"The Beauty of the precedes me."

SOME time in every man's life there is a desire to play monarch and rule over a little domain of his own. So strong has this ruling passion been that many adventurous spirits have sought out remote islands in both the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans and there set up court for themselves. But the man of affairs cannot spare time to roam the high seas in search of a monarchless island no matter how much he longs to sway the sceptre.

On the border line between the provinces of Ontario and Manitoba and the state of Minnesota there lies a lake with the fascinating name of the "Lake of the Woods."

It stretches away from wooded shores to thousands of little islands on many of which wealthy people have already established miniature kingdoms in the shape of beautiful summer residences.

The Charm of the Wild

There is a distinct charm about these island homes that appeals to every one who can indulge in such a luxury. At the upper end of the lake on the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, easily accessible from all points of both Canada and the United States, is situated the Town of Kenora. Here, if anywhere, is the motor-boat enthusiasts' paradise. Here one finds comfortable hotels, cottages, boat and bathing houses, which help to make pleasant the life of the summer visitor.

There are all kinds of water sports and during the summer big regattas with races for motor boats, sail boats two, four and eight oared shells with competing crews as far distant as Winnipeg, St. Paul, Duluth, Fort William and

Fort Arthur. There are many interesting places to visit, such as the gold mines, quaint Indian villages and for those who care for slightly longer trips there are the steamers "Keenora" and "Agwinde" that run between Kenora and Fort Frances, a round trip of over 400 miles.

BEGATTA DAY

Occasionally when cruising among the islands you may see a deer or a startled fawn at the water's edge. A sight to delight the children—and older folk as well.

On nearly all the islands are to be found sandy beaches, where the owners, great and small, can swim and splash to their heart's content.

A man with a motor boat and a chart of the lake, a friend or a guide, good gun, fishing and camping outfit, and a well-filled locker, can cruise around the islands for weeks without camping twice in the same place. Away from the towns in the most remote parts of the lake, the hunter and fisherman will find great sport. In their season, wild duck and geese in large flocks pass over the lake, and pike and black bass abound in these waters. The story one can tell about the catch when returning home will depend entirely on the supply of bait; there are plenty of fish.

To the man who enjoys donning a rough flannel shirt and corduroys, pitching his own tent, and boiling his coffee over the crackling fire, the environs of the Lake of the Woods will prove ideal. As he sits and smokes his pipe after a good day's sport, and watches the oncoming night, over the tree tops and across the waters, the sense of freedom and peace born of the deep silences of the woods seems to lift that load of worry, which every man accepts as part of his responsibility in life, and makes living a positive joy.

The charm of the Lake of the Woods is that it affords all the pleasures of the great solitudes and also offers the comforts of modern life. It is an ideal summering place for every member of the family. You can rough it in the woods, twenty minutes from your comfortable hotel, or have a cottage of your

The Charm of the Wild

When one considers the splendid transportation facilities of the Canadian Pacific Railroad, and the very comfortable hotel accommodations to be had at Kenora, even week-end visits may be enjoyed by those whose affairs render it impossible for them to get away for any length of time. This form of holiday has become especially popular with men whose families are spending the summer at the lake.

If you want to acquire an appetite that will frighten the cook, if you want to regain the muscle you had as a lad at college, if you want to sleep once more as you slept when a healthy, happy boy, try a summer at the Lake of the Woods.

Busy steamers cut through the waters of the big lake, winding in and out among the many islands bearing their load of happy, pleasure-seekers and calling at the various points of interest along the route. To the week-ender or all-summer guest these well-equipped, commodious boats afford many pleasures that even the owners of motor craft do not enjoy. A trip around the lake aboard one of these sturdy vessels is an experience long to be remembered when one gets back to town. There are moonlights too, when the fairy islands standing out against the deep blue sky and water, make a dream-world of the lake and her little boats.
