions, namely, that western Canada is not a land of IOU's; it is not a land of paupers; although it may have been for some time past, it is not a land of men who refuse to meet their just debts. It is a land of men and women of honour and integrity. May I point out to eastern Canada that under anything like normal conditions the farmer of the west is just as honourable, and just as anxious and desirous to meet his obligations as the farmer or any other person of any part of this dominion.

While there have been extreme weather conditions, and while a bad situation has arisen in some parts of western Canada, a situation which was made worse by the depression, I do know that a large number of farmers are doing well in the west. Many farmers in Athabaska resent being represented, through the observations of some hon. members, as men unable to earn a living, and as men living in a country in which it is impossible to provide the necessities of life. We have heard this sort of thing for twenty years, since 1921. We are on that account sometimes met with considerable antagonism and animosity in the eastern provinces.

Every fair-minded man in western Canada knows there is a difficult wheat situation to face again. The 1940 crop proved difficult, and the 1941 crop will be difficult unless the east and the west get together in an effort to solve this problem. We know we can offer value. Only a few hours ago I was reading an article which brought tears to my eyes. It described conditions obtaining in some of the countries of Europe. Millions are being faced with starvation. In Denmark, Norway and the low countries they will have to kill off their live stock because they cannot import the feed necessary to keep them alive and bring them to market. Starvation will be stalking through the streets and lanes of France. In only a few minutes we shall be going to hotels and restaurants, and I ask hon. members to remind themselves that it is not fair for us to speak as we have been doing. Hon. members talk of the misery we are in, but we do not know what true misery is.

Mr. JAQUES: No reason why we should.

Mr. DECHENE: May I say to my hon. friend that I know more about the situation in Canada than he does. The problem of financing the next crop, should it prove bountiful, cannot be solved by displaying the sort of spirit displayed by the hon. member. This problem should be considered in a national way. This is the thought I want to bring from the vast country of Athabaska. The federal and provincial departments of agriculture will have to get together on this matter. Complete information should be furnished to the farmers of the west. If I am correctly informed, there is no wheat problem in eastern Canada because last year's crop has all been sold. Our farmers should be told of the advisability of and the necessity for leaving greater acreage under fallow. This should be done in order to clean the land. A great deal of western land needs cleaning because it has been badly infected with weeds, and next year would be a good time to undertake this work. A greater acreage should be planted with hay in order to clean it up and bring back the fertility which has been lost.

I do not think I am divulging any secret when I say that bacon is not considered a necessity by the British government. Great Britain can secure her requirements from other countries at lower cost, and we should be thankful that Britain has consented to renew the bacon agreement and to take a larger amount of bacon although at a somewhat lower price. It may be that this agreement was entered into as partial repayment of some of the sacrifices Canada has made. I was glad to hear the Minister of Agriculture (Mr.

Gardiner) say—I remind him that we will expect him to live up to this—that better methods of handling and improved marketing will ensure the producers almost the same price for bacon as they secured last year.

I hope I am not taking up too much time in referring to my own riding of Athabaska, but it has been badly neglected in years past. First, I should like to refer to the tremendous undeveloped water power in that riding. There is the Peace river which flows in from the Rocky mountains, there is the Athabaska, there is the Clearwater. The potential water power of those rivers has never been fully estimated by engineers. At present those waterpower sites are too far away. There is a great need for the development of the natural resources of western Canada. The financiers of eastern Canada will not invest their money in the west unless we meet our just obligations. The investment of capital has stopped and our resources are lying dormant.

I should like to give hon. members some idea of the amount of tar sands which are to be found in the vicinity of Fort McMurray. There are billions of tons of these sands, and one of the finest sights one could see is to travel down this river in a boat on a sunny day and see the tar sands on the banks throw back the reflection of the sunshine. Some of these banks are 300 feet high and they extend for miles. Millions and millions of barrels of gasoline, lubricating oils and other by-products could be produced from these sands, and they would provide sufficient paving material to pave the streets of every city in Canada.

The main problem is that of transportation. Within three miles of Fort McMurray there is a modern salt factory, and in spite of the higher freight rates which have to be paid, this industry has been able to compete for the markets of Alberta and part of Saskatchewan. It turns out one of the best table products which can be found in that part of the country, but relief is needed in the form of reduced freight rates between Edmonton and Fort McMurray. On a shorter haul by ten miles we pay a forty per cent higher rate. This goes a long way towards retarding the development of our tar sands and other natural resources. I might say, Mr. Speaker, that a small refinery is already in operation testing the tar sands, and their development has been proved feasible. If the transportation problem were settled, we would be producing vast new wealth in northern Alberta.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. DECHENE: I regret very much that I was unable to conclude before six o'clock and must therefore inflict myself upon this august audience for a few minutes more. I will, however, try to be as brief as possible.

I wish to make one more reference to the extremely important subject of wheat. I agree with the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) that, in order to enable our farmers to carry on with a smaller acreage, after the campaign which I attempted to describe briefly before the recess, a higher payment for a limited acreage might prove a solution. I have every confidence in the officials of the departments concerned, both agriculture and trade and commerce, and I refuse to get excited by anything that our friends across the way may say. They appear to know more about this subject than those who have been at it for years.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member will know a little more after a while.

Mr. DECHENE: The hon. gentleman will never learn, it seems. Take, for example, the system of financing which he advocates—and I did not wish to speak about this. Apparently he does not know that any system of financing, no matter whether it be private or public, ultimately rests absolutely upon the integrity of the individual or of those bodies comprising the government.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What makes the hon. member think that?

Mr. DECHENE: Any party which repudiates, in its first act of political power, its sacred obligations without attempting to make any kind of arrangement to meet them, is unable to understand this question and should not be entrusted with the settlement of any financial question.

This afternoon we heard the Prime Minister in another of his comprehensive statements on the war situation. May I be allowed to say a few words with reference to our views—I say "our" as representing the people who sent me here. It was with the deepest of emotions that, a few days ago, we heard Mr. Winston Churchill, Prime Minister of Great Britain, speaking to the people of France; and a few days later, in quite as eloquent an address from this side of the Atlantic, another able man addressed the French people. He is a representative of those who for over three centuries—since 1632—have played their part in the development of this country. It was at that time that my ancestors came to Canada, and I think I have some right to say that it was with feelings of pride that I heard this able voice from our side of the Atlantic. Many of us believe that it had a great influence on the decision of the Vichy government.

Some of our sons have already made the supreme sacrifice; already many of them lie at the bottom of the ocean. They have shown what this young and virile nation can accomplish on the sea; for now we have a navy. The other day, walking down the street here, I stopped to see a company of soldiers pass by. What splendid men they were! They came from the farms, from the factories, from industry, from every part of the country, free men who had voluntarily enlisted because they wanted to defend something they held dearer than life. I was never so proud of being a Canadian. I realized then that we were out to do our share, that while the British lion was roaring its defiance on the cliffs of Dover, the cub, almost fully grown, was standing by his side.

We may disagree with regard to the work of this government, although I have not heard one real criticism of the way in which it has conducted the war, but when I return home after the house adjourns for the long recess, I shall be prouder than ever of the support I have given to the King government. I am returning home, too, with the thought that now Alberta has an important representation in the Liberal party. After the last election the strength of the Liberal party in that province was greater than that of any other. After all, Liberalism stands for unity and understanding and now there will be no more of fighting between east and west. I must admit, however, that the fault was our own.

I have known the province of Alberta for a long time; I knew it as a boy. What a lovely country, what a marvellous country to a young fellow! The opportunities seemed to appeal to youth, from its plains and forests, its rivers and mountains. Everything in that vast and rich country appealed to a young man. On one occasion an orator expressed this fancy, that when the beneficent Creator had made the universe, after throwing into space stars and planets and suns, and when He decided on the seventh day to rest, casting a look over His work, with which He declared Himself satisfied, He must at that moment have noticed particularly Alberta with its fecundity of soil, its mountains, its vast lakes, its coal mines, that almost limitless province which now appeals to the whole nation for a better understanding. We know that we cannot carry on as Albertans; we do not want to, we want to carry on as Canadians.

A few weeks before the grand old chieftain of the Liberal party, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, passed to his reward, a group of ten or twelve young men from Alberta visited him. They were students from the university of Alberta and some of our higher schools of education in the west, young men of different languages and different descent representing the typical soul of that province. They came to Ottawa, and before going home they called on that grand old leader of Liberalism just a few days before his death. One of these young men recounted to me his interview with that great man who said to him that day, "I stand speaking to you with a foot already in the tomb." My belief—and I do not fear to express it here; it may sound foolish to some but it does not to me because I believe in something beyond the material things of life—is that when a man has served his people as Sir Wilfrid Laurier and other leaders have served them—I suppose Sir John A. Macdonald had that vision—and has devoted his life, his talents, his soul and the best that is in him to the service of his fellow men, he comes nearer to God. That is democracy, as opposed to any kind of autocracy, whether of a man or of a group.

Such men seem to get a vision of things to come. This young man told me—and he repeated it to me recently—that Laurier foretold exactly what is happening now. He said, "Young men, I am so pleased to see you, to see that you have the training given by our best schools and universities, typically, truly Canadian; that you have been taught the principle that the life that is worth while is founded on sacrifice more than anything else since the great sacrifice." He said, "Before you are of mature age, long before you are as old as I am, you will have lived through such terrible happenings as no one could ever describe. The struggle will be stupendous and terrific." That was more than twenty years ago. He said, "Arm yourselves with this thought, to prepare yourselves for this struggle which will be one for the salvation of humankind."

As we have been told so often, it is a struggle for liberty and freedom. More than that, as the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) said at Toronto, I think, during the adjournment of parliament, it is a struggle for the very soul of things that belong to the inner life of man. The great chief said to these boys, "You are going to see these things; I am too old. I have tried to lead my people, like Moses, at least as far as Mount Nebo where I may see the promised land." Let me express the hope that more than this will be granted to our present leader. Sir Wilfrid said, "Young men, things may look very bad, but do not get discouraged; carry on. Take my word, as a man near the last step; justice and right shall triumph in the end."

Yes, Mr. Speaker, these prophetic words are true to-day; justice and right shall triumph in the end. May I express one wish before I take my seat; I wish that the present leader of the Liberal party, who also has given his life, not to his party but to his country, may not only see the promised land—and not from afar, not in a vision from a mountain top—but after a victory for freedom and democracy may lead his people into the promised land and to better days.

Mr. T. J. O'NEILL (Kamloops): The mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne have received well merited praise; may I, however, add my congratulations upon their able speeches?

This debate has been carried on now for about three weeks, and we have listened to some excellent speeches from all sections of the house representing all shades of political opinion, to most of which addresses I listened with interest if not at all times with approval. I feel safe in saying that last fall when we received the news that parliament was to be reconvened on November 5 for the express purpose of formal prorogation and that the next session would be held some time in January, the majority of hon. members in western Canada received that news with approval. Later we were told that this programme had to be abandoned; that we would be convened on November 5 and should come prepared to stay; that the opposition were to ask certain questions and for information for which the vast majority of the public were supposed to be clamouring and that at the same time the government would take the opportunity to give an account of their stewardship.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the vast majority of the people of Canada at the time of the election were quite satisfied with the Mackenzie King administration, and I am of opinion that they have not changed their mind since then; they are still clearly of opinion that the Mackenzie King government could not be improved on very much at the present time, at least from those now seated in this house.

We have heard from some quarters quite a clamour for a national government and a good deal about leadership and about this being a Liberal war. Such statements and accusations emanating from this house do not help to unite the people of this country. As far as national government is concerned I cannot agree that this is not a national government. With respect to leadership, Canada is very fortunate at the present time, and so is the Liberal party, in having such a leader as the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). There is no parallel to such leadership as his in the British commonwealth of nations to-day. No man has held the leadership of his party longer than our Prime Minister has in Canada. And I can assure hon. members that at times it is a difficult job to hold the leadership of that party.

The other night the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) made an excellent address to which I listened with keen attention. But he made one remark with which I cannot agree. He said that this house should sit almost constantly while the country is at war. I do not agree with that view so long as the government follow the present policy of depending for advice upon a number of high salaried executives recruited from the ranks of industry. In many instances these industrial leaders are not sympathetic to Liberal policies, and some of them are unfriendly and unsympathetic toward the labour class. England has found it a great advantage to take labour men into the cabinet, even though they held different political views, because they understood the viewpoint of the labouring classes, and it helped to give confidence to the labour people if they thought they were well represented in the government. I think it is high time the government of Canada gave more consideration to the views of labour and the farmers.

At this point I should like to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) upon the restrictions he is imposing on luxuries and non-essentials of war. Much has been said about equality of service and of sacrifice. The restrictions introduced to-day probably will bring about some of that equality of sacrifice, but I believe we are using the wrong yardstick when we measure that equality. I maintain that equality of sacrifice must not and cannot be measured by the amount of money you take away from a man by means of taxation. It should be measured by how much you have left him when you are through taxing him. That is the yardstick you must use if you are going to have equality.

This brings me to suggest once more to the government the advisability of relieving low paid workers from payment of the national defence tax. I refer particularly to those people who are receiving less than $750 and $1,500 annually, for single and married people respectively. An increasing number of people are asking, who are the financial advisers of the government? Many people consider that salaries far too high are being paid for the belt-tightening advice these financial experts give, especially to people who have had to tighten their belts to the last notch during the past ten years. I have in mind now the farmers and the unemployed. Many reasons have been advanced for the lack of interest and enthusiasm in the last war loan, but it seems to me that very few of those who have dealt with that question have even touched on the real reason why the last loan was not received as enthusiastically as it should have been. At this time I think the government might well pay heed to the repeated warnings that an overhauling of our monetary system is long overdue.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Hear, hear.

Mr. O'NEILL: My hon. friend in the far corner says, "hear, hear." Well, I am not in agreement with everything that is advocated by my hon. friend, but I know there are many people—and the number is increasing daily—who ask why we should continue to pay tribute to private individuals and companies for the use of something that already belongs to us; I refer to the credit of the country. Unfortunately, when this subject is broached, we are usually ridiculed by shouts of "funny money," or the authorities take refuge behind the bogy of inflation. A few days ago a very good editorial on this subject appeared in the Ottawa Citizen. I hear someone behind me make a remark not quite complimentary to the Citizen, but that newspaper does contain some admirable editorials, although I do not always agree with them. In speaking of "funny money," however, the editorial asked what could be funnier in the way of money than digging gold out of the mines of northern Ontario and then taking that gold and burying it in the hills of Kentucky or Virginia for safe keeping. That seems quite ridiculous, and in my opinion some of the things that are done to-day in the name of high finance are just as silly.

Inflation is a word that is heard a great deal these days, and with regard to which there is a great deal of misunderstanding. I care not how well educated or well informed a man may be, before he can carry on an intelligent discussion of the subject of inflation he must first agree on the definition of that word. In my opinion inflation exists when there are in circulation more currency and credit than are necessary to consume the products and services of any country in any given time. We were told also that inflation could not be controlled. To-day any man who is a traitor to his country is put to death. In my judgment any man who would do anything to sabotage the finances of this country when we are at war should be put to death in the same way as the man who would give away our military secrets.

I now come to the question of government employees receiving less than a fair wage, with which subject the hon. member for Fraser Valley dealt aptly the other night. In my opinion those receiving less than $60 a month are not receiving a fair wage. The government should consider increasing their wages, and should see to it that industry follows its example. Then there would be no unfair wages paid in this country. A few days ago I saw in the press a paragraph reporting that the civil service commission said it would not be good business to increase these low salaries because then they would be out of line with wages paid by private enterprise. I do not know that anyone has ever suggested that wages paid under the civil service commission in the high brackets are in keeping with wages paid by private enterprise. Certainly I am not of that opinion.

My constituency has not benefited in any way since the war broke out. The people in my constituency do not wish to benefit, but they are definitely of opinion that they are not being permitted to contribute to the war effort the share of which they are capable, so long as so many who are willing and anxious to work are still unemployed. In one of the best newspapers in Canada, the Kamloops Sentinel, I noticed this paragraph:

> Increase in transients is noted by city police. A considerable increase in the number of transients travelling from the prairies to the coast is noted in the October report of police activities filed in the city council last week by Corporal E. A. Jarvis. . . .

People in the west do not consider they are being permitted to contribute the share of which they are capable, so long as those people are unemployed. I do not consider that there is any case for unemployment at all, so long as there are people in the east working overtime, as they are doing at present. That time ought to be more evenly distributed than it is.

There is one other matter about which the people of Kamloops would like some explanation, in addition to that forthcoming from the Department of National Defence. According to the records, Kamloops has more hours of sunshine and less precipitation than any other place in Canada. It is on the main lines of both transcontinental railways. It has an airport capable of handling everything, except the very largest bombers. The soil condition at Kamloops is such that in no more than two hours after a very heavy rain the ground would be dry enough for troop marching and manœuvring.

All these points have been explained to the Department of National Defence, but the reasons given for moving the troops from Kamloops to New Westminster are not sufficient. With all due apologies to the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), let me point out that ever since moving to that city the troops have been more or less ill. They have not been able to train and drill as they should. We are told by the department that the idea in these days is to get the men in the very best physical and military condition in the shortest possible time. If that is so, then I say that the proper place to keep those men is the place where they can drill the greatest number of hours in the outdoors. That place is Kamloops, British Columbia. I say that we are entitled to some further explanation. The explanation I did receive—and I say it is not good enough—was this: "Selection was made on the considered recommendation of responsible officers who gave due regard to the factors which are considered important in the national training scheme."

In my view the department should consider the arguments we put forward as to why training should be kept at Kamloops. Incidentally may I mention that the first battalion of the Rocky Mountain Rangers—by the way, the oldest battalion in Canada—trained at Kamloops for four months and never had to interrupt their schedule for a single day on account of adverse weather conditions. But since they have moved to New Westminster there have been nothing but interruptions. Of course, they moved to New Westminster at the wrong season of the year. Had they been there in June, July, August or September they would have had fine weather. But from September on, it rains eternally at the coast, just as it snows eternally in Ottawa.

Mr. REID: Not this year.

Mr. O'NEILL: Ottawa would be a better place in which to train, because training could be carried on once the snow was removed. But nothing can be done in the rain, except keep the men in the huts—and that is what they have had to do.

In corroboration of that, may I refer to an article from another famous newspaper in my constituency, namely, the Salmon Arm Observer:

> Pte. George Boutwell of the R.M.R's was home on sick leave over the week-end. A great many of the boys are suffering from 'flu down at the camp in New Westminster.

I now come to the question of Christmas leave for soldiers. This is a matter which I have taken up before. I have letters on my file going back as far as last April, and addressed to the late Hon. Norman Rogers, then Minister of National Defence, calling his attention to the fact that many men on leave were riding freight trains, and asking that something be done. At that time I suggested that these soldiers should be given tickets which would not be transferable and would be good only for men in uniform.

I bring this matter up to-night because I have before me a petition signed by 1,700 citizens of Kamloops, asking that this should be done. Most of the men in camp at New Westminster have come from the interior of British Columbia. Some people will argue that having reduced the fare by half we have already done enough for the soldiers. Well, they cannot come home on a half fare any more than they could if the fare were doubled. They receive $1.30 a day or $39 a month. Most of them send $20 or $25 a month home. The result is that after they buy their tobacco, shaving soap and other necessities they have very little left. They have no money to pay railway fares, no matter how small those fares may be.

When we speak about fares for soldiers we have always been confronted with the excuse that the cost would be too great. Well, for ten years prior to the outbreak of this war, whenever any suggestion was made for social reform we were always met with the same question: Where is the money to come from? Everybody knows that each year we have a heavy railway deficit. May I remind the house that when I make these observations I am not in any way casting any reflection on the railways. Nothing can be said against either the men or the management of either of our Canadian railways. But a good deal can be said about the dead horses for which the Canadian railways are still trying to pay. As a result, each year we are faced with a heavy railway deficit. I maintain that the payment of fares for soldiers involves only the transferring of an entry from one account to another. It would not entail the outlay of any money. Instead of its being paid by way of fares for soldiers, it would be paid by way of railway deficits.

I maintain, therefore, that the government should give consideration to the question of giving free transportation to soldiers. I quite appreciate that it must give consideration to what military officials may say respecting the number of men who would be permitted to go home. I appreciate, too, that it could not be expected that men now located at Valcartier could in all fairness be permitted to come home. They would have only six days leave, and they would require seven days to make the trip. Therefore there is no use in talking about men going from Valcartier to British Columbia.

But there is no reason in the world for urging that it would cost too much money to send a man from New Westminster to Kamloops, from Calgary to Kamloops, from Kamloops to Calgary, from Winnipeg to Regina, or distances such as those. By no stretch of the imagination can the soldiers be expected to pay those transportation costs, when they make only such a small amount of money.

For many months past hon. members have advocated an increase in payments to those receiving old age pensions. Living costs have increased. I realize that they have not increased to any great extent, and I agree that the government is to be highly complimented upon the fact that it has kept down the cost of living. When we consider the increased cost of living at the time of the last war, we realize what has been done by the government in the present instance. It is to be highly complimented upon the fact that there has been an increase of only 4·6 per cent in the cost of living. But to people receiving $20 a month old age pension, such an increase means that they will have to deprive themselves of some of the necessities of life. Any democratic country, whether at war or not, should be ashamed to have such a condition existing. It might be expected to be found among the people from whom we took this country, but we should not permit it.

I come now to the question of dependents' allowances, and I should like to congratulate the chairman and the members of this board upon the wonderful cooperation they have given to me. I expect that all other hon. members have received the same service in connection with dependents' allowances. I appreciate that when a country changes from peace time to war time and increases its military strength to the extent which we have, it would be an almost insurmountable job for any man or body of men to conduct the necessary investigations in order to have these matters adjusted in the manner we would like. But there are some things which should receive attention.

I have the particulars of one case upon my desk at the present time. The allowance of a widow whose son had enlisted was cut from $20 to $10 because she had an unmarried daughter who was earning $70 a month. I do not see why the government should attempt to shift its responsibility to the shoulders of an unmarried daughter. Because her work was so far from home it was necessary for this girl to room and board, and she paid $30 for this accommodation. Then she had uniforms to buy, laundry to pay for, carfare and other incidentals to take care of, as well as the dribs and drabs by way of taxation, such as the defence tax and the provincial tax of British Columbia. The result is that this girl has nothing to give to her mother, and very little left for herself. Such reductions should not be made.

In conclusion, I should like to make a few comments with regard to the 30-day training period. To my mind this period is not long enough, although it is better than no training at all. I was glad to note that the Department of National Defence is contemplating increasing the training period to four months. We should look into the future as well as consider the present. There are a number of young men of sixteen and seventeen years of age who are coming out of our schools every year and who, for various reasons, are not intending to continue their education beyond the high school. These young men should have a year in camp, during which time they would receive three months' military training, while the other nine months would be given to vocational training of their own selection. Eventually this war will be over, although that day may be some time away. But we will win because of the determination of our people. When that day comes, there will be a tremendous amount of construction work and trained men are going to be required. Many of these men object to going into military camps, but if they knew they were going to receive vocational training I am sure they would go in willingly, realizing that they would learn something that would be of value to them after the war was over. I think the government should give consideration to some such plan to train our young men.

For the ten years before the war these young men were permitted to drift round the country. Not long ago when it was necessary to build a military camp in British Columbia it was found that carpenters, or even men who could handle a hammer and saw, could not be procured. Yet there were plenty of idle men around. I think these things can be corrected, and they should be corrected. Plans should be made now looking to the future. A country like Canada, richly endowed as it is, should be the last place in the world where a man who wants to work should be out of a job.

Mr. S. J. FURNISS (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, at this time in the long debate it is not my intention to indulge in any preliminaries, other than to join heartily in the felicitations which have been so generously extended by the hon. members who have spoken to the mover (Mr. Claxton) and the seconder (Mr. Jutras) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, as well as to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and the other ministers of the crown who have spoken in this debate.

May I also say that I am in agreement with the suggestion which has been made so often in this house that free transportation should be provided for our soldiers at Christmas time. I do not think there is any way in which we could better show our appreciation of their services or which would bring more joy to our soldiers and their relatives than by providing them with free transportation to their homes during the Christmas holidays. In connection with transportation there may be difficulties of which we know nothing, but I should like to see the government give every consideration to this suggestion.

Parliament has been called at this time so that the government may lay before members of the house and indirectly the country the record of its war activities since adjournment last August. This has been clearly done by the ministers who are most concerned with war work. It would be expecting the superhuman of any government to have it transform a nation from peacetime work to war-time effort of the present magnitude in so short a time without some possible errors being made. I have no doubt that if the government had to do this work over again, with the knowledge they have gained from experience they would do some things differently. But during all the debate there has not been a single charge of wrongdoing laid against the government. That is a record of which any government might well be proud. It is something which will give the country continued confidence in this government.

Perhaps no other branch of the war service department has done more efficient work than the price control board. According to the last report I saw covering one year of the war, the price of living had gone up only 4·6 per cent, an increase that might well take place in an ordinary year when there was no war incentive to high prices. The work of the price control board has been conspicuous by the absence of the high prices and profiteering which characterized the last war.

I wonder how many members of the house recollect what happened to the price of sugar in the last war. I am reminded of something that the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Cardiff) said about sugar in his address to the house a few days ago. At page 474 of Hansard he is reported to have said:

> I should like to direct a few questions on this point to the government. I do not know the answers, but I should like to know. Did the sugar interests subscribe to their funds?

If exorbitant profits are an indication of where campaign funds come from, then certainly we know exactly where the Conservative party got their campaign funds in the last war. Let me go back to that time. Sugar is a commodity easily controlled between the manufacturer and the wholesaler. When the last war broke out, the price of sugar began to go up and up, and finally the government pegged the price at $12, or a little over, per hundredweight. Then the government undertook to enforce restrictions on the use of sugar. It was doled out in teaspoonfuls, wrapped up in little packages in our hotels and restaurants, and no housewife could get more than twenty-five cents worth at a time even if she had to drive five miles to the nearest grocery store to get it. Sugar was made to appear very scarce. It was delievered to the retailers in half-dozen bag lots.

When the price control was taken off, sugar sky-rocketed to $24 and in some places to $28 per hundred retail. I know of one merchant who bought a carload of sugar at the beginning of the war. As the price increased, he bought small quantities to get a mark-up from his invoice and when he had sold his carload he had netted a profit of $4,000 on one car. Yet, all the time this was going on, sugar was being piled up to the roof in every available warehouse in the city of Toronto, waiting for the price to go higher, and in the meantime the consumer was forced to pay the higher prices and to suffer from lack of sugar.

Thanks to the foresight of this government in appointing the price control board shortly after the beginning of the war, that cannot happen and will not happen while this government is in office.

The other day I listened with a good deal of interest to the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). These are some of the statements he made. I shall quote only a sentence or two. At page 226 of Hansard he is reported to have said:

Then there is a suspicion—

He does not say there is any evidence.

—that contracts are being awarded in some instances to mushroom companies which have sprung up in recent months, and whose main capital is political fitness.

On the same page he said:

I remember some conditions of 1914-18, but I remember that when there was wrongdoing those who did wrong were punished, under the orders of the then Prime Minister, Sir Robert Borden.

I have some recollections of the war of 1914-18 and I should like to refresh the hon. gentleman's memory. I wonder whether he has any recollection of the fuse contract which the Minister of Militia of that time—not a spurious company, but the Minister of Militia —got from the government. The matter was investigated and it was disclosed that the minister had not a particle of equipment with which to make fuses. He took the contract down to the United States and got the fuses made there, and to obscure his profits from the Canadian people he banked his money in a United States bank. I have no recollection of that gentleman being punished. On the contrary, I think he was knighted for his services during the war.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Has the hon. gentleman particulars of what he is talking about? He is making quite a charge in the House of Commons.

Mr. FURNISS: I have recollections, just the same as the hon. gentleman has.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I do not think the house should be satisfied with recollections when the hon. member is making a charge against a former minister in the House of Commons.

Mr. FURNISS: I am giving the house my recollection. I wonder whether the hon. member recollects what happened to pork in the last war. Water was pumped into it to such an extent that the British government refused to accept the pork, and it stood rotting on the docks at Liverpool because they would not accept it. It gave the bacon trade of Canada such a black-eye that it took years for it to recover its former standing.

I wonder whether the hon. gentleman remembers what happened to about twenty tons of chicken in the capital city of his own province, whether the chicken was held in a refrigerator for higher prices until it spoiled and had to be carted to the incinerator for destruction. I do not recollect any punishment being meted out to the wrongdoer in that instance. On the contrary, I know of one gentleman who was knighted for his services during that war.

Mr. QUELCH: He is a Liberal, is he not?

Mr. FURNISS: I do not like talking about these matters, but when hon. gentlemen opposite make such statements I cannot let them pass unchallenged.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has made serious charges and I think he should give particulars to the house so that we can go into the matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not understand that he was making any charges against a member of the house but rather he was going back into ancient history.

Mr. FURNISS: I am not called upon to answer the hon. gentleman's question.

One of the difficulties with which this government has had to deal is foreign exchange. Owing to our heavy purchases of war materials in the United States and our domestic purchases, notwithstanding the restrictions that have been placed on the latter, the value of our dollar has depreciated considerably in the United States market. Everything must be done to prevent a further decline, and, if possible, to bolster up our dollar.

I was not in the house this afternoon when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) was speaking, and I do not know what he said. But if further restrictions are to be imposed against imports I have just this to say. I believe that the people of Canada are willing to go any length in self-denial, provided that there is equality in that self-denial and that proper safeguards are thrown out so that any interests which might be protected are not in a position to exploit the common people. More and more, as this war goes on, we see that this continent must become a vast arsenal for the British empire.

The other way in which we might improve our foreign exchange situation is by the acquisition of United States dollars through our tourist trade, and I wish to speak for a few minutes about that. Representing as I do perhaps the most popular tourist district in Ontario—and I do not think the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) or the hon. member for Victoria, Ontario (Mr. McNevin), whose ridings adjoin mine on the north and east, will think I am extravagant in making that claim—I feel I can speak with some knowledge of the tourist business.

Possibly I should ask the indulgence of the house while I say something about Muskoka.

Muskoka is a district comprising some twenty-two townships lying about one hundred miles north of Toronto and skirting Georgian bay on the eastern shore. It is a land that was at one time covered with as fine a growth of pine timber as could be found anywhere in Canada. That forest has long since disappeared under the lumberman's axe, but a second growth of greater variety and far greater beauty has come up to take its place. From the time the foliage comes out in the spring, all through the summer, and particularly in the early autumn when the frosts have changed it overnight into a blaze of glory, with all the tints ranging from crimson to golden, it is a land of almost indescribable beauty.

Muskoka has three different lake systems on which steamers of excursion size ply back and forth carrying passengers and delivering freight and mail to different resorts along the shores. On one of these lake systems there is the most popular daily cruise anywhere in Ontario. Twelve hours' sail on smooth waters in and out among the islands, into the bays and round the headlands of three lakes, is a day's pleasure that will long remain in the memory of any tourist.

On one occasion when it was my privilege to be on one of these trips I was in conversation with several Americans and I became curious to know how many there were and where they came from. As soon as the boat landed I hurried to the parking ground and counted thirteen cars bearing United States markers, representing seven different states of the American union, two of them from such long distances as Nebraska and Florida. I mention this to show the distances from which tourists come. Speaking of this, I was at one summer resort when there was a convention of the Woman's Missionary Society and there were representatives from forty different countries including Japan and China.

We can get from our bureau of statistics or from the travel bureau some indication of the value of the tourist business to Canada, but to get a more exact idea I asked a banker who transacts most of the business for a number of United States tourists what they were spending, and he told me that one small group from Pittsburgh, comprising twenty families, spent $100,000 annually in Muskoka, or an average of $5,000 per family. Moreover, there were six groups that spent in the lower thousands and others who spent in the hundreds.

The tourist business does not benefit only those who cater to the trade; there is scarcely a person in Canada who does not benefit in some way or another. A year or so ago I listened to an address by the deputy minister of game and fisheries of Ontario and he told us that the tourists who came to Canada every year consumed the beef from 60,000 head of cattle. That is about one-third of the quota we are allowed to send to the United States under the reduced tariff in our trade agreement with that country. Besides that, they consumed in like proportions bacon, butter, milk, eggs and all other farm produce, all of which is bound to benefit the farmer to a great extent.

My object in saying this is to call attention to the decline that has taken place in the tourist business in the past year. I have some figures from the travel bureau showing the number of people who entered Canada from the United States in the months from January to September, 1940 and 1939, and in every month there is a decrease except in February and March. In these months there was an increase of 69,000 in February and 82,000 in March over the same months of last year, this being due probably to the better advertising of winter sports in northern Ontario and Quebec. All other months show a decline, the heaviest being in July, when there were 1,252,173 fewer tourists from the United States than in July, 1939. That was largely due to misunderstanding about the regulations for getting in and out of Canada, but there was a decline of 17·4 per cent throughout the nine months. Some of that was on account of enemy propaganda in the United States.

What I should like to impress upon the government is that every possible means should be used to combat that propaganda. I understand that the travel bureau have in mind an intensified programme of advertising for this summer. They should begin early and continue it throughout the season. While I am speaking of that, I might mention that I had a letter just yesterday from the proprietor of one of the largest hotels in Muskoka, and he was quite sceptical about restrictions that might be placed on oranges and grapefruit and possibly lemons coming from the United States during the tourist season. He said that United States tourists were in the habit of getting these things for breakfast; that a breakfast without them was not a breakfast at all to them, and that if the first meal in the day was spoiled, the whole day was spoiled. I would urge upon the government then to do everything possible to attract tourists to the Dominion of Canada as a means of increasing our supply of United States dollars.

I am now going to refer for a few minutes to the situation of agriculture relative to the other industries of our country. I am going to quote again a few words from the speech of the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Cardiff). He said, as reported on page 474 of Hansard:

> We never did get a fair deal from any government, least of all from this one. . . .

I believe I am quite safe in saying that this government has done more for agriculture than any other government that has existed since confederation. The deal that any industry gets from a government is the way that industry is affected by the policies of the government. And in my opinion the best judges of any policy are the people.

Let us look for a moment at what has happened in the last ten years in Canada. We had an election in 1930; the Right Hon. Mr. Bennett led the Conservative party in that election, and he promised that he would make the tariffs fight for the farmer just as they fought for the industrialists. The people took him at his word and elected him to office with a substantial majority. He immediately put his high tariff policy into effect, and for the next five years the farmers of Canada suffered from the most restricted markets and lowest prices they had ever had since confederation.

In 1935 we had another election. The present Prime Minister appealed to the country on his agricultural and other policies. The result of the election was that he was returned to office with the largest following that any prime minister in Canada ever had. He concluded trade agreements with the United States and with other nations. After five years he appealed to the country again, and on March 26 last, notwithstanding the roads being in a worse condition than at any election ever held in Canada he was returned to office, again with the largest following a Canadian prime minister ever had. That, I believe, is proof that the policies of the Liberal party are popular policies and that the farmers are not getting from this government the worst deal they ever had.

I do not know whether the hon. member for Huron North is a farmer, but he should know that the agricultural problem is an economic one, or perhaps I might say a problem of organization. The farmer is an unorganized individual living in an organized world. And the higher the degree to which industry and finance—and I include labour—are organized, the more impoverished the farmer becomes. He is like a shorn lamb, and that is why he must have government assistance if possible.

I would not add the weight of another straw to the burden under which the government are labouring. They are working under tremendous strain. But I believe that the function of a member of parliament is to represent his people, and if I fail to let the government know what the people at home are thinking I fail in my duty to my constituents and to the government as well.

I come now to a couple of complaints that come to me from my riding. One relates to the high wages paid on ordinary construction work, and the other to the price of bacon in the new contract. These complaints come to me in the form of letters and resolutions, and from the man on the street. The last time I was home, a couple of weeks ago, I met a man and the first words he said to me were: "You are a member of parliament; can you tell me why the government pays such high wages for ordinary construction work?" I said, "Would you complain if you were a workman?" And I reminded him at the same time that labour had had several lean years. "Well," he said, "I am a taxpayer, and I look at it from the taxpayer's viewpoint."

Some time before that I was at a ploughing match and I came across a group of farmers who were in earnest conversation. I knew some of them and joined the group, and the same question was put to me. They said that men were quitting work on the farm, going where they could earn these high wages, and it was creating a serious labour problem. One man said that they expected to be asked even $70 a month for next summer. Put it at $50 a month, which was the highest wage paid during the last war, when farm produce was double the price it is to-day, and add to that $20 for board, for which the farmer should have credit, and you have still $70 a month. Multiply that by seven or eight for the months of hire, and you have about $500. Divide that by what the farmer will get at the prices at which bacon or hogs are going to sell under the new contract, and you will find that it will take between thirty and thirty-three hogs to pay a man's wages for the summer. If you follow that through, you will find that at the average consumption of grain per one hundred pounds of live hog, it will take six to seven hundred bushels of grain to feed those hogs. I have no objection to good wages being paid if the farmer is in a position to pay them. But there will be few men hired next summer on the farm if wages are at that rate.

I have no fault to find with the price of bacon that the Minister of Agriculture got from the British government. I believe he made the best bargain possible. We must remember that Great Britain is sore pressed. All that stands between us and Hitler is the British navy. Britain's soldiers and sailors are in the far east, on the Mediterranean, on the Atlantic, and perhaps at many other places that we know nothing about. Britain's financial resources are not inexhaustible. The time may come before this war is over, when we may have to make common cause with Great Britain and help to feed her soldiers and sailors as we are feeding our own. If that time comes, I know that Canada can and will respond. But if industry and finance can enjoy profits and people can enjoy large salaries, then something should be done to see that the farmer gets his just share of the national income. Next summer the farmer and his wife and family will be working harder and for longer hours than any other class of people in Canada. Again I say that he should get a just return for his labour.

There are two ways by which that might be done. The first would be for the government to exercise more of the powers that have been conferred upon it by the National Resources Mobilization Act. That would be a drastic step and I know it would end in the dislocation of industry and the slowing up of our war work. But I cannot conceive of victory coming out of a struggle such as this if the only incentive to battle is monetary gain, whether it be through profits, high salaries or high wages. That should not be the yardstick with which to measure our war effort. Only when every able-bodied man in Canada is either in the army, the navy or the air force, or at work in the factory or the field producing the essentials of war, will it be possible to say that our war effort is at its maximum. It may be that before this war is over, we shall be fortunate if we are well fed, well clothed and comfortably housed, and beyond that looking for nothing but victory. The other step that I might suggest would be further taxation on profits and incomes to reduce the inequality, and the money gained thereby might be used to reimburse agriculture in some measure.

In the meantime the message I would give the farmer, if by any chance it should reach his ears, is that he should carry on. Remember, we are receiving twice as much as we received for our products during the lean years from 1930 to 1935. Even if nothing can be done I would still say, carry on until victory is achieved, and when that time comes we can set about the construction of a more just and equitable order.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to read just a few lines from the Magazine Digest for November, 1940. This afternoon I heard the Prime Minister state that the Germans did not understand our mentality. I quite agree that this is the situation with most Germans, but these are the words of one German who does understand it:

> The British nation will be considered the most valuable ally in the world as long as it can be counted upon to show that brutality and tenacity in its government, as well as in the spirit of the broad masses, which enables it to carry through to victory any struggle that it once enters upon, no matter how long such a struggle may last or however great the sacrifice that may be necessary or whatever the means that have to be employed; and all this even though the actual military equipment at hand may be utterly inadequate when compared with that of other nations.

There is just one word in that paragraph that I do not like; that is the word "brutality", but when I tell you, sir, the name of the author of that statement, you will not be surprised at that word being included. At the end of this short article it states that these words were written by Adolf Hitler, and appeared in the original edition of "Mein Kampf". Leaving out the word "brutality", I do not think it would be possible to give a better description of the spirit of the British people; and I do not think we in Canada could do better than to foster and emulate that spirit. It is the spirit that won over the Spanish armada, that won through at Camperdown, at Trafalgar, at the Nile and at the battle of Waterloo; it is the spirit that will win out in this struggle. England has been born again in a welter of sweat and blood. England will live on. There will always be an England.

Mr. MAURICE BOURGET (Lévis) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, rising as I do for the first time in this house, I may be permitted, at the outset, to fulfil a most pleasant duty, in tendering my heartfelt thanks to the men and women of my constituency who have done me the honour of electing me as their representative in the nation's parliament. To the best of my modest ability, I hope to become worthy of their confidence by performing my duties with the utmost sincerity and energy.

I also wish to tender my sincere congratulations to the mover (Mr. Claxton) and seconder (Mr. Jutras) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne for having performed so splendidly on that occasion.

I fully realize, Mr. Speaker, the heavy responsibilities that are mine in these troublous times. In my constituency, at the last election, the electors—and especially the older ones—have recognized the necessity of electing a young representative because, to their mind, it will devolve upon the younger generation to rebuild what is now being laid in ruins and, especially, to find a way of solving the serious problems that will arise after the war.

As a representative of that younger generation in this house, I wish to make a few remarks upon a matter of special concern to the younger Canadians, and one which affects directly our war effort. During this session and even during the last one, quite a few members of this house have brought that matter to the attention of the government. I know that many others, and among them my good friend and colleague the hon. member for Quebec West and South (Mr. Parent) never lose an opportunity to draw it to the attention of the proper authorities. The question I refer to, Mr. Speaker, is the technical training of the youth of Canada. We have heard it stated on all sides that this country's war effort would consist in supplying the empire and our allies with their requirements in foodstuffs and munitions.

Only a few days ago the newspapers carried a statement of Mr. Arthur Greenwood, minister without portfolio in the British war cabinet, to the effect that Canada had been transformed into an industrial country. He added that the supplies provided by Canada had been precious in quality and in quantity. He stated further that North America would soon become an arsenal. I believe all hon. members have likewise read the statement of the British minister of shipping that England was now losing more ships than she could replace. This is probably what led the Minister of National Defence for Naval Affairs (Mr. Macdonald) to declare that we should have to prepare ourselves to build destroyers and cruisers in Canada. Then, the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) informed us in his able review of the activities of his department that $255,000,000 would be appropriated for the establishment of new war industries.

The necessity and urgency of these industries necessarily brings up the problem of providing skilled workmen. If a lack of skilled labour is already felt, what will it be when all these new industries have been established? It is all very well to have numerous industrial establishments, but they are entirely useless without the trained labour required to operate them. The training of this labour is a question to be considered by the government.

At the risk of being charged with provincialism, Mr. Speaker, I shall very briefly call the government's attention to the situation at present existing in the province of Quebec. That province now has five or six technical schools and a few other establishments called arts and craft schools. According to the information I have been able to gather, these schools cannot fulfill the growing demand on the part of young men eager to follow their courses. Recalling the statement of the Minister of Munitions and Supply that $255,000,000 were to be spent on the creation of new war industries, I wonder if it would not be good policy, especially in the present extraordinary circumstances, to devote part of this money to the construction and equipment of new technical schools. In addition to providing trained labour for our war effort, the government would thus render a valuable social service in providing the youth of Canada with a technical training which they could use to advantage later on.

I particularly wish to call the attention of the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty), who is the minister responsible for the administration of the youth training plan, to a question which I have specially at heart, as it directly interests the people of my constituency. In Levis county there are two shipyards where corvettes and mine-sweepers are now being built. According to the statement of the Minister of National Defence for Naval Affairs, they will probably be called upon before long and for many years to come to build destroyers and cruisers. You will readily agree, Mr. Speaker, that the men who are working without respite on the construction of these ships, putting in days of twelve, fourteen and even sixteen hours, cannot continue doing that without endangering their health. In this regard, I wish to congratulate labour in general on their splendid energy and patriotism in working night and day to help achieve the victory which we all so ardently hope for. It will therefore be necessary, perhaps sooner than we expect, to replace these workmen or at least provide them with help in the accomplishment of their arduous task.

If I may be permitted to do so, I should like to offer to the responsible minister a suggestion which I consider applicable to shipbuilding as well as to many other war industries. As the minister said on Thursday last, it is absolutely necessary to provide a supply of skilled labour and to do so quickly. In accordance with the youth training plan, an agreement would first have to be made with those industries that have been given war contracts, so that such industries may employ one young workman for every five or six skilled workers. The selection of these young candidates would be made through a board of examiners that might include one representative from the Department of Labour, one from the company or industry concerned, and one skilled workman having some general knowledge of such industry. Mr. Speaker, I fully realize that it would not be advisable to employ all applicants without first ascertaining that they have the requisite intelligence and the necessary fitness for some particular trade. The selection of candidates having been made, the latter might begin to work in the industry concerned in order to gain some practical knowledge, but they should at the same time be required to sign an agreement to attend, two or three evenings a week, a technical school giving theoretical courses directly connected with the occupation assigned to them. After a period to be determined by the authorities, these young apprentices would have to pass an examination so as to prove conclusively that they have the necessary qualifications to hold their positions and be recognized by the examiners as skilled workers in their respective trades. I sincerely believe that if this suggestion were adopted we would have no trouble to find in a very short time all the skilled labour required by our industries. Naturally, these young men should receive during their training a minimum salary which would cover their living expenses, and in certain deserving cases would allow them to contribute to the upkeep of their dependent relatives. I have often met, especially after my election as a member of this house, parents who claim that they cannot afford to pay the expenses incidental to such training, such as transportation, clothing and the like. Payment of such salaries could be shared equally by the federal and provincial governments and by the firm or industry concerned.

I am convinced that there would be objection on the part of the companies. If they objected, the governments could easily overcome the difficulty through a clause in the contracts which would force the companies to contribute their share. I can assure the minister of labour that he would have the willing cooperation of our provincial government, because our newly elected provincial secretary declared recently that the question of technical education in our province would receive the best consideration from the government. I hope that there will be no delay and that thanks to the help of the central government our young people will soon be given the opportunity of enlarging their field of knowledge and of preparing themselves for the struggles of life.

In these few observations, I have given but a very incomplete summary of this most important question which I wanted to bring to the attention of the hon. members of this house. Moreover, if my suggestion were adopted, we would not only further the training of our youth, but we would also make an important contribution to our war effort. I hope that it will receive the best consideration.

I also wish to call the attention of the government to a question that has already been brought up in this house, that of the salaries paid to the clerks and stenographers grade 1 in the civil service. In my opinion the salary paid to those employees is ridiculous, and so is the difference of $30 between the minimums of grade 1 and grade 2. It seems to me that a minimum of $75 would only be fair, and it is hard to understand how they can live on a salary of $60 per month from which taxes are deducted.

(Text) Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a few words with regard to our war effort. Since the opening of this session we have heard it stated many times that the government should have displayed more activity in the prosecution of Canada's war effort. I think every fair-minded citizen will agree with me when I say that our government has put forth a supreme effort to help our allies by supplying them with men and materials. This fact has often been stated and restated by British officials.

Before concluding my remarks, may I say that I consider it a privilege and an honour to extend my sincere appreciation to the English-speaking members in this house who have paid such fine tribute to the French-Canadians. I can assure them that their heartfelt expressions will long be remembered by my fellow citizens. These members have done more for unity than the unjustified statement which can be read on page 409 of Hansard. I quote:

> There is just one other mystery upon which I should like to comment. Who will stand in his place in this house and say that to-day our front line trenches are not on the English channel and along the shores of the Mediterranean? No one even thinks otherwise, but I want to recall a statement that was made in this house not so very long ago, in which we were told that the Canadian parliament would decide to what extent, if any, Canada would participate in this war. I think all hon. members will recall that statement. Then if we turn to page 225 of Hansard for this session we find a question which was asked and answered; hon. members can look it up for themselves. And the minister hastened—yes, hastened—in reply to the question asked, to assure some unseen minority, a handful of men, wherever they may be in Canada, men who were once described as those who wanted to run to the bush in the event of an emergency, that notwithstanding anything connected with the extension of the training period they would not have to serve outside of Canada. I have no thought but to condemn anybody who does not recognize that our front line of trenches is on the English channel and in the Mediterranean. I have no apologies to offer when I make that statement.

Mr. THORSON: Who made that statement?

Mr. BOURGET: The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lockhart). I do not think that represents the opinion of all English-speaking Canadians. If it did, we could not even dream of unity, here in Canada. Similar statements were made during the last war and they resulted in creating disunion and in turning Canadian against Canadian. In times like these when unity is so important, we should refrain from making such statements. It is unnecessary to recall the part which was taken in the building of our beloved country by this unseen minority. This has been proven again and again by others than French-Canadians.

I may assure you, Mr. Speaker, that French Canada is doing its utmost to help the government in the prosecution of its war effort. It may be that the people of that part of Canada have different ideas as to the means to be taken to carry on this war effort, and I think we must admit that this attitude cannot be totally condemned. For example, I think the declaration to-day of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) touching upon conscription goes to show that it is often better to base criticism on the long-range view rather than upon the narrow perspective of the moment. I am sure that no true Canadian will for one minute doubt the loyalty and sincerity of the French-Canadian. When the gods of war shall decree again, as they necessarily must, that the sun of victory will again cast its rays of peace upon the whole British empire, it will then be found that every Canadian from Halifax to Vancouver will proudly and justly maintain that he did his bit to carry on to the successful end.

Mr. V. J. POTTIER (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Mr. Speaker, I am taking advantage of the first opportunity to congratulate the mover (Mr. Claxton) and the seconder (Mr. Jutras) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

During the few minutes at my disposal I intend to bring to the attention of the house a matter which I think might well be given consideration at this time. This is something which I believe is important in view of the serious situation which is facing us at the moment. I refer to the menace which has resulted from the empire's shipping losses. There seems to be no doubt that this situation has reached serious proportions.

We saw in the last war what a menace this might be. A few days ago the Minister of National Defence for Naval Affairs (Mr. Macdonald) related how the building of ships in his department had increased to 155, and he said that before the end of the next fiscal year that number would be increased by another one hundred. I want to congratulate the minister in that regard. But while we are making great strides in our naval shipbuilding programme, there still remains the question of our merchant marine, the question of making up the losses or, shall I say, of helping Britain to make up the losses in merchant shipping that she is suffering at the present time. I believe the time has come when we should have not only a naval shipbuilding programme but a shipbuilding programme for our merchant marine in such proportions that in some measure at least its effect would be felt in this day of world shipping losses.

I said that we are facing a menace in empire shipping. The Prime Minister of Great Britain, speaking in the British House of Commons on November 5, about three weeks ago, said in part:

> The dangers in the air are sudden, but the dangers to our sea-borne traffic mature much more slowly, but they are none the less formidable and if in any way neglected they would touch the life of state. We must expect that next year still heavier U-boat attacks will be made upon us, and we are making immense preparations of all kinds to meet them.

He went on, and this is what I want particularly to draw to the attention of hon. members:

> More serious than the air-raiding has been the recent recrudescence of U-boat sinking in the Atlantic approaches to our island.

That was three weeks ago. Last week Mr. Arthur Greenwood, minister without portfolio in the British government, apparently speaking on behalf of that government, said in a debate in the British House of Commons, I think last Wednesday:

> It is true that we have suffered very heavily. It is true that this is much like April, 1917, but though far worse than it should be, the situation is not as bad as it might have been, but for an actual increase in merchant tonnage built here. We have not quite lived up to our shipbuilding programme, but we are not very far from it and that has made an enormous difference. The shipping we have captured and the shipping transferred to us have gone into the pool; and although our tonnage now is slightly below what it was when the war started, the net loss is not considerable.

He promised that everything would be done to increase home production. He admitted further that the home production of ships was not adequate. He said that Britain hoped for an increased tonnage from the United States. He outlined the programme of Britain, which was made some time ago when it was planned to produce a gross tonnage of 1,300,000 tons a year. Mr. Greenwood said that they had not been able to reach that production, and he went on to say:

It would be folly to deny that the bombing assaults of recent weeks had damaged essential production in Great Britain.

In other words, not only in the past had Britain been behind in their production but they were getting to the stage where they could not maintain even that, shall I say, backward rate of production. The shipping losses in the last two weeks have averaged some 60,000 tons a week. Taking the figures given as approximate, that Great Britain was producing some 25,000 gross tons a week, we find that she is going backward at the present time to the amount of some two million tons of shipping a year. But even these figures do not show the situation in its true light, because in addition to that loss in tonnage the shipping hauls are becoming longer. Ships used formerly to go to Norway, to the continent, and others would use the Mediterranean route; but now all that is changed and ships have to make longer hauls, so that not only is Britain going behind at the rate of two million tons of shipping a year but the freight hauls are becoming longer. That is the situation as we find it to-day.

But some members may say that we have acquired from seven to eight million tons of shipping from Norway, Denmark, Belgium, the Netherlands and Greece. But the British losses cannot be made up simply by transferring to a pool the continuing traffic supplied by ships from other countries. Moreover, this process of freighters from other countries coming into the pool has practically come to an end. It is not a recurring gain. It is not continuous like a building programme and it does not make up for the losses. That to-day is the all-important question.

Mr. Greenwood, as I said, hinted that Britain had to look elsewhere to make up this deficit, and he referred to the United States. Anyone who gives this matter a moment's thought knows that there are only two places where we can get more tonnage. It has to come, as the Prime Minister said this afternoon, from other parts of the empire or from the United States.

Let me go over for a moment just what can be expected from the United States, and then, if I have time, I shall deal briefly with what we could produce in Canada in the way of wooden ships.

Mr. Hore-Belisha in the debate in the British House of Commons said that Britain can expect only about 300,000 tons of shipping from the United States. I think that was an underestimate; I think it was not reasonable. We can with profit look back to the last war to see just what amount of new tonnage was produced at that time. That is the only guide we have.

In 1917—and remember that the United States came into the war in that year—the United States produced 800,000 tons of new shipping, and in 1918, 2,600,000 tons; in 1919 they produced an all-high of 3,300,000 tons. One must remember that in 1918 and 1919 the United States had been in the war for a certain period and had got into their war stride. They were all-out with regard to their shipbuilding programme.

I do not think we can expect such a production at this time. I think we should rather take their tonnage as approximating the 1917 figure, and in 1917 the United States was in the war for about half a year. Their shipping production increased from 1916 to 1917, and in 1917 they produced 800,000 gross tons. Let us raise that up to 1,000,000 tons, for the sake of argument, and even then we shall still be 1,000,000 gross tons short of making up the annual losses in shipping. Therefore, if we take the United States estimate of production at 1,000,000 tons, it leaves other parts of the British empire the duty to do what they can to repair the sustained losses, to counteract the subtractions that are taking place from time to time. I think the time has come when Canada can well go over its own shipyards to see what its possibilities are and in what way it can help to meet the situation.

Let us see what happened in the last war so far as Canadian shipyards were concerned —because that is the only measure we have to go by. I will give the values in dollars in order to give the house an idea of the expansion that took place in shipbuilding at that time. In 1915 there was a total production in Canadian shipbuilding of $7,000,000. By 1917 this had risen to $35,000,000; in 1918 it was $74,000,000, and in 1919 it was $86,000,000. That represents the possibilities of expansion in Canadian shipbuilding, taking the years from 1915 to 1919.

Perhaps at this time it might be well for us to look over our own shipyards to see exactly what can be done with regard to ships. In 1918 we built 428 vessels with a gross tonnage of 235,000 tons and about the same amount in 1919, besides repairs. At that time we built for the imperial munitions board, forty-one steam merchantships, having a total of 132,000 tons, and forty-six wooden ships having a total of 90,000 tons.

Someone will perhaps ask what the policy of the government was in the last war. What did they do then? That might be a guide to what we should do now. At that time they were faced with the same menace; submarines were threatening British shipping, and the question necessarily came before this house. It came before the house first on May 11, 1917, when it was brought up by the Hon. E. M. Macdonald, member for Pictou at that time, and again on April 4, 1918, it was discussed. The question was then, as it is now: Should we as a government go into a shipbuilding programme and build steel ships or wooden ships or both? Let me read from Hansard to show the policy of the government of that day with regard to this matter. I read from page 346 of Hansard of 1918 where the statement of the then Minister of Marine is reported:

I brought the matter to their attention, that the time was opportune for Canada to embark upon the building of steel ships as a national, permanent policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ballantyne: And, after giving the matter very careful consideration for some months, and working out a comprehensive programme on good, sound, business lines, I brought the proposal before my colleagues in the government, and I am very pleased to state that it was unanimously decided that after the imperial munitions board contracts were completed all the berths in all the shipyards of Canada which are building steel ships would be utilized to the full in building steel vessels for the Canadian government.

That was in regard to steel ships. What about wooden ships? The policy with regard to wooden ships was stated by the same minister, as reported at page 349:

The hon. member for Maisonneuve said something about neutral ships. The Canadian government, of course, are confining their efforts entirely to ships of Canadian registry. We intend to keep our yards busy with Canadian registered ships only—ships for the Canadian government.

A large number of wooden ships have been built by the imperial munitions board for the imperial authorities, but it is not the intention of the Canadian government to have any wooden ships built. I am not prepared to express any opinion for or against wooden ships, except that with the money available for ship building in Canada at the present time, it seemed to the government the wisest policy to invest that money in steel ships only. The wooden shipbuilding yards in different parts of Canada have many opportunities at the present time for building wooden ships. While they cannot build wooden ships under Canadian registry, they have every opportunity of building wooden ships for our allies and for neutral countries, and some of these yards are now working on very large orders for wooden ships for allied and neutral countries.

That was the policy in 1917; that is what happened at that time. They built steel ships only, and as a matter of fact, from that policy developed the famous Canadian merchant marine. In 1919, 1920 and 1921, sixty-three steel merchantships were built.

With that record behind us, I think we can profitably consider at this time what we should do in dealing with one phase of shipbuilding, namely, wooden ships. I am not going to deal with steel ships. Perhaps, before discussing this question further, I should congratulate the government upon the recent appointment of a controller of ship construction and repairs, with wide powers to allocate work and distribute men and machinery. The person named is well qualified, and he comes to his position with experience and ability.

At the present time, in yards for the construction of wooden ships in Canada we have about 5,000 tons of shipbuilding going on, and this, by the way, on the part of private owners, except for such wooden ships as are connected with our naval programme. In my remarks I am discussing merchantships. We have existing facilities for approximately 60,000 gross tons, for the construction of wooden ships. We are using less than ten per cent of our wooden shipbuilding capacity.

As we know, there has been discussed a programme in connection with wooden ships for Britain, and nothing that I shall say must be taken as proposing in any way to interfere with that programme. As I understand, there is nothing definite. There are no wooden ships contracted for and the matter is in an unsettled state. The opinion I urge at all times is that Britain should be given the right of way, and I do not wish my remarks to be construed in any way as interfering with that procedure. The right of way should be given to the old country for whatever ships it requires.

What I am afraid of is that Britain may not decide to build wooden ships, or may decide to build a limited number, and that we shall go back to the policy of 1917 of no wooden ships. We shall be not merely in the same position as at that time but in an immensely worse position, because then we had allies and neutrals for whom we were building wooden ships, as mentioned by the then Minister of Marine. That is what causes me to rise here to-night to make these remarks.

I should be very sorry to see a situation in which we were using perhaps ten per cent of our facilities for wooden shipbuilding, while at the same time British losses were such that her shipping was going behind at the rate of two million gross tons a year. In my opinion our present facilities should be increased perhaps threefold; we could produce 150 thousand tons of wooden ships a year.

I make this reservation, that whether or not that can be accomplished depends on the importance assigned to wooden shipbuilding in relation to other industries. We have only a limited number of skilled workers in this country; if they are used in the steel shipbuilding industry, the aircraft industry, the munitions industry or any other industry, and if these industries are placed before the wooden shipbuilding industry, then that is going to restrict the production of wooden ships. But if we want to restore the wooden shipbuilding industry as one of the first into which skilled labour should be allowed to go, then we can produce in this country 150,000 tons a year of wooden ships. That is a very important contribution to the empire.

To-day ships have to be replaced at the rate of two million tons a year. With the United States producing one million tons there are still another million tons to come from somewhere, and that somewhere must be Canada and other parts of the empire. The wooden shipbuilding industry in Canada could produce 150,000 tons of that quantity. That is an important factor which must be considered.

I know and I should be frank in telling hon. members that there are some arguments against wooden ships. We who come from constituencies by the sea hear them and have to meet them, and in order that I may give the whole picture let me state those that we hear most often.

They tell us that wooden ships are of limited capacity; that is to say, a wooden cargo ship of 1,000 tons is considered a large wooden ship. They also tell us that wooden ships are limited as to speed; also that the personnel is an important factor, because if we have one ship of 1,000 tons and another of 10,000 tons, the latter like the former requires only one captain. They say, therefore, that we should go in for the larger ships because our personnel is restricted in numbers.

To meet those arguments one by one: as to the fact that the tonnage is limited, I would point out that wooden ships cost less. With regard to speed, we can produce proper models which, with the diesel engines of to-day, will maintain convoy speed, which, after all, is all that has to be considered at this time. As to personnel, I have great difficulty in convincing myself that there is much in that argument. I cannot see ships tied up at the wharves, particularly on the Atlantic coast, because men to take them out are lacking. We have too much of the old seafaring blood in our veins, of the days of wooden ships and iron men. Such a challenge would never fail to be accepted on either the Atlantic or the Pacific coast. We come of a breed of men whose ancestors came here over stormy seas and who have lived by the sea, and when the time comes that we cannot find the men to man our ships the empire will be no more. Therefore I say that argument of lack of personnel is not one to be given any consideration.

We have gone through wooden shipbuilding eras in Canada. It is interesting to note that away back in the eighties we had 1,300,000 tons of wooden ships, over seven thousand vessels, built in the maritime provinces and the province of Quebec. With such a background as I have tried to outline, with the present rate of shipping losses and with the possibilities in regard to wooden shipbuilding that are ours, and with the importance of keeping that life-line of the empire between this country and Britain in being, it means nothing but ships, more ships and still more ships. We must realize that if the time ever comes that this line of ships crossing the north Atlantic is cut off, it means that the empire as we see it is no more. These ships passing back and forth are the pulse of our national war effort. They carry to Britain that which sustains her life and enables her to carry on her war effort. In our wooden shipbuilding industry we have an asset which can help to maintain that life-line. We have a great tradition of shipbuilding; we have the men to man them, the sons of captains who navigated them over the seven seas and made Canadian shipping familiar in every port in the world.

In view of these factors, I suggest that the government consider seriously a wooden shipbuilding programme. I realize, as every hon. member must, that these industries have to be placed in their relative importance. But I assure them that if the time comes that wooden ships are needed, every creek or cove on the Atlantic coast particularly is a potential shipyard. Shipyards will mushroom up over night—they increased from 40 in 1914 to 250 in 1918. That situation can be renewed, and I ask the government to give consideration to making use of that great national facility.

Mr. PIERRE GAUTHIER (Portneuf) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, having followed with deep attention and without prejudice the various speeches delivered during the debate now drawing to a close, I have been able to appreciate, as many others have, the advantages which a democratic assembly affords to its members and the superiority of our parliament over those which are led by dictators whose sole ambition is to impose their personal views without allowing their hearers or their subjects to discuss the questions on their merits in the light of their intelligence and especially of their judgment. Here, every member has the privilege and the right to voice his views freely and to offer any suggestions he may deem conducive to the better administration of the country, whether he be a supporter or an opponent of the government of the day.

If all those who are inclined to look with a kindly eye upon the totalitarian systems could enjoy the freedom which is ours in this house and, especially, if they could witness the restraint and oppression suffered by the members of a parliament submitted to the constant pressure of a Fuehrer or a Duce; if they could undergo the experience of the German people the humblest of whom cannot even tune in on such and such a radio programme without risking imprisonment and even death, as we have recently seen, I have no doubt that their opinion would change and that their views would become more worthy of a human being capable of appreciating at its true value the inestimable privilege of freedom of speech and individual initiative.

The war effort, under whose weight both the democracies and the totalitarian countries are bending, has become so great and its cessation is so problematical that it would be rash for any human being, however gifted, to attempt to determine its outcome or forecast its ending. This country has entered the war at the side of England and France and as a result of the decision of its parliament. It would be pointless, now that we are engaged in it, to bewail the cost of our participation in this conflict which threatens to become world-wide or to voice criticism which would probably neither add to nor detract from the course which the country has taken. My intention is, therefore, like that of the hon. members who have already spoken, to offer suggestions and express views on the various phases of our effort, including the present mobilization plan and its proposed modifications, the nature and degree of our military and industrial cooperation within the British empire, the need of a far-sighted policy as regards Canada and the Canadian people both during the war and the extremely critical after-war period. These are the points which I propose to consider, without, however, being able to deal with them in all their aspects, owing to the little time at my disposal.

During the debate on the mobilization act at the first session of 1940, some of my colleagues had, as I did, suggested that the government first exhaust the number of recruits who had enrolled voluntarily. According to Hansard of June 18, 1940, I spoke as follows:

> During the last federal election campaign this conscription act was discussed. I did not ask my electors the plain question: "Are you in favour of conscription for this country?" And if to-night I rise in this house and ask the government not to act too hastily in having this act passed by the house, it is because of my wish to be consistently honest toward my electors and to have the opportunity of asking them their views regarding the imposing of conscription in and for this country.

An hon. member of the house expressed a doubt as to the possibility of satisfactorily consulting my electors in the space of twenty-four or forty-eight hours. The means of communicating with them being well known to me, I felt sure of being able to consult to their entire satisfaction the electors of Portneuf whom I consider just as intelligent outside of election time as on voting day. I was thus able to learn the views of men prominent in politics belonging to both parties and also those of most of the members of the clergy. If I mention this incident, Mr. Speaker, it is not because of any resentment I may hold, but in order to show that, knowing the situation in my constituency and the means of communication at my disposal, I knew whereof I spoke. Nevertheless, later on, I consulted once more the people of my constituency, and this time those who had accomplished their thirty days of training. All expressed satisfaction at the good treatment they had received and the experience they were proud to have acquired. They expressed the opinion, however, that the food, though of excellent quality, was often poorly prepared. All admitted that this situation had been largely remedied following the visit of the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power), a visit of which they have retained a most favourable recollection.

We have read in the newspapers of last week-end that an important delegation had interviewed the Premier of Quebec regarding the disorder caused among our trainees by illicit liquor selling. The control of the sale of liquor other than contraband resting with the provincial authority, the premier assured the civil and religious authorities that a very close supervision would be exercised in the matter. Several trainees whom I consulted had mentioned this fact, as well as another which, though less devastating perhaps, is artistically no less debasing—the profanity which continues to fall from the lips of our people. We are inclined to forgive them on the strength of the legend of the last war that swearing was one of the most terrible weapons brought to bear against the German soldiers. It would be sufficient simply to change the words while retaining the tone and expression to obtain the same results without endangering harmony.

Some hon. members have come out categorically against the proposed extension of the training period. I share the opinion of the trainees whom I have consulted that a period of two months would be long enough to inculcate sufficient of the knowledge most useful to a soldier. I have no hesitation to urge the need of being somewhat moderate in the decision to be made, in view of the increasing demand on the part of industry for workers if our real war effort, which is at once the most reasonable and the most urgent, is to fulfill the expectation of our allies in the conflict. A few days before the downfall of France the prime minister and the commander-in-chief of that country launched a request for material rather than for soldiers. Just a few days ago a prominent Englishman made a similar request to the United States and to Canada. Following this experience a decision will undoubtedly soon be arrived at, leaving no doubt as to the necessity of directing all our attention to providing the war industries with all the manpower they need absolutely and in ever increasing numbers.

Furthermore, let us not forget the farmers and the land the full productive capacity of which it is our duty to ensure in order to fulfill the expectations of the belligerent countries. Certain cases should be more frequently taken into account by the reviewing judges—the case, for instance, of the farmer's son whose father needs, on account of advanced age, the services of at least one son to work the farm even in winter; then the case of the young man registered as a farmer's son but whose father died afterwards leaving him in charge of property which he must not allow to depreciate for want of someone to work it.

Incidentally, I wish to thank our doctors for the particular care they have given to the examination of the young men called up for training and to congratulate them on the precious advice they have unsparingly vouchsafed to them and which will prove useful in this new life replete with strange and sometimes dangerous situations. Our army doctors can never be too careful regarding the personal hygiene of our trainees and of all our soldiers during all the days of their life.

There is found among the young men called for training some uneasiness as to the danger, which they consider serious, of losing the positions they held in industry. This danger which is not real when the training period covers only one month could become real were the period to be extended to three or four months. In addition to this, the authorities should also realize that the danger always exists that too long a stay in camp—this has been noted in countries where compulsory military service of a year or more is the rule—tends to make young men lose taste for work on the land or in industry, thus seriously disrupting the economic life of a country and sometimes compelling governments to undertake paternalistic policies or at least policies aiming at almost complete control of all material and human resources with their inevitable consequence of almost total loss of individual initiative.

But, Mr. Speaker, there are some for whom mobilization for the defence of the country is not sufficient. I do not refer to those who have been mobilized but to certain people who believe that Canada's war effort is far from sufficient, that our war industries are not operating with sufficient speed, that our soldiers are not sufficiently equipped for service overseas and above all that parliament should enact compulsory enlistment for service overseas. The appeals of eminent men for war material before all else make no impression upon them; they apparently hanker for more ringing words, for more sensational deeds. Their loyalty, which varies according as the personal and especially the financial interests of their supporters seem to be neglected or insufficiently satisfied, requires something more startling. Could it be the recollection of the bacon of the last war or of the dull though profitable procession of broken-down horses that haunts their minds?

However it may be, they let pass no opportunity to raise their voices—the voices of politicians who have been buried many times already, of politicians who, about to die, utter one last cry, hoping that the echo will carry it so far after their death that they will not be forgotten too soon. There are some among them who, to serve their petty ends and satisfy their dangerous appetites, are not ashamed to make statements the inevitable result of which will be to destroy national unity which genuine statesmen are to-day labouring to preserve. It is unfortunately too true that for certain sharks of the financial world war consists in being comfortably seated in a well-upholstered chair, smoking an expensive imported cigar and fingering the stock-market ticker in order to find out to what extent the ups and downs of one or the other belligerent will affect their holdings in war industries.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame!

Mr. GAUTHIER: What does one human life more or less matter to them, providing their pile increases! The sad part of it is that some of these men manage to acquire a reputation for great patriotism.

Such men are to be found in all countries—in the dictatorships as well as in the democracies. They have made of war a permanent industry. After the massacre of 1914-1918 they rested a little, while disposing from time to time of the products their industries continued to manufacture; we have had the Gran Chaco, the Chinese war, still going on, the Spanish civil war, and after a respite of twenty-five years, a new world war.

An author once wrote:

> The masses are good-natured; they are not curious. When they find that they have been tricked they get angry and want to break everything. A moment later they have forgotten everything and the comedy starts again at their expense.

Should this definition be correct and the people some day cease being good-natured, what would happen?

A country's war effort can be disastrous when one forgets that nations as well as individuals can develop a form of anaemia which renders them incapable of intellectual or manual work. This anaemia declares itself when people are called upon to perform too much work for the food and care they receive. Therefore, in addition to the war effort there should be a conservation effort. Measures should be taken on a permanent basis in view of the years which will follow this effort, when the world will stop for a while to draw breath—those who will still be strong enough to do so—and to repair the losses, if the required materials still exist and especially if there is still in the world sufficient courage to undertake a proper reconstruction.

The Canadian effort, already considerable, will become even greater by force of circumstances. It should continue to be above all rational. Since our allies are asking especially for an industrial effort, it is because that is what they need—what they need more than they need men. I do not think I am wrong in stating that the people of the entire country are willing to give to Great Britain every assistance possible in the way of munitions and instruments of war. Thousands of our young men are already on active service overseas. Those who have remained here have shown their willingness to do all in their power to ensure the defence of the country.

I shall not discuss, Mr. Speaker, the opinion of those who believe that our boundary line is in Europe. I shall simply tell them that as a citizen entitled to his own views I do not share theirs.

We need men for our industries; we have them here, let us use them. We need men to defend the fairest of the lands belonging to the free association of the countries of the empire; we have them, and I am sure they will know how to behave should Canada be attacked. The other day I heard the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard) reply to the question of a fellow-member who asked him whether he was opposed to imperialism. This was the hon. member's answer:

> I am opposed to that imperialism which places the empire above Canada. I am for Canada first; I place Canada above all, Canada should play her part in the empire, but we should not lose sight of the interests of Canada.

These words of the hon. member for Bellechasse awakened in me a world of recollections. I thought I was hearing the voice of one of those who were called, scarcely two or three years ago, the group of ten or the dissentients. A good idea always finds supporters in the end.

Mr. PICARD: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member allow me to make an observation with respect to his last words?

Mr. GAUTHIER: Certainly.

Mr. PICARD: I do not think that in the whole of my speech of November 21 there can be found a single word which could identify me with the position taken in 1937 and 1938 by some hon. members who did not vote for the defence appropriations. The statements which I made and which I shall repeat, my advocacy of the interests of our people which I shall renew whenever necessary, have nothing in common with the attitude taken in 1937 and 1938 by certain persons who did not vote for the armament appropriations. Had I been a member of the House at the time, I should have voted for the budget. In France to-day men are being tried on the charge of not having sufficiently prepared the defence of their country. I say that to my hon. friend, whom I esteem, without the slightest intention to offend him. Had I been here in 1937 I should have voted for the government's budget. I should have approved it and even upheld it.

Mr. GAUTHIER: I do not wish to discuss the hon. member's present or past views and I take the liberty of telling him that I do not intend to labour the point.

If I might be permitted, I would ask the government to pay no heed to the out and out advocates of conscription. On March 26 last, the people gave a clear cut decision on that question. From the lowliest as well as the wealthiest Canadian citizens comes this unanimous plea: carry out the mandate we have entrusted to you; we are confident that you will fulfil your task unflinchingly.

Forgetting for a moment their great financial problems to indulge, as it were, in some kind of relaxation, those who would like Canada to bleed herself white sometimes raise a clamour against "political patronage." As far as I am concerned, and I am sure many hon. members agree with me, I may say that I am now far from being spoilt as regards the "patronage" I can dispense to my electors. In support of that statement, I wish to quote a few paragraphs from a letter written to us on October 3, 1939, by the late lamented Minister of National Defence, the hon. Norman McLeod Rogers. The second paragraph reads as follows:

If Canada is to contribute her effort most effectively, it is absolutely necessary that we all move forward in a complete unity of spirit and purpose. Partisan or personal preferences can have no place in our plans for prosecuting the war.

The letter then goes on:

This means that political interference or personal influence can have no effect in the appointment to commissions in various arms of the service, promotions and employment of civilian help by this department. It means also that purchases of wartime supplies will be made by the war supply board in the open market in the interest of economy and efficiency. No special consideration can be claimed by any particular firm. It is specifically requested that no favours be asked for with respect to contracts, appointments or employment. To grant such requests on a political or personal basis would impair the national character of our wartime effort.

A second letter was written to us by the three ministers of national defence on August 8, 1940. It said about the same things, but dealt with a much greater number of details. In addition to stating that preference should go to war veterans, a statement with which everyone agrees, that letter contained a paragraph which some officials have taken quite seriously:

It is the duty of the employing officer to select his help from those sent to him through any of the employment agencies mentioned above on the basis of qualifications to do the work. He shall not allow personal letters of recommendation (other than those written by former employers) on behalf of any applicant to influence him in this selection.

I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that some officials quote that paragraph with an eagerness and a patience that would be most creditable, were those people showing more judgment.

I took the liberty of replying to that letter as follows:

Dear Sir:

I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter dated August 8th, which is no doubt written for the particular information of members.

I am willing to comply with your request as regards appointments, promotions, transfers, and so on in Canada's armed forces. I do not wish any action of mine to interfere with Canada's tremendous war effort.

Parliament has decided upon that war effort and, while not agreeing fully with its views, I must bow to the will of the majority.

However, I am the elected representative of the people of my constituency, and I cannot refuse to give a letter of recommendation to any elector who wishes to secure work on the various projects carried on in many places by the Department of National Defence, especially when I know that the man needs work. Those whom I recommend are honest and law abiding. I do not think any one of them guilty of any offence under the acts that have been passed.

In my district, most of the work is done in towns and in their close vicinity. I glean for my electors what little work is available for them. I cannot leave them under the impression that I am no longer able to deal with their requests, even in war time.

My letter goes on:

The opponents of the present government protest against political patronage, as they have indeed always done, so as to screen their activities in the various departments of the federal service. My point is sufficiently illustrated by what happens all too frequently in the civil service commission.

It is true that we are at war, but sooner or later peace will come. We shall then be in a position to determine whether our nation's effort has put too heavy a strain on our resources. We shall also be able to see whether priority has always been given to our Canadian fellow-citizens in those services. When the proper time comes, we can easily ascertain the situation and determine the extent of our war effort.

You may rest assured that my remarks are not promoted by the wish to voice any criticism. What makes me uneasy about the future is the fact that I foresee the very serious problems that will confront Canada after the war. I hope you will consider my statement not as a criticism but as a recital of facts.

Yours very truly,

I have had the privilege of an acknowledgment from the Minister of National Defence for Air.

I have therefore continued to give letters of recommendation without any qualms whatever, for, after all, my electors pay taxes like others, they serve just the same as others do. Some of them are even on active service overseas. Whenever they have the chance of earning some extra money and they believe that I can help them to secure employment, I do not wish to disappoint my constituents, and, whatever their political creed may be, I do my utmost, on all occasions, to secure work for them.

Before 1931, the great Valcartier camp was in the constituency of Portneuf, but a redistribution having been made, although that camp was normally a part of the county of Portneuf, by a mere pencil stroke it was detached from it and added to the constituency of Quebec-Montmorency. That is the only war industry in which the people from adjacent parishes may obtain occasional employment. I know that letters of recommendation have been ridiculed and even torn up by some officials. I only ask that this be not done in my presence. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that more judgment will be shown in future. I may add that all too often—I have ascertained the fact during the last few days—some kind of secret patronage system is set up among friends and that some of its most faithful devotees are outspoken supporters of the Conservative party. As I have rightly said, their purpose in raising a clamour is to screen their activities.

Some one was pointing out to me the other day that there was some danger for the people in rural areas if we insisted upon securing work for them in war industries. They might thus be attracted to town occupations and we might be unable to bring them back to the land. I have always held that agriculture is indispensable to us and that we should concentrate all our efforts upon making it successful so that it may become the life work of a larger number of people. But there are also, in my constituency, people who look for work because they need it. Paper factories, which had lately been working at their full capacity seem to curtail their production for the time being, and some people who were working a short time ago are now unemployed. They deserve all my support and I hope that employers in war industries will show them some consideration. I had much pleasure in listening to the speech delivered by the hon. member for Bellechasse, especially when he stated that the province of Quebec had not been given her full share of war contracts. I can tell you that my constituency has not been spoiled in that regard.

Huge plants are now being erected. There are in our province some factories of lesser importance which would certainly have proved useful in the production of many kinds of war supplies. I have taken the liberty of bringing them to the attention of the Minister of Munitions and Supply, and I am now awaiting the result of that action.

A distinguished British statesman has recently said: "We have had the audacity to industrialize Canada." I fully agree with him. I do believe that if Europe is now plunged into a war brought about by economic difficulties, it is to a great extent due to the fact that those continents which formerly imported industrial goods from Europe are today so organized as to be able to compete successfully with countries on the other side of the Atlantic. Since the improvement of machinery has enabled workmen to produce with the same amount of labour ten times more than the farmers, it is unavoidable that manufactured goods should glut the market more rapidly, and whereas trading could formerly be successfully carried on with agricultural nations it has now become ruinous on account of the industrialization of the latter. We are facing a similar threat.

Consequently, we will necessarily be compelled—and now is the time to do some planning in that regard—to concentrate our efforts upon a national programme of land settlement and a back-to-the-land movement. All Canadian provinces have for a long time carried on land settlement, but unfortunately they all too often lacked a definite programme. In a vast country like ours, while we should not rely too much on immigration, which is always dangerous, there is room for millions of people whom we should, more than ever, settle on the land. The opening of new rural communities always ensures new opportunities to skilled workmen and even to professional men. I have read somewhere about a settlement plan prepared by the head of the unemployment relief service in the provincial government of Quebec.

Time will not permit me to describe fully that plan, but I may say that it rightly provides first for such things as the opening of roads by the unemployed, the clearing of land, and its subdivision into lots, the building of houses, and it has two ends in view: lessening of unemployment and placing settlers permanently on the land.

I have taken the trouble to find out in the reports of the different federal and provincial departments the cost of unemployment relief work and direct relief from 1931 to 1940. I have found—my figures may not be quite accurate, but they are not far out—that, for the period mentioned, the province of Quebec alone has paid in relief about $49,000,000. The dominion's share is somewhat more than $44,000,000 and the municipalities have paid nearly $36,500,000. The expenditures have thus reached a total of nearly $130,000,000.

It is quite interesting to note the difference between the amounts spent on unemployment relief and the sums devoted to land settlement, including the back-to-the-land movement. For land settlement, the province and the dominion have jointly spent about $8,000,000, the dominion's share being about $800,000 and the province's over $7,000,000. Thus, land settlement and the back-to-the-land movement have together cost $120,000,000 less than unemployment relief. And such a thing happened in a country considered as the richest in the world. If we add the sum of about $80,000,000 spent in the same province on relief work, we have a grand total of more than $220,000,000.

I may have seemed to digress in dealing with relief work and settlement, but my purpose was to give an inkling of the situation and to point out a phase of the problem with which we will be confronted when our war industries cease to operate, partly at least, for some of them will remain in existence, since war has become a permanent industry.

In those plants that will have to be closed, instead of making guns, tanks and machine guns, we shall have to build tractors, trucks and giant plows for tilling the Canadian soil, making it produce to its full capacity and continuing to give to our people the impression, which visitors from foreign lands sometimes gather, that after all Canada is God's own country.

Something has been said in this house about the fixing of prices for butter and other farm products. A farmer gave me, from memory, some prices that were prevailing during last war, from 1914 to 1918. To my mind, they show the great difference between the government of that time and the one we have to-day. That farmer told me that during the last war the wholesale price of butter was 75 cents and even more. That is more than twice the present price. And, if I remember well, prices had not been fixed. In 1917, the wholesale price of pork was 25 cents; to-day it is 10 or 11 cents. It has never entered the minds of our farmers to be war profiteers; they are doing nobly and courageously their share in the general effort. But before any fixing of prices, some notice will have to be taken of the prices they pay as consumers, for they are indeed the most important consumers and they are those who have had most to suffer during the last few years.

I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Bourget) on his splendid speech. He has asked that the salary of grade 1 clerks who are under the civil service commission be raised. I agree with him and I hope that his plea will receive the attention it deserves.

During the visit of our sovereigns, the king and queen of Canada, who are now giving to the world an example of courage that must astonish and confound the enemies of the empire, I said that our sovereigns, after their passage in our midst, would have the recollection of a flagless country. There are perhaps many who do not believe as strongly as I do in the need of a national flag. It seems that the present time, when we are endeavouring to unite closely all the energies, activities, hopes and the aspirations of the Canadian nation, is perfectly suitable for the carrying out of the plan which has so often been discussed in this house and which would have deserved a better fate. Every country in the world has its flag, even our sister nations of the British commonwealth. Why should Canada have none? We venerate and respect the Union Jack, but it does not symbolize all that makes up the history of our country. We would gladly see it reproduced on a flag alongside the fleur-de-lis and the maple leaf. What stands in the way of the adopting of a national emblem in Canada? I am quite convinced that all Canadians would hail the presence of their flag of the design that was placed on the flag of the first Canadian contingent during the present war. Parliament and the government should not postpone such a necessary and ineluctable task until a movement arises, sooner or later, within the nation. If there are any who believe that the possession of a distinct flag is an unimportant matter for a country, let them take the trouble to observe what happens elsewhere. Does not the Union Jack call forth the admiration of Englishmen? Are the Americans unmoved by the star spangled banner? Why should the sight of our national flag leave us unconcerned? I believe that the citizens of a nation are stirred by the sight of their national flag as much as by the hearing of their national anthem. I should like all Canadians to raise their voices in demanding the immediate fulfilment of that project, and expressing afterwards their gratitude to those responsible for having given to their fatherland a truly national emblem.

(Text) In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure to me to commend the mover (Mr. Claxton) and the seconder (Mr. Jutras) of the address. They had a difficult task to perform, but they mastered it so well that every member of this house, irrespective of his political allegiance, must have found their performance more than satisfactory.

We have been told so many useful and promising things about national unity for many years, and particularly during the last few weeks, that it might seem useless to elaborate upon it. It seems a well established fact. Our unity must not be a make-believe, or smouldering embers only. My belief is that to achieve real unity, the first essential is that every man living in this country must think of himself as a Canadian living here not in a temporary but a permanent homeland. Our point of view must be, above all, Canadian.

In this war effort some of us say that Canada must do everything, go to the utmost limit of our resources and man-power. We are at war, and we do not know how far it may lead us. Canada's possibilities and the industrial aid she can give to Britain are great owing to the large number of men we can count on to provide her with all the ammunition she will need.

Prominent British leaders call upon the United States and Canada for more aid. Before the defeat of France, Reynaud and Weygand were imploring for more material—not for men, but for material. Britain is also asking for more material. A satisfactory difference exists between this war and the last war. As far as Canada is concerned, the money is spent in Canada in a much larger proportion. This is a real Canadian action.

To fight for Christianity and democratic liberties is all very well, but we must see that after the war Canada has the strength to assure the survival of our democratic liberties, and keep this Canadian spirit of welfare and prosperity.

Then we will need that national unity, unity built up by unceasing efforts to observe and care for the details as well as for the important things. This country of ours has been built upon the basis of self-sacrifice, devotion, and respect of everyone's rights and privileges. That is the only way to build it up. We must go on in the same spirit.

A few minutes ago, I said that we should care for even the details. In many instances important matters have been forgotten. We know that our unceasing efforts to keep the free and official use of our French language must have wearied the protagonists of the "one language, one school" policy, but we know too, and everyone must realize, that this affection and attachment for our language, our religion, our traditions, made us feel that there was no land in the world, no country, no government as good and as just as Canada's, and our affection for and adhesion to these privileges and rights grew broader and went beyond the boundaries of the province, became nation-wide and Canadian through and through. This was the result of our tenacity.

We kept our mother tongue, religion, institutions and traditions. We fought for that and would fight to the end for these same rights; and this tenacity we still possess and make use of for the prosperity and defence of our Canada.

Speaking in French I asked the government and the house to give Canada a national flag. Our history, our aspirations, the present circumstances call for a national flag. Canada has been existing, living, growing for four centuries; still she cannot look with pride to her own national emblem. I believe we have waited long enough. A certain class of Canadians may think this a detail, but it must have some meaning since every nation has a flag of its own.

I should like to hear everyone in this country calling for and urging the government and parliament to give our country the flag we need. A national anthem, a national flag, a completed autonomy, a perfect national unity, and Canada will be a real nation.

On motion of Mr. MacKinnon (Kootenay East) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

The house met at three o'clock.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LEAVE TO MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT ON ACTIVE SERVICE IN CANADA TO ATTEND SESSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I should like to direct a question to the associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Power):

1. Has a regulation been issued by the Department of National Defence denying leave to members of parliament on active service in Canada who may desire to attend parliamentary sessions?

2. Would the minister care to tell the house the nature and purpose of any such regulation and if a similar regulation is in operation in Great Britain?

Hon. C. G. POWER (Associate Minister of National Defence): My hon. friend was good enough to give me notice of these questions.

If I may be permitted to speak for the senior service, there are no members of parliament in the navy. With respect to the air force, an order has been issued—not a regulation—to the effect that no special leave will be granted to members of parliament which will take them away from their training. It is however possible on request that members of parliament may obtain from two to four days for the purpose of attending parliament should that be necessary.

With regard to the army, there is an order, issued on January 23, addressed "To district officers commanding, all military districts":

Members of parliament and provincial legislatures appointed to active service units.
Leave of absence.

I am to inform you that such members of the federal parliament and provincial legislatures as may have been enrolled in units called out for active service, will be permitted, so long as their units remain in Canada, if they so desire, to attend the sessions and be granted leave of absence without pay and allowances for the periods of such absence.

To sum up: With respect to the navy, at the moment no members of parliament are in the service. With respect to the air force, no special leave is granted to attend the sessions of parliament. With respect to the army, there is an old regulation to the effect that if they do attend the sessions of parliament they will do so without obtaining pay and allowance.

As regards the rest of the question, I am not familiar with the practice that obtains in Great Britain.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEEDING TO ORDER FOR RESUMING DEBATE ON ADDRESS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): It was understood yesterday that we would not to-day resume the debate on the motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) but would proceed with the special order and continue the debate on the address. If therefore the house is agreeable I shall ask that we proceed to that order.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Monday, December 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Brooke Claxton for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Blackmore.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to detain the house for a brief period of time in order that I may sum up my impressions with respect to this protracted debate.

The debate proper started three weeks ago to-day, and we have listened to progress reports from eight ministers of the crown. I had almost expected a ninth, because we were hoping to hear from the Minister of Pensions (Mr. Mackenzie) all last week. I think perhaps some word is due from him with respect to what is proposed to be done for men who went overseas with the Canadian active service force or those who did not go overseas and have now been discharged from the army. I understand they number about 15,000, and men are being let out every day. They do constitute a real problem for Canada, for the government and for the communities in which they live. It would appear to me that a statement should be made by the Minister of Pensions and National Health as to the government policy. I understand that a policy has been laid down and is crystallized in a lengthy order in council, which I have endeavoured to study but which I think is not clearly understood by the country. Therefore if a convenient time could be arranged for a statement from the Minister of Pensions and National Health in this regard I think it would be of some importance.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend allow me to say that the Minister of Pensions and National Health has unfortunately suffered from an attack of flu during the past week and for that reason was prevented from being in the house. He was here yesterday and hoped to be able to speak. When he found he was not in shape for speaking he so informed me and intimated that he would speak to-day. I received word from the minister this morning that he did not think it would be possible for him to be in the house this afternoon. He hopes however to be able to make a statement before the week is out. If he himself is unable to do so, a statement will be made by one of the other ministers covering the subject raised.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I quite appreciate that, and that will be satisfactory—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I think the hon. leader of the opposition will appreciate what I am going to say. We have now before us a motion, an amendment and a subamendment. The leader of the opposition has already spoken on the main motion and moved his amendment. Citation No. 410 of Beauchesne reads:

Amendments to the address are moved by way of additions thereto. A general debate may take place on the address, but when an amendment is proposed the discussion should be strictly confined to the subject matter of the amendment.

I take it from the remarks the leader of the opposition has already made that he proposes to discuss the main motion and whatever may have subsequently come before the house, but according to the citation I have quoted it is not in order at the present stage of the debate to discuss other than the terms of the subamendment. If I permit the leader of the opposition to engage in a general discussion in regard to all that has taken place I shall have to permit other hon. members of the house to do so, which would be contrary to the rules. Any other hon. member could take the same position and again discuss the main motion. I therefore desire to call the attention of the leader of the opposition to the rule and to point out that so far as relevancy is concerned any remarks at the present stage should be addressed solely to the subamendment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course that was my intention, and my interpretation of the subamendment is that it is of very wide character and will allow very wide latitude.

I am glad to have the Prime Minister's undertaking that a statement will be made in connection with the important matter to which I have alluded.

The subamendment to which Mr. Speaker has so properly called my attention is so wide in its scope, having to do with the financing of the war and the general attitude thereto, that I am fully conscious that I am within my right in discussing what contributions have been made to the debate by ministers on previous occasions, and my remarks will largely be confined thereto.

Speaking in this debate prior to the moving of the subamendment I asked the government to give to the people of Canada a clear, truthful, factual and honest statement, free from propaganda and partisanship, so that we might examine it and know the nature and extent of Canada's war effort. I am asking myself to-day, and I ask hon. members of this house who have listened to those reports in the intervening days, how far they measure up to the requirements, judged by the standard to which I have alluded. I am bound to say that I personally listened to them with mixed feelings, and, may I say, with a sense of frustration and futility. And I am of opinion that this feeling must have been present in the minds of a large number of supporters of the government who have taken part in this debate, because we have listened from time to time to private members in this house supporting the administration who have given evidence not only of their desire to assist the government in its war effort, but of the absolute lack of facility and opportunity to make a contribution.

Many of the statements made by the ministers were factual; many were not. In my view there was less evidence of propaganda intended to bolster up the government's position than in the statements to which we listened in the month of July last. For that I am truly grateful.

But still there is discernible most subtle evidence of propaganda, and that I believe is the effect on the mind of the public. There was throughout, with the possible exception of one address, a total failure to adopt and promote a more realistic attitude towards the war. May I at this juncture—

Mr. POULIOT: Would the hon. gentleman be kind enough to define what he means by "a more realistic attitude towards the war"?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am afraid I could not explain it to the hon. member, and I do not think I shall take the time of the house to make the attempt.

May I at this juncture refer to an address delivered last night in the city of Toronto by the premier of Ontario, in which he made a plea for a more realistic war attitude on the part of this government, and in which he turned his guns on a tight little group turning out propaganda in Ottawa. In that address he referred to the fact that Canadians have been told by the press agents of the government that an all-Canadian squadron flying all-Canadian Spitfires was organized and fighting in England. He went on to say:

> Not one of these pilots had been trained as Canadian flyers. Many of them went over there after we turned down the empire training scheme. They paid their way over or worked their way over and were trained by the Royal Air Force.

It is to this type of propaganda that we have to read or listen to that I take objection. It is not factual.

May I here pause to remind the house and the country that on September 4 last the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) in opening the campaign for the second war loan, referred with great pride to the fact that a squadron of flyers on the other side had flown Hurricane planes made in Canada by Canadian working men in Canadian factories. To me that was an astonishing statement, because I had not understood that anything of the sort had been attempted in Canada. I had been following this question of aeroplane construction in Canada for some months and I knew that the most we could claim was that these Hurricanes had been assembled in Canada, but that the major parts had been made elsewhere. Now it is that kind of propaganda that in my view is calculated to lull the Canadian people into a false sense of security as to our war effort. And I leave with members of this house and with the country the thought that we should not be fed with statements of that kind, which are not factual and are not based on the naked truth.

I believe the lack of realism on the part of the government's war effort was in a measure corrected yesterday when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) brought down his first budget of the session. A careful perusal of his remarks and of the resolutions which he proposed, portions of which in my view were long overdue, will bring to the Canadian people a realization of what I have long visualized as necessary.

It will be recalled that as long ago as last July, after the fall of France, I called upon the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to declare a state of national emergency in Canada. My theory then was that we would have to shock the Canadian people into a realization of the seriousness of the situation. What did we get? We got the national registration, and we got the mobilization act. The first measure has been used as a basis for the improvised thirty-day training scheme. But has it been used in connection with the mobilization of labour? Has it been used in connection with the mobilization of the material assets of this country? If so I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that there is absolutely no evidence of any such use having been made of it. And with respect to the thirty-day training plan and the mobilization act itself, was that anything more than an improvisation to ward off attacks on the government? Was it more than a half-way measure, the importance and value of which only time will tell? I suggest that it was only this.

I shall not pursue at this time the theme of yesterday's budget, except to say that in my view the government has announced some measures which should have been put into effect some time ago. In some respects it has not gone far enough, and I submit that there are serious omissions. Our exchange position is serious, I think much more serious than the Minister of Finance intimated to the country yesterday, and perhaps he was wise in not telling the whole story. He must have information that is denied to me, but I do say to the house and to the country that I have sufficient information at my command to lead me to think that the situation is serious, and that if we are to maintain anything like the present equilibrium we shall have to go far beyond the $60,000,000 or $70,000,000 which was indicated as the objective of yesterday's budget.

May I now attempt a brief review of the statements made by the various ministers, dealing first with that of the Prime Minister.

In his prepared speech delivered on November 12, instead of giving the Canadian people factual information as to a concerted war effort the Prime Minister took an hour and a half to tell the Canadian people his views on the international situation as it had developed in the last few months. It was all very interesting, but I submit that it was not what the Canadian people were looking for. They are intelligent; they know for themselves what is the international situation. We did not expect the Prime Minister to deliver a review of the recent history of European developments or international developments; rather were we asking for a factual statement in a concrete way as to what he and his government were doing to help win the war. Because of that many of us were disappointed; and after reading newspaper comment from one end of the country to the other I believe the Canadian people were disappointed.

In my view, however, there was one outstanding omission from the Prime Minister's review of international affairs, having regard to the declarations contained in the speech from the throne and subsequent declarations. I ask him now: What, if any, are the commitments of this country to the United States qua Ogdensburg?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: None.

Mr HANSON (York-Sunbury): All right; that is a very good answer. There are no commitments, and I am perfectly satisfied with that. But if there were commitments we ought to be told what they are. In the course of his remarks the Prime Minister took to himself great credit—and I do not deny it to him—for having built up a spirit of friendship with the United States.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, Mr. Speaker, he is entitled to that; I do not for a moment deny it. I will go further and say that it is of the very greatest importance at this time, and I said so at Toronto. I said at Toronto that the Ogdensburg conversations were capable of a great and noble purpose, and I have never said anything that would contravene that statement. We have no commitments; that is the statement made to-day. Well, I am not for a moment questioning the Prime Minister's word, but I am rather curious. I should like to bring to the attention of this house and of the country the fact that the Prime Minister's coadjutor—that may not be the proper word—his confidential secretary, the talented Mr. Brockington, recently made a speech before the American Bar Association at Philadelphia.

An hon. MEMBER: Good speech.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It was a grand speech; I wish I could make so eloquent a speech. As a pure piece of eloquence it was in a class by itself, and I told him so. But during the course of that speech he made a statement—whether it grew out of the exuberance of the occasion or whether the walnuts and the wine were too much for him I do not know—in which he referred to a "pact" between this country and the United States. Now that I have the Prime Minister's statement that there are no commitments I am concluding that Mr. Brockington had dined too well.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, Mr. Speaker, knowing Mr. Brockington as I do I think my hon. friend ought immediately to withdraw that remark.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then may I put it this way—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And I believe my hon. friend will be prepared to withdraw it, knowing Mr. Brockington as well as he does.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have Mr. Brockington's letter. I am not going to read it to the house, but in it Mr. Brockington told me he was not authorized to make the statement. But he was very close to the Prime Minister, and I wondered why he made it if there were no basis for it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Anyone who is close to me is not, I trust, deprived of his right to say what he wishes or to draw inferences of his own, and I must not be held responsible for every word that is uttered by those who may be close to me.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree with what the Prime Minister says, and Mr. Brockington was speaking on his own. If it is too strong a statement to say that he had dined too well, I cheerfully withdraw it; but that statement was made by Mr. Brockington; it received wide publicity both here and in the United States, and the general public concluded that there was a pact. Now the Prime Minister's statement to-day washes that all out, and I am content to leave the matter where it is.

Then may I ask the Prime Minister one further question in this regard. Has any report been made by the joint committee?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes; several.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Several reports have been made. Are we to be provided with copies of those reports, or are they considered to be confidential?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As my hon. friend knows, those reports relate to matters which affect the security of this continent. They could not be made public without the consent of the government of the United States as well as the consent of our own government. Speaking for Canada I would say that as they relate to the defence of Canada and disclose information which would be of service to the enemy, they will not be made public.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Very well. I find no fault with that attitude. I simply sought to know the facts: had a report been made. Now we are apprised of the fact that several reports have been made, and we can well leave the matter there.

The second minister to address the house was the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). I may say I listened with interest to his story of his trip to England, to his report on the arrangements he had made for the purchase by Great Britain of bacon and other supplies, and to his prognostications on wheat. Later on I had the good fortune to listen to his radio address and his observations with regard to skilled labour in Canada, and the necessity for training men for warfare as opposed to training men for essential industry. That is a matter with which I shall deal later.

I have just this to say with respect to the bacon agreement. Three times I have asked to have this agreement tabled. Twice we have been put off. No one is competent to speak with respect to this agreement unless he has seen it, read it and digested it. I cannot do so, for that reason. But it seems to me that two or three facts emerge. First of all, England is to take larger quantities at lower prices. There are to be smaller Wiltshire sides and more pigs for less money. Is that a fair deduction?

Mr. GARDINER: No, not quite.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to refer to the effect the agreement has had on the bacon producers of eastern Canada. The question of mill feeds is of major importance to them in their bacon production. I have been told, and we all know it is a fact, that mill feeds have increased in price steadily during the past few months. The reason assigned is greater demand for mill feeds in the United States. Well, Mr. Speaker, I contend that the price of mill feeds has gone so high, having regard to transportation costs, that in eastern Canada our bacon producers cannot afford to buy mill feeds to finish their hogs.

An hon. MEMBER: How do you know?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How do I know?—because I keep in touch with the people in that industry, and I get my information from sources similar to those from which the hon. member could get it, if he were to put his ear to the ground, or were to make intelligent inquiries. I am told in my province that with the price of mill feeds as high as it is to-day they cannot produce bacon for the price offered.

I am not suggesting that England should offer a higher price. That is their business. But I do suggest to the government that because the farmer in eastern Canada cannot produce at the present cost of mill feeds, something should be done for him. I understand that recently an order has gone out pegging the price of mill feeds. Well, better late than never; but I say it should have been done before. Our millers are not now suffering from the processing tax.

Nevertheless I am among those who do not think that we should exact the last cent from Britain. I do not think that Canada as a nation should become rich at the expense of our distressed brethren across the seas. On the contrary I say we should not haggle with England over prices of foodstuffs—and bacon is fourth in their list of necessities. Because of the other conditions to which I have referred, the farmer is producing below the cost of production. And I do suggest to the government that something ought to be done to assist the bacon farmers in this country. Just what the measure of that assistance should be I am not in a position to advise. I am not a technical agriculturist, and the Minister of Agriculture is. But I invite him to give consideration to the plight of the bacon producers in eastern Canada, with a view to seeing at least that they may get back a new dollar for an old one.

I am bound to tell this house that from information which I have from the other side of the water there is a feeling in England that Canada is seeking to make money out of the war.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Nonsense.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am bound to tell my right hon. friend there is that feeling in England, and we should at once endeavour to dissipate it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That feeling certainly is not entertained by the government in England.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The government in England would never say anything. The government of the United Kingdom would never say anything—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Or the people of England.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —that would be offensive to the people of Canada. The people in England are thankful for all that is being done, and they will continue to be thankful for all that is being done. But there is that feeling in England.

An hon. MEMBER: How do you know?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It has reached me; and it is none of your business how I know. I am not here for cross-examination.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I say there is a feeling on the other side that Canada is seeking to make money out of the war, and we should do our utmost—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I suggest my hon. friend should give the house some idea as to the source of information of that kind. We can value it only by its source.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I answer the Prime Minister by asking him a question. Is there any food commodity that we are shipping to Great Britain at the present time for which we are not exacting the market price?

An hon. MEMBER: What about potatoes?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Potatoes? Well, my hon. friend from Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Hatfield) bombarded the minister when he was in England to sell New Brunswick potatoes, but he never got an answer to his cable.

Mr. GARDINER: That is not correct. He did get an answer to his cable.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, he had not at the time I spoke to him. I will say this: the Minister of Agriculture did not sell any potatoes over there.

Mr. GARDINER: No,—and because there was a million bushels more in Great Britain than they could eat.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suggest we ought to do something to dissipate in England the feeling to which I have alluded, on the assumption that it exists.

I should like to refer only briefly to what the Minister of Agriculture had to say about wheat. He made a prophecy, and it was highly optimistic. I have seen certain reviews from western Canada with respect to that prophecy. There was one statement made by the premier of Manitoba. There is a review issued by the Sanford Evans statistical bureau, and also reviews from other well-informed sources. I had intended to go into those reviews at greater length, but I shall content myself by referring only to the Sanford Evans statistical service, in which the minister's proposals and prophecies are analysed. All I can say is that it is based on the assumption that we shall consume more in Canada than we ever consumed in any single year of our history, that England will take more wheat than she ever took in any single year of her history, and that continental Europe, which is now overrun by the nazis, will in the days to come, and with the five-year plan, take more wheat than they have ever taken before.

The whole wheat speech of the Minister of Agriculture is part and parcel of the policy of the government to soothe the people of Canada, and especially the people of western Canada, into a false sense of security concerning the future of wheat in Canada.

I should like to refer briefly to the minister's broadcast on Sunday night, November 17. I enjoyed that broadcast. I pay him the compliment of saying that I have reread it. With a large portion of it I am entirely in agreement. It sounded a high note. Near the end of his speceh he said this:

> I think it would be wise to stop much of this talk against military training for men who are making planes, munitions, arms and ships.

And further on he stated:

> Factory managers who contend they cannot produce to capacity without interfering with the training of their men may have to be told by someone . . . that they . . . are not good enough for war time.

That was a threat to industry in Canada. I want to contrast that statement with a statement made during this debate, on Friday, November 15, by the Minister of National Defence, when he said:

> I have said it before, and I say it again, that under present conditions it is essential to the completion of equipment and the completion of training of those large numbers of men we now have in the Canadian army, that the needs of war industry for man-power be not interfered with.

Here we have two members of the same cabinet, speaking in the same week from the same benches.

Mr. GARDINER: And saying the same thing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Two members of the government saying things diametrically opposed to each other. It would not be so bad if this matter were not so important. The Minister of Agriculture interjects a remark in an attempt to make satire out of it. I ask this question: who is right?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Both.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They cannot both be right because the statements are incompatible. I want to suggest that industry in Canada does not think that the Minister of Agriculture is right. Who is right? The Minister of National Defence, who knows the situation with respect to the training of man-power and the necessity for proper equipment, or the Minister of National War Services, who seems to know all things about everything?

Mr. GARDINER: I should like to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that he added the word "their" to my statement. That word does not appear in the printed statement or in my speech of Sunday night.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I thought it was checked, but I shall have it rechecked. I am prepared to take my secretary's transcript at the moment rather than the minister's word, but if it is not there I am ready to do him full justice.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The rules say otherwise.

Mr. GARDINER: That word makes all the difference in the world.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Minister of National War Services made a direct attack on Canadian industry based on the isolated case of one company which did not refuse to cooperate, but which objected to having their young men trained at this time when they were needed in a key war industry.

Mr. GARDINER: I rise to a question of privilege. I am sure the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) does not want to misquote me. I should like to say that I did not make the statement on Sunday night on the basis of anything having to do with one manufacturer. The facts as I know them with regard to that one manufacturer were not in my hands on Sunday night; I received them on Monday and Tuesday and later.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is immaterial. The fact is that the minister did make the statement, and thereby made a direct attack upon Canadian industry based on one isolated case. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, to the house and to the country that this is a most unfair position for the minister to take in connection with Canadian industry. I recall distinctly and clearly at the time of the outbreak of the war that Canadian industry came to this government and offered to cooperate to the full extent of its resources. I make the further statement that the government was slow in indicating a willingness to accept this cooperation, but industry in Canada has loyally assumed the great tasks imposed upon it by the circumstances which have arisen, and is fulfilling those tasks with the utmost efficiency. Industry has been told that it must not and cannot make big profits, and it is an astonishing thing that Canadian industry should have been subjected to an attack by the Minister of National War Services.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the members of this house, that these diametrically opposed positions indicate that the government went about the business of making war without having anything like a comprehensive plan of cooperation. It is because there is no such plan that there is no real coordination, that ministers like the Minister of National War Services adopt one attitude and the Minister of National Defence adopts another.

May I turn briefly to the statement of the Minister of National Defence. We are all delighted to know that he has arrived safely in England, and I look forward with a great deal of confidence to his return with a coordinated plan, the result of the interchange of views with the British war ministry. I am sure that as a result of his visit there will be coordination between Canada's and Britain's war efforts. I know the Minister of National Defence and I feel quite sure that he would not go over there unless he wanted to know and do what was best in the common effort.

I listened to the minister's report with a great deal of interest. To a large degree it was factual, but it left many things to be desired.

May I pause here to say something which perhaps I should have said on November 12. It will be recalled that in his speech before the Canadian club at Ottawa Major-General Crerar indicated that the period of training was limited to thirty days because, for one reason, and aside altogether from the question of lack of equipment, it was desired to inculcate a sense of national obligation into a part of our young nationals. That was probably true to a degree in some parts of Canada, but not in every part. Our young men had a sense of national obligation in a very large measure, but they found that there was no outlet for that sense of national obligation. That theory was borne out by the announcement of a change of policy by the Minister of National Defence for Air. During this very debate he stated that hereafter the department over which he had the honour to preside would go out looking for airmen, rather than having airmen come looking for them. I thought that was all to the good, and I applauded that change in policy.

I believe there is no lack of a sense of national obligation on the part of our young nationals. But if there be, and Major-General Crerar certainly appeared to be the spokesman of the government on that occasion, why should there be? I put this question to the house: why should there be a lack of a sense of national obligation on the part of our young nationals in many parts of Canada? Is it that they have not been properly taught during the last twenty-five years to have a sense of obligation? I do not know. I am asking the question. I am wondering if it is because of bad leadership or false leadership in the past.

An hon. MEMBER: In the past is right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I certainly have nothing to retract for 1917, but there ought to be some retraction by somebody in connection with what took place between 1919 and 1940. While the Minister of National Defence did not say so in express terms, I gathered, and I hope I am right, that he made the promise to this house and to the country that the thirty-day training plan would be extended to four months. Now, that is exactly in accordance with what I advocated from my place in this house, and if it be so, it is worth while. I am not going to thresh over the old straw. I suggested then that thirty days' training was insufficient, that four months would be better; and if the minister comes to that point of view I am grateful, and I think that all of us who have thought about this ought to be grateful for the change in the plan.

Then the minister told us that hereafter promotions to commissions would come from within the ranks. That would appear to me to be a change of policy, but a good change so far as it goes. As long ago as the 8th of August there was issued from the three Departments of National Defence and signed by the three ministers a letter, or a publication—whatever you have a mind to call it—headed "Canada's War Effort". It deals with appointments, promotions, transfers, and so forth, in the armed forces; government works and undertakings, and government works being carried out by contractors. In the first part, part A, appointments, promotions and transfers in the armed forces, it is indicated that the Minister of National Defence thought that appointments, promotions, transfers, and so forth, in the armed forces should be guided by the general army orders then in effect; and he asked members of parliament not to recommend young enthusiastic men for commissions. I have no doubt that every hon. member, from whatever part of the country, has been pressed from time to time to advance the name of somebody for a commission in Canada's armed forces, and I have no doubt that most if not all have yielded to the persuasions which were brought to bear upon them.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It may be, of course, that there are exceptions, but it is a pretty strict member of parliament who will say to the son of his friend, "No, I won't recommend you for a commission." It is human nature to do it, and I think that down in our hearts we shall all admit that most of us have done it. I have done it with the utmost good-will where I thought the young man was deserving; and because I have done that thing, I am taking the onus on myself, and other hon. members can take it on themselves if they will. Because that was the state of affairs I welcomed the issue of this circular letter. In a measure I was sorry it had not been issued before.

Mr. POWER: May I point out to my hon. friend that the section he mentions had been issued in November, and the particular regulation to which he refers—routine order No. 70—had been in existence, so far as I know, since long before the war.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Routine order No. 70 was, of course, in existence, but may I suggest to the hon. gentleman that so far as most of us were concerned it was more observed in the breach than in the performance. This was a perfectly proper circular letter, it must have been issued for a reason, and the reason must have been the pressure which was being brought to bear upon the minister.

Mr. POWER: It was simply a reiteration of what had already been issued by the late Mr. Rogers.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is a reiteration, but the statement itself indicates that it was desirable to avoid political or personal favouritism in the conduct of the war activities, and therefore it was issued at this time, and I am bound to say that it was the first time the matter had come to my attention, because I was not here in October of the previous year. But I am commending the minister for it, not criticizing him for it.

I am not going into the other parts of the circular, except to say that I thought it would be a grand thing if the government would put into force, in every department connected with the war, the policy there enunciated. I made that known to the Prime Minister, and I regret to say that I did not get the response I thought I would get.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What statement is that? My hon. friend wrote me a letter making certain general charges. I asked him if he would make them specific.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I made no charges. I suggested that this circular was a grand thing and that the policy therein enunciated ought to be carried out throughout the various departments of the government. The Prime Minister wrote back and said that if I would give him specific instances of wrongdoing he would have them investigated. Well, life is too short. Whatever I have had of a major character in respect of wrongdoing in connection with government contracts, and the cases have not been many, I have gone to the Minister of National Defence for Air. Recently I told him the story in one specific case, and I am not going to refer to it further. But if that is not cooperation with the government and with the minister I should like to know what it is. I am sure the minister will bear me out.

Mr. POWER: The hon. gentleman told me the story, but I knew it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course the minister knew it. I found that out when I saw him, but I want to know if the action I took at that time was not the correct action to take.

Mr. POWER: Quite.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I want to say to the membership of this house that I have no use for scandal, and I do not want to be mixed up in it. I am not a detective for anybody. But I am being flooded with letters in that regard, and when I find something which I think is of importance I intend to go with it to the appropriate minister. If it were peace time perhaps my attitude would be a little different.

Now with respect to promotions from within the ranks: that, I suggest, is a change of policy, and I am not condemning it, but I should like to know what the minister proposes to do with these young men who, at considerable expense to themselves and to the country, have taken the Canadian officers' training corps course with a view to getting commissions. How are they to be integrated into the service as commissioned officers? Or have they to go into the ranks? Remember that these are university men.

An hon. MEMBER: That does not make them any better.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That does not make them any better, but it does not make them any worse, and they went into this training on the theory that if they took it they would be given commissions. Am I right in that assumption? I suggest to the minister that at some appropriate time he explain the position. I do not want to labour it further.

The Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) recently made a statement in this house, and I am bound to tell him, notwithstanding what he may have said, or thought, or thinks of me, that it was of a most encouraging character. This war is being fought largely in the air, and Canada will make and is making, in my view, a distinct contribution in the air to empire defence and towards winning the war. We began late, but I believe that real progress has been made. What a pity we did not begin two years ago! I suggest that air training in Canada became really effective only when the present minister took over and when he appointed Mr. Duncan as the deputy; and upon that I congratulate him.

Mr. POWER: You just copied that from "Mitch".

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I did not.

Mr. POWER: Try to be original.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have not "copied that from Mitch" at all. I could say something concerning what "Mitch" said about the minister which would be rather flattering to him, and I could mention other things he said about other members of this government which are not so flattering. Does the Minister of National Defence for Air suggest that I should spread on Hansard this speech of Premier Hepburn?

Mr. POWER: Oh, no. I agree with some things in it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I regret I was not in the house when the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) made his speech. I have read it since. It was moderate. I am one of those who think that the Royal Canadian Navy has been doing good work with very limited means and equipment.

According to the minister we are to embark on a shipbuilding plan. It is said that we are to build destroyers and perhaps cruisers. Well, I think we are a little late in starting. It will be a long time before we are able to make any distinct contribution to the winning of the war with Canadian-built naval vessels. It is true that we built some mine sweepers and some coastal vessels, but, aside from assisting in convoys, our contribution has been meagre indeed.

And now shall I read to you what Mr. Hepburn says about it—or shall I leave it to your imagination? No, I do not intend to read it. Hon. gentlemen have all read it and it is none too complimentary.

All Canadians, I believe, will be pleased to learn that the government has decided to reopen the naval college, thereby rectifying a mistake that was made by the government of my right hon. friend almost twenty years ago when they closed the college. We thus deprived our young Canadians who were looking forward to a naval career of having a college in Canada to attend. They had to go abroad. One fine young naval cadet in my own county went to England at the expense of his parents and entered a naval college there. Last spring I had the pleasure of announcing, through the courtesy of the Deputy Minister of Naval Services in this country, that he had in the whole field of cadets won the King's Dirk, but he had to go to England to acquire that honour.

The minister indicated that it was the policy of the government to build in the near future destroyers in Canadian yards. He stated, in my opinion very rightly, that we did not have the necessary experts here, and therefore he had communicated with the authorities in Great Britain to ascertain if they could furnish the necessary experts in naval construction.

I am at a loss to understand how the minister can expect to get these experts from England when one considers that in this great war every shipyard in England is driving at top speed not only in naval construction but also in the building of merchant cargo ships. Furthermore, all the naval guns and necessary armaments would have to be imported from England, and they surely are not procurable now. That is a pity, but I believe I am stating a fact when I say that we cannot hope to get any substantial number of naval experts to come to Canada and help us in this shipbuilding programme. I may be wrong; the minister may have other information; but it would seem to me that these men would not be procurable at this time.

There is another obstacle in the way, which I think it is my duty to point out to the minister, and that is that the cost of naval construction, either in war or in peace time, would be so excessive as compared with construction in the United Kingdom that for economy's sake we ought to consider whether we should not have these ships built in England. This question came up very acutely in the late twenties. The Lady boats were built in England because it was understood and agreed by the government of the day, and by all parties who took any intelligent interest in the matter, that it would cost at least fifty per cent more to build them in Canada. That consideration still obtains. However, I suppose we shall have to consider the question of building steel ships in this country, sooner perhaps than we think. The necessity is there and it may be that even if we have to pay a higher price it would be good national policy to do so.

The minister quite rightly states that Canada ought to have a stronger and more efficient navy. Hence his reason for advocating a policy of construction of destroyers in Canada. I am not an authority on naval matters, neither is the minister, so far as I know. He has to take expert advice. I should like however to quote to him one of the greatest authorities the world has known—the late Admiral Sir John Jellicoe. When Sir John Jellicoe visited Canada in connection with naval matters in 1920, the minimum policy he recommended for Canada was to provide immediately for three light cruisers, six destroyers and four submarines. We have at the present time twelve destroyers, and I am sure the minister will recognize that when he is considering a permanent policy it is not destroyers that we need but light cruisers and submarines and other craft. These light cruisers are armed with four 6-inch guns, anti-aircraft guns and torpedo tubes. We all recall with a thrill of pride that it was three light cruisers of this type that defeated the German pocket battleship Graf Spee last December.

Destroyers are all right for a short distance when escorting convoys, but for proper protection a convoy must be protected by light cruisers; I think that is the experience of this war. Since this war began our convoys have very often been escorted not only by light cruisers but even by battleships.

There is one other matter to which I should like to allude in a discussion of our navy. I am sure we all appreciate the great responsibility that rests upon the shoulders of the minister as well as the director of naval service to see that no officers shall be appointed as destroyer commanders or to other senior posts unless they are fully qualified. To state that is to state a truism. No better naval officers exist in the world than Canadians when properly trained. Our merchant marine men indicate that. But a naval career, according to the best British standards, requires not only graduation from a naval college but long years of training afloat, first as midshipman, then sub-lieutenant and then lieutenant; and many years elapse before anyone can expect to be promoted to the rank of captain.

The late Lord Jellicoe stated, when he was in Canada on his naval mission, that it takes nine years to make a good lieutenant gunner. I realize that when our naval service now have twelve destroyers, they must be sore pressed for officers, more especially for the senior commands, and I have confidence enough in both the minister and his officers to believe that they would not appoint Canadians to important senior commands unless they were fully qualified.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): That is the policy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We all greatly regret the loss of life due to the unfortunate loss by collision of the Canadian destroyers Fraser and Margaree, and I extend my sympathy to all those whose brave relatives have lost their lives. I was wondering, however, and I ask the minister, why the captain of the Fraser, after she was lost, was not given command of the Margaree, which took her place, but, according to press reports, was really demoted and recalled to Canada. There must have been an official investigation. Of course we have had no report on the matter. It was unfortunate also that the Margaree was lost by collision, but I am not insinuating for one moment that the loss of these vessels was due to other than fortuitous circumstances or that there was any inefficiency on the part of our gallant Canadian commanders.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): In order that there may be no misapprehension in the house or in the country, may I say that the captain of the Margaree, Commander Joseph Wilton Roy, had had twenty-four years' service in the navy and served in eleven or twelve ships before taking command of the Margaree. Commander Wallace B. Creery, of the Fraser, had served in fourteen ships and had twenty-six years' naval service behind him. From the point of view of experience both men unquestionably were well qualified to command ships.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have not suggested that there was anything but unfortunate circumstances whereby these ships were lost. I did not know the late Commander Roy, but the house may be interested to know that his wife was, I think, a native of my city; at all events her grandfather lived there and was a distinguished member of the other chamber during his lifetime.

I want to devote a few minutes to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). We heard from him and got a wealth of information with regard to contracts let and commitments made; but we got nothing with respect to production and deliveries. The Prime Minister should tell the house and the country plainly what the attitude of the government is with respect to this important matter. Are we or are we not to have information with respect to production and delivery? It may be that it is not in the public interest that this information should be given; if that is so it ought to be made quite clear to the house and the country, and the reasons given for the refusal.

One further thing, at the risk of returning to a prosaic matter, which the Associate Minister of National Defence called a "slimy" matter—are we to have unit prices? I think the country will demand that. So far as I am concerned, unless I am shown that it is absolutely in the public interest that we should not have unit prices, I shall continue to press for them.

Speaking on a former occasion I requested specifically that parliament be informed as to what results had been attained with respect to production and deliveries, because we held the view, and I believe it is well founded, that it was the deliberate policy of the government, during the past session as well as during the interval since we adjourned in August, to endeavour to create, by general statements of what we are going to do in the future, the impression that all was well with our war effort in the way of production and deliveries. And if there is any doubt of that I will page Mr. Hepburn and see what he says about it. It was our view that the government has sought to lull and soothe the Canadian people into a false sense of security, and continues to do so. We believe that there is a danger behind such a position. Hence the amendment which I have had the honour to move in this house.

Therefore I felt impelled to ask the government that it cause to be set up immediately two select special committees, charged with the responsibility and the duty of investigating and reporting to this house, factually, objectively and truthfully, without bias and without partisanship, what our exact position is to-day (a) with respect to our fighting forces, military, naval and air, and (b) with respect to the production and delivery of all the important materials, equipment and supplies necessary to our war effort, so that the Canadian people might know the truth.

So far, such committees have not been set up. I indicated that I knew there were difficulties, and I would ask the Prime Minister, if he can and will, to tell the house what the attitude of the government is with respect to that. If the difficulties are such as cannot be surmounted then I have another concrete suggestion which I desire to lay before the house and the country. It is, in brief, that the government cause to be set up a select committee on current expenditure defrayed out of moneys provided by parliament for the defence services, for civil defence and for other services directly connected with the war, and instruct such committee to report what, if any, economies consistent with the execution of government policies may be effected therein.

Now, it is all very well to say that we can get all this information on national expenditure through the public accounts committee. Theoretically that is correct. But the information which will be obtained through the public accounts idea will not be on current expenditure. It will relate only to the expenditures that have taken place in the previous year and as covered by the auditor general's report. Practically all the national expenditure for the war effort has taken place since March 31 last —or rather the great bulk of the contracts relating to national expenditure for war effort have been let since March 31, and inquiry before the public accounts committee will not be possible. That committee may examine only such things as are submitted to it. I am impelled to make this request for various reasons, but more particularly because what I suggest has been done in England and, I am advised, with good results.

I hold in my hand a series of reports of a select standing committee of the British parliament which was set up under the authority of an order of reference made on December 12, 1939, while Mr. Chamberlain was still Prime Minister and while there was an official opposition. The order of reference contains this:

> That a select committee be appointed to examine the current expenditure defrayed out of moneys provided by parliament for the defence services, for civil defence and for other services directly connected with the war, and to report what, if any, economies consistent with the execution of the policy decided by the government may be effected therein.

Then it goes on and appoints a committee of twenty-eight members—and not one of them is a member of the government; they are all private members, and so far as I read the list of names, none of them is of international prominence. The committee has the usual power to send for persons, papers and records, and to sit notwithstanding any adjournment of the house, and to adjourn from place to place. It was to be in effect a continuous working committee to examine current expenditures for war purposes having regard to the announced policy of the government. It had the power to appoint subcommittees and to refer to such subcommittees any of the matters within the jurisdiction of the committee. Such subcommittees so appointed were empowered to send for persons, papers and records, to sit notwithstanding any adjournment of the house, and to adjourn from place to place. This select committee has been sitting almost constantly since it was set up. Its first report was made in January, and the last I have was made on August 21, 1940. Any hon. gentleman who peruses this report will see, I am sure, that it is serving a great national purpose—not in opposition to government policy, not to the detriment of government policy, but to assist government policy, and to see what if any economies can be attained by suggestions.

My view is that we ought to have something like that here in Canada. It is a way in which private members could contribute to the war effort. I have heard dozens of members who support the government bewail the fact that they could not do anything to help, and saying that private members ought to be in a position to do something to help.

So far the war effort of the government has been carried out on the line of a closed corporation, so far as members of parliament are concerned. I submit this to the government as a constructive proposal to which they should give some attention. I submit it in the utmost good faith, not by way of criticism but by way of being helpful to the government. We know that war is wasteful; we know there is great waste in this war, though I do not say intentional waste. I do believe, however, that a committee of private members of this house, sitting day in and day out during sessions and between sessions, could perform a very useful function in assisting the government at this time, and I commend this suggestion to hon. members. It will provide an outlet for the energies of the private members who are anxious about the war, who want to make a contribution, who were sent here by their constituents to make that contribution but who find themselves frustrated—yes, that is the word—because they have no outlet for their abilities and their capabilities.

I do hope that the Prime Minister will accept this suggestion, and before I leave the topic may I say to hon. gentlemen who will accept positions on the committee, if it be set up: There is not only a real job to be done, but a job which will tax your capabilities to the utmost. You will have to make substantial sacrifices in serving the state in this way, but it is a patriotic duty which I think some of you ought to perform. I believe a real contribution can be made in this way by private members.

Now I should like to make some little reference to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), and I shall endeavour to keep away from the question of foreign exchange, which has become a major topic to be dealt with at another time.

The Minister of Finance gave an exhaustive discourse on orthodox finance. I have never criticized the principles of the government's war financing, because it was orthodox. I thought it was just what one would expect from the financial mentors of the minister. When I say that my hon. friends to my left can take it from me that I am in agreement with orthodox finance for war purposes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Perhaps I did not have to say that. I have not criticized the principles laid down by the minister, but I have, I hope in a constructive way criticized some of his methods and the taxation proposals contained in the last budget.

Let me say another word about the war loans. The minister has made a substantial denial that the last war loan was not a success, but I do suggest to the house and to the country that the acceptance by the minister of the proposal I made on that occasion, with respect to the next war loan, is a substantial confession that the last war loan was not handled in the right way. I do not wish out of hand to condemn the professional bond and investment dealers. They serve a very useful purpose in connection with war loans. They can get the big subscriptions, but I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, and to hon. members of this house that they cannot get the individual investors interested in these loans. They showed their failure in connection with the last loan; so I think it is plain that the methods of both the professional and the amateur must be used. Therefore I congratulate the minister upon his change of heart in having accepted what I considered to be a constructive suggestion.

I criticized the last budget because of its income tax proposals with respect to individual taxpayers. I said then and I say now that there was no equality of sacrifice there. The well-disposed were unduly taxed, and the tax was thrust upon them with great suddenness and severity. The minister fell into what I considered a curious error when he interpreted my words "the well-disposed" to mean "the well-to-do." In my view the two terms are not synonymous; the well-disposed may not necessarily be the well-to-do. The minister comes from an old evangelical religious body. Has he never heard of the widow's mite? I am sure he has. I use that as an illustration to point out the error into which I think he has fallen.

I do suggest to the minister that there has to be a real effort in connection with these war loans. Now we are confronted with full page advertisements with respect to the war savings certificates. That is good; publicity is necessary and desirable, but we have to do something more. Yesterday I had a letter from a gentleman in the city of Saint John who is in charge of this work in the province of New Brunswick, one of the finest citizens of Canada, who will give voluntarily his service, his time and his private means to help put this over. He deplores the fact that the public has not responded; and that is the case, since we are not getting $2,000,000 a month from this source. Just what is the cure I do not know. There will have to be concerted action. In my own community the gentleman who has charge of this campaign tells me that he is all but throwing up his hands because of the lack of sympathy for this movement, even in that community.

We must do something to ensure the success of this campaign. If we are to attain the objective of $10,000,000 a month in war savings certificates some people will have to bestir themselves. I do beseech the members of this house to take action. Each is a leader of public opinion in his own community; that was indicated by the work done by the members in putting over the national registration. Let every one of us get behind the sale of these war savings certificates, for the honour of our own communities. Let us see if we cannot help the government put this thing over. It is a patriotic duty and one which I think every one of us ought to assume on his own account.

Now I should like to say just a word about the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty), to whose address I listened with a good deal of interest. The impression he left on my mind was that he was flying a kite to labour. He would have labour depart from its present standards for the duration of the war. I do not know what will be the response of labour. I believe it will be a patriotic response, but I think it will have to be made abundantly clear to labour that if it is to give up its present standards it shall be for the duration and for the duration only. Then I am sure labour will respond as it has responded in England.

I have just a word to say with regard to parliament adjourning until February 17. In my view the adjournment will be too long, but the Prime Minister has explained that in the view of the government it is necessary to take this long adjournment. I am glad to know, however, that it is upon the distinct understanding that should certain eventualities materialize, such as were outlined in the Prime Minister's statement of August 3 last, in connection with the motion presented on that day, we will be called together sooner, and with that I am content.

I have been impressed, Mr. Speaker, by the appeal that has been made by private members of this house during the course of this debate, and particularly by members supporting the administration, that more use should be made of private members and of the standing committees of the house. There is, as I gather, a feeling of manifest uneasiness, a sense of frustration at the lack of functioning on the part of parliament itself. Well, I suggest to hon. gentlemen that this is true, and the fault is the government's, because the government has taken authority to do everything parliament used to do. That may be necessary in war time, but I do suggest that to a large degree we have abdicated our functions and that there has been too much delegation of power. There is manifest in the house a will to do on the part of the elected representatives of the people, and a complete failure in performance because of lack of opportunity. The government are carrying on the war effort, as it were, as a closed corporation, and hon. members are not satisfied.

But we of this party shall not falter. We shall, as opportunity offers, cooperate with the government along the general lines indicated when I spoke on November 12, and we shall do our best to get the results so urgently needed.

In passing may I refer to the observations of the hon. member for Victoria B.C. (Mr. Mayhew) who indicated that in his view my rededication of this party to the service of the state at this time was the highlight of my address of three weeks ago. He indicated, however, regret that I myself did not lay down a policy for a war effort. Well, I do not conceive that at this juncture it is my function or within my power to do that. Why do I say this? I say it for the obvious reason that no one can enunciate a policy unless he is briefed with the facts upon which to base a policy. The facts are not accessible to us—in fact they are denied to us.

Having regard to all the statements made by the ministers with regard to the government's war effort, certain things emerge. First, we have been served with reports similar in most respects to the progress reports which we heard last summer. I am bound to repeat that there is not as much propaganda in what we have listened to during these past three weeks as there was in the reports heard last summer, but their general tenor and purport is the same.

The second point which emerges is that there is abundant evidence that the government lacks a real war programme of production. Apparently the government has become seized of that position, because recently, as late as November 16, order in council 6601 was passed, setting up the war-time requirements board, under the chairmanship of an able business executive, Mr. H. R. MacMillan, and with a retinue of departmental officials. The whole success of this war-time requirements board will centre around the chairman. He is to become the "Sir Joseph" of the effort of the government. Whatever may have been said about the other "Sir Joseph", I say that he was the greatest business man of his time in Canada, and that he did wonderful work for the imperial munitions board. Mr. MacMillan is a capable man, and I wish him well.

Let us for a moment analyse the position with respect to this war-time requirements board. Section 2 of the order in council sets out the powers of the board, and I submit to the Prime Minister that they are entirely inadequate if the board is to do the maximum work it ought to do under this authority. Subsection (a) of that section provides for the securing of information; (b) provides for the coordination and analysis of such information; (c) provides for the formulation of such plans as may be necessary to ensure that war needs in order of importance shall have priority over all other needs. That is all to the good. There must be someone to say what shall have priority. Then, subsection (d) provides that the Department of Munitions and Supply and the controllers and divisions thereof, and any other departments of the government shall be kept informed by the war-time requirements board upon the matters previously referred to, such as production, the use of materials, manufacturing plants and facilities, transportation facilities, and the obtaining of statements of prospective needs of the fighting services.

The criticism I make—and it is a constructive criticism—is that the board has not sufficient power, and that everything must be referred back to the Minister of Munitions and Supply, who still keeps control. I am serious in that criticism. That, I believe, is the weakness of the board. I am certain, however, that if he finds his efforts under the order in council thwarted by the lack of power, the chairman will apply for additional powers and get them, or know the reason why.

Looking over the whole picture it is quite apparent that in six months time the attitude of the government has undergone a marked change in outlook. In May last the government had assumed a complacent attitude. That was certainly the feeling in the country and in the house; and if hon. members do not believe me I suggest that they go back and read the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) in moving the address in reply at that time.

Then came the tragic trend of events in May and late June, the invasion of Norway, the fall of the low countries, and finally the fall of France and the epic of Dunkirk. Then, shocked by all this, we witnessed a series of hasty improvisations. What was the mobilization act? It was a hasty improvisation to ward off an attack on the government's war effort—or lack of effort. But the declarations at that time gave no possible evidence of a real war programme, and down to date we have not been told of a definite war programme. It is true that the staff officers have evolved a plan for the defence of Canada, whatever it is—but we are not told what it is. I do not think we shall be.

We are told by the Prime Minister that during all the years that he attended imperial conferences it was laid down as a fundamental that the dominions were to take care of home defence. I can well believe that, because neither he nor anyone in his entourage at that time would ever consider doing anything else, and never at any time admitted any obligation to the principle of empire defence. Since the war all these preconceived ideas have gone by the board, and to-day, fifteen months after war started, the government is giving support to the theory of empire defence, notwithstanding what some of its supporters are saying in the country.

The difference between the Prime Minister and myself is that I want Canada to go ahead on a well-defined war effort, based upon our willingness and capabilities, and in conformity with empire requirements in the theatre of war, while he pursued, up to a certain point, a course based on a theory of providing for our own defence first—in Canada. I am glad to think that force of public criticism and the tragic trend of events has, to a degree, reversed the situation. This, to me, is satisfactory, so far as it goes.

I have been told, and it stands to reason, that the greatest effort of a country situated as Canada is—an acknowledged belligerent—should be based on the theory that we should contribute to the utmost toward the winning of the war in the actual theatre of war—not here in Canada three thousand miles removed from the actual theatre of war, where our only effort would be required to repel invasion, and then only after the battle had been lost overseas.

That is the advice that was given to the Prime Minister by a great soldier in Canada. I am pleased to think that in some degree the Prime Minister has come around to that way of thinking. In so far as he has done so he is, I think, to be commended.

I shall detain the house only a moment longer to say that I was disturbed by the Prime Minister's speech of yesterday. I do not believe he did justice to himself, and certainly he did less than justice to me. On Thursday last I spoke about my impressions with regard to the war situation. I spoke about the seriousness of that situation and, knowing of the Prime Minister's greater knowledge of what was taking place, I asked him to give the house a review of the position. At that time, in addition to stressing the seriousness of the situation, I asked him to indicate what, if anything, Canada could do at this juncture toward giving further aid and assistance, whether by way of men, materials, supplies or equipment.

On that occasion the Prime Minister stated he had had in mind making a statement to the house respecting the situation. He said, among other things:

> I agree with my hon. friend in his view that the situation is a serious one. I think anyone reading the press would gather that opinion. I would also say that such information as the government itself is receiving the press would appear to be reflecting accurately. Any statement that I may have to make will be practically in accord with what has already appeared in the press.

I was happy at that reply. I thought it was an honest, spontaneous reply. I thought our minds were running in the same channel. But yesterday! What are we to think of the right-about-face of yesterday, the straight contradiction of the spontaneously expressed views of last Thursday? Mr. Speaker, no wonder I have at times a feeling of frustration at such an exhibition. Which is Doctor Jekyll and which is Mr. Hyde? No wonder the country is perplexed. Nevertheless, let us go on. Let us do the best we can for king and country.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not interrupt the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) during his address, although I must say that at times the relevancy of his remarks was rather slender as far as the subamendment is concerned. I just want to point out that there are rules to be observed in the house. I realize that in these war days perhaps the rules may be relaxed a little, but I ask hon. members to remember that my duty is to see that the rules are observed. Therefore, I wish hon. members would observe them more closely.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I shall endeavour to keep my remarks more closely to the subamendment than the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) kept his, but may I suggest respectfully that all members of this house are entitled to precisely the same treatment. The treatment accorded to one member of the house ought to be accorded generally to all members who speak thereafter. I make this suggestion with all due deference to you, Mr. Speaker.

The subamendment reads:

> And this house further regrets the failure of the government to adopt a monetary policy that would permit a maximum war effort without either increasing debt or reducing the standards of living below that necessary for maintaining maximum efficiency.

It expresses dissatisfaction with the present system and a desire for the reform of that system. We of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation agree with those objectives, although we contend that the subamendment touches only the fringe of this great economic problem.

Last week the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) said that during this debate no member of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation had expressed any disagreement in principle with the government's financial policy. However, we have done exactly that in previous debates. For example, on September 9, 1939, I said:

> We should not inflict on the generation that follows us the cost of another great war. And we must not permit an increase in the already almost intolerable burden of national and other public debt. We believe that there are untouched financial resources which the government may still tap, or resources that have been only partly tapped as yet.

Again on June 28, 1940, I criticized the budget proposals and suggested certain alternative methods by which the government might raise revenue for our war effort. It is because we recognize the need for a more progressive approach to the problem of war production and war financing that we support the amendment calling for a reformed monetary system. We believe that our financial system ought to be considered as the accountancy system of our economic life. We feel that if we produce goods and services, the money should be available to distribute and encourage their flow.

Miss Dorothy Thompson is a bitter but well-informed critic of the nazi and fascist regimes, and I have no hesitation in quoting her, nor do I expect to be misunderstood when I do so. She said:

> The Germans did not vote themselves four billion money units for defence. They voted —had voted for them—thirty thousand planes, so and so many guns, so and so many thousand tons of reserves of oil and raw materials. The German economy is an economy of things and men; the allied economy is an economy of symbols: money. The German economy recognizes that all wealth is in goods, particularly in capital goods, and that these are not created by money, which is only the medium of exchange, but by the application of labour to materials. The allies had money, but failed to produce goods. The Germans had no money, but did produce them.

I submit that by those words Miss Thompson clearly placed before the people of the allied countries a fundamental economic truth which the German regime has prostituted for a diabolical purpose, just as the devil can quote scripture when it serves his needs. Although we may dislike the prostitution of that fundamental economic truth, yet in these days when we are considering the expenditure of large sums of money we ought to pay some attention to methods other than those we have been using to finance our war effort.

The truth is that all material wealth results from the application of labour to material things. Once we realize that, the path to a better and brighter economic system will become more clear to us all. As long as we have men and materials we ought to be able to devise a monetary system which will facilitate the flow of goods and services into the channels into which we desire them to flow.

I have the New Zealand Hansard on my desk and I should like to turn to a speech made by the minister of finance of that country, Hon. Walter Nash, on June 27, 1940. As reported on page 307, he had this to say regarding the monetary and financial policies of that country:

Provision for loan contribution by large investors will be made by the issue of loans with a currency of ten years or more in respect of which government stock will be issued in the usual manner. In the circumstances the government consider that these loans should be regarded as contributions to the war effort from the material assets of those with property and should accordingly be free of interest for a period of three years or until twelve months after the conclusion of the war, and thereafter for ten years at a rate of interest not exceeding 2½ per cent. In this way the government proposes to raise within New Zealand not only the money required to be expended in this country, but also some portion of the amount necessary to meet expenditure abroad, thus relieving, so far as is possible, the drain upon the resources of the British government.

Mr. Nash then outlined his proposals for a compulsory loan from those with large accumulations of wealth, and the necessary legislation was subsequently adopted by the New Zealand house of representatives.

Last week the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) suggested a policy which will place a heavy burden upon labour. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that equality of sacrifice demands that a policy such as that outlined by the New Zealand minister of finance should be instituted here, and for the same reasons—to assist our own war effort and to help Great Britain in her economic and financial extremity.

Yesterday this was brought forcibly to our attention by the proposals that were made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and which we shall have the opportunity of discussing later this week. But, holding the views which I have presented, I submit it is incorrect to say that we agree in principle with the government's financial policy. We are indeed in sharp disagreement with it. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in this house and throughout the country have stood for a different system.

Recently Mr. Herbert Morrison, Home Secretary in the British government, in the course of a speech in which he suggested—incidentally—definite war aims, as well as foreshadowed a new monetary and economic system, made this significant statement:

If we are fighting only to end the nazi threat to our future, if we have no aim but to get back to pre-nazi Europe, we are chasing a will o' the wisp, and we shall fall into the mire. The roots of nazism are not all to be found in the original sin of the Prussian temperament: the roots of war lie deep in our present ways of living, and we have the chance now to dig some of them out. Upheavals and landslides there will be.

And, if I may interject this thought in connection with the subamendment, one of these landslides will be against the present financial and economic system, sweeping it away and laboriously establishing order out of chaos, unless we at this time, when we have the opportunity, prepare now during the war to lay the foundations of a better and saner economic, financial and social order than we have known in the days that have gone by.

Mr. Morrison then went on to say this:

To-day, necessary measures to control our economic system in the interests of the community, and in the urgent cause of winning the war, are being resisted and attacked in the name of freedom. We need to be on our guard, evening and morning, against this prostitution of a fine word. The freedom of private business is often another name for economic anarchy, which has always led to war—and always will.

May I point out that, while Mr. Morrison was speaking of economic aims, nevertheless, as a member of the British government he was not unwilling to place before the people of Great Britain some aims which can be interpreted as war and peace aims. He went on to say:

While we must be ready to surrender a measure of national sovereignty, we must maintain the cultural freedom of nations and a proper measure of independence in their political life. We must cling to an ideal of government, whatever its actual form, as something which exists to serve peoples and not to dominate them.

Does our present financial system serve the people or does it to-day dominate the people? That is the question, it seems to me, which is involved in the subamendment.

And we must remember that this is no mere internal question, since the governments that dominate at home are often the peacebreakers abroad.

Next, the nations must come together and tackle international economic problems, including the problem of colonial possessions, on international lines, even if this means the limitation of national sovereignty.

Then we must organize the industry, trade, commerce and raw materials of the world with the idea not of bolstering up the special privileges of any class or group, but of achieving a higher standard of life for all.

May I say that in my opinion that, too, is involved in the subject matter of the subamendment.

Next, we must insist upon achieving international control of arms manufacture and armed forces, once again giving up some of the old ideas of national sovereignty in order to bring that about.

Lastly—

He went on to say:

—the nations—victors, vanquished and neutrals alike—must agree that none will seek to be judge in its own cause. That each will submit its grievances and its quarrels to impartial judgment, and will abide by the outcome.

On that basis, Mr. Speaker, the British people have been rallied in support of a great cause. Some of us in the past looked with a good deal of apprehension to the war which was then coming, because in those days we had little faith in those who were associating themselves too closely with the dictator in Spain and with dictators elsewhere with whom they wished to make some kind of agreement. We should always keep in mind that our aims must include that every man shall secure the right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness; that he shall not be falsely imprisoned in gaols or in concentration camps; that he shall not be enslaved nor shall he be exploited to the profit of any of his fellows; and that he shall be free always and everywhere to think, to speak and to worship as he will. And may I say that these words are a summary of what Mr. Morrison went on to say. He is one of the men who to-day is inspiring confidence not only in the common people of Great Britain but in the common people of Canada and lovers of democracy all across the world.

I only wish that in our own country we could hear the same kind of challenging economic, social and political aims put forward by our leaders at this time. If we heard them, I am convinced that there would be very little trouble about arousing the Canadian people to the necessity of bringing this war to a successful conclusion. But, on the contrary, those of us who hold these views in common with men like Herbert Morrison and Ernest Bevin, are derided and accused of giving allegiance to something our critics call state socialism.

We believe in more liberty not less liberty, in more personal property privately owned and enjoyed but not in public property privately owned and used for the exploitation of the Canadian people. To right the wrong is the aim of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, and it is one of the aims of the group sitting immediately to my left and embodied in the subamendment that is before us this afternoon. The British workers are prepared to follow their leaders, who have fought for their rights to organize and who have secured those rights for them in former days.

Although I usually dislike quoting at any length, I want to give one more quotation which I think has a direct bearing on the subject I am discussing. Mr. Henry L. Stimson, Secretary of War for the United States, in a speech at New Orleans on November 18, said:

Under the leadership of Ernest Bevin and Herbert Morrison, English workers to-day are producing as men have never produced before, and by their labour they are turning their island home into an unconquerable citadel of freedom. With the enemy's bombs literally dropping about them as they work, they are turning out more and more of the instruments of defence. This unconquerable effort has been made under the leadership of labour itself, which to-day is the backbone of the British fight for freedom.

Yet the political faith of Bevin and Morrison is under continuous fire in this house at the present time. In Canada factories are idle and men are unemployed because this nation is trying to wage war under the baneful influence of private enterprise with the profit motive at the root of its endeavours. This debate has revealed that there is not as much basis for the statement I heard from England the other evening from Air Marshal Joubert as I should like to think there might be. The Air Marshal was lauding Canada's war effort and saying that soon there would flow to Britain vast quantities of supplies from the war industries of this country. But this debate has shown that little or nothing is being done to prepare thousands of idle workers for the day when our industrial life is organized, as it must be organized in the near future, for the task that lies ahead.

An estimate was made a few days ago that in addition to all the money that we require to raise, we shall require something over 200,000 new workers in industry in the course of the next few months. So far, however, we have scarcely done anything to train these workers for the work they will have to undertake. I do not agree with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that people who can milk can tend a machine. They require training to tend the complicated machines of our complex industrial life. The Minister of Labour quoted resolutions from labour organizations expressing their willingness to forego some of their basic rights. Let me say to the minister and to the government that if the working people of Canada are to be asked to forego some of their hard-won rights and privileges, then we must ask the owners of industry and the controllers of finance to share equally by the sacrifice of their privileges also. There is a growing feeling that this is not being done.

The defence of Canada regulations are being used to prevent labour from exercising the basic right to organize. We saw an example of that recently in connection with the difficulties at the Chrysler plant. Mr. Herbert Morrison declared that no man shall be falsely imprisoned in gaols or in concentration camps and that justice shall not be denied him or delayed. Yet in Canada there are many men who, although they may be guilty of having been members of subversive organizations at some time, nevertheless have the right, surely, to be tried—a right now long delayed—and to know what the charges are against them. Under the defence of Canada regulations justice, although not denied, is indeed delayed, because men are not getting an early opportunity to make their plea against the accusations which caused their detention. In this war for democratic institutions that right ought to be kept inviolable. Every man should have that right within the British commonwealth. We are not looking in the right places for the subversive influences. The arrest of humble members of society who make stupid remarks has been played up, and members of organizations now outlawed have been arrested only because they were associated with those organizations. Sometimes, not recently but several years ago.

This brings me to a matter which is allied both to the question of our own financial obligations and to the democracy for which we wish to use our financial institutions. It is a matter which in my opinion parliament must consider and consider carefully. In my speech at the beginning of the session I made some references to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the resignation of Mr. Alan Plaunt from the board of governors, and I requested that a parliamentary committee be set up to investigate the serious charges made by the retiring governor. I felt certain that the government would facilitate the establishment of such a committee in view of Mr. Plaunt's long experience with publicly owned radio in Canada and the evident seriousness of the grounds for his resignation.

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is a public institution directly responsible to this parliament and not to the minister who may speak for it in this house. It is, therefore, a responsibility not of the ministry but of parliament itself. As I said in my earlier speech, radio is an important feature of modern life; through it, great good or evil can be done. I would emphasize that this is particularly true during a modern war and is a potent reason why we should maintain public confidence in this great and important publicly owned institution.

As yet no answer has been given regarding the appointment of a parliamentary committee. That being the situation, I think it is not unfair for me to assume that the government is prepared to allow the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to continue its present policies and management without any immediate parliamentary investigation. As members of this house we have not only the right but the duty to inquire into the serious charges made by Mr. Plaunt. Are they well founded or are they not?

Last week the board of governors met and passed resolutions expressing confidence in the general manager. But it is significant that they did not say a word to meet the charges—and I use the word "charges" advisedly—that have been made publicly in the press and recited in the House of Commons. On the other hand Mr. Plaunt repeated his charges and emphasized them in a statement to the press after the board's resolutions were published. He says that, by failing to face the situation, the board was—I quote him—"condoning very serious internal conditions and irregularities as well as certain policies which are indefensibly partisan and harmful." Again may I say that Mr. Plaunt is a highy educated man, a graduate of both Canadian and British universities, and when he uses the word "irregularities" I submit that the use of that word is sufficient to warrant a parliamentary inquiry into the irregularity or irregularities alleged.

Moreover—and this is of the utmost importance—he reiterates his readiness to substantiate fully before a parliamentary committee the grounds for his resignation. In the face of these charges the board's expression of confidence in the management cannot be accepted in place of a parliamentary inquiry. Mr. Plaunt's charges are in part directed against the corporation itself. Had the board been willing to take the necessary action, presumably Mr. Plaunt would not have resigned. In the public interest and in the interest of our democracy as well as of this great public service, it is therefore necessary to speak both plainly and bluntly in this matter.

Since the outbreak of war two important resignations have occurred from the staff of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, for reasons, so I am informed, which dovetail with the charges made by Mr. Plaunt. One of these resignations occurred shortly after the outbreak of war, and concerned a young Canadian who is well known to many hon. members. I refer, of course, to Mr. E. A. Pickering who had for some years been attached to the Prime Minister's office and had won a reputation for both his ability and, I presume, his loyalty. Mr. Pickering joined the corporation in the fall of 1938, and for the latter part of his one-year service held the position of assistant to the general manager. Yet, after less than one year's work with the latter gentleman, Mr. Pickering resigned, I am reliably informed because of unsatisfactory internal conditions and unsound practices. We have a right to know what those unsound practices were.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has referred to Mr. Pickering's association with myself for a time in my office. From that it might be inferred by some that it was through this association in some way and with my knowledge that he obtained a position with the broadcasting corporation. I do not say that anyone is insinuating that, but I should like to make it perfectly clear to the house, and I am glad to have this opportunity to do so, that I was not aware of Mr. Pickering having secured any appointment with the broadcasting corporation until I read it in the papers. That was several weeks, or months, after he had resigned from his position in my office on the score of ill health. I just want to make that plain.

Mr. COLDWELL: I wish to thank the Prime Minister. I had no intention of making any such insinuation. The reason why I mentioned Mr. Pickering's association with the Prime Minister's office was that I thought it to be an indication both of his ability and of his integrity.

In view of the situation that has arisen in the corporation, Mr. Pickering should be invited to appear before a parliamentary committee and explain what unsatisfactory conditions and unsound practices caused him to tender his resignation.

Last week the resignation of Mr. G. W. Buchanan, son of a most respected western senator, was announced. Since before the outbreak of war Mr. Buchanan had been director of public affairs broadcasts, and had been employed in important posts with the corporation since the beginning of 1937. To the press Mr. Buchanan stated that his resignation was caused by "a lack of organization and clear definition of policies relating to war-time needs."

I understand that Mr. Buchanan's letter of resignation goes into the matter fully, and also cites a number of examples, which show a complete absence, in the present management, of any liberalism or sense of democratic objectives for which we are fighting in this war. In fact it would seem that, at times, personal considerations rather than the public interest have influenced the choice of programmes and speakers.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the hon. gentleman permit me? Does he intimate in any way that there has been any malfeasance in office on the part of the management, or is it just a difference of policy? I would like him to elucidate that.

Mr. COLDWELL: I would say that the terms used, "irregularities" and "unsound practices" cover a much wider field than simply differences as to policy. Since those terms are used, I submit that it is the duty of this house to find out exactly what they mean, and that we should do so by way of a committee.

I was proceeding to say that some of the war programmes initiated by the corporation itself since the outbreak of war have done this country no good. Hon. members will recall, for example, the broadcasts by Mr. George McCullagh and the circumstances attending them. They will also remember, perhaps, a series called "Over the Top," which I am reliably informed was stopped through the intervention of the government itself.

We have had some excellent war series, but upon inquiry I have learned, or at least have been told, that all of them originated in the office of public information, or in one of our own government institutions or departments. A parliamentary committee could place the responsibility where it belongs.

I come now to a matter of equally grave importance. In the November 23 issue of Le Jour, a newspaper published in Montreal in the French language, which I read with some difficulty, there was a long article, which I had translated for me afterwards, signed by the editor and dealing in part with the behaviour of the Montreal management of French network of the broadcasting corporation towards Jules Romains, one of the greatest living figures in French literature. I propose to place the following extracts from the article—a translation of course—on Hansard:

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, too, thought it prudent to forbid any political speech by the author (Romains) over its network. He was told that he would be welcome at CBF—

That is the French language broadcasting station.

—if he would confine himself to a literary subject. Naturally the offer was declined. Romains had broadcast more than once from American stations. These broadcasts had been relayed to Canada. They were, perhaps, the finest and most useful talks, from the viewpoint of our war aims, that we had heard in Canada. Why then did Romains, once here, become for these scrupulous CBC officials, a scapegoat and a pariah? We know—and we will prove it at the proper time and place—that there are, in the higher reaches of the information and radio services, men who not only have always been and still are the enemies of the democratic ideals for which thousands of our men are shedding their blood, but who, while hypocritically praising—because it is the duty of their office—the acts of our allies would in no way be displeased by a British defeat and a nazi-fascist victory.

I am quoting, of course.

We know the company these people keep, and in those circles it is quite the correct thing to do to vilify England and to judge with philosophical calm—and even with sympathy—Germany and Italy. And yet, these are the men who are paid to mold public opinion, to steer hatred into the proper channels, to create enthusiasm, in brief, to save us! We are indeed in good hands! It is by having acted in this way, it is by having harboured in their midst saboteurs and traitors, that certain European countries, including France, are to-day humiliated and enslaved.

I deeply regret to have to unveil this shameful situation. I do it because it is my duty and I hope that the government at Ottawa, before whom I place these facts, will be wise enough to open its eyes and to act.

These are most serious charges. Mr. Jean-Charles Harvey, the author of this article, states that he is prepared, at the proper time and place, to prove these charges. There is only one proper place, Mr. Speaker, and only one proper time. That place is before this parliament, or a committee of this parliament, and the time surely is at the earliest opportunity. Therefore I submit that the statements by Mr. Plaunt, the grave charges made by Le Jour, and the reasons given for the resignations of Mr. Pickering and Mr. Buchanan surely demand a complete investigation into this important public service, which we must protect, as a public service, from destruction before it is too late.

Why is the government silent on the matter? No reference was made to the corporation in the speech of the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) in this house. Why does the board of governors remain ready to allow such a condition to continue? This is a great public service, and to my mind it is dangerous to rely almost wholly upon a chairman who is the head of a St. James street trust and a vice-chairman who is a key figure in the Canadian movie industry, which in a sense is a competing industry and which, largely under the guidance of this same vice-chairman, has become one of our great Canadian monopolies. Is this another example of big business controlling what has been called by a United States author the "opinion industries?" I repeat that conditions in the broadcasting corporation, our experience since the outbreak of war and the incidents to which I have referred demand a complete parliamentary inquiry into the whole matter, and I am taking this opportunity of again asking for such an inquiry, or an assurance by the Prime Minister that it will be undertaken when the house reconvenes in February.

There are other matters to which I should have liked to refer, but I see that Mr. Speaker is warning me that my time has expired, and I do not wish to trespass further on the time of the house.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I am sure hon. members must remember quite well what happened last August, when the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) suggested that we should not prorogue but that, instead, the house should sit for an indefinite period of time. I believe the views of a majority of hon. members were not those expressed by the leader of the opposition, who leads—I wonder whether that is the proper word—just a small handful of members of parliament. His idea was that the house should be adjourned to some later date, in order that we might be able to meet in case of an emergency. Strangely enough, the date on which we met again was November 5, not the date of the invasion of England by Hitler but the date of the presidential election in the United States, an altogether different matter. The house met and parliament was prorogued; two days later this session was begun and this debate has continued since that time.

I wish to offer my most sincere congratulations to those members of parliament, whose number is growing every day, who have shown their independence of thought in offering constructive criticism. For many years I have done that, in language that was not always flowery but nevertheless was always sincere. At times, sir, I have been treated like a black sheep because I spoke my mind, but I felt vindicated when I heard or read the fine speeches made by some of my colleagues this session. Members of parliament realize their responsibilities, which are heavy, and I am glad to say that our constituents realize them also. I am amazed that a small number of cabinet ministers should think this is their own war and their own business, and that they can lord it over us. It is time they realized that it is our war, the war of all of us; our business, the business of all of us; our money, the money of all of us; and our future, the future of all of us.

In saying that, I am not at all advocating a union government, nor is it my idea that the leader of the opposition alone should be taken into the confidence of the government. I believe that when matters of importance are to be decided by the government, all members should be taken into their confidence. We are here as representatives of the people, with whom we keep in touch. Every week-end since the beginning of this session I have returned home to meet and talk with my constituents, and I am prouder of them than ever. I feel refreshed when I go home; in fact, if I had not spent my week-ends at Rivière du Loup I could not have stayed in Ottawa for so long this session.

But, sir, at times each of us has occasion to meet a man on the street. We talk to him and, what is more important, we listen to him. I say that because no member of parliament will learn the views of his people if he proceeds to give a lecture. He must ask questions. He must listen, and must remember what has been said to him. When the poorest man in a constituency pays any member of parliament the honour of calling on him, and when that person opens his heart to show confidence in his representative, and tell him secrets he would not tell his neighbour, that member may well be proud of his position as a member of parliament.

When we assemble in this chamber we have the duty not to forget what we are told by those who have honoured us by permitting us to represent them. I want to remember what I have been told by them. There is not a member in this house who does not wish and expect—and the sooner the better—the complete defeat of Hitler and Mussolini, and all of those who would try to impose their will on the democratic nations, and cause them to disappear as such.

There are few of us who are in the army. It is our duty to see that a real war is waged against those whom, by passing two orders in council last year, this government has declared our enemies. They are the enemies of all of us, and we must win over them. The winning of this war is essential to the welfare and to the future of all democracies.

I am reminded of what Marshal Foch said in my presence at the Chateau Frontenac in Quebec, when he was received after the last war as the victor over the hordes he had defeated. His words were: "War is common sense." As we shall all be affected either favourably or unfavourably by the results of this war, it is our duty to give all possible assistance to the government, and to tell them we are one in our desire to help to win.

But I wonder whether flattery is a real help. I do not think it is. When one is driving a car along a dangerous highway and he sees his friend raise his hand, and hears him say, "Do not go farther," that person must not conclude that his friend has become unfriendly simply because of his action in giving warning of a danger. The natural thing to do is to stop and to take heed of the advice given. One may ask, "Why have I been stopped?" And the answer might be, "There is a precipice at the end of this road, and if you proceed two hundred yards farther you may fall over it."

With this in mind, I say that there is nothing hostile in the action of a member of parliament who warns the government against any dangerous policy. One of the worst policies we could follow would be that of thinking that we are to come here simply to listen to everything that is said, and observe "de Conrart le silence prudent"—"Conrart's prudent silence." At times we have something of praise to say; at other times we may have blame to place. But so long as a man is sincere, no person must expect him to become a slave, or to be ready to swallow everything decided by persons outside the government who have no right to speak on behalf of the people of Canada.

We are facing a long, hard war. Everybody is agreed on that. We shall not win it by shutting our mouths and being yes-men. Members of parliament should be consulted, and sooner or later the government would have to make up its mind about it. Matters of great importance and vital to all of us are decided by a handful of anonymous outsiders who believe that they are high above criticism. The man who enters politics or public life, even from the back-door, has no right, whenever it suits him, to retire under the shelter of his private life so as to escape criticism. To give the reason that it is ungentlemanly to criticize the actions of the experts whose advice is blindly followed by the government is ridiculous. As members of parliament we are all exposed to such attacks. When they are unfair we are at liberty to justify ourselves. If one is afraid of them, then there is only one thing for him to do, and that is to stay at home.

In these days we hear a good deal about Westminster. Let us follow what is being done at Westminster. We should act as they do there, so far as parliamentary practice and procedure are concerned. The rules of that house are not numerous, but the practice has been established by traditions stretching back hundreds of years—traditions of freedom, traditions of liberty, traditions of real democracy—and the parliament at Westminster should be our guiding star in our deliberations. Otherwise we might forget that we are a British dominion. Anyone who might visit the English parliament would see that men have an opportunity to discuss questions vital not only to Great Britain but to the whole of the British empire. They do so freely. They are not afraid to speak, nor do they use the language of sissies. They talk like men, and man to man. The atmosphere of Westminster is not that of a pink-tea room but that of the oldest parliament in the world, one in which the members show that they are men, that they are worthy of the confidence placed in them.

I can tell you, sir, that I am true to the traditions of my province, true to the traditions of my family and true to the traditions of the illustrious grandfather of my chief when I make these statements. I have always been ready to defend my party. I have always believed that one should be loyal to his party, and I have tried to show fidelity to mine at all times. I have shown fidelity when the whole party was ready to vote for Bennett. I was alone in voting against him. I have shown fidelity to the party when everyone on our side had a long face after hearing two speeches by the Hon. H. H. Stevens about unemployment. I ask hon. members to refer to what he did and said about it during the time when Mr. Bennett was leader of the opposition, when he was Prime Minister and after the great good-bye. He disappeared and we did not see him round the house any more for a whole week.

The same with the former leader of the opposition. I can remember when he sat with dear old Ned Ryckman during the time our party was in power in 1928. Between the taking of two votes Mr. Manion tried to make a surprise attack on this government, and I answered him. My first word was that this was the first time in my life that I had noticed the effervescence of a cerebral seidlitz. Some hon. members were laughing, but I was defending my own party. That happened before dinner, and after dinner the whip came to me with a five o'clock edition of one of our Ottawa contemporaries and showed me the report of a speech which had been delivered by Sir Robert Borden the same day. He told me to use it because the first part of that speech was directed against the prospective Tory leader in the house.

There were times when we were fighting for the party, fighting against R. B. Bennett, the man who was defying God and man, and was just as scarlet as that thing under the beak of a turkey. I told our lamented friend, Mr. Rogers, to give me a chance to fix him. I told him a few things which were quite right, judging by the way in which they were received by members of the party. Then he sat down. It was said that that was a wicked way to deal with the former Prime Minister. And he was still red.

Every time the party has been in trouble the member for Témiscouata has defended it because he expected at all times that the party would promote views which would be in the interests of the people of the country. This was done for a long time. This was done until 1930, the golden age of the Liberal party. You, Mr. Speaker, were a member of the house at that time, and you will recall the great days until Bennett came to power. Then what happened? Bennett had the opportunity to show how good he was as Prime Minister of Canada, but look at the type of men he picked for high positions in the government service! He picked pygmies from the United States and from all round the country. When Mr. Bennett was Prime Minister, they never knew what was going to happen the day after; but when this government came into power, it was decided that they were experts, that they were gifted with the faculty of being mind-readers and so on. It is deplorable to think that such importance is given to men who are not in contact with the Canadian people. There are many of these men in the service, particularly in the Department of Finance.

I have listened to my hon. friends to my extreme right and I appreciate the fine optimism they show in the subamendment. But that optimism is preceded by pessimism. The subamendment reads:

> And this house further regrets the failure of the government to adopt a monetary policy—

Here comes the optimism.

> —that would permit a maximum war effort without either increasing debt or reducing the standards of living below that necessary for maintaining maximum efficiency.

It has never been clear in my mind just what they wish to promote. When I have asked them they have answered that I did not understand a word of what they were saying. Of course, I am simply a man on the street, I am not an expert in these great problems of finance. Then they asked something with which I cannot agree absolutely:

Furthermore this house is of the opinion that a continuation of the present financial policy will further destroy the precious liberties so essential to, and recognized as being inherent in a true democracy.

I cannot say that I agree entirely with that. There is, however, something which we can discuss together and with regard to which we can arrive at a certain understanding. In my opinion the worst possible policy to adopt in connection with financial matters in this country is that of contraction. If a man attempted to live on a diet of vinegar and lemons, he would be finished in no time, because those articles of food would have the effect of contracting his stomach so that it would be impossible for him to eat anything else. One of the absurdities regarding trade which were advanced by R. B. Bennett was that trade should be one-sided, that we should have no imports but should just export to other countries. He did not consider invisible exports in connection with the tourist traffic and so on. This was a great mistake, and I am afraid that the experts of the Department of Finance may induce this government to follow that practice. Most of these men were Bennett appointees and therefore they are dangerous men. They were advisers of Bennett, and I think this government should take their advice with at least a grain of salt.

For five years we had as Minister of Finance a man who had absolutely no legal training or understanding. He never knew the rules of the House of Commons, and he was inclined to follow the same dangerous course as had been followed by Mr. Bennett, and listen to men who were not qualified to occupy the high positions they hold in the Bank of Canada and the Department of Finance. They were his advisers—men who were cranks. I remember very well that one day I was interrupted by the then Minister of Finance, who took the advice of a man who was then and is still incompetent, in the Department of Finance, and he is one of a great many lords of this country whose advice is followed by the government. He has one of the highest salaries paid in the civil service. Another one, who receives $30,000 a year, says to all the poor fellows who have no money, "Tighten your belts; practise economy." And he receives $30,000, enough to sustain sixty families during this hard winter. Those are the people we are expected to listen to. They are the experts, they are the great men, they are the Melchizedeks. Well, that is enough.

We are told that it is not gentlemanly for us to say that these men are not qualified to be considered experts in this country. I strongly protest, Mr. Speaker. They should be fired, all of them, and replaced by men having sound minds and good common sense.

We find the same conditions in other departments. Men come from outside and are deemed to be experts. So long as they have not been elected by the people they are great men. One of the ministers, who I presume is now the guest of the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett at Juniper Hill, Surrey, told us that we were not to indulge in favoritism or in patronage. Let us look at the directors and officials of Barclay's bank, the bank of which he was a director, who are now in the Department of National Defence. There is Magee, there is Fraser, and how many more. When these things are done by the department, it is all right, but when a request is supported by members—"nix.". What hypocrisy it is to tell us that there will be no politics in these matters, and yet all these barons of finance are coming here to take possession of Ottawa! We shall never stand for it. I am all against this kind of thing. If these men want to have anything to do with public business, they should run as candidates in a constituency, or be appointed to some vacancies in the senate, or be made deputy ministers.

To-day we have a czar of labour. We have also a czar of steel. Besides that, orders in council during the recess are substituted for the statutes of parliament, because the government has followed the absurd proposal of the leader of the opposition. It is not the usual statute book which we are supposed to receive, it is orders in council passed during the adjournment which are the laws of the land, and I would not be astonished if such orders in council are still being passed while this parliament is in session and while we have been discussing and listening to commencement exercises.

Well, sir, I hope we shall soon come back to the good old system of responsible government. We hear at times from ministers that they have assumed a great responsibility—that they have decided this or not done that, and by so doing have assumed a great responsibility. Of course it is the duty of members of the government while in office to make certain definite decisions regarding the matters which are brought before them; they have to decide what to do. But they do not assume thereby any extraordinary responsibility; they are there to discharge those functions, and whether they do the right thing or not is a matter for the House of Commons to decide.

Ministerial responsibility is the rendering of accounts for every cent which is spent by the government. That is ministerial responsibility, it is understood by all of us, and it was well expounded by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), who made one of the most magnificent speeches that I have ever heard in this house. Ministerial responsibility is a principle which our forefathers fought for, and they succeeded in gaining it, and now we have lost it since Charley Dunning has been Minister of Finance. Hon. members recall the discussion of the mortgage bank, when he told me that he had given me information. He had, indeed, given me some information, but it was not all that I wanted, and I did not get any information about some of the bodies for which the Canadian taxpayer is responsible.

My idea of responsible government is so important, Mr. Speaker, that, as it is one minute to six, I will ask you to call it six o'clock. I have something else to say.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. POULIOT: May I refer again to the subamendment? The first part reads:

> And this house further regrets the failure of the government to adopt a monetary policy that would permit a maximum war effort without either increasing debt or reducing the standards of living below that necessary for maintaining maximum efficiency.

We have of course to consider the question of inflation, because we cannot forget what happened to rubles, marks and francs in consequence of inflation. But even with inflation it is impossible to improve the standards of living without increasing debt, and we have the example of the United States of America, where marvels have been accomplished for the unemployed, but not without increasing debt; and, as every hon. member knows, the debt of the United States is the largest of any country in the world.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Why can it not be done without debt?

Mr. POULIOT: Therefore the subamendment is contrary to common sense. If put into practice, it would not work. In my humble view it is necessary to have a currency standard. When our mint was under the British government we had reports on coinage, but unfortunately, since the mint has become Canadian, we have not.

When all the gold reserve of the world is accumulated, concentrated and frozen in one country, the currencies of other countries are depreciated to that extent. What standard shall we have in the future? A possible standard is silver—and I cannot see how we could have any other precious metals than gold and silver as standards of currency. Platinum is, of course, a very rare metal, and no one could expect the standard to consist of diamonds or other precious stones. At any rate, a standard is needed. Whether in the future it will be silver we do not know, but we do know that if neither gold nor silver is accepted as the standard, then we shall have to go in for barter, and that is the primitive method of trading.

We must rely on trade and on trade moving both ways, and I congratulate the government warmly upon having sent a trade commission to south America. I wish every success to the minister who is going there. It is a step in the right direction. The monetary system should be looked at from the point of view that money is not the principal factor, being only the medium by means of which trade is carried on; and if anyone makes it the principal factor, he is making a great mistake. For these reasons it is impossible for me to vote for the subamendment.

May I say one word to my hon. friends to the extreme right. If they cite the Aberhart administration in Alberta as a success in the field of social credit they are quite mistaken, because the management of Alberta's business affairs by Mr. Aberhart has been more conservative than if it could have been in the hands of Sir Herbert Holt.

There is another point I wish to make and it is this. If the first part of the subamendment were deleted, I would vote for the second part, for this reason. In the Bank of Canada and in the Department of Finance we need, not economists but bankers—sound bankers—and I take this opportunity to offer my congratulations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), who honours me by listening to what I am going to say about him. I am going to pay him no mean compliment. May I say that he has intelligence—a thing we have not seen for five years in the heads of that department. In the second place, I believe he is sound-minded and I put him in the class of the late Jim Robb, whose budgets were always so well received by the country. The Minister of Finance can take my word for it that it is no mean compliment I pay him when I compare him with the late Mr. Robb, because Mr. Robb was a man of common sense. Indeed, he was a great man precisely because he had a great deal of common sense. He was no fool.

A great mistake has been made in finance in Canada. As I once pointed out to that great financier who had become rich overnight—I refer to R. B. Bennett—the national debt is in a large measure the national wealth; and if a country pays returns upon an amount borrowed from Canadian citizens, these returns are the income of our fellow citizens. Therefore it is dangerous to reduce the rate of interest on either dominion or provincial loans; for, if the total amount of interest which is to be paid by the dominion and by the provinces is less, it means that the returns to those who have lent money to the Canadian exchequer, or to the exchequers of the provinces, as the case may be, will also be less, so that a certain amount of disturbance results. Of course, it is the policy that has been followed for some years, and in my opinion it was a great mistake.

Interest on bank deposits has been reduced, and interest on the shares—the return to the shareholders of the banks—is about the same. That also is a mistake. Take a person who has $20,000 in a bank. When the rate of interest was three per cent the return was $600; now the rate of interest is only one and a half per cent and the return is only $300. The result is that, owing to that reduction in the rate of interest on deposits, that person has to begin living on the capital itself, and little by little the deposit disappears from the account.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the house for its indulgence, which brings a warmth to my heart.

Let me continue. Whether it is on the advice of experts or of plain-clothes men, I cannot say; but on the one hand the government pays less, the provinces pay less, and it means that John, Joe, Mary and the dear old widow Mrs. So-and-So will receive less. They receive less and have, therefore, to curtail their expenditure.

Mr. FAIR: How about the widow who has to pay that?

Mr. POULIOT: Well, I understood only the word "widow." You see, sir, it is elementary that one should look at both sides of the matter, but only one side is seen, the side of the government. Of course the country pays that, the provinces pay that, but the people of our country are poorer every time.

There is another thing I cannot understand. It is that the issuance of bank notes in Canada is guaranteed by the national reserve in gold and other securities. Of course the reserve must be in the hands of the institution that issues the bank notes; that is elementary. But with our experts—and this is a point I was going to make last session when I was answering one of my hon. friends on the extreme left and was interrupted by my hon. friend the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) who is just coming in and whom I welcome; he did not seem to understand the point—on the one hand, the bank notes are issued by the Bank of Canada, and on the other, our national reserve in gold and securities is in the hands of an altogether different institution, the foreign exchange control board. How can the foreign exchange control board guarantee the payment of bank notes, "pay to the bearer," issued by the Bank of Canada? I cannot understand it, it must be very high finance.

At one time, according to the statute books of this country, it was necessary for a man to have ten years' experience as a banker to be deputy minister of finance. But now it is superfluous.

Banking is a science, and political economy is not. Banking is a science based on rules of experience; political economy is only a conglomeration of views concocted together. One may have one view, another may have another view, a third may have a different view, a fourth a different one again, but it does not mean that from all these views you will make a science. A science is definite, real knowledge. That is what I want for those who are in charge of this delicate problem of finance for this country.

If there were only the last paragraph of the subamendment, I would vote for it because I find that Canada is in a very dangerous situation by reason of the ill-advice that is given by some so-called experts both in the Bank of Canada and in the Department of Finance. And it is impossible to get any information about that. Last year I tried to get the telephone numbers of the Bank of Canada, and my hon. friend the Minister of Finance told me "No. 369;" that was repeated nine times. But it was No. 369, meaning that there were at least 369 telephones in that square building.

I have much more to say, but I will do so on another occasion.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have already spoken on the main motion, and therefore will not have an opportunity to speak again in the course of the present debate if I do not take advantage of the present moment to do so. Possibly I shall not be violating the rules of the house if, in speaking on the amendment to the amendment, I confine my remarks to replying, in a very few particulars, to one or two things that were said this afternoon by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson). What I might wish to say with regard to what has been said by others can perhaps stand over for another time. But I believe my hon. friend would expect me to reply to him immediately, or at least in the course of the present debate.

Perhaps my hon. friend would let me begin my remarks at the place at which he concluded his. His last remarks had reference to the statement which I made in the house yesterday and which, much to my surprise, he characterized as quite unexpected and something much more critical. May I first of all say to my hon. friend that the reason why I made the statement I did yesterday, rather than wait until a later day in the session, was that on Thursday last when he asked me to give the house information with respect to existing conditions, he said that I ought to give the information either that day, or at the latest, "to-morrow", which was the word he used, "to-morrow" being Friday. I replied that I would wish to think over what I had to say before speaking on a matter so important and might wish a little longer interval of time. I was anxious to reply to my hon. friend just as soon as I could after he had made the request he did, not only to oblige him in that particular but also because I thought the statement which he made was one which called for a reply at the earliest possible moment.

The statement which my hon. friend made left in my mind, and I think in the minds of all hon. members, the impression that a condition existed in Europe at the present time, a condition which, as he expressed it himself, was very much worse than it had been at any time since the fall of France. We all know that at the time of the fall of France the condition was as bad as it could possibly be. Nothing could have been more serious than the situation was at that particular time.

My hon. friend asked me to make statements of a specific character. He is right about one sentence of what his request contained; it was:

> I would request him to indicate what further, if anything, Canada can do at this juncture towards aid and assistance, whether it be in men, materials, supplies or equipment.

I felt that the statements which had been made by myself and my colleagues in the course of the present debate had answered that question in very large part before it was asked, inasmuch as they set forth a programme which the government is doing its utmost to carry out, and which I think all will agree is as extensive as could be expected at this particular time. But I did conclude by saying that I thought the situation demanded all that all of us could do. I wish to say at once that I think the time has come when people everywhere throughout Canada should realize that they must examine their own consciences, as well as seek to look into the conscience of the government, to understand what service they can and ought to render at a time as critical as the present. Each man or each woman in Canada knows what he or she in his or her present circumstances can do to assist Canada's war effort. Some can assist by saving, others by lending; some can assist by working in one direction, others by working in another direction. The time has come now when it is for every man or woman to ask himself or herself, "How can I where I am, and where I may find it possible to be, best serve in this great crisis; how can I serve my country and how can I serve humanity itself?" because it is the existence of civilization as we understand it that is at stake at this time.

The government is putting forth all the effort it possibly can, as a trustee of the people. The government's task is to take account of the fact that it is dealing with the funds of the people of Canada. It is not dealing with matters that are the personal property of its individual members. The government is a trustee, having to discharge duties on behalf of the people of Canada as a whole; and in discharging those duties it has to have continually in mind its obligation of trusteeship with respect to what can be done at this stage, what may have to be done to-morrow, and what may have to be done at a still later time.

Here is the specific statement my hon. friend wished me to make. These are his words:

> . . . in my view, in the view of many hon. members of this house, and I feel quite certain in the view of many people in Canada, the war situation in Europe is more serious to-day than at any time since the fall of France. The virtual destruction of the cities of Birmingham, Bristol and Southampton, the loss of shipping as evidenced by press reports, and in particular the utterances of the Marquess of Lothian, his majesty's representative in the United States, particularly with respect to finance, indicate the seriousness of the position.

Then my hon. friend goes on to say:

> Therefore in my view the Prime Minister should make a statement to the house and the country, if not to-day then not later than to-morrow, and tell the country just what the exact position is; because it will be understood that he has access to information which we have not. Let him tell the house and the country how serious the position is or, if we are wrong in our views, how good the position is. . . .

I ask hon. members who listened to the statement I made yesterday if I did not in every respect try to follow literally the request of my hon. friend. I tried to tell the house how good I thought the situation was. I also tried to tell the house how serious I thought the position was. I do not think I over-emphasized the one or the other. I did direct particular attention to the inference that could be drawn from my hon. friend's words, because later on he repeated them, when he said:

> .. . I do feel that the situation to-day in the theatre of war over there is just as serious as it was at the time of the fall of France, and we are all very uneasy about it.

I do not feel that way, and I could not reply to my hon. friend that I agreed with him in that. To-day my hon. friend says that in my reply I agreed with him that the situation was serious, and that he could not understand why I went further in the statement I made yesterday. Here is what I said in reply to my hon. friend, quoting the words that he would wish quoted:

> I agree with my hon. friend in his view that the situation is a serious one. I think anyone reading the press would gather that opinion. I would also say that such information as the government itself is receiving the press would appear to be reflecting accurately. Any statement that I may have to make will be practically in accord with what has already appeared in the press.

What did my hon. friend say when I concluded my statement yesterday? He said I had not told the house anything the house did not know or anything that had not already appeared in the press. I fail therefore to see in what I said where there was anything that should have called forth the remark my hon. friend made in referring to the statement I had given. The hon. gentleman said that, recalling what I said on Thursday last, he felt a sort of sense of frustration as I was speaking yesterday; that he wondered which was Doctor Jekyll and which was Mr. Hyde. I would say to my hon. friend that I have been wondering what could have brought to his mind that work of fiction by Robert Louis Stevenson on the strange case of Doctor Jekyll and Mr. Hyde; and I have come to the conclusion, since my hon. friend spoke about what Mr. Brockington had said as a result of his close association with me, that he must have had in mind some of the correspondence that had passed between Mr. Brockington and himself, before making the remarks he did in the house this afternoon. I do not know whether my hon. friend regards the correspondence that passed between Mr. Brockington and himself as confidential. I do not think he does, because he referred to it this afternoon and, indeed, quoted a passage from it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes; my hon. friend did make reference to it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I referred to it, but I did not quote it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thought my hon. friend quoted what he had said about Mr. Brockington's oratory. At any rate my hon. friend is aware that if any hon. member refers to correspondence in debate, he must be prepared to table the correspondence. The correspondence which my hon. friend had with Mr. Brockington started as long ago as November 13. It is on the paper of the House of Commons, office of the leader of the opposition. It does not bear the words "private" or "confidential," nor do these words appear on Mr. Brockington's reply. I may say that I knew nothing of the text of this correspondence before my hon. friend made his statement this afternoon. I had heard that my hon. friend had asked Mr. Brockington about the source of his information, after he made his statement at Philadelphia, and that Mr. Brockington had made a reply, but I never discussed the matter either with Mr. Brockington or with my hon. friend. That was a natural course for the leader of the opposition to follow, if he was in doubt on any matter; to seek to get the exact information. But what did my hon. friend say in his letters? First of all, he asked for a copy of the speech that was made at Philadelphia, and then he said:

> I assume, of course, that you were speaking in your own personal capacity, but if you went there either representing the government or in any manner interpreting the government to the American Bar Association it would be a matter of great interest to me, because I understand that you made the following declaration on that occasion . . .

In speaking to the house this afternoon, my hon. friend approached the subject from the point of view of Mr. Brockington's close association with myself, and sought to have the house believe that what Mr. Brockington said at Philadelphia was as a result of that close association, that he had been saying something there which differed from what I had given to my hon. friend as a statement of the facts of the case. Mr. Brockington immediately sent a copy of his speech to the leader of the opposition, and my hon. friend thanked him for it and said:

> As a piece of sheer oratory, it is magnificent. I salute you, and congratulate you.

Elsewhere he went on to say:

> But I do wish you would write me and tell me frankly what you had in mind when you spoke, near the end of your speech, of "a pact between your country and mine by which you agree to defend us in certain eventualities and we agree to defend you," and what you know, for I was assured on August 20 by the Prime Minister that up to that time there were no commitments and I have not heard of any since.

So my hon. friend admits that I had given him the assurance that there were no commitments at the time of the Ogdensburg meeting. I repeated that statement this afternoon. My hon. friend had the best of reasons for not doubting that the statement I had made to him was other than wholly correct. Let me read what Mr. Brockington said in his reply:

I had no conversation with the Prime Minister concerning what I intended to say or should say. I, of course, asked him if I might take a few days holidays to attend a meeting in my private capacity.

And later:

With reference to the language and subject matter of the sentence which you question, I had and have no knowledge of the conversations at Ogdensburg or of any cognate conversations or transactions before or since other than that already made public and available to any Canadian citizen in the Canadian press. Any error or misstatement, or misinterpretation, therefore, in my remarks must be entirely attributable to me. I accept full responsibility —no one else can share it or be charged with it.

Mr. NEILL: What date?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The date is November 15. I do not think anything could be plainer than that. I think Mr. Brockington was wholly honourable with my hon. friend, but I must say to him that when he had this correspondence in his possession, and had the assurance that he did have from me, and had, in addition, the assurance he received from Mr. Brockington as to the source of his information, this afternoon as he spoke of the close association with myself as having possibly led Mr. Brockington to give a different interpretation, and went on to refer to his friend and mine as possibly having been influenced by the walnuts and the wine—referring to a gentleman he knew to be most abstemious—I began to wonder whether it was Doctor Jekyll or Mr. Hyde who was speaking.

May I now pass to another remark of my hon. friend to which I wish also to take strong objection. And may I say to him, and this in all kindliness, that I believe sometimes my hon. friend speaks without fully realizing the implication of his words.

Mr. POULIOT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not exempt myself from doing that at times. We are all prone to do it. But I do say to my hon. friend that holding the positions he and I hold at this very critical time, we owe it to ourselves and to the country to be most careful about the words we use in stating matters which relate to this all-important situation.

My hon. friend was referring to Canada's war effort, and to an impression concerning it which, he says, exists in Great Britain. I must say I was very much surprised at the remark of my hon. friend. I thought I had his exact words before me, but I believe I can recall them almost exactly. They were to the effect that from information he had received from the other side of the water there was a feeling in England that Canada is seeking to make money out of our war effort. I ask my hon. friend just to think about the significance of those words. That is not an attack on the government; it is an attack on the people of Canada. That is a reflection upon the war effort of Canada as it is being put forth by the producers, by manufacturers and by all the men and women in this country who are seeking to do their part toward the winning of the war.

My hon. friend tells us that, despite all we have been seeking to do—and I use the term "we" in the sense of the people of Canada—that in England there exists the impression that Canada is seeking to make money out of her war effort. I say that is unfair to the people of England. I say it is unfair—yes, doubly unfair to the people of Canada. I would go farther and say that it is a libel upon Canada that anyone should either express or repeat words to that effect—anyone who has any understanding or knowledge whatsoever of the war effort of this country.

I think I am as much in touch with leading persons in the old country as is my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. Not a day goes by that I do not receive some communication from the old country in the form of letters or telegrams in reference to the views entertained there with respect to Canada's war effort. Hardly a day passes that I do not meet someone, or converse with someone who has just come from the old country or who has been there and just returned home; and I say to my hon. friend that the word they most use with respect to Canada's war effort is that it is magnificent —that is the word. And I say to my hon. friend that if anyone expressed to him views such as he indicated this afternoon, he did not know what he was talking about.

My hon. friend has said that we should do all we can to dissipate that view. May I say to him that I have not heard another citizen in Canada express a view of the kind. It is my hon. friend who has put forth that view, and he is the only one who has done so.

I want the people of Canada to know that no one in England has any opinion of that kind with respect to Canada's war effort.

I come now to the other side of my hon. friend, the better side. A few days ago my hon. friend spoke of the desirability of the house appointing two standing committees. I believe he made that suggestion on November 12, when he first spoke in this debate. His words were as follows:

Knowing of this feeling I am impelled to propose to the government that it cause to be set up immediately two select special committees which will be charged with the responsibility and the duty of investigating and reporting to this house factualy, objectively and truthfully, without bias and without partisanship—and I have no doubt that is possible—what is our exact position (a) with respect to our fighting forces, military, naval and air; and (b) with respect to the production and delivery of all the important materials, equipment and supplies necessary in our war effort, so that the Canadian people may know the truth. Before such committees ministers could appear and be subject to questioning.

My hon. friend concluded by saying:

I am willing with some of my colleagues to meet with the Prime Minister and some of his colleagues so that we may consider the whole proposal, in an honest effort to arrive at a conclusion.

May I say that since making that statement, my hon. friend and two of his colleagues have met with me and two or three of my colleagues to consider the matter there referred to. I wish to say to him and to the house that no approach to the subject could have been more helpful or could have been better in every respect than that which he and his colleagues made in confidence with the government in this matter. We spoke quite frankly to my hon. friend and his colleagues with respect to the difficulties which surrounded the procedure of dealing with war expenditures, questions of production and distribution—deliveries, I believe, was the word he used—in any standing committee of the house which might be holding its proceedings in public and which during part of the time might have to ask that the proceedings be held for some time in camera. We particularly pointed out the difficulties of imparting to parliament or to any committees certain information.

I will mention to the house just what one of those difficulties is. We have been asked by the British government—and this is a request they have made to governments in all parts of the British commonwealth; it is not one which has been made to us alone; it is a matter of which the British government itself has taken full account—to avoid, if possible, the disclosure of numbers, the disclosure of amounts, the disclosure of quantities, the disclosure of anything in public which would help to give the enemy an appreciation of the strength or lack of strength of the forces opposing him.

I think every one can see the reasonableness of a position of the kind. But it does raise a very difficult situation for the government. If we are not on the horns of a dilemma, we are at least in the matter of information sailing between Scylla and Charybdis all the time. We are either too near the rock of Scylla in giving more in the way of information than we should, or we are drifting to the other side toward the whirlpool of Charybdis and are being accused of withholding from the people of our country the information they are entitled to have. I can only put the situation as it is in its clear light before members of this house and before the country, and trust to the soundness of their judgment. That is the position we are in with respect to the disclosure of information that might prove to be harmful.

As I have said over and over again, it must be remembered in connection with this present conflict that it is not a matter of days, it is not a matter of months, but it is a matter of years. Information that we are giving from hour to hour and from day to day is being accumulated by those whose interest it is to do all they possibly can to destroy the British empire and every part of it. I believe our country is fairly free of those who have played the disreputable part which has been taken by fifth columns in other countries, but that we are wholly free of persons who are gathering up information to pass on to the enemy, sorting it out for them and telling them the significance of it, I do not for a moment believe. Therefore, we have to be scrupulously careful of what we say, having regard to human nature as we know it, and having regard to the situations as we know they have been in every land.

It is for that reason and for that reason only that the government hesitates to say to this house that it is prepared to have standing committees before which will be placed the exact position with respect to our fighting forces, naval, military and air. Let me illustrate: With respect to our air force, it would mean that we would have to tell how many planes we have been manufacturing, how many have been sent across the seas, how many airmen are being trained, when they are likely to leave Canada, how many have sons, et cetera, et cetera. I have, I am sure, only to mention this to have hon. members see its significance. Then, with respect to the production and delivery of important materials, equipment and supplies necessary to our war effort, I have only to point out that to state in public what we have shipped and are shipping in the way of supplies, where they have gone or are going, is simply to give to the enemy the kind of information he is most anxious above all else to have.

I agree with what my hon. friend has said about the position of private members in this house. Every member is anxious to become more actively interested in Canada's war effort. I think one thing my hon. friend said this afternoon is very much to be emphasized. There is no greater part that hon. members can take in Canada's war effort than it is possible for them to play in their own constituencies where they are known and trusted. They can tell the people of their constituencies all that they possibly can with respect to the war effort and what they know is needed in order to make the war effort successful. But that is not enough. Hon. members are right in feeling that they would wish, that the house itself would wish to make its own contribution to the war effort in some way. The government, I can assure hon. members, is most anxious to have it do so in any way that is not going to make for confusion but will help to carry forward this tremendous task. I can assure hon. members that we desire their fullest cooperation.

This afternoon my hon. friend made a suggestion which appeals very strongly to me for more reasons than one; first of all, because of the proposal itself, and also because it is the procedure which on this very perplexing matter has been adopted at Westminster. In the parliament at Westminster the government has been faced with exactly the same situation we are faced with here. They have of course a much larger number of private members than we have in this House of Commons and their private members are as anxious to make their contribution as are our private members. They are on the firing line, and one can imagine the intensity of feeling there must be with respect to the desire on the part of every man to do what he can during the hours he is in parliament as well as when he is at home in his constituency.

The British government are making expenditures on a much vaster scale than we are, and human nature is the same in the United Kingdom as it is in Canada with regard to all classes and conditions of men and how they may act in respect of government contracts and large quantities of money and supplies at a time of war. They are just as anxious as we are to see that whatever is done is done openly, honestly and above-board and to bring to time summarily anyone who seeks to profit by opportunities which war conditions may afford. But they have not thought it advisable to set up standing committees of the character which was originally proposed by the leader of the opposition. They have however, established a committee on national expenditure which has been given certain powers and which has been functioning now for almost a year, having been set up on December 12, 1939. On November 7, 1939, Sir Archibald Sinclair, who was then leading the Liberal party in the House of Commons, asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he could make any statement on the appointment of a committee on national expenditure on the lines suggested in a motion to which my hon. friend referred this afternoon.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I read the order of reference.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This motion reads:

> That a select committee be set up, similar to that appointed by parliament in July, 1917, to examine the current expenditure defrayed out of monies provided by parliament for the defence services, including civil defence, and to report what, if any, economies, consistent with the execution of the policy decided by the government, may be effected therein.

Sir John Simon in his reply outlined briefly the measures already being taken to ensure economy, but added that he appreciated the desire of the house to make its own contribution to this end. He said:

> The government consider that this object would be best attained by setting up a select committee on national expenditure with terms of reference which would broadly follow those under which the select committee was set up during the last war. The select committee would deal with expenditure connected with the war whether civil or military.

He said that the committee would be set up at an early date, and the committee was set up on December 12, upon a motion being passed. Before I quote the motion, may I say that after careful consideration of the whole matter the government is prepared to introduce a similar motion into this house and to follow the procedure which has been adopted by Westminster with respect to war expenditure. As the leader of the opposition has rightly said, the committee on public accounts is not adequate at the present time to deal with the vast expenditures that have to be considered. The committee on public accounts has referred to it the report of the auditor general which contains expenditures of the previous year. My hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, wants a committee which will have the power to review current expenditures.

May I say, speaking for myself and I believe for all my colleagues, that anything that is going to assist the government in seeing that the right control is exercised over the expenditure of monies in connection with this war will be more than welcomed by the administration. I want to add that whoever is appointed to such a committee ought to take his responsibilities very seriously. Great care will have to be taken in the selection of the personnel. If there is a genuine desire to do the thing that is helpful, I am sure that great good can come out of the existence of a committee of the kind. If, on the other hand, the committee is to be made an instrument for party warfare, I cannot conceive of anything that could be worse.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I interrupt my right hon. friend to say that nothing was further from my thoughts.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Quite so. I have not said that my hon. friend—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not looking for scandal.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe that my hon. friend is wholly sincere in what he says. I would not have made the remark I did had I thought that he was not. But I repeat that if a committee of the kind were to be used as an instrument of party political warfare, I cannot conceive of a way of working greater injury to Canada's war effort. But a committee which takes its responsibilities seriously, and will assist the government in exercising a control over the expenditures which are being made, keeping on the government the responsibility for policy, but being free to make suggestions that will be helpful and constructive, should be of the greatest possible service. It was that kind of committee which on December 12 last was set up at Westminster, and this is the motion under which action was taken:

That a select committee be appointed to examine the current expenditure defrayed out of moneys provided by parliament for the defence services, for civil defence, and for other services directly connected with the war, and to report what, if any, economies consistent with the execution of the policy decided by the government may be effected therein.

I propose, Mr. Speaker, as soon as parliament reassembles after the adjournment, to introduce a motion in those words in this House of Commons. I say, after the adjournment, because I think hon. members will agree that we can much better begin establishing a select committee of this house at the moment of continuing its regular proceedings, rather than at the beginning of the Christmas recess or within a month of meeting shortly thereafter. I hope this assurance will meet with general acceptance.

In taking my seat, may I again thank my hon. friend and those who were with him for the manner in which they discussed this whole question with my colleagues and myself, and also for the constructive suggestion which he has made in this particular.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is on the amendment.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): I have just a few words to say about this amendment. I express my great surprise about the way in which it is drafted. The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) follows the practice of his former leader and flees away when I start to speak. I remember the time when "R. B." was leader of the Tory party; as soon as I rose he went out, and the same practice is followed by his illustrious successor.

But, sir, I will take the amendment as it is; I find it an insult to the intelligence of the Canadian people, and especially the farmers. Here is that masterpiece of Toryism—I put on my glasses and I will read between the lines. They all run away, they are all afraid, they are hares, they run from the battle, they are all from Taranto. Here is the amendment:

> . . . that this house regrets that the government has continued to soothe the Canadian people regarding the war effort of the nation, thereby creating a false sense of security when a clear-cut call to action is desperately needed.

What does that mean? Nobody knows. It reminds me of the time when Mr. Bennett's Minister of Labour was introducing some legislation, and when I asked him the meaning of that legislation he was unable to answer; he did not know. When I asked the leader of the opposition to-day for the meaning of the words "realistic attitude" that he used in his speech, he was just as dumb as Wesley Gordon was when I was asking questions of him in the glorious time when Mr. Bennett was in supreme command.

The Canadian people want information, but information that can be useful, useful to us as members of parliament for the good of the soldiers, sailors and airmen of this country. A distinction should be made, and it shall be made, between a check on the total expenditure on the war and information about the movements of the troops and so on. The hon. gentleman did not make any such distinction.

I do approve, however, of one of the suggestions of the opposition, that of having a secret sitting at which members of parliament could be fully informed with regard to all phases of our war effort.

Part of the information they insist on getting is information that should be given, but in camera, not in public.

I am surprised that of the great men in the front line of the Tory party none has added very much distinction to the discussions that have taken place in this chamber. What are the words of the amendment?

> We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that this house regrets that the government has continued to soothe the Canadian people . . .

I could read what the dictionary says about the word "soothe." It mentions "to soothe a wound," but this government did not wound the Canadian people. The wound was inflicted by the Bennett regime, of which the leader of the opposition was a member for a few years. This government has had to patch up that wound. I wonder whether I should have used the word "soothe" when the leader of the opposition was turning his back to you, Mr. Speaker, and making some sounds across the floor of the house. No one knows what is meant by that word, and I fear that something is wrong; I fear there was some malicious intent on the part of someone in not explaining it to the leader of the opposition. Then the amendment continues:

. . . thereby creating a false sense of security. . . .

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, how this government creates a false sense of security. Again nobody knows what that means; the leader of the opposition and all the marvellous speakers of the Tory party who have bored this chamber for so long have not explained that. Then it goes on:

. . . when a clear-cut call to action is desperately needed.

Was it a clear-cut call to action when, at Charlottetown, the leader of the opposition betrayed information that the British government had asked to be kept secret? My right hon. chief was amazed that the hon. gentleman should disclose such information.

Then there is the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), who is gifted with the eloquence of an auctioneer, who wanted to launch a convention to replace the present leader of the opposition. It is not a year since the hon. gentleman was chosen, and already they wish to replace him. Whom could they get? The leader of the opposition tried another idea in Quebec; he sent all the defeated Tory candidates a questionnaire asking what they thought of him. I could tell him what was said about him by the two official organs of the Liberal party in the province of Quebec, Le Canada of Montreal and Le Soleil of Quebec. I conceived it to be my duty to include those quotations in a letter which was published in the best weekly issued in Canada, Le Saint Laurent of Rivière du Loup. This is what Le Canada of September 12 had to say about the hon. gentleman, who was one of the nonentities of the Bennett government:

Mr. Hanson is against everything, even common sense.

I might translate that roughly as "Mr. Hanson is against everything, even common sense." Later the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) stated that Hitler was the latest recruit to the Tory ranks; a fine compliment. Through the medium of the local newspaper I said to my electors:

In advising the prime minister not to adopt the Conservative leader's suggestions, your representative sought to avoid for his leader the embarrassment of accepting counsel from a tory "who is against everything, even common sense" (according to Le Canada) and "who has Hitler as a recruit" (according to the Minister for Air).

Then the great Quebec Liberal organ, Le Soleil, had this to say:

The tory leader shows his true calibre.

Mr. Hanson's importance derives principally from the position he is occupying temporarily at the House of Commons, that of acting leader of the opposition. In this capacity, notwithstanding his harum-scarum nature, he is treated with respect by the Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Mackenzie King, who informs him, on occasion, of facts and projects of a confidential nature. Mr. Hanson has just taken undue advantage of this privilege, in the hope of putting himself in the limelight and of striking a treacherous blow at the government.

(Editorial of Oct. 12.)

We have not sufficient space to reproduce here all the editorials Le Canada has since devoted to the leader of the Conservative opposition. Here are the choicest titles: Oct. 14—"Mr. Hanson at the head of his class: first in the Fifth." This editorial purports to state that if Mr. Hanson had spoken thus in England he would now find himself behind the barbed wire of a concentration camp, as leader of the fifth column. On October 16, Le Canada calls him a "circus clown" and on October 18, the same newspaper wonders: "What is delaying Mr. Hanson's resignation?" This edition also contains, on the same page, a second editorial on the subject. It is entitled: "De Profundis", and concludes with: "Here lies Mr. Hanson."

The translation of the last sentence is "Here lies Mr. Hanson." I attach no great importance to that, but the newspapers of my province have recited the de profundis on him; let him now rest in peace. But there is something to this amendment; the second paragraph reads:

And this house further regrets that despite the serious condition of agriculture no effective action is proposed to alleviate that condition and to ensure to the Canadian farmer a just, fair and reasonable return for his products.

I do not wish to do what I blame others for doing, Mr. Speaker; I do not want to turn my back to the chair. We must remember the time when R. B. Bennett was Prime Minister, the time of the iron hand. We discussed butter in this house; butter, which had been the subject matter of lengthy discussions on the hustings throughout the country; butter, that golden treasure which was melting away and returning no benefit to the farmer. The house met; the then Minister of Agriculture was the late Mr. Weir. The Bennett government introduced some legislation. They put a high tariff on butter; and the higher the tariff went, the lower fell the price of butter. My hon. friends behind me remember those days. We were asking questions of the then Minister of Agriculture. I was asking R. B. Bennett who had imported such vast quantities of butter from New Zealand and Australia, because I had information, which I knew to be accurate, that this was being done by the Tory party.

I am glad to welcome my hon. friend the leader of the opposition back to his seat. He must remember also that when I asked his then leader, the leader of the Tory party, who had imported such vast quantities of butter, causing prices to fall lower and lower, he would not answer. It was a secret; apparently it was impossible to learn who had done that. But everyone knew that the Tory party had put some money in the market for speculation, and that the lower the prices of commodities went, the higher became the profit for the Tory electoral fund. Butter was purchased by the Tory party in Australia and in New Zealand, so that the price of our own butter fell. Hon. members opposite, who were then sitting in the house, will recall that when I asked questions of the then Minister of Agriculture he was unable to answer them—and neither was R. B. Bennett himself, or Wesley Gordon, or Sir George Perley, or Mr. Sauve, the then Postmaster General, or Mr. Duranleau, or the present leader of the opposition when he was Minister of Trade and Commerce.

These are the gentlemen who say that farm products are not selling well enough to-day. What is their record? Can we ever forget it? In those days farmers received the rock-bottom price for butter. That drop in price began in the first year of the Bennett regime, due to the high tariffs which were then advocated for the relief of the farmer. They did not dare speak about it afterward.

Then there was an imperial conference of some kind before which Mr. Bennett spoke about the possibilities and potentialities of hogs and bacon. Well, he never had success such as the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has had, in selling to Great Britain large quantities of bacon, for which the farmers will receive reasonable prices. We want to have some real help for the farmers. We find it strange—to use a mild expression—to hear hon. members opposite refer again to the plague which may affect the farmers, especially in view of the fact that conditions were so bad under their management. "A just, fair and reasonable return for his product"—that was the language used by all Tory spokesmen on the hustings during the campaign of 1930.

I see in the house many of my hon. friends who defeated Bennett ministers. For instance, I see the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. O'Neill) who conducted a wonderful campaign, and did particularly well in his constituency. He was victor in the cause of Liberalism. And there were so many others I cannot name them all. They did well because the people—farmers and labour—were fed up with the policies of the Bennett regime.

Someone may tell me that this kind of talk is untimely, that it is uncalled for in a time of war. But my point is that those who were incompetent in time of peace cannot be geniuses in time of war, just because we are at war. Those who have been no good in ordinary times cannot be excellent in extraordinary times.

I am reminded of what was said to me about the Tory leader in the senate on an occasion when he was being praised most lavishly. The person speaking to me was relating that the Tory leader in the senate had been born under a special star, and that his gifts were as numerous as the stars of the sky and the sands of the sea. I was surprised, and asked for more detailed information on the point. I said, "By the way, what have been the great accomplishments of that illustrious gentleman? Can you name in his whole political career a single accomplishment which has served the Canadian people, one piece of legislation which has been useful to the country?" "Well," he said, "he has been very unlucky." That was the description of the leader of the Tory party in the senate by one of his best friends.

Why should we pay any attention to the demands which come from the other side? The people in this country say that the Liberal party has a mandate to govern in war time, and we ought not to pay any attention to demands by the leader of the opposition or any of his satellites. The government should carry on the war effort boldly and honestly and get rid of all those Tories who are a perpetual nuisance and who are committing sabotage in the departments in which they hold important positions. Get rid of the Tories—that should be our watchword. Get rid of all the Tories who infest some of the war departments, and then we will receive no blame from them. Why do they blame the government? They do so because it is too tolerant with them. The government does not deprive them of their positions. Well, let us put them all out; let us put all the Tories out. Let us get rid of them, in order that we may have a sane administration in all departments of government in Canada.

Of course they are greedy for more power. The leader of the opposition knows what I mean. I could name some Tories who have insulted my leader and members of the government, but who are now deciding from whom goods for soldiers shall be bought. Everybody knows that. When there is a leak in the Department of National Defence, it comes from a Tory who is there—and I could name him. They are there, and they are impudent. Not only that, but when Tories are in power, Liberals can get nothing; no Liberal can be appointed. But when the Liberals are in power, we hear the Tory members saying, "Oh, let us have no politics; there should be no patronage." And they raise their hands, as if they were praying, and one would be led to believe that they are praying all the time.

We know that the people of Canada have judged them; they had enough of their rule. My only suggestion is that the government should keep away from bad company. I ask the government to pay no attention whatever to any suggestion from the leader of the opposition respecting four months of training or anything else. I presume his suggestions are made in good faith, but they are inspired by those in the department who desire more power so that they may betray the ministers they should serve faithfully. That is all.

Mr. J. S. ROY (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, like our beloved sovereigns who, every day, disregarding great dangers, convey their most compassionate consolations to the unfortunate victims of the London bombardments, Her Royal Highness, Princess Alice, wife of our most distinguished Governor General, has also shown commiseration for the suffering which has so cruelly stricken the population of the Magdalen islands, which bear the heavy brunt of these war consequences. Her merciful appeal to the population of Canada in her speech to the Women's club on October 7 last has warmly cheered and deeply moved the hearts of these unfortunate people. In their name I have the honour to extend to her royal highness the tribute of their most respectful and sincere gratitude.

Such examples of great heroic magnitude and Christian charity, as given by Buckingham Palace and Rideau Hall, are an infallible token of survival in the most crucial tests. They strengthen the ties of a people to the present regime and the liberties they enjoy under it by convincing them more firmly that, between two contending forces the British might, based on the immutable principles of love and justice, will assuredly triumph over the other force, sustained as it is by hate and by the tyrannical yoke of a despotic Gestapo.

Mr. Speaker, if I felt I should address this house in English, the language spoken by the majority of hon. members—and in spite of difficulties my pleasure in doing so is very great—it is as a tribute to my English-speaking electors of Gaspé and the Magdalen islands, whose great patriotism in the present war I wish to praise.

The various ministers of the crown have eloquently submitted to us accounts of our war effort. May I submit to this house another account, that of the contribution to that same war effort of the most ancient section of the country, the county of Gaspé and the Magdalen islands, which I take great pride in representing here.

The patriotism of our population has not weakened since 1914, when it has given more than one complete regiment. The long and glorious list of its sons who died on the field of honour, and whose names one can read on the pedestal of the monument erected at Gaspé in their memory, is sufficiently eloquent to render unnecessary adding anything to its testimonial.

At the outbreak of the war, in September, 1939, men of all ages and coming from all walks of life volunteered their services in numbers so large that they could not all be accepted at once. Of over 1,300 volunteers serving in the army, and a few in the navy. there are many French-Canadians, but the majority belong to the Loyalist stock and to the other English-speaking Gaspésians. The population of only 8,000 of Gaspé and the surrounding district has alone supplied some 600 volunteers. At Grosse-Ile and Entry island to the Magdalen islands, all the young men and many married men have volunteered their services and are serving in the army or in the navy. If we count those from the other islands, they are in all about 200 in number.

In proportion, these enlistments from Gaspé and the Magdalen islands must hold the record for the whole of Canada. Had all parts of the dominion furnished volunteers in the ratio supplied from Gaspé, Canada to-day would have for overseas service an army of over 320,000 men. And above this contribution in men, our population, according to its means, has heavily subscribed to the war loan and has contributed to welfare societies such as the Red Cross.

This readiness of the Gaspésian people in helping the country during critical hours can be explained by the peculiarities of their character in constant contact with dangers which are their daily companion and allurement.

One anecdote, out of thousands, will convince and help hon. members in reaching a deeper understanding of this class of labourers whose valour and merits are generally too much ignored. I will relate a drama of the sea which happened at Rivière-au-Renard, on September 28, 1936.

On that day the fishing was good and fishers had kept the sea until they were compelled by a tempest to come back to the shore, but one boat continued to battle the high seas. It was the two brothers, Phileas and Peter Tapp, reputed for their courage and ability, who were still fishing.

At three o'clock they decided to make for the shore. Three miles from the shore their overladen boat was capsized by a huge breaker and the fearless fishermen were plunged into the sea.

On the shore their comrades and other people witnessed in consternation this horrible drama. The infuriated sea, lashed by a strong wind, which is customary on the coast in the fall, seemed a challenge to the bravery of these men to come to the rescue of their brothers.

However, the sad victory of the sea was not to be complete. On the crest of a wave we could see the two castaways clinging, one to the stern and the other to the sternpost of the capsized boat, with the grip of their last hope. Four young and sturdy fishermen, Jules, Maurice, Isaac Dufresne and Ephrem Couillard, fortified by their courage, succeeded in launching another boat a few miles below and in reaching the scene. After three hours of struggle this boat was wrecked as it reached the shore. But Phileas Tapp was saved, although, unfortunately, his poor brother was lost.

Even on the battlefields could feats of such heroism and positive bravery be accomplished? The whole history of Gaspe and the Magdalen islands is made up of these and still more pathetic episodes. Every autumn we have to deplore these disasters and often would-be rescuers perish in trying to help imperilled fishermen.

Unfortunately, this admirable population, so full of virtue and of the most generous patriotism, is ill-paid for its devotion and sacrifice. The Magdalen islands settlement is battling against the pangs of the worst misery. Precarious as their situation was last summer, it has now become desperate. May I tell the house what this situation is and what has caused it.

The lobster catch was good enough, but the sale at the minimum price fixed by the government resulted in a deficit. The codfish catch was sold at a better price, but the sale was very small and that of mackerel was a lamentable failure. A few thousand barrels were sold at a loss and the rest, some 20,000 barrels, is a complete loss. About 60,000 boxes of smoked herring are on dealers' hands, if not sold at a loss.

This is the balance sheet of the expired season which has left the fishermen in debt and without any means to secure such essentials as flour and fuel to survive during seven long winter months, when there is no possibility whatever on the islands of earning a single cent. The old saying, "the end of fishing is the end of eating," is now an acute actuality.

To these distressing prospects is added another one. In a few days, navigation with the islands will be closed and it will be practically impossible to come to the rescue of this population before spring.

The Red Cross made a survey in the beginning of November in order to give assistance, but it is not likely that this society will be in a position to give enough assistance in fuel and flour to meet the needs. It must be remembered that there is no fuel whatever in the islands. Meanwhile, what are the governments, federal and provincial, doing to relieve this distress? Have they answered the numerous calls for help from local authorities, the press and, yes, from Her Royal Highness Princess Alice? Have not these people, who are a component part of confederation, paid their taxes and given soldiers for the defence of the country and of democracy?

Moreover, is it not true that the state is helping other classes of producers whose product is undersold? The law of the land permits the granting of direct relief to destitutes and the spending of moneys for relief works. Why is it that these two remedies have not been applied since the government has not deemed it proper to accept the advice of those who advocated a minimum price on fish, as on wheat, or the purchase of the surplus as has been done for apples?

There are two reasons which explain the indifference and lack of sympathy of the two governments for these destitute fishermen. The first is probably the fact that these fishermen are not sufficiently known, nor are their merits appreciated. The second is, perhaps, that the county is represented in the Ottawa and Quebec parliaments by an opposition member. In the first case the anecdote I related a few moments ago should help in reviving a more fraternal sympathy for these people. In the second case, may I say that the time is ill-chosen to exercise sanctions of a partisan nature against a population which accepts so generously its great share of the war sacrifice.

A population so well bred, and answering with such readiness the call of duty, should not be ignored and chastized for its political opinions or abandoned to its fate when abnormal circumstances drive it into destitution. Let the government take urgent and necessary measures to relieve most distressing cases, and let it also strive to remove the causes of all these evils.

Coming to the speech from the throne, may I now discuss the most essential aspect of our war effort. One of the striking notes of the government's policy, in recent days, is the increasingly insistent appeal to national unity, and the tribute to the loyalty of the province of Quebec. It is well and fair to extol our loyalty; but care should be taken not to give the impression that our loyalty has been revived or is of recent date. No; our loyalty is not of yesterday, nor is it any deeper than it was in the past.

The mention of such illustrious dates as 1787, 1812 and 1849 is sufficient to recall the fact that the retention of Canada under the British allegiance is due to the loyalty of the French-Canadians to the British crown. I need not point out the value of this service rendered then by my race. I may say, however, it has made confederation possible, and justified the fathers of confederation in saying that there are no victors and no conquered race in Canada.

As a vivid example of our loyalty and patriotism, one can mention the admirable attitude taken in the present war by the greatest and most distinguished French-Canadian of our times, His Eminence Cardinal Villeneuve.

Three reasons explain the greatness and persistence of our patriotism. First, it has been tested and has suffered. Second, French-Canadians, having remained royalists, are loyal to the British crown by reason of the fact that politically everything separated them from France of the revolution. Lastly, we cherish Canada more than others because we cherished Canada long before others did and with a more exclusive Canadianism. Our Canadianism which cautious and wise men have always upheld in the past has nothing of the dangerous excesses of that campaign inspired by partisan motive waged in Quebec in the last twenty-five years. After such a campaign the wise and rational stand taken by Quebec in the present war is highly surprising. We must realize that French-Canadians have not been led to revolt by demagogues as they were at the time of the former national registration in 1917.

Let the government of the day, and more especially the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), take this into account in recalling the past to which they were no strangers. This political past explains why the government feels the need of appealing for national unity and loyalty, and the remarks I now make are in support of the following amendment which I propose to submit:

We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that by reason of striking contradictions between your advisers on principles which should guide our war policy and war effort this house regrets that your advisers do not give sufficient guarantees to ensure national unity.

We also respectfully submit to Your Excellency that by reason of the fact that Your Excellency's advisers from the province of Quebec in this house have asked a mandate in pledging themselves to participate in the war in a moderate, free and voluntary manner, this house is of the opinion that these advisers have no mandate to carry this war effort to the ultimate limit.

Mr. Speaker, has national unity always existed? Is it yet existing in the midst of the cabinet and the ministerial ranks? Has the Liberal party always worked for its realization? Was it in the interests of national unity to propose during the last war, on January 17, 1918, the breaking of confederation as it was proposed in the Quebec legislature by the Hon. J. N. Francoeur who, with the support of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), was elected federal member for Lotbinière in 1937? Was it in the interests of national unity to charge the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Arthur Meighen) with being the executioner of the French-Canadians, as was done in 1921 by the then mayor of Montreal, Mr. Mederic Martin, who is now a Liberal member of the Quebec legislative council; or to allow the most influential Liberal paper of Quebec, Le Soleil, to say on October 24, 1925, that Mr. King's policy is "not one cent will be spent, not one man will be mobilized for the empire"?

Was it in the interests of national unity to raise the Turkish war scare in 1926, and the Egyptian war scare in the 1930 elections, and to allow to be printed on July 25, 1930, in La Presse a false London cable entitled, "Conscription Menace", with a warning from Senator Raoul Dandurand, the Liberal leader in the Senate, a warning which has not yet been denied? Was it in the interests of national unity in the last Quebec provincial elections to raise the cry, "A vote for Duplessis is a vote for conscription"?

Therefore it is not surprising that those whose political fortune has been made by these appeals to prejudice feel the need to protect the national unity for which in the past they had very little consideration.

Since the government is asking for unity in mind and motive, is it not fair to ask whether this unity is in the mind and motives of the government? Is there unity in the Liberal mind when Hon. Mr. Pattullo, Liberal premier of British Columbia, stated on August 9, 1939, that if Great Britain were at war Canada would help her to the last man and to the last dollar; and, when the same Hon. J. N. Francœur, who had proposed during the last war the breaking of confederation, stated at St. Fabien on December 19, 1937, "I am emphatically opposed to the spending of one cent to equip and send one man to foreign wars?" No sooner had this statement been made than the Minister of Justice said, "Mr. Francœur's cause is mine; his victory will be mine." And on the polling day, December 28, the Prime Minister telegraphed Mr. Francœur, "The electors of Lotbinière have voted as Canadians who place national interest above all."

What can be said about unity in mind of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who on February 6 last stated at Markinch that the Liberal party was opposed to conscription of wealth and conscription of men even for the defence of Canada? This is a Canadian Press report which has never been denied.

Did the Minister of Justice not state in Quebec on December 13, 1938: "Instead of going to war abroad we will stay here?" And did his colleague, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), not affirm on February 28 last: "Our first line of defence is on the English channel?"

Again, what can be said on unity in mind of these other two ministers, the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) who, at St. Fabien on December 13, 1937, said: "I went to the war, I came back and will not go again and will not send anyone to the next war," and the Minister of National Defence, who stated in Montreal in September last: "Canada in this war is at the side of Great Britain and the Canadian first line is in England?"

Can we find any unity in mind between the Minister of Public Works and his leader? None whatever. The Minister of Public Works declared in Montreal on January 14, 1938, that in the event of Great Britain being at war with Italy he would say to Canadians, "Stay at home;" and he added "This is my government's policy."

The government's appeal for national unity would be more convincing were the Prime Minister trying to reconcile the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) with the Minister of Public Works. Speaking in New York on October 24 last, the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services said: "We have sent men and ships and guns and planes over the seas, and we shall send more and still more, so long as there is a single Canadian dollar left to be spent or a solitary Canadian citizen to take his stand in defence of freedom." Only three days later, the Minister of Public Works, speaking at St. Ours, stated: "We will never approve compulsory enlistment for overseas service."

It appears that unity in mind is also lacking between the Prime Minister and his colleague the Premier of Quebec, Hon. Mr. Godbout, who, at Plessisville on November 17 last, stated: "The mobilization act is the most anti-imperialist law put in force by the Canadian government."

To lead his party out of this other valley, the valley of contradictions, the Prime Minister should try to reconcile his own statements on the main object of this present war effort. In fact, in this house on November 12 last he stated:

. . . it was not this party, it was not the members on this side of the house that created a "Canada first" policy and tried to educate the Canadian people in their attitude towards interimperial relations on a "Canada first" point of view. At the time the "Canada first" cry was raised I protested against it as strongly as I could.

That is to be found on page 40 of Hansard for this session.

But, speaking on foreign policy in this house on March 30, 1939, the Prime Minister stated:

We are and will remain Canadians, devoted, first and last, to the interests of Canada. . . .

In view of such conflicting declarations it is not surprising that in Montreal on January 15, 1938, Hon. Fernand Rinfret should have said:

When, in the past, there was participation it was in spite of us, Liberals! We, Liberals, we are for Canada, for Canada after and Canada only.

When has the Prime Minister protested as strongly as he could against this cry of his own colleague? After having been spurred by so many contradictory statements and pledges by the Liberal party, we readily realize the urgency of appealing for national unity. Circumstances seem to have favoured Canada in keeping this party in office at the last elections, because that is the most effective way to keep it under censure. In peace time the Liberal party has constantly opposed participation in foreign wars, and I can hardly understand how it can now change its policy to one of participation to the extreme limit. The Minister of Public Works tried to explain that when speaking at St. Ours on October 28 last. This is what he said:

The government policy has not changed and will not change.

It must be one thing or the other. The government has fooled the province of Quebec if its war policy then was its policy of to-day, or it is fooling the rest of Canada now if its present policy is still its anti-imperialist policy preached in the past. The truth is that in every electoral campaign since 1917 the Liberal party has promised throughout Canada, with particular insistence in the province of Quebec, that Canada will not any more participate in any empire wars. After having declared war on Germany in 1939, it altered its former attitude in the last Quebec provincial and federal election campaigns by promising that there would be moderate participation only. To-day according to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, the limit will be reached only when there is not a single Canadian dollar left to be spent or a solitary Canadian citizen to participate. What an evolution!

It has been said and repeated many times that the Liberal party is a party of expediency. Its greatest electoral successes have been achieved in times of distress by the exploitation of the miseries and sacrifices of the population and of its good faith. This shameless opportunism should not guide the policy of the government in war time, but it seems that the government is pursuing two efforts, the first that of winning the war and the second that of maintaining the huge electoral machine of this oligarchy which controls everything.

There should be only one effort based on the dollars and sacrifices of the poor and the rich; that is the effort for victory. The other should be immediately sacrificed to the first; loyalty and patriotism require it. Since in the name of Canada we are asked to sacrifice our liberty, our wealth and our lives in the service of democracy, have we not the right to ask the government to abandon its partisan ambitions? It is necessary that we ensure national unity, and that must be realized at once and at any cost. To do this it is essential that a policy be clearly and frankly defined which will reconcile the conflicting opinions which it would be dangerous to allow to exist any longer in the cabinet and in the nation. What good would be all the sacrifices generously made in our country to ensure the triumph of democracy over oligarchy in Europe if, after the war, we had to admit that democracy had been killed in Canada by the poison of the oligarchy which is being imposed upon us?

In support of the amendment I wish to quote an editorial from the New York Times of October 9, following Mr. Churchill's famous speech:

> It is one of Mr. Churchill's supreme gifts to democracy that he has put furtiveness and concealment aside in dealing with his countrymen.

Nothing is so anti-democratic as furtiveness and concealment between the government and the nation. Duplicity and furtiveness are the Liberal past. Duplicity and concealment are its present. For these reasons I have the honour, as a National-Conservative-Independent member, to move the amendment I read during the course of my speech.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the name again, please?

Mr. ROY: National-Conservative-Independent.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member a seconder?

[Mr. Roy.]

Mr. ROY: I have proposed the amendment to the house, and all those hon. members who made so much noise. . .

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as you are well aware, I had not the slightest intention of taking part in this debate. Although the amendment of the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Roy) has not found a seconder, I believe it my duty to say at least a few words. I shall be brief.

With the first part of the hon. member's address I am almost completely in agreement. We sympathize with the distress of the fishermen of the county of Gaspe, and in helping them we certainly will be happy to second the efforts of the various associations and even those of my hon. friend.

In one particular, however, I must take objection to what he says. He stated that the government did not come to the help of the people of Gaspe because they are represented in this house by a member of the opposition. My hon. friend is, to some extent, boasting. As he well knows he does not represent the majority of the people of the county of Gaspe, so his argument falls to the ground. The huge majority of the electors of Gaspe are behind this government. The hon. member was elected by an unfortunate accident. There were two strong Liberal candidates in the field who had divided the Liberal vote. I predicted on the night of the election that, because of that division, the constituency of Gaspe would be the only one which would send an opposition member to the House of Commons. That happened.

My hon. friend is welcome in the house; but he must know he is here because of a division in the Liberal ranks. So the hon. member has no right to say that we are not listening to the claims of Gaspé for political reasons, because Gaspé is Liberal, and will prove to be Liberal at the next election. I ask my hon. friend in all sincerity and in all earnestness if he thinks that his speech has contributed anything toward helping Canada in this tremendous conflict. Has he helped in any way?

Here we have a gentleman who has just voted in favour of an amendment which I shall read—and his electors will know all about that. That amendment states in part:

> We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that this house regrets that the government has continued to soothe the Canadian people regarding the war effort of the nation, thereby creating a false sense of security when a clear-cut call to action is desperately needed.

My hon. friend has voted for that amendment. He thinks that the government is doing nothing in its war effort, and that we are lulling the Canadian people into a false sense of security. He believes that we are not giving a clear-cut call for action, as my hon. friend would like to have it. Yet this is the speech he makes in the House of Commons and this is his clear-cut call to action.

My hon. friend's speech—and he must have seen it himself, because he is intelligent—has created a painful impression everywhere in the house, even among his friends who sit round him.

Mr. ROY: Yes, but not for the reasons the right hon. minister thinks.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, it has created a painful impression, and I do not think my hon. friend's dreams, after this effort of his, will be happy to-night when he goes to bed. I congratulate the House of Commons of Canada on the fact that there is only one man who would move this amendment—only one man.

An hon. MEMBER: Too bad he is a French-Canadian, though.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The hon. member suggests that my colleague the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), my other colleagues from Quebec and I are creating disunity in our province. He knows well that the province of Quebec has never been united as she is to-day. All those prophets who had stated and written that if war broke out, confederation would be destroyed and the country divided, have proved to be false prophets. Instead of dividing the country, the war has united it, and the province of Quebec is solidly behind this government. When I make that statement I do not speak politically; I speak rather of parliament as a whole, and indicating that my hon. friend is alone in his view.

Quebec is solidly behind the effort of Canada in this conflict, and we are going to stay solidly behind that effort—no matter what may be the sniping campaign of those disgruntled politicians who try to divide a united country. The hon. member for Gaspé has had the audacity—and I ask pardon for using the word—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): "Audacity" is not contrary to parliamentary rules; the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) uses words much stronger than that. I say that the hon. member for Gaspe has had the audacity to say that during the last provincial campaign there was a cry in Quebec that a vote for Duplessis was a vote for conscription. Is the hon. member serious in that? Every hon. member knows—because we all read the newspapers—that during the campaign in Quebec it was said that a vote for Godbout and Lapointe was a vote for conscription. But the hon. member would have us believe that the people of Canada at large were all wrong, that a vote for Duplessis was a vote for participation in the war, and that that was what was being preached during the last provincial campaign. My hon. friend does not believe seriously that he can make the people of Canada swallow that terrible frog?

Then my hon. friend continues to say that during the by-election in Lotbinière I was supporting Mr. Francoeur. Yes, I am proud to have done so. But the hon. member forgot to say, as everyone who knows anything about recent events must know, that the candidate against Mr. Francoeur was a separatist, a nationalist, an independent, named Mr. Bouchard, who opposed me in the last general election. May I be permitted to say that he was a separatist, an anti-participationist, an anti-war candidate in Quebec East. A Conservative candidate had been selected on the day my good friend Doctor Manion came to address the electors of Quebec. He could not decently endorse Mr. Bouchard, and, as a result, spoke for the other gentleman. But that other gentleman did not open committee rooms, and withdrew two days before polling, asking his friends to vote for the separatist Bouchard. That is the sort of gentleman with whom my hon. friend is associated in Quebec. No wonder he is alone in the House of Commons!

I am not saying anything against Conservatives in the province of Quebec. Heaven knows I would not do that, because they voted for us. They were ashamed of those who were opposing us. That is the reason why my hon. friend, alone, of his clan, is here in the house to-night. He is here because there were two Liberals in the field.

No; in the provincial election of which he spoke and at the general election the Conservatives in Quebec did not vote for gentlemen like my hon. friend, who were running in all the sixty-five constituencies, but preferred to vote for the Liberal candidates and for the participation of Canada in this war. They voted for unity within Canada in this time of terrible conflict. I do not wish to lengthen my remarks, because I believe I have said enough to show that in his speech to-night my hon. friend has not done what he should have done as a representative of his province.

We are proud of the part our province is playing in this conflict. We are proud to be associated with Britain. If there is one thing my fellow countrymen in Quebec are proud of at this time, it is that they are British as well as Canadian. I have tried to do my duty to my province. My colleagues know that they have done their duty.

The only people in Quebec who at the present time are opposed to the war work of this government are the communists. There may be some others, but they are afraid to express their views. The communists are secretly distributing circulars, and they are calling me names. My good friend, the leader of the opposition, referred to that at Charlottetown. They call me Judas Lapointe and all that sort of thing. I do not want to have the communists on my side. They do all this under cover. As the leader of the opposition said, they have sent me many anonymous letters threatening my life and threatening members of my family. But these people are cowards. When a man wants to do that sort of thing, he does not write a letter, he acts. Even if they do their dirty work, I will not mind. I am here to do my duty, and I shall do it. I shall try at all times to counteract all attacks like the one which the hon. member for Gaspe has launched to-night. I disdain that sort of thing. Let me tell him in all sincerity that as long as the people of the province of Quebec will show, as they have done on many occasions during the last three years, that they are with Cardin, Power and myself, I do not care whom the hon. member for Gaspe may be against.

Motion (Mr. Claxton) agreed to on division.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General by such members of this house as are of the honourable the privy council.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 10.46 p.m.

Wednesday, December 4, 1940.

The house met at three o'clock.

DIVORCE

JURISDICTION OF COURTS IN PROVINCE OF MARRIED WOMAN'S DOMICILE—MOTION FOR PRECEDENCE OF GOVERNMENT ORDER

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon) moved for leave to introduce a bill to amend The Divorce Jurisdiction Act, 1930.

[Mr. E. Lapointe.]

He said: Probably I cannot do better than refer to the explanatory note printed with this bill, which is very concise:

The purpose of this amendment is to vest jurisdiction in the divorce courts of the several provinces to try actions for divorce at the suit of a married woman deserted by and living apart from her husband where the woman is domiciled in the province at the date of the commencement of such action.

As the law presently stands the woman may bring suit only in the province where the husband was domiciled immediately prior to the desertion. This condition of the law works a great hardship on the deserted married woman who by reason of such desertion may have been forced to move to another province from that where the desertion took place. It is unreasonable that she should have to take her action back to the former.

I could give a longer explanation and perhaps cite instances and precedents, but if the bill is allowed to be given first reading that can be done on second reading.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to seek to supersede my hon. friend in the matter of the introduction of his bill, but I have already spoken to him about the matter. The procedure contemplated for to-day, as I think hon. members will recall, was that we would seek to proceed with the resolutions which were introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) on Monday last. It would not be possible under the rules to do this immediately without introducing a motion to proceed to government orders, and I am in a position to do so only on some measure that is debatable.

My hon. friend's motion for leave to introduce this bill is debatable. Therefore if he will permit me I am going to take advantage of this opportunity which the rules of the house afford—I refer to standing order 48—to move that the house do now proceed to government orders. If this motion is agreed to the house will immediately reach the government order with respect to ways and means.

I might add, knowing the desire of hon. members for information on some matters, that to-morrow I will ask that leave be given the government at the beginning of the sitting to answer the questions appearing on the order paper and to deal with the notices of motion for the production of papers. I should say also to my hon. friend, to make the matter quite clear, that I do not wish to prevent him from proceeding with his bill, and that another opportunity of so doing will be given him at an early day.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): That will be quite acceptable as far as I am concerned.

Motion (Mr. Mackenzie King) agreed to.

WAR BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON PROPOSALS OF MINISTER OF FINANCE FOR CONSERVATION OF FOREIGN EXCHANGE

The house resumed from Monday, December 2, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I realize that it is the desire of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and members of the government to expedite this resolution and the legislation to be based upon it, but the subject matter is of such importance and of such a character that I feel we would not be doing justice to it or to the occasion if we were to deal with it only in a perfunctory way.

I quite realize that I may not be the best qualified person to discuss such an abstruse and technical subject as foreign exchange, but I recall that in the session of 1935, while I had the honour of being a member of the government of the day, a statute was enacted which forms the basis of the operations of the foreign exchange control board.

It may be worth while to recall to the minds of hon. members just what was the position. It will be remembered that in the session of 1934 the Bank of Canada Act was passed, and that in the following year provision was made, by chapter 60 of the statutes of that year, for the establishment of an exchange fund. Section 6 of that statute, which provided for the control of exchange, was to come into effect only upon a date to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council published in the Canada Gazette. Shortly after that the election came along; the government of the day was defeated and a new government was installed, and that government did not do anything with respect to this legislation until the war came on. On September 15, 1939, shortly after war broke out, the foreign exchange control board was set up under the provisions of the War Measures Act, and on the same day a proclamation was issued bringing into effect the operations of section 6 of the Exchange Fund Act of 1935. That section reads as follows:

(1) For the purpose of endeavouring to control the external value of the Canadian monetary unit or of checking undue fluctuations in its exchange value the minister—

Under the act that is the Minister of Finance.

—may directly or through such agencies as he may designate cause any balances in the special account—

That is the account referred to in section 4 of the act.

—to be invested in

(a) gold;

(b) foreign exchange as defined in section twenty-six, subsection two (b) of the Bank of Canada Act; and

(c) balances with any bank in London or New York designated by the Minister of Finance.

(2) Gold or other investments purchased under the provisions of the preceding subsection may be resold on instructions from the minister.

By subsection 3 it is provided that the statute shall come into effect upon proclamation. This section, together with the order in council which was passed on September 15, forms the basis of the present position with respect to the control of foreign exchange in Canada.

It is with some degree of pride that I call attention to the fact that under a government which was not supposed to be strongly characterized by foresight or to have much knowledge of business the foundation was laid for the functioning of this important body. It is a matter to which I think I should refer, especially since the man who conceived and promulgated the idea has been so often traduced, as he has been even during the present session, by certain hon. gentlemen in this house. I am sure the Minister of Finance would be the last to deny that had it not been for the vision of that man and his knowledge of finance and monetary problems, we should not have been so well equipped as we are to-day to deal with what to me is an abstruse and technical matter.

Under the order in council passed on September 15, which is P.C. 2716, to which I have referred, setting up the foreign exchange control board, complete authority was taken for the regulation and control of foreign exchange. The provisions are lengthy and technical, and intensive study is required to understand them. Control over foreign exchange, foreign trade and related matters is provided for in part II, which will repay perusal on the part of anyone interested. The board began to function immediately, and its operations have grown into great proportions. On the whole I am satisfied it has operated directly for the benefit of Canada and in accordance with the purposes of the promoters of the legislation authorizing it.

I am well aware that there is a school of thought in Canada which, shall I say, would be pleased if there were no such control. But anyone who has given even cursory study to the problem will realize that the old saying "what is one man's meat is another man's poison" is much to the point in relation to a matter of this kind. I know that it would be greatly advantageous to exporters in Canada if there were freedom from exchange control. I know that such freedom would redound to the benefit of some, and especially to the benefit of our paper companies and those who are manufacturing and exporting products of a similar kind. But I should like to emphasize the fact that in so far as some would benefit by what might be described as extreme profits, derived under an exchange market free from control, just to that extent would other interests in Canada suffer. On balance I believe that while a few would gain, and perhaps gain considerably, the public generally would suffer more than the extent of the advantage to those who had gained so much.

I may say therefore at the outset that I am fully in accord with the principle of exchange control and the elimination of speculation. I was going to add "profiteering," but I shall not use that word, because it would not be profiteering in the true sense; on the contrary it would be a quite legitimate transaction.

Having said this much may I return to the minister's statement of Monday last. It was of course a carefully prepared exposition of the government's policy and point of view. Let me say at once that this move on the part of the government was not unexpected by the public, and certainly should not have been unexpected on the part of hon. members who have been following with any degree of care our exchange position in relation to the United States and the mother country.

The balance of trade between Canada and the United States, over a long period of time, has been continuously adverse to us. The war has accentuated that position. When last month I had occasion to speak on the debate on the address in reply I placed on Hansard some figures showing the adverse balance of trade as between the empire and the United States and as between Canada and the United States, with respect only to commodities. These figures show that in the three-year period ending August 31 last the adverse balance of trade against the empire was $1,624,000,000, and as against Canada alone it was $569,000,000. May I repeat that those figures are in respect only to commodities.

Without having any reference to those figures, I believe the minister said in effect, if not expressly—and in my opinion there can be no doubt as to the truth of his statement—that while these figures may have been substantially reduced by deductions made for gold sales and for invisible services such as tourist traffic, there must have been a substantial addition to the adverse balance of trade, particularly within the last three months, and it is progressively growing greater. The fact must be recognized that no attempt has been made to restrict the exportation of dividends on capital invested in Canadian securities by residents of what he describes as hard currency countries. Furthermore—and above all, I should think—the adverse balance of trade both as between Canada and the United States and as between the empire and the United States must have increased with remarkable celerity within the last three months, and in the succeeding months in my opinion it will grow considerably.

The problem, therefore, is one which not only confronts us in the immediate present but which I believe will become increasingly intense as time goes on and so long as we are a belligerent country having to buy extensively in the United States. Having regard, then, to the increased tension in the matter, if I may so describe it, the condition is one which demanded immediate and drastic action. I suggest to the minister not only that there has been delay, but in my view, and with the best information at my command, the provisions are not adequate to maintain the equilibrium which I believe is necessary if we are to continue the present ratio or spread between our dollar and the United States dollar.

As I intimated to the minister by an interjection I made during the course of his observations, unless we are told the full story and are able to predicate our deductions, assertions and recommendations on facts placed before us, we cannot fully appreciate the situation, nor can we deal with it adequately. With a good deal of temerity I shall at a later stage in my remarks offer some recommendations—realizing, as I said a moment ago, that possibly I am not best qualified to deal with the matter. But unless we are given more information, unless we are told the sum total of our present exchange deficit and the anticipated total of that deficit from time to time as the adverse balance grows, I repeat that we cannot fully appreciate the situation or deal adequately with it. I regret that the minister, for reasons which at least to me he did not make very clear, found himself unable to take the house and country into his confidence by stating what the deficit is.

I do not suggest that the minister declined to give the information on the ground that to do so might be in the nature of giving aid to the enemy. I cannot conceive that there could be any sound or common-sense basis for any such reason as that. There may be reasons which I have not yet been able to divine for his not giving the house this information. I ask the minister to give us at some stage in the proceedings reasons over and above those he has already suggested, and which were in the vaguest terms, as to why we should not have this information. It is my opinion that upon knowledge of the quantum of the deficit in our obligations in respect of the exchange position between Canada and the United States will depend the judgment we may seek to pass upon the measures the minister is promoting for at least the alleviation of the position.

I suppose if I were clever enough I could read between the lines and gather from the information the minister did give the house a reasonably close estimate of the present deficit. I am not suggesting that I am a statistician, but it should be possible for anyone versed in the exchange position to make such an estimate. I have endeavoured to do something of the kind, and I suggest to the minister with regard to his estimate of $200,000,000, that the actual figure is higher than that. If I understand his proposals correctly, he hopes to improve the position—shall I put it that way?—to the extent of between five and six million dollars per month. If that be the measure of his proposals, I say that they are wholly inadequate and that we shall have to deal with the matter at a later stage and perhaps in a more drastic and realistic manner.

It must not be supposed by anyone that this is the first move that has been made. During the course of his remarks the minister set out the steps which had been taken since the war broke out at least to touch the position—I shall not say to keep in step with it. In his comprehensive review on Monday he indicated that up to June last the general policy involved no restriction of import or export trade, with the single exception that the board refused to provide exchange for the export of capital from Canada except within certain narrowly prescribed limits and with certain exceptions for capital that had been invested in Canada after control was established. In April an important step had been taken in exchange control when the foreign exchange acquisition order was passed under which all our available liquid supplies of foreign exchange, United States currency being the most obvious, as distinct from such foreign assets as securities, were placed directly under the control of the board, and all our nationals had to turn in their United States money. A further step was taken as a result of the budget in June when the war exchange tax of ten per cent was imposed upon all imports except those from sterling countries. In addition, special progressive excise taxes were imposed on automobiles. In July the board took further measures to prohibit the sale of foreign exchange to Canadians for pleasure travel abroad.

While some of these measures are not of substantial importance, I suppose they are all relatively important. But they have not been sufficient to keep the position in equilibrium, and as a result we had the budget of Monday last. In reflecting upon this budget certain questions have arisen in my mind. The first is: Are the new provisions adequate? I think I have answered that already. In my opinion they are not. They may be just the first dose to the Canadian people. That may be sound policy; I do not know what the reaction is throughout the country, but I am inclined to think that it is good. With the principle involved I am in accord. I am in accord also with the principle involved in the second schedule of the budget, which deals with the loosening up—I use that expression for want of a better one—of sterling exchange in this country.

Having read the resolutions, I ask myself: Are the safeguards against price rises adequate? Further, while I do not wish to deal at the moment with individual positions I am wondering what will happen with respect to magazines and periodicals. Would it not be better for parliament to lay down the rules with respect to this matter rather than to leave it to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson)? It seems to me that this is a delegation to a minister of authority which ought to be retained by parliament.

Prior to 1935 the government of the day sought to deal with the question of the importation of cheap United States periodicals—not in relation to exchange, but in relation to their effect upon national literature and national sentiment. I remember that hon. gentlemen opposite, especially the Prime Minister, opposed the principle of the imposition of taxation upon the advertising in these magazines. The Prime Minister took the broad view that there should be no tariff on brains. That is a high-sounding phrase, but what was the effect of his action in wiping out the protection to Canadian periodical producers when he came into power? It has been this: In five years the importation of these periodicals—I was going to use another term—has increased in value from about $2,250,000 to $6,500,000. If hon. members will go with me to any large news-stand in this city and look at the periodicals on sale I think they will agree with me that, exchange considerations or no exchange considerations, the government should exercise some authority to keep these things out of the country and away from the Canadian people. There is no tariff on brains, but there should be a tariff on trash.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have never supported the allowing in of any of these rotten sheets.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I dare say my right hon. friend did not think it would have the effect it did. I know the question was considered minutely with those in the trade and it was felt at the time that the only way to deal effectively with the matter was to tax the advertising. When the Prime Minister opposed those measures I do not believe he had it in mind that the traffic would grow to the proportions it has.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have always been in favour of prohibiting altogether certain classes of magazines or periodicals, particularly the type referred to by my hon. friend.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If my right hon. friend has been in favour of that, he certainly has been slow to act. In bookstalls in any of the large cities in Canada I can show him magazines of the veriest trash which should never have been allowed into the country. Some are even worse than trash. Occasionally salacious magazines have been prohibited by action of the Department of National Defence—

Mr. ILSLEY: The Department of National Revenue.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It ought to be the Department of National Defence. I think it would be a good defensive measure to give the jurisdiction to that department. However, I appreciate the fact that it can be handled better by the customs than by any other branch.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think I am safe in saying that hundreds have been prohibited.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There are hundreds more that ought to be prohibited. I shall not go further into the matter, but I suggest to the minister that parliament might very well be asked to deal with the question of policy rather than leave it to the discretion of the Minister of National Revenue. I do not question his good faith or his understanding of the situation, but this is an exercise of power on a matter of principle with which parliament itself should deal.

Mr. ILSLEY: Parliament does deal with it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not so sure about that. My reading is that a very wide discretion is left in the hands of the Minister of National Revenue. That means, in his officers. They may or may not move. I do not for a moment suggest that the minister should have the duty and obligation of making examinations himself because he must rely on his officials. Many a time they have been asked to move, and many a time they have failed to move, but sometimes they have moved.

I shall not deal with that further except to suggest to the minister that we might very well in this house settle the principle upon which this action is to be based. I hope that, war or no war, the time will never come when Canada will allow these salacious magazines to appear again on the bookstalls of this country. I am thinking of generations yet to come.

There is another thought. When I heard the minister's explanation of his budget proposals I wondered what steps had been taken and what avenues had been explored by the ministry to increase the flow of our exports into the neighbouring republic. From our point of view that would be, I suggest, the ideal method of correcting the exchange position between the two countries. I referred to that when I spoke in the house on the 12th of November. It is astounding to me that a little nation of twelve million people should buy at least twenty-five times more per capita from the United States than they buy per capita from us.

Mr. ILSLEY: We are selling twenty-five times as much to them as they are to us per capita.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I say it is astounding to me that a little nation like Canada, with twelve million people, should buy from the United States of America, with one hundred and thirty million people, twenty-five times more per capita than they buy from us. That is a situation which I suggest to the government and to the people of Canada has been going on altogether too long, and it cannot continue indefinitely if we are to keep our heads above water. In the old days we had a remedy for that situation. We had a settlement on a three-way basis, but that, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) himself stated, is no longer open to us. If that be so, what is ahead of this country if it is not national bankruptcy, war or no war. It is a situation that must be corrected, and we are now in a favourable position to have it corrected. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has, he has told us, paved the whole way. He has got the United States to the point where they will cooperate with us in the defence of our nation, and financing is a part of the defence of this nation and of the north American hemisphere. I ask the minister to tell the house if any avenues have been explored with respect to sending our exports to the United States.

Mr. ILSLEY: Certainly. That has been our policy ever since we came into office in 1935.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We are tied up to the Canada-United States agreement; and the minister in dealing with the question, in making an apology, shall I say, for taking no action in the matter of fresh fruits and vegetables, made it quite plain that we dare not go back to the United States and ask them to correct that position because it would put the agreement in jeopardy. That just shows the futility of having our tariffs made for us in Washington.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does the hon. gentleman want us to scrap that measure of extending our export trade to the United States?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I do not suggest for a moment that we should scrap it.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would have that effect.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But I do suggest that if conditions are as ripe as has been indicated to the house and the country we can go to the people of the United States and say: We are increasing our purchase of United States products, particularly manufactured products, and especially war materials; we are finding great difficulty in paying for them; the load of adverse exchange is becoming increasingly burdensome, and because we are buying so much more from you than we did in days gone by, we think it a fair proposal that avenues should be explored with a view to increasing our exports to the United States.

I could indicate to the minister articles which the United States could use in their war effort right at the present time. I might mention base metals, for instance. Has the United States ever been approached to let down the bars against our base metals? Has the United States been approached to extend to us further facilities for the export of more of the natural products of this country?

Take, for example, the small item of cream. Cream is in the agreement, but the membership of this house could drink in one day all the cream that the United States is importing from us. But the dairy farmers of eastern Ontario, the dairy farmers of the eastern townships, the dairy farmers of Quebec counties lying along the Vermont and New Hampshire borders, and the dairy farmers of my province, where we are just twelve hours overnight from the Boston market, could ship substantial quantities of cream to the United States every day of the year, to the advantage of the United States consumer and without any great disadvantage to the United States producer. These are matters which I think should be explored.

One of my colleagues suggests, what about quotas? I have no desire to go into details. I am trying to deal with principles and leaving it to others to give specific instances and cases. I am questioning in my mind whether the government, in meeting this problem, have met it full face. It has two aspects. I have tried to deal with one of them, that of increasing exports as opposed to restricting imports. I suggest it is of the greatest importance, and I commend it to the government. We should make every possible effort to increase our exports to the United States in view of the fact that we are daily increasing our consumption of their manufactured products. I believe that in war time they would meet us in the right spirit.

I know that in peace time the situation was difficult. I know that in the winter of 1934 and the spring of 1935 we could do nothing with the officials of the state department of the United States with respect to two homely products of the maritime provinces, fish and potatoes. We got a quota for potatoes, a quota which a single county in New Brunswick could easily fill in any given year. What has happened this year with regard to potatoes? Does the minister know? We have no tariff against United States potatoes, and according to the trade reports of this country potatoes from Aroostook county are being imported into Canada via Windsor, to the detriment of the New Brunswick producer. That may be all right, but it is pretty hard to tell the farmer in the Saint John river valley that it is all right. Where is Manitoba getting its potatoes from this year? It may not be feasible to ship potatoes so far west, but my information is that the crop in that province is a failure.

Mr. WARD: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): My information is that the crop in Manitoba is a failure and that they are importing potatoes from the Dakotas.

Mr. WARD: That is just not true.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the hon. member will go over to the bureau of statistics, he will get the information that North Dakota potatoes are being imported into Manitoba. The trouble with my hon. friend is that he does not want to hear the truth and he does not want to know the truth.

Let me come back to the more technical aspects of this matter. When war broke out and the control was established, the foreign exchange control board set an arbitrary rate. I do not mean, arbitrary in the sense that it was purely arbitrary; it was a rate which they in their judgment—and I do not know any body who would have better information on the point—deemed to be a rate which possibly could be sustained without any ups and downs over a long period of years, and it had the merit of stability. I think that is a fair position to take with regard to it; and in so far as it had that merit of stability, it was an advantage to business people in this country and in the neighbouring republic. They fixed the rate on purchases at ten per cent, and the rate on sales at eleven per cent, the additional one per cent covering the charges of operation. The board thus came into possession of the substantial profit of one per cent, a portion of which, I understand, they had to give to the commercial banks of the dominion in return for the services which they rendered in carrying out the operations of the board. Just what that rate is I have heard, but I have forgotten. However, there must have been accumulated, in the fifteen months or so which have elapsed since that time, a very substantial fund, which the board, I assume, has made or will make use of in connection with stabilization operations. At all events, out of that fund will be paid the cost of the operations, and there will be, I assume, a substantial surplus as well.

I should say this: My understanding of the rate established was that it was about half-way between the value of the United States dollar and the British pound sterling—it could not be said to be pegged to either—and was fixed at that rate as the result of the exercise of the best judgment of those having charge, and for the reason that it was about half-way between the two currencies. I am bound to say, so far as my information goes—and I have made inquiries—it has operated well, although I am of opinion—and the necessity of this legislation bears me out in that opinion—that in recent months the rate charged for foreign exchange has been on the low side.

I have already outlined what steps, more or less important, were taken in the preceding months, and I have indicated in a general way what thoughts occurred to me with relation to the present proposal. The measures proposed have, broadly speaking, two ends. First, they are to help Canada finance war purchases in the United States. I think they have a second purpose, a psychological one, namely, to impress upon the Canadian people the necessity of not spending their money on articles they can do without; and that is all to the good. I have advocated that for a long time. I have no objection whatever at this time to the principle of that kind of legislation.

I shall have some objection, as we go into committee, with respect to the incidence of that burden. There is room, I should say, for honest difference of opinion with regard to that, and it may be that the minister—although I have found his mind rather inflexible in days gone by; having set his mind upon a certain course, he is loath to change it—will be in a position to say that he will give more than consideration to any suggestions we make with respect to it. But on the general principle I and my friends are in agreement. I think it serves the two-fold purpose of helping our war effort and of instilling into the Canadian people the necessity of sacrificing something. There will be, of course, some whom it will not affect because they cannot make any more sacrifices than they are making. There will be a middle class who will be affected. Then there will be a class of well-to-do people who will have, in spite of everything, what they want as long as they have money to pay for it.

In its second phase this proposal is to help Britain finance her purchases in Canada; and with that, too, I am in substantial agreement. But here again, in connection with the incidence of this lifting of restrictions on British imports, there will, I think, be room for honest differences of opinion, and we can argue those out in the later stages.

I have in mind at the moment the question of Nova Scotia coal. I do not think the importation of British bituminous coal free of duty will be immediately detrimental to the production of coal in Nova Scotia, because the information I have is that to-day coal is a scarce commodity. But I venture to suggest that, before this war is over, the question will become a very live one, and I am going to leave my colleague from Nova Scotia, the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) to deal with it.

Before I leave this question, I wish to say to the minister that Nova Scotia coal is the only coal which this free importation of British bituminous can affect. They both will have to go into the same market unless the market increases beyond what any of us visualize that it will increase to. Whatever is imported from the other side will displace Nova Scotia coal. If we are prepared to make that sacrifice, well and good. I know that all these changes in policy and all these diversions of trade are bound to affect somebody. They cannot help doing so, once a channel of trade is established. How about the effect on our policy of subventions? It will affect that policy indirectly. I wonder whether the minister has thought that through.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, if he did, he did not say anything about it. We shall have ample opportunity to discuss that on the committee stage. I personally would have preferred to delay my remarks until we were in committee, but we are faced with the rule of this house which I had in mind when I spoke briefly the other day, and which the leaders of the two groups to my left had also clearly in mind, namely, that if there were no general discussion on this resolution, then, when we got into committee of ways and means, we could not deal with the general principles and we would be held down to the item immediately under discussion. If, for that reason, the passage of these measures is delayed, it is because I think there would have been a too rigid application of the rule. With that I think the Prime Minister and members of the government will have to be content.

The government propose to deal with the first phase of our exchange position by restricting the imports which are listed in the resolutions tabled. I have already pointed out what in my view are some of the glaring omissions. I am not going to deal in any detail with the question of fruits and vegetables, but I would point out that in four weeks' time the Florida strawberry crop will be on the market. Florida strawberries are ready for local consumption in that state on Christmas day, and a week later they begin to move out in carload lots. Strawberries will come also from Texas, Louisiana and other southern states. Can the minister tell this country that fresh Florida strawberries in January are a necessity for the health of the Canadian people, or to help win the war?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, they are not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course not. Then take the case of citrus fruits; we all like citrus fruits, there is no doubt about it—and in passing I should like to say that there is no better grapefruit than that grown in Florida. But at the hotel we are eating grapefruit from Honduras and Jamaica, and oranges from Dominica and Honduras. I believe the health argument does not hold water; we can get these fruits from the sterling area. We can get them, and there is transportation for them; the Lady boats are coming back half loaded at times.

The fact of the matter is that we have not dealt with this question of fruit and vegetables in a realistic manner; we have not been allowed to. I am not going to pursue that line of thought any further; the minister knows exactly what I mean. In my view, we have had the big stick held over us.

I will leave the question of new potatoes to my hon. friend on my left. Bermuda grows potatoes; they will be on the market shortly. And Bermuda is in the sterling area.

In the course of his remarks, as reported on page 555 of Hansard, the Minister of Finance indicated four principles which had governed the government in making up the list of goods to be restricted. He said:

> The articles prohibited should be such as consumers can legitimately be expected to do without in war time or for which their requirements can probably be met from the durable goods which they already have on hand.
> The list should include finished goods rather than raw materials or parts or equipment for Canadian industries so that disturbance to Canadian industry and to those employed in it will be kept to a minimum.
> Wherever possible, goods used by the well-to-do rather than those used by the mass of the public should be restricted.
> The items should be such as to require a minimum of administrative machinery and action in order to carry out the restriction.

The first three are important; the last one I do not think is. With the first three statements of principle I do not think there can be much quarrel, if any.

In the committee of ways and means there are to be two resolutions. The first of these precedes the introduction of a bill to be entitled the War Exchange Conservation Act; and appended to that resolution are two schedules. The first contains a list of items, based on the tariff classification, the importation of which from all countries except those in the sterling area and Newfoundland is to be subject to restriction; and with regard to part I of the schedule, no permits are to be granted for their importation from the so-called hard-currency countries. Part II of the first schedule comprises goods for which permits to import from hard-currency countries will be granted temporarily but on a decreasing scale.

I question the desirability of parliament vesting in any minister authority of that kind. In other words, the Minister of National Revenue may say to John Jones, "You may import under permit", and to Tom Brown, "You may not import." There is the opportunity for abuse, for discrimination, because this is to be left to the judgment, shall we say, of one man. No matter how reputable he may be or how high his character, I submit that is not good legislation. If it were not war time, I would fight that principle. I suggest to the minister that parliament itself ought to grapple with the principle that is to be followed here, and not leave it to the discretion of the minister. In the hands of a minister who might be weak, of a minister who might be susceptible to all kinds of pressure, I can visualize that great injustices might be done. I do not like the principle, but I am not going to labour that point any further.

In dealing with our exchange position, we must take into consideration the question of the cost of carriage, which is also important. Under present-day conditions we have to find, if I am correctly informed, no less a sum than $50,000,000 per annum for freight payments alone; and, so far as I know, there is no counterbalancing compensation. If the minister knows of any, I wish he would tell me for my information. That is a dead-weight debt on our exchange board. It is an extremely important item in arriving at the true adverse balance of trade.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is that railway freight?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, and express.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is net?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am told that that would be net, that there is not much offset to it. I may be wrong in that because my avenues of information are, of course, not nearly as adequate as those available to the minister. He has the official authority to find out these things; I have to get them as best I can. But I am informed that that is about the net amount we have to provide. And it will be increasingly great as we increase our imports.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will check up on it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Just a word more with respect to these fresh fruits. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) intimated the other day that on his visit to England he was told that fresh fruits are not considered a necessity in England in war time; hence the failure to take any part of our apple crop. Canned fruits, I understand, are not barred, but even these are well down the line on their list of what are considered necessaries during this war—No. 9 I am told; I thought it was No. 12.

Then there is the question of substitutes in this country. Why should we not try to educate our people to use substitutes? They may have to come to this. I am told that the humble tomato contains exactly the same kind of vitamins as the lordly orange that comes from the groves of Florida.

Mr. McCANN: But not in the same quantity. It takes twenty times as much tomato juice to give the same quantity of vitamins.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): My hon. friend is an expert, of course, but I think I would rather page another expert before I would be quite willing to accept that statement. However, that is a suggestion which I throw out in passing; I am not at all certain of my ground, nor do I believe my hon. friend is certain either.

I have already given my views on the matter of extending our sales to hard-currency countries, and I need not go over that field again. Something should be said, and I think I should say it now, with respect to the second part of the proposals, the extension of the British preference. The schedules in connection with the extension of the British preference are extremely wide, and I am certain that we do not know all the implications. I should like to ask the minister a question just from the point of view of revenue. I understand that the government is not putting forward this proposal on the basis of revenue at all, nor do I think it should be put on that basis. If there is any man in this house who wants to help Britain win the war, it is your humble servant, and as far as I am concerned, I am willing to make any sacrifices that I may be called upon to make to further that end. But it is a problem that the government must keep in mind, because if we lose certain revenues from one source we have to make them up from another. The minister did not attempt to give us any estimate of the loss of revenue. I should like to ask this, though: Has he looked into the question of loss of employment that may be occasioned by some of these proposals?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not anticipated that there will be any loss of employment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has the minister gone into the matter with any degree of particularity?

Mr. ILSLEY: Pretty well.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Iet me bring it home to him. In my county there is a cotton mill. There are three in New Brunswick. Two towns are dependent for their very existence on the operation of the mill in my county. Prior to the outbreak of war, these mills were running only three days a week; the operatives were living on a standard of existence that was below the border line. The war broke out; substantial orders were given; the mills ran on full time and on overtime for a long period. The war orders are now practically all filled, except in connection with those mills equipped to make cotton and wool goods. That is not the situation with the mills at Milltown or the mill at Marysville. The number of days worked per week has been steadily dropping since they filled their war orders. How is this going to affect them? I must ask myself that question, naturally, because it will be put to me by the first man or woman from the town of Marysville that I meet on the street.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let me put it in just a word. The cost of production of cotton textiles in England is estimated to be up about 43 per cent, and therefore the price that will be charged for cotton textiles is so much higher than it would be under normal circumstances that the cotton industry of Canada does not require the very moderate protection it has had in the past.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am glad to hear the minister say that the protection is very moderate, because during all the years I have been in this house and for longer than that—

Mr. ILSLEY: I mean it is very moderate as against Great Britain.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is very moderate as against Great Britain; I agree with that, but even then I have heard mutterings about it. Let us analyse the minister's statement. The cost of the raw cotton is the same to them and to us, and that is the big item.

Mr. CRERAR: It costs them more.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am speaking about the raw cotton at the point of production; that cost is the same.

Mr. CRERAR: That is what I am speaking about.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; the hon. member is not speaking about the same thing. He is speaking about the cost of the cotton landed. Of course it costs more in Great Britain, the carriage and the exchange have to be added, and it has to be paid for in a depreciated currency. We are in exactly the same position, but to a lesser degree; but the cost of raw cotton at Savannah or Atlanta or any other big cotton market is exactly the same to Britain as it is to us, so there is no distinction at all. Of course there is the cost of carriage in war time and the cost of war insurance to England; but it must be borne in mind that this carriage is nearly all by water. As against that, ours is rail carriage every mile of the way from Atlanta, Georgia, to Fredericton. I have often wondered why it was not brought in by water, but that has never been done. It comes up via Chicago; the freight is substantial, and it has to be paid in United States currency.

I have not had time to make any comparison, but I suggest to the minister that altogether aside from the question of the difference in exchange, the cost of transportation is against Canada qua the United Kingdom. I may be wrong in that, but that is the theory I have in mind, and I have given my reasons for it. There is the question of the adverse exchange. Undoubtedly on a pound of cotton the amount allotted for exchange by the British converter will be slightly greater than the loss sustained by the Canadian converter, but the amount per pound or per yard of material will be so small as to be almost infinitesimal.

Then there is the cost of conversion. I have always understood, and in this I think I am borne out by those who know, that the cost of converting cotton goods in England is less than it is in Canada. How in the world, then, can the minister make the statement that there has been a rise of 48 per cent in the cost of production in England, without taking into account the fact that there must have been a rise in the cost of production here as well?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am informed that there has been an increase of 43 per cent, not 48 per cent, in the cost of production of cotton textiles in England. The hon. gentleman must not forget those two Atlantic trips.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I quite agree that there is an ocean trip involved.

Mr. ILSLEY: Two of them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But I would also point out to the minister that goods shipped to Canada come in ships that are seeking cargoes. The whole trend of commerce is from west to east; the heavy cargoes are going from Canada to the United Kingdom, and in some instances the ships are coming back not filled. The same thing will apply to coal. If British bituminous coal is coming to this country, I venture to say that it will come as ballast, bearing the very lowest rate. I would ask the minister to investigate that. It will not bear a commodity rate unless it comes in full shipload lots. I do not know what the situation is in Saint John this year, because the condition has been erratic, but for a long period of years most of the coal that has come to that city, most of the British anthracite which I myself burn, has come in as ballast, bearing the lowest possible freight rate.

Mr. ILSLEY: Can the hon. gentleman suggest anything we can do for England?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, yes; I can suggest a number of things we can do for England and I am willing to go the whole way on cottons. I am only asking the minister if he has thought the thing through. I am glad to know that this provision is only for the duration of the war. Certainly I could think of things to do for England. I would buy some woollens from her, and would thereby do something for the woollen trade in England. That has not been thought of.

Mr. ILSLEY: Has the hon. member thought that through?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would make the gesture, anyway. I know it would have a detrimental effect on some people. I have heard someone say that he was glad the woollen schedules were not touched. I would help England in any way I could, unless that help meant suicide to Canadian nationals and Canadian labour. I will go that far with the minister. I am anxious to that extent about the situation, and that is why I tell him I am going to support these resolutions.

I do not believe, however, that the minister and the officers in his department have adequately thought through the implications in the proposals, and I am certain they are wrong about cotton textiles. That is my conclusion from the information at my disposal.

Anything further I have to say I shall defer until the items in the schedules are under discussion. I have already indicated my desire to help England in her present position. I want it to be understood that we on this side of the house are in favour of the principle of aiding England by the means suggested or by other means. Let me say this: I have never forgotten the ringing words of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom on the occasion of his ascendancy to that office. He said, "I have nothing to offer but toil, sweat, blood and tears." Neither have the British people in these days; and the people of Canada should emulate that example. That is why we are willing to make sacrifices to help England win this war.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) rose in his place last night and declared that he was a Britisher to the core. I am sure that statement will have a wonderful effect throughout the country. I felt like applauding him for making it, but I could not help thinking that if he had adopted that attitude years ago, there would have been much less trouble in Canada.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): My hon. friend is wrong in listening to his supporters.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Let bygones be bygones. I wish to tell the Minister of Justice right here and now that my admiration for him began to glow when I read the report of the speech he made on the question of the neutrality of Canada. I say to him that it was a noble speech, and after reading it I forgave him for much of what has happened in days gone by. I am willing to do that; that is my attitude toward this whole matter.

I was impressed with the declaration of the Prime Minister in England; and we in Canada should help, even if it pinches every last one of us. Therefore I say to the Minister of Finance that we will support these proposals, but we shall reserve the right to examine each and every one of the items he proposes to change.

There is just one other matter to which I might refer before I resume my seat. When the matter of foreign exchange came to the front, the thought occurred to me that the government of Canada might very well ask residents of the United States to leave their dividends in Canada to be invested in Canadian securities, just as we compel them to leave their capital assets in Canada, invested in Canadian securities, and not to be removed during the war. I wonder whether it would not be possible to ask the well-to-do in the United States who hold these securities to help us out in these times. Has that possibility been explored? If I understood correctly what the minister said the other day, it takes the total gold production of Canada to pay those dividends and interest. I believe my suggestion will have to be accepted by him sooner or later, and I believe it should be the subject matter of negotiation now rather than later.

I commend that suggestion to the minister. Already, in effect, we have frozen capital assets in Canada. Is it asking too much to do as I now suggest, or are we afraid of the repercussions on our own investments in the United States? I know it is a ticklish matter to deal with, but I suggest that we shall have to take drastic action in connection with it, and that the minister might well explore the possibilities.

I had toyed with the idea of suggesting that an arrangement be made between ourselves and the two nations now so closely associated with us, one of which is our mother country and our ally, and the other, our good neighbour to the south, for the tying of our respective currencies together for the duration of the war. That would be done along the same lines as were followed when the British pound and the French franc were tied, until the time of the fall of France. I have abandoned that theory, and I shall tell the house why. I am afraid the burden would be so great that it would fall altogether upon the shoulders of our neighbour to the south, and that it would not be decent to ask them to accept that burden.

But, over and above this reason, let me say to the minister I would oppose that theory to-day because I believe that so long as we are a nation, so long as we call ourselves Canadians, we must, by all means at our command, preserve if we can our fiscal independence. Once we lose that fiscal independence, the laws of economics will become too strong for us, and I am afraid that the next step would be the loss of our political existence. Therefore I reject that theory, and suggest to the minister that if I have made the suggestion, he ought not even to toy with it.

I have been impressed with the thought that I should urge upon the government the necessity of beginning at once negotiations with the United States toward the establishing of credits for us, and to enable us to borrow over there. I am afraid we shall have to come to that sooner or later. I realize, however, that there are certain legal impediments in the way. First of all, there is the neutrality act. I have no doubt that after the examination now under way in the United States senate, both the neutrality act and the Johnson act will be at least moderated. I believe the way will be opened. But let me say to the minister and to the people of Canada that borrowing is just a palliative; it is just a mortgaging of the future; it is just stalling off the day of settlement. If we create a heavy debt, at the conclusion of this great struggle we may find ourselves so far in debt to the United States that our economic and political existence will be in jeopardy. We ought to stall off that evil day to the last minute.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to discuss at any great length the details of the special budget. I realize of course that the new financial proposals with which we are faced are made necessary on account of our war expenditures, and that we have to face a grave economic and financial situation in the future.

While in the main supporting the proposals made by the minister at this time, we wish to offer some constructive criticisms, because we believe the proposals are insufficient to meet the needs of the country now and in the near future. We understand that in presenting this budget the government's objectives are the conservation of foreign exchange and the encouragement of individual saving among our people so that the savings may be available for war purposes. Such revenue as may come from the excise tax must be considered to be purely incidental and not a primary requirement of the tax. It seems to me that an equally desirable objective is the maintenance of the Canadian dollar at a stable value in terms of foreign exchange and particularly in relation to the currency of the United States; hence I presume the proposals for the restriction, indeed the prohibition, of the import of many commodities.

On the other hand, large purchases by Britain in Canada make it essential that we should buy more from Great Britain. In other words, we have to conserve our United States dollars for purchases by Canada in the United States, and if possible expand the amount of Canadian dollars available to Great Britain in order that she may pay for the very large purchases she is committed to make in this country. We are heartily in accord with the proposals made to improve Britain's ability to purchase here. The criticism that we would make is that they are too timid and therefore largely ineffective. I do not agree with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) in that regard. I do not think that you can have it both ways. I do not think that you can keep certain British goods out of Canada and yet serve the British need to the fullest extent. Consequently we have to face the facts as they are before us; and so we approve of the removal of the duty on a fairly wide range of British textiles.

I notice that most other products, excepting coal, will be subject to a tax of ten per cent or more. This tax, together with the high ocean freight rates, constitutes a fairly substantial protective tariff. When I looked over the schedules a small matter occurred to me. For example, why should soap powders and soaps, of which Britain produces a very large quantity, not be included in the free list? In a previous speech which I made in the house I referred to soap advertising, and a few days later I read in the Montreal Gazette a reprint of an article which had appeared in one of the United States women's magazines in which it was stated that the soap companies spent upon radio time alone, exclusive of the voices and scripts, the enormous sum of $30,000,000 per year. This is a substantial sum of money, and I believe that there is a field for further taxation in connection with that industry, or else British soap should be allowed to come into the country free of duty. I make one further observation in that regard. To my mind, more British goods should be placed upon the free list. I have always been in favour of British commonwealth free trade, and I am glad to see a step being taken in that direction. I wish that under the pressure of war the government had gone a little further. As I have said, high ocean freight and insurance rates give Canadian industry quite adequate protection.

We are in agreement with the policy of prohibiting the importation of certain articles from the United States, because we believe that an embargo or a prohibition based on a well-thought-out plan is preferable to increased tariffs. But this prohibition places a responsibility upon the government, and I noticed that during the course of his remarks the minister recognized that responsibility. We have to see that the prices of Canadian-made articles which receive protection through this prohibition are adequately controlled by the war-time prices and trade board. I hope the government will reconsider its policy in regard to price control. We do not agree with the present policy of allowing price increases and then permitting appeals, as it were, to the prices and trade board. I have always thought that when war broke out what we should have done was to set a basic date for commodity prices, as they did in Great Britain in September, 1939, for a large number of articles. Then if the industries felt they required a higher price they could appeal to the board for permission to increase prices beyond that which prevailed on the basic date. I believe that to be the better procedure of the two.

I think our income and excess profits tax legislation will reveal that considerable sums of money have been made out of price increases. For example, I have been reliably informed that certain people interested in sugar—not in the raising of the sugar beet but in the manufacturing of the refined sugar —have made vast sums of money this year because of the increased prices which have been permitted by our government. Unless efficient control is exercised and severe penalties provided in connection with other commodities, huge fortunes will be made out of the war situation. Unless we watch this condition closely there is danger of playing into the hands of the great monopolies or near monopolies which to-day control our oil industry, our sugar industry and our tobacco industry—to mention only three which were subject of comment in the price spreads report of several years ago. In adopting this budget parliament should make such provision as will ensure that our people shall be protected against any exactions because of this new measure.

I take it that the excise taxes proposed will serve a dual purpose. First, they will restrict consumption because of increased prices and, second, they will bring in some revenue. The question I asked when I saw these excise taxes was: Whose consumption will the taxes decrease? I venture to say that the people who will have to forego buying the articles taxed will be those in receipt of the lower incomes. Those in receipt of higher incomes will be able to buy as before. Some of the articles which are being subjected to fairly high excise taxes are not luxury goods but actual necessities for many persons in the low income groups. For example, electric and gas stoves. In this city there are many rooms and many homes in which no provision is made for a coal stove and where consequently an electric stove is a necessity. Electric stoves, ranges, heaters, lamps, washing machines—even the toaster upon which many a poor working girl earning six or eight dollars a week gets her breakfast before she goes to business in the morning—are not luxuries to that type of person, and in that respect this is not a luxury tax but a tax upon something that is necessary to their way of life.

As I said a moment ago, for the well-to-do all that the new taxes involve is an increase in the price, thus depleting funds available to them for other expenditures, for luxuries, or for savings. Hence it will be seen that the incidence of the tax may not fall justly upon all our people. A twenty-five per cent excise tax on the range of goods to which I have referred is to my mind the most objectionable feature of the government's proposals, because it tends in some instances to lower an already too low standard of living.

Again I would point out in the same connection that we are trying to raise our war revenues all the time in the wrong places. We appeal for support for sales of war savings stamps and certificates. I recognize that such appeals are necessary and useful because every group of our people ought to be asked to do all they can in connection with our present effort. But these appeals are mostly to the small income groups upon whom the new excise taxes and increased prices will fall heavily, thus restricting their ability to buy war savings stamps and certificates. If, of course, the object is to divert the electrical supplies industry to war work, then perhaps rationing or licensing might have been preferable to increased taxation in this manner.

Canada must raise vast sums of money for the war effort. The method suggested will, I submit, not achieve the desired result. Neither the budget of last summer nor the supplementary proposals we are now considering will achieve that object. Therefore we must explore other possibilities.

Fifteen months ago, in September, 1939, when the war broke out, and many times since, we of this group have said that if our manhood is asked to give its life for this cause, then wealth ought to be asked to give itself to the same cause. Yesterday I referred to a compulsory non-interest-bearing loan for the duration of the war and one year afterwards which was introduced in New Zealand last July. In justice to our people—to our farmers who are depressed on account of the condition of their industry, and to those who are being asked to sacrifice some of their privileges in the industrial life of the nation—we should ask those who control vast accumulations of wealth to make a sacrifice and contribution equivalent to that which the same classes have been asked to make in our sister dominion of New Zealand. Such a proposal is not confiscation; it is merely a loan made to the country in her hour of need, and repayable when the danger has passed away. If a country like New Zealand can do it, I suggest we should be able to do it also. There are not in New Zealand the vast accumulations of wealth, Mr. Speaker, that we have in Canada. Everyone who knows anything about that country knows that there is a greater equality of wealth there; that vast fortunes are less in amount and certainly fewer in number than they are in Canada.

We already have provision for a non-interest-bearing loan on a voluntary plan, to which there has been some response—but a relatively small response in dollars and cents. New Zealand had a similar voluntary loan, as the following extract from their Hansard will show. I have the New Zealand Parliamentary Debates of the second session, 1940, from which I read yesterday. At page 307, speaking on June 27 of this year, the Hon. Walter Nash, Minister of Finance, had this to say regarding New Zealand's voluntary loan and the proposed compulsory loan:

> A start towards the provision of interest-free loans has already been made by generous voluntary effort on the part of many citizens, and to date nearly sufficient has been subscribed to balance the war expenses account to the end of last financial year. But that is not sufficient. It is not right that others equally capable of affording assistance should not make their due contribution. In this connection it is the intention of the government to formulate for the consideration of the house a procedure under which all who have means will be required to assist by subscribing to loans for these purposes. Those who already have or who may in the future voluntarily lend money free of interest may have the amount already subscribed taken into account in determining their total liability under this heading.

In order, Mr. Speaker, to bring this matter to the attention of the house more forcibly than can be done in the form of a speech, I propose the following amendment to the resolution, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis):

> That all the words after "that" in the said motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> This house regrets that the government has not seen fit to introduce proposals for the raising of a compulsory war loan free of interest to be levied according to ability to subscribe.

We feel that this means of raising money should have been thoroughly explored by the government before new taxation was imposed on the people of Canada at this time. I know that the proposal I am making will meet with a response from a large number of our people, and I can say that because of an interesting experience that I had this autumn. When I was out in my constituency, one of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation members of the Saskatchewan legislature, whose seat largely coincides with the southern part of my constituency, had been promoting the idea of a voluntary interest-free loan, to which, I may say, he himself, a farmer, had made a substantial contribution. I refer to Mr. L. H. Hantelman of Elrose. I was with him a good deal of the time as he went through his constituency and talked to the farmers and business men regarding the lending of money to the dominion at this time, free of interest, and he estimated that people in that constituency would raise among them a million dollars for our war effort—

An hon. MEMBER: Those poor farmers!

Mr. COLDWELL: Just wait a moment—on this condition, that the government of Canada would accept wheat on the basis of the present price and take that as a loan for the duration of the war. The first proposal was that it should be for one year, but then they realized the implications of that, under the storage conditions which exist in Saskatchewan at this time, and Mr. Hantelman has since been going over the district and suggesting that it should be for the duration of the war. The response has been equally good. I rather think that the minister will hear from him again in the near future. Here we have a group of people who for a number of years have been depressed but who in the time of their abundance of wheat and at some sacrifice are willing to make a loan interest-free to the dominion.

Mr. TRIPP: The hon. member would not suggest that Mr. Hantelman is "depressed" so far as wheat is concerned?

Mr. COLDWELL: I am asked if I would suggest that Mr. Hantelman is depressed so far as wheat is concerned. I certainly would not, and I say that, wherever we go in any industry, we can find individuals who because of fortuitous circumstances are not afflicted with the depression with which their industry is afflicted. Mr. Hantelman happens to be one of the very few men in the province of Saskatchewan whose superior land and equipment are free of debt.

Mr. ILSLEY: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question? The offer is equivalent to an offer to lend cash, in view of our wheat board act, is it not?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes—interest-free.

Mr. ILSLEY: There are facilities for that to be done now. It is just a matter of those farmers buying the non-interest bearing certificates which are available, if they want to do it.

Mr. COLDWELL: But may I say this, that with a delivery of eight or even twelve bushels to the acre at 50 cents a bushel at the local point, they have not been able to meet their accumulated obligations. And while, in the district to which I refer, many of them have had crops running from thirty to forty-five and even fifty bushels to the acre, they can hand over surplus wheat which the government can turn into cash, but they cannot themselves turn it into cash because they cannot deliver more than twelve bushels, the proceeds of which are required to meet their own running expenditures and other obligations.

Mr. ILSLEY: Because of temporary storage difficulties.

Mr. COLDWELL: Storage difficulties, yes, and of course those difficulties may continue a long time. They are quite willing to make this loan immediately if the product is accepted instead of the cash.

Mr. ILSLEY: We would have to find some place to store it.

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, I do not think the government would find that an insuperable difficulty.

In our opinion, this whole field of non-interest-bearing loans should be thoroughly explored.

There are sources of revenue of other kinds. I have in mind the increase to 100 per cent of the excess profits tax, and other means of improving our foreign exchange position. In our opinion the non-resident owners of Canadian property and securities should be taxed. The balance of interest payments against Canada, according to the Canada Year Book of 1939, the last issue which I happen to have in my office, was $246·2 millions in 1937. It seems to me that the non-resident holders of Canadian securities should be subjected to an increase in taxation at the present time, because the war effort of the Canadian people will protect their property and their security, and they should contribute substantially to the cost of that protection.

Some people may think that these are drastic proposals. They are not too drastic under the circumstances. I fancy that as the war proceeds we shall have to consider proposals even more thoroughgoing than those which I have placed before the house this afternoon. But, because they are drastic, our people have the right to know that the money which is being expended is being expended wisely, without waste, and well.

Last evening the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) announced that he had agreed to the proposal made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), that a committee of this house should be established to give constant supervision to the expenditures of money used in our war effort. That is all to the good, but I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that committee should have been established already and should be sitting now. A similar committee was established in Great Britain just a year ago; speaking from memory, I believe the Prime Minister said, December 12 of last year; and that committee has been sitting continuously ever since. So that we are now twelve months late, and there should be no further delay. If the committee were established now it would be possible for it to present a report when the house reconvenes and we would be able to discuss much more intelligently our war effort than we have been able to do at this session. I should have liked to have seen our standing committees appointed and at work as soon as we assembled in November. As an hon. member remarks, private members want something to do; they want to feel that they are actually doing something to assist the country at this time.

One further word. The leader of the opposition regretted that the entry to Canada of fresh fruit and vegetables had not been prohibited. I think I can understand the desire regarding this matter of those who live in British Columbia, in Ontario, and perhaps in the maritime provinces. But there is another side to that argument. Those of us who live on the prairies know perfectly well that our people cannot produce green vegetables until away on in June, even July, and that fruit, with us, except in a very good year, is very difficult to grow and to ripen at any time. Consequently we have to rely on fruit at some seasons from the immediate south.

Green vegetables, citrus fruits and other winter necessities we must get from that source. If it is ever found essential to prohibit the importation of these goods in order to protect the growers of British Columbia, central Canada or the maritime provinces, it should be done on a regional basis and the prairies should be exempt from such a prohibition.

We want Canada's war effort to succeed. We feel that under the leadership of those who are now directing the allied cause there is no danger of betrayal. For a good many years I felt that those who were leading the motherland and France prior to the outbreak of this war were desirous of seeing a strong Hitler and a strong Mussolini as a barrier against the rise of leftist movements throughout Europe. They showed that from time to time, I think, but they have gone, and have been replaced by men who all through the years were pronounced in their opposition to dictatorship of every sort. I believe we may have every confidence that our present leaders will carry on until the last threat to our democratic institutions has been removed and destroyed. For undoubtedly the fight now is against those who would destroy human freedom. Fortunately however the fight is not only against those who would destroy human freedom; it is also for a great extension of human freedom. That, it seems to me, is the positive attitude that we all ought to be taking in Canada at this time.

Believing this, we want to see the burden of the war placed more equitably upon the shoulders of our people, and particularly upon those who are best able to bear the burden. We want this war waged in a democratic manner until Hitlerism, fascism and dictatorships of all sorts and types have been removed from the earth.

I close, Mr. Speaker, with that thought. The suggestions that we have made and the amendment that we have moved have that objective in mind.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I must say that I was agreeably surprised when the budget was finally brought down. It was much less severe than I had feared. I found a great deal in it to commend. But at the same time there are several aspects of the budget which in my judgment are undesirable.

In the first place it is a budget of scarcity, just as have been all the budgets brought down by the ministers of finance in Canada since the depression, or even before. It is a budget which tends to starve the goose which lays the golden eggs, to bleed the goose to death rather than to feed it, heal it and put it in an environment which will enable it to produce golden eggs of the finest quality and in the greatest number.

A nation might be likened to a farm. Granted that the farm is good, the owner will probably get out of it about what he puts into it, in time, labour and money. There are two types of farmer: the niggardly type, and the generous free-hearted type. The niggardly farmer, whose like we have all seen, spends as little as possible on his machinery, consequently is always having it break down just when he has a great pressure of work on. He works his land as little as possible, feeds his stock in a stingy way; his fencing is poorly done; his buildings are ramshackle and fastened together with wire; his attention to his farm generally is such as makes one feel that what he is thinking about when he is on his farm is how soon he can get away from it. He lacks that progressiveness and forward-looking quality which causes a man to rejoice in making his farm a home and a great productive enterprise, a place where he wants to be. He does not put into his farm love. The free-hearted farmer is exactly the opposite in all these respects.

Now I say this budget is a niggardly budget. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) will probably feel that that is a severe statement. I make all possible allowances for his feelings in the matter and for his point of view, yet I repeat earnestly and sincerely that it indicates that the government of this land belongs to the type of the niggardly farmer rather than the free-hearted farmer. The farm they are administering is a magnificent one, of boundless resources, but they are so managing it that the goose will be killed, or at least its vitality reduced to the lowest level; and thereby they will fail to obtain the results which they and the people desire.

The budget is a backward-looking budget. It looks back to the last war and the years before the last war; it fails to face the facts of to-day and to-morrow. This is an age of plenty. It is astonishing how few people seem to realize that the last war was fought in an age of scarcity, while this war is being fought in an age of plenty.

Mr. CASSELMAN (Edmonton East): Have we plenty of United States exchange?

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is not a very intelligent question, so that I shall not deal with it here. I will deal with it off the floor.

This is an age of abundance. Somewhere between 1913 and 1928 the world rounded a corner. It left behind the age of scarcity and entered an age of abundance, in which men could produce more than the people were enabled to buy. That fact has rendered it necessary for us to readjust our whole attitude toward the war if we would avoid mishaps.

As I have said, this is a budget of scarcity; it looks backward to the last war, not to to-day and to-morrow. This is an age of plenty, an age of machines, of science, of synthetic goods and improved processes, an age of colossal speed not only in aeroplanes, automobiles and ships but in every process that enters into the fabrication of goods and services for the use of humanity.

This budget is based upon the thinking of "have not" nations like Britain and France. It quite ignores the fact that Canada is a "have" nation. Canada's resources are so rich and so varied that to compare this country with a nation like Britain, whose resources are so much restricted, is to make the gravest kind of error. Canada is capable of being self-sufficient, of successfully applying the principles of economic nationalism.

This budget disregards the fact that a nation's fighting efficiency depends upon its people, their health, their strength, their morale and the productive power of the country both potential and actual. This budget tends toward inflation, because it tends to destroy productive power. The only thing that will prevent a great distribution of money in the country from becoming inflation is adequate productive power to absorb that money. This budget will tend to destroy production at the very time when, by loan or otherwise, vast quantities of money are being liberated into the country's avenues of trade. Therefore it has a tendency toward inflation.

The other day the minister spent a good deal of time dealing with the supposition that the proposals my group are making would cause inflation. Let the minister bear in mind that the very principles he is applying to-day are those which brought about the inflation of the last war; and if he pursues them consistently they will result in a greater disaster than any we knew as a result of the last war.

Now, having had some fault to find with the budget, may I point out some commendable features of it. In the first place there is a most refreshing frankness shown in the definition of exchange. I should like to read a sentence or two which particularly pleased me:

> First, however, let us recall the nature of the problem. Foreign exchange means, essentially, the money of other countries, with which we can buy goods in those other countries or make payments to people there. It is not like our own money, subject to the control of our national government. We can only obtain it by selling things to other countries . . .

[Mr. Blackmore.]

If only the people of Canada during the last ten years had been instructed by both Liberals and Conservatives on the hustings throughout the country that this was the thing which decided the exchange value of our dollar, they would have been in a far happier situation to-day. I continue:

> We can only obtain it by selling things to other countries or by getting payments from them for services rendered, or by borrowing it. We cannot simply go and buy it with our own money. People in other countries cannot use Canadian money for their own internal transactions and naturally they do not want it merely to keep or to hoard—they want it only to buy things in Canada or to make payments in Canada for services rendered to them by Canadians.

That is an admirable expression. There is truth in every phrase, in every word, and the significance of that truth is not even dreamed of by the majority of hon. members of this house. As an example, during the last election campaign in Alberta the people everywhere were told, either openly or in whispering campaigns, "Why, the new money won't be any good in other countries." See how widely at variance that sort of thing is with the principle so excellently expressed here!

Let the people know the truth; be honest with them. If there is one thing for which the people of Canada hunger and which they need above all else, it is the truth, the honest, bare, bald truth about the great economic factors that enter into our situation. I commend the minister because in this respect he has told them the truth. Tell the people that what gives our money value in Canada is goods in Canada.

I am sorry that when the minister was answering me the other day he failed to quite follow that principle. He did not stop to tell the people that if a billion dollars were issued in Canada it might be inflation or it might not, depending upon whether or not there were over a billion and a half dollars' worth of goods in Canada to be bought with the money; and that if there were a billion and a half dollars' worth of goods in the country to be bought with the money, it would not cause inflation. He did not tell them that, but that was the vital thing that should have been told. The value of our money in the United States depends upon the goods we have here which we can sell to the United States, as the minister has so admirably stated.

Another commendable thing about this budget is that it frankly faces the development of what is called economic nationalism. For some time, Mr. Speaker, there has been a tendency on the part of certain prominent men in Canada to run away from economic nationalism as something dreadful. They "hush-hush" it; they say we must not have it, that it will cause war, and all that sort of thing. It was a grave error to talk like that. It was a grave error to think like that. Economic nationalism is a fact in the world, and Canadians need to face that truth realistically and courageously, and say, "Well, what are we going to do about it?" Here is the situation, and the minister does face it frankly in several respects. I commend him for having done so.

There have been definite trends towards economic nationalism in the world which everyone should have been able to see. Always, for the last ten or twelve years, when Canadian leaders have spoken of economic nationalism they have pointed to Germany, to Italy, or to some other country, when right across the line our next-door neighbour was taking every possible step to develop economic nationalism within that country.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; the trend has been the other way.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is what they say, but that is not the way they act. The Hawley-Smoot tariff against cattle was a case in point.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member said during the last ten years.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes, but they are still taking some steps the other way, too. For example, I am sure the minister has heard of the elaborate attempts being made in the southern United States to develop forests so that they can be free of the need of buying Canadian wood pulp. That is a definite step towards economic nationalism. I understand now, moreover, from a recent report, that the United States are taking careful steps to develop their own beet sugar seed production, so that they may be independent of the nations across the water. That, again, is a step toward economic nationalism.

I am sure I could find scores of such examples, if I took the trouble; and the minister could do so too. Perhaps the United States have been lowering their tariffs in certain respects. But so far as I can tell the only reason why they have been lowering their tariffs is that they have discovered that only by lowering tariffs and taking in certain Canadian goods would they be able to get Canadians to take in certain of the goods they desired to sell abroad. I will grant that the desire to sell goods abroad is not a tendency to economic nationalism, but to-day to a large extent the desire to sell goods abroad is the result of the failure to recognize and appreciate the existence of economic nationalism.

We find little Hawaii endeavouring to develop her own potatoes. Why is she doing that? She is doing it so as to be independent of maritime potatoes. That is the natural thing to do; it is the tendency toward economic nationalism. We read of Eire putting forth the very greatest effort to render herself self-sufficient. We do not condemn that action on the part of Eire; it is a tendency toward economic nationalism. The last report we have is that Great Britain is ploughing up hundreds of thousands of acres—I have even heard she is ploughing up millions of acres—and putting them into wheat. "Well," we say, "that is a sensible thing to do. Great Britain may be starved out." True, but the fact remains that that is a tendency toward economic nationalism. And if the British people once begin producing their own wheat successfully, it is not very likely that we shall recover that market after the war. It is a tendency toward economic nationalism. What causes it is another matter entirely. The thing that causes it is the tendency which is abroad in the world, a tendency which has arisen largely from the fact that we live in an age of machines. It arises, too, because of our monetary system, and because of several other factors it is not my business this afternoon to analyse, but which I could analyse for hon. members had I the time to do so.

It is noteworthy that Great Britain is becoming more or less economically nationalistic in her thinking. When the minister's budget was announced, the British trade commissioner, Mr. A. M. Wiseman, is reported in the press to have said, "Canada has been generous to Great Britain." Yes, she has,—in a niggardly sort of way. I will use the expression again; she has, in a niggardly sort of way. Canada believes that is the best thing she can do, under the system she is following. But it apparently has not dawned upon her leaders that she might change her economic and financial system, and thereby make a tremendous difference to the extent to which she might assist Great Britain.

Nevertheless the fact that Mr. Wiseman said that Canada had been generous to Great Britain indicates quite clearly that he realizes Canada is making a sacrifice. She is making a sacrifice by undertaking to buy British coal, when she can produce her own. The common-sense procedure would be, surely, to produce her own. The same is true of all the other commodities which Canada has "generously" agreed to accept from Great Britain.

The minister has said that Canadians can stand competition. Canada could easily produce the products to be admitted from Great Britain, and probably could produce them quite as satisfactorily as she will be able to get them from Great Britain—perhaps even more satisfactorily. How, then, did it come about that so many Canadians came to decry economic nationalism? The very same men who decried economic nationalism will stand on the floor of the house and tell the people that the solution for the problem of the western farmer is that he must stop growing wheat and begin to produce other commodities. In other words he must go into diversified farming. Diversified farming is economic nationalism on a small scale, and economic nationalism for a nation is simply diversified farming on a large scale.

Why does the minister not go farther than he has gone? No doubt he has his reasons. When he was delivering his address I listened most attentively for some indication that Canada was going to produce and use her own coal. A report I have before me indicates that in 1939 Canada imported 14,998,645 tons of coal, and paid $41,578,685 for it. Most of that coal came from the United States. There are immeasurable deposits of coal in Alberta, and the men ready to mine it. There is equipment ready for mining operations to produce coal at economic prices. There are large numbers of railway cars and tracks in excellent condition. Why not bring that coal from Alberta? Why not bring it from Nova Scotia? Since I have come to this chamber I have sought a satisfactory answer to these questions, but I have sought utterly in vain.

According to the records I have, last year Canada imported 10,343,626 hundredweight of sugar for refining purposes, and paid $20,225,605 for it. When I first came to the House of Commons I began to point out to the people of Canada how important it was that they develop their beet sugar producing capacity. What has been done? My pleas, of course, have been completely ignored. But the fact remains that every pound of that sugar could be produced in Canada. Fifty per cent of the total sugar consumption of the Canadian people could be produced in southern Alberta, in the district south of Calgary.

We talk about foreign exchange! Well, it does not look as though the importance of foreign exchange has even yet fully impressed itself upon the minister. What about the amount of wool we are importing into Canada, despite the fact that we are a nation admirably adapted to the production of wool? What about the corn we are importing for the purpose of making starch?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Why doesn't the hon. member produce wool?

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am not discussing that point at the present time. I could discuss it with my hon. friend, but I do not believe I would be in order if I were to do so now.

Vegetable oils are coming into this country in quantities appalling to the western farmer who is producing animal fats. Petroleum and gasoline are being imported in vast quantities. I may be met with the reply that we are not now able to produce the petroleum and gasoline we need. Yet the other night the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Dechene) rose in his place and with a fine burst of oratory portrayed to the house the tremendous possibilities of the McMurray tar sands. What is being done about that matter? Definitely nothing,—notwithstanding the fact that we have in that district the repository of a quantity of oils which could render the British empire completely independent of every other source on earth. And we are rushing rapidly toward a time when the empire may sorely need those resources. But nothing is being done about it.

Mr. GRAYDON: Why?

Mr. HANSELL: Because they do not know where to get the money.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There is another matter to which I must refer. If I remember correctly, the minister stated that he did not desire that the shutting off of certain goods from outside should result in increased production of those goods in Canada. I am sure the minister will excuse me when I say quite frankly that I do not agree with him. Of course he will not take that very seriously, but I believe he will in a year or two. Increased production is exactly what we want. There may be reasons to be offered otherwise, but I am quite sure they can be met. I fancy that the minister assumed that this would be a short war.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I did not.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am glad to hear the minister say he did not. If this war is to be of ten years' duration, and if the economic structure of this country and the economic system we are following change as much in each one of the five or six years to come as they have in the last year; if the thinking of our people changes as much as it has done, then we shall be in a different world entirely. It will then become highly important that we have all the production that we ourselves can use, as well as what might be necessary for the support of mother Britain. Economic nationalism may be forced upon us after the war by the very forces which are now causing Britain to plant all those acres of wheat. We cannot blame her;

we know she has to do it. If we are not at that time in a position to produce the things we need; if we are unable to sell enough goods of which we have a surplus to buy the things we need, we are going to be in an unsound condition economically.

Finally, as I have pointed out, it is production of a wide variety that prevents inflation. Inflation has not nearly so much to do with the amount of money in circulation as it has to do with the goods in circulation. The minister assumes that there may be a shortage of these goods. All over the land to-day there is a tendency to make broad general statements and to swallow them without examining them in sufficient detail. For example, utterly unjustifiably optimistic remarks are being made in the press about the Rowell-Sirois report. It is necessary to examine the evidence for or against these statements. Let us examine the evidence with respect to the production of goods.

We are ready to agree that there may develop a shortage of such things as leather goods, assuming we neglect the production of live stock to the extent that we have no raw hides; or that we have to supply so many soldiers with shoes that we cannot meet the demand. But there is not going to develop a shortage of wheat, or of coal, or of various kinds of meat, nor need there develop a shortage of milk, or cream, or butter, or eggs, or cheese. For all practical purposes our capacity to produce these commodities is limitless. All we need to do is to see that we have the milch cows and the people who can learn how to milk. For the last ten years Canada has been doing her level best to deplete our milch cow population, and we may have to suffer for it now. If, however, we attack the problem in time, we may overcome the danger which threatens us. There are simply hundreds of kinds of goods in this country of which there is no chance that a shortage will develop, provided we use the simplest kind of common sense in managing this heritage of ours.

Our resources consist of our soil and climate, the forests, the mines and the fisheries. They are well-nigh limitless so far as our own national consumption is concerned. I repeat that while there may be a danger of a shortage developing in connection with certain kinds of goods, as I pointed out in my last speech there certainly is no sound logic in making people go without wheat in order to prevent them from using too many coonskin coats. The thing for us to do as a group of people managing this heritage is so to adjust our economy that our people may enjoy all they want of the kinds of goods of which we can produce in abundance. Then no one would object to being restricted. But the trouble with the budget and the policy of the government at the present time is that it is endeavouring to make us lack every kind of thing regardless of the question whether we can produce a particular commodity in super-abundance.

We hear a great deal about the danger of a shortage of labour. I have not gone out on the streets of towns in Ontario to try to hire men, but I know that in the provinces of Alberta, British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Manitoba there are simply tens of thousands of people who cannot buy jobs, let alone get them.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Skilled labour?

Mr. BLACKMORE: If there is a skilled labour shortage, why in the name of common sense are we not putting our high school boys to learning the particular skills which are required? Everything is being left to chance. For example, a boy of eighteen who would be perfectly capable of learning to perform properly the most highly specialized technical task, within say two years, knows nothing to-day about the existence of that task, or where he can go to get training.

Mr. CASSELMAN (Edmonton East): Where would he get it?

Mr. BLACKMORE: If it is not known, then it is high time the government made it known. Facilities should be provided for training these boys. Is there any reason why we could not send our youth to the United States, to Britain, or to other countries where they could be trained? They could cross the ocean in a short time. No attempt is being made to meet this danger of a labour shortage.

Mr. CASSELMAN (Edmonton East): It would take a lot of exchange to send them over there.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The little bit of exchange it would cost to send them there to be trained in the highly technical skills in which there is a danger of a shortage of labour would not prove nearly as serious to the economy of the country as will the policy we are following to-day of allowing such a shortage of labour to develop, thus impairing our efficiency to produce the goods we need.

Mr. HANSELL: They should have been in training for the last five or six years.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There is another aspect of this labour question to be considered. There are great numbers of older men and women who are still skilful enough to do good work. Let those people ask for jobs anywhere, and what answer will they get? They will be told that we must have the youth of 19 to 23 or 24; they will be told that we cannot think of anyone over thirty-nine. When I was a small boy it was the glory of a man to be able to do a real day's work at sixty-five. Hundreds of thousands of these elderly people—or scores of thousands, to be a little more careful—are still able and would be joyful to go out and do a day's work at sixty years of age. What measures are being taken to use these people?

Let me refer to still another aspect of this labour question. The United States has upwards of 11,000,000 unemployed.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Where did the hon. member get those figures?

Mr. BLACKMORE: International Labour News.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Are they recent figures?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Not recent—July, 1939.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): What is the recent figure? It is much lower.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is it lower than 6,000,000?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): The hon. member said 11,000,000.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is it lower than 6,000,000?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): The hon. member is making the speech. He said 11,000,000, and I am asking him.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That was the last figure I had, and it may be lower than that. During the last election campaign in the United States the figure of 10,000,000 was given. But if there are only 6,000,000 unemployed, that means there are plenty of men there for us to employ.

The minister talks of increasing our exports as a means of overcoming our exchange difficulties. In that he is on safe ground. He fears to subsidize exports lest he encounter difficulties with the United States.

There are indirect ways of helping to increase our exports. One of these is to decrease the cost of production, thereby lowering the price of our goods for export. Why not so manage that there would be lower interest rates on loans; why not consider the remission of freight rates and the application of discounts to the prices of goods used in production?

For example, in the use of mill feeds. (Some hon. members smile about this proposal. Last spring, Mr. Speaker, we gave to the Minister of Munitions and Supply and to the government absolute powers. If they have not used these powers to make the necessary adjustments, then so much more the reflection upon them because this parliament has done its share.) Why not a sales tax remission on goods entering into production so as to bring down costs and enable us to sell our goods on foreign markets? If we use our national credit, our goods-and-services producing and consuming powers, to increase production and modify the price structure, we shall be able to convert this country into a veritable arsenal to support the empire in war, and a veritable storehouse of goods to sustain our war effort.

May I commend the minister for his desire to assist Britain? We must help Britain; we must give Britain far more assistance than we can possibly expect Britain to pay for by sending over to us some of her bituminous coal and what-not. How are we going to do it? I say that Canada can assist Great Britain without debt to us, without taxation, and without taking away anything from our people, and she can give Britain goods up to the limit of Canada's ability to produce, so that the contrast between what we could do and what we are doing now would be enormous. We do not need to take Britain's bituminous coal or her other goods, fine gesture as it was on the minister's part to offer to do that. Does Britain need for other purposes her workers who are producing her coal? If she does, then in taking her coal we are causing her to put to work labourers who might be better employed. If she is not using those labourers, why not bring them to Canada and put them to work here?

We have in Canada, Mr. Speaker, a tremendous capacity for producing iron. Some people may say that our ore deposits are remote. Then why not bring them up close? Yes, laugh, with your prehistoric minds and antiquated thinking, but if the proposal were advanced that Hitler should have control of the Labrador iron fields, we should immediately become fearful because we know that Hitler would use them. How is it that Hitler could use them, and we cannot, when they are so much closer to us than they would be to him?

We have a tremendous capacity for producing iron and a wide variety of other products such as eggs, wood and lumber, copper, nickel, fruits, cheese; and all these things could be bought with Canada's credit and given to Britain in so far as we produce more of them than we ourselves need, and in so far as we can produce other goods which would absorb the money which would have to be created by Canada and spent to buy the iron, etcetera, in Canada.

May I say a word or two with respect to the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). We are going to support that amendment. Our social crediters believe in debt-free money. This proposal has been refused by the minister, but perhaps he will live to wonder why in the world he could ever have thought that it was not a sound proposal.

Social crediters took the stand last year that we should have conscription of finance, industry and man-power. By conscription of finance we meant that the government should take over the power and the function of turning into money Canada's goods-and-services producing and consuming power, that the government should monetize Canada's credit. Once that were done, the amount of money at the government's disposal would be highly gratifying I am sure to the Minister of Finance. We felt that if that were done, it would be unnecessary to conscript industry because a government can control industry through the technique of prices, and it would be unnecessary to conscript man-power because men will go to-day where they can get money enough. So that was our proposal.

The government must have money, and money that is interest-free because the interest burden on this country is rapidly becoming so colossal that it is causing anxiety to all serious thinkers. Since our own proposal was refused, we intend to back the proposal that has been made this afternoon by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, that those who are able to lend money, who have it to spare, who are not using it for production or for economic consumption in Canada, should be called upon to lend the money interest-free to the nation.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is that what it means?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I take it that that is what it means. I have not asked them what it means, but the words mean that to me. It merely proposes to borrow the money. That is not so bad as conscripting our young men. If I had $100,000 that I was not doing anything with, I would rather a hundred times that the government ask me to lend it to the nation without interest than that they ask me that I give one of my precious sons. It is a simple proposal. It might be pointed out that in the army a man is earning $1.30 a day, but I think I could arrange matters so that he could earn more than that outside the army, and so could any other man in Canada who is well situated.

I do not think the proposal contained in the amendment would be a serious handicap to the Canadian people, although I wish to point out that the social credit concept does not envisage the taking away of money from the people.

I have given the reasons why I am going to support the amendment. I have also put my case with respect to the minister's budget. I wish to commend him for the moderation of the budget. I wish to commend him for all the various things I have mentioned, and I will say that considering the circumstances in which he is situated, the budget does him a great deal of credit. On the other hand I have pointed out the reasons why I oppose it.

Mr. ILSLEY: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question just to clarify his position? He says he would not take money away from the people, but he would be in favour of a compulsory loan to the government. How does he reconcile those two statements?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Perhaps I did not convey to the minister what I was trying to say, that is, that social credit as a philosophy does not envisage taking money away from people. But we are going to support the amendment moved by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, not because it is in accordance with social credit principles but because it offers a means whereby the government can obtain money without interest. Have I made that quite clear?

Mr. ILSLEY: As I understand it, the position is that the hon. member does not support the amendment as a matter of social credit philosophy or principle, but is supporting the proposal in this instance.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Because it is the lesser of two evils. The minister is proposing one very serious evil, and the proposal in the amendment is a little bit less evil than some of the minister's proposals.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): He is supporting the amendment because it is against his principles.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Against whose principles?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Against those of my hon. friend.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If the explanation I have made has not been sufficient to make the matter clear to the hon. member, I am very sorry. It certainly does not reflect credit on his intelligence because I made my point perfectly clear.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): The hon. member has not made his point perfectly clear. The two viewpoints he expressed seem to me to conflict entirely.

Mr. BLACKMORE: They do.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): The amendment says: We will force the people to give us their money. The hon. member is supporting that. Yet at the same time he says: I do not agree with taking money away from the people.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I can understand why the hon. member cannot get this straight because he did not even get the resolution straight, and for that of course there was some excuse because he did not have a chance to read it but just heard it read from the chair. The amendment simply requires loans without interest, which is a long way from taking money away from the people.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Do I understand that people would be free to lend their money without interest?

Mr. BLACKMORE: No; they would be required to lend it without interest.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Is that not compulsory, if a person is required to lend it without interest?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Exactly, but is not taking your boy to go to war compulsory?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I am not arguing that now.

Mr. MacINNIS: The hon. member is, however, arguing against the other proposal.

On motion of Mr. Church the debate was adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READING

Bill No. 7, to amend the Divorce Jurisdiction Act, 1940.—Mr. Black (Yukon).

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, December 5, 1940.

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

OIL CONTROL—BULK STORAGE TANKS AND OIL AND GAS STATIONS

Mr. HANSELL:

1. Has the oil controller for Canada prohibited the erection or establishment of bulk storage tanks in Canada?
2. If so, were the provincial governments consulted as to this action?
3. Has the oil controller for Canada prohibited the erection or establishment of oil and gas stations in Canada?
4. If so, were the provincial governments consulted before this action was taken?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City):

1. The oil controller has prohibited the erection or establishment of new bulk storage stations used for the purpose of supplying retail vendors of gasoline and petroleum products for the use of vehicles driven by gasoline engines, including aircraft. This prohibition does not extend to the erection of additional tanks at existing stations.

2. The provincial governments were not consulted as such prior to the making of orders numbered 001 and 001-A.

3. The oil controller has prohibited the erection or establishment of new service stations in Canada.

4. The provincial governments were not consulted as such prior to the making of orders numbered 001 and 001-A.

The oil controller has had the fullest co-operation from the proper officials of the provinces of Canada relative to the orders mentioned.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE USED TO PAY FOR UNITED STATES MAGAZINES

Mr. NICHOLSON:

What was the amount of United States exchange used during the last fiscal year in payment of United States magazines brought into Canada?

Mr. CRERAR: Imports from United States of magazines and periodicals, fiscal year ended March 31, 1940: $6,633,677.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS CONFERENCE

Mr. HANSELL:

1. Will the sessions of the coming dominion-provincial conference on the Sirois report be open to the public?
2. Will the conference be open to any or all members of the Canadian parliament and provincial legislatures?
3. Will the proceedings of the conference be reported verbatim and published?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The question of the publicity to be given meetings and proceedings of the conference will not be decided until the conference itself meets.

NAVAL STORES—PAYMENT TO CLARKE STEAMSHIP COMPANY

Mr. STOKES:

What commodities make up the item—"Naval Stores, Montreal, Quebec, Clarke Steamship Company, Limited, $19,412.10"—as mentioned in press release from the office of director of public information, dated August 2, 1940?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Approximately 1,200 commodities, including stocks of rope, various sizes, paint, kitchen supplies, tools, greases, ship hardware, mill-wright supplies, canvas, batteries, rockets, flares, drugs, engine-room supplies, pipes and fittings, electrical supplies, instruments, packings, medical supplies.

FREE TRANSPORTATION TO SOLDIERS ON LEAVE

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East):

1. What does the government estimate would be the cost of granting free transportation to his home to the average member of the troops in Canada when proceeding on the one leave known as "embarkation leave"?
2. Is the answer to question No. 1 based on the price of a one-way ticket?
3. How is the estimate arrived at?
4. Is the estimate based on first, second or third class fares?

Mr. POWER:

1. No definite figure can be given in reply to this question. It will be recognized that large formations of troops may be stationed within a few miles from their homes, or at a much greater distance. Due to the exigencies of war, it is not possible to predict for any time in advance where future troop concentrations may be required. It follows that this factor of distance is such a variable one, that no proper estimate can be made of the cost that would be entailed in paying the average soldier's fare to his home. Any figure that might be given would in all probability be not only quite inaccurate but might be misleading as to the cost in actual practice.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Answered by No. 1.
4. Answered by No. 1.

UNITED STATES MAGAZINES AND PERIODICALS

Mr. DESMOND:

1. What is the total value of United States' magazines and periodicals imported into Canada in each fiscal year since 1930?
2. What amounts of duty and taxes were paid on these importations in each fiscal year since 1930?

Mr. CRERAR: Imports from the United States of magazines and periodicals:

Fiscal year	Value	Duty collected*
1930	$4,140,690	Free
1931	4,116,620	Free
1932	3,639,820	$317,829
1933	2,683,191	600,700
1934	2,469,629	444,948
1935	2,539,724	461,925
1936	2,927,171	355,920
1937	4,507,233	Free
1938	6,261,241	Free
1939	6,427,149	Free
1940	6,633,677	Free

*No record of excise taxes.

JAMES F. SMELLIE, K.C.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. What superannuation or other allowance is being paid to James F. Smellie, K.C., recently retired from the position of registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada?
2. What salary was he receiving prior to his retirement?
3. Who was appointed in his place?
4. What salary is he being paid?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East):

1. Superannuation allowance, $1,200 per annum.
2. $6,000 per annum.
3. Hon. Paul Leduc, K.C.
4. $7,500 per annum.

RECOGNITION OF PROVISIONAL FRENCH GOVERNMENT—FRENCH LEGATION IN OTTAWA

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Does the government recognize the provisional French government of General De Gaulle?
2. Is there now any government regulation for inspection of the Vichy embassy in Ottawa, and, if so, by whom?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. General de Gaulle and his associates who are continuing to fight against the enemy do not constitute a provisional French government. They have not been so recognized either by the government of the United Kingdom or by the government of Canada.
2. The government is satisfied that no actions are being taken by the French legation in Ottawa contrary to the interests of Canada or her allies.

ASSISTANCE TO COVENTRY

Mr. CHURCH:

Will the government give consideration to making a contribution of food, clothing or other form of needed assistance or a grant to the mayor and corporation of Coventry, England, for relief and urgent general purposes?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: While fully aware of the damage inflicted on Coventry and other cities in the United Kingdom by ruthless night bombing attacks, the government do not propose to make contributions to any specific city. The immediate requirements of such cities are being met by the national and local authorities in the United Kingdom itself. It appears advisable that any supplementary aid from Canada should be afforded by private funds and relief agencies, federal government funds being directed to more immediate war requirements.

CASUALTIES TO MILITARY FORCES IN TRAINING IN CANADA

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Have pensions been refused by the pension commission to widows and dependents of members of Canada's military forces killed in Canada while in training?

2. Has a ruling been given that they were not on military service when away from a camp on a pass and were killed in highway accidents through no fault of their own?

3. If so, how many cases have been considered or are pending before the board or commission?

Mr. POWER:

1. Yes.

2. No, but the Canadian pension commission has ruled, in some cases, that deaths were not attributable to military service as such.

3. Number of cases which have been considered—22. Number of cases which are pending—15. Number of cases which have not been considered as there are no known persons who were dependent on the member of the forces at the time of death—22.

FRUIT AND VEGETABLE IMPORTS FROM UNITED STATES

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East):

1. Of the fresh fruits of all kinds imported from the United States from January 1, to November 1, 1940, what quantity and value are of a kind grown (a) in Canada, and (b) not grown in Canada?

2. Of the vegetables of all kinds imported from the United States from January 1 to November 1, 1940, what quantity and value are of a kind grown (a) in Canada, and (b) not grown in Canada?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. Imports from the United States of fresh fruits entered for consumption in Canada during the period from January 1 to September 30, 1940:

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT—PROCEDURE UNDER PROVISIONS OF SECTION 56

Mr. POULIOT:

1. In accordance with the British North America Act, 1867, section 56-1. Whose duty is it (a) to certify as authentic a copy of any act mentioned in the third line of said section, and (b) to deliver same to His Excellency the Governor General?

2. To which one of his majesty's principal secretaries of state referred to therein is same act sent by His Excellency the Governor General?

3. Is the procedure described by the first four lines of the above mentioned section still in force?

4. If not, (a) what are the exceptions, if any, and (b) when, by whom, and why was such procedure repealed, amended or changed, and in the latter case, what was the change, if any?

5. Was the procedure mentioned in Nos. 1, 2 and 3 followed for the nine acts assented to by his majesty on May 19, 1939 (3 George VI, chap. 27 to 35 inclusive)?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. (a) The clerk of the parliaments certifies a bound copy of the statutes of each session of parliament for the purposes of section 56 of the British North America Act, 1867. This duty is imposed upon him by section 6 of the Publication of Statutes Act (Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, chapter 2). It is not the practice to certify each statute separately.

(b) The existing practice is that the clerk of the parliaments sends the certified copy of the statutes to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who sends it to the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs. On July 1, 1927, the Governor General ceased to be the channel of communication between the government of Canada and the government of the United Kingdom, this change in procedure having been arranged at the Imperial Conference in 1926.

2. The Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs. However, as stated in 1 (b), the copy of the statutes is now sent to him by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

3. No.

4. (a) The existing practice is that the copy of the statutes is sent, not by the Governor General, but by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

(b) This change in the procedure was made on July 1, 1927, by the government of Canada, for the reason given in 1 (b).

5. No. These nine acts were included in the bound volume of statutes passed at the fourth session of the eighteenth parliament. A certified copy of this volume was sent to the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS CONFERENCE

Mr. POULIOT:

In view of the coming interprovincial conference of January next, did the government send to each provincial government copies of the 1935 report of the special committee of the House of Commons on the British North America Act, 1867, and of the 1939 report of the Senate of Canada on the said act?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government has not sent to the provincial governments any reports other than that of the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS—CANADA'S EXPENSES

Mr. POULIOT:

1. What amount of No. 48 estimates for fiscal year ending March 31, 1941, for "the expenses of the league of nations for 1940, including secretariat, international labour organization and permanent court of international justice, $150,410" has been spent up to November 27 of this year?

2. What is the amount of unpaid accounts up to that last mentioned date, if any?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. No amount had been paid out of the vote up to November 27th of this year.

2. The full amount of the appropriation, which is due in the current calendar year was paid on December 2nd.

RAILWAYS—PASSES TO GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

Mr. CHURCH:

Are any free return trip passes given government officials, civil servants or railway employees of all kinds in receipt of full civilian pay once a year over the railway systems of Canada?

Mr. CARDIN: Passes are issued only in accordance with the railway act.

JOINT DEFENCE BOARD—PUBLIC STATEMENTS OF MEMBERS OF CANADIAN SECTION

Mr. CHURCH:

Were all interviews and speeches of the members of the Canadian section of the joint defence board first submitted to and approved of by the government, and do they state government policy?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No member of the Canadian section of the permanent joint board on defence has given any statement to press or made any announcement of government policy in regard to problems of joint defence.

SHIPMENT OF SASKATCHEWAN LUMBER TO GREAT BRITAIN VIA HUDSON BAY

Mr. NICHOLSON:

Has the government considered the feasibility of cutting lumber this winter in northern Saskatchewan to be shipped to Great Britain via Churchill and the Hudson bay route?

Mr. HOWE: No. All Canadian lumber required by the British government in Great Britain is purchased by the British timber controller without direction by the Canadian government.

RATE OF PAYMENT FOR ROAD WORK BY RECIPIENTS OF RELIEF IN SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. Has the federal government information that relief recipients living on farms in northern Saskatchewan have been required to work at the rate of 25 cents per hour for a ten-hour day on roads in order to qualify for relief?

2. Has this rate of pay been approved by the dominion Department of Labour?

Mr. CASGRAIN: No information.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

DELIVERIES OF WHEAT TO ELEVATORS—WESTERN DIVISION

Mr. PERLEY:

How many bushels of wheat were delivered to elevators in the western division from August 1, 1940, to November 15, 1940, on which the initial price of seventy cents was paid on each of the following grades: No. 1 northern; No. 2 northern; No. 3 northern; No. 4; rejected No. 2 northern; rejected No. 3 northern and rejected No. 4?

Mr. CRERAR:

	Bushels
No. 1 Northern..	115,760,783-45
No. 2 Northern..	67,381,423-20
No. 3 Northern..	18,484,411-50
No. 4 Northern..	1,745,490-00
Rejected 2 Northern..	182,900-25
Rejected 3 Northern..	25,790-10
Rejected 4 Northern..	1,973-00

SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY BOARD

Mr. REID:

1. Who is the designated secretary of the treasury board, and (a) how long has he held such a position?

2. What salary does this official receive?

3. How long has he been in the employ of the government, and (a) what is the date of his first entry into the service, (b) in what department and (c) in what capacity?

4. Does this official have authority to handle reports, recommendations or other documents and to sign any of the same for or on behalf of the treasury board?

5. Are statements, recommendations or reports affecting the staff of the various departments handled by this official before presentation to the treasury board?

6. What other matters are handled by this official?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. W. C. Clark; since November 4, 1932. (Under section 11 of the Department of Finance and Treasury Board Act, R.S.C. 23, the Deputy Minister of Finance is designated as ex-officio the secretary of the treasury board.)

2. Under Order-in-Council, P.C. 2361, dated October 24, 1932, Mr. Clark was appointed "deputy minister of finance and receiver general, with salary at the rate of $12,000 per annum, including the salary as ex-officio secretary of the treasury board."

3. Since November 4, 1932, when he entered the service of the government as deputy minister of the Department of Finance.

4. As secretary of the board, he has authority to sign reports as to the decisions reached by the board, to maintain the records of the board, and to carry out such other duties as the board may direct. The Department of Finance and Treasury Board Act authorizes the board to communicate through the secretary with any public department, office or other person.

5. Statements, recommendations or reports received from the various departments for consideration by the board are handled and prepared by the secretary and the treasury board staff for submission to the board.

6. All the duties associated with the position of deputy minister in the Department of Finance.

NATIONAL RESOURCES MOBILIZATION—NUMBER FAILING TO REPORT FOR DUTY

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many men, to whom notice was given of a call for training under the National Resources Mobilization Act, failed to report for duty, (a) in the dominion as a whole; (b) by provinces?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. (a) 169.

(b)

British Columbia	7
Alberta	11
Saskatchewan	6
Manitoba	1
Ontario	39
Quebec	94
New Brunswick	11
Nova Scotia	0
Prince Edward Island	0

WAR MATERIALS—EXPENDITURES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA AND PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

What is the total expenditure made by the government since September, 1939, in each of the provinces of British Columbia, Manitoba, Alberta, and Saskatchewan, for (a) building and construction; (b) munitions; (c) manufactured war supplies (other than munitions and food)?

Mr. HOWE: Refer to published "Record of contracts awarded." Refer also to page 262 of Hansard, showing money value breakdown for provinces. Refer also to the minister's reference to blanket questions, page 462 of Hansard.

COMMONWEALTH AIR TRAINING—SASKATOON

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. What is the total expenditure to date for the establishment of the air training scheme at Saskatoon, in Saskatchewan?

2. What are the particulars of the tenders for construction therefor that were submitted?

3. Did the plans include a heating plant?

4. If not, has a heating plant been installed, and, if so, at what cost?

Mr. POWER:

1. The total expenditure to date for the construction of the hangars, buildings, roads, sewer system, water supply and delivery system, parade ground, walks and heating systems is $1,032,107.92. An additional expenditure for $4,173 was made at the relief field, Vanscoy, and $2,000 at the relief field at Osler.

2. Plans and specifications of the requested buildings were submitted to the Department of Munitions and Supply. Tenders were called by the above department; all quotations received were reviewed, and a recommendation made by the director of works and buildings of the Department of National Defence for Air. The lowest tender was accepted, and funds were raised to cover the cost. Tenders for the services such as roads, sewers, water supply, etc., were called locally by the local representative of the Department of Munitions and Supply. All quotations received were forwarded to Ottawa for approval, and for letting of the contract.

3. Yes.

4. See No. 1 above.

GASPÉ COUNTY, QUE., OIL DEPOSITS

Mr. ROY:

1. Is it true that prospecting for oil deposits in the York river basin, Gaspé county, which was under the supervision of the government of the province of Quebec, has been suspended indefinitely?

2. If so, were measures taken to (a) open up oil deposits, and (b) develop them for national defence purposes?

Mr. CRERAR: With respect to the first part of the question may I say that we have no information on that point. We do not know what Quebec has done in that respect. Part 2 of the question is answered in the same way.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE—CASUALTIES IN CANADA

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Was any civilian inquest or military court of inquiry held into the deaths of members of the Royal Canadian Air Force killed in accidents as follows: (a) at St. Catharines, Saturday, November 23, two instructors killed; (b) near Ottawa, Friday, November 22, two killed; (c) at Camp Borden, November 19, two killed; (d) while on guard duty at R.C.A.F. huts at foot of Yonge street, Toronto, a resident of New Westminster, British Columbia?

2. Did any federal authority request civilian inquests to be suspended in these and other similar cases by municipal or provincial authority?

Mr. POWER:

1. (a) Yes.

(b) Yes.

(c) Yes.

(d) Investigation by local police resulted in the arrest of one man, who is now facing a charge of manslaughter as a result of this accident.

2. No.

WAR MATERIALS—CAPS AND HELMETS

Mr. DESMOND:

1. What is the total value of the contracts awarded by the Department of Munitions and Supply and its predecessor purchasing bodies from September 1, 1939, to date, for caps and helmets?
2. What are the names of the persons or companies to whom such contracts have been awarded?
3. On what date was each such contract awarded?
4. What was the type of cap or helmet specified in each contract?
5. What was the total amount of each contract, and what was the unit price?

Mr. HOWE: Refer to published "Record of Contracts Awarded". Refer also to pages 265 and 266 of Hansard. Refer also to the minister's speech, page 462, regarding blanket questions.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—SAINT JOHN, N.B. WAREHOUSE SPACE

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. Did the Department of National Defence rent a warehouse, or space in the warehouse, on Union street, Saint John, New Brunswick?
2. If so, what rental was paid for the warehouse, or the space in the warehouse?
3. What use was made of this space?
4. For what period of time was the warehouse, or space in the warehouse, rented?
5. To whom was the rental paid?
6. Is the warehouse, or the space in the warehouse, still under rental?

Mr. POWER:

1. Yes.
2. $200 per month.
3. As offices, accommodation for personnel, and garaging of vehicles, No. 7 detachment, Royal Canadian Army Service Corps, Saint John, N.B.
4. Lease for one year, commencing 17th November, 1939, and thereafter on a monthly basis as long as required by the crown.
5. To the lessor, Mr. C. J. Wilson.
6. Yes.

MILITARY CAMPS—SENTRY BOXES FOR WINTER USE

Mr. CHURCH:

Will the government, in view of the many military camps for the training of Canada's military forces all across Canada, give consideration to the making of a better type of open wooden hut for soldiers on guard duty?

Mr. POWER: The present standard type of sentry box is intended only to give some measure of protection from the elements in very inclement weather as sentries normally have to patrol their beat. Sentries are relieved every two hours but in very bad weather they can be relieved at the discretion of the commanding officer, i.e., they may be relieved every 15 minutes, if necessary.

[Mr. Power.]

*ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE—PAY AND ALLOWANCES OF OFFICERS

Mr. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent):

What is the pay or the schedule of pay and allowances of all officers commissioned or non-commissioned in the Royal Canadian Air Force?

Mr. POWER: There is a very thick volume which contains the record of the pay and allowances for commissioned and non-commissioned officers in the Royal Canadian Air Force. If my hon. friend would like me to file this volume he could probably get the answer he requires. I do not know in what other way I could answer his question.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

NATIONAL RESOURCES MOBILIZATION—CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. How many men, not claiming to be conscientious objectors, have refused, to date, to report for training under the National Resources Mobilization Act?
2. How many men were affected by factories, or one factory in particular, which objected to send any men to camp?
3. What action has the government taken, or proposes to take, in regard to men, not claiming to be conscientious objectors, who refuse to report for training?
4. What action has the government taken, or proposes to take, in regard to factories which object to allow their employees to report for training?

Mr. GARDINER: I think I should answer parts 1 and 3 orally at the moment, and then I would ask the hon. member to permit this to be made an order for return, now tabled, in order that the answers may be fully explained in connection with the other two questions.

As to the first question, the number of men unaccounted for is 169. I should explain that this is not necessarily a case of refusing to report, because in many instances the notices did not reach the men.

The third question asks what action the government has taken, or proposes to take, in regard to men, not claiming to be conscientious objectors, who refuse to report for training. The answer is that all cases have been or will be referred to the police for necessary action. Reports to date indicate that an appreciable number of men notified to report at training centres had enlisted in the armed forces or were students taking their training at universities. Others had previous military training, and some were ill. That accounts for practically all the cases which have been checked up to date.

I would suggest that the answer to the question put by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), which I am tabling to-day—it has to do with the same matter—be read together with the answers to this question, which I suggest be made an order for return, now tabled.

Note: The question of the hon. member for Lake Centre above referred to appears at page 673 of this issue.

PROFESSIONAL MEN IN CANADIAN FORCES CARRYING ON PRIVATE PRACTICE

Mr. McGREGOR:

Are there any regulations of the Department of National Defence which prevent professional men, lawyers, physicians, architects, etc., who are officers in Canadian forces, from carrying on private practice?

Mr. POWER: Now tabled as far as army and air are concerned.

VOLUNTARY SERVICE REGISTRATION BUREAU

Mr. NEILL:

1. When did the voluntary service registration bureau start operations?
2. How many people are now engaged in the service of the bureau?
3. How many applications for employment have been received by the bureau?
4. How many people have received employment through the bureau?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Return tabled.

DARTMOUTH, N.S., AIRPORT

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. To what company was the contract for the excavation and grading work at the Eastern Passage airport at Dartmouth, Nova Scotia, awarded?
2. On what date was it awarded?
3. Who are the directors of the contracting company?
4. What was the total amount of the contract?
5. Did the company perform the contract itself, or was it sublet?
6. If sublet, to whom was it sublet and at what price?
7. Is this work now completed?
8. What amount has been paid to the contractor?
9. What amount remains to be paid?
10. Was any amount claimed by the contractor and disallowed by the government?
11. If so, what was the nature of such claim or claims, and what was the amount claimed?
12. Were any amounts paid to the said contractor without an engineer's certificate?
13. If so, on what dates and what amounts were so paid?
14. Was there an extension of the original contract?
15. If so, for what quantities and periods was the contract extended?
16. What is the total cost to date of all works undertaken at the Eastern Passage airport?
17. What is the estimated cost completed of all works undertaken or required to be undertaken at the Eastern Passage airport?

Mr. POWER: I am very anxious to have this question answered, but it involves research in the Department of National Defence, the Department of Munitions and Supply and the Department of National Defence for Air, so that I think it should be made an order for return. As soon as it is possible for me to get the replies I shall be glad to forward them to my hon. friend.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That will be during the adjournment?

Mr. POWER: Yes, if I can get the information.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I thank the minister. I want to point out that this matter has created considerable interest in Nova Scotia, in this city and in other parts of Canada, and I think we should have the information as soon as possible.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. Was a cost-plus contract awarded for grading and surfacing runways for the Eastern Passage airport at Dartmouth, Nova Scotia? If so, to whom?
2. What was the departmental estimate of the cost of performing this work?
3. Did the company perform the contract itself, or was it sublet?
4. If sublet, to whom was it sublet and at what price?
5. Is this work now completed?
6. What amount has been paid to the contractor?
7. What amount remains to be paid?
8. Was any amount claimed by the contractor and disallowed by the government?
9. If so, what was the nature of such claim or claims, and what was the amount claimed?
10. Were any amounts paid to the said contractor without an engineer's certificate?
11. If so, on what dates and what amounts were so paid?
12. Was a supplementary contract awarded?
13. If so, what was the nature of the work to be performed under the supplementary contract?
14. What was the contract price provided for in the supplementary contract?
15. What amount has been paid to the contractor in respect of the supplementary contract?
16. What amount remains to be paid?
17. Who are the directors of the contracting company?

CARPENTERS EMPLOYED AT MILITARY CAMPS

Mr. LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency):

1. What rate is paid to carpenters employed on national defence works at Valcartier military camp, Quebec?
2. What rate is paid to carpenters employed on national defence works at Camp Borden, Ontario?

Mr. POWER: Return tabled.

CONSOLIDATED MINING AND SMELTING COMPANY

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. Did the government of Canada pay a subsidy to the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada during the period from 1904 to 1919?
2. If a subsidy was paid, what was the total amount, and how much each year in the period mentioned?
3. Did the government of Canada pay a bounty on lead and zinc produced by the said company?
4. If a bounty was paid to the said company, what was the total amount?
5. Did the government erect buildings and install machinery on the said company's property?
6. What is the total amount of profits made by the said company from 1904 to date?
7. Has the government received from the said company any sum or sums on account of moneys advanced or paid?

CANADIAN HOSPITAL ACCOMMODATION FOR MILITARY FORCES

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Is the hospital accommodation for Canada's military forces adequate in the various military districts of Canada for those in training, or is there a shortage of accommodation?
2. At what distances from the various camps established under the present system, are there civilian hospitals, and have these all adequate equipment to take care of any cases that occur that cannot be dealt with at the various camps?
3. What hospital accommodation in the various military districts of Canada has been or is to be established by the government to take care of those now overseas if sick or wounded when they return home to Canada?
4. Has any hospital accommodation survey been made?

Mr. POWER: Order for return, tabled on behalf of army, air and pensions.

CHRISTMAS LEAVE TO MILITARY AND AIR FORCES AND GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

Mr. CHURCH:

1. On whose recommendation was Christmas leave limited to six days for Canada's army?
2. Is that the limit of time allowed for those who wish to come from the maritimes and the west, or the Pacific coast, to central Canada, on leave at their own expense?
3. On whose recommendation was leave at Christmas refused officers and men of the Royal Canadian Air Force?
4. What Christmas leave or holidays have members of the civil service not of Canada's military forces, or any employees of Canada's outside commissions?

[Mr P. C. Black.]

Mr. POWER: Mr. Speaker, this is an order for return, now tabled. But if the house would permit I should like to add a verbal statement with respect to this general question, either now or later. Possibly I could do it now.

On November 11 last my colleague, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), issued a statement to the press in regard to the proposed Christmas and New Year's leave arrangements for members of the Canadian Army on active service in Canada. In the house on November 28, and in reply to the question from the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lockhart), I again gave information in regard to the arrangements for leave for the army, and also at that time pointed out the impossibility of making any special holiday leave arrangements for the Royal Canadian Air Force. I would like, at this time, to amplify these statements.

In the first place, may I say that the guiding factor in the consideration of leave privileges to men on active service must be the defence and safety of the country and the obligations we are under by way of our war commitments. Under routine orders for the Canadian active service force, the members of the Canadian Army may be granted leave not exceeding fourteen days with pay upon completion of six months' continuous service with the Canadian active service force, and a further fourteen days' leave upon the completion of each subsequent period of twelve months. The six days' leave at Christmas or the New Year, which has already been announced, is in addition to these regular periods, and while it is hoped that the maximum number possible can avail themselves of the privilege, it is limited to the conditions that not more than fifty per cent of the unit may be absent at one time, and, furthermore, that the commanding officer must take into consideration the nature of the service being undertaken by the man concerned, and the necessity of having certain types of training completed speedily.

I realize that in cases where men are far distant from their homes a total absence of six days from their unit will not permit them to spend any time with their families. In such cases special arrangements are authorized in that where a man has not used up his regular fourteen days' leave, there may, with the permission of his commanding officer, be added to his six days' leave such number of days as he has available in order to enable him to carry out a lengthy journey.

In so far as the Royal Canadian Air Force is concerned, however, the situation is not by any means parallel. The entire personnel of the force is engaged either upon important defensive operations or on the intensive programme of training flying personnel so urgently required for service overseas.

Under normal conditions personnel engaged in active and continuous flying are granted, as far as possible, twelve days' leave every three months, and fourteen days' leave every six months is granted to non-flying personnel. It will be readily realized, however, by hon. members that at no one time can any substantial percentage of the operational defence force be spared from their immediate duties.

The joint air training plan is engaged upon a programme of extreme importance and urgency. The courses are intensive, and continuous, and any interruption occasioned by the release for a period either of the pupils or the instructional and administrative personnel causes serious delay in the output of trained pilots, observers, air gunners, and wireless operators. I cannot feel that under the present circumstances any special grant of holiday leave can be justified. Under present arrangements pupils in the flying schools are treated as liberally as possible in the provision of forty-eight-hour passes when their commanding officers feel that this can be done without interruption of their training. At the conclusion of their course it is the practice of the force to grant adequate leave to enable them to visit their families before embarking for an active theatre of war or proceeding on other duties. Beyond this I do not feel I can at present go.

Before leaving this question I would make emphatic reference again to the practice common to all the defence services of endeavouring to ensure an adequate period of embarkation leave for all members of the forces before they leave their training stations either for defensive positions in Canada or for overseas. In all cases where units are now garrisoning vulnerable areas or are en route overseas, opportunity has already been afforded to the personnel to see their homes and families before leaving.

Many representations have been made both in the public press and directly to my colleagues and myself on the question of the provision of free transportation for members of the forces proceeding on leave. I feel that many of those who make these representations do not realize the magnitude of the question.

I have made careful inquiry into the practice during the last war and I find that in Canada free transportation was never provided for troops proceeding on ordinary leave. In certain cases men returning invalided from overseas, when their condition permitted it, were given free transportation to proceed on leave to their homes, and return transportation to the hospital where their medical treatment was to be continued. In 1915-16, when the gathering of the harvest was considered to be a work of national importance, free transportation to a maximum distance of 300 miles was provided for those proceeding on harvest leave.

In the present war the scale of pay and dependents' allowance is considerably in excess of that paid during the war of 1914-18. Members of the forces proceeding on ordinary leave are entitled to return tickets at single fare rates. My colleagues and I are agreed that any further financial concessions cannot be made under the present circumstances.

I do not wish hon. members to think that I am not without the greatest sympathy for families who are widely separated on account of the fact that their sons and husbands are on active service, particularly at the Christmas and New Year festival, but I must remind them that at the present time we must all, perforce, subordinate our natural desires and inclinations to the exigencies of war service.

EXCHEQUER COURT—CASES HELD UNDER ADVISEMENT

Mr. BLACK (Chateauguay-Huntingdon):

1. Are there any rules governing the time within which courts of federal jurisdiction must deliver judgment after taking a case under advisement? If so, what is that time?
2. If not, is the Minister of Justice contemplating introducing legislation to determine a period of that nature?
3. What is the number of cases presently under advisement by the Exchequer Court of Canada, showing cases (a) before the president of the court, (b) before the associate judge?
4. How many cases have been kept under advisement, by each judge, within the last twelve months, (a) for more than sixty days; (b) for more than four months; (c) for more than six months; (d) for more than twelve months; (e) for more than eighteen months; (f) for more than two years?
5. For what reasons is a case held under advisement for more than ninety days?
6. Is the Department of Justice keeping a record of judgments under advisement for more than ninety days?
7. Is the business of the exchequer court such as to warrant the appointment of an additional judge?

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION—SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. PERLEY:

1. How many small projects, dams and dugouts, constructed under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, in the province of Saskatchewan, were accepted, approved of and the government committed to pay for in each of the years 1939 and 1940?
2. What amount was paid by the government on this account in each of the years 1939 and 1940, in the constituencies of Yorkton, Melville, Lake Centre, Moose Jaw, Weyburn, Assiniboia and Qu'Appele?
3. Which of the above were constructed by (a) contractors, and (b) individual farmers?

CANADIAN SHIPPING BOARD

Mr. McGREGOR:

1. What are the names of the members of the Canadian shipping board?
2. What is the racial origin of each?

Mr. CRERAR: Return tabled.

NATIONAL CONSTRUCTION COMPANY LIMITED

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many contracts have been awarded to the National Construction Company Limited with head office at Prince Albert, Saskatchewan?
2. What are the amounts thereof?
3. When was this company incorporated?
4. Who are the directors thereof?
5. What is its total capitalization, and, of said amount, how much has been subscribed?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

AGRICULTURE—IRREGULARITIES IN WINNIPEG LABORATORY ACCOUNTS

Mr. MARSHALL:

For a copy of the report of investigation made by responsible officials of the department of the auditor general or of the Department of Agriculture into serious irregularities revealed in the accounts of the Winnipeg laboratory.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

Mr. CASSELMAN (Grenville-Dundas):

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the governments of Canada, United States and the province of Ontario or between any officials of the said governments from January 1, 1935, to the present time, referring to: (a) a double-stage development of the international section of the St. Lawrence; (b) a single-stage development of the international section of the St. Lawrence.

MIGRATORY BIRDS CONVENTION ACT—APPLICATION TO YUKON TERRITORY

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, communications and other documents passing between the Controller of Yukon Territory and any minister of the crown and any employee of the government of Canada concerning the application of the Migratory Birds Convention Act to Yukon Territory and the game ordinance of Yukon since 1935.

AIYANSH, B.C., PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. MacINNIS:

For a return showing: The amount of money expended by the federal government for works of any kind at Aiyansh on the Naas river, British Columbia, for the period September 1, 1938, to August 31, 1940, together with (a) the number of persons employed on such works, (b) the length of time employed, (c) the hourly or daily rate of pay, and (d) the amount received by each person during said period.

[Mr. Perley.]

MILITARY FORCES—FREE RAILWAY TRANSPORTATION AND SYSTEM OF INSURANCE

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents from any organization or any other person or persons urging (1) free fares on railways for the military forces of Canada, and (2) for a system of insurance for our military forces.

Mr. POWER: I would ask the hon. member to name a specific date with respect to the second part of the motion. The hon. member asks for all correspondence, et cetera, from any organization urging a system of insurance for our military forces. My recollection is that that was a debatable question during the last war. I hope the hon. member does not wish me to go back to 1914-18.

Mr. CHURCH: I would like to have letters from municipalities in Canada, and from other public bodies asking for this legislation.

Mr. POWER: Since when?

Mr. CHURCH: I cannot give the date. The papers have been received by the government. One of the organizations is the Toronto city council; another is the East York township council, and there are many other municipalities.

Mr. POWER: Does the hon. member wish me to go back five years?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Since the declaration of war will be good enough.

Mr. CHURCH: Since the war started.

MIGRATORY BIRDS CONVENTION ACT—APPLICATION TO YUKON TERRITORY

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

For a copy of all regulations now in force affecting Yukon Territory made by the governor in council under the provisions of the Migratory Birds' Convention Act.

FORT OSBORNE BARRACKS, TUXEDO, MAN.—EMPLOYMENT OF F. WINCH

Mr MAYBANK:

For a copy of all papers, letters, telegrams, memoranda and other documents passing between the department of defence and the civil service commission and between the said department and the treasury board and between the civil service commission and the treasury board relating to one F. Winch, an employee as a fireman (or any other capacity) at Fort Osborne barracks, Tuxedo, Manitoba, and his employment in such capacity and his rate of pay from and including June, 1938, to date, and also for a copy of all such papers, letters, telegrams, memoranda, and other documents, passing between any individual or individuals and any department of government including civil service commission and treasury board over the same period and relating to the same subject matter.

Mr. ILSLEY: Documents and communications passing between departments of government or branches of the service, such as are called for by this motion, have been regarded as not properly producible by motion of this kind. They are interdepartmental communications, and I therefore believe that this motion should not carry. It should be dropped.

Motion dropped.

DARTMOUTH, N.S., AIRPORT

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

For a copy of all contracts executed since October 23, 1935, relating to (a) excavation, (b) grading and surfacing, (c) any other work undertaken, at the Eastern Passage airport at Dartmouth, Nova Scotia, and also a copy of all letters, telegrams, estimates, accounts, engineers' certificates, audit reports, memoranda and any other documents or papers referring to the said contracts.

Mr. POWER: It would be easier if my hon. friend would limit the order to a time since 1938.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It goes back a little farther than that.

Mr. POWER: All right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It all belongs to one series of contracts.

JOINT DEFENCE BOARD—MATERIAL GIVEN TO THE PRESS FOR PUBLICATION

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all addresses, correspondence, interviews, press conferences and all other facts published and given by the chairmen of the Canada and United States sections of the joint defence board or other members or officials, at Halifax, Vancouver and other cities in Canada and in the United States, respecting the joint defences of Canada and the United States, as given to the press for publication in both countries.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Order granted, and return now tabled.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does that contain all the twilight twitterings?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES—COAL

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn):

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the government, or any department thereof, and any railway companies regarding the marked weight of cars of coal and the inspection of the same, and also a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents regarding the complaints received concerning the weights to retail dealers of coal, from January 1, 1935, to date.

GOVERNOR OF THE BANK OF CANADA

Mr. QUELCH:

For a copy of the order in council appointing and fixing the salary of the governor of the Bank of Canada, and also a copy of all subsequent orders in council in connection therewith.

Mr. ILSLEY: Return tabled.

RENT CONTROL BOARD—PETITION THAT CALGARY BE DECLARED A CONTROLLED AREA

Mr. COLDWELL:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, resolutions and other documents in the possession of the government relating to a petition requesting a hearing by the rent control board in Calgary, Alberta, in order that said city be declared a controlled area.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE—SUPERINTENDENT'S OFFICE IN REGINA

Mr. PERLEY:

For a return showing:—

1. The names of all persons employed in the superintendent's office under the provisions of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act in the province of Saskatchewan at any time during the year 1940;

2. The dates of employment of each individual, the position held by and the salary and expenses paid to each such individual;

3. The premises leased under the provisions of the said act in the city of Regina, from whom leased, the area of floor space, the rentals paid and the sum expended on alterations, repairs, furniture and equipment;

4. Whether the employees were employed through the civil service commission, or on whose recommendation.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS—CORRESPONDENCE WITH MANITOBA AND SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. ROY:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, memoranda and other documents exchanged between the dominion government and the governments of Manitoba and Saskatchewan since January 1, 1939, to the present time with reference to the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROVISION FOR ADJOURNMENT TO FEBRUARY 17—PAY FOR SESSIONAL EMPLOYEES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That when this house adjourns immediately after parliament has disposed of the financial legislation thus far submitted for its consideration, it stand adjourned until Monday, February 17, 1941, at 3 o'clock, p.m., provided always that if it appears to the satisfaction of Mr. Speaker, after consultation with His Majesty's government, that the public interest requires that the house should meet at an earlier time during the adjournment, Mr. Speaker may give notice that he is so satisfied, and thereupon the house shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, before this motion is put I should like to suggest to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and to you, as Speaker, that some consideration be given to the members of the sessional staff of the house. During the past fifteen or sixteen months the house has met infrequently, and to my mind we are in danger of losing the services of some of the experienced help we now have. We may have to content ourselves with inexperienced help in the future unless something is done. I do not know what the government has in mind, but from conversations which I have had with hon. members on all sides I know there is a feeling that some consideration should be given at this time to the sessional staff. I hold the view that the government ought to be something in the nature of a model employer. We have often criticized corporations which from time to time have taken on people for a short while and then laid them off and allowed them to enter the ranks of the unemployed. I ask the government to consider this matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Some days ago the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) wrote me about the matter to which my hon. friend has just referred. I replied that I felt that the interests of the members of the service would be better served if the matter were left to the government rather than having it brought up in parliament at this time. The matter has since been considered by the internal economy commission, and I think the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has the views of the commission on the matter. Perhaps he will state them to the house.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The internal economy commission met to consider the question of the payment of the sessional staff between this part of the session and the next part after we meet in February. It has been found that the payment of the sessional staff during the two months' adjournment, over December and January, would involve the expenditure of $1,276.83 per day, or a total of $79,163.46.

There are 260 sessional clerks and employees. For example, there are 130 stenographers who receive $5 per day, which totals $650 per day. It will be realized that the rate of pay for stenographers on the sessional staff is much higher than the rate of pay prevailing in the service. This higher rate is paid because it is thoroughly understood that they must take the chance of the session being irregular and accept the possibility of being laid off between sessions. The sessional staff is not employed on the same conditions as permanent civil servants. It is paid by the day and its members are liable to be laid off when there is not sufficient work to justify their employment. Salaries are higher than in the government departments, but these employees must take the risk of being left unemployed during long adjournments or when a session is of short duration. They were not paid during the three-month adjournment from August 7 to November 5, 1940.

The matter of travelling expenses may possibly be raised, but the payment of such expenses to these employees is prohibited under the terms of standing order 89, which reads:

> No allowance shall in future be made to any person in the employ of this house who may not reside at the scene of government, for travelling expenses in coming to attend his duties.

The members of the internal economy commission were unanimously of the opinion that whatever the house might do, certainly the country would not approve under present-day conditions of an expenditure of nearly $80,000 which is not authorized and which has not been contemplated.

Mr. COLDWELL: Just a word of explanation. I did not intend to suggest that the government should pay full salaries. I did think that the government might be able to do something to aid the situation, since we have had some quite long adjournments. Perhaps some of the members of this staff might be used in connection with the conference in January.

Mr. ILSLEY: That can be considered.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, it was my intention to ask this question to-day, but the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) got in just one jump ahead of me. I realize the position of some of the members of this staff—

Mr. SPEAKER: I must point out that this matter cannot be the subject of debate. A question was asked by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and it has been replied to by the Minister of Finance. I have already read the motion which is before the house.

Mr. FAIR: I am speaking to that motion, and I believe it is debatable. I do not think it is fair that—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The motion with respect to the adjournment of the house has been put, and a question has been asked by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and has been answered by the minister. There can be no further debate on the question.

Mr. CHURCH: May I ask the Prime Minister a question about the adjournment?

Mr. SPEAKER: I must insist that there can be no further debate on that question. A question has been asked, and in plain terms, and the minister has replied, also in very plain terms, and that is the end of it.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister for information. If it should become necessary to call the house together at an earlier date than that indicated in the motion, would the Prime Minister be kind enough to give instructions that those members who live a long distance from Ottawa shall be notified by air mail or wire? They can send my wire collect, if they like. I am making the suggestion because when a previous hurried session opened I got here two days late, and two days after that I got my formal notice of the opening of the house. I think that out of consideration for hon. members some steps should be taken to notify them promptly by air mail or telegraph in order that they may get here in time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I regret that my hon. friend did not get his notice promptly as to the time of meeting. The date was broadcast by radio, I know, and my hon. friend might have got the information in that way. However, I agree that members should get a specific notice by telegraph, and I shall give special instructions that any message that is sent to my hon. friend be prepaid.

Mr. FAIR: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand that the hon. member is addressing himself to the question before the house?

Mr. FAIR: Yes, Mr. Speaker. This is not the ordinary motion to adjourn, and because of that fact and because we may reconvene before the date set out in the motion, I think the payment of our sessional staff during the adjournment should be carefully considered.

The house will remember that in January last we had a very short session, and I know several members of the staff who did not make their expenses. Again this session members of the staff have come here from outside Ottawa, and if we are to adjourn over a long period it is unfair to ask them to pay their railway fares, which I understand cannot be allowed them because of some order that is made by the house. If that be the only objection, the house is still in session and we have power to change that order, and I think we should do so.

Several members of the staff have not had an opportunity to earn their travelling and living expenses while in the city, and something should be done for them by the government. Either allow them full pay, or at least part of their salaries, during the adjournment until February 17. I hope the government will seriously consider my suggestion.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, may I voice a protest, which is only my own but which may be shared by other members of the house, against this way of dealing with adjournments. We have examples that we should follow. We have one example in particular that is very good, and much better than any suggestions that may be offered by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson). It is the example of the province of Quebec. The premier of the province will attend the dominion-provincial conference in the middle of January notwithstanding the fact that the Quebec legislature is meeting on January 7. It will adjourn for a week and then resume its proceedings afterwards. That is the first thing —an example that we might well follow; an example from the good old Liberal party of the province of Quebec.

There is a second matter which is of great importance. Our first duty here is not to make speeches but to enact legislation. We have been sitting here for a month and no legislation has been submitted to the house except by private members.

There is another thing, Mr. Speaker, and this is a very deep grievance which I lay before you and the government. It is that members are not well informed of the legislation that has been passed by parliament until they receive the statute book in bound form. In the province of Quebec there is another example—I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to tell the leader of the opposition to keep silent when any hon. member is addressing the house. I do not appreciate those manners of his, and I am sure he was brought up very differently as a young boy. The sound of his voice annoys me. Therefore I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to be kind enough to keep order when the member for Témiscouata is speaking so that he can be heard. The sound comes through the leader of the opposition's nose and not from his mouth.

Mr. HOMUTH: Your voice is no violin.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think the hon. member should address these remarks to the leader of the opposition, and I wish he would withdraw them.

Mr. POULIOT: I shall be glad to withdraw the remarks, Mr. Speaker.

I was saying that in the province of Quebec there is another example set by the good old Liberal party in the province, which I think we should follow. Every piece of legislation that is passed by the Quebec legislature is printed in the Quebec official gazette within a week after it has been passed by the legislature and assented to by the lieutenant-governor. But here we have to wait for months before we get our statute book. It was absurd that this session should start without members having available to them the statute book of the previous session.

This is one of the main objections that I have to the procedure that has been followed, and when this session ends I hope parliament will prorogue instead of adjourning to an indefinite date. I have, sir, made two suggestions; I made them very clearly, and I shall not repeat them for the benefit of those who do not understand what is stated in plain English.

You, Mr. Speaker, who are more familiar with British traditions than anyone else in this house, know that in Great Britain only a few days intervene between the prorogation of parliament and the opening of a new session. It is on account of the privilege that members of parliament have enjoyed for so long, of immunity from arrest over a certain period after the close of one session and before the opening of the next. Nobody has mentioned that here as an argument for the long adjournment of last session.

We can very easily be summoned to meet here at any time by notice in the official gazette. I will tell my revered leader the Prime Minister of a letter that I saw yesterday in my files. It was a notice sent by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in August, 1896, to every Liberal member, telling him it was his duty to attend the opening of the first session after the general election; and I assume that that practice was followed for some years afterwards. This year we met without notice to any individual member. Members were notified by an announcement in the press. I do not think that is the right way to deal with members of parliament. When we adjourn and go home I think we should be summoned here on some other authority than that of the press. We should be notified, either by you, Mr. Speaker, or by the Prime Minister, to come here and attend the sittings of parliament, and I assume that when this period of adjournment is over, whether we meet on the date which is mentioned, February 17, or are called before that time, or the sitting is postponed until some time afterwards, we as members of parliament will be officially notified that parliament will resume at that time.

There is another thing that I would mention. It is that we come here and find that nothing is ready. The Prime Minister told us that the government would have a fortnight to make preparation, in the month of February, after the sittings of the conference. But what sound legislation can be prepared in a fortnight? At any time sessions are opened, governments should be ready to submit a sound legislative programme.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: I see the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and his satellites laughing heartily and making gestures.

Mr. HOMUTH: Not with the hon. member, but at him.

Mr. POULIOT: I am speaking of the importance of legislation. He seems not to realize what we are here for. I am not here to listen to him, I am here to see that sound legislation is enacted for everyone in the land. And, sir, I regret to have to reiterate that nothing is ready. It will all be provided in thirteen days. It is like a quick lunch; we shall have to digest the indigestible. I hope that when we meet it will be, not to pass hasty legislation, but to scrutinize the estimates, and then we shall fulfil our duty to those who have elected us.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Before the question is put, I might be allowed to speak of one or two matters which have been referred to.

First of all, may I say to my hon. friend (Mr. Pouliot) who has just taken his seat that I have tried at all times as far as I could to be courteous towards hon. members with respect to matters pertaining to the sessions of parliament, as well as all else. I do not know whether that courtesy should be expected to go to the length of obliging me to write a personal letter to each hon. member in order to tell him that it is his duty to be in the house at the first meeting of a session.

My hon. friend referred to a letter which Sir Wilfrid Laurier wrote in 1896 to members of parliament. I believe I have seen a copy of that letter, and I think I know its purpose. Sir Wilfrid Laurier had just been returned to power. His government had come into office and was about to meet parliament for the first time, and Sir Wilfrid was anxious to have all members of his party present so as to confer with them at the beginning of a new parliament, just as, I think, my hon. friend opposite did this year at the beginning of the present session; he had a party caucus at the beginning of the session with a view of greeting and meeting the members of his party. I do not believe that the letter of Sir Wilfrid Laurier was ever intended by him as an official notice of the obligation upon members to attend the sittings of parliament. The official notice is given by proclamation. I should feel that I was belittling the intelligence of hon. members were I to take it upon myself to send to each of them a letter indicating what their duty was in the matter of attendance. I make that clear because I should not like to have it thought that I was discourteous, least of all to my hon. friend, because I know what would follow if I were.

May I say to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), who has spoken about the sessional employees, that, while my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has given the house the information which it was necessary to give, the government naturally will wish, for example, as he suggested, in connection with the dominion-provincial conference, to make use of some of those who would not be employed at the time in the work of the Commons, and who might be of service when the conference is held. More than that I do not think I can say as to the position of the sessional staff.

I might mention, however, what I said to the hon. member for Davenport when he took up this matter with me privately. All over this country to-day are persons who are pressing to get any kind of government appointment, even for a few weeks. There is something of security—and that not any false sense of security—which belongs to those who were taken on at the beginning of the session and have been given to understand that they will be reappointed when the session continues. They are in a rather privileged position as matters stand at the present time.

My hon friend the member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) has spoken about sessions of parliament being for the purpose not of making speeches but of enacting legislation. I agree with him that the purpose is not that of making speeches, particularly speeches which have nothing to do with our war effort. I believe that is an aspect with respect to speeches which we should keep very much in mind at the present time, if we do not, I am inclined to believe that the public will judge us critically. No one can realize how very serious the situation of the world is to-day and not feel that everything else is comparatively irrelevant: I say "comparatively", in relation to the importance of this House of Commons and this parliament concentrating thought and effort upon matters relating to the war. I am not stating anything which is not wholly obvious when I venture to say, it is not the quantity of talk, it is the quality of the decisions reached which counts in all that parliament does. I do not think it is a sign of high intelligence that a long time is needed in discussion in order to reach a decision. It seems to me that most persons who are able to reach decisions promptly do so usually because they have already become pretty fully informed upon the subject matter with which they are dealing. One does not need to restrict one's opportunity to parliament in order to become informed with regard to most matters which are discussed here.

While I am speaking I should like to say a word about the view which has been so frequently expressed, that parliament should be continuously in session during the period of the war. I suppose every hon. member will agree that the parliament of the United Kingdom has a very much larger obligation, in matters of legislation, of war effort, and all else, than has this parliament of Canada. It has to legislate with respect not only to matters pertaining to the United Kingdom but also to those which relate to the large colonial empire and the empire of India. In addition it has the obligation of considering and deciding upon those classes of questions which in our country are considered by the nine provincial governments as well as the federal government. I mention these things because I believe it is helpful to have a true sense of proportion when we estimate the length of time necessary for discussion in the house as compared with such time as may be needed by the executive in order to carry out the policies which are decided upon here and the enactments that are passed.

I have had an estimate made of the length of time that the House of Commons in the United Kingdom parliament has sat since the beginning of the war. The period I have taken is the first year of war, that is to say, from the 1st of September, 1939, until August 31, 1940. I find that the sittings of the commons amount to 149 days. That represents 30 weeks of five days a week. It represents the entire period in number of days during which the commons have been in session in the British parliament in that period of time.

May I point out something else the significance of which I would ask hon. members to note. In the British House of Commons, in order that the ministers may be able to discharge the heavy obligations that rest upon them at this time of war, parliament for the most part sits only three days in the week, not as we do, from Monday to Friday. The custom has been for the Prime Minister to indicate the days on which parliament shall sit, and after a careful survey of the British Hansard I find that both the late Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Churchill, while they did not make a definite rule—because sometimes they might wish to meet on Monday and at other times on Friday—generally moved that, when the house adjourned on Thursday night, it should stand adjourned until the following Tuesday. That obviously would not be workable in Canada where hon. members have to travel such great distances. What I do wish to point out, however, is that the British parliament, with all its heavy obligations, has found it possible to limit the time of its sittings as indicated, and also has found it necessary to follow the practice I have indicated because of the exceptional burden which of necessity is thrown upon a ministry during a time of war.

I would point out further that so far as the government of the United Kingdom is concerned, as hon. members are aware, the cabinet is only a part of the ministry. The ministry itself is a much larger body and it has supporting it many of the most highly trained minds of the United Kingdom, a very large staff of exceptionally well-informed experts. In our public service we are fortunate in many of our departments in having officials who are well qualified to give the very best expert advice, but for ministers to have a chance even to confer with the members of their staffs at a time like this, and to do so in any careful detail, requires time and opportunity. If parliament, when we resume, is to go on sitting from Monday to Friday, I think we shall have seriously to consider at that time how we can make a division of labour which will at least afford more opportunity than has thus far been available, to enable the ministry in this time of war to deal with the pressing problems which arise not only from day to day but from hour to hour, and to have longer periods of time for cabinet consultation and conference.

While I am on this subject, may I remind hon. members of the difference between our system of government and that of the United States. Every now and then one hears it said that President Roosevelt is able to do this and that, that he is able to broadcast, to travel, and so on. He and his ministers are able to do this, it is said; why, therefore cannot the same be done in Canada? Well, under the constitution of the United States the ministers have no immediate obligation to congress. The president and his ministers, the secretaries of state, give their whole time to executive work and to submission of recommendations to congress. But so far as what would correspond to our parliament is concerned, either in the senate or in the house of representatives, they have no obligations beyond that of the president to appear occasionally before congress and the secretaries of state at particular times before committees.

I mention these facts only in order to help to make clear, not only to hon. members of this house but to the country generally, the position as it is in reality. If we consider the length of time necessarily spent by the ministry in Canada in dealing with questions of legislation and matters pertaining to their executive duties, and compare the position here with what it is either in the United States or in Great Britain, I think we shall find the comparison, from the point of view of the length of time accorded the ministry to fulfil its administrative obligations, more favourable to the executive in the United Kingdom and in the United States than it is in Canada.

Motion agreed to.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

ARRANGEMENTS FOR DEALING WITH APPLICATIONS AND MAKING PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. FLEMING (Humboldt): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). What arrangements are being made to speed up payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member was kind enough to give me a copy of the question before I came in, and I have had the following answer prepared:

Regulations under order in council P.C. 3887, dated August 13, 1940, provided that applications for assistance under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act be submitted prior to the fifteenth of September and be supported by such information with respect to the average yield of wheat in the township or other area as may be available.

Applications were received from a large number of municipalities for all three provinces, and, of the townships for which applications were received, 1,950 were found to have a yield of thirteen bushels or less according to standing crop and stook-thresher estimates made by field inspectors.

These 1,950 townships were again visited by field inspectors to check acreage reports submitted by farmers, to determine farms on which the average yield of wheat is in excess of eight bushels per acre and on which the production of wheat is in excess of three thousand bushels and to obtain complete information with respect to township yields and farmers' status for the board of review.

The board of review began the examination of reports on November 4 and dealt with two-thirds of the applications received. Complete information was not available for the other townships; further reports have since been received and the board reconvened on December 2.

An emergency year was declared by order in council P.C. 6650 on November 20, 1940.

Because of delays in a number of townships for which complete information is still not available and difficulties in transportation conditions, it has not yet been possible to determine the exact number of townships which may be included in the crop failure category but it is expected that this can be done within the next few days.

Many applications have been received since September 15 for both township assistance and area substitution. It may be possible to deal with some of these under the regulations, but others will have to be rejected.

A large number of schedules for different townships have been completed and it is expected that the issuing and mailing of cheques will commence within the next few days.

It should be possible to have cheques for first payments under the act mailed to the great majority of those who will be eligible to receive them during December but it is not believed that this can be done in all cases.

NICKEL AND SCRAP IRON

REPORTED STATEMENT OF DR. ROBERT MCCLURE AS TO SHIPMENTS TO JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): In view of the statement made by Doctor Robert McClure, International Red Cross Director for China, speaking in Toronto last night, to the effect that "only last week a shipment of nickel was sent to Japan and will soon be found in the bodies of British soldiers," will the Prime Minister tell the house whether or not nickel is still being shipped to Japan, and secondly will he give some assurance to the house that this shameful traffic will be stopped?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend was kind enough to give me notice of his question, and the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) also came around with a similar notice with respect to this matter.

Let me say at once that no nickel has been shipped to Japan, as far as the government is aware, since the beginning of this year. My hon. friend speaks of an assurance. That assurance was given at the beginning of this session; not in the words which have been used by the hon. member, regarding a "shameful traffic," but an assurance that no permits would be granted for the export of nickel to Japan at this time, for reasons which were made quite clear in the statement.

I should like to take advantage of the question which my hon. friend has asked to read to the house the full report of what was said last night by the gentleman to whom the hon. member has referred, and I would ask hon. members to consider while I am reading it whether they feel that any responsibility is to be attached to utterances which are expressed in language such as appears in this speech, and also whether or not utterances of the kind are not very dangerous at a time like the present.

The dispatch which appeared in this morning's Ottawa Citizen, and I assume in the other newspapers as well, is dated Toronto, December 4, and is as follows:

> Dr. Robert McClure, International Red Cross director for China, said in an address here to-night that Canadian nickel was being shipped to Japan as recently as last week "and I expect some one will soon be digging it out of British bodies."
> He said the reason is that "Canadian merchants want the profit."
> "For three years I have been digging Canadian scrap iron out of Chinese bodies and I expect someone will soon be digging it out of British bodies, for Japan is now ready to attack Singapore. That is all her build-up in French Indo-China means. . . ."

I want to repudiate a statement of that kind just as strongly as it is possible to do so. I cannot understand how anyone holding any kind of responsible position could allow himself to use words of the kind in regard to a situation so delicate as is the present international situation.

I saw this report this morning. A telegram was sent immediately to Doctor McClure by the under-secretary of state for external affairs. When a reply is received I shall be pleased to give it either to the house or to the press. The telegram was as follows:

> Canadian Press despatch in this morning's Ottawa Citizen quotes you as saying in an address in Toronto that Canadian nickel was being shipped to Japan as recently as last week. No nickel can be exported from Canada without a permit, and no permit has been granted for export to Japan since January 2nd, 1940. If you have any evidence of specific illegal shipment please communicate it at once so that the government may institute necessary investigations with view to prosecution. If you have not please correct Canadian Press report for publication.

Perhaps I might be permitted to add a word in reference to the export of scrap iron, since scrap iron was also mentioned by Doctor McClure. I stated to the house at the beginning of the session, and I repeat now, that no permits have been issued for the export of scrap iron to Japan since the autumn of last year.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF AGREEMENTS WITH BRITISH GOVERNMENT RESPECTING BACON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): On Monday last in reply to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), with respect to the tabling of the bacon agreements, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) made this statement:

> There are some features of the agreement which have yet to be discussed with the other parties concerned before it can be brought down. As soon as that is done, both agreements will be brought down.

Would the minister state to the house how this discussion is progressing; whether it is by correspondence, verbally or by cable; with whom it is being conducted, and if there is any possibility of the agreements being tabled before the house adjourns. I think the minister knows that at this season of the year it is important that the farmers should have some definite information in this regard.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I think the discussions were to start this morning; the board was to reconvene in this city. I am not certain that the members have arrived and are carrying on the discussions, but just as soon as I have information from them the agreements will be tabled. If there are any parts of the agreement that cannot be tabled for the time being, I will bring down all that can be tabled.

WAR BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON PROPOSALS OF MINISTER OF FINANCE FOR CONSERVATION OF FOREIGN EXCHANGE

The house resumed from Wednesday, December 4, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) to set up the committee of ways and means furnishes an opportunity which is of great importance to the people of Canada. It has in its favour constitutional practice going back two hundred years. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, has moved the following amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis):

> That all the words after "that" in the said motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> This house regrets that the government has not seen fit to introduce proposals for the raising of a compulsory war loan free of interest to be levied according to ability to subscribe.

The leader of the Social Credit group (Mr. Blackmore) supports that amendment. He said:

> . . . that social credit as a philosophy does not envisage taking money away from the people. But we are going to support the amendment moved by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, not because it is in accordance with social credit principles but because it offers a means whereby the government can obtain money without interest.

I am hoping that during the recess the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) will pay heed to the handwriting on the wall and give some consideration to forming a national government. The Conservative party gets much of its support from the working classes, the trades unions and those engaged in agriculture. It receives strong support from the members of our trade unions because it is a protectionist party. In view of the grave disaster which awaits the British people unless the empire wakes up, I believe the time has come when the government and the head of the government should have a conference with representatives of labour, industry and agriculture in order to see what can be done immediately to help Great Britain in her lone fight against the forces of darkness and paganism in the defence of civilization and freedom, and should abolish the duty on British imports if such action will not hurt labour and industry. I did not wait until war broke out to urge rearmament; I have been urging it since 1937 when Britain first started to rearm. Between now and when parliament meets again, I believe the government would be well advised to take representatives of the opposition, other groups in the house, labour and the trade unions, into the ministry. If labour were represented in the government, then I believe that all these political theories with reference to the tariff and other matters would be put, with all politics, into cold storage until after the war was over. Let us have a really national government so that we may have unity and war action.

Thanks to the British fleet and our air forces, Canada and the United States will be able to enjoy Christmas free of the fear of invasion. The splendid primate of the Anglican church, the Most Reverend D. T. Owen, Archbishop of Toronto, has pointed out that we should take some of the load off England, which has supported Canada and missions here for years. This budget, in so far as it lowers duties on goods from Great Britain, is a step in the right direction, but it does not go far enough. The primate ably points out that England is carrying a huge burden in the defence of Christianity and freedom, and he suggests that the members of the Church of England should shoulder part of the burden and maintain their own missions. Great Britain has established many of these in the past.

The amendment and the subamendment show the real need for a national government composed of representatives of all classes. This is the worst war in the history of civilization. It may destroy religion and Christianity. The Social Credit and Cooperative Commonwealth Federation groups are both minority groups in this parliament, but the latter, although few here in numbers, has considerable influence among the working classes, as was shown by the last election. I object to the war being used by them as an opportunity to urge their plans, to put across their own cures, remedies, prescriptions, palliatives, patent medicines and gold cures for the economic ills and financial and social burdens of the country. They are using the dire straits in which Britain finds herself to-day to put over their remedies and divide this country when it should be one from coast to coast, with all its citizens ready to support the government. This is what should be done as long as the government are carrying out their duties and doing a real war job, and if they run the war in a non-partisan way, but not otherwise.

The socialist party in this house—that is really what they are—is patterned after the socialist wing of the Labour party in Great Britain. The other day I referred to the way in which the government of Great Britain had obtained the support of the socialist branch of the Labour party by taking into the ministry two of its representatives, Mr. Bevin and Mr. Morrison, who are doing a splendid job, although, before they became ministers, they were pacifists and bitterly opposed rearmament. If a similar course were followed in Canada, then we would have a united war effort. The country wants to find out the truth, the way and the light about our war effort before we go into committee of ways and means. Does this budget add to our security, which is better than opulence, or does it not? The people have been left in darkness. How are they going to find out about the situation? Parliament might just as well meet in secret, for all the reports that are published. The proceedings are not even reported. If the taxpayer or the man on the street has a grievance, there is only one place where he can air it—in this parliament.

What is the position of affairs to-day? In the past the people have looked to the press. The acid test of a newspaper is how it reports this House of Commons. I have always advocated the removal of all censorship on the press. In my opinion such censorship is a farce. There are some censors in Toronto and elsewhere who were formerly hockey and turf reporters. They know nothing about finance or defence or war or foreign affairs. The people are being left in darkness. If this continues, it will lead to trouble, as Mr. Chamberlain in January, 1938, pointed out, and the country will be, as he said, left to a course of secrecy that will spell disaster.

Criticism should prove a tonic for any government. It should urge and arouse the government to action. This budget has been called a baby budget. The minister is one of the baby half-backs of the government, and he is making some fumbles. This budget is really more important than the one presented in July in the last war session because it contains more changes in economic principles and important tariff departures not known before. I believe it will prove to be of more importance than the main budget which will be presented next year because it will be the framework for the 1941 budget. In my opinion the presentation of this baby budget should be made the opportunity for an inquest into our whole war effort. We are spending a billion dollars a year, and we should be told what is being spent for war purposes and what is being spent for purposes other than the war, but in the name of war only, and what is primary and what secondary. We should be told this before it is too late. Some of this money is being spent to keep up useless legations and all that kind of thing.

Some of the money which the minister seeks to collect by means of the various amendments to the tariff will not be spent for war purposes. Many of these expenditures should be eliminated, and they could be eliminated by further drastic economy in civil administration and by coordination within the civil service. There have been no signs of economy. What amount is being spent on the battle of Britain? On May 20 I asked for certain information about recruiting and for all orders in council on soldier matters. Apparently we are carrying on a Liberal war, because no return was ever made; apparently some official stopped it. We now have this budget which provides funds, first, for conscription for home defence and, second, in order to protect the neutrality of the United States. All the money collected by this new budget should be spent upon the battle of Britain and the battle of the Mediterranean before it is too late. We have been too late in everything.

I should like to say to the Prime Minister, who is not in the chamber at the moment, that I challenge every statement he made in this house the day before yesterday about our war effort and about things looking brighter. I make the same challenge as was made in New Zealand and Australia when recruiting was stepped up. The money raised by this budget should be spent for war purposes and the taxpayers of this country should not be taxed the way they are for non-essentials and so-called luxuries. Our primary object should be to help the mother country. As I said before, this budget is of more importance than the main budget which will be brought down next year. It contains two cardinal principles. First, the government wants to increase all production and, second, the government wants to restrict consumption, both private and public, as much as possible.

The man on the street wants to know about this budget and the debates in this house. He does not object to paying taxes if they are used for the defence of civilization, freedom and religion, in the battle of Britain, but he does object to paying taxes for things that are of secondary importance, such as home defence, and many other useless expenditures, for example, on the old league; a new one, pan-Americanism; collective security and pacifist doctrines. The House of Commons is the only forum where a person can have his grievances dealt with and learn the facts. The man on the street does object to his grievances not being ventilated, and he does object to the press not giving some report of what goes on in the House of Commons, because he desires to learn what the policy of the government is, what a minister proposes, and what is proposed by the official opposition and by the hon. gentlemen of the two groups to my left on the other side of the budget debate.

I have no bouquets to throw at the government, because I am greatly dissatisfied with the war effort of the government, both before and since the war started. Down to the hour of the outbreak of war they had done nothing but support neutrality and disarmament. For four or five years in this house I have been urging rearmament. I did not wait for the war to start to urge that a rearmament budget be brought down. For the past five years I have forgotten politics and have worked in and out of the house to arouse the country from its apathy to the proper need for security and preparation. I have not made speeches as far apart and different as the poles and a right-about face. I have been a consistent supporter of the rearmament policy of the government since they started to take up this work.

One of the main things to which I object in this budget—and this is the second we have had; the minister should be able to combine them in one—is that we have nothing to relieve real estate or the municipalities, whose revenues have been taken away. Instead, the government is making up its budget with an income tax, an excess profits tax, and all these federal burdens which are placed upon the municipalities, with resulting overgovernment and overtaxation, and appropriating municipal revenues such as income tax and other taxes. We have no redress in this respect. Another thing I object to is the unfair way in which, in connection with the Municipal Assistance Act, the money provided for relief and relief works has been distributed. Ontario got nothing.

After the collapse of France, Mr. Churchill said, regarding the budget, that members of parliament should "search their own consciences, as I frequently search mine," because everybody has made mistakes. It seems to me, in looking at both the amendment and the subamendment, that the only use in recriminating about the past is to enforce effective action at the present. We seem to have done everything too late. As I see it, panic has stimulated the government to action. Britain and France learned to their sorrow from bitter experience that constructive criticism prevents governments from reacting into blunders which are nothing but suicide. So long as criticism is honest, founded on facts and not inspired by any ulterior political motive, it is more helpful, urgent and necessary in war time than in peace.

With reference to this particular debate on the budget and what it is for, and the conduct of the war, we seem to be too late in everything. We were too late in getting this long deferred relief to the mother country and helping her to bear the burden. Nine times out of ten we have been too late—too late in recruiting; too late in our operations respecting the Bren gun and bombing planes; too late in the commonwealth air training scheme; too late in respect of clothing, boots and equipment; too late in furnishing money for dependents; too late in supplying big guns, mine sweepers, bombers, real tanks, Bren guns, and modern rifles and munitions; too late in dealing with the fifth column; too late getting a survey of industrial and economic power; too late in organizing large and small plants for the manufacture of munitions, torpedo boats, and aircraft such as Spitfires; too late in preventing the menace which arises from magazines printed in the United States, which have exhibited Anglo-phobia for years, and from United States radio programmes which are sent into Canada every day to destroy the morale of the Canadian people. Help Britain now; argue about it afterwards. It is now or never, now and forever in this hour of need.

In connection with this ways and means committee, I would say to the government, and particularly to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who has recently returned from England, that I am glad to see the government has given, by way of reduced rates, a small concession to the mother country, situated as she is; but if it had been done in 1938 or 1939 it would have been much better. Away back in 1938 I urged upon the Minister of Agriculture that he should establish food reservoirs over in England, that he should send the exportable surplus of grain to be stored over there, in addition to bacon, canned goods and other foodstuffs, because of grave submarine menace, such as we experienced in the last war.

When we saw the disaster coming, I put forward the constructive suggestion that Canada should find a way of making possible the impossible. In other words, where there were no barracks or implements of war we should do as we did before, namely, take other public buildings. I said, if men have no uniforms, let them train without uniforms. If they have no rifles, machine guns or other modern implements of warfare, let them do as had been done in France and Great Britain, namely, use dummies until the real weapons can be obtained. Instead of allowing these men to drift round with nothing to do, they should be given the proper training immediately. Canada misjudged the whole situation. I said in 1938 it would take two years to train men and two years to get any real munitions.

If the government needs money it must, no doubt, go the easiest way to secure it in order to finance the war, but what I object to is the way they are doing it. In my opinion the government should charge seventy per cent of this war expenditure, if of primary importance, not secondary, to capital, and about thirty per cent to income. Industry cannot continue any longer to carry the burdens, restraints and all these artificial barriers which are placed upon it by a score of boards. I do not know how businessmen are going to conduct their operations or businesses, with all the boards which have been appointed in this country. We are simply being headed for state socialism all along the line, and the rank of a totalitarian state, and nobody will want to conduct a business or have one, with the artificial barriers and burdens which are being imposed and the attitude expressed by the leader of the group on my left, with regard to conscription of industry and all wealth. The municipalities are starved by federal and provincial powers grabbing their revenues, and the time is coming when they will have no money with which to carry out some of their functions, with those imposed by Ottawa on them. There was established by the British North America Act in this country overgovernment and overtaxation by a duplicate municipal system, resulting in a triple-header system of taxation, with dominion, provincial and municipal budgets, so much so, with the increased income tax and the added sales tax on civic utilities and all this kind of thing, that the time has come when the minister should consider more carefully my proposal to assess two-thirds of the amount in the ways and means resolution to capital, and the balance to revenue.

Hon. gentlemen of the social credit party believe that the way to raise this money is not by taxes and borrowing, but by inflation, namely, to start the printing-press, create paper money by a gamble, and let the government use it for war purposes. We are told that the amount required next war year will be about a billion dollars. But now the social credit party abandon all that and their principles and support the amendment moved by the leader of the other group.

The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation amendment goes further than the social credit proposals. If we accept the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation proposal to reconstruct industry, trade and commerce and our financial institutions in war time and conscript industry and wealth, we are going to kill all our war effort, supported by the majority of the people of the industrial provinces, who pay eighty per cent of the taxes under this budget. I believe the sense of the people of the two central provinces is opposed to any such drastic change at the present time as unwise and uneconomic. It would dislocate industry, which is already severely handicapped by these artificial barriers and burdens, and crushing loads which are placed on business to-day. We are fast approaching a totalitarian state, with these numerous excursions into state socialism, with the main budget and this baby budget, as it is called, with sickness and unemployment insurance—which I have supported.

What have we to-day? The business man is so taxed that he is taxed to death. One of the glories of the Victorian era was that the people kept the state. Now the state keeps the people, and we are squandering our resources in the directions indicated by such an amendment as is proposed here, many of them with regard to non-essentials. In England the Socialist party, as I pointed out the other day, did everything they could before the war to defeat the government in any plan for rearmament. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, in this amendment, do not attack sound money as a principle; but, as far as I can see, claim that the whole organization of industry is on a wrong basis and that all war production should be on a socialistic basis.

To beat Hitler, the minister says, we shall have to increase our production by greater efficiency. I believe the time is coming when we should, in this budget, cut out the non-essentials, such as roads to Alaska, uneconomic duplication in roads, legations, league votes and so forth. We are collecting too much money from the people for purposes which are of no value in the prosecution of this war.

Britain has always been able to protect Canada and has never failed us. We owe to her our peace here, free from invasion. There is a great deal of talk about Canada and the joint defence board. There are too many speeches for which Hitler cares nothing. Canada cannot be talked out of the British empire by those who want a political union, and pacifists and pan-Americans. The defence board is all board and no defence so far, from what I see of it, and if it is for this that we are taxing the people in this budget we could use the money better elsewhere, because the battle of Britain is primary and this is secondary. Canada is not going to be talked out of the British empire. Canada will have to be fought out of the British empire. If Canada could have been talked out of the British empire, it would have been talked out of it long ago by some of the theories which have been proposed in and out of this house.

Canada was not ready when this war came. For four years the government had been listening to the babble of the pacifists and isolationists, and we had a foreign policy based on complacency. The government refused to see the handwriting on the wall and did nothing. They misjudged the whole European situation.

[Mr. Church.]

I come now to the celebrated victory loan of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), and I should like to have his attention for a moment, also that of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Hoblitzell), who is at present sitting beside him. I am one of the constituents of the hon. member for Eglinton. He is a great sportsman and all that, but I think he would do well to hearken to his constituents for whom I have been speaking this afternoon. I have referred to the working classes that live there. Many of them come from various parts of Ontario, and very few of them, on account of the taxes and burdens on real estate, could subscribe to the victory loan. The brass-band method was used to raise this last loan, but the people were scared off it by all this talk about belt-tightening and heavy taxes to come, and this talk of a joint defence board, and that we should pay attention only to home defence, when the people knew well that Britain had been left to fight the battle of civilization all by herself, without any allies, and that it was to her we owed our freedom. Is it any wonder that the victory loan did not go over well, because it was ill-timed, when the people were burdened with all the taxes I have mentioned, when there is confiscation of property in many cities and even in the riding of Eglinton owing to federal and provincial authorities having refused to lighten the burden on real estate, with all these federal taxes, which amount to nearly five or six mills on the dollar in Toronto and other municipal tax rates. Many of the people of Eglinton riding and of all Toronto industrial ridings generally are losing their property because of the heavy taxation, federal and provincial, placed on municipal institutions, and this parliament and the Minister of Finance hold out no hope of relief. Yet the minister tells the real estate people to tighten their belts and continue to pay for relief works and many other duplicate forms of taxation.

The second victory loan was put on at the wrong time. It was poorly advertised. The government paid 1¼ to 1½ points too much for this loan last September, and that is going to be reflected in the country's tax rate. I have had some experience with large loans, with the $32,000,000 deal, for instance, to take over the power companies in the Niagara Falls district, also, while I was in office, for almost seven years, in connection with the $200,000,000 bond transaction re municipal utilities when we took over the Toronto Street Railway and harbour, and power and light matters. I can tell you this, that if we had adopted the methods used by the government in the first and second victory loans we would never have been able to pay the rates, or to have paid what was asked in 1913 for some of these properties. See what happens next year! Notwithstanding all the taxes in this special budget and the taxes that will be brought down in the budget next spring, the minister now announces a new victory loan for next summer, and frightens the people with a scarecrow programme, because that is all it is. He is going to scare off all the investors by all this belt-tightening talk. Belt-tightening on what? Is it to be belt-tightening of the kind urged by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, the conscription of the money that a man has left in his pocket? All these taxes, the income tax, excess profits tax, foreign exchange tax and all the rest, loading up real estate with a burden that it cannot carry, are bound to have an effect when we go to the country for another loan next summer with all this overgovernment and overtaxation.

I congratulate the leader of this party (Mr. Hanson) upon the speech he made in the house yesterday. He has never faltered in his love of Britain despite the attacks which have been made upon him for his speech at Charlottetown. What he said there was quite correct. The Ogdensburg agreement has been referred to by other speakers. It was a talk, not an agreement, all right in its way as it is of tremendous importance to have the United States with us, but that talk was exactly the same as the government's 1938-39 defence policy, of home defence, and the second cardinal principle is to protect our neutrality if the United States is attacked. There was much ado about nothing over that Ogdensburg agreement, but Canada's defence policy had the same cardinal principles. I agree with what the leader of this party said yesterday on our tariff policy and the need of protecting Canadian industry and agriculture.

This government changed the Ottawa agreements, and all hon. members know what happened. This government gave the United States almost the same advantages that we enjoy in the Ottawa agreements. We had a 6 cent preference in the British market on grain carried in British ships, and generally the Ottawa agreements were the backbone of the prosperity that we had before the war on bacon and other products. Our trade with Britain increased by 44 per cent and Britain's trade with us by 42 per cent under them. The resolutions now before us to aid Britain were a wise gesture. Britain is protecting our shores, and if the government will only consult with industry, labour and agriculture I believe that we can reduce import duties against Britain 50 per cent more on some goods in certain items and 100 per cent more in other lines. That is, if those reductions can be made without hurting labour and industry in Canada. The British fleet and the Royal Air Force are the real Monroe doctrine and not a mythical Monroe doctrine as expressed in a joint defence board, which without Britain is a myth. The Monroe doctrine for the United States and us is the British fleet and the Royal Air Force, and that is why at Christmas our country and the United States will not be invaded, for which the United States should give thanks by aiding Britain. I hope that conferences will be held by the government with industry, labour and agriculture to see if our imports from Great Britain cannot be extended all along the line in order to help out the mother country when she has so few friends, and has lost most of her export trade, if Canada is not injured in doing what I suggest.

I believe there should be an exemption granted with respect to some of the provisions relating to exchange. Why should United States citizens and British subjects have to go to all this trouble to send some poor relative a present of $25 or $50? Why should a man who wants to send $10 or $15 to a relative in the United States who may need it to pay a hospital bill have to go through all this red tape and formula of the foreign exchange control board with all its standing army of officials? From 1921 to 1930, under our pan-American tariff 600,000 of our citizens left Canada to go to the United States to look for a job, and many of them were soldiers who fought in the great war, and some of them are fighting in this war, at great hazard to their lives. Why should they be hampered up to the amount I name, by the foreign exchange control board when they had to leave this country to look for jobs betwen 1921 and 1930?

Another thing is the passport plague. Is this the Monroe doctrine in action? Also, cannot it be amended before Christmas, and what is being done? Neither country benefits from such drastic measures.

I would also repeal a lot of this Canada-United States trade agreement. It was for three years, and expires in 1940. It was to the disadvantage of Britain and Canada, and my hon. leader gave many illustrations of that yesterday. How can we compete with these people with such adverse trade treaties against agriculture and industry in Canada? They are our friends and kinsmen and it is of the greatest importance that we should try to maintain most warm and amicable relations with them forever. No one has ever suggested anything else. They are our friends to-day, and long may they continue to be. But business is business. If it is looked upon as a matter of pure business in dealing with the mother country that we should consider ourselves in trade, why should it not be business when we are dealing with another competing country? Why should we give away our market, taking work away from our own workmen and giving it to our competitors across the border, and our own markets with exchange as it is?

A few years ago I brought up the question of a national coal supply for Canada. The minister could conserve a great deal of exchange by adopting a national coal supply policy such as was urged in 1922 and 1923. The importation of bituminous coal free of duty may not be detrimental to Canada as a whole but it may be to Nova Scotia. It was the coal from the maritime provinces and Alberta and Wales that I had in view when I proposed a national, all-British coal supply policy in 1922, and it took ten years to get it recognized. If the maritime provinces suffer by the new free British duties here, they should be given increased protection by way of bonuses, subventions and subsidies so that the interests of those provinces should not be injured.

As regards cotton, woollens and fabrics of all kinds, I submit that the government ought to confer with industry and labour to see if something cannot be done to lighten the burden on the mother country, especially when she has lost her export trade. For fifteen years I have been asking this question: Why are there so many Washington-made tariffs? Largely as a result of the abrogation of the Ottawa agreement, Washington has become the economic capital of the British empire. There is a right and a wrong way of securing concessions from the United States. If they were convinced that we were losing all this money, I believe they would be the first to take steps to bring about some change in our favour with regard to tariff reform.

I am opposed to the price-fixing theory. As regards railway fares, it is all right for the railways to get out hand-bills quoting fares of $30, $35 and $40 from Halifax to Toronto, but as a matter of fact we find very low excursion rates. For instance, there was an excursion on November 28, the fare being $17.50 to Truro. Other figures to points in the maritime provinces were $16.25, $15, $17 and $18. Yet, when the poor soldiers want transportation they cannot get it and are refused a $20 return rate from Truro. We have spent millions of dollars on the Canadian National railway, and this will have to be taken into account in the budget, because the taxpayers will have to pay the deficit on our railways. Yet they cannot carry soldiers free. But although the railways can give all kinds of excursion rates every week to civilians, when it comes to railway fares for our soldiers in Ontario they quote higher, fabulous rates to maritime places.

The government has done nothing about insurance for soldiers. I have asked about four or five times what it intends to do in this regard. The minister said that the superintendent of insurance had written a letter. He did in the session of 1939 and that was the last I heard from him.

Again, the government should bring down a policy with regard to grain. The people of the industrial provinces can no longer pay such extended annual bonuses, subventions and the cost of pegging grain. They cannot afford the measures brought down almost at every session. The industrial workers and the farmers of the three central provinces and of the maritimes get little or nothing in return in bonuses and subventions. It is of the utmost importance that the grain industry should be on a good basis and receive all due assistance, but there has been a serious want of judgment in marketing the crop in war time. The government misjudged the markets. They failed to establish English reservoirs; they failed to cooperate with the department of agriculture at Washington on the question of the wider marketing of grain during the war, with the loss of ships which we are sustaining at the present time.

I am opposed to any new pan-American league of nations of north and south America because I believe it will lead to the same state of affairs as has developed in Europe, and to more strife than peace. I am opposed to any proposal to link up this country with any more such pan-American alliances over the head of this parliament, and without our knowledge, and I suggest to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that in the recess he should find out all the circumstances relating to the disaster that has overtaken seventeen of our merchant ships off the west coast of Ireland on the way to England from Canada. The cost of that disaster will be reflected in the coming budget next spring and in lost trade, lives, and goods. Will the government make an inquiry into this matter? Will the Prime Minister find out whether these neutral ports and inlets are being used against Canada and Canadian trade, and whether they shelter German submarines? Many businessmen are losing consignments on these ships and they will be without any compensation and will want a show-down. I urge, therefore, that during the recess the government take steps to ascertain what is being done to protect Canadian interests in relation to the question of neutrality in this area. I raised this question on July 10 last.

Parliament is going to have a holiday for more than two months. We are going to take a holiday until February 17, and yet the government cannot give a brief holiday to our soldiers, or even a day to the men in our air force. These men are fighting for civilization, for religion, for Christianity; and yet on the greatest of religious holidays, Christmas day, Canadian soldiers of the Royal Canadian Air Force are to be denied leave to visit their parents and friends. I suggest to the government that if they want to hurt recruiting they should continue as they are doing in this respect, in not aiding to the utmost our soldiers who risk their all for the country.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): One of the best speeches I have ever heard in this house was delivered by a former member of the Liberal party on March 15, 1938. It reads—I am quoting from pages 1376 and 1377 of Hansard of that year:

Concessions were made by reducing the tariff on their raw materials; I have no objection to that. Why were they so successful in the two years following the reduction? It is easy to see why. It was for the simple reason that prices went down and people bought automobiles more freely, and although the manufacturers had to accept a smaller profit on each automobile, their aggregate profits at the end of the year showed a large increase. After all, what is the secret of success in any line of merchandising? Is it to sell one article a day and make fifty cents profit on the sale, or is it to sell ten articles a day and make ten cents profit on each article? The more goods you sell the more profit you make and the more service you can give.

Here may I quote, with approval, the statement made by the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman): "There has never in Canadian history been a tariff reduction which did not benefit Canadian manufacturers, but they fear it." Ah! Fear! Fear! That is it. Fear, which at one time was no doubt the natural and normal reaction of man in his primitive state and was intended as a necessary shield for his self-preservation, has to-day become a heavy and burdensome armour, impeding him in his upward march towards a higher civilization. That fear which in those days was a physical, bodily fear, and quite normal, has to-day become simply an atavic, mental and moral fear—the curse of humanity, and man's greatest enemy.

If I were—I was going to say if I were king, but I will put it in a more modern way—if I were the dictator of Canada, do you know what I would do, Mr. Speaker? I would issue a decree to take effect to-morrow morning, establishing absolute free trade in this country.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Louis Robichaud, K.C., was a member for Kent, one of the New Brunswick constituencies.

I may surprise some hon. members since I am not resident of the west or a farmer, when I proclaim myself a one-hundred per cent unadulterated free trader. But someone will say: "If you do that, you will flood the country with foreign goods." I say then, and in the spirit in which the apostle of the gentiles uttered his famous exclamation, "O felix culpa". Happy flood, blessed flood! The flood would continue only so long as we were able to pay for the goods, and so long as we were able to pay for them we would be prosperous indeed.

That is worthy of Cobden in his best moments. As the first sentence of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to use four Latin words: suaviter in modo, fortiter in re—"mild in expression, strong in belief."

I desire to make two points, to show what has been the tariff under the Bennett administration from 1930 to 1935 and under Mr. Dunning from 1935 to 1939. In the first place we must not forget that trade is the lifeblood of the country. That is very well understood in England, where as their motto they have these three words, "Business as usual." They mean business as usual in peace time as well as in time of war. Mr. Bennett came to power in July, 1930, and a special session was called in September of that year, at which he advanced the idea that by raising the tariff he would decrease the number of unemployed in the country. What astounded me was the fact that his proposals met with a sort of indifference on the part of our party. I hold in my hand an extract from an article by Mr. Benoit, who later became president of the press gallery, which appeared in Le Devoir on September 10. The translation is as follows:

The address in reply to the speech from the throne has been voted rather unanimously. There was only one dissident voice, that of the member for Témiscouata, Jean-François Pouliot.

According to sessional paper No. 290C, reference No. 250, tabled by Mr. Cahan on June 5, 1935, at that special session 152 items of the customs tariff were increased, while 11 were decreased. It is interesting to see how Mr. Bennett dealt with the tariff. At that time he was assuming the duties of Minister of Finance and Minister of Labour in the house, which is why I told him it was the first time in the history of this country that the same minister represented capital and labour. The total number of tariff items, as of August 1, 1930, was 1,100; as of June 5, 1935, it was 1,280. The items increased were as follows:

	By parliament	By order in council
1931.....	128	2
1932.....	150	1
1933.....	8	nil
1934.....	18	1
1935.....	13	nil
The decreases were as follows:
1931.....	55	7
1932.....	144	7
1933.....	42	6
1934.....	57	7
1935.....	57	1

The next question I asked was how many customs tariff items had been left untouched since August 1, 1930, and still in force. The answer was 643. In other words about half the tariff items had been changed by Mr. Bennett during the five years he was in power. Then I asked whether any of the customs tariff items had been changed more than once, either by parliament or by orders in council, since August 1, 1930. The reply was yes in both cases, and the numbers: by parliament, 101; by order in council, 1. There, Mr. Speaker, you see the disorder that was created in Canadian business by tariff changes. Mr. Bennett not only desired to change an item once; he changed some items several times. His first idea was that Canada could be self-sufficient; he went to London in 1930 and made such a good impression on the British government that Mr. Thomas called him a humbug. Then he returned, and realized that it would be quite difficult for Canada to become self-sufficient. Therefore he raised the tariff, according to the figures I have just quoted.

Later, in 1931, Mr. Bennett thought Canada should stand alone and be absolutely independent; the tariff was raised and raised again. Then in 1932 he saw that this policy was impracticable. He tried to bring in a new sort of tariff, just for the British empire, and the tariff items were changed accordingly. We had the Ottawa agreements; and then in 1933 he realized that this was not enough. He began to ask for world trade, and all countries were invited to the London conference, which met with complete failure. The member for Témiscouata is reported at page 1421 of Hansard as having spoken on November 22, 1932, as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege in connection with an absurd newspaper item published on the front page of l'Action Catholique of Thursday, November 17, 1932. The heading reads as follows: "J. F. Pouliot endorses the tariff changes—statement made by the hon. member for Témiscouata, yesterday, in the House of Commons." What has actually happened is that this newspaper attributes to me a speech delivered by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). You are, sir,—

I was then addressing the Speaker.

> —better aware than anyone that I have never lost an opportunity to strenuously and energetically protest against these evil omen agreements.

I could not vote against them because I was paired with the late Herb Lennox; we had a gentleman's agreement; nevertheless I expressed my disagreement with that sort of tariff.

The Ottawa agreements worked badly. They were passed in midsummer, and on December 15, 1932, I read this article in the Montreal Gazette:

> Return to Barter in International Trade Suggested.
> Clearing houses to provide exchange machinery, idea of London chamber. Scheme studied here. "Better to have some trade than none at all pending complete reform of monetary system."

Then, on January 25, 1933, we find the following front-page news item in the Montreal Gazette:

> Leadership being tested, Borden says. Former premier urges freer world trade. Speaks in Toronto. British empire leads way with conference pacts, he declares.

Those Ottawa agreements did not work out successfully. They were an impediment to world trade. In fact, they were the reason for the failure of the world economic conference of 1933. After that time the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) became Minister of Trade and Commerce. I had an opportunity to write him a letter setting out my views respecting the management and the policy of his department. I sent a copy of that letter to the late Hon. Norman Rogers, and since the reply from Mr. Rogers is not personal I intend at this time to read it. It is dated at Queen's university, Kingston, March 8, 1935, and is in the following terms:

> Jean-François Pouliot, Esq., M.P.,
> House of Commons,
> Ottawa, Ont.
> Mon cher ami:—
> I want to thank you for your kindness in sending me a copy of the return made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce to your inquiry regarding British trade in relation to world trade during successive years since September 1, 1929. Your own letter to Mr. Hanson in reference to this return is most illuminating. I have had a suspicion that the recent statistical barrage on the Ottawa agreements contained some misleading figures. In fact, it seems to be possible to support quite different propositions on the basis of figures supplied by the Department of Trade and Commerce and the bureau of statistics. I take it that Mr. Hanson has not made a correction of his statement in accordance with the suggestion contained in your letter. No doubt he will do so in due course, if you exhibit the same perseverance as you did in relation to the station at Rivière du Loup.
> Thank you also for your kind note of congratulation and good wishes.
>
> Yours sincerely,
> Norman McL. Rogers.

In 1935 the Bennett government was defeated at the polls. After that time we were faced with the necessity of solving a tariff problem, if we were to improve our trade throughout the world. The Dunning budget of 1930 did not receive a fair deal, and during the election campaign was represented in only some of its aspects. Since the people did not have an opportunity to consider it from all angles, I thought it proper to suggest that the Ottawa agreements should be replaced by the Dunning budget, so that it might be given a fair trial.

Turning to page 920 of Hansard for March 10, 1936, I find the following:

United Kingdom Trade Agreement.

Proposed Revocation of Legislation Instituting Agreement.

Mr. Jean-François Pouliot (Témiscouata) moved:

"That in the opinion of this house, chapter 2 of 23-24 George V (1933) should be repealed;

That the trade agreement entered into between representatives of His Majesty's government in Canada and of His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom, copy of which is set forth in the schedule of the above mentioned act, should be revoked;

And that chapter 13 of 20-21 George V (1930), an act to amend the customs tariff, should be substituted thereto."

Hon. Charles A. Dunning (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, much as I appreciate the compliment contained in the last paragraph of the motion, I think I must call your attention to the fact that this resolution is entirely out of order.

Mr. Pouliot: Then a pious wish is out of order.

Mr. Speaker: I will reserve my judgment until another day.

Motion stands.

On motion of Mr. Dunning the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

If Mr. Dunning was sincere when he introduced his budget of 1930, I was giving him the opportunity to give it a fair trial, and to see what it would produce. The idea behind that budget was sound and good. At that time England was importing wheat from the Argentine, for reasons well known to my western friends, and there was a decrease in our trade with England only in respect of wheat. With regard to all other commodities the trading situation was good. Of course the discussion developed into a debate respecting butter, and all the rest was forgotten. The people became crazy, and thought that R. B. Bennett was the saviour of the land.

It was interesting to note, sir, that Mr. Dunning was objecting to my motion. I wanted to see the extent of his sincerity in bringing in the budget of 1930. In my humble view it was a very good budget; but he made the objection to which I have referred, and did not give me an opportunity to discuss the whole matter on a point of order. The funny part of it is that he himself objected to it.

Then, on April 6, 1936, I addressed Mr. Speaker as follows, as reported at page 1815 of Hansard for that year:

Mr. Speaker, I respectfully draw your attention to Hansard of March 9, page 920. Would you be kind enough to give your ruling on the point of order raised by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) on that resolution?

As I stated earlier, he never understood the rules of the house—I do not mean Mr. Speaker; I was referring to Mr. Dunning—and he was objecting to my point of order, stating that it was not well taken. I do not know why a decision was not rendered.

On April 27 I wrote the Clerk of the House, Doctor Beauchesne, asking him to get in touch with Mr. Speaker, so that a decision might be given. His answer to me was that it would be given later on. I have in my hand a letter dated April 28, 1936, asking Doctor Beauchesne if Mr. Speaker would give his decision after the roar of the gun—prorogation. No decision was given on the motion.

What happened in 1937 was most strange. I wanted to show my good-will—I wanted to show what my chief calls good-will and cooperation. I said I had not the time to read the tariffs, and to make comparisons between the tariff of 1937 and that of 1932. I believe the tariff of 1937, as approved by the party to which I belong, was all right. But I have before me what Mr. Bennett had to say, as reported at page 1398 of Hansard for March 7, 1937. He gave the names of those members who had voted against the second and third readings of the Ottawa agreements, and then continued as follows:

Those were the immortal forty-two. They voted against the United Kingdom agreement, an agreement which now in terms they ask this house to adopt. In order that there may be no question on that point I propose to put the deadly parallel upon Hansard; I propose to compare the paragraphs from the agreement of 1932 and the paragraphs from the agreement of to-day, to show that they are the same; the same in principle and almost identical in words. But in order to endeavour to save their faces they make some change in the relation of the words one to the other, though the principles have not changed and cannot change. I doubt whether, in the long history of our institutions, we have ever seen the spectacle of a government asking within the short period of less than five years the acquiescence and approval of members of the house to a document that was in terms similar in every principle to a document they had voted against just a few years before.

I am rather fearful of the results of these tariff changes because of the words that were uttered yesterday by the leader of the opposition. As reported on page 647 of Hansard, he had this to say about the foreign exchange control board:

It is with some degree of pride that I call attention to the fact that under a government which was not supposed to be strongly characterized by foresight or to have much knowledge of business the foundation was laid for the functioning of this important body. It is a matter to which I think I should refer, especially since the man who conceived and promulgated the idea has been so often traduced, as he has been even during the present session, by certain hon. gentlemen in this house. I am sure the Minister of Finance would be the last to deny that had it not been for the vision of that man and his knowledge of finance and monetary problems, we should not have been so well equipped as we are to-day to deal with what to me is an abstruse and technical matter.

I will admit that the former leader of the Conservative party had something like vision, but it was more than that, he had visions. We may differ sometimes, but we are still patriotic. Our duty is not to follow blindly the lead of the government in this matter, our duty is to warn the government against the danger of certain tariff policies in order that the people of Canada may not suffer either in the near future or later on. No one should be depressed at the present time; we should all have courage; we should have what Mr. Bennett called "fortitude," during this present war.

We should endeavour to pass legislation which will not prove a handicap to Canadian business during the war and afterwards. Tariff changes are very delicate matters. It would be easy for one of these clever boys who act as pages here to go through the Canadian tariff with a blue pencil and strike out certain items and change others, and then present them as a budget. We should not forget that many people are employed by the importers of Canada. If we destroy the import trade, these importers will be put completely out of business. If the mission of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) to south America is a wise move, as I think it is, then we should not isolate ourselves with high tariffs. Not only did I fight this type of legislation when Mr. Bennett was leading the government, I tried to do what I could to prevent it from being put into force when our own party was in power.

I was much concerned over the fact that those who had been the advisers of Mr. Bennett were also acting as advisers to the then Minister of Finance. They were considered as experts and their word was powerful. But I did something else. I was concerned over the financial disaster which had been brought about by the brain trust in the United States, and therefore the member for Témiscouata moved to introduce a bill to repeal the act which had established an economic council. The first reading of this bill was on February 24, 1936, at which time I said, as reported on page 437 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, it is very easy to explain the purpose of this bill. It is to put the axe of parliamentary control to a dry branch of the dead tree of so-called social legislation.
> [Mr. Pouliot.]

I had quite strong support in introducing that bill. A few days later, when the second reading was up on February 27, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said, as reported at page 578 of Hansard:

> Mr. Mackenzie King: The measure comes under the Prime Minister. The act provides for the appointment of an economic council to advise the Prime Minister. I am quite satisfied with my own council; I do not think I need an economic council to tell the present government what is necessary in the way of legislation. The government at all times is in a position to command the services of any members of the public service. It seems to me wholly superfluous to have on the statute book a law which obligates the government to bring together a number of the members of the public service and constitute them into an advisory council, when members of the public service have enough to do in their own departments if they are doing their work properly.

That was very well said.

> It is prodigal to add to public expenditures to the extent necessitated by this act. I think the government made its attitude toward the legislation clear when we did not place in the estimates an appropriation for the legislation, and I do not think it is necessary for us to say anything more about it. It is superfluous legislation, and our attitude towards it when the late government introduced the measure was that it was superfluous. However, being a part of the new deal which was being tried out it was allowed to pass. The public has since expressed its view with respect to much of the late government's legislation and made clear its attitude towards some of these measures. The present government does not feel it in the public interest to continue the legislation.
> Section agreed to.
> Bill reported.
> Mr. Pouliot moved the third reading of the bill.
> Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

The bill was passed in less than five minutes. My idea in sponsoring that legislation was to get rid of Bennett's brain trust. That has been a curse to the country since it was established. I have nothing against these fellows. The government may pay them any amount they wish in the way of salaries provided these men do not give any advice. It would pay the country to pay Mr. Graham Towers $100,000 a year provided he stayed home and did not get in touch with the government. It would pay the country to pay the same salary to Mr. Clark, the deputy minister of finance—

Mr. ILSLEY: I listened to similar remarks the other day and did not say anything, but I think I ought to make it clear to the house that I have the utmost confidence in both Mr. Towers and Mr. Clark. I appeal to my hon. friend to desist from these personal attacks on civil servants who are recognized as being eminent. These men are giving faithful service and I do not think they should be attacked in this way in the House of Commons.

Mr. POULIOT: I have great personal regard for the minister, but I ask him to read one letter which is published in Hansard at the end of the speech which I made in 1939 on the mortgage bank legislation. When that matter was before the house I quoted a letter which I had written to the Prime Minister. This was acknowledged by him but never answered. My ideas as to ministerial responsibility are contained in that letter. If we cannot offer a word of criticism of those who receive high salaries, then it is no use our rising in this house and the country is doomed to ruin and complete failure. Criticism is necessary, it shows that members of parliament are watchful of the expenditure of public money and want to know what is going on. I do not intend to repeat what I have written already; it is all there. I have not changed my view, and nobody has asked me to change my view, nor has anybody contradicted what I said then.

Mr. SPEAKER: The only thing I would point out to the hon. member is that when an attack is made on a civil servant, the civil servant is in no position to defend himself. He cannot get up on a public platform or rise here as a member of parliament does to defend himself, and for that reason an attack on civil servants should certainly be accompanied by specific charges respecting particular cases, and not simply be a general charge against civil service administration. Such does not add to the strength of an argument, and it is not conducive to the good of the civil service to make such attacks. I would ask the hon. member to desist.

Mr. POULIOT: I shall not insist, Mr. Speaker, and I shall say nothing of anybody in particular. It has been said that these people are not in the house, and that is true, and for a very good reason. They receive emoluments from the crown, and therefore they are barred from sitting as members of parliament. But on the other hand they are represented in the house by the minister, and the place for me to inform the minister is the House of Commons. If the minister is acting on their advice, and action is taken in consequence which I cannot support, it is the duty of the minister to defend the civil servants concerned in the house.

But I do not see why members of parliament cannot express their views on civil servants. We vote their salaries and have a perfect right to express what we think of them. I regret to differ from your opinion on this point, Mr. Speaker, although I regard your opinion highly and shall abide by it. But if it is impossible for a member of parliament to inform the minister of what is going on which he sincerely believes should not go on, what is the use of our sitting here?

Mr. ILSLEY: Would the hon. gentleman permit me? I think it is legitimate for a member of parliament to attack the quality of the advice or of the service that a civil servant gives a minister, if the member is specific in his complaints. I also think it is legitimate for him to attack the minister for what he does on that advice. That is the proper point of attack. That is one of the main things ministers are for. But what I object to is a general attack of a very extreme type on civil servants, and then to have it repeated. The other day the hon. gentleman made his position quite clear. I did not know whether I should take exception to his remarks at that time or not, but I would ask him now if he does not think he should desist from repetition of such a general attack, simply personal attack, as distinguished from an attack on anything that civil servants may have done.

Mr. POULIOT: When I wanted to bring up what they had done I was stopped by Mr. Dunning and by the Prime Minister. Afterwards I answered the Prime Minister and I had an acknowledgment from him, and I have put the letter on Hansard. What strikes me is that the support of these people comes from Conservative members all the time, and these people continue to give Conservative advice to the government. That is against my personal conviction. I do not agree with that advice. I do not say that there is graft but I do say that their advice is all wrong, and if I have not the right to speak in this house when a civil servant or an official, whoever he may be, is all wrong, I do not see what is the use of sitting in this house. I have no grudge against these civil servants. I suggest that they be paid more provided we get rid of them. But I shall not insist, Mr. Speaker. I simply want to show that I am being logical with myself.

I opposed the Bennett policy at the request of the party and because I believed it unsound, and afterwards I opposed the Dunning policy. I voted for one of Mr. Dunning's treaties but I could not vote for some of his other treaties, and I felt miserable because I knew that it was the same policy that was being carried out. I could not change the policy so I tried to change the people who were advising that policy. I was successful in having my bill adopted by the house, and it passed the senate and became the law of the land. It is chapter 5 of the statutes of 1936. Notwithstanding that, Ottawa is filled to-day with boards, experts and brain trusters to a number that is incredible. As one brain trust was not good in 1936, I do not see how scores and scores of brain trusts can be good now. I fear for the future of this country if all these people are giving advice to the government. The country is going to the dogs on their advice, and I shall not let that happen if in my humble capacity I can do anything to save our country.

Mr. PERCY C. BLACK (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, all the people of Canada are interested in the resolutions submitted to this house by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). Nova Scotia has a particular interest in one item, namely, the admission into Canada from Great Britain of bituminous coal duty free. If this means anything, it must mean that a large additional import of coal and other commodities is to be made. Otherwise there is no necessity for the resolutions.

I understand that in recent weeks there has been imported from Great Britain 2,000,000 tons of bituminous coal, most of which is now in storage for the Montreal-St. Lawrence market. If the change in the duty is to have the effect it is supposed to have and there is to be a large additional importation of bituminous coal, it means the displacement of Nova Scotia coal in the markets that have been recognized as belonging to Nova Scotia; that is, the maritime provinces, Quebec, and eastern Ontario as far west as is necessary to absorb sufficient coal to take up the production of Nova Scotia.

Mr. MacNICOL: As far west as Toronto.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): As far west as Toronto or even farther.

I am not opposed to these resolutions. I am heartily in favour of them. I agree with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) that they have not gone far enough. If Great Britain is to be put in a position to pay, at least in part, for her enormous importations, she must be allowed to export to this country and to the United States—a privilege she was denied by the United States in making payments on the loans in the last war.

If taking off the duty on bituminous coal means anything, it means that a large quantity of bituminous coal will come into the Canadian markets to which I have referred, to the disadvantage of Nova Scotia. I should like it to be understood that if that is to be done—and I am not going to oppose it—then subventions and assistance should be extended so that Nova Scotia coal can be marketed to points farther west in Ontario in order that the total output of Nova Scotia coal may be absorbed in Canada. That can be done by paying additional subventions, and it would have the effect, not of interfering with the importation of British coal but of keeping out coal from the United States, and in that way helping our position as regards United States exchange.

We in Nova Scotia treasure very highly the subventions and other assistance which have been given to coal mining during the last ten years. The importance of that assistance has been recognized, I believe, by all the people of Canada. It was put into effect when the coal trade of Nova Scotia was at the most difficult period in its existence. In 1930, 372,000 tons of Nova Scotia coal were assisted by subvention. In 1939 that amount was increased to 2,381,995 tons; in the ten months of the present fiscal year the total quantity so assisted is 1,828,000 tons. It is necessary that this assistance be rendered. Costs of production are higher than for imported coal; the men are entitled to a fair wage; and the people of Nova Scotia are entitled to this market, the only one open to them, that they may have fair treatment within confederation, and to some extent obtain the means whereby they can pay for their enormous purchases of commodities of many kinds from central Canada. Many of these commodities are mass-produced, and there is no possibility of manufacturing them in outlying portions of Canada.

In 1939 Canada imported 9,907,000 tons of bituminous coal, 3,977,805 tons of anthracite coal, and—

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask the speaker if the bituminous coal was largely imported from the United States, or was a portion imported from Great Britain?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I have not those figures, but I believe that in 1939 the importations were almost entirely from the United States. In addition, we imported 435,871 tons of coke. In the ten months of this fiscal year to October 31 Canada imported 11,898,453 tons of bituminous coal, 3,369,183 tons of anthracite coal, and 742,132 tons of coke. Therefore there is still a large importation from the United States of fuel a part of which, at least, can very well be assigned to Nova Scotia, in order that the coal mines of that province may have a market for all that they are able to produce.

When the subventions were extended in 1931, it was said that we would market an additional million tons of Nova Scotia coal. Under those subventions, the increase from 1930 to 1934 of coal marketed in central Canada amounted to 1,375,975 tons. For last year, 1939, this has increased to 2,381,995 tons. It is the expectation of the people of Nova Scotia that it will be further increased, and that we shall have in central Canada a market for three million tons or more.

In the fuel policy laid down for Canada at that time, it was the view that Canadian-produced coal was necessary in our national economy. It is necessary at the present time, and how much more necessary it would be if anything should occur—we are all thankful it has not occurred, and do not believe that it ever will—whereby we were not able to get importations from the United States. Such a contingency makes it necessary that markets be found within Canada for the coal production of Nova Scotia and western Canada.

We in Nova Scotia are thankful for the assistance which has been given our coal industry. I thank the present government for their assistance in carrying out the policy which was put into effect in 1930-31. I thank the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), because I have found that he has been sympathetic; also, the Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty). I thank the people of Ontario and Quebec and the industries established there for their sympathy towards Nova Scotia and their assistance in the marketing of this coal.

Mr. ILSLEY: Pardon me, was not 1928 the first year of this coal policy?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): It was put into effect about 1928 as an experiment, but the difficulty at that time was that no coal of any consequence was moved. The principle may have been established at that time, but the subventions were not sufficient to move any appreciable quantity of coal and provide an output which would keep the mines of Nova Scotia operating.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is correct.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): There are many other organizations which should have a word of special appreciation for their consideration to Nova Scotia; among them are the Toronto board of education and many institutions, individuals and industries.

As part of that policy the duty on bituminous coal was increased 50 per cent, to seventy-five cents a ton; a duty on anthracite coal of fifty cents a ton was put into effect, where there was no duty before; and a duty of $1 a ton was placed upon coke, thereby encouraging the production of coke in Canada, and a bonus of $1 a ton paid on Canadian coal used for coke. But these subventions have been entirely paid for through the increased revenues accruing from the additional duties placed upon imported coal. For the last ten years the additional revenues have totalled $24,352,000. The total subventions paid to eastern and western Canada in the same period amounted to $21,333,000, so that a surplus of $3,000,000 accrued to the treasury of Canada over this period by virtue of this fuel policy. Furthermore, if it had not been put into effect, many of the coal mines of Nova Scotia could not have continued to operate. At that time they were in a desperate plight; in fact, the government of Nova Scotia had to plead with the banks that credit might be extended to tide this industry over that very, very difficult period.

I would mention particularly one man from central Canada who was most helpful to us in Nova Scotia at that time. I refer to the Hon. Wesley Gordon, then Minister of Mines and Labour, who cooperated with us on every occasion and assisted in increasing the duties and subventions. It meant tens of thousands of dollars in additional costs to the consumers of coal used in his constituency. On top of the other difficulties, he said it might result in such intense criticism of himself that he might never come back to the federal parliament. "But," he said, "I believe you are entitled to it and I am going to stand by you and put it into effect." He did, and I am grateful to Wesley Gordon and the Bennett government for what they did in those hard years in Canada and particularly in Nova Scotia from 1930 to 1933.

There is one other man whose name I would mention. He was really the author of the Canadian fuel-steel policy—the Hon. Gordon S. Harrington, deputy minister of national defence overseas in the last war, premier of Nova Scotia, and first chairman of the unemployment insurance board. He gave splendid service to the people of Nova Scotia and Canada in connection with coal and other matters. He regarded his duty to the public so highly that he refused a judgeship in that province—and there are very few men who have sat in this house who have refused such positions of great honour and trust in order to continue to serve in public life. I was sorry indeed that he was not given fuller justice last year when he was referred to by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), but we in Nova Scotia are under a great obligation to Colonel Harrington. He is out of politics now, but his work with regard to the fuel policy will be a lasting credit to him.

I have not taken up much of the time of the house during this session because I felt that I should render every possible assistance to the government and that in so doing I would be serving my electors. I have therefore withheld criticism, but that does not mean that there is not a great deal of discontent in Nova Scotia with regard to the administration and more especially from the point of view of the war. I have asked the people of Cumberland and Amherst to have patience and to do their part. Nova Scotia is nearest to the seat of the war and perhaps there is more uneasiness there than in any other part of Canada.

There has been much delay in equipping our soldiers. Last week-end I was motoring from Amherst to Oxford and Pugwash and I overtook a soldier. He was two hundred yards ahead of me when he beckoned me to stop. He wanted to get home to his family in Oxford. The temperature was almost zero; there were six inches of snow, and he had no overcoat. I asked him where his overcoat was and he said that none had been issued to him. I suggested that he must be an exception and he assured me that there were two hundred men in the North Nova Scotia Highlanders who had not yet been given greatcoats. It is hard to understand that. If the figures the minister gave in his statement to the house are correct, 411,000 greatcoats had been ordered and 241,349 had been issued. It seems strange, therefore, that there should be a lack of clothing for these men. It is said that the trainees are given their equipment more expeditiously and are given better equipment than the men who have enlisted for active service, the argument being that it will make a good impression at their camps and when they go home they will say how well they have been treated. At any rate, there have been complaints in Nova Scotia, in Cumberland, from the early days of the war until last Saturday, that the men had not been issued proper clothing.

Mr. POTTIER: Was that a member of the active service force or the non-permanent active militia?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would that make any difference?

Mr. POTTIER: In the one case they furnish and in the other the government does.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I understood he was a member of the North Nova Scotia Highlanders, active service. I am not going to make any charges, but the reports that have been coming to me should receive consideration. I am given to understand that there has been extravagance in many of the expenditures, and this is having a bad effect on the morale of the people who are asked to contribute in the form of war savings stamps, and subscribe to war loans. Many complaints have come to me with respect to conditions in the camp at Debert. It would appear that there has been lack of sanitation, lack of water, lack of the ordinary conveniences and necessary supplies that make for contentment at a camp. There are also serious reports regarding the way the work at Debert was started and is being carried on. I wish to quote from a report by Mr. H. R. MacMillan, timber controller for Canada. In a public statement appearing in the magazine Timber I find the following:

> The timber controller explained that it would have been impossible to have put this job over under ordinary government methods of procedure. As a matter of fact he had bought the lumber without authority and without any money being voted. In fact the government didn't know of the transactions until they were completed. It was necessary to exercise initiative in the emergency arising. The timber controller pointed out that there is lots of authority in Ottawa but the trouble is there are not enough people willing to exercise it.
> In explaining some of the difficulties under which timber control operated, Mr. MacMillan stated that no bills of material had been taken off for millwork. The plans for the Debert job were received the day the government announced construction would begin, and the statement was made that the camp would be organized in six weeks' time. In this emergency timber control had bought all the material without tenders, a procedure entirely contrary to the government system of doing business.

It is a serious matter to Canada that the Debert construction programme should not have been under way before August 15, according to this report.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have asked my people to have patience, and there has been very little criticism. The feeling, however, has been fairly definite and fairly widespread that everything possible has not been done and that fair consideration has not been given the people of Nova Scotia and the maritime provinces generally. I do not wish to be unduly critical, but I do not see how I can remain silent with respect to these matters that are of so much concern to the people whom I represent.

In his statement a few days ago the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) included a table showing the purchases by his department up to September 30, 1940. Total purchases in Canada amounted to $383,941,515. Of this total only $7,445,561 was spent in Nova Scotia, or less than two per cent. With many of our industries idle or working on part time this cannot help but create discontent. About November 20 I received a circular, as did all other hon. members, I presume, from the office of the director of public information, indicating that the Department of Munitions and Supply had placed orders for 120 sets of harness and twenty portable sawmills capable of sawing 20,000 feet of timber a day, for use by the forestry corps overseas. In my constituency we have a prominent harness factory, and at Oxford we have a manufacturer of portable sawmills. I assumed that these firms had been given an opportunity to tender for these materials, and if that had been so, I would have had no complaint. I communicated with them, and set out the information contained in this circular. I had a reply from A. E. Wry-Standard, Limited, one of the larger harness manufacturers, who market their products over Canada, stating that they had never had even an inquiry, that they did not know the material had been required and therefore could not submit their prices. I wrote the Oxford Foundry and Machine Company, Limited, at Oxford, Nova Scotia, and from that company I received this telegram:

> Appreciate yours of 21st instant. No inquiry or tender received for portion of twenty sawmills required for forestry corps for operation in Great Britain. We feel this discrimination against maritime province industries. Thanks for your very fine cooperation.

These two firms are listed in the Canadian Trade Index, which is put out by the Canadian Manufacturers Association and accepted all over Canada as authoritative. Under "harness" is listed A. E. Wry-Standard, Limited, one of twenty-five firms under this heading; under "sawmills, portable", is listed Oxford Foundry and Machine Company, Limited, together with fifteen other firms. The Oxford company makes a specialty of these sawmills, supplying practically the entire requirements of the maritime provinces and even shipping some of their mills to the United States. They have patented many devices or appliances in connection with their sawmills and have acquired the reputation of being one of the best manufacturers of sawmills in Canada. How can the people of Cumberland or of eastern Canada be content when firms such as these are not given even an opportunity to quote? If they had submitted their specifications and figures; if the specifications were not suitable or the prices were too high, I would have no complaints; but I do remonstrate when firms such as these—and they are only two of many—are not even given an opportunity to tender.

Many new industries are being established in Canada; I understand that many millions of dollars are being expended for this purpose. None of these industries is being established in the maritime provinces. There is also the Christie Trunk and Bag company, of Amherst. There was some publicity given to certain requirements in their line, but they were not given a chance to figure either. I do not wish to be too critical, I waited upon Colonel W. A. Harrison, an executive of the Department of Munitions and Supply early last summer, and he gave me the assurance that he would do what he could to see that some recognition was given the people of the maritime provinces. I know that in some instances that has been done, but in many others it has not.

We have other industries as well, such as the rolling mills at Amherst. Since I came to Ottawa I have received representations to the effect that the workmen there are anxious to do their part but that the mill is about to close down because it has no orders. There are also the salt mines at Malagash; with the need for large chemical plants in Canada in connection with our war undertaking, some special consideration might be given them and the industries of eastern Canada, such as those I have mentioned.

Protection was given to our industries back in 1878; in some instances bonuses were given in order that industries might be built up for peace-time service and be ready in case of an emergency such as we have at the present time. Never in the history of Canada, however, have grants been made to industries to the extent practised since the beginning of this war, and particularly in recent months. It is time some consideration is given to the outlying portions of Canada that have sacrificed a great deal in the interests of victory. How can we expect to have a united war effort in all Canada if consideration is not extended to those outlying parts of the country? Not only should industries be established for war purposes; they should be given assistance in order that they might have an opportunty of continuing operations in peace time. Then there would be better distribution of industry throughout Canada, but so far as I know that has not been done in connection with expenditures in the maritimes by this government.

Another question which I am sorry I have to bring up is in connection with the airport in Amherst. I do not wish to be critical, but in justice to the people whom I represent here I must make a statement. Aeroplanes have been assembled at Amherst. How do I know? Well, a report was made to parliament on May 21, 1940, covering the work being done in Canada, and in that report I find this paragraph:

> Amherst:
> The assembly of Anson wings and aircraft.
> The overhaul of Anson aircraft.

Amherst was asked to provide the land for a runway first, then for a standard port and then for a super-standard port, and Amherst complied with every request. The town was then asked to go fifty-fifty on the cost of grading the land. The money could not be provided until the expenditure was submitted to the ratepayers, who approved more than one hundred in favour to every one who voted against it. The people of Amherst have a patriotic interest in this, and they have, too, a money interest. The Right Hon. Winston Churchill, Prime Minister of England, expressed the views of the English people when he said that never in history did so many people owe so much to so few. Our people want to be of assistance, and they want to have the undertakings implemented.

I do not blame the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power). If I may judge from my contact with him, I would say that I am sure he wishes to get results. I do not blame Mr. Ralph Bell, who is in charge of aeroplane construction; knowing him as I do, I believe he, too, desires to get results. I did blame the Canadian Car and Foundry Company. I visited their plant at Montreal, and had a chance to see what they were doing. I doubt whether there is another firm in Canada that is doing better war work than this company. The people of Amherst are not at fault; so why have we not results? Someone is to blame. I am going to leave the matter there.

I am sorry the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) is not at present in his seat. I understand he is overseas conferring with the British authorities. May I pay my respects to him, and tell him that the people of Amherst, of Cumberland, in fact the people of not only Nova Scotia but of all Canada, have confidence in him and are proud of what he is doing. At the time of the last war he did his work well, and I am satisfied he will do it to the limit of his ability in the present war.

I am pleased, too, to join with other hon. members in welcoming to the house my associate from Nova Scotia, the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald). He is here only because duty has called him. Associated with me in this chamber are five of us who had experience together in the provincial legislature of Nova Scotia. That legislature has sent good men to this chamber and to the public life of Canada. From that legislature came Sir Charles Tupper, Sir John Thompson, at one time Prime Minister of Canada; the Hon. W. S. Fielding, the Hon. A. K. Maclean, and many others I could mention.

The Minister of National Defence for Naval Services has said in the house that he is here to speak for those men who go down to the sea in ships and do business in great waters. He also has the traditions of the British navy to follow, the traditions of Drake, Nelson, Beatty and Churchill. Churchill with whom to some extent he will no doubt be associated, was First Lord of the Admiralty soon after the declaration of war. It was he who sent ships of the British navy to Norway, irrespective of international law. We remember the greeting they got there, "The navy is here!" That is the watchword all over the world—in South America, in Iceland, on the stormy Atlantic—everywhere: "The British navy is here!"

Therefore my hon. friend, the Minister of National Defence for Naval Affairs has a great duty to perform and a great tradition to follow. He has to follow and be worthy of Mr. Churchill, that man of destiny, that man who, prior to 1939, was warning the British people, and who later became First Lord of the Admiralty. He was First Lord of the Admiralty at the beginning of the first great war, in 1914; with prescience, he felt that that first great war was coming, and kept the British Navy at sea so that it might be ready, its guns manned for action. This is the same Mr. Winston Churchill who was First Lord of the Admiralty back in 1911, 1912 and 1913, at a time when the then Prime Minister of Canada, Sir Robert Borden, wanted to do something to show the duty of this country to Great Britain and other parts of the empire.

Away back in those years Sir Robert Borden conferred with Mr. Winston Churchill, and the policy was then laid down whereby three dreadnoughts were to be built, the finest that science could devise or money could buy. It was Sir Robert Borden who in those years also laid down the policy that cruisers or destroyers would be built in Canada—a policy practically the same as that announced a few days ago in this chamber by the minister.

This statement was made either by Sir Robert Borden or by the present Minister of National Defence for Naval Services. Either of them could have said it:

> I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian people wish indefinitely to continue a policy which demands of Great Britain the sole responsibility of guarding our trade routes, or which on the other hand takes shelter behind the existence on this continent of a great and friendly power. I believe that Canadian pride, Canadian dignity, Canadian consciousness of present greatness, Canadian hope for increased stature among the nations of the world all demand that we should assume our proper share of the burden of naval service hitherto borne so largely by the motherland.

Those were not the words of Sir Robert Borden; they were the words of the present Minister of National Defence for Naval Services. He was born thirty years too late, or he would have been standing side by side and shoulder to shoulder with Sir Robert Borden thirty years ago. Had that policy been carried out then, had we been united within the empire in Canada, in south Africa and in Ireland, there are many people who believe that that first great war would not have taken place—and perhaps we would not have the present one.

The minister announced in the house that the government was going to establish a naval college as well as build destroyers in Canada. I am sure those statements would not have been made by the minister unless they were to be carried out. I am sure that so far as the minister and the government are concerned, they have no political considerations with regard to matters of this kind. It is my view that the naval college should be located on the Atlantic coast. It was there in 1917, but was destroyed at that time by the great Halifax explosion. It should not be placed adjacent to balmy waters, but should be placed facing the north Atlantic, and in association with the fishermen of Nova Scotia, the Magdalen islands and of Newfoundland. Those men go down to the sea in ships, as the minister has described. There should be close contact with the British navy, with the stormy waters of the Atlantic and with the British people, and an understanding and friendly hand extended to the United States who are so anxious to cooperate with us with regard to naval matters.

I must hurry along to the discussion of a few more subjects with which I should like to deal. The largest industry in Nova Scotia is that of farming, but the farmers of that province are not prosperous. They receive low prices, and are faced with increasing costs. They have to compete with mass production, and the difficulties of processing and selling. They have made one request through their minister of agriculture in the local legislature, the Hon. John A. McDonald, and through their agricultural societies. That request is that they receive mill feeds at reduced freight rates, so that they might be placed on the same basis as were the people in Europe to whom those feeds were formerly exported.

The granaries of the west are overflowing. Our friends from the prairie provinces are anxious to dispose of their product, while the farmer of the maritime provinces wants those products. The minister and other representatives have asked for that reduction in freight rates, but up to the present they have not been able to secure it. The result is that they are unable to obtain these feeds at prices which would permit them to make the necessary purchases to feed their stock.

The farmers of Nova Scotia wish to be placed upon the same basis as the farmers of the west as regards the control of water. Millions of dollars have been spent in the west to control water, but in the constituency of Digby-Annapolis-Kings, represented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), there are dyke lands that have gone out to sea. In my county of Cumberland and in Westmorland there are large acreages of land which attracted the early settlers, but which are covered by the sea or have reverted to floating bogs. This matter should receive attention from the government, and I should think this was as good a time as any to put some of the idle machinery in the Department of Public Works to use.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have to inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): With the permission of the house, I have just a few more subjects to discuss.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not like to take exception, and I do not think it should be necessary to take exception in a case of this kind, but the fact is that we are trying hard to get through and the hon. gentleman has been talking about nearly every subject except the one that is really before the house. I do not think that I can assent to his going on.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is a motion for ways and means, and I think hon. members can make budget speeches if they desire. But I agree that the forty-minute rule should be observed.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): Mr. Speaker, I shall detain the house for but a few minutes because I desire to deal with just one phase of this motion. The measures which will result from the passing of these resolutions are for the purpose of enabling the government to conserve that comparatively small amount of United States exchange which is in our hands, for the purpose of buying from that country ever increasing quantities of materials, munitions and commodities of that sort required for the war. I am in full agreement with the desire which the government has in mind, and I referred to it when I spoke on the address ten days ago. My reason for being so strongly in favour of this is that I see in Canada a certain number of people who of their own volition are making use of self-sacrifice in the expenditures which they are making. There is another group of people who, unthinkingly or in ignorance of the dire necessities of the case, have not yet begun to make use of self-sacrifice. There is yet another group of people who, through obstinancy or otherwise, have no intention of curbing their purchases unless they are made to. This measure is the government's gesture to bring home to all these people the necessity of looking at both sides of every dollar before it is spent.

The government have not seen fit to let us into the secret of what sum of money is being aimed at by this measure. It is said that it is anticipated that some $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 a month may be forthcoming, but we do not know the total that we should be aiming at. However, making what estimates we can from past peace-time years and adding to those what we imagine has been incurred by way of expenditures for war materials, it would appear to me that the sum will be but one-third or one-quarter of what will be required. I am of opinion that this is but a timid gesture which the government are making in this great necessity. It may be that they are trying out something; it may be that they are "flying a kite" in relation to what may happen in the budget some six months hence; but, whatever their motive is, it seems to me that it will not accomplish what appears to me to be the dire necessity.

The minister has erected a structure which is to be an obstruction to the useless waste of Canadian dollars. But, unfortunately, he has left in that structure what I consider to be a most serious gap. I think we shall see pass through that gap some $20,000,000 which need not pass. In his speech the minister anticipated the objections which might be raised to the omission of fruits and vegetables from those articles which are prohibited. He explained that this was not a protective measure. Of course it is not a protective measure; it is a measure to conserve dollars and to induce Canadians to spend those dollars in the wisest possible way for war purposes.

The minister said that when the government made representations to the United States, the United States said that they were not prepared to go the full way with Canada in its desire. We cannot delve into those conversations, but I cannot help thinking that the valour with which the government put up a plea in those conversations was not as great as it should have been. Canada must have explained to the United States the purpose of this measure, and it must have been pointed out that this was no attempt to reduce the amount that Canada would purchase from the United States, that it was being done with the intention of making every dollar count in this war effort in connection with which the United States have given so many instances of their desire and intention to help.

Of course they desire to help. We do not minimize the help that they will give and we greatly rejoice that this help will be forthcoming. But let us look the facts in the face. Let us recall that a year ago millions in the United States realized that only Great Britain stood between them and a very great danger for which they were not prepared. Since that day many, many millions of that great nation have come round to the same feeling, that nothing but the Royal Navy, the Royal Air Force, the mercantile marine and the people of Great Britain are standing between them and a jeopardy which they had not foreseen. That being the situation, it seems incredible to me that the United States with their enormous production of fruits and their enormous production of vegetables, many times greater than that of Canada, should have said, "We will do this much, but we will not do that."

When the minister made the statement that he thought there would be surprise at the omission of fruits and vegetables, I noticed that the free-trade supporters of the government showed that they appreciated that by the clapping on their desks. This makes me believe that, after all, there is some protection in this matter, at least in the way they look at it. But I would not be standing here and speaking in these terms if I misinterpreted the object of this measure. It is a measure to induce us to use those dollars that we have, to spend them in such a way that they will be of the greatest benefit in this war effort.

This evening I received a letter from Great Britain, written from Bristol, bombed Bristol. It was written before the terrible attack of ten days ago, but they had had 290 air warnings already.

The writer later referred to the fact that they were considering what they could substitute in the plum pudding for raisins which were not obtainable. If they are able to look round in that comparatively happy way, for the writer had just said, "compared with others we are well off," could the Canadian people not look round for substitutes for utterly unnecessary purchases in this emergency? Why should it be necessary for Canadian dollars to be spent on strawberries in January and exotic fruits many of which we do not produce, when the people in the old country who are doing what they are for us are looking round and seeing what they can substitute for raisins in their puddings?

Why should it be necessary to import 10,000,000 pounds of melons of various descriptions in the three summer months when Canada produces canteloupes and melons galore? Is it not reasonable that the Canadian should assuage his anxiety to buy these exotic fruits until Canadian produce is available?

Something like $23,000,000 is spent in the year to bring in from the United States fruits and vegetables; that is a round figure; $16,000,000 of it is for fruits and $7,000,000 for vegetables, again in round figures. Within that $16,000,000 undoubtedly come oranges, grapefruit and lemons, those fruits which we do not produce. There are those in Canada who sincerely believe that these citrus fruits are a necessity of health. Suppose we grant that they are. Yet there are such extremely desirable substitutes as apple juice and tomato juice, which have so largely taken the place in our hotels and restaurants of the ubiquitous orange of a few months ago. Still, let us say for the purposes of argument, that it would be reasonable to treat these citrus fruits kindly. There come to Canada from the sterling countries considerable quantities of citrus fruits. Had the decision been so, and had the minister put the citrus fruits into the second part of schedule 1, where imports are permitted under permit, it would have been possible to satisfy the Canadian demand for citrus fruits from the sterling countries, thereby reducing the length of time in which the Canadian people would have had to do without that type of fruit, and then, if needs be, admitting them in the months when they could not be obtained from the West Indies.

But no. The government decided that this leak should exist, and through that leak will pass out dollars by the million, which to my mind spoils the equality of sacrifice that I desired to see demanded of the Canadian people by this measure.

But the value of the fruits is not all. Those fruits and vegetables come north from the places of their production to the Canadian boundary. They come by various forms of transportation owned in the United States. The freight rates have to be paid for in United States currency, and this means a further drain on dollars which is usually taken to be pretty nearly 100 per cent of the value of the fruits and vegetables. So, if we whittle that $23,000,000 down to $10,000,000 or $12,000,000 worth of these commodities brought in from the United States which certainly Canada could do without, we have to add another $10,000,000 of freight rates and payments to transportation companies, which has to be met in United States exchange, and we have the leak of $20,000,000 to which I referred just now.

Nor is that all. From all the centres of population in this country the habit has grown up of truckers going down to an appropriate market south of the line with money at their disposal to buy what they choose which can be sold at a profit in Canada. When you and I, Mr. Speaker, want to go into the United States we have to satisfy a certain board that it is necessary and that we need such and such a sum of money, and that sum of money is very often reduced below our desires. We have difficulty in obtaining even that much exchange. But the truckers do not. They are going there on a piece of business, and they go there and spend that money, that valuable Canadian dollar, that Canadian dollar which is in effect reducing the United States currency which we have at our disposal for war purposes. When the trucker comes north to the line again he displays an invoice, explaining on what he has spent his money. Let me ask the minister to pay particular attention to these invoices. Will he have them examined? There is such a thing as an invoice which does not truly represent the goods it is supposed to represent, and I would suggest to the minister that he put the requisite officers at work in checking, and then in double checking those invoices, and see if we could yet save comparatively small sums of money.

My reason for objecting to this leak, Mr. Speaker, is that I looked forward to this measure in the hope that where pressure was needed on Canadians who were not ready to bear their share of the burden, the pressure would result in the necessity on the part of those Canadians to use their money properly, in that way evening up a little bit that inequality of sacrifice, and make them give that little bit of assistance which already so many Canadians are voluntarily giving in this matter. Why should we not suffer? Why should we not spend ourselves so as to try and bring ourselves, which is Canada, nearer to those who are suffering, those who are dying, those who are giving everything they possess in this battle of freedom for us as well as for themselves?

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, my address on this resolution will by no means be the best during this debate, but I do lay claim to this one thing, that it will be the shortest.

This nation is at war. The budget resolutions are aimed at increasing our war effort. Upon their general principles I find myself almost entirely in agreement with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), because it is of prime importance to Canada that our foreign exchange position be guarded and maintained.

My plea, however, is that the resolutions do not go quite far enough. I am not convinced that the government gave sufficiently careful or sympathetic consideration to the admittedly heavy Canadian purchases of fresh fruits and vegetables from the United States. In that I am in agreement with the previous speaker (Mr. Stirling), who gave in much more detail than I shall do the entire picture of this trade.

This importation is steadily on the rise and is seriously sapping the vitals of our foreign exchange status. This year we shall import approximately $23,000,000 worth of these commodities. Over half of these purchases are of a class or kind produced by our own growers who are in turn asked to assist our national war effort. Added also to that is the fact that, roughly speaking, we are using up almost $43,000,000 worth of precious exchange when we add the freight charges of something like $20,000,000 to the amount which I already gave; and this, Mr. Speaker, at a time when we need every cent of foreign exchange on which we can lay our hands in order to purchase engines of war from our neighbours.

I plead with the Minister of Finance tonight to give comprehensive, earnest and sympathetic consideration to what, I think, is a simple and direct governmental duty at this time.

Canada surely cannot be serious in thinking that the use of our money supplies to buy United States fresh fruits and vegetables can be an effective means of helping our war effort while similar products to those which we purchase lie rotting in our fields.

The question is simply this, and with it I conclude. Shall it be, for this country, fresh fruits and vegetables, or shall it be munitions and supplies from the United States? That, I think, is a simple question. As a matter of fact we cannot have both from the same Canadian dollar. I think I know the answer. I think the government knows the answer. I think the house knows the answer. And I am sure the people of the Dominion of Canada know the answer, too. Need I say more? Surely this is a time for action rather than for words.

Mr. H. H. HATFIELD (Victoria-Carleton): I want to commend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) for his budget, but it does not go far enough. There may be a reason for not including all fruits and vegetables in schedule 1, which is the prohibitory schedule; but surely such fruits and vegetables as strawberries, grapes and other small fruits, vegetables coming from Louisiana, Florida and California, and especially new potatoes and all grades of potatoes, should be prohibited, in view of the fact that we have in eastern Canada almost the largest surplus crop of potatoes in history, selling at half the cost of production, at a price of 20 cents a bushel to the grower. There are coming into Canada at the present time potatoes of a lower grade than the growers of Canada are allowed to ship to market. There is in the United States and Canada one of the largest crops of potatoes that we have had in a great many years, and the only shortage is in the provinces of Manitoba and Ontario. I contend that foreign exchange should not be allowed to be used for imported potatoes when we have a surplus crop in this country and the potato growers are able to supply our markets the year round.

According to the last Canada-United States trade agreement we are not allowed to ship potatoes to the United States except under a quota, but there is no quota or any other restriction upon United States potatoes entering Canada. Surely their potatoes, the production of which is assisted in every way by the United States department of agriculture, should not be allowed to come into Canada and compete with our Canadian potatoes at this time when our growers are selling their potatoes at less than half the cost of production, for that is what they are doing this season. In the last two months more than ninety-one carloads of potatoes came into Canada from the United States. I quote the weekly imports furnished by the Department of Agriculture of potatoes marketed in the city of Winnipeg, Manitoba.

These potatoes sold at ten cents per hundredweight lower than Alberta Gems, and forced the Canadian market down.

The maritime provinces have received from this government no such assistance as the United States potato growers have had from theirs. Across the border from my constituency, in Maine, potato growers are now receiving fifteen cents a bushel for every bushel of potatoes they deliver to the starch factories. This bonus tends to lift the surplus from the market and give the grower a better price for his marketable potatoes. The potato growers in the maritime provinces receive practically no attention from our Department of Agriculture. This government could assist the eastern potato growers at very little cost by making arrangements to increase the production of potato starch and dextrine, and at the same time help our war effort, because the British empire needs these starches and dextrines for the textile trade and for the manufacture of explosives.

The starch factories now operating in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick cannot begin to handle the surplus supply of potatoes this season.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I have to call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that he is reading his speech.

Mr. HATFIELD: The starch factories in Prince Edward Island number three, and there is one in New Brunswick, with another under construction which, I hope, will soon be in manufacture. These factories will not begin to handle the surplus of potatoes. Not only potato starch, but potato dextrine and wheat starch are needed in Great Britain. We are sending thousands of dollars out of Canada for the importation of corn to be manufactured into corn starch in this country. This corn comes from south America and south Africa. Low grade wheat would make wheat starch which is equal to or better than corn starch, and also dextrine and a better grade of glucose than can be derived from corn. We are, however, sending away thousands of dollars for corn which comes in free of duty to be manufactured into corn starch. I suggest to the government that they get in touch with our corn-starch manufacturers and invite them to erect factories for the purposes I have mentioned. I believe the Canada Starch company have a factory at Fort William which they have not used for years and they could use the surplus of low grade wheat.

We cannot continue increasing the crop of potatoes in eastern Canada and the crop of wheat in the west for food purposes because we have at the present time more foodstuffs than the markets will absorb. Agriculture has come to the manufacturing stage and the sooner the government assists in the manufacturing of agricultural products, the better. Canada is the only country in the world to-day that is not assisting in this direction. The United States government has just voted $6,000,000 for the erection of four laboratories in that country to look into the manufacture of power alcohol. Power alcohol will account for 80,000,000 bushels of western wheat, and low grade wheat at that.

We cannot go on in the west piling up wheat and building more storage space. Every bushel of wheat that goes into storage overhangs the market and every bushel that goes into a manufacturing plant is taken off the market. Wheat will make the finest starch, dextrine and glucose, and calls are coming now from the British empire, China, south Africa and south America, and all countries that are not blockaded. The textile trade of Great Britain is in need of starch, both potato and wheat dextrine.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to put on the record a brief prepared by a chemical engineer who left Poland before the Germans entered. He had a plant for the manufacture of power alcohol from wheat, barley and soya beans. It was worth a million and a half dollars and he destroyed it before he left. I wonder whether I may place this statement on the record.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the brief lengthy? Only with the consent of the house may it be put on Hansard.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. HATFIELD: I think it would be of interest to western members. It is as follows:

Arguments for the Erection of Industrial Plants in Canada for the Production of Power Alcohol

A. Present situation of the alcohol industry in Canada.

In 1938, alcohol production was about ten million proof gallons, including 4,250,000 gallons commercial alcohol. For this production, the following raw materials were imported:

Corn .....lbs.	72,000,000	value	$ 1,200,000
Molasses ..... "	89,000,000	"	650,000
Fuel oil .....gals.	2,240,000	"	106,000

In 1940 these figures will be increased considerably. Canada, having an overproduction of agricultural products suitable for the production of alcohol, imported over $2,000,000 of raw materials for this industry. By the new methods for producing alcohol from domestic raw materials—potatoes or grains—it is possible to obtain alcohol cheaper than from imported molasses and corn, and also by this method to obtain very valuable residues (slops) rich in protein vitamins and yeast. These residues are very valuable foodstuffs for cattle and poultry. From the production of ten million proof gallons annually, an amount of about 10,000 tons of this high value feed would be available.

Thus it is possible to liquidate the import of molasses and corn for cattle food. The total amount of these imported products for industrial purposes and for cattle feeding amounted to the following for the year 1938:

Molasses ....gals.	12,600,000	value	$ 2,180,000
Corn .....bus.	15,500,000	"	10,330,000

B. Importance of creating a power alcohol industry in Canada.

1. Trade balance.

Canada imports $60,000,000 of petroleum products per year, and over $2,000,000 of tetra ethyl lead. The amount of these imports will increase on account of the development of motorization, and with the difference of exchange between the Canadian and American dollars.

The consumption of gasoline in Canada amounts to over 800,000,000 gallons per year. A blend of 20 per cent of alcohol (160,000,000 gallons) mixed with gasoline will not only improve the quality of gasoline from 63 to 80 octanes, but will save in trade balance about $15,000,000 per year in imported petroleum products.

When producing 160,000,000 gallons of absolute alcohol per year from grains and potatoes, Canada will get about 320,000 tons of the above mentioned valuable foodstuffs. This cheap fodder will increase the production of milk and eggs; will create conditions for the breeding of cattle and pigs, and will also be the basis of a new industry of next products, thus liquidating the import of animals and animal products, which amount at present to $30,000,000 per year.

2. Profits for Agriculture.

Canada produces per year the following average amount of grains and potatoes:—

Wheat	bushels	300,000,000
Oats	bushels	330,000,000
Barley	bushels	80,000,000
Rye	bushels	10,000,000
Potatoes	cwts.	40,000,000

The value of field crops amounts to $600,000,000 per year. Because of the overproduction, and lack of export in some years, this figure decreases to less than $500,000,000. This difference is a big loss for the farmers.

When adding 20 per cent of alcohol to gasoline, we create a consumption of 160,000,000 gallons of power alcohol per year. This quantity of alcohol would need 80,000,000 bushels of grain, and would provide every year a "safety valve" in the grain price market, by taking this amount of grain out of the market for good. From the economic point of view, the production of power alcohol is not less important than the grain elevators problem was some years ago. Grain elevators provide for the storing of grain only. Modern alcohol factories, using agricultural products, decidedly rid the markets of agricultural overproduction, which does not return to the markets at a later date. Moreover, the cost of investment in a modern alcohol factory for one ton of processed grain is not greater than the construction cost of the same amount of grain elevators. Producing alcohol from grain saves the cost of grain storage. Alcohol is usually produced from the lower grades of grain, which increased therefore the value of the other grades of grain. Constructing an alcohol factory where the grain grows, saves 70 per cent of its weight in the cost of transport, or 90 per cent when dealing with potatoes. The weight of the alcohol produced from grain amounts to 30 per cent of the weight of the grain, or 10 per cent of the weight of potatoes. Besides this, the farmer gets the valuable fodder mentioned above, which gives him the possibility of an additional revenue on the breeding of cattle and poultry, receiving at no charge a great amount of fertilizer. Thus he reduces the cost of the production of grain.

3. Indirect profits of development of the power alcohol industry for the economic life in Canada.

The construction cost of a modern factory to produce 10,000 gallons of alcohol daily is estimated at $500,000. If the industry were to be developed to the extent mentioned, i.e., 160,000,000 gallons annually, a capital investment of $25,000,000 would be necessary. The buildings and machinery equipment can be executed in this country. Thus the building and machinery industries would be able to give work to a large number of unemployed. The new alcohol industry itself would be able to give permanent work to 5,000 workers, not including the farmers nor the industries connected with the alcohol production.

The fifteen years' experience of 35 countries of the world which introduced the production of power alcohol, indicates that these countries not only did not suffer though cancelling the taxes of the power alcohol which takes the place of taxed gasoline, but received them back from the improved agriculture, through the decrease of money grants to farmers and unemployed, also saving at the same time many foreign payments already mentioned. During the last few years, Brazil, Italy, and Japan, increased many times the power alcohol production. Now, Australia is developing a great programme of production.

Among the agricultural countries, Canada is the only one which has not done anything yet about this important industry.

4. The alcohol industry and the war.

The war is a great consumer of alcohol, as it is required for the production of explosives, and other war needs. Production of alcohol in England is based on imported molasses. Because of transport difficulties, it would seem useful to construct immediately some alcohol plants in Canada, using domestic raw materials. Canada, being free from air raids and invasion would be able to deliver alcohol to England in connection with its war programme of supplies.

C. Execution of the programme.

The construction of a power alcohol plant under actual conditions, would require at least eight months. Considering the large area of Canada, it would be wise to construct two or three plants at once, in different centres of large agricultural overproduction. These pilot factories would give practical results as to the cost of production, as well as the economic point of view. The results obtained would give a basis for the construction of other factories.

D. Recapitulation.

The creation of power alcohol production in Canada would give the following benefits:

1. Decrease imports per year as follows:

Molasses and corn.....	$12,000,000
Petroleum products.....	15,000,000
Animals and animal products	30,000,000

2. Protect agriculture against marketing losses of $50,000,000 to $100,000,000 per year.

3. Increase taxable revenues from the more profitable agriculture and the new industry in alcohol.

4. Reduce unemployment in agriculture and industry.

5. Save cost of transporting 70 per cent of 80,000,000 bushels of grain annually.

6. Save cost of storing 80,000,000 bushels of grain annually.

7. Supply agriculture with a cheap valuable fodder as well as fertilizer, and create the basis of increased animal production and meat industry.

8. Ensure delivery of a great amount of alcohol for war purposes from domestic raw materials.

9. The use of the lower grades of grain in such large quantities will increase considerably the value of the rest of the grain.

10. Provide a "safety valve" for the grain price market, even of more importance and utility than the grain elevators question a few years ago.

(The basic figures given in above report can be confirmed by the Canada Year Book, 1939.)

I should like to see the Department of Agriculture do something to assist the potato growers of eastern Canada especially in the maritimes. We have no market in the United States this year. Our export market has been shut off.

I wish to commend the Minister of Trade and Commerce for his trade mission to south America. I believe I brought this matter up in June. It is late, but better late than never. I suggest, however, that they will have to go further than a trade mission. The United States government has been building a steamer a month for the last ten months and turning these ships over to the operators for the purpose of capturing the trade which Germany and the Scandinavian countries had in south America before the war. We need shipping facilities to south America. There is a very large trade there for the agricultural products of Canada.

The bacon agreement made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) while in the old country is lower by $2.28 a hundred than the former agreement, and in the meantime prices of mill feeds and of everything else that go into the production of hogs have risen, so that our eastern farmers are up against it and are cutting out the raising of hogs.

I see that the war-time prices and trade board has fixed a maximum price for butter. Why should it fix a maximum price for butter when it has fixed a minimum on apples and wheat? If we want the dairymen of Canada to take their milk to the cheese factories there is no need to use force. The dairymen are loyal and they will cooperate. All the government has to do is to tell them that cheese is required instead of butter. There is no need to fix a maximum price for butter. It can go as low as you like, but it cannot go higher, and if butter is in the hands of speculators it should not be. The government should have some system of handling butter in surplus periods in the summer months, and the farmer who makes the butter should have the benefit of the excess price in the winter.

May I say something now about fertilizer and fertilizer chemicals. When the war import tax of 10 per cent was imposed it covered fertilizer. Our fertilizer chemicals have to be imported. The exchange tax of 10 per cent meant to our farmers, who are selling their produce below cost of production, an advance of from $3 to $4 a ton. Only one fertilizer chemical is produced here, namely, sulphate of ammonia. That is handled by one firm who immediately advanced the price $4 a ton or 10 per cent. This should not be allowed.

There is no reason why we should send out foreign exchange for the importation of corn. I would suggest that the government establish a committee to look into the question. The Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce should study the whole subject. We should be using up our low grade western wheat. Two hundred million bushels of wheat could be used in the manufacture of starch dextrine, glucose and power alcohol. Two million dollars' worth of tetra ethyl lead is imported, raising the octane value of gasoline. Power alcohol, wheat alcohol or potato alcohol would give the same results.

I suggest that the government do away with the central experimental farm and turn over the experiments to the national research council. The council is doing a wonderful job in Ottawa, whereas the farm has outlived its usefulness. There are enough offices at the central experimental farm without building more. Agriculture to-day is not bothered with the problem of production. It has surpluses. Give the farmer a decent return for his products and he will soon find ways of producing them. It is not the production we need so much as the marketing.

The people of Canada are tired of the waste that is going on in our war effort. They are tired of seeing money spent for the construction of small arms factories and so on. Nothing but aeroplanes will win this war, and an aeroplane factory should be built in every province.

An hon. MEMBER: Is the hon. member an expert?

Mr. HATFIELD: No, I am not an expert, but that is what the people are calling for. And since the people are demanding that we build aeroplanes we should start now to do so, even though it is late. We should not be importing aeroplanes; we should be spending every possible dollar in the construction of these factories. In the meantime we should buy aeroplanes wherever they can be secured, and send them to Britain to help carry on this war.

In conclusion, I should like once more to suggest to the government that a committee be formed to look into the manufacture of our surplus farm products, thus doing away with the necessity of using foreign exchange for the importation of farm products to be manufactured here.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say just a few words on the motion and the amendment. First, I should like to endorse the statements made yesterday by the acting leader of this group, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell); that is, the budget proposals in the main are satisfactory, as far as they go. Measures will have to be taken to ensure that prices of home products are not increased where importations are restricted or prohibited. The necessary safeguards, however, I think can be better discussed when we are dealing with the items in the schedules. My purpose in rising at this time is to support the amendment proposed yesterday by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and seconded by myself. Our amendment has two virtues: it is very simple, and it is very direct. I should like to read it again for the benefit of hon. members. It reads:

That all the words after "that" in the said motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"This house regrets that the government has not seen fit to introduce proposals for the raising of a compulsory war loan free of interest to be levied according to ability to subscribe."

In his two speeches on the address in reply to the speech from the throne the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) referred at considerable length to the last war loan. Speaking just last Tuesday, he referred to the failure of the loan and the necessity of finding some procedure to get large numbers of individual investors to subscribe. He said that he did not know what the cure was, but that there would have to be concerted action. Well, we are proposing concerted action, and, moreover, action that is in conformity with the provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act of 1940. I will quote the important section of that act, which reads:

2. Subject to the provisions of section three hereof, the governor in council may do and authorize such acts and things, and make from time to time such orders and regulations, requiring persons to place themselves, their services and their property at the disposal of his majesty in the right of Canada, as may be deemed necessary or expedient for securing the public safety, the defence of Canada, the maintenance of public order, or the efficient prosecution of the war, or for maintaining supplies or services essential to the life of the community.

[Mr. Hatfield.]

When the amendment was proposed yesterday, I thought I detected hostility to it from the attitude of certain hon. members opposite. I am at a loss to understand why that should be the situation, since these members gave their unanimous support to the National Resources Mobilization Act less than six months ago. The purpose of that act, as is clear from the section I read, was to give the government power to take whatever measures were necessary for the effective mobilization of the resources of this country, both human and material, for the prosecution of the war. At the time that act was under discussion this group pointed out that we were fearful, because of past experience, that in its operation the act would be applied only to persons and not to property. So far the act has been applied only to persons. In reply to our expressed fears in that regard the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said, according to Hansard for June 18, 1940, at page 902:

The measure is intended to cover every resource that the country has, human and material. But may I ask my hon. friends this question: What justification is there for assuming that it is only going to be the provisions of the measure related to the human that will be invoked and not the material? Is not any fair-minded man entitled to say that there is just as much reason to assume that this bill is introduced solely for the purpose of applying it to material things?

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said:

Experience of the past.

Then the Prime Minister went on:

Not experience of the past. I absolutely deny that statement. Does my hon. friend mean to say to me he believes I place more value in material things than I do on human life?

The fact of the matter is that we were at that time fearful that this act would apply only to human beings, and we stressed that point. We tried in every possible way to get this house to put itself on record that it would deal with material things first. What has transpired since the act was passed last June is sufficient proof that we were wise in taking heed of our past experience.

The young men who have been called up since the national registration are wondering why the act should apply to them, why they should be registered, tabulated and on call. They know that if they do not show up at the appointed place at the appointed time, a policeman will knock at their doors and find out very quickly the reason why. They wonder why all this is done, when no attempt is being made to take the wealth of people who have been bleeding this country since and even during the last war.

In my home city of Vancouver young men in their 'teen age are walking the streets without anything to do, and without a place to lay their heads. They are sleeping in boxcars and empty buildings—any place they can find. As soon as they reach the age of twenty-one they will have to answer the call and take their turn at training, in order that they may give their lives, if necessary, to defend a country which will not feed them. I think it is far more appropriate that people to whom the country has been kind, people who have been able to amass large amounts of this world's wealth, and who have been able to lay that money to one side, should be called upon at this time of need to give of their means and their wealth in defence of their country, without waiting until it in its extremity will have to give them higher interest rates or higher wages for their money.

Why should there be any opposition to compulsion? As I have said, we have already voted for compulsion. This house has approved it; it is on the statute books; it is the law; it is being applied to human beings. Then, why should there be any opposition to its application to money or to wealth? Surely, when hon. members voted for the National Resources Mobilization Act, they did not make mental reservations. Surely they did not from their experience of the past conclude that it would not apply or that it would not be used to take property. But let us consider this matter of compulsion. Is not all taxation a matter of compulsion? So far as compulsion is concerned, what is the difference between digging into the pay envelope of the young man or young girl, old man or old girl, if you like, who gets a measly $50 or $60 a month, and taking out 2 per cent of the wage and calling it a national defence tax, and taking from the savings of those who have been receiving anywhere from $5,000 to $50,000 or more a year for the past number of years, and asking them to lend a part of it without interest to the country in its time of emergency?

There is no ethical difference in the world, so far as the two cases I have mentioned are concerned. If there is any difference, and if any different method should be applied, surely it is the person who is getting the low wage who should be exempt, and not the other person who has a good living and idle money.

I believe I read somewhere in a bankers' magazine that the real purpose of savings certificates and of urging persons of small means to subscribe to war loans is not so much to get the money but rather to take the money out of circulation, so that it will not be used for ordinary consumption purposes. People who have huge savings accounts are not limited in what they can buy, as long as they have those accounts. Very wisely, I believe, our amendment does not go into detail as to how a measure such as we suggest, or a loan such as we have proposed, should be organized. We have not made any suggestion as to what amount of savings should be exempted or taken. We leave all that to the minister and his capable advisory staff.

As I have said, however, there is plenty of idle money in the country. I have in my hand the last return made by the chartered banks of Canada, showing deposits in those banks as at October 31, 1939. The return shows in savings accounts an aggregate amount of $1,705,455,083. There are 4,160,897 accounts, but in 3,828,291 of them the average deposit amounts to only a little over $118. The details of the table I have before me are as follows:

Deposits	Number of depositors	Aggregate deposits	Average deposits
Of $1,000 or less	3,828,291	$ 454,885,624	$ 118
Of $1,000 to $5,000	290,222	588,261,912	2,026
Of $5,000 to $25,000	40,001	348,860,597	8,721
Of $25,000 to $100,000	2,757	123,329,760	44,733
Of $100,000 and over	626	190,117,190	303,701
	4,161,897	$1,705,455,083

There are 626 people in Canada with savings accounts that average over $303,000. That money is being left intact in the banks and is growing from year to year. Yet we take 2 per cent out of the pay envelopes of those girls mentioned the other evening by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), whose wages are so little that the only breakfast they can afford is a cup of coffee and a cigarette. This way of raising money is not good enough for people who are saving civilization. We must change our ideas of values—of things worth saving. We must place a greater value upon human life, human welfare and human happiness than we place upon large bank accounts accumulated over the years by people in favoured positions.

I do not think the people of this dominion can consider that they are more patriotic, more interested in doing the utmost for the cause for which we are fighting, than the people of our sister dominion of New Zealand. The proposal we are making is for a compulsory loan to which people would subscribe according to their ability to do so. This principle was adopted in New Zealand a considerable time ago. So I ask the house to give its approval to this amendment. It is in absolute accord with the National Resources Mobilization Act. It asks only that those people who can afford it shall give of their idle money for a short time, that time depending upon how long it takes us to win the war.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the war budget now under consideration by the house is closely related to the financial and economic position of the country. That is why I have decided to make a few brief remarks in what I believe to be the interests of the Canadian people.

As regards the amendment presented by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), it would seem to be but another attempt at conscripting wealth. We must therefore reject it as should be rejected conscription of any nature, for in the preparation of a budget, as in all things, our first care must be to avoid imperilling the economic life of the nation.

Agriculture is, particularly in war time, our principal industry. To lessen agricultural production, to take away the labour essential to its prosperity would be a tragic mistake. The various countries vanquished by Germany were subdued through lack of food and munitions. In these difficult times, agriculture must not only carry on but develop and expand. Farm production, intensified and reorganized with the assistance of public bodies, will triumph over the obstacles that lie in the path of sacrifice whereon treads a world in distress. Liberty, justice and right cannot successfully oppose barbarism without the support of that living force that is agriculture.

Many have suggested that the training period of our young men be extended from one to four months. Such a measure would be most inopportune. It would paralyse agricultural production and consequently this country's war effort. Numerous are the young farmers, journeymen and technicians who have had to request from their local registrars delays and postponement of their training under the mobilization act. Such postponements are granted however only in extremely serious or special cases. It has been said that the training of young farmers at the end of autumn and during the winter would not impair agricultural production. This is not correct. A great many young men and as many heads of families have pointed out to me that it would be impossible for them to find the help required for the maintenance of production figures and the sound management of their farms. Certain farmers in my riding sell a great deal of milk the whole year round. Many of them are the owners of certified herds, having invested in the dairy industry the greater part of their assets. Concerned with public hygiene, they have erected their farm buildings according to plans and specifications furnished by the governments. Briefly, there exists for them no off season, no more than for any progressive farmer to my knowledge.

The same remarks apply in the case of market gardeners. There are in my riding a great many hot-house owners who produce fresh vegetables all winter long. Their installation and equipment costs have been rather high. Why should we now add to their already heavy burden of poor returns for farm produce that of a scarcity of labour. Therefore do I demand for agriculture and all the vital industries of the nation, on which depend the economic balance and the salvation of this country, all the assistance required not only to pass through a trying period but also for the solution of those distressing post-war problems. When the present conflict has reached an end, the lost peoples of the earth will turn to the land in their supreme struggle for life. What industry better than agriculture will then be able to resist the far-reaching reactions provoked by war? In so far as it is essential to life, thus will its decline paralyse all initiative. Side by side with armament plants erected at the cost of enormous sacrifices, the governments should build a first rate agricultural industry.

The worst enemies of agriculture are: the desertion of rural areas, war profiteering and the unfair distribution of taxes. Sixty years ago or more, the farm population of Quebec represented four-fifths of the total population in that province. The exodus toward the cities, begun in the years following 1880, has been increasing ever since and to such an extent that there exists to-day a terrifying lack of balance in this regard. At the moment, two-thirds of the population of Quebec live in urban centres. In the face of such a deplorable economic situation, what policy should our governments follow? They should endeavour to prevent this wholesale desertion of our rural districts by adopting measures destined to encourage and protect agriculture; to promote understanding and appreciation of agriculture through education, farmers' organizations and cooperation; to check by every means profiteers who exploit the poverty and efforts of the producer and the consumer.

While there were more than fifty million pounds of butter stored in various warehouses throughout the country, we recently experienced a rise in the price of this commodity to the sole profit of the speculator. The price obtained by the producer for his milk remained in fact the same, and both he and the consumer were thus exploited. One might make the same observation in connection with a great many other farm products. How can such reprehensible speculative operations be tolerated at a moment when the workmen of the soil and the factory are making enormous sacrifices? Taxes of all kinds have been placed not only upon luxuries but also upon the necessaries of life. Consider, for instance, the tax placed upon containers destined to our home industries, and the additional taxes upon the very products of such industries. Let us beware of awakening one day to find agriculture in an irreparably exhausted state. Let us keep on the land the labour essential to its development. Let us not tear away from agriculture the youth in whom rests the survival of this nation. Nowhere else could they render greater service to their country than on the farm. The day agriculture is sacrificed, then may we expect the worst to befall us.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few words to say on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). The habit has grown in this debate of referring to the speech that I made here last Monday as a budget, and to the proposals as budget proposals. I think it is unfortunate that members should have fallen into the habit of referring to it in that way because it has led us into many speeches some of which I think perhaps would not have been made had the purpose of these proposals been kept more clearly in mind. The budget, of course, is a different thing entirely. The budget estimates the revenues and expenditures for the coming year and ordinarily proposes the imposition of taxes, presents a financial statement, and otherwise deals with the financial affairs of the country. But this was in no sense a budget. These proposals have one purpose and one purpose alone, namely, the conservation of foreign exchange. Such taxation measures as were proposed were incidental and supplementary to the main proposals which were for the object I have mentioned. I was very careful in the proposals to leave out anything of a taxation nature or anything which could be construed as being introduced for the purpose of raising revenue.

There are measures which I should have liked to introduce in the house this session if the circumstances had been just a little different. For instance, I announced in September last that income taxpayers would have the privilege of paying their income tax by instalments; that is, the income tax which will be due on April 30 next. If the taxpayer should pay one-third of his tax in four monthly instalments before April 30, he would have the privilege of paying the other two-thirds of his income tax in four equal monthly instalments following April 30. It is necessary that this be authorized by act of parliament, and I was tempted to include that proposal among the proposals submitted at this session, but I purposely left it out because I did not want the house to fall into any confusion about the purpose of these particular proposals. They are introduced for one purpose and for one purpose alone.

The procedure was to move that the Speaker do leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of ways and means. I believe that under the standing orders it is possible under a motion of that kind to move an amendment such as the one proposed. But while that may be, I presume, technically possible under the rules, nevertheless it is not, I submit, a proper amendment for consideration on its merits by the house at the present time. It is simply a motion of non-confidence in the government and must be regarded by the government as such. It is equivalent to saying this: The government is moving that the Speaker do leave the chair for the house to consider certain proposals for the conservation of exchange, but I, the mover of the amendment, and my supporters, think that, instead of doing that, the house should go on record as condemning the government for having taken the wrong line in its general financial policy. Of course that is a serious motion, and if it were to be treated on the merits it would require a full discussion, a great deal of debate, and so forth. But I do not think the house or the country will expect us at this stage, before the Christmas recess, to depart from the consideration of exchange conservation measures into a broad discussion of general financial policy. I hope not, and I think that is the feeling of the house and also the feeling of the people whose eyes are upon us here.

So, Mr. Speaker, I am going to content myself to-night with simply pointing out to the house that, if the amendment passes, we are prevented from considering the exchange conservation measures because the Speaker will not leave the chair. Those words, if the amendment carried, would be struck out, and we would be prevented from considering exchange conservation measures which I believe everybody in the house agrees are necessary and urgently necessary.

I would also point out that, if the amendment carries, it is equivalent to a vote of non-confidence in the administration and would be followed of course by the results which normally attend such a vote. I would suggest, therefore, that the house deal with the amendment on those considerations. At the proper time there is no objection at all to amendments or proposals of this kind being considered on their merits, and we will consider them on their merits. But I am suggesting to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the house that this is not the time and the place, and I am going to ask the house to reject the amendment, for these reasons.

WAYS AND MEANS

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Vien in the chair.

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Special War Revenue Act and to provide—

1. That schedule 1 of the said act be amended as follows:

(a) by repealing paragraph 1. (a) thereof and substituting the following:

1. (a) Automobiles adapted or adaptable for passenger use, with seating capacity for not more than ten persons each, valued at
$900 or less	20 per cent
Over $900 but not more than $1,200	20 per cent on $900 plus 40 per cent on the amount in excess of $900.
Over $1,200	20 per cent on $900 plus 40 per cent on $300 plus 80 per cent on the amount in excess of $1,200.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain to the committee just what objective he has in mind in increasing this excise tax on automobiles? It does seem to me that the government overlooks the fact that for many of our people an automobile is not a luxury at all but a necessity; for example, for the majority of our farmers, for many of our tradesmen in the cities and towns, for physicians and for salesmen. Perhaps hundreds of thousands of Canadians have to use automobiles to make their living, and it seems to me that the government should have very good reasons for increasing the excise tax on automobiles produced in Canada. I would ask the minister to explain just what he is aiming at in taking this drastic step.

Mr. ILSLEY: The importation of automobiles into Canada will be prohibited under the provisions of the War Exchange Conservation Act, when it is passed, and it is not desired simply to transfer the business from those selling imported automobiles to those selling domestic automobiles.

That is one consideration. The second and more important consideration is this. We are informed that manufacture of automobiles makes drains upon plant capacity, upon materials and upon labour, which can be used very suitably in our war effort and which will be required in rapidly increasing degree for our war effort. While it is recognized that for many people automobiles are more or less a necessity, yet it is hoped that there will be a tendency on the part of the people of Canada to use their old cars longer instead of buying new cars, so that there will not be a drain in the form of resources that are required in the manufacture of a large number of automobiles. I do not know that I can explain it any better than that.

Mr. GREEN: I am afraid one of the reasons for this step is that mentally the government is still living in the horse-and-buggy days instead of in a stream-lined age. I am afraid it is trying to force people back to the horse and buggy, and they will not go back. I think the minister will admit that the effect of this measure will be to increase the cost of an automobile to everyone in Canada who buys a car.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is true.

Mr. GREEN: The minister says this step is being taken in order that automobile manufacturers may not be making too many cars. Well, the government have power, under legislation passed since the war began, to tell the manufacturer that he must make a certain number of cars and trucks for war purposes. Why can they not say to the manufacturer that he must make so many trucks and so many cars for the forces, and then let him make whatever cars he can over and above that number for sale to civilians in Canada? The government also have power to control prices, so they cannot be increased. I suggest to the government, certainly in connection with the low priced cars, that if instead of taking this drastic step they would tell the Canadian people it is desirable that they should not buy new cars, perhaps that would have just as much effect. This measure simply means that if a man has to buy a car he has to pay that much more for it, and I doubt if it will stop the purchase of very many cars.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask the minister if the same tax applies to parts coming in from the other side?

Mr. ILSLEY: The resolution with which we are dealing now has no reference to the importation of cars.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I should like the minister to make some comment on the point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South, who brought up some very important matters. I think the minister should say whether some direction could not be given manufacturers of automobiles as to whether they should discontinue the manufacture of cars, and to the public at large as to whether they should refrain entirely from purchasing new automobiles.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know whether that would be a better method; personally I do not think it would. I believe this is a far better method.

Mr. GREEN: It is not possible to distinguish in some way between people who must have automobiles and people who get them as a luxury? Can the government not devise some measure that would differentiate between these two groups of Canadians?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know how.

Mr. MacNICOL: What about parts purchased in Canada, then; is there an additional tax on those?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, not on repairs.

Mr. REID: May I ask the minister if notice has been taken of the fact that many dealers had cars on their hands before this tax came into effect? It will be remembered what was done when the 10 per cent increase was brought in. What check is going to be made in that connection?

Mr. ILSLEY: We are not doing what we did last spring, when we made the tax we imposed attach to cars on showroom floors. This time we are not doing that. I do not know whether the committee would be interested in why we pursued one rule last spring and why we are pursuing another now—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You were wrong then and you are right now; is that it?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. It has not always been the practice of governments to follow the same method in connection with regular budgets as in connection with extraordinary measures between budgets.

Paragraph agreed to.

(b) by repealing paragraph 5 of the said schedule and substituting the following:

5. Cameras, phonographs, radio broadcast receiving sets and tubes therefor, 25 per cent.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Surely the reasons given by the minister with reference to automobiles would not apply to cameras and radio receiving sets. There would not be large quantities of steel used in the manufacture of these articles. Would the minister mind explaining the reason for this excise tax, especially on radios, which have become a practical necessity in Canadian homes, particularly farm homes where newspapers very often are not received?

Mr. ILSLEY: Generally speaking, durable consumer goods require skilled labour for their manufacture, and the kind of materials used in what is required for war purposes. If the hon. member asks me to name just what materials are in cameras, and the type of skilled help required, I cannot do so, because I have not the technical qualifications necessary to give that answer. Generally speaking, however, the same considerations apply to practically all durable consumer goods. I have stated publicly that in the opinion of this government that would be a good line for economy and for saving on the part of the Canadian people.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Is there actually a shortage of skilled labour for the production of these articles? Is there a shortage of the raw materials which go into their manufacture, or is the government using this as a revenue-producing tax, and advancing the other reason more or less by way of window-dressing?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; this is not done for the purpose of raising revenue. Perhaps I should have said that we are prohibiting the importation of these particular articles from high-currency countries, and that unless there is a tax imposed in Canada the probability is that a great advantage will be given to the domestic manufacturer. It is not desired by the government that the domestic industry should simply expand to take the place that was formerly filled by the imported goods. Our people then would be spending for these commodities just as much as they spent before. That is not the object, nor is it in accordance with the principle underlying the war conservation measure we are taking.

Mr. HANSELL: To what extent are these three articles manufactured in Canada? I do not know of any place where we manufacture cameras.

Mr. MacNICOL: Oh, yes, we have one of the largest plants in the empire.

Mr. HANSELL: Probably, but I had not heard of it. What is the advantage? It seems to me that if the purpose is that of saving labour, it will save United States labour, more than our own.

Mr. ILSLEY: The Canadian Kodak company is the company I had in mind. I have not detailed information before me, but I happen to know that that company does a large business in this line. I believe that is the one the hon. member for Davenport had in mind.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes, the Canadian Kodak company at Mount Dennis.

Mr. HANSELL: How about radio companies?

Mr. ILSLEY: There are many of them.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I do not wish to labour the point, but I must say that in my opinion the principle underlying this excise tax is not sound. The purpose the minister has in mind may be a good one, but I am not sure that this provision will have the effect the minister desires. It seems to me the people who imported cars and radios were importing expensive articles. They will now buy them on the local market. The price will be higher than it was before, but it will not be higher than the price they paid previously for the imported article. So it seems to me practically the same number of people will be buying these commodities. However, the people who will not be buying them and will be pushed out of the market are the poorer class. They will be pushed out by those people who used to buy abroad, but are now buying at home. It means that the poorer man who used to buy a car or a radio, by virtue of the increased excise tax will be pushed out of the market, and his place will be taken by the person who at one time bought the imported article. The result will be a curtailment of consumption of these commodities, and that curtailment will affect the people who least deserve to be penalized. It will not affect the people who used to buy the imported article, but who are now buying the one manufactured at home. To obtain a commendable objective we are following a method which will penalize one class of the people. It seems to me that is not a proper procedure.

Mr. ILSLEY: It penalizes everyone who buys.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes; but it penalizes most the person who cannot buy. There comes a certain margin beyond which people will not be able to buy those commodities. If this were not going to push certain people out of the market, there would be no use in having the excise tax. It is only because certain ones will no longer be able to buy that you will be able to conserve raw material and labour. The people who will be pushed out of the market are those in the low-income brackets. It seems to me some rationing system, or some other system of handling the matter would be more equitable. We are now going to prevent the people in the low-income brackets from buying radios and cameras.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would not want to undertake the rationing of cameras to the Canadian people, I can assure the hon. member.

Mr. HANSELL: I can appreciate the minister's reply with regard to cameras and radios manufactured in Canada. I wish to say, however, that some of us deplore very much the fact that prices of such articles produced in Canada are very much higher than they are in the United States. We may walk down the street and see a tiny radio bearing a price tag of $18 or $20. Immediately we say, "We can get those in the United States for about $7.50." There is something wrong there, somewhere, if we manufacture radios of that kind in Canada. People have to pay almost twice as much. I do not know very much about manufacturing, but when I see those price tags my immediate reaction is, "Well, of course there is a duty to pay." We do not mind paying a little duty. It is now revealed that radios are manufactured in Canada, and in view of that fact I say those who are in responsible positions should see that those radios are reduced in price.

Paragraph agreed to.

(c) by adding to the said schedule as paragraph 6 thereof the following:

6. (a) Electric or gas light fixtures and lamps and shades, globes and reflectors therefor..... 25 per cent

(b) The following electrical or gas appliances adapted to household use:

Stoves, ranges and heaters; water heaters; refrigerators .....25 per cent

(c) The following electrical appliances adapted to household use:

Food choppers and grinders; irons and ironers; washing machines; garbage disposal units; floor waxers and polishers..25 per cent

(d) The following electrical appliances:

Vacuum cleaners and attachments therefor; grills, waffle irons, hot plates, roasters, kettles, chafing dishes, food and drink mixers and juice extractors, coffee makers, toasters of all kinds, portable humidifiers, curling irons, tongs, hair dryers, permanent waving machines, razors and shavers.....25 per cent

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would call the attention of the committee to paragraph (b), dealing with stoves, ranges and heaters. These are household necessities. They are absolutely necessary in certain communities where hydro development has taken place. I suggest that the extra tax of 25 per cent on an electric or gas stove is putting a high premium on the cost of living. I say that those articles are not at all in the same category as automobiles, cameras, phonographs or radio receiving sets. I should like to register my objection. Perhaps water heaters are not quite in the same category. The fact remains, however, that stoves, ranges and heaters are absolute household necessities, and they are necessities which are constantly wearing out. I suggest that the minister might very well eliminate those three articles from the schedule, and I ask him either to do so or to justify their retention. I say that these are not articles upon which people should be taxed unduly. The most humble people have to have them, and certainly they cannot be classed as luxuries.

In large cities like Toronto, Ottawa or Montreal an electric stove, in many instances, is the only kind that can be used. I have gone back to using the old-fashioned wood range because electricity in my community is too high. If electricity were cheaper, I would never have abandoned the electric stove. These items are in an entirely different category from that of the preceding items upon which the minister has placed this excise tax of 25 per cent. Electric stoves, ranges and heaters are necessities and I object to a tax being placed upon absolute necessities.

Mr. SHAW: With the imposition of a 25 per cent tax on washing machines I am led to believe that the minister and his advisers consider that washing machines are luxuries. For a long time I tried to convince my wife of that fact, but I was unsuccessful. I should like to hear an argument advanced by the minister which would convince the washboard-aged mothers of this country that washing machines are luxuries. In view of his being unable to advance such an argument, I suggest to the minister that these washing machines be deleted from this list.

Mr. ILSLEY: A good argument might be made for the deletion of practically every one of these items, and for the removal of all other taxes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not treating the position fairly, and I suggest that the minister ought not to treat this matter with levity. Electric stoves are absolute necessities. In many instances they are the only kind of stove that can be used, and they should not be taxed. We are supposed to be taxing luxuries, not necessities. I do not think the minister did himself justice when he treated this matter with levity. Perhaps he has an argument against taking off this item; if so, I should like to hear it.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is not a luxury tax.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, it is a luxury tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a tax to discourage the purchase of particular items which require certain materials, plant capacity and labour. I admit that they are not all luxuries.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Some of them may be, but these are not.

Mr. ILSLEY: Most of them are what are used by well-to-do people. The hon. gentleman says that he was not obliged to continue to use an electric stove.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not rise to find fault with the items in paragraph 6, but I wonder whether the minister has had his departmental officials estimate the number of employees who will be displaced by the reduced purchases of these articles. In the production of the articles in subparagraphs (a), (b), (c) and (d), at least 75 to 80 per cent of the labour is female. I am acquainted with these factories and I know that the assemblers of these articles are girls. Is it intended that they are to be displaced so that they can be absorbed into munition plants? If so, I have no objection.

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot give any estimate, but the hon. gentleman must remember that retail store sales have been increasing quite rapidly on account of the large amount of money in circulation in the country. It is not a question of getting these sales much below their present level; it is more a question of preventing an undue expansion of demand for those articles which require materials, plant capacity and labour which could be devoted to other purposes.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: If a tax of 25 per cent is to be placed on slot machines, what tax will be put on Florida strawberries?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is a poser.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like an answer.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am speaking from memory but I believe the tax on Florida strawberries is 10 per cent. Then there is an exchange disadvantage of another 10 per cent. In addition, there are fixed valuations which are applied when strawberries enter the country at a time when our own strawberries are in production.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They have none to ship then.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: If the hon. member will be quiet, I can take care of this.

Mr. ILSLEY: Then there is a war exchange tax of 10 per cent. Even if we leave out the fixed valuation, there is a tax of 30 per cent on strawberries.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I do not claim to be a moralist, but if there is a tax of only 25 per cent on United States pin games or United States skin games or any other kind of games, why should strawberries and other fruits and vegetables be allowed into this country without paying any tax? In probably the best speech that he ever made in this house the leader of the opposition referred to trash, but these skin games are being allowed to come in.

Mr. ILSLEY: I find the hon. gentleman's question rather difficult to answer. There is a tax of 25 per cent on slot machines when manufactured in this country, but they are prohibited entry from the United States.

Mr. GREEN: There is one item in this group which I suggest might very well be dropped from this legislation; that is, electric light globes. There may be some argument as to whether electric stoves are luxuries, but there cannot be any argument that an electric light globe is anything but a necessity for nearly every home in Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: The bulbs are not taxed.

Mr. GREEN: What is meant by globes?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is the covering for the bulb; the bulb itself is not taxed.

Mr. GREEN: The minister is quite definite that the word "globe" does not cover what ordinarily is called a globe?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. HATFIELD: Food choppers and mixers are not luxuries. They are used in every fox ranch and hennery in the country and they should not be included in this list.

Mr. NICHOLSON: While these commodities are luxuries for 90 per cent of the people whom I represent, I still feel that if there is a shortage of the materials used to manufacture these commodities, the minister is not going about the restriction of consumption in the right way. The last time I spoke in the house I had in my hands one of our well known magazines, and in it were several double-page advertisements urging people to buy these commodities. Unless the minister is prepared to give definite direction to the Canadian people, legislation to increase the price is not going to serve the purpose he has in mind. I think a more definite lead should be given the Canadian people. It should be pointed out that they are consuming commodities which are urgently needed for our war effort.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a question of method, and we have taken the least arbitrary method.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Has any direction been given to the manufacturers and the advertising agencies in Canada as to not carrying these attractive advertisements?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I do not think so. It must be remembered that we are not under a dictatorship; we have a parliamentary democracy here, and there is still a considerable degree of freedom in the country. There is a huge number of people in business in Canada, and we cannot be interfering in their business all the time. We have to lay down some general principles and ask them voluntarily to help us carry on this war, and we impose taxes that will steer them towards that end.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister will admit, however, that from time to time we are being more and more regimented. That was a favourite expression of his leader in days gone by. We are certainly being regimented in Canada, and this is just another example of it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Much more regimentation is necessary in war than in peace.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Granting that it is necessary to establish general principles, what we are trying to do now is to see that those principles will be applied by the steps proposed to be taken. The purpose of this taxation is not so much revenue producing as to conserve material and labour to produce more needed articles. If that be true and we are going to try to restrict the number of automobiles and radios sold, would we not be further ahead by prohibiting altogether the manufacture of certain articles that have no social value, so as to allow people to purchase more of other articles at a lower cost? I refer, for instance, to slot machines. What possible social value have they? Surely we are not going to allow people to continue to produce slot machines when, in order to get the material to make slot machines, we must do with less materials for cars and radios, which in the rural sections are an absolute necessity of life. We would be further ahead to stop altogether the manufacture of slot machines and other objectionable gambling machines and use the materials that go into their manufacture to produce radios, automobiles and goods of that kind. If the minister's object is to conserve labour and material, I suggest that instead of a 25 per cent excise tax on slot machines he entirely prohibit their manufacture for the duration of the war, so that the materials that go into their manufacture can be used for the production of articles that have some social value.

Mr. ILSLEY: The suggestion will be considered. There are prohibitions from time to time. I would point out that the description includes slot-vending machines which are not necessarily gambling machines. I do not think very many of them are made in Canada. They are practically all imported and now their importation will be prohibited.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Even the vending machines have not very much social value. People can still buy what they want at the local stores. If you want to buy peanuts you are not limited to buying them from a machine.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think the actual prohibition of the manufacture of the very few that are made is very important. If it were of importance it could be considered. It would not be such a difficult step to take.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: As I understand it, the government is trying to conserve technical and scientific labour. I also understand, having played these slot machine games—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And lost.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: —and lost, that they are of a most scientific nature. I cannot understand why we permit these machines to come into Canada and prohibit the importation of other articles. I would ask the minister, instead of merely imposing a 25 per cent excise tax, to consider prohibiting entirely the importation of slot machines or any other article that requires labour which could be utilized in winning the war.

Mr. CHURCH: In the matter of electrical fixtures is any distinction going to be made between fixtures bought by a privately-owned utility and those bought by a publicly-owned utility giving the consumer power and all other services at cost? The hydro-electric system in Ontario operates at cost; commercial and domestic consumers get current at actual cost. Hydro pays no dividends like the privately-owned utilities. In my opinion a distinction should be made between the two, especially since the working classes are large consumers of electric power supplied by the publicly-owned system. These candles may be used for street lighting, for commercial and domestic lighting, and the principle of the whole tariff has always been to give the benefit to the publicly-owned utility. which is supplying power at cost for the artisan, the farmer and the industrial worker. I do not think that principle should be changed. Is there any difference in the treatment accorded publicly- and privately-owned plants?

Mr. ILSLEY: From what I could gather, the hon. member is speaking of the taxing of electrical energy and power, which is not dealt with in this resolution. If I am wrong about that, I wish he would let me know.

Mr. CHURCH: A tax of 25 per cent is a pretty heavy charge on a system supplying power at cost.

Mr. GREEN: I think the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) had in mind lights for city streets and matters of that kind.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not clear just what his question referred to. It may have been that he was suggesting that if these articles are bought by publicly-owned utilities instead of private companies, the tax should not apply. I do not think we would be justified in making that distinction. In some places the two systems are in competition. I do not know the ground for making such a distinction.

Mr. GREEN: Would cities, for instance, have to pay the tax on the fixtures they get for street lighting?

Mr. ILSLEY: The standards are not in this list, but the shades are, and they are taxable. There would be no exemption for a city. The tax is on the manufacturer, and he adds the tax, no matter to whom he sells.

Mr. GLADSTONE: The effect of this 25 per cent tax may or may not be to reduce the use of the articles specified. The minister hopes that the increased prosperity of the country on account of war activities may keep the purchase of these articles up to normal.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not say I hoped that, but I thought that would probably happen.

Mr. GLADSTONE: If there should be a heavy reduction in the use of these articles, individual industries and the working people engaged in those industries in a small community might be seriously affected. Certain war industries are being set up in the larger industrial centres, and the call goes out for skilled workmen. The call comes to these small communities where skilled workmen are released from industries that have been affected by this higher tax. I should like to know if the Department of Finance has already taken up or will take up with the Department of Munitions and Supply the necessity of safeguarding small communities which are entirely dependent upon an industry that may be almost put out of business through the imposition of this tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: If a situation arises which deserves attention, attention will be given to it. That is the best I can say.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no question that the point which the hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Gladstone) has made is an important one. If this has the effect which the minister anticipates, namely, the reduction of the sale of all these different articles—and I imagine that the total quantity sold in a given year is substantial—some unemployment will result. The sale will be cut down, consequently employment will be reduced, and there is not any compensation at all. That is what the hon. gentleman is referring to; and the minister takes that risk when he puts through this class of taxation and legislation.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to add just one further word in connection with a question I asked the minister earlier. I have now had time to study the various items. Nearly everything mentioned in these schedules is manufactured in my riding. Many of the largest plants in Canada are in my constituency, manufacturing many of these articles: phonographs, broadcast receiving sets, electric and gaslight fixtures, household electrical or gas appliances such as water heaters and refrigerators, and such household electrical appliances as irons and ironers, washing machines, garbage disposal units, floor waxers and polishers; also grills, portable humidifiers, and so forth.

I have been making a mental calculation from memory of the number of young women employed in these various factories manufacturing these lines of material, and I think I can say that there are not less than five thousand so employed. If what the minister said at the beginning, namely, as I took it down, that one of the objects of these schedules is to discourage the buying of these items, then, supposing that buying is discouraged by only 25 per cent, this would mean that within a reasonable length of time 25 per cent of five thousand, or twelve hundred and fifty young women, will be thrown out of work. If they are reemployed in shell-making and fuse-making factories, some of which are located in my riding and are increasing in size, and in other branches of war industry, I have no objection. I have been wondering whether this has been taken into consideration—the numbers of female help that will be thrown out of work if my calculation that it will affect twelve hundred and fifty in my riding is approximately correct. I hope that such unemployment, if it occurs, would be only temporary, and that as war production plants increased, all such labour would be reemployed, but it will mean hardship for them for a time.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would say to the hon. member that the 25 per cent here mentioned is reckoned on the manufacturer's price, not on the retail price, and that makes the tax lighter than might be thought at first blush, because the manufacturer's price in many instances is very much lower than the retail price.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is 50 per cent, though, anyway.

Mr. ILSLEY: In the case put by my hon. friend, if without these taxes the demand for these particular goods would be increased by, let us say, 30 per cent, and the imposition of the taxes has the effect of discouraging purchases—

Mr. MacNICOL: I hope the minister is right.

Mr. ILSLEY: —to the extent of 25 per cent—

Mr. MacNICOL: Then, it would not make any difference.

Mr. ILSLEY: —then, employment has not been reduced at all.

Mr. MacNICOL: I hope the minister is right.

Mr. GREEN: Has the minister estimated what the increase in the retail price will be as a result of this 25 per cent tax? As I understand, the tax is levied on the manufacturer, and then of course there will be a mark up, perhaps as high as 50 or 100 per cent, of that manufacturer's price by the wholesaler and retailer.

Mr. ILSLEY: One would have to take it for every commodity; the discounts cover such a range; they are so much greater for one commodity than they are for others. But the hon. member will understand that the probability is that the increase in the retail price in many instances would not be 25 per cent. It should not be.

Mr. GREEN: Is it not apt to make the retail price 50 per cent higher?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, no. I would be very much astonished if anything of the kind occurred.

Mr. ESLING: I wonder whether the minister has given thought to the immediate effect on retail dealers and on salesmen employed by such dealers? I ask for this reason, that every general store in the country—every hardware store, every electrical store—now has a supply of these articles on hand. They employ salesmen to go practically from door to door. Because such articles are usually sold on the instalment plan, it is only by solicitation that people are induced to buy them; and it simply means that now they will not buy them and that thousands and thousands of retail salesmen, solicitors, are going to be out of jobs. The question is, will this curtailment compensate for the loss of labour in such ranks?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think that is just the subject we have been discussing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We take the risk of that; we are bound to take it.

Mr. SHAW: While we appreciate the difficulties confronting the minister and his advisers in devising forms of taxation, I am satisfied that, so far as taxes on electrical appliances are concerned, Canada should have been zoned into two broad zones.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): One to have it and one not to have it!

Mr. SHAW: I say that for this reason. Take Alberta as an example. We find that the people of Alberta pay an 8 per cent tax on the consumer cost of electricity; and also, the cost of electricity—that is the consumer's cost—is four or five times as high in Alberta as it is here in eastern Canada. Not only that, but most of these electrical appliances manufactured in Canada are made in the east, and with the ridiculous freight rate we are confronted with we find that we pay considerably more for these appliances than is paid by the people of Ontario and Quebec. So I suggest to the minister that we zone Canada into two broad zones, and that, so far as the tax on electrical appliances is concerned, it be made lower in so far as it applies to western Canada. I believe that the reasons are very evident. It may seem only a small matter, but if one takes into consideration all the appliances purchased and used in the west, plus the cost of all electricity used in western Canada, he will find that an unfair burden is being placed on the people in the western areas. I would ask the minister to give the matter consideration.

2. That any enactment founded on this resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on the second day of December, one thousand nine hundred and forty, and to have applied on all goods imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on or after that day and to have applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that day.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the minister be good enough to tell us why he has changed to the principle enunciated here, as distinct from the one he enunciated and carried through in the previous budget, that is to say, taxation of cars on the showroom floors? If that was just then, it is just now; if this is just now, then he ought to give back to the dealers of this country some money which the government took from them. It was done once before.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, I don't know.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is no excuse at all. I want to know what the principle is.

[Mr. Shaw.]

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think it is a question of the dealers at all. Let us take what we are doing this time. The tax is not being placed on the cars on the showroom floor. Let us say we had placed it on the cars on the showroom floor, as we did the last time; does not the competition between the dealers prevent any dealer from getting an unjust benefit?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think so. That is the weakest argument I ever heard.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not given the whole question the consideration it deserves, but does the hon. gentleman want me to argue that point out?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What I want to know is, why the change? It was done before against the protest of a great many members of the house. It was done years ago and the refund was made—perhaps it was before the minister's time—and it cost the country a great deal of money. Will the minister admit that he is right now and was wrong then? That would suit me.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; I should not like to do that.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Do I understand that there will not be an increase in the price of stocks in retail stores? What procedure will be followed to guarantee that there will not be an increase in these stocks?

Mr. ILSLEY: We are just relying on competition.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Will a penalty be imposed on retail merchants who charge an increased price?

Mr. ILSLEY: None is provided for.

Mr. GREEN: I have had a telegram from the motor dealers in Vancouver who feel they will be unjustly treated if the tax is applied as set out in the resolution. I will read the telegram and the minister can let me know if these people are correct in their assumption. It reads:

Fully attended meeting this association to-day strongly protested discrimination far western dealers in applying new tax to automobiles in transit unpaid. Many cars have been en route for ten or more days. Dealers nearer factory have benefit of quicker delivery and cheaper freight rate. Urge that all cars in transit prior December 2 be exempt also many of these cars already sold.

Vancouver Motor Dealers' Association.

Would it not be possible to provide, where cars were in transit on December 2, that the tax should not apply? This seems to be their suggestion.

Mr. ILSLEY: The question comes up every time we touch cars. This is the third time in my recollection. The principle that has been laid down and so far always adhered to is that when the manufacturer retains the right of disposal of a car by attaching his draft to the bill of lading, the car is regarded as being in the manufacturer's possession and not delivered until the draft is paid and the bill of lading taken by the consignee. That is a reasonable rule and one which we have to adhere to, because there must in time come a point somewhere where the car passes from the manufacturer to the dealer. If the dealer pays for the car in advance, or if the manufacturer does not retain the jus disponendi, then the car has passed into the hands of the dealer and is in his possession, and the tax does not apply. But it would not do for us to depart from the principle that has been adhered to year after year whenever taxes affecting cars have been imposed.

Mr. GREEN: This is a very heavy tax and there is a grave injustice to dealers operating as far away as the Pacific coast. Surely something could be done to right this wrong. There is no doubt they are correct when they say that they are penalized in the way of freight rates, and in many other respects, for being such a long way from the manufacturing centres. The government might very well consider their request under these particular circumstances. They say that some of the cars have already been sold. Surely, under such conditions the government should allow some leeway.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was going to ask the meaning of the words "or taken out of warehouse for consumption."

Mr. ILSLEY: That applies to imported goods. Importation is one thing and being taken out of warehouse for consumption is another. Goods may be imported, and may go into warehouse in bond and remain there until the duty is paid. This applies to goods that are taken out of warehouse for consumption on or after December 2.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was wondering whether there might not be a loophole with regard to the matter raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South.

Mr. ILSLEY: He was talking about a different matter. He was discussing domestically produced cars.

Mr. REID: I wish to support what the hon. member for Vancouver South has said. There is a great deal of merit in it. The representations that have been made to me are to the effect that most cars heading for the Pacific coast have already been purchased and are not being brought in on consignment, and the dealers are now faced with the necessity of saying to those who have purchased the cars, "We are sorry; we quoted you one price but now you will have to pay $90 or $100 more". It is a serious matter so far as British Columbia is concerned.

Mr. CASSELMAN (Edmonton East): I have received a similar protest from one big dealer in the city of Edmonton and I wish to be clear on this question. If I understood the minister correctly, the specific example was a carload of cars arriving on Monday morning, already contracted for, having been sold to the purchaser by the retail dealer. The deal was closed and that dealer did not know until eight o'clock that night, our time out there, that this tax was in effect. Do I understand that the retail dealer in Edmonton is not responsible for the tax but that it falls on the manufacturer?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that is correct. So far as we are concerned we look to the manufacturer if the draft is attached to the bill of lading, if the manufacturer retains control of the cars until they are taken delivery of in Edmonton.

Mr. CASSELMAN (Edmonton East): In that event there is this difficulty that the retail dealers find themselves in. The manufacturer says, "We did not know anything about it, and you, the dealer, will have to bear the tax or get it out of your purchaser". That is an unfortunate situation and I add my protest to those expressed by two other speakers. The matter should be reconsidered.

Mr. NICHOLSON: With reference to the point I raised a moment ago regarding increased prices, would the minister consider imposing a penalty for any increase in retail prices of stocks already being carried? An increase of 25 per cent will give the retailers a large margin.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not like to say that I will not consider anything, but I would point this out to the hon. member. The retailers are in competition. There is no combine among retailers, is there? Not among the retailers of Canada at any rate. They are in competition with one another in the sale of these articles and I should think that such competition would be an effective deterrent to profiteering. I hardly think, however, the government would be justified in imposing penalties or taking further steps. Some day these taxes are coming off, and in that event these retailers would have a claim against the government if we took a step of that kind now. I think it is just a situation where we shall have to rely on competition as far as retailers are concerned.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 2 carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I would ask my hon. friends if they would kindly not look at the clock, or at least refrain from calling the attention of the chairman to the hour. We would like to make some little progress, if possible. The senate, of course, will have to go over this legislation when it passes this house, and they have been waiting for these bills for two or three days. Of course I am in the hands of the committee, but if we could sit a little later to-night we might get the measures through a little sooner.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAR EXCHANGE CONSERVATION ACT, 1940

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to be called the War Exchange Conservation Act, 1940, and to provide—

1. That the importation into Canada of any goods enumerated and described in schedule one is prohibited except in such cases as the Minister of National Revenue in his discretion deems desirable and under and in accordance with the terms of a permit granted by him: Provided however that this prohibition shall not apply to—

(a) any goods imported from, and being of the growth, produce or manufacture of, any country within the sterling area or Newfoundland, except, at the discretion of the Minister of National Revenue, goods composed wholly or in part of silk;

(b) any goods which on or before the second day of December, 1940, were in transit to Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to make a few observations with respect to this matter. I made reference to it yesterday. Is there not some other method by which these exceptions could be handled? This measure provides that with regard to goods intended to be prohibited under this measure there may be exceptions in the discretion of the Minister of National Revenue, under the terms of a permit to be granted by him. This seems to me to be the wrong way to handle this matter. What would be the considerations that would actuate the minister in exercising his discretion and issuing a permit? What standards, what principles would he rely upon? Would every case be judged upon its own merits, or is there to be set up some standard which would guide the minister? I do not for a moment suggest that the present minister would abuse the exercise of his discretion, but this discretion is capable of great abuse, and it is bad legislation because of that fact. Certainly I object to the principle and spirit of this type of legislation. I dare say we have gone a long way beyond this in the delegation of power, but as far as I am concerned I am going to register an objection to the principle involved. I think we ought to deal with the matter in another way. Either we are going to keep out these goods, or we are not.

This prohibition does not apply to goods in transit, of course, so no question arises there. If we are going to keep out imports for the purpose the minister intends, that of conserving our foreign exchange, there should not be any loophole which would enable any friend of the government to come and say, "I must have this thing here." The minister might accede to the demand, while some man not so important, who would not be able to pull as many strings, may I say, would be denied the same right. That sort of thing does happen under party government; make no mistake about it. This is not exactly a war measure. It is a measure designed to aid the war effort, but it leaves too much power in the hands of the minister—any minister—and I object to the delegation of power to any minister which will give him authority to say that John Jones may have this article brought in while Tom Brown may not have it. That is wrong, and I believe the matter can be handled in some other way.

If the minister is really desirous of keeping out certain articles let him go the whole length. I assume that this will not apply to goods ordered legitimately and now in process of transit or even of manufacture. I would help out a man who had entered into a contract even though the goods were not actually in transit. But to say that the minister shall be entitled, on representations made to him, to give a permit to somebody to bring in something that it is intended by parliament shall be kept out for the duration of the war, while somebody else cannot obtain a permit, I submit is all wrong. If I argued the thing for an hour I could not put it any more concretely than that.

Mr. ILSLEY: I point out that with regard to part I the announced intention of the government is to prohibit all those items to everybody.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understand that, but still—

Mr. ILSLEY: That is part I, and that is the greater part.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But still there is the exception.

Mr. ILSLEY: I know, but the exception is designed to enable the minister to deal with part II, although it does not say so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If that is the intention, then I say the language is very unhappy. Nobody would give it that interpretation.

Mr. ILSLEY: Why not?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Later on it deals with part II, but under part I and schedule 1 the minister may, notwithstanding the prohibition of importation, make an exception and say that certain goods may come in. There is no doubt about the interpretation; the minister cannot put any other interpretation upon it. I am too old a bird to be caught by any line of reasoning like that.

Mr. ILSLEY: I want to repeat that it is the intention to deny licences to all importers of all goods in part I. I am free to confess, and I want to say this so that everyone will remember that I said it, that from time to time we may have to make changes by order in council. There is no use in our deluding ourselves about the possibility of that necessity arising. As a matter of fact, this whole thing could have been done by order in council, but we placed it before parliament because it is a matter of great importance and something upon which parliament should pass. But in time of war abundant powers are vested in the executive to do almost anything by order in council, and the government has to decide what steps must be taken from day to day. Parliament is not in session all the time, and it is necessary to do these things.

Certainly it is not the intention of the government to make any changes in principle, or any sweeping changes or anything like that, by order in council, but that may have to be done. I debated with myself whether I should put in this measure a provision giving power to the governor in council to amend this list, to add to or take away from it. I did not think I would do that, because already the government has that power under the War Measures Act, and I think perhaps they also have power in certain cases under the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act. I thought I ought to tell the committee and the house that in working this matter out it may be necessary as time goes on to make changes by order in council. I say that because when we meet again I do not want anybody to say, "Oh, well, after parliament got away there was an order in council put through altering one or two of these items." That might have to be done, but of course that is a different matter from the point raised by the hon. gentleman. He is talking about the discretion vested in the Minister of National Revenue. The intention as to the exercise of that discretion is that the Minister of National Revenue shall deny to all importers licences for the import of all the goods set out in schedule 1.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the general principle.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes—except those in transit. I understand the Minister of National Revenue has decided to give licences to importers who have placed orders for goods prior to December 2, such orders having been placed in good faith, and accepted. I believe that is being done, and I presume is being done in all these cases. But that is a matter for the Minister of National Revenue. There are a number of cases where not only have importers placed orders which have been accepted, but they have paid for the goods and have purchased letters of credit for them. That is the reason why there must be some discretion in the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, but the government can take care of those cases in the legislation, just as it can in respect of goods in transit.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And that is the way it ought to be done.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, if we can think of everything.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suggested that idea to the minister. It does not apply to goods in transit, and I suggested it should not apply to goods under contract which were not in transit. If that is the intention in this instance, then say so in the statute. The minister should say so in the resolution, just as he has with respect to goods in transit.

My point goes far beyond that. It comes to this, that there should not be vested in the minister power to issue a permit to an importer in respect of any one of these classes of goods which it is intended, in the general principle, shall be kept out. If we are proceeding on a proper principle, then six months hence no power should be given to bring goods in.

Then, with respect to the cases to which the minister has referred, I would say that that would simply be a matter of justice, and ought to be in the statutes. It could be easily placed there. In fact, I do not know why the draftsman did not put those in when he was putting in goods in transit. He could, by appropriate and apt expressions, provide for goods under contract, such as those to which the minister has referred, and to which I refer. That is the way it ought to be.

I object to the principle involved in this part of the resolution. I do not wish, however, to take time to argue it, because I am trying to get through. If I argued it all night I could not make it more emphatic than I have.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I believe this is the first time that the principle of giving a minister of the crown such discretion has ever been asked. It amounts to an abnegation of the right of parliament, as I see it. Already the governor in council has very wide powers under the War Measures Act. The minister says that the governor in council has the power to do that which is now being delegated to the minister. If this particular section is to cover only part I of schedule 1, I submit it should be so stated. The minister has said it is his intention and that of the government that the interpretation to be placed on this resolution is to make it applicable only to part I.

The minister will realize that the intention of the government will not be taken into consideration in the interpretation of the statute. I would suggest that at least in the first place part I be added to schedule 1, if the government insists upon passing the resolution as it now stands.

Second, I take objection to the wording. It says:

> That the importation into Canada of any goods enumerated and described in schedule one is prohibited except in such cases as the Minister of National Revenue in his discretion deems desirable—

And so on. I do not understand the use of the words "in such cases." Does that mean that the minister may say to one individual, "You may import certain goods," and to another individual, "You shall remain subject to the prohibitions in schedule 1." I do not think that can be the meaning of it.

If the meaning is that it refers to goods, and not to individuals, then I suggest that the words "in such cases" should be altered to read "for such goods." Generally speaking, I submit that this is one of the most flagrant delegations of power on the part of parliament to an individual minister that has been asked by this government. I suggest to the Minister of Finance that having the powers already, under the War Measures Act, to do that which he now wishes conferred upon the Minister of National Revenue, is sufficient. This is too great a delegation of power.

Mr. ILSLEY: The changing of the phrase "in such cases" to "for such goods" is perfectly all right, so far as part I is concerned, if the committee wishes so to do. It will be understood, of course, that no matter what the committee does or no matter how it is phrased, powers exist under the War Measures Act to go beyond or to repeal and go all round the statute. It is all very well for us to take great pains with the drafting, but those powers exist. They are not taken away.

So it comes to a question of trusting the governor in council but not trusting the minister. There may be a distinction there, but I do not think it is a valid one. I was going to say that the intention, so far as part I is concerned, is that all individuals will be treated exactly alike. That is, no individual in any particular period will be given a permit to import a certain class or kind of goods, and at the same time another individual be denied that permit. That will never be done under part I.

But under part II it may be necessary for that very thing to be done, depending upon the stock of goods, or the requirements of the person applying for the permit. Perhaps this could be torn to pieces in such a way as to tie it down a little more definitely as between these two parts of the act. Then, if it did not work in any particular we would have to alter it by order in council, under the War Measures Act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the draft bill follow the resolution?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I believe so.

Mr. GREEN: I can find no reference in the resolution to part II of schedule 1. Why is there not some reference? Why are there parts I and II; what is the difference?

Mr. ILSLEY: I explained exactly what we intended to do, and the different treatment we proposed to extend to goods under part II as compared with those under part I. Those under part I are prohibited goods. Those under part II are goods which are not prohibited, but concerning which permits are to be diminished, as time goes on.

Mr. GREEN: Tapered off.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, there is to be a gradual shutting off.

Mr. GREEN: Why is that not put in the resolution? Why is there no reference to part II in the resolution?

Mr. ILSLEY: I was just saying that if the committee wishes to have such reference, there would be no objection. It would really have no further control.

Mr. GREEN: Will it be in the bill?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There ought to be some redrafting, then. The minister suggests that even though the matter is dealt with in a stricter fashion, and the language is tied right down along the lines suggested, it could be overruled under the War Measures Act. Remember, this is a later statute, and if it is specific there might be a very nice conflict between those two statutes.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, no.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, yes. Have the law officers of the crown given consideration to that situation? The War Measures Act is a general law. This is a specific law. Parliament is legislating on a specific matter, and if this law fastens the interpretation specifically, then I suggest to the minister that the courts, in a proper case, would look into the matter very carefully. The specific legislation would override the general legislation which was passed subsequently.

Mr. ILSLEY: That would mean that all acts passed since the War Measures Act was passed in 1914 would be limited in their application by that act, and the hands of the government tied accordingly.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It raises a very nice legal point, but I am not going to give an expert opinion.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What impelled the government to ask for these powers when the governor in council had them already under the War Measures Act? They are being extended and granted to a minister of the crown.

Mr. ILSLEY: It was done out of respect for parliament. It was well understood by the government that this could be done under the War Measures Act. When the debate on the address ended two or three days ago the house could have been adjourned and then, any time after, we had the power to act under the War Measures Act, because if ever there was a war measure, this is one. We did not think, however, that would be acting in the true spirit of the constitution of this country. We thought that when parliament was here we ought to lay the matter before parliament and state what we intended to do. We must have wide and inflexible powers. It was thought we should tell parliament that we intended to take the powers and then work it out. As I say, parliament can wrestle over these clauses and tie the minister down a little tighter or make it clear that it is only in respect of one thing that he has certain powers and so on, but I do not think that is the thing to do as a practical matter. If we run into a situation which requires correction we may have to refer to the War Measures Act, and certainly we will refer to it in order to correct such a situation. If anyone finds that the government is being unjust, that it is treating a supporter differently from the manner in which it is treating someone who is not a supporter, then he will just have to bring the case to the attention of the government. That would be a disgraceful thing, and it will not happen.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I congratulate the minister upon having realized that it is time to get back to the authority and supremacy of parliament. We have gone too far in the other direction in Canada. I have been harping on this off and on for six months, and I am glad that we have made the government do this.

Mr. POULIOT: Do not make my speeches.

Mr. GREEN: Can the minister give the committee a rough idea of the total importations in the last fiscal year and how they will be affected by the two parts of schedule I, and also let us know from which different countries these importations came?

Mr. ILSLEY: The volume of imports from non-empire countries of goods covered by schedule 1, including the estimates in connection with items where records are not available, was $52,840,000 for part I, which can be termed the prohibited goods, and $71,150,000 for part II, the goods subject to licence. The annual loss in revenue resulting from schedule 1, part I, is estimated at $12,000,000 for customs duties and $5,000,000 for war exchange tax. No estimate is possible for the revenue loss which will result from part II of schedule 1. Imports from the United Kingdom of schedule 2 goods were valued at $13,343,000, on which a duty of $1,950,000 was collected in the calendar year 1939.

Mr. GREEN: How much will be collected under the changed schedules?

Mr. ILSLEY: Quite a number of the items are free from the United Kingdom.

Mr. GREEN: Can the minister give us the imports by countries, from the United States and Japan, for instance?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am sorry, but I have not that information.

Mr. GREEN: Could the minister have that for us to-morrow when we are considering the bill?

Mr. ILSLEY: If the hon. gentleman really wants it, although I cannot see the purpose of it myself.

Mr. GREEN: We should like to know the value of imports from the United States, Japan and other non-empire countries.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will get it. The prohibition applies to a whole lot of them.

Mr. GREEN: We want to see what is being shut out.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Is the title War Exchange Conservation Act a happy thought? Would not Foreign Exchange Conservation Act be better? I am not just clear as to what is meant by war exchange.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a war act.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It could be stated in the bill that it would terminate with the cessation of hostilities. In his speech the other day the minister referred to the possibility which we all must see of this prohibition of the entry of certain articles being likely to cause an increase in the price of similar articles produced in Canada. This legislation virtually amounts to protection for certain commodities and there is an immediate advantage to the manufacturers of those articles. I am sure that in drawing up this legislation the government must have had some specific steps in mind.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is covered by resolution 4.

Mr. ILSLEY: We take full powers in a later resolution to restrain them.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Would the minister prefer to leave the discussion of this until we come to resolution 4?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it would be better.

Resolution agreed to.

2. That notwithstanding anything contained in the preceding resolution, the Minister of National Revenue may, in his discretion, exempt any goods from the operation of the preceding resolution for such periods of time as he may deem desirable and notice of any such exemption shall be published in the Canada Gazette and the exemption shall take effect on and after the date of such publication or any later date fixed in such notice.

Resolution agreed to.

3. That for the purposes of these resolutions "sterling area" means the territories under the sovereignty, protection, suzerainty or mandate of His Majesty (except Canada, Newfoundland and Hong Kong) and such other territories whether or not under the sovereignty, protection, suzerainty and mandate of His Majesty as may be designated by the governor in council.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We will register the same objection and let it go at that.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the significance of including Hong Kong with the excepted countries?

Mr. ILSLEY: The currency of Hong Kong is not tied to sterling.

Resolution agreed to.

4. (1) That in the event of producers of goods taking advantage of the prohibition of imports to increase the prices of such goods to the consumer or to maintain such prices at levels deemed by the governor in council to be higher than should prevail, having regard to changes in the cost of production of such goods, the governor in council may, in addition to permitting entry of such goods, reduce or remove the duties of customs imposed upon such goods.

(2) That in the event of any such producer taking advantage of the prohibition of imports as aforesaid, the governor in council may impose upon all the products of such producer, or any of them, an excise tax equivalent to the amount of customs duty which would be paid by such goods if the same were imported into Canada under the provisions of the general tariff and the same shall be collectible as a tax, and the provisions of the Special War Revenue Act as to the collection of taxes shall be applicable thereto.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have an amendment to move to this resolution, as follows:

That the resolution of December 2, 1940, introducing a measure to be called the War Exchange Conservation Act, 1940, be amended by striking out resolution No. 4 and substituting therefor the following:

"4. (1) That in the event of any person taking advantage of the prohibition of imports to increase the prices of goods to the consumer or to maintain the prices of such goods at levels deemed by the governor in council to be higher than should prevail, having regard to changes in the cost of production of such goods, the governor in council may, in addition to permitting entry of such goods, reduce or remove the duties of customs imposed upon such goods.

(2) That in the event of any person taking advantage of the prohibition of imports as aforesaid, the governor in council may, for such period of time as he may determine, impose, levy and collect upon all the products of such person or any of them, an excise tax of 25 per cent of the sale price thereof payable by such person at the time of delivery of such goods to the purchaser thereof and the provisions of the Special War Revenue Act as to the collection of taxes imposed by Part XIII of the said act shall be applicable thereto."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The change is from "producers" to "any person". The resolution is being made all-inclusive, whereas before it was just confined to producers.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct. The reason for this amendment is that the original resolution was taken verbatim from section 17 of the customs tariff. The amended wording should accomplish the purpose of this resolution rather more effectively.

The amendment will enable the government to proceed against any person, whereas section 17 applied only to producers of goods. It also provides for an excise tax of 25 per cent on the sale price of the goods, whereas under section 17 the tax is equivalent to the amount of customs duty which would be paid by such goods if imported into Canada under the general tariff.

These prohibitions relate to goods some of which are free. We just made a mistake there when we provided for imposing customs duty as a penalty.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is the first time I remember hearing the minister admit making a mistake..

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I move the amendment, Mr. Chairman, that has been read by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. COLDWELL: Before that is put, I raise again the point I raised yesterday. Instead of this procedure being followed, I think it would be better if the house enacted that the prices of goods shall remain at the prices in existence say on the 2nd day of December, and in the event of producers desiring an increase in prices on account of changed conditions they shall make application to the war-time prices and trade board, which will consider the application.

I do not think the method suggested by the government is sufficiently effective. I believe that we should stabilize prices as of, say the 2nd day of December, and then in the event of changed conditions an application may be made to the proper board for consideration of a proposed price increase. I think that suggestion should be considered. I believe it would be much more satisfactory to the public who already feel that some price increases have been permitted. It is difficult for the general public to appeal to a board, whereas a producer who felt he was penalized by changed conditions could easily make application and get consideration of his case. I want to place that point of view before the minister.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would suggest to the minister that my hon. friend, I think, has not thought his suggestion clear through. If prices were pegged as of December 2, it might work a great hardship if costs of production were increased by abnormal conditions.

Mr. COLDWELL: The producer could apply to the board.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is regimentation. A price increase might be justified by increased costs of production or by other factors. I think my hon. friend's suggestion would not be workable. I prefer the penalty.

Mr. ILSLEY: On some occasion, I cannot remember when, because it was not in my department, I had a discussion with the war-time prices and trade board as to the two methods they might follow. One was to make a stand-still order on prices and to let everyone apply for an increase in prices. The objection to that was that the board would be swamped with applications. That plan would not be administratively possible. There are a great many prices in Canada and a great many people charging prices.

Mr. COLDWELL: They are doing that in Great Britain.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know about that.

Mr. COLDWELL: That, I understand, is their method.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is a question of principle involved.

Mr. ILSLEY: The civil service required to attend to that effectively would be very extensive because the ramifications are tremendous. The board could not with any sense of responsibility be issuing permissions to increase prices unless they went into the matter carefully because every increase in price that persons could persuade the board to permit them to make would be justified by the authority of the board. The board would be cited as the reason why the price was increased. It was therefore considered much more desirable for the board to require everybody to report to them when they intended to increase prices or when they did increase prices, and for the board to get a reasonably large staff which, if they saw any price increase which prima facie appeared to be unwarranted or unreasonable, would investigate and require the person increasing the price to justify it. That was considered a much more practical way, and I think it is. I do not think there has been much complaint about it either. I believe it has worked well.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): There is a danger on the other hand that the public may get swamped. There are two provisions in resolution 4. First, if it is discovered that a man is taking advantage of this measure of protection, the prohibition will be removed. But if it is removed, the whole purpose of the legislation, which is to conserve exchange, will be defeated. Therefore that rules the first out, because it would defeat the purpose of the measure.

Mr. ILSLEY: Only for that item.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes, but what if the same thing happens in connection with other items? The government's measure will no longer be operative.

The second provision is that where a person has been found to be taking advantage of the prohibition of imports, the 25 per cent excise tax will be applied. But would a 25 per cent excise tax be sufficient to offset the advantage of an industry that is now given a complete monopoly by virtue of the fact that certain lines of goods from non-empire countries are completely shut out? The 25 per cent tax may not be a sufficient penalty to offset the protection they are going to enjoy. I do not think in either case the minister is giving us sufficient assurance that prices will be kept at a moderate figure and that advantage will not be taken of this virtual monopoly which is now going to be given to certain industries in Canada.

May I point out further that we do not know what machinery will be set up to decide whether or not an industry or a particular firm is taking advantage of the situation. Who will decide, for example, and inform the governor in council that a certain producer is taking advantage of the prohibition of imports? Will it be the Department of National Revenue or the war-time prices and trade board?

Mr. ILSLEY: The government holds itself free to use any agency it wishes.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Or none at all.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend does not give other Canadians as much credit as he should. That is his trouble. I have listened to him a great many times. He feels that people who have a chance to make a lot of money are going to do it. He goes on that principle. But there are such things as public opinion and patriotism in this country, and such things as a sense of decency and a sense of responsibility on the part of the government of the country, and all these things work together at a time like this.

I have seen people under the pressure of public opinion here and there in connection with government activities, and they want to do the right thing. They want their fellow Canadians to feel that they are doing the right thing. They want to do it in their own interests, in the interests of their reputation, and in the interests of the way they and their families will be treated. There is not just this one narrow idea of gouging the last cent out of people all the time. All these factors I have mentioned are going to work together.

In the national revenue department I found that 95 per cent of the sales taxpayers—the sales tax was the largest—were honest, and there was only about 5 per cent with whom we had any trouble. Most of these taxpayers were honest and decent. I do not anticipate that there is going to be any mad rush to put prices up to the limit behind the shelter of this prohibition. If there is, we shall hear about it; do not make any mistake. When a person sells goods, somebody buys the goods; it is well known when people begin profiteering, and we can get after them and in various ways take action to see that they bring their prices down. We have not, I admit, set up any machinery here, but we have left ourselves free to use any agency or all agencies. If there is any profiteering out of this, we shall hear of it and we shall do something about it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister has certainly strengthened the resolution. Does he say that these provisions are adequate to maintain a decent standard of prices without profiteering? If the minister believes that, and the government intends to carry it on that way, I am quite satisfied. They must use any agency they can use; I agree with that statement.

Mr. KINLEY: Really we are only prohibiting the import of these goods from non-sterling countries?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. KINLEY: Practically everything which is on the list can be imported from one or other of the empire countries?

Mr. ILSLEY: A great many of them.

Mr. KINLEY: There is that competition. How can we fix the price when we do not know what the cost will be from empire countries? It is not a complete prohibition. It is only a prohibition from certain countries; that is all.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is true.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): May I point out to the minister that he is not altogether consistent. I have as much faith, I think, as he has in human nature and in my fellow Canadians. But the minister himself says that it is the five per cent who have always spoiled it for the other ninety-five per cent, and when, just a few minutes ago, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar suggested to the minister that we should fix the prices as from a certain date and the onus would be on those who felt justified to make an application, the minister said that there would be so many applications that we would be swamped, that it would take a tremendous amount of administrative machinery to handle all the innumerable cases of persons who would be applying to have prices increased.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, legitimately in most cases.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That is the very point. If there is that large number of people in Canada who will think that the situation warrants an increase in price, there is all the more reason why some machinery should be set up to deal with the matter and see whether or not that increase is justified.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend is certainly not talking with his customary clearness of mind, is he? The fact that a great many applicants would make applications does not mean that they would be taking an unjust advantage of the act at all. I would anticipate thousands and perhaps tens of thousands of applications on legitimate grounds. They would all have to be checked, and there would be an extensive civil service to check these legitimate applications. Is there any inconsistency in what I said? I cannot see it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes. The minister says that there is a great deal of decency in Canada and that there are a great many people who are not going to gouge out the last dollar. That is true. But the minister also knows that there was war profiteering in days gone by. The story of the last war is filled with it. The minister knows that the cost of living has risen. The minister belongs to a party which for half a century in this country has always said that the moment you give to the country a large measure of protection, you give to a small class an opportunity to exploit the public, and that is why they have talked about freedom of trade and have been opposed to high protection. But this is high protection of the very highest sort, because it is a complete embargo on certain goods. And we ask the minister to give us some assurance that, when this is applied, the public interest will be protected and the consumer will not be exploited.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. I will give that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Before the resolution as amended carries, I should like to say a word in commendation of the minister's department, on the ground that I believe they have exercised their powers wisely, with restraint and effectiveness. There have been rises in prices in Canada, but no such extravagant prices as were registered in the last war. I would say that on the whole the increases have been justified from the producers' point of view, although they have been painful to the consumers, and before very long adjustments will have to be made on behalf of the consumers.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is the Minister of Labour who should be congratulated.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Well, I don't know. These boards are becoming so bewildering that it is impossible for a person to keep track of them without a guide; but let the credit go to whomsoever it should go. The work has been well done.

But there is one matter which I wish to draw to the minister's attention. The other day, when we were discussing the application of the principles of social credit, we came to the question of price.

The committee will remember how almost hysterical the minister became when he envisaged all the spies in every shop and the tremendous regimentation and all that. He is now confronted with the same kind of problem, and he says, "Well, wherever there is a salesman there is going to be a buyer, and we will hear about it." I would just suggest to the minister—

Mr. ILSLEY: We were talking about rationing—price-fixing and rationing.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I would just suggest to the minister that the next time he meditates such references to the principles of social credit and the just price as he made the other day—which I have not had an opportunity to answer, but which I am going to answer some of these days—he should just go back and read this fine statement he made in reply to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. He will then discover that this matter of controlling price is not an insuperable problem, that when the problem is attacked with scientific skill and determination, and on certain scientific principles, it can be controlled, and without a whole lot of spies too. I thought I would just make that comment because I believe the minister needs it.

Amendment agreed to.

Resolution, as amended, agreed to.

5. (1) That goods enumerated and described in schedule two, the growth, produce or manufacture of the United Kingdom, when imported into Canada in a manner and under conditions which entitle such goods to entry under the British preferential tariff of Canada, shall be exempt from the rates of duty set out in schedule A to the Customs Tariff and shall, in lieu thereof, be subject to the rates of duty set out in schedule two.

(2) That any enactment founded on this resolution shall apply to all goods enumerated and described in schedule two imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on or after the second day of December, 1940, and to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before the said date.

Resolution agreed to.

6. That the governor in council in order to increase Canada's supply of foreign exchange may, on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance, enter into agreements with individuals, partnerships or corporations to grant assistance by way of special tax credits and/or special allowances for depreciation or depletion under the Income War Tax Act and The Excess Profits Tax Act, if, in the opinion of the governor in council, such assistance is necessary in order that an expansion of the exports of any individual, partnership or corporation receiving such assistance may take place.

Mr. REID: Regarding resolution 6, I have one suggestion to make to the minister which I believe has a double merit. I believe that if it were carried out it would create more Canadian credit in the United States and would also provide a certain amount of further employment in this country. The facts we received a few days ago were to the effect that some $200,000,000 of Canadian gold had been produced in Canada, came through the mint, was sent to the United States, sold in that country and held in deposit to our credit. In view of the monetary policy of the United States in that, in 1934, they agreed to accept silver as well as gold, I suggest to the minister that he give some consideration to using our silver as well as our gold, and have the silver go through the mint and be sold to the United States and held there also as Canadian credit.

I am not going to-night into the question of monetary reform, but so long as there are individuals and banks holding to the old idea about gold and silver, we should take full advantage of that and start again our silver mines. We produced last year in Canada well over 20,000,000 ounces of silver. It was sold by private individuals, and a great deal of the value of the silver remains in the United States to the credit of United States interests. Last year the United States purchased something like 341,000,000 ounces of silver, 281,000,000 ounces of which came from foreign countries. Altogether, the United States have acquired about two and a half billion ounces of silver; and might I draw this to the attention of hon. members, that the world's supply of gold is estimated at approximately $28,000,000,000, of which the United States hold $23,000,000,000. I mention that merely in passing, in an endeavour to point out that there must be some readjustment before very long, because the United States will soon own all the world's supply of gold, and perhaps the greater proportion of its silver.

Only the other day it was pointed out that Australia had sold 8,000 tons of flour to China, receiving silver in payment, which I understand has since gone to Great Britain. If Australia can do business like that why cannot we? Our silver mines are idle and hundreds of men could be put to work. The President of the United States still has the power to fix or to alter the price either of gold or of silver. I would point out that when the millers here are protesting the processing tax, it is interesting to note that the wheat growers of Australia are receiving less for their wheat than the growers in Canada, in terms of Canadian dollars, while flour there is very much cheaper than it is in Canada. There is something wrong there. According to the latest figures, the price of wheat here is 73¼ cents on the Winnipeg market while our flour is sold at from $3.90 to $4 a barrel, whereas in Australia the price to the farmer is from 52 to 60 cents a bushel while flour there is sold, as it is abroad, at something like $2.90 a barrel. Compare $2.90 with $3.90 and $4 charged here. I am quoting the exact figures as given by the latest bulletin, the barrel being 196 pounds. I am giving the straight comparison in Canadian funds and under similar conditions.

My purpose in rising was to point out something that we are overlooking, namely, that the sale of our silver to the United States would enable us to acquire considerable credit there and at the same time put many hundreds of people to work.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is nearly midnight and resolution 6 has a great many implications. I think we had better adjourn, and I suggest that to-morrow the minister make a statement—I have no doubt he has one ready—as to the implications of this resolution. I am beginning to realize all that it does imply, although I can only visualize a part of it now. We ought to be told frankly all that is intended by the administration with respect to resolution 6.

Mr. COLDWELL: We have not yet passed resolution 5.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, we have.

Mr. COLDWELL: Resolutions 4 and 5 were called so quickly.

Mr. ILSLEY: Resolution 5 was called.

Mr. COLDWELL: I understood the hon. member for New Westminster was discussing resolution 5.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, resolution 6.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think resolution 5 should stand.

Mr. ILSLEY: Can it not be taken up on the bill?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It can be discussed on the bill.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): To add to what the leader of the opposition has said, I would say that resolution 6 involves a matter of tremendous importance. As I gathered from the minister's remarks, the sum involved is equal almost to the gold production of Canada; that is to say, dividends and interest payments due in the United States are of a magnitude almost equal to Canada's gold export to that country. The sum involved is some $200,000,000, a figure that astounds me. It is of tremendous moment to Canada, and when the minister makes his statement to-morrow I hope he will not shut the door on the idea that in the United States at the present time there is not only a vast volume of public opinion, but a sentiment in the hearts of United States citizens who are the recipients of dividends and interest payments on their Canadian investments, that perhaps they should not take the last pound of flesh from the Canadian people in the form of foreign exchange to pay these dividends. They are to a great degree of opinion that confidence is so high in the future possibilities of Canada, taking a long-range view over a period of many years, and visualizing the position of this dominion in world economic affairs, that directors and investors might be advised that it would be well to plough back into Canadian industry the dividends which they are receiving from their capital investments in Canada—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Or into Canadian war loan.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): —in order to help to liquidate the position of their business in Canada, so that in turn United States investors might more and more expand their interests here and develop our resources and, from the long-range point of view, receive in the course of years more and more from their investments in this country.

I am not one who is prone to suggest that we should arbitrarily declare that dividends from United States investments in Canada should not be exported. That is an arbitrary position to take and it is perhaps not good business. But when the minister makes his statement on resolution 6, I can well believe that those who have investments here will appreciate the point that it would be good business for them to expand working capital in our Canadian industries, in their Canadian investments, rather than force us to buy United States exchange to pay these dividends.

Let me put it this way. I know cases to-day of estates, individual recipients of hard cash, who are living off the interest that they are receiving from dividends which they had previously earned and left in the business, first, to assist working capital and, second, to expand that business, so that their families in days to come may receive more dividends or, if they want to expand their business still further, receive more interest on dividends.

Perhaps my hon. friends to my left will hardly understand how folks could live off interest or dividends, but it is being done in Canada to-day, and in this war emergency and the feeling that is in the hearts and minds of our United States cousins at the present time, perhaps they would not like this government to stop the export of dividends. But in my opinion they would be very happy to leave those dividends in Canada, to expand their interests here and develop our natural resources, so that generations to come might obtain the benefits of the expansion which would occur if the working capital of these companies were helped out by holding the dividends here, and they perhaps could receive the interest from those dividends later. Therefore I hope that when the minister makes his statement to-morrow he will give some thought to the possibility of encouraging a movement of that kind, rather than look to the position into which we may be forced within the next twelve months, of stopping the export of dividends, because his words will be recorded in the New York Journal of Commerce.

Mr. ILSLEY: As far as I can see, that subject is not dealt with under this resolution. I thought the statement the leader of the opposition asked me to make was under resolution 6 of this resolution, which to my mind deals with an entirely different matter. As I understand it, the subject about which the hon. gentleman has been talking is quite away from resolution 6. If hon. gentlemen opposite see some deep meaning in this that I do not see, I wish they would tell me.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Under resolution 6 as I understand it, the minister is empowered to enter into agreements to grant assistance by way of special tax credits or special allowances for depreciation or depletion if such assistance is considered necessary in order that an expansion of the exports of any individual, partnership or corporation receiving such assistance may take place.

Mr. ILSLEY: It has nothing to do with the movement of dividends.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I would like the minister, in making these agreements, to keep definitely in mind the idea I have tried to enunciate, with regard to those of our United States cousins who are doing a very considerable business here, with the idea of conserving exchange from any dividends which may arise from the conduct of such business.

Progress reported.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 8, to amend the Special War Revenue Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Vien in the chair.

Mr. STIRLING: Before we proceed in the committee stage, the undertaking having been given that we would sit until twelve o'clock, surely it would be desirable to defer this stage until to-morrow.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): If it is the desire of my hon. friend, of course we will report progress. Our idea was to send this to the senate to-morrow afternoon, but if my hon. friend has the slightest objection to sitting any longer, that is quite all right.

Progress reported.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I desire to thank hon. members of the committee for their kind cooperation, and I move that the house do now adjourn.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 12.10 a.m. (Friday).

Friday, December 6, 1940.

The house met at three o'clock.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

STATEMENT AS TO TABLING OF AGREEMENTS WITH BRITISH GOVERNMENT RESPECTING BACON

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, may I say to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) that, if I may be permitted to do so later in these proceedings, I shall lay on the table the agreement in connection with bacon and a memorandum in regard to it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will copies be immediately available?

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

MESSAGE OF PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT TO SEAWAY AND POWER CONFERENCE—ENGINEERING PROBLEMS IN INTERNATIONAL SECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. C. CASSELMAN (Grenville-Dundas): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). In view of President Roosevelt's message to the Great Lakes seaway and power conference yesterday, in which he is reported to have emphasized, among other things, "that the St. Lawrence project would provide millions in new horsepower urgently needed to speed up defence production," will the Prime Minister make a statement outlining in general terms the progress that has been made from the Canadian standpoint with respect to the scheme advocated by the Canadian representatives on the joint board as between (a) a single-stage development, (b) a double-stage development, (c) a controlled single-stage, or other scheme?

Will the Prime Minister also state what is the attitude of the government with respect to the seaway proposal, and whether opportunity will be given to those whose property will be adversely affected by the choice of scheme to present their views?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend advised me of his intention to ask the question he has. I had anticipated that some question would be asked with respect to the important message which the President of the United States issued yesterday through Mr. Berle in connection with a great lakes seaway and power conference which is being held in Detroit. I have therefore come prepared to make a brief reply to my hon. friend.

The house has already been advised through the correspondence tabled on November 12 of the agreement reached between the government of Canada and the government of the United States, regarding additional diversion of water for power purposes at Niagara and the appointment of committees to carry on the necessary additional engineering investigations in the international rapids section of the St.

Lawrence. The diversion has been made at Niagara and the power development is being utilized for Canadian industry. The committees appointed by the two governments have been actively at work in the study and analysis of the engineering problems in the international section.

As regards the wider questions involved in the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence development, it will be recalled that the Niagara convention of 1929 and the St. Lawrence treaty of 1932 failed to obtain the approval of the United States senate, and the negotiations were later resumed with a view to the possibility of combining the projects in a revised single agreement. Delegations of officials appointed by the two governments met in Ottawa and in Washington last January and the problems involved have continued to receive consideration by both governments. Those negotiations will be continued. Any agreement resulting from the negotiations will, of course, be submitted to this house for approval in due course. I have earlier indicated that any such agreement on this subject would not be brought before the Canadian parliament until it had received the approval of the appropriate United States authorities.

As I have already indicated, the committees appointed by the two governments are continuing their study of the engineering problems in the international section. They have not yet completed or reported upon their work, and no final decision has therefore been taken as to the details of the development in this section. The project under consideration, as I stated a few days ago, is a controlled single-stage development, which differs from either the single-stage development or the double-stage development that was under consideration some ten years ago. On January 25 last the following statement as to the character of the project under discussion was issued after the conference of officials of the two governments:

> The engineering advisers of the two governments have reached substantial agreement on the feasibility and desirability of a project in the international rapids section of the St. Lawrence river which would involve a main dam in the vicinity of Barnhart island, with a power house in each country, and a control dam upstream. This project is based upon a plan which was discussed in some detail in the 1926 report of the joint board of engineers. The engineers of the two countries are in agreement that such a project is sound from an engineering standpoint, cheaper in cost than the project on which the 1932 treaty was based, and affords full protection for all the interests in the various sections of the St. Lawrence river.

My hon. friend the member for Grenville-Dundas has inquired whether opportunity will be given to those whose property will be adversely affected by the choice of scheme, to present their views. Any scheme for development naturally affects some adjoining property. This was of course true of the project embodied in the treaty which was negotiated by the government of the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett in 1932. At the appropriate time the present government will be quite prepared to receive representations from those whose property will be adversely or, for that matter, beneficially affected.

Mr. CASSELMAN (Grenville-Dundas): Did the Prime Minister make it clear that the agreement would first be submitted to the United States senate?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: To the proper authorities in the United States, yes.

Mr. CHURCH: Will any agreement arrived at be reported to parliament before action is taken?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Parliament will have to approve of any agreement.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I direct the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that no reference was made in his statement to the seaway aspect of this matter. I understood up to yesterday that the question of navigation was in the discard, but according to the president's statement of yesterday the navigation aspect has been brought back to life.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is impossible to separate the development of the seaway from the power project. The two are interlinked; the one affecting power and navigation necessarily affects the other. Our purpose in seeking agreement is to provide that all phases of the question may be considered at one and the same time.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask the Prime Minister if this government has been notified by the United States of the recent order of the United States supreme court permitting Chicago to divert another 3,500 cubic feet per second for dilution purposes, increasing the dilution diversion to 5,000 cubic feet per second, the equivalent of the amount of water that will be poured later into lake Superior from northern Ontario? I should like to know also if this government has under consideration any means to control the level of the three centre great lakes. With another 5,000 cubic feet per second being diverted at Niagara, and this 5,000 cubic feet per second being diverted at Chicago, the lake levels are going down six inches.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: About a fortnight ago I rather anticipated that my hon. friend would bring up this question and I had a full statement prepared in connection with the order the United States supreme court had made. I shall send him the statement, but speaking from memory at the moment I would say that the order was to provide means of meeting a rather serious immediate sewage problem in one of the United States cities. The order took cognizance of the problem. The statement of the court however helped to emphasize the permanency of the arrangement for controlling the level of the waters in the lakes, about which my hon. friend is concerned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE IN NOTICE OF AMENDMENTS TO RESOLUTIONS IN COMMITTEE OF WAYS AND MEANS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) a question as to procedure. In Votes and Proceedings No. 17 of December 2 the resolutions, which we are about to consider, along with the schedules, are printed in full. Then in the Votes and Proceedings of December 5 I find that part I of schedule 1 is to be amended. For instance, tariff item No. 163 as it appears in the original schedule covers wines of all kinds containing 26 per cent or less of proof spirit. On page ii of the Votes and Proceedings of December 5 I find that this item is being amended to cover wines of all kinds containing forty per cent or less of proof spirit. I was wondering if that is the usual practice. A number of other changes are being made, including the items having to do with artificial silk and paintings. These resolutions have had the force of law as of December 2 and I am wondering just how importers will be affected. I suppose the reason for this will appear later in the discussion, but I did think that this was rather unusual. I do not know enough about our practice and procedure to say whether or not it is improper. It may have been done on many other occasions; I do not know.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): It is desirable to give notice of amendments if possible. When amendments are proposed while the house is in committee of the whole the committee has no notice. Whenever there is a chance to do so, amendments are printed in the votes and proceedings so that hon. members will be aware of what is being proposed. The other point mentioned by the leader of the opposition did not occur to me, but I assume that some consideration will have to be given in the issuing of permits to the fact that they were not included in the first schedule.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I just wanted to be sure that no injustice was being done.

SOLDIERS' PENSIONS

RELIEF TO MEN DISCHARGED FROM THE ARMY AND IN NEED OF ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to ask the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie)—we are glad to see him back in the house—if during the recess he will give consideration to providing some form of relief to the 15,000 men who have been discharged from the army, many of whom are destitute and unable to obtain any assistance. Will he have this matter taken up by the pensions committee which will meet next year? I draw his attention also to the fact that the pensions board has ruled that no pensions are granted in respect of men in military camps who are killed on the highways, it having been decided that they were not on military service. I should like this matter also to be considered by the committee. Will relief be granted to these other men this winter?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): In connection with the first part of my hon. friend's question, that having to do with the 15,000 men who have been discharged from the army, may I say that my information is that most of these men have been absorbed into employment. The second part of my hon. friend's question refers to an order in council which was passed in May, 1940. All things of this nature will be considered by the committee to be established when the house resumes.

NICKEL AND SCRAP IRON

EXPLANATION OF DOCTOR ROBERT MCCLURE OF REPORTED STATEMENT AS TO SHIPMENTS TO JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was good enough to read to the house a copy of a telegram that he had sent to Doctor Robert McClure. The press reports that Doctor McClure has replied to the Prime Minister, and I wonder whether the Prime Minister would care to place that reply on the record and give the assurance requested?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I may say to my hon. friend that I am more than pleased to meet his request; for I certainly had in mind placing the telegram of Doctor McClure on Hansard to-day. It deserves something in the way of attention.

The house is already aware of the statement which was made by Doctor McClure at Toronto with respect to the export of nickel and of the fact that the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs sent a telegram to Doctor McClure asking for an explanation of his statement and requesting particularly information as to the source from which he got his information. The following is the reply which the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs has received:

Toronto, Ont., December 5, 1940.

Dr. O. D. Skelton,
Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs,
Ottawa.

In view of the disturbing reports I have been given from what I consider an authority, and in view also of persistent rumours which have been given credence by less informed persons, I believe it would be in the best interest of Canada and the empire if you would unequivocally state that in addition to no permits being granted for the direct export from Canada to Japan of nickel, every precaution has been taken to ensure that no Canadian nickel, in any form whatsoever, is finding its way, even circuitously, to Japan or to any country dominated by or friendly to Japan from which transshipment might be made. I think your statement also should apply to Canadian copper in all forms and to zinc and lead. I do know from the disquiet in certain circles in China, Canada and United States that such a comprehensive, unequivocal statement would allay many fears. The information which I consider authoritative and on which I based my statement was not to the effect that shipments of Canadian nickel were being made directly from Canada to Japan but that they were reaching Japan after having been shipped from Canada to some other nations, such as United States or to some Pacific nations dominated by Japan. If the facts permit you to state that such transshipments do not occur, I will be most happy to apologize fully for having added to your cares at this time. Arriving Ottawa Friday evening.

McClure.

I might say to Doctor McClure that his apology is owing rather to the British government and to the other governments of the British commonwealth of nations for adding to the very difficult situation which at the present time exists between the governments of the different parts of the empire and other governments in the orient. These are days in which language cannot be too greatly restrained, and the language used by Doctor McClure in his statement which I quoted yesterday was of a character to raise very considerable difficulties between the governments of the British commonwealth of nations and certain countries in the orient.

The communication I have read to-day, while it does not answer the one sent yesterday, is very different in its statement from the one which was made originally. It is now not direct shipments to Japan, but it is said that nickel may have been sent from Canada to some other country and have found its way from that other country around to Japan. The statement originally made by Doctor McClure was that he himself had been digging scrap iron which had come from Canada out of the bodies of Chinese and that he expected others would be digging nickel which came from Canada out of the bodies of British soldiers. That is a very different indictment from that which appears in his telegram that I have just read.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He did not say they were direct shipments; I think I should say that in justice to Doctor McClure. I do not know him at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, he did not. He did not say they were not direct shipments.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The inference was clear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Now, instead of Doctor McClure having information of his own knowledge, he states that his remarks were based on a statement which was made by some unnamed Canadian official and on information from some United States committee. Doctor McClure is to be in Ottawa, I understand, either this afternoon or to-morrow, and I have asked the Under-Secretary of State to ascertain from him the name of the Canadian official who he says gave him this information, and also to enlighten us a little as to the United States committee that gave the information on which he based the extraordinary statement which he made.

I have already given the house information as to the export of nickel from Canada. Its export has been under extremely close control since the beginning of the war. Permits are required for its shipment from this country in any form to any destination, and permits have not been granted when there was any reason to believe that the nickel might directly or indirectly reach a hostile destination.

We have not only made certain that no nickel was exported direct from Canada to any dangerous or possibly dangerous destination, but we have taken far-reaching precautions to see that nickel exported from Canada to another country is not re-exported in primary or fabricated form to any destination for which we would not grant an export permit for nickel in the first place. Our policy, as I have already stated, is to see that nickel is kept to meet the war needs of Britain, direct, and in articles being manufactured for Britain and ourselves in the United States. It is obvious that the secondary control cannot be as completely watertight as is our direct control over the shipment of nickel in its primary forms. Nevertheless, I have reason to believe that it is operating satisfactorily except with regard to nickel scrap. Here there is undoubtedly a small reexport trade from other countries to which the Canadian system of export control and guarantees cannot be extended.

I might add that I am prepared to arrange to have any member of the house furnished with full confidential information as to the control procedure in force in Canada, but it would not be advisable to make that particular aspect of the question public.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

QUESTION AS TO DECLARATION OF CROP FAILURE AREA IN SASKATCHEWAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Might I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). How soon does his department expect to have sufficient data available to decide whether or not a crop failure area can be declared in Saskatchewan under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I gave that information to the house yesterday and it will be found on Hansard.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister was not clear as to when. He said that he expected it would be done.

Mr. GARDINER: The latest information we have is on Hansard of yesterday. I cannot state exactly when.

"HIS MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT"

REFERENCE BY THE PRIME MINISTER TO EDITORIAL IN THE MONTREAL GAZETTE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I wish to say a word on a matter which I do not think can be called one of parliamentary privilege, and certainly it is not a matter of personal privilege, but it might be as well to clear it up.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

I notice that the Montreal Gazette of to-day contains an editorial in which it finds difficulty in seeing why it should be necessary for this government to confer with the British government before deciding whether or not we should resume our sittings on the 17th of February. The language used in my motion respecting adjournment, on which the editorial is based, was that you, Mr. Speaker, in conference with his majesty's government, would decide whether or not it was necessary to have parliament reassemble earlier than February 17. The Gazette seems still to belong to an age which regards his majesty's government as the government existing in Great Britain. I might say that over thirty years ago Sir Wilfrid Laurier made clear to all parts of the empire that the governments of the different dominions were all his majesty's governments. Certainly for many years past, in official communications which have passed between the governments of Great Britain and Canada, the one is referred to as "His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom," and the other as "His Majesty's Government in Canada." That is the present practice. When I speak of "his majesty's government," if I not specify, I have reference to His Majesty's Government in Canada.

PRIVATE BILLS

EXTENSION OF PERIOD FOR PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS UNDER STANDING ORDER 92

On the order for motions:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): This is a matter of procedure. I move:

That, on account of the pending adjournment of the house, the six weeks' period allowed by standing order 92 for the presentation of petitions for private bills be deemed to expire on Wednesday, February 26, 1941, instead of on Wednesday, December 18, 1940.

Motion agreed to.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

The house resumed from Thursday, December 5, consideration in committee of Bill No. 8, to amend the Special War Revenue Act—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Vien in the chair.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

Schedule agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

WAYS AND MEANS

WAR EXCHANGE CONSERVATION ACT, 1940

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Vien in the chair.

6. That the governor in council in order to increase Canada's supply of foreign exchange may, on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance, enter into agreements with individuals, partnerships or corporations to grant assistance by way of special tax credits and/or special allowances for depreciation or depletion under the Income War Tax Act and the Excess Profits Tax Act, if, in the opinion of the governor in council, such assistance is necessary in order that an expansion of the exports of any individual, partnership or corporation receiving such assistance may take place.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) asked me yesterday to make a statement about clause 6. Before I do that, perhaps I should give a little information which was asked for by other hon. members.

The hon. member for Vancouver South asked for certain information about imports from various countries. These are estimates, since in some cases only parts of statistical items are included in the schedule. Further, imports which came from Europe in 1939 tended to come from the United States. In addition, a number of imports from other countries, such as Japan, are recorded as originating in the United States because they enter Canada from the markets of that country. For example, practically all our imports of raw silk are credited to the United States. With these qualifications, the best figures that I have been able to get for the hon. gentlemen are these:

Total foreign imports.....	$53,000,000
United States	41,600,000
Japan	1,800,000
Europe	8,500,000
Other countries	1,100,000

The recorded imports from individual countries can be given for most of the individual items as those items are discussed. It has not been possible in the limited time since last night to prepare a more particularized statement than this.

Mr. GREEN: Could the minister say what is the value of the silk which comes from Japan through the United States to Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: Approximately $6,000,000. Now, with regard to the request of the leader of the opposition for figures relating to the importation of motion picture film from the United States: for the eight months from April 1 to October 31, 1940, the amount of motion picture royalties paid was $3,199,047.07.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is that item growing in quantum?

Mr. ILSLEY: I could not say.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course that in itself is not a very large item, but it is an item; and at the risk, perhaps, of being a little rash, I suggest to him that a lot of these films are in the category of magazines. I would not say that about the good films; I enjoy the good films; but there is a tremendous amount of trash coming in from the United States for which good Canadian dollars in the way of royalties are going out. I realize, however, that in the small communities they cannot afford to buy and pay for the good pictures, at least until the pictures are very old, and I hesitate to suggest to the minister that there should be anything in the shape of prohibition of these films. I suppose they are all censored by the provincial authorities. But there a tremendous number of them, it appears to me, are neither entertaining nor educational. I do not think I should say more than that. But it is an item to which the minister may have to give consideration later on.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am quite content, Mr. Chairman, to have the resolution carry, but an hon. member asked that I make a statement with regard to it before it was considered by the house. In the speech which I made at the time these proposals were introduced I emphasized the extent to which the government is in a positive way attempting to increase our supplies of foreign exchange. We are not confining ourselves merely to negative, restrictive measures. The present provision as to encouragement of exports is in the nature of an enabling measure. It gives power to the governor in council to enter into agreements. It is anticipated that under such agreements the government would offer certain concessions in exchange for an undertaking on the part of a company or individual to provide additional exchange of some amount. The benefits would be conditional upon a certain undertaking having been fulfilled by the exporter to the government's advantage.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is, to increase their exports?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. While this method of proceeding may be regarded as unusual, I think it is fully justified by the unusual circumstances we have to face. The variety of situations with which we may have to deal makes it next to impossible to formulate legislation which will be sufficiently elastic. I should like to give the house an example of what I mean by this.

A company may be able, through certain additional capital expenditure, say to double its exports of pulp. If it did this it would probably find that 79·5 per cent of its profits on this business would be taken away in corporation income tax and excess profits tax. In British Columbia, for example, a further ten per cent of profits would be taken by the provincial government if the profits exceeded a certain amount. In these circumstances the company would have only 10·5 per cent of its profits left. This margin of profits might not be sufficient to justify the capital expenditure for what might later have proved to be only a temporary market. In such a case a greater allowance for depreciation than is ordinarily allowed might be sufficient to induce the company to go ahead and take the risks involved. Another company might be able to expand somewhat its exports with little or no additional capital expenditure. Additional depreciation might not be of great assistance here. Different circumstances in this case might call for another type of incentive.

It is just possible after we have explored the possibilities further we may be able to generalize on some incentive provisions for certain industries. And here I might again emphasize that this is enabling legislation that we are concerned with. I would interject at this point that it was at first contemplated that we would ask the house for power to finance, to assist industries by loan or guarantee, if they would undertake to provide a certain amount of foreign exchange.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We really do not need that.

Mr. ILSLEY: I thought it was too dangerous a power for the government to take and that the two classes of assistance authorized by this bill were sufficient, at least to start with. There are two classes, one being increased depreciation or depletion allowance, and the other tax credits, which would be proportioned to the exchange produced.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister has abandoned that idea?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of financing?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If you allow these companies to make a little money they will do their own financing. It should not in any degree become a burden on the country's credit.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: I argued that the companies should be allowed to make a little money this last year, and my hon. friend was in favour of a 100 per cent excess profits tax.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Based on the English practice. Do away with the corporation tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: They would not have had any incentive then. In other industries, it may not be possible even subsequently to lay down any general rules. For example, certain gold mines may be facing a situation where the margin of profit is so low—for instances, 50 cents a ton—that it is not in the interests of the company to attempt to continue operations. I think anyone who is familiar with the gold mining industry will realize that some mines can continue to look forward to a profitable future even with a very low rate of profit per ton, while in other cases a much higher rate of profit per ton may not be sufficient to justify continuing operations. In circumstances such as these, the house will realize that it would be uneconomical to offer concessions to all mines whose profit per ton is less than a certain amount. An arrangement of this sort would almost necessarily mean that many would be getting benefits which they do not need, while others which needed it were obtaining no relief whatever. It is in the face of situations such as these that it seemed necessary to take power to deal with individuals by means of contract or agreement rather than attempt the more wasteful and uneconomical method of providing benefits through general legislation.

It is the intention of the government to have such agreements as are entered into tabled in the house and available to members. Full details with regard to the administration of this provision have not yet been worked out. However, these details will be developed later as seems best.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would they be made available in the interim if parliament were not in session? They will be stale by the time we get back. As regards the question of depreciation and depletion, to which the minister has alluded, has he come to any conclusion with respect to the extra quantum of depreciation and depletion which may be allowed? Both are important. I am not opposing the suggestion at the moment, but I should like to have it elucidated.

I would point out, on the subject of depreciation, that consideration ought to be given the question whether the raw material is cut off a company's licensed lands, that is to say, lands held under licence from a provincial government, or whether the raw material is cut off freehold lands owned by the company. May I tell the minister my own experience? Not so very long ago, in settling a tax claim against a taxpayer, I discovered that in the income tax department no discrimination was made, on the item of depletion, between pulpwood cut on licensed land held under a licence from the crown in the right of one of the provinces and raw material cut on the company's privately-owned lands held in fee simple. The situations are entirely different. This was some time ago, and apparently the department had not before had the matter drawn to their attention. They adopted an arbitrary figure, say a dollar a cord—I cannot remember the exact figures—and applied it in both cases, whereas in the case of privately-owned land double depletion at least should be allowed on raw material cut on fee simple land owned by the company. The land can be cropped only once in so many years. There is not the capital invested in a timber licence that there is in privately-owned land, and if they are to be on the same basis it will work an injustice. Much greater depletion should be allowed for pulpwood cut on fee simple land than on licensed land. I am sure I convinced the commissioner that this was the proper thing to do and I hope he has been following out that practice. I wish to take time by the forelock to suggest that it be carried out.

Since we were here last evening there has appeared in the morning papers—I have before me a clipping from the Ottawa Journal of this date—an item which I suppose was supplied by the Canadian Press. The heading is:

Gov't to Aid Newsprint Industry

May give tax relief under special war measure.

The text reads:

The government is expected to take action, probably under a provision in the special war finance measures now before parliament, to give taxation relief to the newsprint industry.

This industry to-day ranks next to gold in commodity export to the United States and thus in the provision of the urgently needed United States dollars.

It goes on to tell a story and to give figures of exports, and it refers to the minister's speech on Monday in which he spoke of a "special allowance for depreciation or depletion of capital assets" being made to companies for the purpose of export trade. It adds:

That is a provision which may be worked out under the Excess Profits Tax Act.

May I ask the minister if it is intended to do that through that legislation or by enabling legislation such as he has now referred to in connection with the matter at present under consideration?

I should like to make this statement with respect to the excess profits tax. Perhaps it is too late to start off on a new basis in connection with that tax; we have had for years the corporation tax. This is the thought I should like to convey to the minister: that these companies should not be taxed to death at the present time; they must be sound and able to withstand the depression that may come to this country after the war. That should be done not for the benefit of the companies themselves but so as to prevent them having to "go through the wringer," as they have had to do in days gone by; and more especially so that they may be in a position to give employment in times when employment may be sadly needed. Their resources should not be sapped too much. If you take away from them all their earnings in good times and give no consideration to the losses in bad times which most of them have experienced, some of these companies are going to find themselves, let us say, with expensive inventories at the expiration of this war. All the foresight in the world will not prevent some of them from having large and costly inventories on hand, and they may find that the value of their assets has shrunk overnight while their liabilities remain just the same. They may not be able to meet their obligations to their creditors, with the result that reorganizations are bound to follow.

What does that mean to the country? It means unemployment, reduced wages and generally bad times. I want to convey to the minister the idea of the need for broad vision; that these companies should not be taxed to death but should be put in a position to weather the next storm.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the farmer?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, I agree, but at the moment I am not dealing with the farmer. These big companies provide the backbone of our employment in certain parts of eastern Canada—in my province, to a lesser degree in the minister's own province, and to a very large extent in Ontario and Quebec.

I do not want anybody to say that I am championing the bondholders of these companies. I know that thought will immediately arise in the minds of some. I have even heard it said that the whole basis of the Rowell-Sirois report is to protect the bondholders of the provinces at the expense of the dominion. I never thought that was the genesis of the report, and I do not think so yet; but there are people who will say it, and the minister will hear it before this session is over. That theory does not carry conviction to me. But the principle I am trying to impress upon the minister is that these companies should be left reasonably sound in order to be able to weather the storms that may come. Revenue must be obtained, but let us take it from the ultimate recipients of the earnings of these companies. The principle followed in England is sound. We may have gone too far to go back to it now, but I do beg of the minister that he give consideration to what I know is a constructive suggestion with respect to company taxation and finance. Because after all, with the system of modern finance, these companies are the backbone of industrial employment in Canada, and if they are not prosperous how can they give employment in bad times?

The minister has indicated the general trend of his ideas; he is going to make these allowances with respect to depreciation and depletion in return for certain undertakings to increase exports. The idea has a good deal of merit. I would like to have the principle developed a little further, and if he could be a little more definite it might be helpful in passing this resolution.

May I call the minister's attention to another consideration with respect to export trade and the increase in the volume of our United States exchange resulting therefrom. There is still in this country a substantial industry known as the lumber business, which for generation after generation was the backbone of the industrial life of the maritime provinces and eastern Canada, as I believe it is to-day of the industrial life of British Columbia. Is the minister prepared to say that consideration will be given to lumber companies which are not in the pulp and paper business but want to do an export trade, who have to suffer in a lesser degree in connection with the question of depreciation and depletion but will make a valuable contribution to the total import of United States dollars into Canada? I have an idea that our lumber men may be able to export a good deal more to the United States in coming days, especially if certain things happen, if the tempo of business is increased by certain eventualities in the United States which perhaps all of us are thinking about. Will the minister give consideration to extending this principle, rather nebulous yet, to export companies of that type, and not confine it so much to the bigger companies?—because I think it should go down the line. The line has to be drawn somewhere, but consideration might be given to all classes of business that are in the export trade in a reasonably large way.

Mr. ILSLEY: They are included. There is no exclusion of lumber companies, or any kind of company for that matter.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am just calling the minister's attention to that.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am anxious to get ahead, but let me say a word in respect to what the leader of the opposition says about taxation of companies. I am interested in hearing him take that stand, because hon. members cannot take two different stands—I am not talking about the hon. gentleman particularly. The feeling of this house last year certainly was that business interests were not to be allowed to use the war or the war period as a means of making profits in excess of ordinary normal profits. Now a doctrine has arisen—it may be a good one; I am not prepared to condemn it now, but it is certainly contrary to the former one. We find it in the financial press; to-day we hear it from the lips of the leader of the opposition. The sentiments he now expresses are very different from his stand last spring, when he was in favour of taking away from these companies all the excess profits that they earned during the war. If we are going to do that we cannot put them in a position to build up reserves against undefined losses in the future.

With regard to inventory reserves, the hon. gentleman referred to the probability that their inventories would suddenly drop in value at the end of the war. That was the experience at the end of the last war, and for that reason we embodied in the Excess Profits Tax Act a section providing, within certain carefully thought-out and defined limits, for inventory reserves. I do not see how we can possibly provide for general reserves against loss of profits due to some undefined circumstances that may arise in the post-war period. That would be equivalent to enabling them to prosper during the war, something to which the house was certainly opposed last session and to which I think it is still opposed.

There may be some middle ground. I pleaded for moderation last spring in this house; I said that in view of the fact that a great deal of our capital in this country had come from outside, and that a great many of our own people would do better if some profit incentive were left, I pleaded for moderation in this regard, and we were confronted by our friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation who said, "No, take it all away from them." And my hon. friend, and many of the members of his party, joined them. What has happened is exactly what I expected would happen. I knew that at every session we would have more and more members who, having in mind the experience of certain companies, perhaps companies in their own districts, would say, "Be a little easier on those companies." Now, I am prepared to listen to all requests of companies, but I am not prepared to abandon the principle we laid down at the beginning, namely that companies during this war period shall not be allowed to strengthen or buttress their positions, or to build up reserves and make themselves prosperous, thinking that later there may be a loss of prosperity.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister made one very interesting admission, if I may say so, during the course of his remarks, namely, that the incentive which must be provided for industrial expansion is some additional profit. I want to draw the attention of the committee to that statement. We are appealing to our people to make sacrifices in a war period, yet the minister tells us that the government cannot take excess profits to the extent I believe they ought to be taken, because if that were done we should be providing no further incentive. Therefore the required incentive must be the incentive of profit, for that is what makes the wheels of industry go round.

In order perhaps to provide a little balance, the leader of the opposition having spoken as he did, I would say that we disagree with the point of view he has expressed. We object, too, to the powers given to the government under this proposal, whereby they may interfere with the excess profits tax. The house agreed this summer—members of this group dissenting—that the profits over and above the base period should be taxed at the rate of seventy-five per cent of the excess profit. That still left twenty-five per cent of the excess to the company.

Mr. ILSLEY: Just to keep the record straight: That, combined with the Income War Tax Act, left only 20·5 per cent. The combination of the two amounted to 79·5 per cent.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am dealing with the excess profits tax, and the minister is bringing in some other tax. But we have left the companies with 20·5 per cent of the excess profits after excess and other taxes have been paid, an amount which, to my mind, is a considerable increase over what they had before.

I repeat now what we said in the summer, namely that to my mind the base is not equitable for the imposition of that tax. If we examine the records of some companies we shall find they made profits in 1939 as high as forty per cent, and their average would be around that for several years before. I would refer at this time to companies such as the Consolidated Mining and Smelting company, or Canadian Industries Limited. Yet the proposal is that these plants shall be allowed to retain, if the government so permits, a percentage of the excess profits larger than that now allowed. I wish to register a most emphatic protest against the adoption of such a policy.

At the present time the gold mining industry is relieved from several forms of taxation. The ground given is that we require the gold. Of course, under existing circumstances, we require the gold in order that we may obtain the necessary dollar exchange in the United States. But in my opinion the necessities of this country, arising out of war effort, ought not to be the excuse for allowing corporations to escape taxation.

The other evening the minister said that the group to which I belong want to take over and to socialize all industry. That is not so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Pretty nearly.

Mr. COLDWELL: No, it is not. We would take over at this time the industries essential to the carrying out of our war effort. We would take over the munitions industry, and if necessary the mining industry, and any others—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And the banks.

Mr. COLDWELL: —essential to our war effort.

Mr. LACROIX (Beauce): And the paper industry?

Mr. COLDWELL: At the present time that industry is not essential to our war effort. I believe that by progressive steps this nation, and other nations too, will take out of private hands and operate for the good of the community those industries which to-day are private, profit-making monopolies. Indeed, as I have often said, and as I shall repeat this afternoon, we believe that more people should own more property and that a few people should own a great deal less property than they now own. That is the basis of our plea. Whether we like it or not, it is coming, and coming fast.

One of the factors which will bring this condition about more quickly than any other is the type of class legislation implied in this particular item. I protest against it on behalf of the group with which I am associated. I protest, because I believe when we are calling upon our men to relinquish their homes, their jobs and everything else, we have the right to ask these industries to do without the profit motive or profit incentive.

Last night the minister gave the hon. member for Weyburn something in the nature of a verbal castigation because that hon. member had suggested that there were people in the country who were looking for profits and who ought to be controlled. Now we find, on the minister's own statement, that there are industries in Canada that we cannot expect to operate unless they show increased profits during war time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, that is not a fair statement.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, it is a fair statement; and if the leader of the opposition and the minister will read Hansard to-morrow they will find that that is the effect of the statement made in committee this afternoon—namely, that they want a further incentive.

Let me proceed to the next thought in that connection. We are told that we must put those industries in a position whereby they may give after-war employment. But our experience in the past has been that there was no employment unless industry could see a profit.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not right.

Mr. MacNICOL: That certainly is not right.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is true.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Half the paper companies in Canada—

Mr. COLDWELL: I have the floor.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then may I ask a question?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the hon. member know that half the paper companies in Canada operated for years at a loss?

Mr. LACROIX (Beauce): For thirteen years.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): For at least ten years some of them operated at a loss, but they continued to give employment.

Mr. COLDWELL: That may be true, but it does not affect the argument I am making, namely that unless industry can see the prospect—I shall use that word—of a profit, there will be no industry, and the industry that can show a profit will be the one which will be operated. All one has to do is to look at our own economy to know that that is true. Industries such as those owned by distillery and liquor interests operated continuously because they could obtain money and make a profit while other industries which might have given work and essential services to our people were idle.

Mr. McCANN: Does the hon. member know of any essential industry which is closed because of inability to make a profit?

Mr. COLDWELL: A number of essential industries were shut down or on part time during the depression.

Mr. McCANN: This is war time.

Mr. COLDWELL: In some cases they were closed for days and weeks. Take the mining industry, for example. I know of mines that were closed down when people in the province in which I live were without coal. The need for the coal was there, but there was no profit because the people had no purchasing power and consequently the industry would not make deliveries.

A few days ago I asked for a return from the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). I was anxious to obtain some information regarding new plants being built. I find that a great deal of the information which I require in order to understand what is going on has not been given because it is not considered to be in the public interest to give it. The government should tell the exact basis upon which plant extensions in private industry are being made. Many plants are being built and extended by the governments of Canada and Great Britain, and, if I understand the matter aright, there is a similar proposal involved in this.

If my information is correct, the rate of depreciation being allowed in privately-owned plants is such as these publicly-financed extensions can be written off in five years. My information may not be correct, and I have asked questions in order to get the correct information. If what I have just said is incorrect, then I want it corrected so that I may know precisely what is going on in the department. I want to protest against this method of making special allowances for depreciation or depletion to corporations under the Income War Tax Act and the Excess Profits Tax Act, if, in the opinion of the governor in council, such assistance is necessary in order that an expansion of the exports of any individual, partnership or corporation receiving such assistance may take place. That covers a great deal of ground, and in my opinion we are giving a very dangerous power to the government in providing that this type of assistance may be given to industry.

Mr. KINLEY: I think the hon. member has missed the important point of this resolution. The purpose of the resolution is to increase Canada's exchange. I cannot conceive of a healthy business without profit. It may be that the government will take that profit to carry on the war, but that is another matter entirely. Let us consider the individual. The profit that an individual makes is what he lives on.

Mr. COLDWELL: Oh, no.

Mr. KINLEY: The profit that an individual in business makes is what he lives on. If he has a loss, he will have nothing to live upon. In the case of a corporation, the officials are paid before the profit is computed and there is a slightly different situation. I do not think this resolution is framed for the rich or large companies. I can see in it possibilities for the fishermen in my riding. The herring and mackerel fishermen in the maritime provinces can catch fish, but the prices on the foreign markets are so low that they have no profit. If certain expenses can be eliminated, then these men can ship their product to foreign countries and we will have the advantage of the exchange. I have in mind the vinegated herring industry, or herring cured in vinegar. There are fishermen and dealers in my riding who operate in a small way but who produce thousands of barrels of these vinegated herrings. This product has a ready market in the western states but at present the price is not sufficient to make a profit possible. Surely it would be in the interests of the country to have this industry stimulated.

Then in connection with the newsprint and pulp industry, it seems to me that if this industry can increase its production it would bring more exchange to the country. At the present time no newsprint or pulp is coming in from Europe. Surely abnormal extension expenditures could be written off in a way that would not prove a burden when we return to normal times. I think this would be eminently in the interests of the people of the country. To make this resolution the subject of an attack on the capitalistic system is not in keeping with our war effort. The capitalistic system is not perfect; it was conceived by man and anything conceived by man is not perfect. But for the last hundred years it has been the best way devised for the orderly progress of society, and until I can see something better—I am always looking for something better—I am not prepared to step into some unknown which will reduce this country to a condition similar to that prevailing in the countries of Europe where the conflict is going on at the present time.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Last evening the minister said that if hon. members opposite to him were able to see some deep meaning in this legislation which he could not see, he wished they would tell him. This resolution provides for assistance to individuals, partnerships or corporations by way of tax credits or special allowances for depreciation or depletion. There are individuals, partnerships or corporations which have invested United States funds in this country to develop our natural resources. If in due time they have dividends to disburse and ask the foreign exchange control board for United States exchange, then I suggest to the minister that should any of these individuals, partnerships or corporations appeal for assistance under this section they should be told either to pay their dividends in Canadian funds or to refrain from going to the foreign exchange control board for United States funds with which to pay dividends.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member is referring to United States owned companies.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I tried to make that abundantly clear last night. I have one other suggestion to make, apart altogether from this one, but having to do with the conservation of foreign exchange. Many United States owned companies make interplant shipments from Canada to the United States which are invoiced at prices far below the true market value. It is difficult to establish this, but these prices should be checked in the United States in order to make sure that we are getting the full United States exchange for these exports. Some commodities are shipped to the United States for further processing before being marketed. I have one firm in mind which placed $100,000 in their depreciation reserves for the day when commodity prices might drop considerably. When any of these individuals, partnerships or corporations appeal for concessions under this resolution I hope the department will see to it that they invoice shipments from their Canadian to their United States plants at the full market value in order that Canada may obtain the full exchange value of the shipment. I just throw that out as a suggestion.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the income tax division takes some pains to see that that is done.

Mr. O'BRIEN: Mr. Chairman, so far I have remained almost mute in the deliberations of the house, and it is not my desire now to delay the committee. I find this discussion very interesting for the reason that as I am in business, as most of the members are, it is something that we can put our teeth into. The war discussion has been so abstract at times that I have felt bewildered.

During this discussion the word "incentive" has been mentioned, and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) has voiced a view which I should like to commend. The immediate incentive is not altogether the point, but, it seems to me, as he so ably suggested, that the future is a very important item to consider.

Coming as I do from the county of Northumberland, which depends almost entirely on the lumbering business, as do also the constituencies of Gloucester, Restigouche-Madawaska, Victoria-Carleton, York, Kent, and virtually all the northern counties of New Brunswick, I know that this item is a matter of vital importance to our province and particularly to what I might term the owner-managed type of business. Some reference has been made to-day to corporations. Corporations I think are usually able to take care of themselves, but the smaller owner-managed type of business usually suffers owing to the fact that there is no organization in which their difficulties can be discussed with a view to getting relief. For that reason I wish to compliment the minister upon the degree of flexibility which is being achieved, because, as we all know, in times like the present there must of necessity be generally speaking, rigid control.

When a government or a department is dealing with matters of business, certainly business principles should be followed; for any business, to be successful, must of necessity have a great degree of flexibility in its structure. Therefore I am happy to note with reference to individuals, partnerships or corporations that each situation may be flexibly treated on its merits. That I think is a splendid thing.

Referring to the Ottawa Journal of this morning, to which the leader of the opposition also referred, it seems to me that the report as to government aid to the newsprint industry is a bit premature because that is what we are attempting to determine here at the moment. But if it should be the decision of this committee that aid should be given to the newsprint industry, and the department is given the necessary authority, I suggest that if relief is given, and I am in favour of the principle in the circumstances—

Mr. ILSLEY: No relief is to be given to the newsprint industry, but the same concession will be available to them if they can produce exchange as a result of the concession. But the idea is not to relieve the companies.

Mr. O'BRIEN: Concession or relief.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before any return is made they must do thus and so.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

[Mr. O'Brien.]

Mr. O'BRIEN: I would hope that we might follow along the same line in connection with the primary producer, the producer of pulpwood, for instance. I am not going to quote any figures here to-day because frankly I believe business should be smart enough to govern its own affairs and create its own destiny so that government would not be forced to interfere and control business.

Whether it be done by statute or by persuasion, and I much prefer persuasion, it seems to me that the newsprint industry should be informed that the primary producer of pulpwood, the farmer, is not receiving a sufficient return in view of the increased profits and the much greater returns which evidently the newsprint companies are making to-day. I am informed that pulpwood in Nova Scotia—it may be so-called distress wood—is now being sold at $7 a cord, which I think is a price unfairly low. Whether the matter should be looked after by the war-time prices and trade board or by some other agency I do not know, but on October 29 I wrote the Canadian Pulp and Paper association drawing attention to the matter and stating my belief that the pulp and paper industry should consider it. I received a non-committal reply, almost a month later. I hope the pulp and paper business will be smart enough to realize that if this adjustment is not made voluntarily by the business itself it will eventually be done through government control.

There is another matter in connection with the small lumber business, to which I should like to refer. I wrote to the minister with regard to this and received a friendly and I think useful reply, stating that he would be glad to have any suggestions. In the lumber business as carried on in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, the operations take place in small portable mills, which do not permit of any large capital investment; consequently depreciation on the plants used by these small owner-managed businesses is practically nil. I am convinced that those of us engaged in the lumber business in the maritime provinces wish to carry on that business in order to supply the necessary material required for Great Britain's war effort. We are not particularly anxious to make enormous profits. But as the leader of the opposition has suggested, provision should be made so that in the future some reserve may be allowed. That is perhaps looking too far ahead, but I have been wondering if it would not be possible to devise some scheme along this line. Let us say that a company pay a $5,000 tax—I am speaking of an owner-managed business. In return a certificate might be given to them for a certain portion of that tax to be re-issued without interest to the person making the payment, so that in future years, when war business ceases and unemployment and depression are perhaps again our unhappy lot, the certificate might be taken by the lumber operator or the operator of any other line of business to his bank as security. Some future generation might thus reimburse the present day operators in view of the severe war conditions they have to contend with to-day. As a matter of fact I think such a certificate of the dominion would be as valuable to the bank as some types of bonds. I hope that when these concessions are being arranged—because I appreciate the necessity for creating exchange—some consideration will be given to the primary producer, particularly the small farmer pulpwood producer.

Mr. CASSELMAN (Edmonton East): Mr. Chairman, I rose for the purpose of asking a question of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) but he has left the house so I shall have to leave that till later. Somebody had asked him whether he would consider farming an essential industry to be taken over by the government.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Surely the hon. member does not think that farming is a monopoly.

Mr. CASSELMAN (Edmonton East): I was talking not about monopolies but about industries. I should like to ask the minister if this section we are now dealing with is wide enough to enable the government to make whatever arrangements might be deemed desirable to assist coal. I have in mind particularly Alberta, where coal is a vital matter to us. My information is that about $93,000,000 went to the United States last year for the purchase of coal by Canadians. It seems to me that this is a very important question, much more important, in fact, as regards the conservation of exchange than the matters with which we have been dealing, although I do not quarrel with those at all. Is this section which we are dealing with wide enough to promote a greater market for Canadian coal in the way of subventions or lower freight rates or in any similar manner?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. This measure does not affect industries which rely on the domestic market. This is to encourage export industries for the purpose of obtaining exchange.

Mr. GREEN: As I understand it, the purpose of this resolution is to help increase Canada's supply of foreign exchange. That is being done by giving certain remissions of taxation in order to expand exports.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: The discussion to-day has taken the form of considering exports to the United States. In British Columbia practically all the lumber which is exported goes either to Great Britain or to one of the empire countries, in which transactions, of course, there is no such thing as United States exchange. Is it the intention that this power shall be used to assist the lumber industry to expand its exports to British empire countries?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, that is not the intention of the legislation. Although it is possible under this bill, it is not considered desirable to limit the powers so as to make that entirely impossible. But it is not my intention at the moment to recommend assistance except for the single purpose of increasing our supplies of par currency exchange.

Mr. GREEN: Last evening the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) raised the question of promoting the production of silver. Frankly, I thought he made an excellent presentation. I believe that many of us in this house are in entire agreement with the stand he took. But the minister did not answer the hon. member's question. I would ask him to tell us the attitude of the government with regard to encouraging the production of silver so that it may be exported to the United States.

Mr. ILSLEY: An application from the silver mining industry for assistance under this measure would be considered. If the industry is exporting silver and feels that it could obtain exchange for this country by increasing, with assistance, its exports, it would be possible within the letter and spirit of the proposed legislation for the government to assist it. Whether that would be economically desirable I am not prepared to say; it might or it might not. It would depend upon the facts.

Mr. REID: That does not quite answer the question. The proposition made last night was that the government give consideration to doing the same with regard to silver as we are doing with regard to gold, so as to lend encouragement to operators of silver mines, to give employment in Canada, and to provide Canadian dollars in the United States. The answer given just now by the minister in reply to the hon. member for Vancouver South is not exactly in keeping with the argument which I advanced last night.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the hon. member means, would the government give consideration to amending the Excess Profits Tax Act so that the same rules should apply to silver as apply to gold, I think I can say that such consideration will be given. I am not in a position to say that I will introduce an amendment to that effect. The question was very fully considered last year, as to where the line should be drawn. We drew it between the gold mines and the oil wells, on the one side, and other extractive enterprises on the other. But we are prepared to consider at any time the location of that line. That is all I can say.

Mr. REID: That is well so far as it goes, but it does not answer my question. The question which was asked affects the argument under consideration at this moment. What we were asking was, would the same consideration be given to silver produced in this country, as regards being controlled by the mint and deposited in the United States under similar arrangements to those which apply to gold?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know. I will consider it, if the hon. member will write me outlining the respects in which he wants consideration to be given. I have talked already about two of these, one, in answer to the hon. member for Vancouver South, the other under the Excess Profits Tax Act. The hon. member has a third of which I am not aware, and if he will write to me I will consider it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am wondering whether or not the minister has considered the implications of this type of legislation. I protested against this last evening, and I am going to repeat my protest, because I think it applies even more to this type of legislation than to that which I objected to last evening. This amounts in effect to parliament granting to the governor in council the right to interpret statutes according to the needs of foreign exchange at the moment. Under the provisions of the war tax act and the Excess Profits Tax Act, statutory provision is made for the deductions that can be made for depreciation and so on; and what in effect parliament will do if it allows this resolution to pass is to give approval to the dangerous proposition that statutes shall be on the statute books but may be applied in such way as the governor in council may consider advisable in the interests of foreign exchange. That is what it does.

If the war tax act is not sufficient, amend it. If the Excess Profits Tax Act goes too far, and I am not arguing that at the moment, why should not the government take it upon itself to amend it? This resolution in effect allows the governor in council to relieve any individual or company from the law of the land, and I think this is a most serious matter. Surely there must be one law for all individuals and companies in this land. We have now come to the position where the government says, "We are going to leave on the statute book these statutes, the war tax act and the Excess Profits Tax Act, but we are going to make such orders in council as we deem necessary from time to time to relieve certain individuals, persons or companies from the application of the law of the land as set out therein."

I repeat my protest against this kind of legislation. I submit that its passage will create a dangerous precedent. It will destroy the rule of law. I realize that in time of war our people must give up some rights in the greater interests of the safety of the state, but I emphatically protest against legislation of this type, which will permit the executive to create inequalities under law in this nation. It allows the governor in council to say to one individual or company, "You shall operate under the law of the land," and to another individual or company, "You are to be relieved from operating under the law of the land." My submission is that this is a most dangerous principle, because the essence of law, whether in war or in peace, must be uniformity, certainty of application and reasonable definiteness. If we pass this type of legislation empowering the executive to enforce the law for one individual or company and relieve another from its application, we destroy the rule of law. We permit the law to be elastically applied and give to the executive power such as has never been asked of this house, nor, do I believe, of any other parliament.

Last night in reference to this very matter I asked why this type of legislation was being brought up, and the minister answered: "We had the power to act under the War Measures Act, because if ever there was a war measure this is one. We did not think, however, that that would be acting in the true spirit of the constitution. We thought that when parliament was here we ought to lay the matter before parliament and state what we intended to do." The minister nods agreement with that statement. "Does the minister contend that under the War Measures Act the executive of this nation had the right to say to one individual, "You shall pay the tax provided by the Excess Profits Tax Act," and to another individual, "You are relieved from it"?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister says, yes. I do not think the courts of the land would ever uphold any government in discriminating, as the government would if it applied that principle.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend is aware that the Department of Munitions and Supply provides for the construction of plants by assistance to private companies—$500,000 to this, $1,000,000 to another, and $2,000,000 to a third—in proportion to the value which they think the enterprise has in the carrying on of the war effort. Is not that a much more important discrimination between companies than would be a tax concession or depreciation allowance in return for a specific service rendered, namely, the provision of foreign exchange?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is quite a different thing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The plea of confession and avoidance under the old common law procedure.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is a different principle, I submit. These are statutes which make certain provisions that apply to every person in the country, and what the government is now asking is that it shall have the power to relieve certain persons from the law to a greater or lesser extent. Against that type of legislation I protest.

Mr. COLDWELL: I warmly support what has just been said by the hon. member (Mr. Diefenbaker). It seems to me we are in danger of placing on the statute book provisions which become more or less window-dressing, because people do believe that taxes are to be imposed as laid down by parliament in the budget of last summer. If we give the power implied in the government's resolution we have nothing but dead letters which deceive a good many people. I believe that the point made by the hon. member has been well taken.

I was out for four or five minutes just now and I understand a question was asked by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Casselman). I should like to answer it. As I understand it, the question was whether I considered that farms should be subject to socialization by the state. My answer is, no. To-day farmers are being squeezed by the monopolies of which I have spoken. We believe that when an institution exploits society so that it becomes a matter for the protection of society, it should be taken over. The farmer, the producer, never makes a profit in the sense in which I have used the term profit, which is the residue left after all other costs including depreciation have been met. It is consequently a reward unearned which goes entirely to the ownership of capital.

Mr. CASSELMAN (Edmonton East): Was it only to monopolies the hon. member was directing his remarks?

Mr. COLDWELL: Monopolistic industries.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I take exception to this section 6. Last summer when the excess profits tax was imposed, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) suggested that these mining corporations were already enjoying enviable profits. The Excess Profits Tax Act, according to the minister, allows them 20 per cent in excess of what they have enjoyed in the last few years. In view of the fact that we are appealing to all groups in Canada to make the fullest contribution to the war effort, I submit that the admission by the minister that there is some difficulty in getting some of these corporations to play their full part should warrant the government in carrying out the provision made under the National Resources Mobilization Act, section 2 of which provides:

> Subject to the provisions of section three hereof, the governor in council may do and authorize such acts and things, and make from time to time such orders and regulations, requiring persons to place themselves, their services and their property at the disposal of His Majesty in the right of Canada, as may be deemed necessary or expedient for securing the public safety, the defence of Canada, the maintenance of public order, or the efficient prosecution of the war, or for maintaining supplies or services essential to the life of the community.

If any difficulty is being experienced in getting the necessary foreign exchange the government should at once take action under the act. I strongly object to giving the government the wide powers asked for in section 6.

Resolution agreed to.

7. That any enactment founded on these resolutions shall be deemed to have come into force on the second day of December, 1940, and to expire on the date of the issue of a proclamation under the War Measures Act declaring that a state of war no longer exists or on such earlier date as may be fixed in a proclamation of the governor in council.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before this resolution carries, would the minister say, having regard to what has been said this afternoon, especially the remarks of the hon. member for Lake Centre, that the whole position will be reviewed between now and the next budget? I realize that, if one wanted to do so, one could raise grave objections to this kind of legislation.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I will do that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The whole question ought to be reviewed. And in the meantime will he provide members with the information as to what has been done under this resolution?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then in four months time we can review the whole position.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Before this resolution passes may I make two or three comments? In the first place I wish to associate myself with the minister in his observation regarding profits, and in his endeavour to manage matters so that industry can make a profit. It is to this question of profit that I wish to refer.

In the first place the minister, without knowing it, has begun, in these provisions to assure a fair profit, to move in the direction of social credit in respect of the just price. I am afraid that statement may not appeal to him, but after a while it will not look nearly so bad. I believe that before the war is over, before production is at the peak at which we all want it to be, the minister will have to go a great deal further than he has gone already. Either he or the Minister of Munitions and Supply has already gone a long way in another direction—that of advancing money to assist in the establishment of distinctive war industries. Let us take as an illustration—I have no other in mind at the moment—the ammonia plant which I understand is to be established in Alberta. If the government were unable to find a company that dared to risk its capital in the construction of an ammonia plant, they might say to the people concerned: Look here, we realize that the war may end in a year or two, and that if you put your money in this plant you may lose it; we are therefore prepared to help you bear the burden. We are ready to assume a certain amount of the risk; we will advance from government funds say half the total amount necessary for your capital expenditure.

Now, that is completely sound. It is something which has been done, is being done and will be done to a greater and greater extent before the war is over. What the government have undertaken to do there is to make productive loans. At the present time the government is either collecting that money from the people in the form of taxation, or borrowing it. But I contend very seriously that after a while it will come to be seen quite clearly that the money might just as well be created. If the money can be spent when it is borrowed, or when it is taxed, without causing inflation, it can be spent when it is created without causing inflation. This is an extremely important matter, which I think has not yet become clarified in people's thinking. But men are making good progress. I have a passage here from a speech by Mr. G. W. Spinney—I suppose he would have a nightmare if he knew I was referring to him in support of social credit—before the shareholders of the Bank of Montreal on December 3, in which he made a remark which shows a great advance towards modern concepts of money.

Having used this illustration, may I point out that the minister is pursuing a perfectly sound principle in advancing money free of interest as a loan, as a gift to a producer who is going to bring into being commodities which the government or the people will sorely need. I believe that the informed thinking people in Canada will support the minister in doing that. Common sense would say that if we need ammonia, let us have ammonia, and if we have to give the money to a company to get the ammonia, let us do it. That is sound thinking, as I think the ordinary person will agree.

The minister can go still further. He can arrange to allow the company that is producing the ammonia to buy its raw materials at a reduced price brought about by a direct payment by the government of part of the price of the goods being used by the company. I do not know just what is used in the production of ammonia, but if, for example, it were zinc, the government could arrange to see that the company got its zinc at, say, ten per cent below the market price.

I am sorry to be taking so much time, but the discussion has been extremely interesting and valuable; I have not thus far taken up much of the time of the committee, and I believe I have a message that is important in relation to the matter under consideration.

I was speaking of a discount on the price of raw material. Or the government might say: We will remit part of the cost by paying part of the freight rate on the raw material. That again would be of direct assistance to the company and an assurance that they would make a profit. Or the government might go further and remit the sales tax on the raw material in order to enable the company to sell its product at greater advantage.

All these matters are devices which are in the minds of social crediters as possible means of helping producers produce. As I said the other day, there is no nonsense to it; it is just common sense in action, as will be clearly seen by anyone who takes the time to examine these proposals calmly and dispassionately and without prejudice.

I turn to the matter of conserving exchange. It is clear that the government should advance money to help produce ammonia, say, but it has perhaps not become clear that the government can afford to advance money to producers of other things, say wool, or shoes, which happen to be needed. If the government carry this process far enough to assist in the production of shoes, for example, they will enable the people who are producing shoes in Canada to produce and sell at such a low rate that people will buy Canadian shoes instead of shoes from the United States. They will prevent the importation of shoes made in the United States, and thereby conserve exchange.

Let me turn for a moment to the remark of the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Casselman) the other night. I believe I was just a little discourteous to him—

Mr. McNEVIN: Will the hon. member tell us how many shoes are imported from the United States?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Well, if shoes are an unfortunate example, let us take something else. If the hon. member is asking a sincere question, very well; but if he is asking it just to interrupt me, it is another matter. Suppose we are importing carrots. If the government advanced money to help someone in Canada build a greenhouse in which to produce carrots so as to supply our winter market, the principle would be the same; it would prevent the importation of carrots and other vegetables from the United States and thereby conserve exchange. Once this idea is apprehended by the people we shall approach from an entirely different angle the matter of conserving foreign exchange.

Mr. McNEVIN: What would happen to the Canadian farmer if the United States did the same in respect to our cattle? We manufacture between ninety-seven and ninety-eight per cent of all our shoes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member is asking a very good question but he is confused by the anomalies of our present system. He cannot tell to save his life what to do with the various commodities of which we now have a surplus, such as the wheat that the farmer of western Canada is producing in abundance. He raises these questions which confront us under our present system, whereby the country is cluttered up from end to end with unsalable products—in itself an indication that it is essential to have a change in the system. We could eliminate the consumption of foreign goods just as Canada could eliminate the buying of United States steel if the production of Canadian iron were promoted and our dependence on United States iron done away with. We can in large measure eliminate the need for United States exchange without raising any difficulties or doing anything which might be objectionable. We can also gradually increase our own production, thereby avoiding inflation; we can increase our home consumption, which will raise the standard of living among the people, make for prosperity and happiness, and give the government a greater taxing base, which is another thing much to be desired.

What I am about to say now may not appear to bear directly on the question under discussion, but certainly it does relate to it indirectly. If the adjusting is done with created money instead of with borrowed or taxed money, the strain on the Canadian people will be removed. The only question which arises is whether such action will cause inflation. Again let me say that if we can borrow money which would not ordinarily be spent, and spend it without causing a rise in prices, we can create the same amount of money and spend it without giving rise to inflation. I believe that is quite clear.

If we create the money we will avoid inflation provided that we take care to look for four things. First, we must see to it that we have plenty of goods; second, we must have a sufficient variety of those goods; third, we must have plenty of resources to produce more goods, and, fourth, we must have the planning which will supply a still greater variety and a greater abundance.

For example, let us consider the facts in connection with wool. We may have the fear that if we permit money to go into circulation the price of wool will go up. But if we produce more wool we shall have then approached the matter from an entirely different angle. We could increase the wool production of Canada to such an extent that the Canadian people could not begin to buy all the Canadian wool, and endanger a rise in price. Once the government approaches the problem from that angle it will have an altogether different outlook concerning the whole inflation situation, and will understand what I said the other day—that it is following a niggardly policy with respect to Canada. It is starving the Canadian people down, instead of stimulating them to the greatest possible production and to consumption which will give them the greatest possible strength in the contest upon which we have only entered.

I shall now turn to the matter of profits. As the hon. member for Edmonton East will probably see, by following the proposals I was making the other day when I said we were living in an age of plenty, he would see that we would have plenty of foreign exchange if we had plenty of production of a sufficiently great variety at a sufficiently low price. So that the problem would be cleared up.

Mr. CASSELMAN (Edmonton East): Provided you could get the other country to buy your goods.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes, but if you could not get the other country to buy your goods you would have accomplished one great thing when you produced plenty and enabled your own people to buy them.

Mr. CASSELMAN (Edmonton East): What about the production of more wheat?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I shall come to that. That is one of the things confounding people to-day; Canadians do not see how to deal with it. Before I finish my speech I wish to deal with it, although it is not part of the subject of the debate. If the hon. member wishes to ask questions when I have finished my observations I shall be only too pleased to answer them, because I am not advocating anything that is not scientifically sound.

Social credit is simply a new order, that is all. It is a way by which we can raise revenue without dragging ourselves down into a state of niggardly scarcity, through which we are in danger of being defeated.

This question may be raised: Why did the Social Credit party support the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in their attitude toward the taking away of money from people who had money to spare? I would draw the attention of the house to the fact that the amendment then under consideration said, in effect, "We will take a compulsory war loan, free of interest, according to ability to subscribe—"

The CHAIRMAN: I am sorry, but the hon. member cannot refer to another debate of the same session.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I bow to your ruling, and shall not continue along that line.

I agree with the minister when he says that under the present system it is necessary that companies must have a profit. There is no possibility of avoiding it, and there are several reasons why. Companies need to have a profit because, as has been pointed out, they are afraid of the aftermath of the war. When a man invests $100,000 in a plant, knowing that almost any day the war may come to an end and his market may be lost and his investment thereby jeopardized, he will of course require a sufficient profit.

Canada could organize on such a basis that producers would not demand exorbitant profits. If there were an arrangement whereby we could guarantee to the farmer that no more wheat would be produced than could be used, he would not be taking such a tremendous risk if he were to invest $10,000 in a farm. The same reasoning is true with respect to a company. If we could guarantee that production and consumption would be planned and that prices would be maintained at stable levels, with no fear of disastrous changes in tariff or of loss of trade as a result of which a man might be ruined, there would be no necessity for all these great profits which companies are now so eagerly trying to get.

In my view, under the capitalistic system, the profit motive is quite sound. The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley) spoke wisely: without profits we simply cannot get along under the capitalistic system. The minute we try to do so, production is stopped. The only way to induce production would then be by threat of punishment. If that were done we would have regimentation.

We want profit, but we do not want exploitation. I do not think my hon. friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation would object to profit so long as there were no exploitation.

Mr. MacNICOL: Don't offer them any; they won't refuse it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think that is probably so. Perhaps my ideas are somewhat at variance with those of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar when it comes to a discussion of profits. But man has not yet found any effective incentive for production other than that of profit. It is dangerous to seek to abolish the profit motive. I believe the minister has realized that fact, and as a result he is now introducing these measures.

Mr. REID: It is part of our lives.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes, I would say it is. We must take the choice between profit and regimentation—and I do not for one moment favour regimentation. It is said that Lenin brought in the machine gun to take the place of the profit motive. Well, that was not a good thing; it immediately brought about a dictatorship. I believe you can encourage people to produce all you want them to produce. You can encourage them to sell at whatever price you wish to prevail, if you just manage the profit properly. The profit motive is the only way of preserving democracy, because the very minute you force a man to raise wheat or to work, for example, in a mine, you have destroyed completely democracy.

I believe we must contrive to give a fair profit, or one adequate to encourage production; there must be a profit for all—for primary as well as for secondary producers, for farmer as well as manufacturer.

May I turn once more to the observations of the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg. As I understand the situation, there are two distinct classes of production. First there is the primary producer, such as the fisherman or the farmer, who, generally speaking, lives on his profit. But the man engaged in, we will say, machine manufacturing, does not necessarily live on his profit. His wages or his living are included in the cost which goes into the price of his output.

Mr. KINLEY: If he operates as an incorporated company.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes.

Mr. KINLEY: He creates another person, in law, to carry on his business.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes. We must bear in mind the fact that the farmer simply cannot live without profit, because that is all the living he has. How can the fisherman live without profit? He must make money. We must distinguish between the profit of the primary producer who lives on his profit, and the profit of the secondary producer who does not live on his profit. But the secondary producer uses his profit to pad and to protect himself against eventualities to come. Therefore he needs profit—in fact a rather large profit. Once we get that in our minds we can stop worrying about big profits and big industry. The iron industry is a war industry. The man conducting such a plant is constantly worrying over what he is going to do after the war is over. He is thinking of the day when iron will not be needed to kill men, when there will be a surplus of that commodity in the world. He wonders how he will be able to sell iron then.

What could happen was seen in the last war when sugar production was increased to such a tremendous extent that after the war there was more sugar than the people could use and the sugar producers were almost all ruined. The men who are conducting our war industries are certainly worrying about what is going to happen when they are not able to sell their products. The man engaged in war industry should be dealt with in a particular kind of way. He has his own money invested and there is the investment of his shareholders. These are the main reasons why he needs considerable profits. There should be a fair profit for both the primary and the secondary producer.

May I suggest once more that consideration be given to what is known as the social credit just price by the creation and wise use of money based upon the goods-and-services-producing-and-consuming-power of the country. For example, the amount of money which can be created and given to farmers in price modifications depends upon whether there are plenty of things that are used by the farmers which the farmers can buy with the money they earn. If there are, the money will not cause inflation. Again: The amount of money which can be created and advanced to railways as freight adjustments depends upon what commodities the railways will spend the money which they receive, and whether there are sufficient goods for which they can spend the money without causing a rise in prices. The railroads will buy coal. Is there plenty of coal? They will buy oil. Is there plenty of oil? If there is plenty of oil and plenty of coal, there will be no rise in the prices of those commodities. As soon as we begin to look at the matter in this way, the dread of social credit proposals will be removed immediately.

To sum up, I agree completely with the minister when he says that there must be a fair profit. Measures must also be taken to help the producers not only to produce all we want, but to produce it at prices that will give the producers, both primary and secondary, a return for their production.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It is to be regretted that in the dying minutes of this part of the session we should have to consider such important legislation as this is embodied in this resolution. We spent weeks and days in the last session discussing the budget and amending the Income War Tax Act and the Excess Profits Tax Act, but by this one resolution practically the whole thing is being wiped out in that it places within the power of the governor in council the right to discriminate and grant special privileges.

The CHAIRMAN: I did not want to interrupt the leader of the social credit group, but the fact is that we are now discussing resolution 7.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Resolution 6 has not been passed.

The CHAIRMAN: Resolution 6 has been agreed to.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

The CHAIRMAN: I should know whether it has been carried. Resolution 6 has been carried and we are now discussnig resolution 7.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We were under another impression.

The CHAIRMAN: Unless the committee is willing that the hon. member should revert to resolution 6, he will have to address his remarks to the subject matter of resolution 7.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Mr. Chairman, I have been waiting to speak on resolution 6. At the time you said that this resolution was agreed to, there were two hon. members on their feet.

The CHAIRMAN: Resolution 6 has been carried.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I think this resolution places the people of Canada in a precarious position.

The CHAIRMAN: Unless the hon. member secures the unanimous consent of the committee to revert to resolution 6, he cannot discuss this matter.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I call upon the committee to give its consent to my reverting to resolution 6.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the committee that the hon. member shall have permission to revert to resolution No. 6?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am inclined to think we should give the hon. gentleman a chance to speak. If there has been a misunderstanding, I think this permission should be granted. I thought of raising the point when the hon. member for Lethbridge was talking, but there seems to be some misapprehension in that corner of the house. I think we shall get along more quickly if we let these gentlemen say what they have on their minds.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the committee willing to give unanimous consent to the hon. gentleman reverting to resolution 6?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The trouble that I see in connection with this legislation is that it is bound to lead to some form of discrimination. An individual, partnership or corporation may be granted assistance by way of special tax credits or special allowances for depreciation or depletion under the Income War Tax Act. It seems to me that every company in Canada will be asking for this. These companies will be compelled to ask for favours from the administration, and I do not see how certain businesses can continue to exist in such an atmosphere. Already the government has taken certain representatives of big business into some of the departments, and it seems to me that the natural result of this legislation will be increased lobbying. There will be a disgraceful scramble for special concessions, and the successful lobbyists will be able to wipe out any opposition.

This creates a monopoly, and industries in less favoured parts of this dominion may suffer considerably. The resources of Canada are owned in a large part by monopolistic organizations. They own and control much of the machinery of production. Owning the natural resources of this country and having control of production, they are able to tell the primary producer what he shall get for the commodity he raises and can dictate to labour what it shall receive.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will the hon. member name just one monopoly?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The oil industry and the power industry in eastern Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: We have the hydro electric power commission in Ontario which is not a monopoly, but a public utility.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Beauharnois and Montreal Light, Heat and Power company.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Nickel is a world monopoly.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Also the General Electric Company of America. Many businesses can continue only upon the condition of their claims being favourably considered by government officials. I cannot see how justice can exist in such an atmosphere. I cannot see how we can continue to sit in this house and favourably consider legislation which will grant one kind of treatment to one group of people and give special privileges to another. It will be a sad day for the people of Canada if this thing should continue any further.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to speak at any length on this matter, but I wish to point out to the government that perhaps they should spend a little time in reading the remarks of the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore). If that were done—and I say this advisedly—then as far as I am concerned there would be no objection to this resolution passing. As it now stands, however, I am definitely opposed to it because in my opinion it is class legislation. I think the minister must acknowledge that this is just another belt-tightening process and it will be something that will bear most heavily upon the common people. There is to be an increased price for washing machines, but I do not think anyone ever bought a washing machine as a luxury. When you begin to increase the price on articles such as this, you just make it that much more difficult for the common people. This resolution reads:

That the governor in council in order to increase Canada's supply of foreign exchange—

There are many other ways of increasing our supply of foreign exchange, as the hon. member for Lethbridge pointed out.

—may, on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance, enter into agreements with individuals, partnerships or corporations—

I fancy that the minister has not in mind the agricultural or fishing industries, and I am sure that he has not in mind the fruit growers. If this is to be class legislation, then it is definitely wrong.

—to grant assistance by way of special tax credits and/or special allowances for depreciation or depletion under the Income War Tax Act and the Excess Profits Tax Act—

There is a great danger in these depreciation allowances.

—if, in the opinion of the governor in council, such assistance is necessary in order that an expansion of the exports of any individual, partnership or corporation receiving such assistance may take place.

According to the minister himself, these large corporations are making an excess profit of 20·4 per cent, so that besides making their regular profit over the base period, and an additional 20·4 per cent, we are going to grant still further concessions to them. Immediately following the resolution is a long list of items with regard to which the common people will have to tighten their belts a little more, so that they will really appreciate that we are at war. I really fear the outcome. This type of legislation is not going to stimulate patriotism; it is going to create dissatisfaction among those who joined the army because of economic insecurity, and it is not conducive to the creation of unity in Canada, which we so greatly need at this time.

We talk of equality of sacrifice and service. I am in favour of that principle, and I am convinced that if there were an indication to the public, even to the members here, that there was going to be equality of sacrifice and service for all classes and every part of Canada, such a step would do much to promote unity. But at a time when agriculture, fishing, and coal mining are not making the profit they did before; when many of the workers in those industries are still unemployed, and when the cost of living is going up for the common people, the government brings down legislation like this favouring the big industries still further. I recommend to the minister that he give close scrutiny to the speech which has just been made by the hon. member for Lethbridge.

Resolution agreed to.

On schedule 1.

Customs tariff—20. Cocoa paste or "liquor" and chocolate paste or "liquor," not sweetened, in blocks or cakes.

Mr. ILSLEY: There are amendments, Mr. Chairman, to some of the items so we shall have to take the schedule item by item.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Items 20 to 23 inclusive are the cocoa items. Do we import much?

Mr. ILSLEY: Imports from non-empire countries during the calendar year 1939 amounted under item 20 to $2,000; under item 21, $9,000; under item 22, $215,000; and under item 23, $42,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are important items.

Item agreed to.

Items 21, 22, 23, ex 45, 46, 65, 66, 67, 78, 79, 79a, 79b, 82(d), 82(e), and 85 agreed to.

Customs tariff—89. Vegetables, prepared, in air-tight cans or other air-tight containers:
(a) Beans, baked or otherwise prepared.
(b) Corn and tomatoes.
(c) Peas.
(d) N.o.p.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Is any provision being made to protect the farmer in Canada, particularly in British Columbia, who is producing vegetables and small fruits?

Mr. ILSLEY: This item refers to vegetables, prepared, in cans, and not to fresh fruits and vegetables, which have not been prohibited for the reason I gave in the speech I made to the house.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Is the minister aware of the fact that while pears are rotting on the ground in British Columbia, pears are being imported into that province from the United States to be canned and preserved?

Mr. ILSLEY: I was not aware of that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This item deals with vegetables.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: When I have to take my instructions from the leader of the opposition it will be a sad day for this house. I am not prepared to let this item carry yet. I stated that pears are being imported into British Columbia to be canned while our own pears are rotting on the ground, and I ask the minister if provision will be made to prohibit these importations from the United States.

Mr. ILSLEY: We are taking no power under this legislation to prevent the canning of fruits and vegetables.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Why not?

Mr. ILSLEY: This is a measure for the conservation of foreign exchange, and we have put in the schedule the items we think should be there. I gave the other day the reason why we are not prohibiting the importation of fruits and vegetables.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I heard the minister speak this afternoon and he used the words—I have them exactly—"reserves for companies for future use". That was in reference to industrial concerns. In other words, industries producing shells or other essentials for war purposes ought to be allowed a reasonable profit and to prepare for the future. I would ask the minister if he honestly thinks there is any industry more necessary than agriculture. Is the farmer not to be protected, not only for the future but for to-day? I am telling the minister that pears from the United States are being dumped into British Columbia, and canned and preserved. I am speaking for the British Columbia farmers in my riding, and I am asking the minister how he can account for the fact that pears are imported from Washington and Oregon to be canned in the Fraser Valley ridings?

Mr. ILSLEY: All I can say is that the matter has been gone into fully, previously in the debate.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Then I ask the minister, has the government any intention of making any provision to take care of these farmers?

Mr. ILSLEY: For what?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Has the government any intention of making any provision to take care of all these farmers in the Fraser Valley riding who are now losing their farms owing to the fact that fruit from the United States is being dumped into British Columbia?

Mr. ILSLEY: Not in this bill.

Mr. COLDWELL: I wish to ask, arising out of this, in the event of fruit being brought in from Washington and canned in British Columbia, is it distinguishable as a Canadian or a United States or a British empire product? How is it marked? Is there any way of getting a mark on it?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. If it has a certain British empire content, it has the advantage of the British preference in entering such other parts of the British empire as give special preferential rates. On account of war conditions, I do not know how important the trade is now.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. COLDWELL: Is there any check on that?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; there is the check of the investigators of the Department of National Revenue. They have auditors specially qualified in the determination of British empire content.

Item agreed to.

Item 90 agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 99b. Apples, dried, desiccated, evaporated or dehydrated.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East) moved:

That item ex 99b be amended to read as follows: Apples, dried, desiccated, evaporated or dehydrated (not to include apple pomace imported for use in Canadian manufactures).

Mr. ILSLEY: The reason for that is that it is necessary for the preservation and continued operation of the pectin industry to import some apple pomace from the United States.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We do not make it here?

Mr. ILSLEY: Some is made in Canada, but not enough, and such as is available has to come such distances that it is not an economic proposition.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is not a large item anyway.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—99f. Figs, dried.

Mr. COLDWELL: Figs are used quite largely by parents, sometimes for health purposes, for children. Is there another large source of supply?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not aware that there is. The whole of the imports of figs comes from non-empire countries—$217,000 worth last year. Whether there is an alternative empire source, I do not know.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Palestine?

Mr. ILSLEY: It may be that there is a sterling area source. I am not aware of it.

Item agreed to.

Item ex 99g agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex. 101. Mandarins and tangerines.

Mr. GREEN: Does that cover what are commonly known as Japanese oranges?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Have the government, under their special powers, any intention of allowing any Japanese oranges to come in at this time, or is this prohibition to be a real prohibition?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no intention of letting them in at all. I do not know just what the arrangements are regarding those ordered and to come within a certain time. That is a matter of detail in the hands of the Minister of National Revenue. But, subject to that, undoubtedly these are to be prohibited and no licences granted.

Mr. GREEN: It is practically all a Christmas trade, and I should like to know.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, I do not know.

Mr. GREEN: I should like to know whether this Christmas supply is to be allowed in.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are all in now.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know.

Mr. COLDWELL: I understand that citrus fruits from the United States are allowed to come in.

Mr. ILSLEY: All except mandarins and tangerines.

Mr. COLDWELL: We exclude mandarins and tangerines from the United States as well as other countries?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like to ask the minister a direct question, will what are known as Japanese oranges be permitted to enter Canada this year?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have to get the information from the Minister of National Revenue. I find that there is a customs bulletin affecting not only mandarins and tangerines, but everything, to this effect:

> Goods ordered prior to December 2, 1940—
> Goods which were ordered prior to December 2nd, and which arrive at the customs port of destination on or before February 28, 1941, will be admitted under general permit No. G-1. Full information, supported by a certified copy of the purchase order and such other documentary evidence as may be required, shall be presented to the collector. . . .

All precautions are taken to see that the order is bona fide. Therefore, if the mandarins or tangerines were ordered prior to December 2, and the order accepted, and if they come in prior to February 28, 1941, they will be admitted under this ruling of the national revenue department.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Has the government power under the War Measures Act to overrule any order, so-called, that was passed before December 2, and cancel it? If so will they do so?

Mr. ILSLEY: My opinion is that they have the power. My answer to the second part of the question is that they will not do so.

Mr. GREEN: What is the value of imports of Japanese oranges this year?

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot give the hon. member the information. My information is that imports from Japan are much smaller than formerly, although there are substantial shipments of mandarins and tangerines from the United States this year; they are much larger than in former years.

Mr. GREEN: I understand that the bulk of importations from Japan come through the United States, or at any rate, that they have to be paid for in United States currency.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is so.

Mr. GREEN: What permits have been given for the purchase of United States exchange to buy these oranges? There has been a great agitation about this on the coast—

Mr. ILSLEY: I know.

Mr. GREEN: —and the information would be most desirable.

Mr. ILSLEY: I know there has been a great agitation about the matter, and I believe that, as a result, the orders have been very much smaller than usual. I have no information about exchange. It would take some time to trace that down, and I am told it is information which is extremely difficult to get. It is much easier to get the facts as to imports than it is to get the amount of exchange which has been made available for payment of those imports. It involves, I understand, the examination of every individual transaction to find out whether it was paid for in United States exchange or not. There is such a thing as paying for imports with Canadian exchange, the money remaining in this country.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—102. Limes.

Mr. FULFORD: Why are limes included in this list? Limes form a part of the diet of the British navy and have done so for one hundred and fifty years. One reason why British sailors are known as "limeys" is the fact that they use so many limes.

Mr. ILSLEY: They are available from British empire sources. The bulk of imports of limes have come from empire countries.

In 1939 we received $6,000 worth from non-empire countries and $23,000 from empire sources.

Item agreed to.

Items 103 and 104 agreed to.

Customs tariff—104a. Fruit pulp, other than grape pulp, not sweetened in air-tight cans or other air-tight packages.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Will the minister give an explanation of this item?

Mr. ILSLEY: All I could do by way of explanation would be to read the item.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I have heard so many different explanations.

Mr. COLDWELL: Why is grape pulp prohibited under this item?

Mr. ILSLEY: This simply follows the wording of the tariff item.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was wondering whether grape pulp was excluded because it is used in the wine-making industry.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not excluded here for that reason.

Mr. COLDWELL: Only for the reason that these items follow the tariff?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Items 105, 105a, 105b, 105c, 105d, 105e, 106, 107 and 108 agreed to.

Customs tariff—109. Nuts of all kinds, n.o.p., including shelled peanuts, n.o.p.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Does the minister think there are sufficient sources of supply in the British empire to warrant this item? Some people must have nuts to provide the necessary protein.

Mr. ILSLEY: British India will be able to supply us with walnuts and cashew nuts, but to a large extent Canadians will have to do without these high-priced luxury nuts. The opinion is that this sacrifice is fully justified by the emergency. China and India are the principal sources of green peanuts. Coconuts and non-edible nuts are not listed.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What about almond nuts? Are there sources of supply in the empire?

Mr. ILSLEY: They do not come from other parts of the empire. They are all from non-empire countries and are prohibited.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I mention this because there are people who are definitely unable to get the necessary proteins from any other source, and it will be a great hardship on them unless some provision is made to meet their situation. Perhaps for the sake of health, provision could be made for the granting of a licence to obtain nuts where necessary. One person told me the other day that he would have to leave the country if he could not get nuts because he is so constituted that other kinds of proteins do not agree with him.

Item 114 agreed to.

Customs tariff—121. Fish preserved in oil, n.o.p.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It seems to me that the farmer has been the fish all his life. There is no provision being made to protect farmers, is there?

Mr. ILSLEY: None is being made in the present proposals.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Is it intended to make any?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not the intention to make any alterations.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Why not?

Mr. ILSLEY: For the reasons already given.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does this item mean that we shall have no more Norwegian sardines?

Mr. ILSLEY: Norway is enemy-occupied territory.

Item agreed to.

Items 123, 123a, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 141, 143, 143a, 144, 145, 146, 147, 147a, agreed to.

Customs tariff—150. Lime juice and fruit juices, fortified with or containing not more than 25 per cent of proof spirits.

Mr. GREEN: Does this include orange juice and grapefruit juice, or are they allowed to come in?

Mr. ILSLEY: Grapefruit juice is permitted entry under another item. Orange juice as such is prohibited.

Item agreed to.

Item 151 agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 152. Lime juice, fruit syrups and fruit juices, n.o.p. (but not including grapefruit juice).

Mr. BRUCE: The other day a question arose as to the relative vitamin content of orange juice and tomato juice. In order to clarify the situation, so that there might be no mistake either in this house or among the Canadian people, I got in touch with Doctor

Tisdall in Toronto. I can now give the exact result of an investigation made in the laboratory of the department of paediatrics in the university of Toronto, which is under the direction of Doctor Alan Brown, who has associated with him an eminent nutrition expert, Doctor F. F. Tisdall. The result of their investigation will be found in the June, 1940, issue of the Canadian Hospital, in which is given the total vitamin C content—vitamin C I should explain is ascorbic acid—as determined by chemical means, of various fresh and canned juices which were bought at retail in Toronto during the winter of 1939-40. The ascorbic acid (vitamin C) content is given in milligrammes per 100 cubic centimetres and per ounce, together with the milligrammes of ascorbic acid purchasable for one cent.

The vitamin C or ascorbic acid content of citrus juice varies considerably in the different varieties. In the table given, the content of vitamin C in one ounce of canned California orange juice is 11·3 milligrammes. In the best brand of sieved canned tomato juice it is 6·9 milligrammes. It takes, therefore, only a little over one and a half times as much tomato juice to get the same amount of vitamin C as there is in California orange juice. It will therefore be seen that the statement made by an hon. member the other day that it would take twenty times as much tomato juice is not correct. The juice of sieved Canadian canned tomatoes is as economical a source of ascorbic acid or vitamin C as the juice obtained from fresh California oranges, and also as useful for health as grapefruit juice or any other citrus fruit juice.

I think it will only be necessary to call the attention of the Canadian public to this fact in order to have them make a much wider use of tomato juice than they are now making, and also to enable them as a war measure to discontinue the use of orange or grapefruit juice and substitute in its place a home-grown product which will not only be as healthful but also be of advantage by conserving foreign exchange.

Just to complete this statement, I should say that because it does require a slightly larger bulk, for very young infants grapefruit juice or orange juice would be preferable. But that will be only a very small part of the requirements of the country.

Mr. REID: Is the vitamin content of all oranges the same as that quoted?

Mr. BRUCE: It varies slightly. I have the list here, but I did not think I should trouble the committee with the complete story. It is all to be found in Canadian Hospital for June, 1940. It varies with the oranges; Florida oranges are slightly richer in vitamin C than those from California, and the same with regard to grapefruit juice, but by only a small amount.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May I ask the hon. member a question, because it may help me in voting. What vitamins are to be found in item 156a?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I interrupt the proceedings for a moment to ascertain the sense of the committee on the question of continuance of the present discussion. I believe it is more or less hoped and expected that it will be possible to reach adjournment of the house to-night until February 17, so as to avoid the necessity of hon. members coming back on Monday. If that were not within the realm of probability, I would not suggest what I am about to suggest.

If hon. members are agreeable, it might help to ensure that end if consent were given to continuing the discussion in committee of ways and means by running on at six o'clock—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I notice many appear to be in favour of this and I hear none to the contrary. If that be the situation, I should wish to have His Honour the Speaker in the chair in order to move that there be no intermission between the hours of six and eight o'clock.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I move that there be no intermission between the hours of six and eight o'clock this day.

WAYS AND MEANS

WAR EXCHANGE CONSERVATION ACT, 1940

The house resumed in committee of ways and means, Mr. Vien in the chair.

Customs tariff—ex 152. Lime juice, fruit syrups and fruit juices, n.o.p. (but not including grapefruit juice).

Mr. McNIVEN: Citrus fruits are admitted into this country, but as I understand this item, orange juice, lemon juice and lime juice are to be excluded?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. McNIVEN: Has the minister considered the industries that are carrying on the manufacture of carbonated beverages? In these products fruit juice syrups form a very small part of the cost of the completed product. There are a number of such industries throughout Canada; there are several in my own province. They import the concentrated syrup and turn out a manufactured product. The cost of the beverage is small; the manufacture is largely labour, and the other ingredients are obtainable in this country. But the concentrated syrups are essential for the continuation of this business. Has the minister considered the position he is putting that business in?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know that consideration has been given to the welfare of those particular businesses; the matter has been dealt with on different principles from that. Grapefruit juice has been left in because we are informed that it is the cheapest way of getting the vitamins required from fruit juices. Therefore, for the health of our population, we are permitting the import of grapefruit juice, and that is all that is necessary really in addition to tomato juice. From the point of view of health it might be a bad thing to shut out this cheap grapefruit juice which is an economical way for poor people to get vitamins, but to permit the importation of a variety of juices in order to keep people who use them in carbonated beverages in business, I do not think is a sufficiently important consideration to be taken into account in view of more important matters.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Good spring water is better for us.

Mr. McNIVEN: Would the minister consider making the same amendment he made to another item a moment or two ago, and permit the importation when brought in by manufacturers for use in their own plant?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; this is not necessary. These carbonated juices are not necessary. There are substitutes in Canada which are quite good enough. In this instance there is no question of going without fruit. There would be no harmful effects upon the population.

Item agreed to.

Items 153, ex 156, 156a, 160 and ex 162 agreed to.

Customs tariff—163. Wines of all kinds, n.o.p., including orange, lemon, strawberry, raspberry, elder and currant wines, containing 26 per cent or less of proof spirit, whether imported in wood or in bottles.

Mr. ILSLEY: My colleague will move an amendment to this item.

Mr. McLARTY: I move:

That item 163 be stricken out, and the following substituted therefor:

"163. Wines of all kinds, n.o.p., including orange, lemon, strawberry, raspberry, elder and currant wines, containing 40 per cent or less of proof spirit, whether imported in wood or in bottles."

Mr. ILSLEY: This amendment is for the purpose of making absolutely clear that all wines dutiable under item 163 and the addendum thereto are prohibited. Item 163, which was quoted verbatim in the original resolution, provides for wines containing 26 per cent or less of proof spirits. The addendum provides for additional duties on wines from 26 per cent to 40 per cent proof spirits. Wines over 40 per cent proof spirits are classified under item 156. The effect is to shut them all out.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If it were left at 26 per cent, it would not cover those between 26 per cent and 40 per cent?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Customs tariff—165. Champagne and all other sparkling wines.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suppose the minister knows that there are at present substantial quantities of these champagnes and wines in the country. I believe there would be enough to supply us for a couple of years. The department would have information about quantities on hand. Will there be any prohibition against taking these wines and champagnes out of bond?

Mr. ILSLEY: In customs bond?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes; most of these commodities are taken out from time to time from bonded warehouses. The liquor commissions take them from the bonded warehouses as they need them, and pay for them in that way.

Mr. ILSLEY: That matter would come under the supervision of the Department of National Revenue—so long as delivery is taken on or before February 28.

Item agreed to.

Items 181a, ex 184d, ex 169, ex 170, ex 171, 194, 195, ex 197, ex 197b, ex 198, ex 199, ex 181 and ex 509 agreed to.

Customs tariff—228. Soap powders, powdered soap, mineral soap, and soap, n.o.p.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): What proportion comes from sterling countries now, as compared with what comes from hard-currency countries, under item 228?

Mr. ILSLEY: In 1939, $145,000 worth came from non-empire countries, and $92,000 worth from empire countries.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Are those non-empire countries hard-currency countries?

Mr. ILSLEY: Roughly speaking, that is correct.

Item agreed to.

Items 233 and 234 agreed to.

Customs tariff—284. Drain pipes, sewer pipes and earthenware fittings therefor, chimney fittings or vents, chimney tops and inverted blocks, glazed or unglazed, n.o.p.; earthenware tiles, n.o.p.

An hon. MEMBER: Does that include wall tile for bathrooms?

Mr. ILSLEY: They would be included in one or the other of items 284 and 285.

Item agreed to.

Items 285, 287, 288, 289, 323, 326(ii), ex 353, ex 353a, 362, 362b, ex 415, 415a, ex 415b, 425, 429, 433, ex 438a, ex 438g, 439, ex 439b, ex 440a, 440j, ex 443, 444b, ex 445, ex 445d, ex 445j, 450, 451e, ex 462, 465, and 468 agreed to.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would ask my colleague to move an addition at this point.

Mr. McLARTY: I move:

That schedule 1, part I of the resolution be amended by adding to the said schedule the following item:

"ex 473a, ex 475, ex 472, ex 180, ex 180d, ex 181, et al. Printing plates of all kinds, copper or other shells, matrices, positive or negative films, transfers, proofs, illustrations, covers, inserts or other printed matter, for use in connection with the production of the publications covered by item ex 184d et al of this schedule which were not printed in Canada during the three months immediately prior to December 1, 1940."

Mr. ILSLEY: A number of publications are prohibited under item ex 184d. I believe it would be possible to have printed in Canada a number of magazines known in the trade as pulps. The publishers would simply have to transfer their plates from the United States to Canada, and print them in this country. This is to shut out the matrices, and thereby prevent that from being done. The justification is that it would involve a heavy expenditure of exchange to bring in those matrices. There is the further consideration that there does not seem to be much point in debarring the periodicals, if the difficulty can be overcome simply by moving their place of business.

Amendment agreed to.

Item ex 473a, ex 475, ex 472, ex 180, ex 180d, ex 181 et al agreed to.

Items 508, 511, 511b, 512, 514, 515, 518, 519 and ex 532 agreed to.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will ask my colleague to move an amendment in substitution for item ex 532, ex 548, ex 555.

Mr. McLARTY: I move:

That schedule 1, part I of the resolution be amended by striking out item ex 532, ex 548, ex 555 and substituting therefor the following:

"ex 532, ex 548, ex 555. Articles made from woven fabrics and textile manufactures, wholly or partially manufactured, composed wholly or in part of cotton, flax, wool or other textile fibres, as specified, namely: sheets, blankets, quilts, counterpanes, bedspreads, comforters and other bed coverings; hassocks, pillows, cushions, including pin-cushions filled or not, pillow-cases, cushion covers and similar articles; tablecloths, napkins, tray cloths, dresser scarves, doilies and similar articles; diapers; towels, wash cloths, bath mats, bathroom mats, seat covers, curtains, drapes, window runners, decorative panels and similar articles; automobile rugs, steamer rugs and similar rugs or coverings; canopies, awnings and tents; removable coverings for automobile and furniture upholstery; textile manufactures composed in part of embroideries or lace."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The only difference is the deletion of the words "except silk and artificial silk or other synthetic fibres." That is the effect of the amendment. Artificial silk or other synthetic fibres are now included in the prohibition.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is purely a technical matter. They are already included in another item, and it is not necessary to have them in this item.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is simply taking them out of this item. This item can be carried without amendment, the amendment being to the next item.

Mr. McCANN: When the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) was speaking a few minutes ago, he made reference to a statement which I had interjected when the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) was speaking. According to the very sheet from which he quoted I submit that he deliberately failed to give the committee the proper information. Either that, or he and I were speaking of two entirely different matters. The information on the sheet from which he quoted, which information he failed to give the committee, is to the effect that in the case of canned tomatoes the juice is obtained by a thorough rubbing through a sieve. The remark which I interjected the other day when the leader of the opposition was speaking was that it took twenty times the quantity of ordinary tomato juice as sold in cans to produce the same amount of vitamin C as is produced by orange juice sold in cans. That statement still holds good. The figure given by the hon. member for Parkdale had to do with specially prepared tomatoes which were put through a sieve. From his point of view his statement may be correct, but from my point of view my statement is equally correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You just did not mean the same thing.

Amendment agreed to.

Item ex 532, ex 548, ex 555 as amended agreed to.

Item 532a, ex 548 agreed to.

Item ex 548 agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 555. Clothing and wearing apparel, wholly or partially manufactured, composed wholly or in part of wool or similar animal fibres, but of which the component of chief value is not silk nor artificial silk, n.o.p.

Mr. POTTIER: It seems to me that this is a good item under which to bring up a matter of overcoats. Yesterday the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) brought up a similar matter before the committee, and he is reported as follows on page 700 of Hansard:

Last week I was driving home from Amherst to Oxford and Pugwash and I overtook a soldier. He wanted to get home to his family in Oxford. I asked him where his overcoat was and he said that none had been issued to him. I suggested that he must be an exception and he assured me that there were 200 men in the North Nova Scotia Highlanders who had not yet been given greatcoats.

There were communications with Colonel Murdoch, the officer commanding the North Nova Scotia Highlanders stationed at Amherst, and he advises that all of his men are equipped with greatcoats except twelve who are of abnormal size, and that action has been taken to furnish coats to those twelve and they will be provided with them within three days. That is quite a different matter from 200 men being without greatcoats.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Since the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare (Mr. Pottier) brought up this matter, I should like him to complete his report and inform the committee whether this statement was of November 30, the date to which I referred. With the weather we have had in the last few days, I certainly hope that these men have been fitted out with greatcoats, especially when there are 411,000 of them on order.

Item agreed to.

Items 560, 560a, 560b, 560d, 560e, 562, 564, 565, 567, 567a, 568, 568a, 568b, 568c, ex 569(i), ex 569(ii), ex 569(v), 569a(i), 569a(ii), 569d, 578, 597, ex 597a, and ex 598 agreed to.

Customs tariff—598a. Brass band instruments, of a class or kind not made in Canada; bag pipes and complete parts thereof.

[Mr. McCann.]

Mr. REID: Why should this item be included here when the fact is no bag pipes come from the United States? I would have thought that bag pipes would be included in item ex 597a which covers musical instruments of all kinds. I raise this question because there is a growing sentiment among some of the officials of the department and among certain officers in the service forces which is quite prejudicial to these instruments. I am doing what I believe is right on behalf of a race which is just as proud of its lineage as any other in this country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it not a fact that none come in from the United States?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think that is correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it not a further fact that a great number of the articles enumerated in this schedule do not come from the United States at all and that they are more or less window-dressing? A large number of these items refer to commodities that we do not get from hard-currency countries. These look much more impressive than they are, but on the whole they amount to a substantial quantity. When the minister gets through, I am going to ask him to be good enough to give the sum total of importations in, say the last fiscal year, under the items covered by part I of the schedule. Then we can appreciate the magnitude of the changes.

Mr. ILSLEY: The total was $53,000,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But there are in the schedule many items of which we import nothing, and the item of bag pipes is perhaps the best illustration.

Mr. ILSLEY: We took the exact wording of the items in the customs tariff. Some parts of those items, like this one, would be a dead letter I have no doubt, but the reason for taking the wording of the present items is that the customs collectors have had long experience and are guided by a large number of rulings as to what comes within any particular item.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I quite agree. May I ask, with reference to item 598, whether we make band instruments in Canada. We are starting up a number of bands for the soldiers.

Mr. ILSLEY: We make a few in a small way.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what I thought. In my town they are starting a band for sixty cadets, and I am wondering where they are going to get their band instruments. May they get them from the United Kingdom?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All right; that is settled.

Item agreed to.

Items 603, ex 604, 605a, 611b, 622 and 623 agreed to.

Customs tariff—Item 624. Bead ornaments, and ornaments of alabaster, spar, amber, terra cotta or composition; fans of all kinds; statues and statuettes of any material, n.o.p.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is an amendment to this item.

Mr. McLARTY: I move, Mr. Chairman, to strike out item 624 and substitute therefor the following:

Customs tariff—Item 624 et al. Bead ornaments, and ornaments of alabaster, spar, amber, terra cotta, composition, or other material; fans of all kinds; statues and statuettes of any material, n.o.p.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The words "or other material" have been added. What is the significance of that?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is estimated that it will bring in about $100,000 worth of goods which otherwise would be left out.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Items 624a, 624b, 625, 629, 634, 634 (ii), 647, 648, 648a and 652 agreed to.

Customs tariff—Item 653. Brushes of all kinds.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would this keep out Fuller brushes?

Mr. POTTIER: Fuller brushes are made in Canada. Would this exclude them?

Mr. ILSLEY: Brushes of all kinds are excluded. It is just the importation that is prevented.

Item agreed to.

Items 655, ex 655a, 656 and 665 agreed to.

Customs tariff—Item ex 695a. Paintings in oil or water colours and pastels, valued at not less than twenty dollars each.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is an amendment to this item which I will ask my colleague to move.

Mr. MULOCK: I move:

That item ex 695a be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

695a. Paintings in oil or water colours and pastels, valued at not less than twenty dollars each (not to include paintings in oil or water colours and pastels to be used exclusively for printing or lithographic reproduction purposes).

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Item ex 711, ex 362c, ex 427, ex 446a et al. agreed to.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is an amendment to be made to item ex 415, Mr. Chairman, to which I will ask the committee to revert.

Customs tariff—item ex 415. Electric vaccum cleaners and attachments therefor.

Mr. MULOCK: I move, Mr. Chairman, that this item be amended to read as follows:

Ex 415. Electric vacuum cleaners and attachments therefor, domestic or household type.

The amendment adds the words "domestic or household type" in order to exclude industrial vacuum cleaners.

Industrial vacuum cleaners are used in cleaning up large industrial plants, such as explosive plants. They are also used for cleaning furnaces and flues in military camps, and by automobile firms in the reconditioning of used cars. They are not made in Canada at the present time. They are also used in keeping machinery free from dust and dirt.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

On the schedule, part II.

Customs tariff—item 19. Cocoa shells and nibs.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister make it plain for purposes of the record that we are now dealing with another aspect of this legislation?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. It is not intended to deal with the items in part II in the same way as with the items in part I. The items in part II come within the classes of goods as to which some licences will be issued, but on the whole on a decreasing scale, so as to shut out these imports gradually instead of abruptly.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Can the minister give us any indication of how long it is intended to carry on this policy? How long will it be before we arrive at the exclusion stage? There ought to be some care in dealing with this matter.

Mr. ILSLEY: We will reach that stage as rapidly as possible. It may never be reached completely.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What method is followed in determining the quantity of the goods?

Mr. ILSLEY: At the moment normal imports will be allowed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Under permit?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; but as it becomes possible to shut them out, they will be shut out. Take silk, for instance, which is an important item. To shut off importations of silk at the moment would cause great hardship in certain industrial centres, and it would not be practicable or desirable to do that. But if these industries can turn to the manufacture of something else which will take the place of silk products—and that is quite possible—then they will be denied the right to import silk from hard-currency countries. There is also power to prevent the importation of silk products from empire countries too, because otherwise an anomalous and unjust situation might arise.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suggest that the minister make an appeal to the ladies of the country that in this type of weather they wear woollen hosiery and that next summer they wear lisle. I believe we should get a response from the women of Canada.

Mr. FULFORD: Better make their skirts longer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All right. I have no objection to that, either.

Item agreed to.

Items 20a, 77a, 109a and 142 agreed to.

Customs tariff—267. Crude petroleum not subjected to any other process than natural weathering and removal of foreign matter and water, when imported by oil refineries to be refined in their own factories:
(i) ·8155 specific gravity (42·0 A.P.I.) or heavier at 60 degrees Fahrenheit.
(ii) Lighter than ·8155 specific gravity (42·0 A.P.I.) at 60 degrees Fahrenheit.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Would the minister explain generally what it is proposed to do in connection with petroleum products? The matter has been running through my mind because of the large consumption of gasoline in this country and the necessity of supplies in future. Is it proposed to do anything, by way of a tax or something of that kind, to curtail the non-essential consumption of gasoline?

Another consideration which appeals to me is that we need to curtail as far as possible duplication of effort. Take, for example, a city like Toronto. We have a good street-car service and a bus service as well, so that a great many people could very well dispense with driving their cars down-town. In certain instances, of course, people need to use motor cars to get to work. But in connection with this whole transportation system there seems to me to be a great duplication of effort. To-day motor buses compete with our own railroads, and altogether the consumption of gasoline is very large. I find from the "Canada Year Book" that our consumption in 1939 was 762,740,326 gallons, and refunds were allowed on 130,722,877 gallons, so that 632,017,449 gallons were used in motor cars and similar vehicles. I assume that the refunds represent the amount of gasoline used by farmers and essential to their requirements. But I think the commuter should have some idea of what the policy of the government is to be with respect to this matter.

There is no doubt that we shall need more and more gasoline for the air force, and I think that we have here one way whereby the people of Canada could conserve their dollars for war savings stamps, but that a little direction is needed. Has the government in mind putting on a tax of some kind? A cent a gallon does not amount to very much so far as the purchaser is concerned, but it would bring in over $6,300,000; two cents a gallon would bring in $12,600,000. It would be interesting if at this time the minister could give the committee a little further information with respect to these products.

Mr. ILSLEY: As the committee knows, there is an oil controller who has an organization and who is studying this whole question. It may be possible for importations of refined gasoline to be very greatly reduced.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is, the refined oil?

Mr. ILSLEY: The gasoline itself—what gasoline comes in.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It is not mentioned in this schedule, is it?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. But that cannot be done all at once, because it would mean too great a dislocation of existing businesses. I am not saying that it will be done; but this gives the power to do it, and it will be the object of the government, working on the advice of the oil controller, one of the officials of the Department of Munitions and Supply, to attempt to limit as far as possible importations of petroleum products which can be eliminated. But that is a different matter altogether; that is a different subject from that of controlling the consumption of gasoline in Canada, which perhaps would involve the allowance of so much to each person—the rationing of gasoline. I am not in a position to make any announcement about a policy with regard to that, but it has certainly not been decided to do it.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is there any shortage of gasoline at the present time, or is there likely to be a shortage?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, no.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Does the minister think that some time in the future we shall have some regulations regarding curtailment of the use of gasoline? It seems to me that it is just as necessary as getting people to do without washing machines and articles of that kind.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is worthy of consideration. There has been quite a lot of discussion about it, rumours about it, and so on, but it has not been decided upon as a policy of the government. Further than that, I cannot make any announcement.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Along that very same line, may I direct the attention of the Minister of Finance and the government to what I consider to be excessive use of gasoline in the armed services in Canada? The other day my attention was directed by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton to the fact that, for a little training school in a little town in New Brunswick which I shall not name, a contract was let for $6,400 worth of gasoline. There is no motorized equipment there except a few automobiles which they are using. I was almost paralyzed to think that the government is paying out $6,400 for gasoline in that little town where there is no motorized equipment, excepting that a few officers may have their own passenger cars. That is just an instance where I think some saving might be made, and I thought if I had the chance I would mention it to somebody in authority.

Apart from the air force, whose position is different, it seems to me that the quantity of gasoline which is being bought by the army is enormous. One sees these huge trucks going round; before I came here I saw a whole train of them going through my town. I do not know where they were going to, but it seemed to me that a tremendous amount of gasoline was being used. As regards the specific item I spoke of, I could not conceive why it was necessary to order so much gasoline, so I wrote to the Minister of Munitions and Supply to find out why that contract was let. I have not yet received an answer. I mention the matter just as an instance of the directions in which we might exercise some economy.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): In that same connection, could the minister tell me where we shall get our crude petroleum? Can we get most of it from the Turner valley or out of some of the Ontario wells? Surely there must be something in the minds of the government as to where they are going to get their petroleum products in this country, instead of importing them. Is it intended to step up the production of the Turner valley?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): For the time being, crude oil will be permitted as usual?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): From the usual channels and sources of supply, which are the Gulf and the Caribbean?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Items 267a and 267b agreed to.

Customs tariff—268. Natural casinghead, compression or absorption gasoline, lighter than ·6690 specific gravity (80·0 A.P.I.) at 60 degrees Fahrenheit, when imported by refiners of crude petroleum for blending with gasoline wholly produced in Canada.

Mr. PERLEY: This product is very important to western Canada. Farmers are using large quantities of gasoline which are being refined in Saskatchewan. The Consumers Limited have a small consumers' refinery there, and there is a cooperative refinery in competition with Imperial Oil. They have been getting most of their crude oil from the United States; it comes in under a duty of, I understand, half a cent a gallon. I should like to be sure that this will not have the effect of discriminating in any way against these refineries, which have started up in the last year or two, and from which farmers are getting a cheaper gasoline. It will be readily understood that, farming having been revolutionized, it is important that farmers be allowed to get their crude oil for refining in their own refineries so that they may have cheap fuel for the production of wheat and for other farming operations.

Mr. ILSLEY: Crude oil will be admitted for the time being under permit.

Item agreed to.

Items 269, 269a and 271 agreed to.

Customs tariff—272a. Petroleum greases and lubricating greases, n.o.p.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What was the value of lubricating greases imported last year under this item?

Mr. ILSLEY: Imports of petroleum greases from non-empire countries in 1939 amounted to $423,000, and from empire countries, $4,000.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What was the quantity of the Canadian production?

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot give that information.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Petroleum products are the largest importation into Canada. Can the minister give the total amount in dollars of petroleum products importations?

Mr. ILSLEY: This item covers petroleum, asphalt and petroleum products. Only a very small part of it consists of asphaltic products. Total imports in 1939 had a value of $55,913,177.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A big traffic.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. By far the greater part of it is crude petroleum for the refineries. That amounted to $39,564,000 from non-empire countries.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Does that include gasoline?

Mr. ILSLEY: The $55,000,000 does.

Item agreed to.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will ask my colleague (Mr. Mulock) to move the following amendment which will be found in Votes and Proceedings:

2. That Part II of Schedule 1 to the said resolution be amended by adding thereto the following items:

"Tariff Item—326(i). Demijohns or carboys, bottles, flasks, phials, jars and balls of glass, not cut, n.o.p.; lamp chimneys of glass, n.o.p.; decanters and machine made tumblers of glass, not cut nor decorated, n.o.p.

Tariff Item—414. Typewriters and complete parts thereof.

Tariff Item—414a. Dictating, transcribing and cylinder shaving machines and complete parts thereof, including cylinders and unfinished wax blanks.

Tariff Item—414c. Adding, bookkeeping, calculating and invoicing machines and complete parts thereof, n.o.p.

Tariff Item—415d. Sewing machines, with or without motive power incorporated therein; complete parts of sewing machines.

Tariff Item—415e. Sewing machine attachments.

Tariff Item—434. Locomotive for use on railways, and chassis, tops, wheels and bodies for the same, n.o.p.

Tariff Item—434a. Motor rail cars or units for use on railways, and chassis for same; complete parts of the foregoing.

Tariff Item—438. Railway cars and parts thereof, n.o.p."

On the recommendation of the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), an order in council was recently passed prohibiting the manufacture of new models of a great many articles. The question then arose whether the importation of new models should not also be prohibited.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): As a corollary.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. A number of difficulties arose in the application of that order in council to imported models. The situation was different in a number of ways. If hon. members will think about it, they will see that in Canada, if you held models as they are now, there would be no difficulty; but in another country models are changing from year to year and it is difficult to know what a new model is in the sense of the term as it was used in the order in council. It was thought best, therefore, to deal with the matter in this way. These items will take care of imported new models. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson), by granting permits, by having power to deny permits for the importation of anything in these items, can see that there is no discrimination or injustice in the model situation as between imported models and models domestically produced.

Mr. MULOCK: I so move.

Motion agreed to.

Items 326(i), 414, 414a, 414c, 415d, 415e, 434, 434a and 438 agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 438a. Automobiles and motor vehicles of all kinds, n.o.p. (but not to include passenger automobiles); electric trackless trolley buses; chassis for automobiles and motor vehicles of all kinds.

Mr. GREEN: Does this cover trucks?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Power is taken to exclude all trucks?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 500. Railway ties.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Do we import railway ties?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How many and why? I am astonished to think that we do because we have been exporting railway ties.

Mr. ILSLEY: They are imported in western Ontario, I am told. The value of imports in 1939 was $359,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They had better buy them in Canada.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Has the minister any comment to make on the suggestion of the leader of the opposition?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is power to carry it out if the railways can get them elsewhere. They are brought in by United States railways operating in Canada.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—ex 503. Planks, boards, clapboards, laths, plain pickets and other timber or lumber of hardwood, not further manufactured than sawn or split, whether creosoted, vulcanized, or treated by any other preserving process, or not.

Mr. GREEN: This and the next three or four items deal with hard woods. Why are soft woods not included? Apparently these are only the hardwood items. In other words, there are no restrictions on the importation of soft woods.

Mr. ILSLEY: We do not desire to interfere with the soft-wood situation at all. Our export is very substantial and we have favourable treatment under the trade agreement. It is not considered desirable to take power to shut them out.

Mr. GREEN: When the minister says our treatment is favourable, does he mean in the United States or Great Britain?

Mr. ILSLEY: In the United States.

Mr. GREEN: The export must be from eastern Canada, because there is practically none exported from western Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will get the figures.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Do we import any soft wood from the United States? —yes, southern pine. We have to have it, so I think that is proper.

Item agreed to.

Items ex 504, ex 505, 505a, 507, 507a, 507b, 507c, 507d, 507e, ex 557, ex 557a, ex 557b, 558, 558a, 558c, 558e, 600, 601 and 602 agreed to.

On schedule 2.

Mr. GREEN: With regard to schedule 2 I asked the minister last night what proportion of the duty is being taken off. He gave the figures for last year on these items in schedule 2 as $1,950,000 collected on goods from empire countries.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: But he did not say how much would have been collected if the rates had been as now proposed. In other words, what does this reduction mean; how much are we giving Great Britain?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before leaving part II of schedule 1, would the minister put on the record the volume of business which will now be under permit under part II as he did under part I? I think he gave $53,000,000 that would be shut out.

Mr. ILSLEY: I gave it.

Mr. GREEN: Yes, page 727 of Hansard, $71,150,000.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; something like that. The figure of $1,950,000 given last night should have been the estimated loss in revenue. It was stated to be the amount collected.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The anticipated loss of revenue?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, and the imports were estimated at $13,343,000. I have now what I am informed is a more accurate estimate. The first figure is $13,745,380 and the estimated loss of revenue on the basis of 1939 is $2,026,169. In round figures $2,000,000 would be as good an estimate as one could get.

Mr. GREEN: That means that all the assistance we are giving Great Britain is the amount of $2,000,000?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; I would not think so. What Great Britain gets is the value of what they ship in. This is what it costs us to allow it to come in.

Mr. GREEN: What was the total duty collected last year on those items?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am informed it would be about $3,000,000.

Mr. GREEN: From which different empire countries do these imports come?

Mr. ILSLEY: Practically all from Great Britain; the nature of the articles shows that. They are nearly all manufactured articles.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Why is it that woollens seem to be so carefully excluded from schedule 2?

Mr. ILSLEY: There are two or three reasons. The British woollen industry is a strong one and the British control the sources of wool; sell us the wool. Moreover the British have been increasing substantially their sales of wool products in this market. Total imports of woollens from the United Kingdom for the first ten months of 1939 amounted to $16,466,000. For the first ten months of 1940 they amounted to $26,345,000. The increase is very substantial. It must be remembered they have more of the woollen trade in Canada now than Canadians. I am speaking from memory of the evidence given before the price spreads commission which I think was something like this: Prior to 1930 the British had about 60 per cent of this market and Canadians about 40 per cent. With the higher duties imposed between 1930 and 1935, that proportion was altered so that the Canadian proportion grew to nearly 60 per cent at one stage, if I remember correctly. It would be something like 50 per cent. Now the British are apparently maintaining their position in this market with ease, and when it is borne in mind that the industry here is rather widely scattered, with quite a large number of small establishments, upon which the welfare of a great many communities depends; and when it is also considered that the British control the sources, the raw material, completely, and also that against the present duties they are doing pretty well, we did not think we were justified in making any difference in the duties on woollens.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What was the value of imports from the United States last year?

Mr. ILSLEY: They are negligible.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to make a brief statement with respect to cottons, if it would not be considered out of order.

At the time the Ottawa agreements were being negotiated, the cotton industry of Canada and that of Lancashire were asked to get together, to see if they could not reach an agreement. They did not agree very well. I believe Lancashire came to Canada with the idea that they ought to have the whole Canadian cotton market, and that our local industry should be scrapped. At least that was the information I got at the time. Of course, under conditions which then existed, that idea did not prevail.

The first point is this: In connection with the cotton schedules, will the minister give the committee the assurance that this is for the duration of the war, and only for the duration of the war? That is in the statute. But once the duty is brought down, even if it is only for the duration, it will be difficult to get it up again. Will the minister give the assurance to the public that there is to be no vested interest on the part of Lancashire in our trade, in accordance with the schedules laid down in these resolutions?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I certainly will.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is one thing. I am obliged to the minister. We had some discussion yesterday with respect to costs.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: I have in mind the figure the hon. member is going to mention. That figure is 43 per cent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: I want to make a correction. The 43 per cent I had in mind was an estimate. I have no reason to think it was unreliable or inaccurate, but it was an estimate of the increase, not in the cost of production, as I somewhat loosely stated, but on the delivered value, or the duty-paid price of the cotton.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Which is quite different.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but I should not be a bit surprised if the cost of production went up that much, too.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That may be true. I think nobody can say arbitrarily just what the increase is. I believe that the minister has now made a fairer and truer statement of the position. In view of the increased cost of production on the other side, I do not think there will be in the immediate future any great influx of cotton goods into Canada. But it may be very valuable. I believe Lancashire knows that, because I saw some newspaper comments which appeared after the minister had delivered his speech, indicating that the cotton people of Lancashire were most profuse in their thanks. They were quite enthusiastic about this so-called let-down of the bars. It may work out that way.

At the moment I do not think there is any great danger, because there are obstacles and impediments in the way. At the same time may I point out to the minister a few important factors. The cotton business in England has been rationalized, and cotton exports are being bonused by the association of cotton manufacturers in England. That is the information I have before me. The minister is letting in free this bonused production. That would seem to be the effect of the provision. No doubt the minister has expert factual information which is not available to me, but I would ask him to give consideration to that phase of the matter. If that production is being bonused for export, then I suggest the position should be reexamined.

The second point to which I wish to call the minister's attention is this: Canadian cotton manufacturers have to pay a 10 per cent excise tax, as well as the ordinary foreign exchange premium on all cotton imported. But the British manufacturer does not have to pay any such excise tax, and the result is that there is a 10 per cent increase in the cost of the raw material to the Canadian manufacturer. This would seem to be an unfair situation, and it should be compensated for by an excise tax on imported cotton goods or, as an alternative, on the cost of the raw cotton content thereof. That would balance the arrangement. In other words, there is a differential to the extent of that tax operating against the Canadian manufacturer. It would seem that our manufacturers are taxed in a way in which the British manufacturers are not taxed. The manufacturer in England will not have to pay the excise tax on his finished product. I suggest an examination should be made to see if he should not pay that 10 per cent tax on the value of the cotton content—not necessarily on the labour. I believe the condition I have described constitutes a serious handicap.

Mr. ILSLEY: There are various factors to be considered. The British manufacturer has a greater exchange disadvantage.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I realize that. I suggest, however, that if, upon examination, the officials in the minister's department find any injustice, a correction should be made. The officials now sitting in front of the minister will appreciate the point I have made.

I would point out to the minister that labour costs in Canada were 60 per cent higher than corresponding costs in Great Britain. I do not know just what the situation is at the present time. It is impossible to give the Canadian worker the standard of living to which we believe he or she is entitled, and at the same time meet the competition of the cheaper labour used in the manufacture of imported goods. The important consideration is that there is a difference in the prices paid to labour here and labour over there.

I should dislike very much to see any necessity for a reduction in our wage scale. I do not think our workers could stand it because, no matter what the minister may say, the cost of living is going up. The wholesale index indicates an increase, and costs of retail goods have increased. I believe they will continue, willy-nilly to go up. In my community the price of milk is increasing steadily, the price being fixed by the milk board. Because of the processing tax on flour, the price of flour is going up. I do not know whether wages are keeping pace with these increases. They will, however, have to. I do not anticipate any great difficulty in this matter at the present time, but these are factors which must be kept in mind. If there is any injustice, steps ought to be taken to make the necessary correction.

I have tried to place before the committee the three points I had in mind which, it seemed to me, were important factors. I am not opposing the resolution before the committee, but I am simply describing the situation as I understand it.

Schedule agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAR EXCHANGE CONSERVATION ACT, 1940

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 9, respecting the conservation of exchange.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Vien in the chair.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Prohibited goods.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister not consider making reference in this section to parts I and II of schedule 1? We have had the bill in our hands for just a minute, but so far as I can see, there is no mention in it of parts I and II of schedule 1. That would appear to me to be rather loose draftsmanship.

Mr. ILSLEY: I gave consideration to that last night, and there are reasons why I do not think it would be desirable. There will have to be some freedom to deal with even the items in part I. This is not ordinary tariff legislation; this is emergency import control. This is concerned with prohibition by licensing, not with duties. This type of control is exercised in all countries by administrative action. Every issue of the Board of Trade Journal contains changes in the list of products for which the government of the United Kingdom will grant licences. The fact that complete prohibition rather than merely duties is involved requires greater discretion and flexibility in administration. In many respects, if the government did not desire to use the War Measures Act, the logical procedure would have been to take power by legislation, place all imports under permit and then proceed by order in council under the act to set up schedules of imports requiring permits and those for which permits would not be granted.

Out of consideration for parliament the government decided to include the schedules in the legislation and disclose to parliament just what action it is proposed to take. Wide discretion is required by the minister because certain imports may prove to be required for war or other essential services. Restrictions are by tariff items, and even the customs officials cannot name all the articles which may be included in a single customs item. In the case of such goods as canned vegetables or wearing apparel a serious shortage might conceivably arise if the importation were prohibited and the minister had no power to grant permits at his discretion. In the case of imports under part II it may be necessary to discriminate even between importers in granting permits. One importer may seek a permit to increase his already large stocks of raw materials, while another may apply for a permit merely to replenish exhausted stocks.

I may say also that powers at least as wide as these are vested in ministers by other acts. For instance, there are the powers exercised by the Minister of Finance in connection with the export of gold and the powers exercised by the Minister of National Revenue with respect to export permits. He has a discretion in the matter of export permits, as well as in the matter of import permits for aluminium. These powers can be exercised and will be exercised with care. Powers are now vested in controllers under the Munitions and Supply Act which are much wider than the powers vested here in the Minister of National Revenue.

For these reasons I do not think we should go further than we have. We have divided these items into two parts, part I and part II, and stated to parliament what the intentions of the government are in reference to part I and what the intentions of the government are in reference to part II. I think it is necessary that there should be discretion vested in the minister to deny or grant permits regarding all the items in both parts, the principles upon which he will exercise this being understood and explained to the house.

Mr. GREEN: In order that the record may be clear to anyone reading Hansard, will the minister explain the difference between the treatment which will be meted out in connection with items in part I of schedule one, and in connection with items in part II?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have done that twice already.

Mr. GREEN: I think it should be stated again in order that people who read this will know.

Mr. ILSLEY: Generally speaking, and speaking with considerable approximation rather than accuracy, I would say that it is the intention to deny permits to those desiring to import any of the articles mentioned in part I. As I say, some exceptions may have to be made, but that is the prohibited list and it is not intended to grant permits for the importation of those articles. It is the intention to grant permits as usual for the importation of the articles in part II, but to decrease the importation of these articles by the gradual denial of permits in so far as that is possible.

Mr. GREEN: With the intention of ultimately prohibiting the import of all articles in part II?

Mr. ILSLEY: If possible. There may be some items in that part which can never be prohibited. But the intention is to get away from the importation of those articles as far as possible. I do not have any idea that we can get away for a great while from the importation of crude petroleum. We are importing $39,000,000 worth of crude petroleum and I would not like to say that the imports of that commodity will ultimately be shut off.

Section agreed to.

Sections 4 and 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Power to permit entry, to reduce or remove duties.

Mr. GREEN: The government are taking power to reduce the duties as well as to prohibit importation. Is that the situation?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: So that instead of prohibiting the entry of the goods, the government may simply reduce or remove the duty or, in other words, deal with it as they see fit. Are the powers intended to be as wide as that?

Mr. ILSLEY: If a domestic producer undertook to take advantage of the prohibition unduly to enhance the price of his goods one way to deal with the situation would be to remove the prohibition, and in addition the duties could be reduced or removed. The governor in council takes power to do all this.

Mr. MacNICOL: The government would have to take that power to prevent the enhancing of prices.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Duties of customs schedule 2.

Mr. HANSELL: In connection with coal coming from Great Britain or other parts of the empire, just what in the opinion of the minister is going to be the effect of this provision upon the coal mining industry of Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have before me a statement from the technical adviser to the coal administrator, the material parts of which are to this effect: Any bituminous coal which we might be able to import from Great Britain would be used entirely in the Quebec and Newfoundland areas where, on account of increased requirements of the railways and the pulp and paper industry, our own supplies must be supplemented by imports of bituminous coal from the United States. It is not anticipated that importations of British bituminous coal would in any way interfere with the present movement of Nova Scotia coal under subventions, nor would it be necessary under present conditions to extend the market for Nova Scotia coal beyond existing boundaries. A careful study is now being made of the situation with a view to determining the amount of British bituminous coal which might be absorbed in the eastern markets without disturbing present distribution.

Mr. HANSELL: I notice that these observations were directed particularly to Nova Scotia, and I am wondering how the coal mining industry in other parts of Canada will fare. Alberta has quite a coal-mining industry; so has British Columbia, and there are other areas where a less amount of coal mining is done.

Mr. ILSLEY: They would not be affected.

Mr. HANSELL: I am glad to know that, but I am under the impression that those in responsible positions in the coal-mining industry are not of the same opinion.

I believe there is need of some sort of conference being called by the government—it should be called here I think—where representatives of the coal-mining industry throughout the country could meet together. In addition to the calling together of representatives of the coal-mining industry of Nova Scotia, Alberta, British Columbia and other coal-mining areas, I believe that labour and other phases of the coal-mining industry should be represented, to determine upon an adequate and proper national coal policy for Canada. I do not believe we have what could be termed a really satisfactory national coal policy.

I have some very big files on coal and all sorts of reports—reports by all sorts of commissions, and reports by various delegations that have come to Ottawa. One report will be along one line and another report along another line. There is a report from a commission created to inquire into anthracite coal, and another report from another commission on some other phase of the coal-mining industry. Therefore I believe that a conference should be called at which every part of the coal-mining industry of Canada will be represented, together with the coal committee of the cabinet, and there this whole question could be threshed out with a view to getting down to the business of establishing a really national coal policy. I do not know whether the idea is new to the minister, but I do wish he could say that he favours such a conference. I do not suggest that it be as large as the forthcoming conference on the Sirois report. Nevertheless the coal-mining industry of Canada is one of our biggest industries, and I think it is time that something of this sort was done.

Mr. GILLIS: In view of the minister's statement that a certain percentage of the coal imported from Great Britain would be utilized in the Quebec market, I wish to say that in my opinion it would seriously affect the Nova Scotia coal-mining industry. Last night the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) went into the story at length and quoted many figures, but he did not carry the story through. Reading Hansard, one would be led to believe that the coal-mining industry of Nova Scotia had expanded since the introduction of subventions. The reverse is true. By virtue of the subventions given to the coal-mining industry of Nova Scotia, the industry expanded to this extent, that 2,000,000 tons were marketed in Ontario. While the subventions have assisted the industry and enabled Nova Scotia coal to be marketed in Ontario, nevertheless during that time there has been a decline in the industry. In that connection I should like to refer to the "Coal Statistics for Canada" for the calendar year 1938, in support of my statement. It states:

> Production from Nova Scotia coal mines in 1938 declined to 6,236,417 tons from the 1937 total of 7,256,954 tons. Mines in Cape Breton produced 4,676,730 tons or 14·8 per cent below the 1937 output. Cumberland district produced 713,768 tons compared with 807,651 tons a year ago. The Inverness output was 7·2 per cent lower at 173,535 tons. In the Pictou district production declined 12·9 per cent to 672,384 tons.

That was in 1938 as compared with 1937, and that decline took place regardless of the fact that we were marketing our coal further west.

There is another matter to which I should like to make reference. I quote further:

> Active mines in Nova Scotia in 1938 produced approximately 63 per cent of their possible output; 33·5 per cent of the output loss was due to lack of orders. Causes other than strikes were responsible for a production loss of 3,739,938 tons....

The reason why I put these figures on the record is to show that at the present time the coal-mining industry of Nova Scotia is on the wane. Unemployment has increased, and the figures quoted will show that the reason for that unemployment is lack of markets. We who have been engaged in that industry and do business with the coal companies know that they have no intention of expanding operations, because of lack of markets; and while I am absolutely in accord with the principle of assisting Britain, I am reasonably sure that the removal of the thirty-five cents duty on British bituminous coal will further affect our production.

At the present time a large part of the war materials being shipped overseas are leaving the ports of Montreal, Halifax and Sydney. I have seen at least 100 boats in convoy leaving a port. Most of those boats arrive without a cargo. By the removal of that thirty-five cents tariff these boats will be enabled to bring back a cargo. Most of them come back with water as ballast, if British bituminous coal is admitted duty free, most of those boats will, in my opinion, bring back cargoes of coal, and we in Nova Scotia cannot compete with it. That has been our experience. Time and again the operators have told us that because of lack of markets they have no intention of expanding the Nova Scotia industry. The statistics of 1938 show that they are away below their possible production, and the consequence is unemployment.

The measure before us is to conserve foreign exchange, and I am absolutely in accord with that object; but I believe that if it is to be effective with respect to the item under discussion, it will have to be carefully administered. I listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) having reference to a conference of operators. That has been tried time and time again. Representatives of the east and of the west met in Ottawa and laid down a programme for the purpose of inaugurating a national fuel policy. All we ever got out of it was talk, talk, talk, a whole lot of recommendations, and a good deal of paper; absolutely nothing else.

In my opinion, if we are serious in our endeavour to give Britain a market in this country for her bituminous coal, there is only one way of doing it. Approximately ten million tons of bituminous coal is imported from the United States. The only way of marketing British bituminous coal is to place an embargo on United States bituminous coal which is coming into this country.

Mr. MacNICOL: Or give them a quota.

Mr. GILLIS: Or a quota. Decide upon the amount you intend to take from Britain, bring it in, and put an embargo on the equivalent amount of bituminous coal from the United States. That will have to be done, in my opinion, so as not to interfere with or dislocate markets controlled and handled at the present time by Canadian operators. There is, in my judgment, no other answer to the problem if we intend to conserve foreign exchange.

I believe that the Nova Scotia industry has already felt the effects of British coal in the Quebec market. During last session there was brought to my attention the fact, which I could not then verify, but which I have since confirmed, that 200,000 tons of British coal which was consigned to France at the time France capitulated was diverted to Canada. I am informed that one of the big mining operators in this country handled and marketed that coal, and the figures which I have seen in one of the local papers reflect, I believe, the effects of the marketing of that coal. According to what I saw in a local newspaper, the Dominion Coal company, the biggest unit of Dominion Iron, Steel and Coal, had an output last month of 22,957 tons less than the output of October, 1939, and 39,396 tons less than the output of October, 1940. That should not be, because there has been created an abnormal market, as a result of the war. The boats constituting the large convoys in and out of a harbour with which I am acquainted are bunkered, and this coal company has done quite a business with the bunker coal. At the same time their output, on account of the additional imports of bunker coal, is in my opinion forty or fifty thousand tons less than it would otherwise be. It is my belief, although I cannot verify it, that that coal was marketed in Quebec, causing the output for the collieries for the last month as compared with the previous month to be down to that extent.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Does the hon. member ascribe the diminished output to any cause other than lack of markets?

Mr. GILLIS: I tried to make that clear. I said that 200,000 tons of British coal which was consigned to France at the time France capitulated came into eastern Canada and was marketed by one of our coal companies. I believe that that tonnage so brought in and placed in the eastern market would be a contributing factor to the monthly decline of the Dominion Coal company.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Has my hon. friend any figures as to the number of tons of coal which were lost on account of the stoppage of work in the collieries?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, I have them right here.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): What are they?

Mr. GILLIS: I will read the paragraph in the 1938 report entitled "Coal Statistics for Canada":

Active mines in Nova Scotia in 1938 produced approximately 63 per cent of their possible output; 33·5 per cent of the output loss was due to lack of orders. Causes other than strikes were responsible for a production loss of 3,739,938 tons during the year while strikes accounted for an additional computed loss of 11,651 tons.

I had not any intention of making reference to that particular question, because of what I have heard in the past year from many government officials who have come to our conventions. The Minister of Labour went into Nova Scotia, tackled miners' organizations and everyone connected with them and gave them a severe talking to on the question of sporadic strikes and the amount of coal lost as a result of stoppages of work, and so forth. I think the amount of coal lost on account of stoppages of work is insignificant when compared with the amount lost—over three million tons—from other causes. If we are interested in the industry from the viewpoint of production, the other causes should be given as much analysis and investigation as this question of the sporadic strike.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I think my hon. friend knows that the figure of 11,000 tons is entirely incorrect. He must know that.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not compile those figures and I have not any way of finding that out.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): The hon. member knows that from his own experience.

Mr. GILLIS: I am taking the government's word for it. I know there has been doubt cast on it, but I assume these figures are correct. They should be.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): They are not correct.

Mr. MacNICOL: I want to ask the hon. member a question, because I know he knows what he is talking about. How many tons is an ordinary day's production of coal? I want to try to estimate how much 11,000 tons would mean in shortages in terms of time. Would it mean more than an hour, or would it mean a day's production? The hon. member said that their loss through strikes was 11,000 tons' production, and I was just trying to ascertain what that means in time. Eleven thousand tons seems to be a very small amount. How much time would that represent? The hon. member is an expert and he must know.

Mr. GILLIS: If we take the industry as a whole, it would amount to practically nothing. One mine produces 4,000 tons a day. With regard to the accuracy of the figures here, that is something I cannot argue; I am accepting them as authentic, because I get them in cold statistics.

My intention in rising was to point out the seriousness of the mining situation in Nova Scotia. It is the basic industry in that province and employs over 100,000 men, and the whole economy of the province is wrapped up in the industry, whose operations are on the wane at the present time. I find, in most of the older mines, that there is no incentive for the companies to go ahead with new programmes. The question of the importation of bituminous coal into the Quebec market, where the minister says more will be used, is a serious one, because that is the only economic market the company has. If it is interfered with or dislocated, it will mean that the company will not go ahead with the programme of making new openings, and an already bad unemployment situation in those areas will be aggravated. We are facing a crisis and it is our intention to help Britain. I am in favour of that. But if we are to bring in any quantity of bituminous coal from Britain there will be no room for the coal from our operators in Canada. We shall have to put a quota on the border and keep out the bituminous coal coming from the United States. Millions of dollars going to that country could be saved.

The government should accept some responsibility with regard to the development of the coal areas in Canada. At the present time Britain is going through a terrific ordeal in consequence of the technique developed by the Germans of attacking town after town in an attempt to make a shambles of the country and to put it out of production. The mining industry there is not immune from destruction and while we are talking about importing bituminous coal from Britain the reverse may be true in six months' time. Canada may have to step in and supply Britain with coal. There are many undeveloped coal fields in Canada, particularly in the part of the country for which I am speaking, and the possibilities of expanding that industry should be probed.

Most of our coal has been shipped by water. It is only a seasonal matter during the winter months. From November until about May the coal is banked and that is a costly operation. An effort should be made to ship Cape Breton coal by rail. There are three factors that make it impossible, and a costly operation, to ship coal by rail, and these should be removed. In the first place, the assembly yard in Sydney is altogether too small; it should be enlarged; and ninety miles up the line, at Point Tupper, the assembly yard is also very small, being unable to handle much coal. Then there is the strait of Canso to contend with. A train of coal goes through and is shunted around in all directions to make room for it. Taking the train across on the Scotia is a slow operation and is not workable at the present time. It adds much to the cost of transportation by rail.

If the government are sincere in their effort to do something with regard to the industry in that end of the country, a good approach to the problem would be to consider the possibility of either tunneling the strait of Canso—it is only a mile or so—or bridging it, and at the same time enlarging the two yards to which I have referred, thus making it possible for coal to be shipped from that end of the country both summer and winter, and eliminating the necessity of banking the coal. The coal is banked twice, in Sydney and in Montreal, and coal company officials will tell you that this is one of the biggest factors in the question of cost—banking the coal and keeping it from catching fire. That is something which should be considered. The cost would be offset in years to come by the subventions that are now paid. The sum of $2,500,000 a year is now paid by way of assistance, and the industry will need still more assistance in time, or it will shrink to the point where it will take care of only our own domestic market. That seems to be the trend of events at present.

I leave these thoughts with the minister. They are factors that will have to be considered. That part of the country is not getting a fair deal. The people there are living in a completely different world from this part of the dominion. Something must be done for the development of the Nova Scotia coal industry or, I repeat, the industry will shrink to the point where it will take care of only its economic market. I hope the minister will consider these points.

Mr. KINLEY: The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) told the house that there were 100,000 people employed in the coal mining industry in Cape Breton. I am afraid the figure is too large.

Mr. GILLIS: The hon. member is wrong in that statement. I said that 100,000 people depended on it.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): He said it was the basic industry in Nova Scotia.

Mr. GILLIS: So it is.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. KINLEY: The hon. member also said that coal mining in Nova Scotia was on the wane, production becoming smaller and smaller. The question before the committee is the invasion of the St. Lawrence market, and if the production of Nova Scotia coal has decreased, as the hon. member says, it is not because of deliveries to that market. The upper Canadian market has increased enormously in the last two years. The movement of coal to Quebec and Ontario in 1938-39 was 1,300,000 tons; in 1939-40 it was 2,600,000 tons; and up to October, 1940, it was 1,343,000 tons. This cost the country in subventions the sum of $1,888,000, and the estimated cost of subventions for this year to March will be $2,873,000.

The movement of coal to the Quebec and Ontario markets was less this year than in 1939-40, but there were three reasons for that. First, there was the scarcity of bottoms; you could not get cargo space to bring the coal up the St. Lawrence in the summer because of scarcity of tonnage. Next, there was a greater local consumption because the steel plant in Sydney is using more coal owing to war-time production. And, third, the railways of the country are using a great deal more coal. I was talking to an official in the fuel controller's office who tells me the estimate for this year is that there will be an increase in production of 200,000 tons from the Nova Scotia mines.

We talk about subventions; the hon. member only last session said in the house that subventions were no good—

Mr. GILLIS: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, I did no such thing. I never made that statement. And by the way he might let H. J. Kelley do his own arguing.

Mr. KINLEY: I refer to Hansard of August 6, 1940, page 2549:

> Mr. Gillis: ....I know positively without having to guess about it at all, that no employment has been created for miners since the establishment of subsidies. As a matter of fact the reverse is true. On two occasions I have attempted to paint a picture of conditions in that industry during the past ten years. Coal mining in Nova Scotia is definitely on the way out. Since this session of parliament opened I have had telegrams, wires and letters stating that unemployment was widespread throughout the industry.
> I have only a word more to say about subventions. I have been employed by the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation, which controls coal mining in Nova Scotia, for a period of thirty years, and I am very sceptical in regard to the question of subventions. I would advise the government to examine closely into the question whether or not that subvention has been used for the purposes for which it was intended. I have not seen any benefits accruing to the man who produces or digs the coal. That is all I have to say on that point.

Mr. GILLIS: That is all right; does that say subventions are no good?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The hon. member does not say they are good.

Mr. GILLIS: Might I be permitted to correct that statement?

Mr. KINLEY: Well, it is in Hansard, I do not know what the hon. member wants to correct.

Mr. GILLIS: First, the hon. member made the flat-footed statement that I said subventions were no good. He will find in Hansard that on two other occasions I thanked the government for the assistance given to the Nova Scotia coal-mining industry by way of subventions.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): The hon. member has changed his mind.

Mr. GILLIS: No; I did not change my mind, I appreciated and do appreciate that assistance, but the point I make is that since the subventions were inaugurated and coal moved westward, that industry has lost other markets somewhere, because according to the government figures production has decreased, and I know that unemployment has increased. I say that I see no benefit accruing to the men who dig the coal, because from 1921 until the present they have lost 37½ per cent of their wages, and I cannot see where their standard of living has increased. I say that assistance is necessary, and probably will have to be increased because apparently we are losing the markets somewhere else while we are pushing our coal further west.

Mr. KINLEY: So far as subventions are concerned it is my understanding that the purpose is to enable the commodity to reach markets which otherwise it could not reach. And the subventions have done just that, because in 1939-40 there were 2,600,000 tons coming to the upper Canadian market and in 1938-39 the amount was 1,300,000 tons.

We must not forget that the government has been pretty generous to the coal-mining industry of Nova Scotia. I have no coal mining in my constituency. The hon. member for Cumberland and the hon. member for Cape Breton South have a local interest in this coal-mining business. I have, however, a general interest as one who is intensely interested in Nova Scotia generally. In my county we are, however, also interested in foreign markets and we use coal. Canada is a cold country, and to keep warm is an important matter. The government of Canada has been very generous, and the men who represented Nova Scotia here and who secured these subventions, with the assistance of the premier of Nova Scotia, ought to be commended. The subventions are splendid. I am told by men who know, that the industry could not survive as a national industry without the subvention, so I hope it will be continued.

With regard to British coal I am told that the price at the present time is advancing in Great Britain and freight rates are also high so that you really must have some special concession in order to get coal at all from Great Britain. I am informed that during this week immense quantities of coal have come up into the province of Quebec from the United States for the purpose of supplying war-time industries. Look at what this United States coal has to face. There is the exchange which is around 20 per cent; there is a 10 per cent excise tax, and the duty. It seems to me that might be called adequate protection. When this coal comes in in such quantities over such hurdles it is hard to talk on economic grounds.

I am told that there is not the slightest danger to Cape Breton coal or Nova Scotia coal. The cheapest coal to mine is in Cape Breton; the mainland mines bring up the average cost of production. But I am told that there is not the slightest danger because there is room for all. During this winter time any English or Welsh coal that will come to the maritime ports cannot get up the St. Lawrence on account of ice, and it will not get the $2 subvention to Montreal or $2.50 to Toronto. Surely that is a preferred position for the industry in this country. I think the hon. member should say that this government has done well by the coal-mining industry of Nova Scotia.

Let us look a little further. Under the legislation now before the committee we are restricting petroleum products. Some time ago there was an order in council which prohibited the use of petroleum for heating purposes in this country under certain conditions. That is all to the benefit of the coal-mining industry. We are putting back the clock, as it were, in the interest of the coal-mining industry; that industry is being helped because it is in the national interest. It occurs to me that my hon. friend is using a local economic problem in arguing against an item that is inserted because of the national interest and with an international aspect.

This legislation is for a purpose, that of stabilizing exchange as between the three great countries concerned in this war. It seems to me that if there is anything we can do in order to stop what might be called a financial traffic jam in the flow of money between the three countries, it should be done. All three will be benefited; and surely we in Nova Scotia need not put the red light of danger before this parliament in connection with that matter. It may be we should put the orange light of caution on so that we may watch it in future. But I think that with the reduction of 35 cents duty a ton on coal, there will not be very many people hurt.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South said that the 3 per cent excise duty was taken off United States coal when we raised the subvention a year or two ago. That is only 5 cents a ton; it is very little. The whole problem resolves itself into one of whether we must have teamwork for the interests of the whole country. If the British can send us some coal, if only for ballast for ships that go over there with the goods we produce, it is better than having them return to Canada empty. It will also mean that perhaps we shall have British coal, which will help the exchange situation, instead of more coal from our southern neighbours who are rich in exchange.

Mr. GILLIS: I tried to have my remarks relevant to the matter before the committee. In 1939, approximately $18,000,000 worth of bituminous coal came in from the United States. I have tried to be patriotic. If we are going to market British coal in Canada on the basis of conserving foreign exchange, then we should exclude as much as possible of the United States product, and give the preference to Great Britain. The coal should be zoned, so that it would not dislocate the present Canadian market.

Mr. ILSLEY: It will not.

Mr. CASSELMAN (Edmonton East): I am not a coal expert; I cannot quote figures, or anything of that kind, but I am from a province which to-day produces the second largest amount of coal in Canada. I refer to Alberta. It is safe to say that if we had the markets we ought to have in Canada, and that if we have any sort of national policy, then certainly we have the capacity in Alberta to produce very much more coal than any other province, or, in fact, than all the other provinces put together.

The measure with which we are dealing has for its purpose the conservation of foreign exchange, and has particular reference to the exchange position with the United States. I have before me some figures submitted by the western fuel dealers association, and I believe I may assume they are correct because they check with the figures appearing in the "Canada Year Book." In 1939, we imported from the United States 2,605.735 tons of anthracite. It may be argued that anthracite is needed, that it cannot be supplanted, and that we cannot put bituminous coal in its place. The value of that coal is placed at about $27,000,000. In addition to that, we imported 9,836,110 tons of bituminous coal to a value of almost $63,000,000. If we add the $27,000,000 to the $63,000,000 we have a total of $90,000,000. Then, to that total could be added United States coke to the value of about $3,000,000.

If the government are really serious about this business of trying to save foreign exchange, surely I have shown a field which should be carefully explored by them. I may be asked what can be done. True, our coal is under subvention at the present time. I would, however, suggest to the government that, on account of the wheat situation in the west, a much smaller amount of wheat is moving along our railways. For that reason I assume rolling stock would be available for the movement of coal. I submit that the government might very well take up with the railways the matter of moving more coal to the east, and of having the railways reduce the present rate of $8, one which I believe applies to most of Alberta. If it were reduced only to the extent of 50 cents a ton, such a reduction would enable Alberta coal to go farther into Ontario.

My personal view is that it would be good business if the present subvention of $2.50 a ton were raised to $3, to serve that portion of Ontario which is not now covered by the $2.50 rate. I suggest that the government might very well take this matter into consideration, and for this reason: From all sides of the House of Commons we have heard discussion respecting national unity. It is admitted that practically all the war contracts are placed in the two central provinces. We in the west and the maritimes in the east are not receiving many contracts. We are not complaining, particularly, because, handicapped through lack of power, we have not as good facilities to offer. The fact remains, however, that we have some facilities which might be used. But if power is necessary, and since it is recognized that coal is a big factor in the development of power, I believe the part of Canada from which I come might be given further consideration in connection with the development of war industries.

My point is this: At the two extreme ends of Canada we have not the necessary industries. We still have a great deal of unemployment, much of which is in the coal-mining areas. In the winter time many of our farmers act as both farmers and coal miners. Many of the farmers are capable of doing coal-mining operations, and in that way they fill in their time and help fill out their limited incomes.

When we are thinking of national unity, I suggest that this is something we might keep in mind. The government should try to devise a policy which will give the people in the section of western Canada from which I come an opportunity to do something worth while. The more tons of United States coal which, through a measure of this kind, can be kept out, just to that extent do we save United States exchange. That is the purpose behind the measure before the committee. I leave the matter with the government, so that they may think about it.

Mr. BRUCE: I was absent from the house this afternoon when the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann) challenged the statement I had made earlier. Therefore I ask to be allowed to revert to the discussion of item ex 152 in the schedule.

The hon. member states that I deliberately failed to give the committee the proper information. Then he refers to his having interjected something into the debate of a few days ago. The hon. member states that when the leader of the opposition was speaking, he interjected that it took twenty times the quantity of ordinary tomato juice as sold in cans to produce the same amount of vitamin C as is produced by orange juice sold in cans. The hon. member is reported at page 654 of Hansard as follows:

> But not in the same quantity. It takes twenty times as much tomato juice to give the same quantity of vitamins.

The hon. member makes no reference to its being in cans. In my statement today I clearly stated, in two paragraphs, that I was referring to juice from sieved Canadian canned tomatoes. I picked them out, specially, because I did not think it was too much to ask Canadian housewives at this time, when economy is necessary, and when the Minister of Finance is asking us to tighten our belts, to spend a little time in putting tomato juice through a sieve, particularly when the vitamin content is considerably increased by so doing.

If the hon. member prefers, I will give the figures respecting canned tomato juice which has not been put through a sieve. The amount of milligrammes per ounce in that instance stands at 4.9, using the figure given for the best brand selected from eight or ten different brands of tomato juice. If we take that as against 11.3 of orange juice, it gives the vitamin content of orange juice as being about 2¼ times more than tomato juice.

Mr. KINLEY: Of the one vitamin?

Mr. BRUCE: Vitamin C, which is an important vitamin and one of great importance in nutrition. I have given these figures from table 3 of the report referred to, which has to do with the content of vitamin C in canned tomato juice. My hon. friend referred to it to-night, but he did not refer to it as canned tomato juice in his speech the other day.

I should like to give the average vitamin content which is given here in case I am accused again of not giving all the information. The average vitamin content of all brands of tomato juice is 3·6 milligrammes per ounce, while the average of all orange juice brands from various parts of the United States is 12·5 milligrammes; that is the average vitamin content in orange juice is less than four times greater than in canned tomato juice. I fail to understand why an hon. member who, I am sure, is interested in helping Canadians to dispose of their products and who, I am also sure, is interested in educating the public in the nutritional value of the tomato, should take the stand he has. The tomato is grown in every garden in Canada, by poor as well as by those able to afford orange juice. I would have thought that he would be interested in even exaggerating the importance of our own product.

Mr. REID: Who shall decide when doctors disagree?

Mr. BRUCE: I am quoting from a report of an investigation which was undertaken in Toronto for this specific purpose. I think the evidence is perfectly clear and I leave it to the committee.

Mr. KINLEY: The hon. gentleman has referred to the value of juices in an evident attempt to extol the Canadian tomato. He is to be complimented upon that, but I want him to know that in Nova Scotia we think the apple is superior and we recommend it to the people of this country.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Coming back to this coal question, I want to say that with resolution 6 we went to special lengths to assist Canadian industries which are a little hard pressed.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend seems to have the wrong idea. It is not a case of relieving industries, it is a case of getting industries to do a job for us and making a tax concession if they will do that job.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am glad the minister brought that to my attention. In order to get these industries to do the job efficiently, we have to guarantee them a profit. We are guaranteeing them a profit of 24·4 per cent—I think that was the minister's statement—above their normal profit.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not want to get into any altercation over the Excess Profits Tax Act at this time. There is no guarantee of a profit to industry. If there was any guarantee, there would be no difficulty. Many of these companies risk as much as half a million or a million dollars. They cannot, unless some concession is made, make these large capital investments to meet a demand in what may prove to be a temporary market. I do not know whether they can or not, but they will not. I do not wish hon. members or the country to think we are taking power to hand out concessions to industries because we want to put them in the profit-making class or guarantee them a profit. Not at all, it is a question of asking them if they will produce so much exchange for us, in which event we will make certain concessions in connection with their depreciation or depletion or by way of tax credit.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Nevertheless it is a concession to those industries. As the minister says, they may not make a profit, but if they do make a profit they are entitled to 20·4 per cent above the normal profit which they have made in the past three years. We take 75 per cent of the excess profits, but we leave them with 25 per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: Twenty-five per cent of what?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Twenty-five per cent above the average for the past three years, which was used as a basis. The minister corrected the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and said that it worked out to about 20·4 per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: From what the hon. gentleman says, I am not at all sure that he knows what the 25 per cent is of. It is 20·5 per cent of the profit. That is, if they make a dollar profit, this tax takes 79½ cents.

Mr. COLDWELL: Of the excess profit.

Mr. ILSLEY: If they make that profit over and above what they made before.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I understand that perfectly.

Mr. ILSLEY: Then the provinces usually take some more.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): But that leaves them a good margin above their ordinary profit. It depends, of course, upon the business they do.

[Mr. C. E. Johnston.]

The point I want to make is that these industries are given every possible assistance in order that their production may be continued. Surely the minister would not say that we have not sufficient coal in Canada to take care of our requirements. As the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Casselman) and the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) pointed out, we have an abundance of coal. What I am worrying about is why we should want to import more coal from Great Britain when we have thousands of people unemployed.

At Drumheller in my constituency there is one of the greatest coal industries in Canada. Every time I go there, these men come to me and wish to know what the government is doing. They say that all they want is a chance to work. I shall have to go back after this session and be faced with their questions as to why this government is letting in this coal from Great Britain. These men are sitting along the railroad tracks without any work to do. I cannot explain to these men that they are supposed to remain on the relief rolls, that their families are supposed to continue to suffer because they cannot get enough work to buy food and clothing. Yet here we are reducing the tariff so that coal from Great Britain may come in. I am not against coal coming in from Great Britain because we should give that country every assistance, but we should be consistent in our actions.

As the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley) has just said, it is quite possible that coal will be brought from Great Britain as ballast. It might prove to be in the interests of the shipowners to bring coal in as ballast, and if that is done the eastern mines will not be able to compete. It will only aggravate the situation in the east, which is already getting beyond our control. If there was not enough coal here, then I would say, bring it in from Great Britain.

We should shut off coal coming from the United States and thereby save in foreign exchange. I spoke at some length last session in connection with conserving foreign exchange by this action. If I remember the figures rightly, we would save something like $50,000,000 in foreign exchange if we produced our coal requirements in Canada instead of bringing them in from the United States. This would seem to be commendable action for the government to take. If that were done, then I would have no objection to coal coming in from Great Britain. But when we allow all this coal to come in from Great Britain and thus aggravate our labour troubles, it does not seem logical to me.

Then we have a situation in the west with regard to wheat. We are now going to shut off the farmers; they are not to be allowed to make a profit of any kind. The coal miners are now going to be shut off and not be allowed to make a profit of any kind. The Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) is going to have difficulties on his hands because of the increased importations of coal that will be coming in, and I think he might very well review this legislation with respect to its effect on the coal industry of Canada. I think he should at least restrict the amount of coal coming in from the United States by the tonnage that we shall be importing from Great Britain. These importations will only aggravate the present unfavourable conditions in this whole industry. If we are going to preach unity to the people of Canada, let us be logical about the whole matter. While coal importations from Great Britain may not affect us very much in the west, the coal industry in eastern Canada is going to be seriously affected. Coal is a national problem, and I think the government would be well advised to formulate a national coal policy for the benefit of all Canada and not for just one section of it.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Agreements to grant assistance.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I want to register my protest against what was said by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) this afternoon. I am absolutely opposed to the principle contained in this section whereby parliament surrenders to the executive the power to declare by order in council what persons shall be compelled to pay a certain tax and what persons shall be exempt from paying it. From the point of view of democratic government this is a most dangerous and unsound principle.

I suggested to the minister yesterday that producers who wanted to increase the prices of their goods should appeal to the war-time prices and trade board, and the minister replied that the board would be simply swamped with applications. I can tell him that I imagine he will be swamped with applications under this section. Once he has the power of recommending to the governor in council the granting of exemptions, a great many firms will apply to him for the benefits of that exemption; and instead of being able to satisfy anyone, this power will only lead to a great deal of dissension and, what is more serious, to many charges of favouritism and special privileges. Here in Canada for the first time the governor in council takes power to say that this firm or group of firms shall in certain circumstances be exempt from taxation under the Income War Tax Act and the Excess Profits Tax Act.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is not the first time at all. Under the Income War Tax Act the Minister of National Revenue has power to fix rates of depletion and depreciation. Indeed, if he were so minded, he could fix one rate of depletion for one firm and another rate for another. As a matter of fact, a board is sitting in this city at the present time to make special arrangements about depletion and depreciation for war-time industries. It is doing that under order in council passed under the War Measures Act. The War Measures Act confers powers a thousand times greater than this and gives a power of discretion a thousand times greater than this.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): But the minister will remember that when that power was granted last year, we protested vigorously. This is an extension of the same principle, a principle which was never acted on prior to the outbreak of war. I register my protest against conferring these powers because I think it will inevitably lead to charges of favouritism and special privileges, and it will not make for the best type of morale in fighting this war.

May I ask the minister if he would give the assurance or include a provision that orders in council granting these exemptions or partial exemptions will be made immediately available to the members of the house. I do not mean tabling the orders in council six months afterwards; I mean publishing them immediately in order that the public may know the terms of the exemptions that are granted under this section.

Mr. ILSLEY: I was about to move an amendment to this section in line with what I stated earlier in the debate, but I do not go as far as the hon. member is now suggesting because I do not think it is necessary.

The amendment I propose, Mr. Chairman, reads:

That section 8 be amended by adding thereto as subsection (2) the following:

(2) Whenever an agreement has been entered into under the authority of this section a copy thereof shall be laid before parliament by the Minister of Finance within fifteen days if parliament is then sitting, or if parliament is not sitting, within fifteen days after the opening of the next session of parliament.

Then the hon. member will have a chance to check us up, but I can tell him that we are pretty careful. I would ask my colleague to move the amendment.

Mr. McLARTY: I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 9 and 10 agreed to.

On schedule 1.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, by an inadvertence the printer or the law branch has included in part II of schedule 1 an item relating to apple pomace. It is item ex 99b—"apple pomace when imported for use in Canadian manufactures." That is all right. I am moving that that be inserted, although it has not been preceded by a resolution. The committee will remember that we took out the wording "when imported for use in Canadian manufactures," when dealing with the item in part I, but it is being put in part II where it does not do any harm at all. As it is printed, I should like to have it stand, because it will save reprinting.

Mr. McLARTY: I move:

That part II of schedule 1 be amended by adding thereto item ex 99b—apple pomace when imported for use in Canadian manufactures.

Amendment agreed to.

Schedule as amended agreed to.

Schedule 2 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, December 6, 1940.

Sir:—I have the honour to inform you that the Right Hon. Sir Lyman P. Duff, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber at 9.30 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
F. L. C. Pereira,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

STATEMENT AS TO ORDER OF UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT PERMITTING TEMPORARY DIVERSION AT CHICAGO

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Perhaps the house will allow me to give to my hon. friend the member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) some information he asked me for a little earlier in the day with regard to the Chicago diversion. I might mention to the house that the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) has a statement which he wishes to make in respect of rehabilitation and matters of orders in council and the like which it was promised would be made before the session is over.

That I think, is the only business. After the minister has made his statement, the house might suspend its sitting until 9.30 p.m.

What I wish to give to the hon. member for Davenport, if the house is agreeable, might be placed on Hansard.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. SPEAKER: By leave of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As the hon. member for Davenport mentioned, the press recently reported that the United States supreme court had permitted the Chicago sanitary district to increase its diversion from 1,500 to 10,000 cubic feet per second for ten days beginning December 2.

The main provision of the supreme court order issued on Monday, November 25, is as follows:

Upon consideration of the motion of the states of Wisconsin, Minnnesota, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Michigan, New York and Illinois, and in accordance with the following stipulation, it is ordered that the sanitary district of Chicago be and it hereby is authorized to increase its diversion of water from the great lakes-St. Lawrence system or watershed through the Chicago drainage canal from 1,500 cubic feet per second in addition to domestic pumpage to 10,000 cubic feet per second in addition to domestic pumpage for one continuous period of ten days from an appropriate hour on December 2, 1940, to the same hour on December 12, 1940, after which period all the provisions of the decree entered April 21, 1930, shall be and remain in full force and effect until further order of this court.

The stipulation contains statements that the agreement between the great lakes states and Illinois is not to be construed as in any way waiving, abandoning or prejudicing any of the positions taken by these states and is:

....not to be used as a precedent for any future request for additional temporary diversions in excess of the amounts fixed by the United States supreme court decree of April 21, 1930.

The Special Master, the Hon. Monte M. Lemann, in suggesting this agreement, said:

....it would be solely for the purpose of trying by this means to remove whatever slocculent active sludge deposits and sewage sludge may have accumulated in the Brandon road pool by reason of the introduction of untreated sewage and sludge from treated sewage.

It will be noted that the increased diversion is limited to ten days and that it is stipulated that it is not in any way to constitute a precedent. By meeting in this temporary fashion any substantial element there may have been in the Chicago sanitary district's contention that an increased flow might be necessary for sanitary reasons, the court has removed any possible ground for urging an increased permanent diversion.

The attitude of the supreme court to the general question of Chicago diversion is clearly set forth in a decision on April 3, 1940, with regard to a request from Illinois for a permanent increased diversion. The decision will be found in the Congressional Record of April 17, 1940. It will be seen that the court said that the state of Illinois had failed to show that it had provided all possible means at its command for the completion of the sewage treatment system, and that no adequate excuse had been presented for the delay.

SOLDIER REHABILITATION

STATEMENT WITH RESPECT TO PROBLEMS OF POST-WAR RECONSTRUCTION.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): Mr. Speaker, I had a statement prepared dealing with the general question of the programme of the government respecting the rehabilitation of ex-service men. I sent that statement this morning to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and to the leaders of the other groups. With the consent of the house I should like to have that statement, which is entirely informative and interpretative of the various orders in council and the policies already adopted by the government, placed upon the records of this house.

The house has been informed by several of my colleagues of the tremendous scope and scale of Canada's war activities from military, industrial and financial standpoints, but we are all acutely conscious that, following the tremendous upheaval of war, there will come the even more difficult problems of post-war reconstruction, with which my own department, that of Pensions and National Health, is inevitably associated in the public mind.

There is not only the problem of rehabilitating the ex-service men—that task is already with us, and in a measure has been grappled with—but that is only one aspect of the vastly greater and more complex task of reorganization and readjustment of our whole national life from a war-time to a peace-time basis.

The government has established an organization for the purpose of planning and directing the country's activities during this critical transitional period. Necessarily the existing organization of the Department of Pensions and National Health has been called upon to take an important part in this programme.

Now let us speak of the discharged soldiers and of the after-war problems, dealing first with those concrete and specific measures which have been already taken to provide for the welfare of the men whose services with the forces have already been terminated and with the measures taken looking towards the problem of demobilization and rehabilitation in its broader aspects after the war.

On September 2, 1939, by P.C. 2491, the benefits of our Pension Act and the whole machinery of the Canadian pension commission were placed at the disposal of the members of the naval, military and air forces of Canada who, while serving on active service, suffer disabilities.

In the same way, the dependents of such members of the services who met death in the performance of their duties on active service were brought under the benefits of the existing pension legislation.

Later, in the light of administrative experience, P.C. 1971 was passed on May 21, 1940, providing certain regulations for the guidance of the Canadian pension commission in administering the act in its relation to men on active service in the present war.

The chief principle involved in the order in council of May, 1940, was a clearer definition of the responsibility of the state, in relation to those whose service occurred in Canada.

It was provided that, where the man served in Canada only, the liability for war pension should exist only when disability or death arose as a direct result of the performance of military duties.

It will be realized that thousands of the men on active service in Canada are engaged in their military duties for only a limited number of hours per day and that, in the evenings and on week-ends, they are at liberty in very much the same way as the ordinary civil employees of the government.

In fact, thousands of men are being enrolled in this war with the avowed intention that their service shall take place entirely in Canada. I need only mention the ground crews employed in the air training plan. These men are in uniform and are subject to military discipline because that is the form of organization in which they are employed.

Actually, many of them are living normal civilian lives except for the hours during which they are on duty. Full protection is given where death or disability arise as the result of the performance of duty. But a number of cases arose in which men were the victims of accident while away from their military duties and under circumstances in no way associated with their service. It was not considered that any claim for war pension should arise from the consequences of accidents and incidents which come to all of us in the course of our ordinary lives.

A special regulation was necessary to meet this set of conditions because the original pension act was based on the conditions of the last war, when the assumption was that every man enlisted would proceed as rapidly as possible to a theatre of war.

A further amendment to the pension legislation was adopted on September 25, 1940, by P.C. 63/5079.

This order in council provides that Canadians who have joined the imperial forces since the outbreak of war shall receive pension at the Canadian rates.

Specifically the order in council provides that the Canadian Pension Act shall apply to persons who were resident and domiciled in Canada at the outbreak of the war and who, subsequent to September 1, 1939, have become members of the naval, military or air forces of the United Kingdom.

The benefits of the Canadian Pension Act shall apply to such persons if they suffer disability or death in respect of which a gratuity or pension is awarded under the laws or regulations of the United Kingdom, provided that the benefits shall be paid to persons who are residents of Canada, and only during the continuance of their residence therein.

The object of this was to provide for pension at the Canadian scale to bona fide Canadians who since the outbreak of war, have joined the imperial forces or been transferred thereto, and who return to live in Canada, or whose dependents, in the case of death, reside in Canada.

The large number of Canadians who have entered the service of the Royal Air Force and of the Royal Navy are, of course, the chief persons affected.

These men have offered their services in the manner in which they can best be applied to the common cause of the empire. I am sure it is the desire of all Canadians that, because circumstances have caused their services to be rendered in the forces of the United Kingdom, they shall not be deprived of the benefits of our legislation in any particular where the Canadian law provides greater or better assistance than would be received under the laws of another part of the empire.

During the present month, a further order in council (P.C. 204-6613, dated November 18, 1940) has been adopted, to meet a problem which many members have had drawn to their attention. It is necessarily and rightly the function of the armed forces to have on their strength only men who are fit for service, or who are expected to recover from any accident or illness which they experience, and return to service.

As soon as it is determined that a man is no longer fit for service, he has no place in the armed forces, and he is very properly discharged.

It was found, however, that the Department of Pensions and National Health had no authority to admit men to hospital after their discharge, unless and until it was ascertained that the disability was pensionable. The new order in council overcomes a very serious difficulty.

It is now provided that, if a man is in hospital under the department at the time of his discharge, treatment shall be continued, and a special allowance equal to assigned pay and dependents' allowance to the man's dependents shall be continued until treatment is concluded, or it has been determined whether the man is eligible for pension.

If a ruling is given that the man is not eligible for pension, the allowance shall continue for a period of seven days thereafter. Treatment, however, may be continued by the Department of Pensions and National Health until completed.

This order in council will, it is felt, avoid much hardship which would otherwise accrue to the families of men who are found unfit for further military service during the time required to adjudicate on the question of pension entitlement.

There have been approximately 20,000 discharges from the armed services, but many of these represent persons who did some temporary guard duty in their own localities. Some served for a few days or few weeks and the majority were never far away from their own provinces. It cannot be said that their contact with civilian life was completely disrupted for a long period, and in fact the majority have been reemployed.

About 1,000 men have returned from service overseas, about two-thirds of whom have been discharged to civil life.

Although the tremendous amount of war industry and general commercial prosperity resulting from the large war expenditures have created a most favourable employment market in Canada, special problems have already developed in connection with the placement and welfare of these discharged men.

At my personal request, one of my principal advisory officers made a tour of the chief Canadian cities investigating present conditions, and his observations were placed before a general advisory committee, whose functions I intend later to describe in detail.

Following a most careful study of the problem, in the course of which the views and experience of many private organizations and agencies interested in the welfare of the soldier were obtained, the government has decided to create, in the Department of Pensions and National Health, a new division, to be known as the veterans' welfare division.

There will be representatives of the division in all principal centres where such representation is needed and there will be a chief administrative officer at Ottawa.

The duties of this division and its representatives will be as follows:

(a) To interview, advise and assist former members of the forces.

(b) To become conversant with all regulations relating to pensions, allowances, medical treatment, employment, training, social welfare and other policies that may be of assistance to the ex-service men.

(c) To make a study of all occupational opportunities in the areas at which sub-divisions are established.

(d) To encourage employers to reemploy discharged men who were formerly in their service.

(e) To endeavour to secure preference for ex-service men in employment by industry generally.

(f) To keep in constant touch with the employment service of Canada, with regard to available employment.

(g) To obtain information from the Department of National Defence with respect to members of the forces arriving in the several areas for discharge, to arrange for notification to be sent to their families and to encourage volunteer local committees to welcome them.

(h) To maintain contact with veterans' organizations, with a view to fostering interest in the rehabilitation of former members of the forces, and to keep in touch with all other agencies likely to be of assistance.

(i) To develop favourable public opinion regarding the reestablishment of former members of the forces.

(j) To report to Ottawa on the activities and requirements in each district, and upon the results of the various types of reestablishment activity.

At the same time, I am able to inform the house that the auxiliary services of the Department of National Defence have instructed their local representatives to establish contact with all men at the time of discharge, and refer them to facilities that have been organized to assist in their reestablishment.

With the creation of the veterans' welfare division to coordinate civilian activities, a complete liaison will now be established, so that the man will be informed of all measures available to assist him in his return to normal civil life.

Prior to the establishment of the veterans' welfare division, measures had been taken in all chief centres to bring together the voluntary agencies desirous of assisting the ex-service men. The representative of the department, whose tour of Canada I have just described, held meetings in the following centres: Montreal, Quebec, Saint John, Halifax, Kingston, Toronto, London, Winnipeg, Regina, Saskatoon. Calgary, Edmonton and Vancouver.

In many of these centres he found citizens' committees already in existence, awaiting only some guidance and official machinery which would bring them into direct contact with the problem. In other centres representative groups were called together and arranged to create such committees. The form which the committees take will vary, according to the desires of the community itself.

Thus, in New Brunswick it was decided to ask the Red Cross society, which has branches in every community, to undertake the formation of committees throughout the province to interest themselves in the placement of men returned from overseas.

In several cities, particularly in the west, it was felt that the already established machinery of the veterans' assistance committees should be utilized and it was decided to add to the personnel of the voluntary committees to make them more broadly representative of the community at large and of those in a position to assist.

In Toronto, a citizens' committee, consisting very largely of outstanding industrial leaders, was in existence and had already placed some 250 men. Other organizations, such as the greater Toronto war services advisory council, agreed to cooperate.

One large industrial company has agreed to offer the facilities of its personnel division as a centre in which any official selected by the government might be trained in vocational guidance and placement work in the Toronto area, without cost to the public. I wish to express my personal appreciation of this splendid offer, because it is very evident that trained placement and vocational guidance personnel will be required by the department in increasing numbers as the problem develops.

As an illustration of the type of voluntary committees now being formed, it is interesting to note that in Saskatoon there were representatives on the committee of the Canadian Legion, of organized labour, of the government employment service, of the youth training programme, and of the board of trade.

It is the desire of the government that organizations such as these shall be represented in the local committees on as wide a basis as possible and I wish to express my personal appreciation of the extreme willingness to cooperate which was found in all parts of Canada.

Generally speaking, the problem of employment is not acute at the present time, although, admittedly, there are individual problem cases which can best be handled by these local committees familiar with the personal and family history of the men themselves and with the local conditions to which they must be adjusted.

At this stage, I should like to inform the house that amendments to our pension legislation have so far been enacted by order in council under the authority of the War Measures Act. This was considered essential in order that problems arising out of administrative experience might be dealt with promptly.

It is intended, however, at the present session of parliament to introduce a bill incorporating into the act the amendments already adopted by order in council, in order that they may have the consideration and sanction of parliament.

I am particularly anxious to bring these matters before the house in order that the whole question may be considered by a committee of the house in consultation with the government's principal advisers such as the chairman of the Canadian pension commission and the officers of the Department of Pensions and National Health.

The several amendments adopted to date were the result of very careful study and deliberation by staff committees and the government as a whole.

Nevertheless, there is no desire on the part of the government or the department to assume the role of omniscience in connection with this very human and complex problem.

The government is most anxious to receive the cooperation and advice of this house in connection with its pension legislation, and I look forward with keen anticipation to the work of the committee to whom the house will be asked to refer the bill, which it will be my duty to present at an early stage of the present session.

The foregoing measures just described are applicable especially to the men now being discharged, and constitute the nucleus of legislation and administrative measures out of which will be developed the nation's programme for the demobilization period, when several hundred thousands of men will suddenly be transferred from war-time to peace-time activities.

[Mr. I. A. Mackenzie.]

It was recognized from the outset that the demobilization period calls for long range planning, and that no single government department could begin to cope with a problem of such magnitude—affecting as it must every phase of the national life.

On December 8, 1939, by P.C. 4068½, the government created a special cabinet subcommittee on demobilization and rehabilitation to study and advise upon measures which will be required to meet the problems arising from demobilization and the discharge from time to time of members of the forces during and after the war.

The Minister of Pensions and National Health was designated as convener of the committee and the other members are the ministers of Public Works, National Defence, Agriculture, Labour, and the Hon. J. A. MacKinnon, who is now the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

The cabinet committee was authorized to appoint advisory committees selected from the personnel of government departments and to consult provincial and municipal authorities and public service organizations generally.

A general advisory committee, under the chairmanship of the Canadian pension commission, was organized and a series of subcommittees dealing with specialized phases of the problem was formed.

These committees have been functioning for some months and exceedingly valuable preliminary reports have been received.

However, this fall, it was found necessary to give legal status to the advisory committee and this was done by P.C. 5421, dated October 8.

It is provided that the advisory committee shall consist of:

The chairman of the Canadian pension commission, who shall be chairman;

The chairman of the war veterans' allowance board, who shall be vice-chairman;

And of the following members:—

The chairman of the civil service commission.

The deputy minister of labour and two other members nominated by the Minister of Labour.

The deputy minister of public works and two other members nominated by the Minister of Public Works.

The director of auxiliary services, Department of National Defence, and two other members nominated by the Minister of National Defence.

Two members nominated by the Minister of Agriculture.

The deputy minister of pensions and national health, and two other members nominated by the Minister of that Department.

Two members nominated by the Minister of Finance.

One member nominated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Broadly speaking, the chief governing principles which are guiding the committee in its work may be stated as follows:—

1. To avoid duplication of machinery and clashes of jurisdiction on the one hand, and to avoid gaps in administration on the other.
2. The Employment Service of Canada established under the Unemployment Insurance Act will give specialized attention to the placement of ex-service men.
3. Information, guidance and directional services to be furnished by the Department of Pensions and National Health.
4. Pension and other legislation to be extended and modified from time to time, to meet the new conditions of the present war, as may be found advisable.
5. The work of the general advisory committee to be kept strictly advisory in character —administrative responsibility being assumed by appropriate departments and branches of the executive government.

Prior to the passing of this order in council, the work was being done almost entirely by government officials. But authority has now been granted to name recognized experts from outside the service to assist on the subcommittee.

The general advisory committee is also authorized to bring before it persons specially qualified to advise on any matters coming within its terms of reference.

A small secretariat has been established for the purpose of compiling the results of the efforts of the committee and its several subcommittees.

I have already indicated very largely the extent to which action has been taken as a result of the deliberations of the cabinet committee and the several staff committees. But it will be of interest to the house to know in a general way the subjects under reveiw by the various subcommittees.

Subcommittee on post discharge pay and service gratuity: This committee is by no means satisfied that the gratuity paid to every discharged man at the end of the last war constituted the most scientific and effective use of the very large sum of money involved in the interests of the ex-service men themselves, and is making a comprehensive study of possible alternative measures—taking into account the deferred pay situation, the rates payable by the unemployment insurance commission, training allowances, and similar factors.

Subcommittee on vocational and technical training and retraining. There is a strong sentiment in this committee in favour of occupational training—

For those who are disabled in such a way as to prevent them from returning to their former occupations;

For those who have served for twelve months and whose technical, academic, or industrial training or education has been interrupted;

For others, honourably discharged after twelve months' service, who are considered by competent vocational guidance officers by reason of their age, aptitudes and inclinations to be benefited from such training.

In this connection, the work of the Canadian Legion war services, in affording secondary education facilities to the men while serving, has been noted with great satisfaction.

The work of the committee has been divided into specialized groups dealing with allowances, a survey of technical courses, a survey of agricultural courses, training for public survice opportunities, documentation on vocations and employment opportunities.

In the study which this committee has already made, there has developed a feeling that the maximum use should be made of the youth training plan already established under the Department of Labour, in cooperation with the several provinces.

It is also felt that provincial and local facilities should be utilized in any programme developed under this heading.

Subcommittee on retraining of special casualties. This committee has been especially concerned with the blind, the deaf, the maimed, etcetera.

In this connection, definite decisions have been made affecting those who may lose their sight.

An agreement has been entered into with St. Dunstan's hospital for the treatment and training of overseas casualties of this nature up to a certain point in England at the expense of the government of Canada.

In connection with those suffering from tuberculosis, it has also been decided that the existing provincial sanatoria shall be utilized, and that ex-soldiers shall be provided with their treatment there on a civilian basis.

There is a pronounced sentiment, among those who have given special study to the problem of amputation cases, that every effort should be made to return this type of casualty to Canada at the earliest possible moment, rather than to prolong their treatment and convalescence in the United Kingdom.

The Canadian National Institute for the Blind and the Amputations Association have rendered very valuable advice and assistance to this committee, and I wish to express my cordial appreciation of the voluntary cooperation received from these quarters.

Subcommittee on home settlement. This committee has made an intensive study of the soldiers' settlement schemes of the last war and is disposed to recommend a more limited measure of assistance which will avoid the setting up of burdensome debt contracts. It will also bear in mind that the permanent settlement of the ex-service man and his family in a home whether in the town or in the country is the ultimate aim.

Subcommittee on administration of special funds. Following the last war, it will be remembered that there were surpluses from the patriotic fund, canteen funds and various other sources which were devoted to the welfare of ex-service men. None of us is altogether satisfied that these funds were applied to the best advantage. It is contemplated, therefore, that a very close eye should be kept on the probable extent of any such special funds, and that the proper steps be taken to ensure that the maximum benefit shall accrue to the ex-service men in their rehabilitation.

Subcommittee on preference in public employment. The chairman of the civil service commission is presiding over this committee with a view to evolving such recommendations as may be deemed to be practicable.

Subcommittee on employment service. It is anticipated that the greatly strengthened Employment Service of Canada, under the Unemployment Insurance Act, will be the agency responsible for bringing together the man seeking a job and the job seeking a man.

It is contemplated that there will be a special service for ex-service men in this department.

This subcommittee has developed a form upon which the vocational experience and aptitudes of men in the services may be recorded, and this form has already been found to be of great value to the Department of National War Services in connection with any redistribution of labour which may be found necessary, in order that the country's man-power may be applied to the greatest advantage in our war effort.

I have enumerated the subcommittees now existing, but it is recognized that these by no means exhaust the field to be covered.

It is contemplated that additional committees will be formed to take up other fields of investigation, such as—

Returned soldiers' insurance.

Distinctive badging for ex-servicemen.

Organization of voluntary effort.

Cooperation of provincial governments.

Urban home settlement.

General family welfare.

Preferences in employment and public services other than dominion and in industrial and commercial enterprise.

Post-war public works.

It may be found advisable to cover even wider territory as time goes on.

In repaying our debt to these men we must neither patronize nor demoralize our service men. We trust we shall not make our efforts in this regard matters of political controversy.

Our men of Canada will fight a great fight; our men of Canada must be given the chance to finish the course with a fair field. We at home hold all Canada in trust for their return. They must never be permitted to return to a devitalized homeland.

Parochialism would be a grave disservice to men fighting and dying for this dominion and this democracy.

We cherish our federal framework of government. As long as we are truly federal we can never be fascist. We are conscious that unitary government would be destructive of unity in Canada. But our men are fighting for Canada, not for any local or parochial aim, and therefore we must realize and recognize that the remaking of Canada will constitute the major post-war reconstruction into which all our rehabilitation plans must be shaped and fashioned.

In all this work of planning and perfecting of rehabilitation arrangements, we must reinforce the patriotism of those whom we seek to help. Their opportunity of serving their country in war must be enlarged for service in peace, when peace comes. Consequently, home settlement, training, and employment will bulk largely in our plans and our policies.

The blueprints for the main fabric are in the Rowell-Sirois report. It is fitting that at this time there should be called a dominion-provincial conference to lay the foundations of the structure in which a living democracy can grow and develop.

When our young men are offering their lives as they are to-day, we who are less fortunate must not be less generous in the contribution which we should make to our nation, to the sacred cause and the unity of our nation.

I have always felt that the essentials of our Canadian citizenship can be stated very simply. They involve consent—the will to live together worthily; conservation—the preservation of our liberties and institutions; cooperation—conference with one another and courtesy.

But, most important of all, contribution—both individual and corporate.

Our ancestors have won for us many rights—sometimes we have taken these for granted—that life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness are the inalienable rights of every citizen of a true democracy. This was a banner for every man on this continent and all over the world.

Now I think we must go farther. Our method has served us well but the tempo of democratic action must be speeded up, and the purpose of our whole way of life must be reaffirmed and reestablished.

Let us capitalize the deficiencies of the totalitarian schemes and values. Democracy in the days to come must roll up a counter-revolution that will recall everywhere to the banner of human freedom all the resurgent elements of human progress and definite reforming purpose, all free men and free women who believe in the necessity of constant endeavour and of constant change.

Harold Laski, in his latest book, has said and they are very true words:

> Our choice is between the dark age of privilege and the dawn of an equal fellowship among men.

Progress, combined with consent, will avoid the legacy of bitterness and hatred that extremist policies would leave behind.

We war to-day against a fanatical creed combined with fiendish efficiency and cosmic aims.

In our life and death struggle to win, we must satisfy the craving of the ordinary man for a dynamic creed and a burning faith in a new social justice that will move the mountains of despair.

Our ancestors won for us liberties which are now the great pillars of democracy—liberty of speech, thought and writing; toleration, equality before the law, and government of the people.

We shall never know the meaning of these priceless liberties until they are lost to us.

We must now move on to ensure that every man will have the essentials for the pursuit of happiness; facilities for training if there is aptitude and inclination, a widening range and variety of employment, with a sufficiency of food and clothing and shelter and warmth.

With these rights should go minimum duties which will form a sound and solid basis of reciprocal benefit in the upbuilding of our nation.

We must expect our people to serve their country to the utmost of their capacity, but with this expectation and hope there must be fashioned and formed a charter of true democracy, security without slavery, freedom without poverty, progress without violence.

As I have said, we face the difficult problem of laying down equitable pension rules, of establishing ways and means of absorbing men from the armed forces back into civilian life.

It is a long-term programme, as the last war has taught us, which requires our serious consideration even in the midst of this great struggle.

What form of social or economic life is to be our lot following these tragic days, is, I am sure, the deep concern of every man in this assembly. It would indeed be bold to suggest now any specific system which would remedy most of the ills of the days gone by which are now so apparent.

But nothing in the story of human progress is more valuable, in my opinion, than men with inquiring minds.

So that perhaps it would not be amiss to put forward the view that while the "sweet red wine of youth" is being spilt to defend those constant companions along the broad highway of all human progress—yes, and all man's highest dignity, liberty and freedom—we who occupy another form of public service might spend our time at least building the fabric into which may be incorporated a sounder system which will reveal a higher conception of public service.

I do not wish to condemn completely economic, monetary, social systems of the past, but surely our future society can be better built if we benefit from the mistakes of the past and preserve the fundamental principles which existed in the period that lies behind—and supplemented, strengthened and buttressed by whatever constructive thoughts we may each and every one of us contribute to the system in the future.

I am not one of those who subscribes to the very much used phrases "the post-war period of economic chaos"—and—"never again in our time will we see civilization as we have known it."

I believe with all my heart—as does every man in this free House of Commons—that in all adversity lies great opportunity.

I believe in the capitalistic system, or rather in true and controlled capitalism. Capitalism as I understand it—and I am sure you all agree—is simply man sharing in the benefits of nature. In other words—sweat and toil applied to the natural world. Men using their hands and their muscles to create natural wealth and industry, instead of through idleness, enjoying the unearned increment of capital.

I have no prejudice against men who, through success and enterprise, have accumulated some measure of material wealth. But the principle that has been rapidly growing of living off the unearned increment of capital instead of digging and providing capital to mankind has been one of the cardinal departures from fundamental principles, which, to say the least, has caused distress, class distinction and unhappiness.

May I say that, in my judgment, there is no man in this parliament who would not honestly accept his part in the honest mistakes of the past.

I would consider it a great honour and privilege, in these serious days when we are bending our will to the preservation of our very lives, to work with all members regardless of political views.

I assure you, Mr. Speaker, my time will be available to work in cooperation with any member of the house to explore ways of contributing to success and victory in the difficult, terrible and anxious days ahead.

Mr. STIRLING: There are two questions I should like to ask, if I may be permitted. Is it the intention of the government to set up, when we return in February, a special committee to deal with soldiers' affairs?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: The second question is this. We have read on a good many occasions recently of from fifteen to twenty thousand men who have been discharged since the beginning of this war. Surely this does not represent the medically unfit.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I shall have to get the information from the defence services with regard to the latter part of the hon. gentleman's question. I have not that information at the moment.

Mr. MacINNIS: I understood the minister to say, in answer to the hon. member, that a committee would be set up to deal with the affairs of returned men. Will there be a committee to deal with the general problems of reconstruction?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No. That committee will deal only with the question of the adequacy of pensions administration and the War Veterans' Allowance Act.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I believe the minister assured us last July that a health committee of the house would be set up. Can he give us an assurance now that this committee will be functioning in February?

[Mr. I. A. Mackenzie.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I do not recall such an assurance, but there is an unofficial committee of the house which will act in cooperation with the Department of Pensions and National Health.

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the sitting was suspended until 9.30 p.m. this day.

The house resumed at 9.30 p.m.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Honour, the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the house went up to the Senate.

And having returned.

Mr. Speaker informed the house that the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

An act to amend the Special War Revenue Act.

An act respecting the conservation of exchange.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 9.45 p.m. until Monday, February 17, 1941, at 3 o'clock.

Monday, February 17, 1941.

The house met at three o'clock.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF ADDRESS IN REPLY

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received a message from His Excellency the Governor General, signed by his own hand, reading as follows:

I have received with great pleasure the address that you have voted in reply to my speech at the opening of parliament, and thank you for it sincerely.

ORIENTALS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

REPORT AND RECOMMENDATIONS OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TABLED

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I desire to lay on the table of the house copies of the report and recommendations of the special committee on orientals in British Columbia, which was appointed on October 1, 1940, to investigate the positions of persons of Japanese and Chinese racial origin who are resident in British Columbia, and to report upon the problem of Japanese and Chinese in that province from the point of view of national security, with particular reference to the question of military training.

BITUMINOUS COAL

TRANSFER OF ADMINISTRATION OF CHAPTER 6, 20-21 GEORGE V, TO MINISTER OF MINES AND RESOURCES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): In accordance with the provisions of the Public Service Rearrangement and Transfer of Duties Act I desire to lay upon the table of the house copies, in English and French, of order in council P.C. 1055, transferring the administration of the act to place Canadian coal used in the manufacture of iron and steel on a basis of equality with imported coal from the Minister of Trade and Commerce to the Minister of Mines and Resources.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

TABLING OF REPORT OF PROCEEDINGS AND OTHER RELEVANT DOCUMENTS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I wish to lay on the table of the house copies, in English and French, of the published record of the recent dominion-provincial conference. It has been thought advisable to have all the relevant documents brought together in a single volume. This volume thus includes: the letter of invitation to the conference which I addressed to all premiers on November 2, 1940; the replies received from the premiers; my letter of December 28, 1940, outlining the proposed agenda, and, finally, the verbatim proceedings of the conference itself. A general distribution to all hon. members will, I understand, be undertaken to-day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATIVE PROGRAMME—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DOCUMENTS

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if I am in order I should like at this stage to make some general inquiries of the government, and of the Prime Minister especially, in view of the fact that there is no speech from the throne on the resumption of this session.

First I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he will as soon as convenient make a general statement of the legislation and business of parliament for the remainder of the session.

I would also inquire when the war appropriation bill and the budget will be brought down. I should also like to know when the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1942, will be tabled.

May I also ask for the publication of the statistics prepared for the dominion-provincial conference in order to bring the statistical computations of the Sirois report so-called up-to-date. The Prime Minister and the house will recall that reference to these statistics was made by the press at the time the conference assembled, and the statement was made that these statistics were ready for production, but for some reason they were not produced. It seems to me it would be of great value to have these revised and up-to-date figures published.

May I also ask the Prime Minister if he will be good enough to let us know when the proposed committee on national expenditure will be set up.

I would also ask that copies of the revisions of the Bren gun contract and all other contracts awarded since the outbreak of war to the John Inglis company be tabled as soon as possible.

May I ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) if he will be good enough to table the latest record of war contracts awarded. The last volume I understand brings us down to August, 1940, since which time several thousands of contracts must have been awarded.

Finally—it may be unnecessary to ask this question because I have been in communication with the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston)—I should like to know the amount spent in the present fiscal year under the National Resources Mobilization Act in connection with the thirty day training period.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, replying to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), first with respect to the legislative programme of the session, I shall endeavour, in so far as the government is in a position to do so at the present time, to indicate to the house in the course of a day or two the measures that are likely to come up at this session. But I think I should state at once that the main work of the session will relate to essential war measures.

The war appropriation bill, to which my hon. friend has referred, will be introduced possibly this week—certainly immediately after the estimates of the Department of External Affairs have been discussed in the house.

The estimates for the fiscal year 1941-42 will be tabled this afternoon. The budget I understand will be introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) immediately after the war appropriation measure has been disposed of.

It was my intention this afternoon, if it were agreeable to the house, to proceed with a statement on external affairs as an introduction to a discussion of the estimates of the Department of External Affairs. That statement would give a review of the international situation, particularly of the progress of the war as it has developed since the house was last in session, also an outline of the measures relating to the war which have been considered since parliament adjourned. It would also contain a review of the affairs of the Department of External Affairs. It will be open to hon. members, of course, if they so desire, to have that statement followed by debate. I would suggest, if debate is desired, that we follow the procedure which was adopted on a previous occasion, namely, that such speeches as might be made on general policy be made with the Speaker in the chair. When the house goes into committee of the whole, the estimates of the department can then be taken up in detail.

What I shall have to say this afternoon, if the house is agreeable to listening to me, has been prepared with a view to furnishing a background for discussion on both external affairs and the war appropriation bill. It is almost inevitable that many of the questions relating to external affairs which will be asked will relate in large part also to what will be discussed under the war appropriation bill. I think, therefore, it would facilitate the business of the house if it is known at once that the war appropriation bill will, if the house is agreeable, follow immediately upon the discussion of the external affairs estimates.

My hon. friend also asked a question relating to the dominion-provincial conference.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): For the publication of the statistics prepared for the conference, bringing the figures up to date.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe that statistics have been prepared bringing up to date matters referred to in the report. They will be tabled immediately.

My hon. friend also asked some questions with respect to departmental matters. Perhaps I had better allow my colleague to reply to those.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There was the question of the setting up of a committee on national expenditure.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sorry I omitted to refer to that. I hope to introduce the motion this week. I would have introduced it at once, but I thought it desirable that the whips should first confer as to the personnel of the committee. It is also necessary under the rules of the house that notice shall be given in the Votes and Proceedings.

Were there any other questions?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I interject that I think it would be very desirable that we should confer on the terms of reference to the committee. That I think is just as important as the personnel of the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall be very happy to confer with my hon. friend. I may say I had in mind in drafting the motion what he himself had expressed before the adjournment, namely, that we should follow as closely as possible the motion as introduced in the British House of Commons. I have had the motion prepared, but I shall be pleased to confer with my hon. friend further with regard to it.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question asked by the leader of the opposition with respect to the tabling of contracts awarded, may I say that, but for difficulties in connection with printing, I would have been able to table one volume to-day. The printing bureau has two volumes in hand and one of them was promised in time for the opening to-day. As soon as they are ready I shall be glad to table them. They cover contracts awarded to the end, I think, of the year 1940.

With respect to the Bren gun contract revisions, I shall table them at the next sitting of the house.

MAIN ESTIMATES 1941-42

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1942, was presented by Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE FOR GOVERNMENT BUSINESS ON AND AFTER MONDAY, FEBRUARY 17

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Monday, the 17th February, to the end of the present session, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence at every sitting over all other business except introduction of bills, questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

He said: As hon. members will recognize, this motion is in terms identical with the one I moved at the beginning of the last session. At that time I thought the house felt itself fully seized of the significance of the session as a war session, and as I recollect it, the house gave its assent readily to the passage of the resolution. I am sure that with such knowledge as hon. members must have of conditions in the world to-day, there will be agreement that the present session should have as much of the character of a war session as any session of parliament is ever likely to have. The government feels that as rapidly as possible we should proceed with the most important legislation relating to Canada's war effort, and that, throughout, the attention of the house should be concentrated as exclusively as possible upon Canada's war effort.

The motion is also similar to the one introduced in the British House of Commons at the first session after the outbreak of war by Mr. Chamberlain, when he was prime minister, and to the motion which has again been introduced at the beginning of the present session of the British parliament by Mr. Churchill. Indeed, the motion introduced in the British house goes somewhat further than the present one, in that it does not permit even the introduction of public bills other than government bills. As it is worded, this motion does not preclude the introduction of bills other than government bills, nor does it prevent the placing of resolutions on the order paper. What it does ask is that the house give precedence to government measures. As I have already said, the reason for giving such precedence is to permit of concentration upon matters which relate to the war.

I would point out, first of all, that such concentration is desired by the government itself, in order that members of the government may be able to devote their time as exclusively as possible to war measures. Hon. members will realize that if private resolutions were to be taken up in the order in which they appear on the order paper, practically all members of the government would have to be present as the resolutions are called, and individual members more or less prepared to discuss them. It is not known when items on the order paper may be reached, or in what particular order they may be discussed. Of necessity, much time would require to be given by members of the government to a consideration of a great variety of questions. It is time which it seems to me can be ill spared at this particular period.

Then there is the hope that the House of Commons itself may concentrate more exclusively on war measures. There is no desire to prevent hon. members from bringing up any subject they believe to be of public importance. There are in fact many opportunities for the discussion of questions which are likely to have any real, public significance. Those discussions may take place while the house is considering the estimates, in connection with the war appropriation bill. In the consideration of the budget other opportunities will also arise. In the event of the house wishing to discuss any particular question of public interest, I should think some arrangement might readily be made as a result of conference with leaders of the different groups.

Not only is there the necessity of concentration by the government and parliament on our war effort. There must also be consideration for the time which will necessarily be exacted from members of the public service. I doubt very much if hon. members can appreciate the load which many members of the public service are carrying at this time, in comparison with what is carried by them in ordinary years. There is not a prominent member of the public service engaged in any war effort work whose time is not already taxed to the limit. To add to the staffs in the service any additional burden at this time would be placing a very heavy load upon them, indeed.

I would say, further, it is necessary that the House of Commons give guidance in these matters to the country itself. I believe the country as a whole will become increasingly war conscious, if that is the correct phrase to use, by the House of Commons devoting most of its time to matters pertaining to the war, rather than if attention throughout the country is from day to day and week to week diverted from the war by the discussion of irrelevant or extraneous matters.

A little later in the day I purpose, as I have said, to make a statement to the house with respect to the international situation as it exists at the present time. I would ask hon. members in considering their attitude towards the present motion, to ask themselves what the impression created throughout the country would be if at a moment of great crisis such as I believe is approaching, and approaching rapidly, this House of Commons should be busying itself with the discussion of some academic resolution or some question which at this time at least does not begin to assume the importance which attaches to problems of war which are uppermost in the mind of the public to-day. I am afraid that people would feel that we had not a due sense of the gravity of the situation in the world if we allowed the time of this House of Commons to be taken up, at present, or, indeed until after all war measures are disposed of, with the discussion of private members' resolutions.

The government is very strongly of the belief that the world situation is so critical that we should press on with government measures as rapidly as possible, and that they should have precedence. It is for that reason that I have introduced this resolution immediately.

I might add that I would wish it to be understood that the government appreciate to the full the rights of private members in ordinary times, and that the rights, that for the moment are being suspended, should be restored as soon as circumstances justify that course. But the country has sent us here to get on with government business; that is the first charge that is upon us, and in the light of the situation as we know it in the world to-day we feel it our duty to ask the house to join with us in giving to war measures as immediate and exclusive attention as may be possible.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): This motion I think was anticipated by the house and by the country, even before the notice was given. It is similar in principle, and I think in letter, to that introduced on May 21 last by the right hon. gentleman, which carried then with very little opposition except on the part of one or two private members. The reasons alleged for the motion to-day are the same as those alleged in May last, special emphasis being laid on the fact that the ministers should not be required to attend here to follow discussions of private members' resolutions.

Fundamentally and primarily the resolution was carried last May for three reasons: First, the country was at war, and the situation the same as to-day; second, this is a war parliament and the situation then and now is the same. But primarily it was because the government had a programme of war legislation which it desired to have enacted with the least possible delay.

It was for that reason that I personally, and I believe my friends surrounding me, readily acquiesced in the Prime Minister's motion. But that situation is not present to-day. What have we on the order paper, or what had we until the estimates were tabled and my friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) made the motion which he did to have those estimates referred to the committee of supply? There was no government business on the order paper; therefore the real underlying necessity for this motion is not present to-day. The situation is not as it was last May.

With respect to diverting the attention of members of the ministry from their war efforts, I sympathize with the desire of the Prime Minister that these gentlemen should be unimpeded in their efforts to win this war, although there is much to be said about their lack of effort. But I do not think that many of those hon. gentlemen whom I see facing me on the treasury benches need be detained from their offices to attend here on the discussion of private members' resolutions which are at present on the order paper. They are few in number and, with the exception of one or two, of no importance.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is true. I do not mean—yes, I suppose I might apply that to the members of the government, although that was not the thought in my mind at the moment.

But behind this there is a principle. It has been the privilege of the private member to bring forward views on matters of public importance on days reserved for that purpose by the custom of this parliament since the day there was a book of rules. Last year I made the observation that I hoped the passing of this motion would not be considered a precedent for future sessions, but what I feared then has now come to pass. It has become a precedent for this session and will continue to be a precedent for future sessions for this and succeeding governments. That ought not to be. Hon. gentlemen in this house, private members sitting on both sides of Your Honour, have the right, if opportunity is afforded them, to bring up matters of public importance. Notwithstanding what the Prime Minister has said, I suggest that it is the best method for bringing forward concrete subjects for discussion by this house—in fact the only method that is available to private members.

If the government has a programme of war legislation ready to proceed with, and necessity required that it be proceeded with, I should be among the first to try to help forward the government's war effort. But that is not the case. The government might very well give to-day and Wednesday to private members, allowing them the opportunity which the constitutional practice of this house gives them. I suggest to the Prime Minister that he amend his motion to read "on and after the twenty-fourth of this month". If he will not do that I suggest that he enlarge the motion not only to take in the introduction of private bills but also to facilitate the consideration of private bills. There are some already introduced and I presume there will be others. Under this proposal, unless the government saw fit to facilitate it, there is no opportunity afforded for proceeding with private legislation. We ought not to bar private legislation. My right hon. friend will remember that last year a special motion had to be passed in order to facilitate the consideration of certain private legislation in this house. I suggest, therefore, that in any event the Prime Minister ought to change his motion in order to make that possible and to obviate the necessity of a special resolution.

Once more I suggest to the Prime Minister that the right of the private member to bring forward by way of motion any matter of public interest and importance has long obtained in this house, and ought not to be taken away except in situations of the utmost gravity. Whether or not the Prime Minister has made out a case of such gravity at the present moment I leave it to the house to decide.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown Biggar): I should like to support the suggestions made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson). I do not think there is an hon. member in this house who would wish to deny to the government the right of precedence in the present emergency. It is true that last May we agreed to the passage of a resolution similar to the one now proposed. At that time, on behalf of the group with which I am associated, I suggested that perhaps later in the session some opportunity might be given for the consideration of the resolutions and bills of private members, but that was not found possible.

I would respectfully submit to the Prime Minister that while in England similar resolutions were passed, at the instance first of Mr. Chamberlain and latterly of the Lord Privy Seal, conditions in the two countries are not altogether analogous, for the reason that we are paying very little attention to those grave domestic problems which, if they are allowed to continue to simmer as they are simmering at the present time, will interfere with our war effort more than almost anything else I can think of. During the last several months I have been over a good deal of this country, and people are asking the question: "What is to happen after the war has been won? Are we going back to the conditions we knew prior to 1939?" These domestic problems require attention, and one of the ways in which they are brought forward is through the resolutions of private members.

There is now on the order paper in the name of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) a resolution dealing with old age pensions. In Great Britain old age pensions have been almost doubled since the war broke out. There are other matters of equal importance, brought about by the rising cost of living, which ought to receive the consideration of this house. While I am not intimating that we want to interfere in any way with the precedence of all government measures relating to the war, I suggest to the Prime Minister that some safeguard should be given the private members in order that they may introduce legislation and resolutions and thus bring before parliament problems of domestic importance. I would support the suggestion of the leader of the opposition that unless the government has an immediate programme to introduce, for this week at least the resolutions of private members should be proceeded with.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, if no one else wishes to speak I would say to my hon. friends who have referred to the legislative programme that what is being presented to-day is almost identical with the programme that was presented to this house at the beginning of last session. Despite the fact that there are not a number of bills on the order paper, having regard to the estimates, which cover the entire work of government; the war appropriation bill, which covers the expenditures on war account, and the budget, which has to do with the ways and means by which the revenues are to be raised, the house has before it at the present time a very large programme of government business. These are all measures that must pass this house if public business is to be carried on, and I venture to say that if the house should give its entire attention to the war appropriation bill, the estimates and the budget, we shall be here for a couple of months at least before we reach the end of that programme. No hon. member in this chamber can begin to surmise what may happen within even a couple of weeks. I think it important that we should get as far under way with our government business as may be possible, just as speedily as possible. I come back to what I have already said, the legislative programme to all intents and purposes is in its nature the same as the programme of last session, which was also a war session; it is all related to war measures and the carrying on of the government of the country at a time of war.

As to the resolutions on the order paper, I will not go as far as my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), who said that with the exception of one or two none of them were of any importance, but I will say that there is not on the order paper a single resolution that I have read which brings forward a question of public interest that could not be fully discussed either on going into committee of supply or when we are in committee on the estimates relating directly or indirectly to the particular subject to which it refers. That, I think, is the proper time to discuss these matters.

My hon. friend the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) has just mentioned old age pensions. Well, this house has to vote money for that purpose. What better opportunity could there possibly be for a complete discussion of that question than when the item in the estimates on old age pensions is before the committee? The advantage of discussing these matters on the estimates will be that every member of the house will know in advance just when these matters are likely to be taken up. On the other hand, should we follow the usual procedure we would have before us a series of resolutions, and until some hon. member proceeds with his resolution no one would know what was going to be taken up. I quite agree with my hon. friends the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and the leader of the opposition that no question of public importance should be sidetracked by the government under the pretext that precedence must be given to matters concerning our war effort. I will undertake to say that if questions of that character are brought up and the house is of the opinion that they require a full discussion, somehow arrangements will be made in order that such discussion may take place. I do wish to say, however, that when my hon. friend asks us to give this week for the resolutions of private members, I, for one, would not take upon myself the responsibility of saying that we were serving the public interest, in the manner I think we are expected to serve it, by devoting time to the resolutions that stand in the names of private members, instead of taking up those other measures to which I have just made reference.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I have no objection to this motion if, as the Prime Minister says, it is going to enhance our war effort, but I do not believe it is. After all is said and done, the government have been three years late in adopting many of the measures that private members have introduced in an attempt to give leadership to the government. I refer to national registration; a larger navy, army and air force; the youth training schemes of the Minister of Labour, and many similar matters. The Prime Minister might just as well abolish this House of Commons altogether, because when this motion carries we are going to be simply a body of yes-men and nodders. The duties of the opposition are constitutional. The opposition is here to criticize government legislation. The opposition is the alternative government. If the opposition objects to government measures the government either amends them or compromises, and the country is given the parliamentary and constitutional rule to which it is entitled. This house is the only place where the man on the street, through his member, can have his grievances ventilated or where he can find out what is the government's policy and what is the policy of the opposition.

Since the Prime Minister has adopted this attitude this house might as well meet in secret, because the press no longer reports the proceedings of the House of Commons. The government has usurped the powers of the private members. I would not object if you took away private members' days at once, but I do not believe that would lead to any greater war effort. We have been too late in everything. Since the house last met we have had minister after minister going across the country announcing expenditures running into hundreds of millions of dollars, over the head of parliament; and in England even one of the deputies announced a huge expenditure which had never been considered by the house. Treaties have been entered into at Washington, and we heard of one of these from a member of the joint defence board, the mayor of New York. He announced certain policies to be adopted by this country for the joint defence of the two countries before this House of Commons heard anything about them.

It was things like this that caused this war; it was interference with constitutions that caused this war. "Yes-men and nodders" caused this war, as the evolution of tyranny in Germany and Italy and Russia was only made possible by those representing the people who at the start surrendered their powers and functions to autocracy there, and that is how the dictators were installed, and once they are installed it is not possible, except by force, to unhorse them. It is coming to that in Canada as, unnoticed, the powers, functions and privileges of the private member are usurped by outside boards and by the executive. The private member is the connecting link between the government of the day and the electorate, and where he ceases to function all parliamentary government is at an end, and we are on dangerous ground. The people are not given the facts and know nothing of what is going on, and this house might just as well meet in secret or not at all, as owing to this usurpation the press no longer reports the House of Commons.

The private member is being treated with contempt. For instance, the members from the Toronto district have never been invited by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power), or the Minister of National Defence for Naval Affairs (Mr. Macdonald) to attend a single function since the war started, or to see how the money is being spent. I did get one letter from the late Minister of National Defence, Mr. Rogers, in which he asked for constructive criticism. Everybody wants to assist the government in the conduct of its business, so long as the government gets on with the war effort. But the people are not satisfied with the war effort so far in Canada.

The government misjudged the question of man power and the whole European situation. The government was too late with munitions, too late with everything. A year ago the government was depending on France and the Maginot line to hold on until they got ready, but we know now what happened. This year, in the same way, they are depending on the United States instead of on Britain and themselves. The Toronto members have been treated with contempt. There are more than 5,600 men in the Manning depot, but not one member from that district has been invited to visit this depot, to see how this and other military expenditures are being made and how the war is being conducted.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that on this motion he cannot enter into a discussion of the merits of the policy of the government.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The hon. member is entirely out of order, because the debate was closed with the Prime Minister's reply.

Mr. CHURCH: I am just about to conclude. I am simply defending the rights of the private members in this house to function and get the facts. If we have no rights, it would be better to close up the house at once. With the appointment of all these outside boards, our functions and powers have been taken away from us, without our knowledge or consent. In my opinion, the Prime Minister has been acting as a dictator. He treats the members of his own party, and the opposition as well, as though they were a lot of yes-men and nodders. I am objecting to the way he treats the private members. As a member of parliament I have certain rights and privileges. I was not sent here to represent myself; I was sent here to represent a constituency. I may be the only one to do it, but I protest against this manner of doing business.

The members of the opposition have certain functions which they should carry out. We should not be asked to sit here when boards have usurped our powers and functions. As I understand the constitution, it is the duty of you, Mr. Speaker, to protect the private member when his rights and privileges are being taken away. The Minister of Finance gave us no notice whatsoever about this war certificate campaign until the night before it opened; he wired us to help but did not say how, and we never received even a pamphlet about it. I got a letter this morning from the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Gardiner) asking me as a member of parliament to take part in a rags, bones and bottle campaign.

The government are too late even with this. About a year ago I moved for a return in connection with the sale of copper, pig-iron, scrap-iron and other base metals to Germany, Italy, Russia and other dictator countries. This return which was not brought down until the middle of the summer, showed an awful state of affairs. At that time the city of Toronto carried on a campaign of its own to collect and utilize waste materials, and a large sum was realized. But the city started that campaign itself and finished it itself. Now when parliament is reassembling we are being asked to take part in a rags, bones and bottle campaign, and that is the sum total of our invitation to help in this war.

If the government want to get on with the war effort, let them get on with it and not treat the private members with contempt. There was never a prime minister who talked more about the supremacy of parliament than the present Prime Minister, but since the war started he has set himself up as a dictator. I will not object if we close up to-morrow. It might be a good thing to do that and let these outside boards which have assumed our functions take over. Some of them are all "board", because nothing has been done. If the government is sincere in wanting to get on with the war effort there should be some real recruiting in Canada and real aid to Britain, not this "on again, off again, on again" type of recruiting. Public confidence has been lost, as was demonstrated in the last loan campaign, by lack of leadership.

I am not objecting to taking away private members' days, but I do object to members of parliament not being given the information they should receive under parliamentary practice. I reassert the rights of the opposition to air grievances as to the conduct of the war and of the civil departments, as well as of these outside boards and other bodies which are usurping the rights and privileges of the members of the opposition in this honourable house.

Motion (Mr. Mackenzie King) agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE

INCREASE IN PENALTY FOR FAILURE OF DRIVER OF MOTOR CAR TO STOP AFTER ACCIDENT

Hon. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 10, to amend the Criminal Code.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. CHURCH: This bill brings up again the awful slaughter which takes place upon the highways of Canada. The object of the bill is to increase the penalty from "a fine not exceeding $500 and costs or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months" to a term of "not less than six months and not exceeding twelve months". There will be no option of a fine and the driver's car will be subject to seizure and forfeiture. The lives lost and the persons injured upon our highways exceed by far the deaths and injuries caused by this war. They equal the havoc caused by plague, pestilence, famine, battle, murder and sudden death. The responsibility is now upon parliament to take some action in this matter.

I do not want to see the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) or the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) killed upon the highway. Several soldiers have been killed by hit and run drivers when on military duty. This type of driver is the most cowardly of all. He who hits and runs away will return to kill another day. Ninety-eight per cent of our drivers are careful; it is only the two per cent who create this problem. This slaughter goes on and yet nothing is done about it. I am laying this bill upon the doorstep of the government, because after all it is their duty to solve this problem.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NATIONAL BIRD DAY

COMMEMORATION OF WORK OF JACK MINER IN BIRD CONSERVATION

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 11, respecting national bird day.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. MacNICOL: When the estimates were being considered last year in connection with a grant to the Jack Miner bird sanctuary at Kingsville, Ontario, I stated that I felt that this country ought to do something while Jack Miner was still alive to commemorate the wonderful work he is doing.

The purport of the bill is that the government of this country proclaim April 10, which is Jack Miner's birthday, a national bird day in honour and commemoration of the marvellous work that has been done by this greatest conservationist of wild life and particularly bird life. Jack Miner, while not Canadian born, is and has been a Canadian all his life, and his family were all raised here. A short time ago a citizen who had read in Hansard the remarks I had made last session in connection with Jack Miner wrote me a letter suggesting that Jack Miner's birthday should be commemorated and a national bird day be proclaimed in his honour. He will be seventy-six next birthday. We have quite a number of national days of one kind or another which we observe. We have a fire prevention week, which I believe is a United States institution, but it is also observed here during the week of October 9, which is the anniversary of the great Chicago fire.

In April the birds, both wild and tame, will be returning to this country from the south. The tame birds will be bringing their song and colour to delight us, and the wild birds will be alighting in the constituency of my hon. friend the member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette), where hundreds of thousands of geese and ducks, after leaving Jack Miner's sanctuary, stop over on their flight to the north.

Briefly, then, the purport of the bill is to honour Jack Miner. When the bill is before the house for second reading I shall have more to say. I think this would be a well deserved though long delayed honour that we might well pay to Canada's greatest living naturalist and one of the world's great men to-day.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

*NAVAL, ARMY AND AIR FORCES—REHABILITATION OF DEMOBILIZED PERSONNEL

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East):

1. What reports, if any, have been made by the committee appointed under P.C. order 4068½, dated December 8, 1939, regarding the problems which will arise from the demobilization and the discharge from time to time of members of the forces during and after the conclusion of the present war, and the rehabilitation of such members into civil life?

2. What recommendations, if any, have been made by the committee set up under P.C. order 5421, dated October 8, 1940?

3. What does the government propose to do with regard to the rehabilitation of personnel being discharged from time to time from the navy, army and air forces?

4. If a general policy has not yet been formulated by the government with regard to discharged personnel, what is being done in the meantime for persons being discharged from time to time from the navy, army and air forces?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, this question was answered in detail in the statement I made to the house on December 6, 1940, and I therefore ask that the question be dropped.

Question dropped.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY—AMHERST, N.S., CANADIAN CAR AND FOUNDRY PLANT

Mr. GILLIS:

1. Has the attention of the government been drawn to the fact that the Canadian Car and Foundry Company Limited plant located at Amherst, Nova Scotia, which rolled sheet steel during the last war, is idle, and that the other mill there is expected to close down shortly on account of shortage of material?

2. Does the Department of Munitions and Supply intend to utilize these plants at this critical time?

Mr. HOWE:

1. The Canadian Car and Foundry Company Limited plant at Amherst, Nova Scotia, has no equipment for rolling sheet steel. It has rolling mills for producing bars and structural shapes. The steel controller has not been advised that any firm in Amherst now working on war materials is expected to close down because of shortage of steel.

2. The aircraft branch of the Department of Munitions and Supply proposes to utilize a very large portion of the plant facilities of Canadian Car and Foundry Company Limited at Amherst, N.S., in the manufacture of components for the Anson twin-engine training plane, the final assembly and fly-away of same, and is establishing in that company's plant a permanent overhaul and repair base for all planes to be utilized in the joint air training plan in the maritime provinces.

Substantial sums of money have already been expended in preparation for the handling of these contracts and actual work on both these undertakings will be in active prosecution during the next few months.

SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES—NAZI AGENTS POSING AS JEWISH REFUGEES

Mr. REID:

1. Has the government's attention been drawn to the information as stated by the New York News of November 26 to have been given the United States government by the government of Great Britain that specially trained nazi secret agents and saboteurs are presumably fleeing to vital world countries masquerading as authentic Jewish refugees to operate under direct orders of Germany?

2. Has any such information been given to the Canadian government, and, if so, (a) are appropriate steps being taken to safeguard against such visitors or immigrants, and (b) are any further investigations or checks being made on those who have come to Canada since April, 1939?

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. The Canadian legation has ascertained informally, from the United States State Department, that they have no record of having received any such communication from the United Kingdom government.

2. No. (a) and (b). A thorough investigation is made of all refugees before they are allowed to enter Canada and a close check is kept on them after they are in Canada.

TIMBER CONTROL—EXPORT OF LOGS

Mr. REID:

1. Have any steps been taken to prohibit the export of logs?

2. If so, what prohibitions have been put into effect, and (a) do any such prohibitions apply to all provinces, and (b) are all such regulations or prohibitions formulated by the timber controller?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes.

2. An order prohibiting the export of all fir sawlogs from British Columbia to non-British empire destinations was issued by the timber controller on July 6 last, to take effect on July 10, for a period of three months. This was subsequently extended for a further period of two months. Order in council No. 7156 of December 4, 1940, provides that "no person shall export from Canada Douglas fir sawlogs without first having obtained a permit issued by, or on behalf of, the Minister of National Revenue".

(a) This embargo applies in effect only to the province of British Columbia as it is the only province from which Douglas fir sawlogs are generally exported.

(b) Yes.

MERCHANT VESSELS FOR BRITISH ACCOUNT—USE OF ATLANTIC SHIPYARDS

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. Will contracts for the eighteen large merchant vessels for the British government account, announced by the Minister of Munitions and Supply on November 20, be awarded only to shipyards on the St. Lawrence river and the Pacific coast?

2. If so, for what reason?

3. Why are Atlantic coast shipyards not to be given an opportunity to share in this construction?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes.

2. They are the only shipyards whose facilities are available to undertake such construction at the present time.

3. Facilities of Atlantic coast shipyards equipped to undertake construction of this character are at the present time fully occupied with ships' repairs.

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL—RACIAL ORIGIN OF PERSONNEL

10. Yes.

COLIN MACKENZIE, K.C.

Mr. MacLEAN (Cape Breton North-Victoria):

1. Is Mr. Colin MacKenzie, K.C., of Sydney, Nova Scotia, serving in any capacity under the Department of National Defence?
2. If so, what are his duties and authority?
3. Has the department or any officer in military district Number 6 instructed officers in Cape Breton to take orders only from Mr. MacKenzie for the supply of stoves and other materials?

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. and 2. Mr. Colin MacKenzie, K.C., of Sydney, Nova Scotia, is not employed by the Department of National Defence. He is an agent of the Department of Justice and receives his authority from that department.

3. No such instructions have been issued by this department. If officers in Cape Breton have issued such instructions they have done so without authority.

PROCEDURE IN EMPLOYMENT OF SYDNEY MINES YOUNG MEN ON DEFENCE PROJECTS

Mr. MacLEAN (Cape Breton North-Victoria):

Must young men of Sydney Mines, who are in need of employment, first go to Sydney, Cape Breton South, and obtain employment slips before being employed in their home town on defence projects?

Mr. McLARTY: Placements on Department of National Defence projects in Cape Breton are made by the Employment Service of Canada. While the Department of Labour subsidizes the operation of the free public employment offices in Nova Scotia, they are under the direct control and supervision of the provincial government. The nearest office to Sydney Mines is that at Sydney, but the province has a special placement officer for the district, dealing with national defence placements. Sydney Mines is one of the points visited by this officer, whose name is C. C. Ogilvie.

CHESTER WALTERS

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Is Mr. Chester Walters in receipt of a pension from the Dominion of Canada?
2. If so, what is the amount?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Yes, a superannuation allowance.
2. $1,941.67 per annum.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ADVISORY BOARD

Mr. LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency):

Why did not the Labour Minister appoint a French-speaking Canadian on the unemployment insurance advisory board?

Mr. McLARTY: For the reason that at the time the commissioners of the unemployment insurance commission were appointed, the chief commissioner and one other commissioner were residents of the province of Quebec. It was felt that fair representation of other geographical sections of Canada could only be secured by making the appointments to the unemployment insurance advisory committee in the manner in which they were made.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Return tabled.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES—TRACK SCALES AND RAILWAY TEST CAR

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn):

1. How many track scales are known to the Department of Trade and Commerce to be in use in Canada, and (a) who is the owner of each, and (b) in what province is each situated?
2. Are these track scales inspected by the weights and measures service, and, if so, what method and equipment is used?
3. Is the equipment used for testing track scales owned by the government?
4. How are the weights of railway test cars verified, and how often?
5. How many have been verified during the past ten years?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Return tabled.

DUFFERIN PAVING COMPANY—JAMES FRANCESCHINI

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Is James Franceschini, at present in an internment camp, connected as an officer, shareholder or otherwise, with the Dufferin Paving Company Limited, Toronto, Ontario?
2. What are the particulars of the contract or contracts that have been awarded to the said company by this government since the internment of said Franceschini?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Return tabled.

[Mr. McLarty.]

GERMAN PRISONERS OF WAR IN CANADA—RATIONS

Mr. NICHOLSON:

What are the details with regard to the quantities and items of the rations supplied, monthly, to each German prisoner of war interned in Canada?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Return tabled.

PORTSMOUTH PENITENTIARY STAFF

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

1. Since September, 1939, how many men employed at the Kingston penitentiary, Portsmouth, Ontario, have been (a) discharged; (b) superannuated; (c) let out on leave for military service?
2. Since September, 1939, how many men have been taken on the strength of Kingston penitentiary?
3. What are the names and addresses of men taken on strength since September, 1939?
4. What are their respective ages?
5. What military service have they had, if any?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Return tabled.

COLLINS BAY PENITENTIARY STAFF

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

1. Since September, 1939, how many men employed at the Collins Bay penitentiary, Collins Bay, Ontario, have been (a) discharged; (b) superannuated; (c) let out on leave for military service?
2. Since September, 1939, how many men have been taken on the strength of the Collins Bay penitentiary?
3. What are the names and addresses of those taken on since September, 1939?
4. What are their respective ages?
5. What military service, if any, have they had?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Return tabled.

EMPLOYMENT OF JUDGES IN EXTRA-JUDICIAL WORK

Mr. McGREGOR:

1. How many royal commissions have been set up by the federal governments since 1923?
2. What are the names of the judges who served on these commissions, and what amounts were paid to each of them?
3. What judges are now serving on boards of review under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, and what salary, allowances and expenses does each receive for this work?
4. While so employed, are judges also paid their statutory salaries?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Return tabled.

PAYMENTS TO CIVIL SERVANTS IN NAVAL, ARMY AND AIR FORCES

Mr. PURDY:

1. Are there any civil servants, permanent or temporary, now engaged in office work at Ottawa or elsewhere in Canada with the defence services at rates of pay, allowance and tax exemption which gives them a higher rate of income than they secured in their civil positions?

2. If so, what is the number involved, and the aggregate increase in remuneration?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Return tabled.

PRINTING AND DISTRIBUTION OF PRIME MINISTER'S SPEECHES

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

1. Have any speeches delivered by the Prime Minister since September 1, 1939, been printed at the public expense?

2. If so, how many speeches have been so printed, and what was the subject matter of each such speech?

3. How many copies of each such speech were printed?

4. What was the cost of printing each such speech?

5. Were such speeches distributed by any government department or agency?

6. If so, by what department or agency?

7. To whom were copies sent?

8. What was the cost of such distribution?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Return tabled.

NORTH SYDNEY AIRPORT AND SYDNEY MINES BARRACKS

Mr. MacLEAN (Cape Breton North-Victoria):

1. From whom were the stoves purchased for use at airport at North Sydney and barracks at Sydney Mines?

2. What type of stove was purchased and at what price each?

3. Were they purchased through an agent? If so, what is the name of such agent?

Mr. MacLEAN (Cape Breton North-Victoria):

1. From whom were each of the following properties purchased, (a) air field at Reserve Mines, Cape Breton, Nova Scotia; (b) that taken over for defence works at Centreville and Chapel Hill, Sydney Mines?

2. What price was paid for each property?

3. Was the amount paid to the owner in each case?

4. If not, to what agent or agents were these amounts paid?

Mr. MacLEAN (Cape Breton North-Victoria):

1. Were tenders called for the construction of barracks at Centreville and Chapel Hill, Sydney Mines, Nova Scotia?

2. On whose recommendation was the foreman at Chapel Hill barracks appointed?

COLIN MACKENZIE, K.C.

Mr. MacLEAN (Cape Breton North-Victoria):

1. Is Mr. Colin MacKenzie of Sydney, Nova Scotia, employed by the dominion government or any department thereof?

2. If so, what are his duties and salary?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY—W. J. SANDERSON

Mr. BENCE:

For a copy of the letter or letters of resignation of Mr. W. J. Sanderson from his position in the Department of Munitions and Supply, and any correspondence, memoranda or other documents relating to such resignation.

NATURAL RESOURCES MOBILIZATION—TRAINING OF MEN EMPLOYED IN WAR INDUSTRIES

Mr. BENCE:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, memoranda and other communications or documents passing between the Minister of National War Services or any official of the Department of National War Services or any official of any other department of the government, and Mr. W. J. Sanderson or any official of Fleet Aircraft Limited, relating to the training under the National Resources Mobilization Act of men employed in war industries.

RETIREMENT OF CHESTER WALTERS FROM DOMINION INCOME TAX DEPARTMENT

Mr. COLDWELL:

For a copy of all correspondence in the possession of the government relating to the retirement of Mr. Chester Walters from the employ of the income tax department of the dominion government.

NIPAWIN-FLIN FLON HIGHWAY

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, reports and other documents in the possession of the Department of Mines and Resources and dated during the years 1938, 1939 and 1940, in connection with the proposed highway between Nipawin, Saskatchewan, and Flin Flon, Manitoba.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I should like to amend this motion so that it will ask simply for the engineer's report instead of for all the correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I might offer a word of explanation. As the motion reads, it would involve a great deal of work to bring down the necessary documents. I spoke to the hon. member and ascertained that what he really desired was a copy of the engineer's report, and he is now suggesting that his motion be amended accordingly. That is quite satisfactory and I now table a copy of the engineer's report.

Motion as amended agreed to.

ROYAL AIR FORCE TRAINING SCHOOLS IN CANADA

Mr. G. J. TUSTIN (Prince Edward-Lennox) moved:

For a copy of all orders in council, correspondence, cables, memoranda of agreements and other documents relating to the arrangements made between his majesty's government in the United Kingdom and his majesty's government in Canada to transfer to and establish in Canada training schools for the Royal Air Force.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the documents and correspondence asked for by this motion would require us in the first place to obtain the consent of his majesty's government in the United Kingdom. But, apart from that, I may say to the hon. member who is asking for the production of these papers that they are of a confidential and secret nature, and therefore could not be made public at this time.

Motion dropped.

CANADIAN ARMY—RECRUITING; PAY AND ALLOWANCES

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all orders in council, rules and regulations, and all other instructions issued either under the Militia Act, the air force act, the naval affairs act, the army act, the War Measures Act, or the National Resources Mobilization Act, regarding recruiting and dealing with the rights and privileges, pay or allowances of soldiers of Canada's military forces.

Mr. RALSTON: A somewhat similar motion was made by the hon. member in May 1940. At the time the then minister was absent from the house. The papers were not brought down, and the objections to making the return were conveyed by the late minister to my hon. friend under date of July 11, in a letter a copy of which I should like to table. It is as follows:

Dear Mr. Church,

In connection with your request for a copy of all orders to Military Districts regarding recruiting, etc., I have received a memorandum on this question from the Chief of the General Staff, which I give you herewith.

"1. To comply with this request would imply the production of,

(a) Mobilization instructions for the Canadian militia—1937, which is a document marked "Not to be published",

[Mr. Crerar.]

(b) Certain recruiting memoranda which are "security" documents,

(c) Copies of a great deal of correspondence on secret files of this department.

2. As regards the documents mentioned in (a) and (b) above, it is pointed out that while the disclosure of much of what is contained in these publications would not in itself be prejudicial to the public interest or the safety of the state, there are certain other provisions in these documents whose publication probably would be detrimental. It would be difficult to disclose a portion of these documents without inferentially disclosing information regarding the non-published portions as well.

3. As regards secret documents, these are clearly privileged and I consider that it would be prejudicial to the public interest and the safety of the state if extracts therefrom were furnished. It is also pointed out that if documents of this character are published, either in whole or in part, a precedent is created which might be extremely embarrassing in other cases and which would tend to loosen the restrictions heretofore imposed with respect to documents of this character.

4. Again, it is to be noted that a large proportion of the correspondence in question refers to specific details of British war establishments and other British documents which the United Kingdom government classes as "security" documents. We hold these documents through the good will of the War Office and to publish details of them might in a sense be construed as a breach of the trust reposed in us to ensure their security.

5. Incidentally, it may be observed that the volume of correspondence and documents which might be deemed to come within the meaning of Mr. Church's request is such that I am informed that the work of reproduction alone would involve the employment of perhaps ten experienced typists for about two weeks."

The minister then goes on:

In view of the above I anticipate you will agree that the return which you requested would not serve any useful purpose as it would contain material which it would not be in the public interest to give out.

I wish to point out, Mr. Speaker, that in connection with this motion the judge advocate general has given the opinion that to comply with the request of the hon. member it will be necessary to supply him with every statute, law, regulation, pamphlet, order in council and instruction having reference to the Canadian forces. This would constitute a fair-sized library.

I am going to suggest to my hon. friend that the motion pass on the understanding that the documents to be brought down for the army will be limited to the financial regulations and instructions for the Canadian active service force on active service, Canada and overseas, and copies of recruiting memoranda provided they are not marked "security", "secret" or "confidential".

I want to add that if there is any particular document he has in mind and to which he will refer me, if it is not in the class of "security", "secret" or "confidential" I shall be glad to consider having that brought down as well.

Mr. CHURCH: A motion for this return passed last year, but the return was never brought down because some heads of departments objected to it. Now, there are rules and regulations which this government has not the power to pass, nor has the deputy, and if the deputy minister is going to usurp the functions of members of the House of Commons it is going to hurt recruiting. It is in the interests of recruiting in this country that the acts which parliament passes should be carried out, and that rules and regulations issued in respect to them should not be wider than the acts themselves. Take recruiting: on again, off again—you do not know where it is. One of the heads of the departments reduced the pay, $1.30, of the soldiers. It may be only a small thing, but it hinders recruiting. I see no reason why the information for which I have asked should not be produced, and I desire to have your ruling, Mr. Speaker, because this order passed the House of Commons and the papers should be tabled.

Mr. SPEAKER: The minister has suggested that this order should pass as amended; perhaps the hon. member did not hear what he said. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion as amended?

Motion as amended agreed to.

"TOOLS FOR TREACHERY"

INQUIRY WITH REFERENCE TO ARTICLE BY COMMISSIONER OF ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I would like to direct an inquiry to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). I wish to draw to his attention an article by Commissioner S. T. Wood, Royal Canadian Mounted Police, in the Canadian Spokesman of February 1941, entitled "Tools for Treachery", and particularly a sentence on page 6, reading as follows:

> A few parliamentarians, who are apparently sincere but obviously uninformed or indifferent to facts, are greatly encouraging the subversive elements by attacking the defence regulations.

I should be glad if the minister would read this article and indicate whether or not it reflects the views of the department, and if he considers that this is a proper expression of opinion from a public official when the House of Commons is in session.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Well, I will ask for a copy of the publication mentioned by my hon. friend, and I will certainly read it.

WHEAT

INQUIRY AS TO PAYMENT ON 1939 CROP AND POLICY FOR 1941

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the Minister of Agriculture when farmers may expect an interim or final payment on the 1939 crop, and also when the 1941 wheat policy will be announced?

Hon. JAMES A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I think that the answer to the first question will be found more or less in the report, tabled to-day, of the Canadian wheat board for the year 1938-39.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is it? We have not seen it.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It will be distributed immediately. Then, with regard to an announcement of policy covering the 1941 crop, it would be very easy to make a partial announcement immediately. We are, however, gathering information and hope within a very few days to make some partial announcement. We want to make that announcement as early as we possibly can so as to enable the farmers to make their plans for the year.

REPORT AS TO DISCONTINUANCE OF PROCESSING TAX ON WHEAT PROCESSED FOR FARMERS' OWN USE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The Winnipeg Free Press of February 11 carries a Canadian Press dispatch from Hartland, New Brunswick, which states that the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Hatfield) had said that he had received word from R. A. Ball, Secretary of the Canadian wheat board, to the effect that a processing tax of the board no longer would be collected from farmers hauling their own wheat to the mills for processing for their own use. Would the minister tell the house when the order in council was passed, and when it was tabled?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The order in council was signed on February 1, and I believe appeared in the public press on the same day. Do I understand the hon. member to ask that a copy of the order be tabled? If so, I shall be glad to see that it is done.

POSTAL SERVICE

COMPLAINT RESPECTING MAIL DELIVERIES IN TORONTO BUSINESS AND RESIDENTIAL AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to call the attention of the Postmaster General to the inadequacy of the mail service in some of the residential districts of Toronto. The department is receiving an annual revenue of almost $9,000,000 from Toronto, yet in some of the retail store districts and many residential areas the mail is not delivered until 10.30, 11.00, 11.15 and sometimes 11.45 o'clock in the morning. The mail service is a public utility, and I would ask the Postmaster General if he would look into the matter and see if a better service cannot be afforded such as previously was given. Would he also consider giving back to the people the privilege of the one-cent drop letter in Toronto city? The public is entitled to a much better service, and I trust the minister will make an inquiry.

Hon. W. P. MULOCK (Postmaster General): I shall have to make inquiries, and shall accept what the hon. member has said as a notice of question.

LABOUR DISPUTE

ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION BY BILTMORE SHIRT COMPANY AGAINST EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): May I ask the Minister of Labour if the attention of his department has been drawn to a case of alleged discrimination by the Biltmore Shirt Company of Montreal, at present engaged in the manufacture of shirts for the armed forces, against certain of their employees who are members of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers' Union and who have been discharged for attempting to organize the employees in that factory? If the matter has been drawn to the attention of the department, has any action been taken to have the discharged workers reinstated?

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Minister of Labour): The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) was good enough to give notice of his intention to ask this question. Information came to me shortly before noon to-day that the complaint to which he refers has been made. I was advised it was being investigated by the representative of the Department of Labour in Montreal. I have not yet had an opportunity of seeing his report. What may be done will of course depend upon the circumstances set out in that report.

[Mr. J. A. MacKinnon.]

SUPPLY

THE WAR—PRESENT POSITION—STATEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER ON MOTION OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of the present session, I outlined the international situation in considerable detail. On December 2, shortly before the adjournment, I sought to give an appreciation of the progress of the war. I propose to-day briefly to review events from where I left off when parliament adjourned. I shall endeavour to set forth the significance which, it seems to me, attaches to the sequence of events and to the world situation as it now presents itself. This statement, I trust, will afford a suitable background against which to consider external affairs, and the 1941-42 war appropriation bill.

It is not possible to divorce war enactments and the foreign policy on which they are necessarily based. This is particularly the case at a time of war when both foreign policy and war measures themselves are focused upon the successful prosecution of the war. It is proposed, therefore, to proceed at once with the estimates of the Department of External Affairs, and the war appropriation bill. This procedure it is believed will give to the house at as early a date as possible the information it will most wish to have. It should also prove advantageous to the consideration of the matters certain to arise in the discussion on both the estimates of the Department of External Affairs and the war appropriation bill.

Hon. members, I know, will be anxious to hear from the ministers who have recently visited the United Kingdom, and from other members of the government concerned with the administration of Canada's war effort. When early in December, just before the adjournment of the house, I spoke of the war, I gave reasons for the view that the situation for Britain and her allies was much better than it had been, not only at the time of the collapse of France, but in the months that followed that appalling catastrophe. The development of events has borne out the justness of that view. In the United Kingdom, night bombing raids, which were then the subject of so much anxiety, have become not more, but less effective. Submarine attacks, though continuing to constitute the gravest menace, have, in fact, in recent weeks, grown not more, but less destructive. In spite of enemy attempts at interference, the output of British industry has developed at a faster tempo and on a wider scale. On land, on sea and in the air the defences of the British isles have been materially strengthened. The morale of the British people has remained unshaken. If anything, the entire population has become more determined than ever. In Europe the Royal Air Force has effected large scale destruction of industrial plants and agencies of communication, and of naval and air bases, particularly the so-called invasion ports. The British navy has continued to patrol waters adjacent to the British shores, and to protect the transportation of men, munitions nad supplies to and from the British isles and other parts of the empire.

In the African campaign, the whole situation has changed, from one of grave uncertainty for the British, to one of the gravest concern for Italy. Spectacular victories have been gained over the enemy in the field. Indeed, only a few days after the house adjourned, the imperial forces in Egypt launched a strong attack on the Italian troops of Marshal Graziani, who, several weeks previously, had penetrated into western Egypt, and appeared to be preparing an attack on the Suez canal. The British advance, in which land, sea and air forces participated, carried all before it. Three Italian divisions were captured or destroyed on the first day, and British armoured troops pursued the retreating enemy as far as the Libyan border, some fifty miles distant. In the weeks that have followed, Libya itself has been invaded. Stronghold after stronghold has fallen to British arms. The troops of General Wavell, among whom the Australians have had a conspicuous part, have captured Bengazi, the Italian base more than three hundred miles inside the eastern Libyan border. They are continuing to sweep onward in the direction of Tripoli and the boundary of Libya on the west.

In Eritrea, the Italian colony on the other side of Egypt, the fascist forces are also in retreat. In Abyssinia, overrun by the Italians a few years ago, in flagrant disregard of the most solemn assurances under the covenant of the League of Nations, tribesmen are rising against their Italian conquerors. With British assistance they are making every effort to regain their lost freedom. The exiled emperor, Haile Selassie, has returned to his country, and the United Kingdom government, reaffirming that Great Britain has no territorial ambitions in Abyssinia, has recognized his claim to the throne. In Italian Somaliland, the British and South African forces have already occupied an area as large as Wales. In this fashion the whole Italian empire in Africa is vanishing before the eyes of the world.

Across the Mediterranean, in Albania, the Italians have fared no better. The Greek army, fighting with a valour worthy of the finest traditions of classical times, has since this house adjourned inflicted on the Italians a whole series of defeats. Thus far reinforcements from across the Adriatic have wholly failed to reverse the tide of battle.

In international affairs success in arms is a potent factor. That Britain, half armed and preoccupied with the defence of the British isles, was strong enough and courageous enough to spare men and materials of war for service in Africa; that the British fleet has been able to patrol the narrow waters of the Mediterranean and even in broad daylight to bombard Genoa, the leading Italian seaport; that assisted by the British naval and air force a small Greek army has repeatedly defeated vastly better equipped and more numerous Italian forces; these facts have undoubtedly served greatly to strengthen British prestige. They have helped to maintain the confidence of Turkey, Egypt and the Arab world. They have served to encourage the resistance of France and Spain to the pressure of German demands.

To view these facts in their true perspective, however, we must also recognize what nazi penetration has meant to Roumania and what the dread of a like fate means to-day to Bulgaria and Yugo-Slavia. We should also keep in mind that the victories have been won against the minor and not the major axis partner. Italian power is one thing; the might of nazi Germany is quite another.

The Italian defeats to which I have alluded have a further significance. They have shown in unmistakable fashion that, while the Italian soldier has been led into war, his heart is not in the cause. It would be difficult otherwise to explain the apathy, discontent and indifference which have marked the conduct of operations on the Italian side. Numbers are important and equipment is important, but neither one nor both of them can make up for a lack of fighting spirit. The fascist regime has been discredited in the eyes of its own people. The Italian people are not, and in this war have never been, behind Mussolini. As Mr. Churchill said in his broadcast to the people of Italy on December 23, the Italians have been forced into alliance with the nazi aggressors by one man, against the will of the king and the royal family of Italy, against the Pope and all the authority of the vatican and of the Roman Catholic church, and against their own wishes. Could anything illustrate more completely the power and the dangers of dictatorship?

I now turn to a development of far greater significance. It is the change which has taken place in the attitude of the United States. It serves by constrast to illustrate the methods of a democracy in safeguarding its interests and asserting its power. The rapid crystallization of opinion in the United States in favour of actively assisting the democratic countries in their struggle against aggression has been the most important event of the present year and the months immediately preceding.

The earlier policy of the United States was devised before the war started. It was based upon an assumption which ignored the real character of the present struggle. American ships were withdrawn from British waters and forbidden to enter the war zone; the belligerents were allowed to buy only what they could pay for and themselves carry away. Purchases were limited to such as could be made in the course of normal business. The unanswerable logic of events has brought home to the American people the realization that their future development, their security, the survival of the democratic way of life, are all bound up inseparably with the defence of Britain and the defeat of aggression. The president's message to congress, one of the most important in his great career, set forth in words which cannot be misunderstood, a new policy of full material support of peoples resolute in resisting aggression. It expressed the determination of the United States that the cause of freedom shall prevail.

The president's message is more than a statement of principles. It deals with means as well as with ends. The new policy as laid down by Mr. Roosevelt envisages sending ships, planes, tanks and guns to beleaguered Britain and to other nations resisting aggression. This aid is to be furnished in ever-increasing measure without the exaction of immediate payment and regardless of the threats of dictators. The precise form which assistance will take is now engaging the attention of the competent branches of government in the United States. It is a matter for the United States alone to decide. To the whole democratic world, however, the new policy has brought fresh hope and renewed resolution.

The United States is without question the most powerful economic unit in the world. In terms of national income, a recognized measure of economic strength, it outweighs Germany at least four to one. The United States has an annual output more than twice as great as all Europe. The forces against which the mobilization of this vast, this unrivalled industrial power is directed, must eventually feel the full weight of the impact. Meanwhile its growing might towers like an impending avalanche above the heads of the aggressor nations.

That the material assistance of the United States on the scale contemplated will in the long run be of decisive importance, there can be no shadow of doubt. We must make sure, however, that there is a long run. A very critical stage is certain to be reached before the full aid of the United States becomes available. As I pointed out in a broadcast a fortnight ago, there are many indications that in the immediate future the enemy will make a tremendous effort to destroy the British commonwealth by a series of smashing blows of unprecedented severity. The skies are full of sure signs of a gathering storm.

Where the storm will break we cannot say. It may come in the near east, or in the western Mediterranean, or in the far east, or over Britain itself. It may come in more than one place at the same time. Signs are not lacking that it may come in all these places at once. Among diplomatic and military authorities there is a growing belief in the possibility of a world-wide conflagration involving an attempted German invasion of Britain timed with thrusts at Suez and Gibraltar and a Japanese thrust at Singapore. The German air force and army may try to break Britain; simultaneously the combined axis powers may try to seize Britain's most strategic positions, Gibraltar, Suez and Singapore.

It would be the gravest of errors to assume that growing alarm and tension in the Balkans mean that Hitler is abandoning for the time being attack upon the British isles. It is British power that Hitler is out to destroy, and the seat of it is the island fortress in the North sea. It is no less apparent that the destruction of British power is the bond that cements the axis powers. Only by the defeat of Britain can the combined totalitarian powers gain their world sway. It is well that this fact should be kept continually in mind and squarely faced. There is, moreover, nothing to be gained by failing to view the strategic world picture in its true proportions. On the contrary there is everything to be gained by seeing it as a whole and in its true light. It is to the emergence of this wider vision that Britain and her allies owe the ever-increasing aid from the United States.

If I venture again to draw attention to the situation as it must present itself in any realistic view, it is not because I wish to lessen the optimism to which the successes thus far achieved have naturally given rise, but rather to see that they do not blind us to the real struggle which has still to be faced, and which I believe is even now at hand. That the forces of freedom will triumph in the end, I have no doubt whatever. But equally I believe, as I have already so frequently said, that the road is going to be much harder, much longer and much more terrible than most people imagine. We should govern our thoughts and actions accordingly.

The enemy must be held back until his strength can be matched. That day will not come soon. Long, grim months lie ahead, in which we must expect set-backs and discouragements. In the present circumstances it is more than ever necessary to steel our hearts and minds to the magnitude of the effort, and of the sacrifice, that will be demanded of us over a considerable period of time and, in a special measure, throughout the next few months. We are too prone to think of the outcome of the last great war and to draw our conclusions from it. It is well, therefore, that we should check up comparisons with the last war at all possible points.
